

IMMIGRATION AND REFUGEE LAW AND POLICY

FIFTH EDITION

STEPHEN H. LEGOMSKY
CRISTINA M. RODRÍGUEZ

FOUNDATION PRESS

IMMIGRATION AND REFUGEE LAW AND POLICY

FIFTH EDITION

by

STEPHEN H. LEGOMSKY

The John S. Lehmann University Professor
Washington University School of Law

CRISTINA M. RODRÍGUEZ

Professor of Law
New York University School of Law

FOUNDATION PRESS

2009

THOMSON REUTERS™

This publication was created to provide you with accurate and authoritative information concerning the subject matter covered; however, this publication was not necessarily prepared by persons licensed to practice law in a particular jurisdiction. The publisher is not engaged in rendering legal or other professional advice and this publication is not a substitute for the advice of an attorney. If you require legal or other expert advice, you should seek the services of a competent attorney or other professional.

Nothing contained herein is intended or written to be used for the purposes of 1) avoiding penalties imposed under the federal Internal Revenue Code, or 2) promoting, marketing or recommending to another party any transaction or matter addressed herein.

© 1992, 1997, 2002 FOUNDATION PRESS

© 2005 THOMSON REUTERS/FOUNDATION PRESS

© 2009 By THOMSON REUTERS/FOUNDATION PRESS

195 Broadway, 9th Floor

New York, NY 10007

Phone Toll Free 1-877-888-1330

Fax (212) 367-6799

foundation-press.com

Printed in the United States of America

ISBN 978-1-59941-613-7

To Annie, Katie, and Lorraine, and in loving memory of my parents, Jack and Pauline SHL

Para mi familia
CMR

*

PREFACE TO FIFTH EDITION

In the United States of America, immigration touches everyone. The vast majority of us are either immigrants ourselves or the recent descendants of immigrants. Some Americans, and some of our ancestors, fled hopelessness and poverty. Others came to escape tyranny. A great number sought to unite their families. Still others were brought here forcibly, as slaves.

But whether one's own immigrant heritage is centuries-old or more recent, all who live here now are part of a national community whose character has been sculpted by generations of immigrants. History aside, the law by which a nation selects its members speaks volumes about the nation's values and about the society those values will produce.

That United States immigration policy permeates every aspect of American life and affects millions of people in far-off lands might alone explain the fervor with which immigration issues tend to be argued. But there are other explanations. Debates in this field ignite core values that excite passion—fundamental beliefs about sovereignty, national security, race, personal autonomy, equal economic opportunity, freedom of association, national community, civil rights and human rights, taxes, jobs, education, welfare, law enforcement, labor policy, the environment, foreign relations, war, and the distribution of wealth. Those issues and passions are not uniquely American and neither, therefore, is the debate over immigration. The United States has a distinctive immigration history, but globalization, transportation, technology, armed conflict, and rapid economic change have brought the immigration issue to sending and receiving states all over the world.

The first edition of this book appeared in 1992. Its preface described the surging public interest in immigration policy and frenetic change in immigration law. Since then, public interest has only continued to surge and the law has continued to lurch forward, rapidly and at times clumsily. The present edition reflects a number of important developments that altered the content, and to some extent the organization, of the materials. At this writing there is renewed, serious talk of “comprehensive” immigration reform, which could include such elements as enhanced border and interior enforcement, liberalization of the criteria for permanent legal immigration, a new guest worker program, and legalization for a large sector of the undocumented population. The burgeoning emphasis on illegal immigration, combined with the more assertive roles of state and local governments in immigration policy, have required an expanded and reorganized chapter 12 (undocumented immigrants). The present edition also explores the trend toward “criminalization” of immigration law, new developments on gender-based asylum claims and the “social group” prong of asylum, emerging problems in the immigration adjudication system, important changes in the law regarding ineffective assistance of counsel, several recent Supreme Court decisions, the “material support for terrorism” exclusion, and many other significant changes to the legal, political, economic, and cultural landscape of immigration and refugee law and policy.

Such is the life of immigration law. The public mood is ever volatile, and so are the resulting rules. Through it all, America for more than 200 years has sustained two venerable traditions. One is to admit immigrants in plentiful numbers. The other is to complain, every step of the way, that today’s immigrants just aren’t of the same caliber as yesterday’s. The irony, of course, is that today’s immigrants eventually become the role models to whom tomorrow’s immigrants invariably suffer by comparison.

Something else is different. In the past, Congress typically enacted major immigration legislation every ten to twenty years and let things simmer in between. Starting in the 1980s, the bouts of inactivity shrank. Today, major policy changes take place almost every year. The “immigration issue” is now, and almost certainly will remain, a perennial.

The law school world has kept pace with that trend. Twenty years ago, the law school that offered a course in immigration was the exception rather than the norm. Today, immigration law is taught at almost every United States law school. Many law schools also offer immigration clinics and specialized courses in refugee law, citizenship law, or business immigration. Scholarship in this once esoteric field is now abundant, sophisticated, and diverse. And in our information age, exchanges of ideas now routinely occur across both national boundaries and disciplinary boundaries.

The Pedagogy

Immigration courses are taught in a variety of ways that reflect both the instructors’ pedagogical goals and their preferred methodologies. Our goals for a course in immigration and refugee law include those that we consider fundamental to legal education generally—honing students’ abilities to analyze, evaluate, and synthesize difficult materials; challenging them to think about broader questions of law and social policy; training them to work with, and to develop confidence in their abilities to work with, traditional legal materials such as statutes and cases; sharpening problem-solving skills; enhancing communication skills; and fostering social and ethical responsibility. Beyond those general goals, we believe a survey course in immigration law should strive to accomplish other things: It should expose students to the core principles of immigration law; force them to think critically about immigration policy and the theory that underlies it; use the comprehensive and intricate Immigration and Nationality Act as a vehicle for teaching statutory interpretation techniques; and enable students to acquire a feel for the administrative process so central to immigration. Above all, a successful immigration course should appeal to students' imaginations, encouraging them to embrace ideas from other nations, from other disciplines, and from polar opposite ideologies.

This coursebook, therefore, walks a middle ground. It mixes theory, policy, and politics with practice-oriented materials that deal in doctrine, planning, and problem-solving. There is enough of both kinds of material that instructors will be able to give their courses whatever emphasis they think appropriate.

A few distinctive features of the book are worth mentioning:

(1) There is heavy use of fact problems. They generally call upon the student to plan a strategy for helping a hypothetical client or analyze how a case is likely to come out.

(2) There are a number of "Simulation Exercises." Students play the roles of legislative drafters, witnesses testifying for or against proposed reform legislation, immigration lawyers advising clients, lawyers engaged in oral argument before an appellate court, dissenting judges, and members of Congress debating bills on the House floor. The most ambitious of the simulation exercises are a mock removal hearing (chapter 9) at which the students play the roles of government trial attorneys and the immigrant's counsel, and a simulated attorney-client asylum interview (chapter 11). Student enthusiasm for these simulations has been especially keen and the preparation levels unusually high.

(3) Immigration lawyers know that this area of practice involves much more than statutes and appellate court decisions. The materials here attempt, within reasonable limits, to impart the flavor of the administrative process. Substantial space is devoted to the decisions of the Board of Immigration Appeals (BIA), to important principles of administrative law, and to the interplay between the statute and the regulations.

(4) The Notes and Questions are much more extensive than in most law school coursebooks, and an explanation is in order. Whatever classroom methods a teacher uses—Socratic dialogue, group discussion, lecture, simulation, or a combination—the educational gains are greatest when the students have done some hard thinking before they walk into the classroom. Those of us who teach Socratically have a particular problem: The Socratic method achieves its goals only if the questions are provocative and challenging. If they are, however, students who hear the questions in class for the first time will rarely be able to provide spontaneous answers that do the questions justice. To address that dilemma, this book contains the kinds of questions and fact problems—ranging from highly theoretical to highly practical—that can be used as the basis for classroom discussion to the extent the instructor wishes. Spontaneity has its benefits, but too often the flip side is a superficial level of analysis devoid of any lasting educational benefit. When students think critically about specific questions and problems before class, their thoughts can be more contemplative and the resulting class discussion more vibrant and sophisticated. At any rate, most of the questions generate differences of opinion that preserve a good deal of spontaneity.

This book is intended to be used in conjunction with the text of the Immigration and Nationality Act. Several excellent statutory supplements (which also include the texts of the 1951 Refugee Convention, 1967 Protocol, and miscellaneous other documents) are available.

STEVE LEGOMSKY CRISTINA RODRÍGUEZ

July 2009

ACKNOWLEDGMENTS

BY STEVE LEGOMSKY

I am delighted and fortunate to have Cristina Rodríguez as a co-author beginning with this edition. Her contributions have already enhanced the book immeasurably and will add still more in the coming years.

It is customary for an author to thank the many people without whose efforts the book could not possibly have been written. That tribute is traditionally followed by a gracious acknowledgment that any errors are, of course, solely the responsibility of the author.

I have always dreamed of writing a book in which I could say: "No one helped me with this book. And there are no errors, but if there were, they would be somebody else's fault."

Over the years, a great number of people have shattered that dream. A few deserve special mention. When I wrote the first edition I was just getting my feet wet in refugee and asylum law; Deborah Anker came to my rescue and vastly improved what is now chapter 11. Maria Frankowska has provided an endless stream of encouragement and ideas, and she has diplomatically identified errors in time for me to correct them. Arthur Helton, killed in Baghdad while continuing his life's work of human rights for all, was and remains a source of ideas and inspiration; his friendship was a gift. Peter Schuck's prolific and provocative feedback has been especially generous. I am grateful to the Honorable Gene McNary for educating me about the immigration bureaucracy and Capitol Hill at monthly meetings during his four-year term as Commissioner of the former INS. I also thank two other special people—Kevin Johnson and Michael Olivas—for their continuing commentary, for alerting me to a glaring (and embarrassing) omission in the first two editions, and most of all for their lasting friendship.

I extend my sincere appreciation to all the friends and colleagues whose generous comments are reflected in successive editions of this book. The list has grown long, but here's my best try: Muneer Ahmad, Lynn Alvarez, Deborah Anker, Rodney Barker, Betsy Bedient, Lenni Benson, Patty Blum, Cindy Buys, Franco Capriotti, Gabriel (Jack) Chin, Michael Churgin, Mary Crock, Clark Cunningham, Nora Demleitner, Valerie Epps, Jason Eyster, the late Joan Fitzpatrick, Eugene Flynn, Susan Saab Fortney, Maria Frankowska, Maryellen Fullerton, Michael Gans, Pamela Goldberg, Iris Gomez, Guy Goodwin-Gill, the late Charles Gordon, Honorable John Gossart, Elwin Griffith, Lucas Guttentag, Kay Hailbronner, Lee Hall, James Hathaway, Dina Haynes, the late Arthur Helton, Berta Hernández-Truyol, Michael Heyman, David Hudson, Linton Joaquin, Kevin Johnson, Mark Jones, Dan Kanstroom, Harvey Kaplan, Linda Kelly, Christina Kleiser, Dan Kowalski, Estelle Lau, Arnold Leibowitz, Warren Leiden, the late Daniel Levy, Michael Maggio, Stanley Mailman, Susan Martin, Angela McCaffrey, Gene McNary, Isabel Medina, Frank Miller, Hiroshi Motomura, Craig Mousin, Jim Nafziger, Gerald Neuman, Michael Olivas, Huyen Pham, Michele Pistone, Judy Rabinovitz, the late Maurice Roberts, the late William Robie, Victor Romero, Linda Rose, Lory Rosenberg, John Scanlan, Andy Schoenholtz, Phil Schrag, Peter Schuck, Rebecca Sharpless, Anna Shavers, Roy Simon, Peter Spiro, William Stock, Michael Straus, Michael Teitelbaum, David Thronson, Karen Tokarz, Bernard Trujillo, Jorge Vargas, Leti Volpp, Shoba Wadhia, Jon Weinberg, David Weissbrodt, Virgil Wiebe, Leon Wildes, and Steve Yale-Loehr.

I also appreciate the information provided by John Bjurke, Robert Bombaugh, Tomas Curi, Bruce Hake, Michael Hoefler, Honorable Gerald Hurwitz, Rick Inzunza, Mary Ann Mohan, Chester Moyer, Honorable David Neal, Charles Oppenheim, Honorable Paul Schmidt, Cornelius D. Scully, Paul Virtue, and Carol Wolchok. Closer to home, I have benefitted from the insights of my friends Suzanne Brown, Larry Carp, Lilian Fernandez, and George Newman.

Locky Nimick (1st edition), Caryn Jackson (2nd edition), Karla Mitchell (1999 Supplement), and Stacie Powderly (4th edition) served as research assistants. All were outstanding. The staff of the Washington University Law Library, and especially Peggy McDermott, deserve the highest praise. The late Mary Ellen Powers, my secretary and dear friend for almost 20 years, was a special person, as all who knew her will attest. Her successor, Jo Hobbs, has also done fabulous work that I have much appreciated. As anyone who has ever written a coursebook well knows, I am greatly indebted to the many students whose questions and ideas have made their way onto the pages of the book. Those of us who teach immigration law also have the most supportive colleagues one could ever hope for. It has sometimes felt as if 100 co-authors and friends were with me as I was working.

Before writing the first edition, I had the advantage of teaching for several years from an excellent coursebook by Alex Aleinikoff and Dave Martin. Since then, the additions of Hiroshi Motomura and Maryellen Fullerton have only enhanced their fine book. I value their friendship and continue to appreciate their huge positive impact on our field.

In the first edition I thanked my little daughters, Annie and Katie, for their superb assistance with the cutting and pasting. By the time of the second edition, alas, they had grown too old for cutting and pasting. By then, technology and downsizing had eliminated that job anyway. They still contribute nonetheless, in countless ways that they will not fully appreciate until they are blessed with children of their own. Expressing proper appreciation to them, and to my loving wife, Lorraine, is not possible in a few words. They have all tolerated my ridiculous work hours and my mood swings with much more grace than I deserve, and they have provided the love and encouragement that have sustained me through the most grueling periods.

So much for my dream.

The author thanks the many people without whose efforts this book could not possibly have been written. Any errors are, of course, solely the responsibility of the author.

*

ACKNOWLEDGMENTS

BY CRISTINA RODRIGUEZ

I am honored and thrilled to have begun this collaboration with Steve Legomsky, whose contributions to the field of immigration law, and to my own appreciation and understanding of it, have been extraordinary. I first engaged the subjects of immigration and citizenship in historical and theoretical perspective as a student at Yale College, under the guidance of Rogers Smith, whose work continues to shape my thinking profoundly, and whose early mentorship still means the world to me. Harold Koh supervised my first attempt at immigration law scholarship when I was a student at Yale Law School, and I count his example and encouragement as crucial to my development as a teacher and scholar. I also encountered the work and ideas of Peter Schuck and Mike Wishnie while still a law student, and I attribute my eventual gravitation to this field in large part to their influence.

Since I joined the legal academy in 2004, many of the established figures of the immigration law world have extended crucial intellectual and personal support. I have benefitted, in particular, from the warm welcome of Hiroshi Motomura. With great enthusiasm and remarkable generosity, he encourages junior scholars by providing copious advice about teaching, as well as sharp and incisive feedback on scholarly work. Alex Aleinikoff, Dave Martin, and my exceptional colleague, Nancy Morawetz, also have been invaluable interlocutors. Integral to finding my way have also been the lively and frequent conversations I have had with an incredible cohort of relatively recent arrivals to the field, particularly Kerry Abrams, Adam Cox, Clare Huntington, and Juliet Stumpf. Without my collaborations over the last two years with the Migration Policy Institute and, especially, Muzaffar Chishti, my understanding of the political economy of immigration law and my conceptions of what is truly at stake in the migration debates of our time would be impoverished.

I cannot imagine a more dynamic and supportive environment in which to teach and write than the NYU School of Law. The rigorous and challenging interactions I have with my colleagues on a daily basis, in workshops and informal debates, make my work stronger and my conception of this field more honest and clear. I have the great fortune of teaching highly engaged and deeply intelligent students, whose probing questions on the minutiae of the INA and the grand themes of membership, national identity, and belonging make my classroom hours extremely fruitful, as well as exhausting. I am particularly grateful to Rebecca Press for her excellent research assistance on this project.

Thank you to the many teachers and friends, too numerous to list here, whose work, support, and example have made possible all of my professional endeavors, including my participation in the writing of this book. All errors are mine and my co-author's.

TECHNICAL CONVENTIONS AND ABBREVIATIONS

Deletions from reprinted materials are indicated by three asterisks. If an entire paragraph is being deleted, the asterisks are centered. Footnotes and citations, however, are deleted without notation.

Previous editions used 3 different numbering schemes for footnotes—one for author footnotes to author text, one for author footnotes to reprinted materials, and one for the original footnotes in reprinted materials. That scheme was cumbersome and confusing. In this edition, therefore, we have gone to a new system. We use one continuous sequence of footnotes, starting with footnote 1, in each chapter, regardless of whose footnote it was. The reader will still be able to distinguish author footnotes from original footnotes in reprinted materials. If the footnote is part of the original reprinted material, the footnote will start with the phrase “[Footnote x in original.]” If the footnote is added by the authors to reprinted material, the abbreviation “Eds.” will appear at the end of the footnote.

The Immigration and Nationality Act (INA) has been codified as title 8 of the United States Code (8 U.S.C.). Title 8 has not yet been enacted into positive law. The INA and 8 U.S.C. use different sequences of section numbers, and there is no systematic conversion formula. For example, INA §§ 101 and 212 correspond, respectively, to 8 U.S.C. §§ 1101 and 1182. For the sake of uniformity (and because DOJ and DHS regulations are pegged to the INA section numbers that they implement), this book uses only the INA section numbers. References to sections of 8 U.S.C. in the reprinted materials have all been changed to INA section numbers without any notations to that effect. Students using this book should not need the parallel citations to 8 U.S.C., but a conversion chart is provided at the front of each volume of 8 U.S.C.A. for anyone who wants it.

The following abbreviations are used throughout the book:

1951 Convention	Convention Relating to the Status of Refugees, 1951 U.N.T.S. 137, accepted by U.N. Conference of Plenipotentiaries on the Status of Refugees and Stateless Persons, signed at Geneva, July 28, 1951
1967 Protocol	United Nations Protocol Relating to the Status of Refugees, 606 U.N.T.S. 267, 19 U.S.T. 6223, T.I.A.S. No. 6577, done at New York, Jan. 31, 1967
200[x] Yearbook of Immigration Statistics	U.S. Dept. of Homeland Security, Office of Immigration Statistics, 200[x] Yearbook of Immigration Statistics

AEDPA	Antiterrorism and Effective Death Penalty Act of 1996, Pub.L. 104-132, 110 Stat. 1214 (Apr. 24, 1996)
AILA	American Immigration Lawyers Association (the main national organization for immigration lawyers in the private sector)
Anker	Deborah E. Anker, Law of Asylum in the United States (3d ed. 1999) (the leading treatise on U.S. asylum law)
BALCA	Board of Alien Labor Certification Appeals (within Dept. of Labor)
BIA	Board of Immigration Appeals (within EOIR, below)
BIB	Bender's Immigration Bulletin
CAT	Convention Against Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment, UNGA Res. 39/46, 39 U.N. GAOR Supp. (No. 51) at 197, U.N. Doc. A/39/51 (adopted 10 Dec. 1984)
CBP	Customs and Border Protection (within DHS, below)
DHS	U.S. Department of Homeland Security
EBSVERA	Enhanced Border Security and Visa Entry Reform Act of 2002, Pub. L. 107-173, 116 Stat. 543 (May 14, 2002)
EOIR	Executive Office for Immigration Review (adjudicative tribunal within Dept. of Justice)
F.A.M.	U.S. Dept. of State, Foreign Affairs Manual (updated regularly)
Gordon, Mailman, & Yale-Loehr	Charles Gordon, Stanley Mailman & Stephen Yale-Loehr, Immigration Law and Procedure (the leading treatise on immigration law; multiple volumes updated regularly)
HSA	Homeland Security Act of 2002, Pub. L. 107-296, 116 Stat. 2135 (Nov. 25, 2002)

I. & N. Dec.	United States Dept. of Justice, Administrative Decisions under Immigration and Nationality Laws (bound volumes reporting decisions of BIA, AG, and sometimes USCIS or former INS)
ICE	Immigration and Customs Enforcement (within DHS, above)
IIRIRA	Illegal Immigration Reform and Immigrant Responsibility Act of 1996, Pub.L. 104-208, 110 Stat. 3009, Div. C (Sept. 30, 1996)
IR	Interpreter Releases
IJ	Immigration Judge (within EOIR, above)
IMFA	Immigration Marriage Fraud Amendments, Pub.L. 99-639, 100 Stat. 3537 (Nov. 10, 1986)
Imm. Act 1990	Immigration Act of 1990, Pub.L. 101-649, 104 Stat. 4978 (Nov. 29, 1990)
INA	Immigration and Nationality Act, Pub.L. 82-414, 66 Stat. 163 (June 27, 1952), as amended
INS	U.S. Immigration and Naturalization Service (now defunct agency replaced by several agencies within DHS)
INS OIs	INS Operations Instructions (internal guidelines for employees of former INS, refining regulations)
IRCA	Immigration Reform and Control Act, Pub.L. 99-603, 100 Stat. 3359 (Nov. 5, 1986)
LIFE	Legal Immigration and Family Equity Act, Pub.L. 106-553, 114 Stat. 2762, Title 11 (Dec. 21, 2000) and Pub.L. 106-554, 114 Stat. 2763, Title 15, Div. B (Dec. 21, 2000)
LPR	Noncitizen admitted as "lawful permanent resident" of the United States
NACARA	Nicaraguan Adjustment and Central American Relief Act, Pub.L. 105-100, Title II, 111 Stat. 2160, 2193 (Nov. 19, 1997)
OCAHO	Office of the Chief Administrative Hearing Officer (within EOIR, above)

REAL ID Act	REAL ID Act of 2005, Division B of Pub. L. 109-13, 119 Stat. 231 (May 11, 2005)
UNHCR	Office of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees
UNHCR Handbook	UNHCR, Handbook on Procedures and Criteria for Determining Refugee Status (Geneva, Sept. 1979)
USA PATRIOT Act	Uniting and Strengthening America by Providing Appropriate Tools Required to Intercept and Obstruct Terrorism Act of 2001, Pub.L. 107-56, 115 Stat. 272 (Oct. 26, 2001)
USCIS	U.S. Citizenship and Immigration Services (within DHS, above)
VO	Visa Office (an office of the Bureau of Consular Affairs, within the State Dept.)
Welfare Act	Personal Responsibility and Work Opportunity Reconciliation Act of 1996, Pub. L. 104-193, 110 Stat. 2105 (Aug. 22, 1996)

PERMISSIONS

The author acknowledges the permissions kindly granted to reprint excerpts from the following works:

T. Alexander Aleinikoff, Citizens, Aliens, Membership and the Constitution, 7 Const. Commentary 9. Copyright © 1990 Constitutional Commentary. Reprinted by permission.

Deborah E. Anker, Refugee Status and Violence Against Women in the "Domestic" Sphere: The Non-State Actor Question, 15 Georgetown Immigration L.J. 391 (2001). Copyright © 2001 Deborah E. Anker. Reprinted by permission.

David Bacon, Be Our Guests, Reprinted with permission from the September 27, 2004 issue of The Nation. For subscription information, call 1-800-333-8536. Portions of each week's Nation magazine can be accessed at <http://www.thenation.com>.

George J. Borjas, Heaven's Door (1999). Copyright © 1999 Princeton University Press. Reprinted by permission.

Linda S. Bosniak, Exclusion and Membership: The Dual Identity of the Undocumented Worker under United States Law, 1988 Wisconsin L.Rev. 955. Copyright © 1988 Wisconsin Law Review. Reprinted by permission.

Peter Brimelow, Alien Nation—Common Sense about America's Immigration Disaster (1995). Copyright © 1995 by Peter Brimelow. Reprinted by permission of the Wylie Agency.

Howard F. Chang, Migration as International Trade: The Economic Gains from the Liberalized Movement of Labor, 3 UCLA J. Internat'l L. & Foreign Affairs 371 (1998). Copyright © 1998 Howard F. Chang. Reprinted by permission.

Gabriel J. Chin, Segregation's Last Stronghold: Race Discrimination and the Constitutional Law of Immigration, originally published in 46 UCLA L.Rev. 1 (1998). Copyright © 1998, The Regents of the University of California. All Rights Reserved. Reprinted by permission.

David Cole, The Priority of Morality: The Emergency Constitution's Blind Spot, 113 Yale L.J. 1753 (2004). Copyright © 2004 The Yale Law Journal. Reprinted by permission.

Robert A. Divine, American Immigration Policy 1924–1952. Copyright © 1957 Yale University Press, Inc. Reprinted by permission.

Joan Fitzpatrick, Temporary Protection of Refugees: Elements of a Formalized Regime, 94 Amer. Journal Internat'l L. 279 (2000). Copyright © 2000 American Society of International Law. Reprinted by permission.

Guy S. Goodwin-Gill & Jane McAdam, The Refugee in International Law, 3rd ed. Copyright © 2007 Oxford University Press. Reprinted by permission.

Charles Gordon, Stanley Mailman & Stephen Yale-Loehr, Immigration Law and Procedure. Copyright © 2009 Matthew Bender & Co., Inc. Reprinted by permission.

Jacqueline Greatbatch, The Gender Difference: Feminist Critiques of Refugee Discourse, 1 Internat'l J. Refugee L. 518. Copyright © 1989 Oxford University Press. Reprinted by permission.

Henry Grunwald, Home is Where You Are Happy, in Time (July 8, 1985). Copyright © 1985 Time, Inc. Reprinted by permission.

Arthur C. Helton, Persecution on Account of Membership in a Social Group as a Basis for Refugee Status, 15 Columbia Human Rights L.Rev. 39. Copyright © 1983 Columbia Human Rights Law Review. Reprinted by permission.

Louis Henkin, Foreign Affairs and the Constitution. Copyright © 1972 Louis Henkin. Reprinted by permission.

Berta Esperanza Hernández-Truyol, Natives, Newcomers and Nativism: A Human Rights Model for the Twenty-First Century, 23 Fordham Urban L.J. 1075 (1996). Copyright © 1996 Fordham Urban Law Journal. Reprinted by permission.

David Isaacson, We're All Entitled: The Literary and Cultural Significance of the Dictionary of Occupational Titles, 27 Reference Quarterly 226. Copyright © 1987 American Library Association (ALA). Reprinted by permission.

Kevin R. Johnson, The Future of the American Mosaic: Issues in Immigration Reform, 7 Stanford L. & Policy Rev. 111 (1996). Copyright © 1996 The Board of Trustees of the Leland Stanford Junior University. Reprinted by permission.

Mark Krikorian, Keeping Terror Out—Immigration Policy and Asymmetric Warfare, The National Interest (spring 2004). Copyright © 2004 The National Interest.

Him Mark Lai, Genny Lim & Judy Yung, Angel Island—Poetry and History of Chinese Immigrants 1910–1940 (2d ed.). Copyright © 1986 Hoc Doi, Chinese Cultural Foundation of San Francisco. Reprinted by permission.

Stephen H. Legomsky, Immigration and the Judiciary—Law and Politics in Britain and America. Copyright © 1987 Oxford University Press. Reprinted by permission.

Stephen H. Legomsky, Portraits of the Undocumented Immigrant: Epiphany through Dialectic. Reprinted with the permission of the Georgia Law Review, from Vol. 44, No. 1 (2009–10).

Stephen H. Legomsky, The Haitian Interdiction Programme, Human Rights, and the Role of Judicial Protection, 2 Internat'l J. Refugee Law 181 (special ed. 1990). Copyright © 1990 Oxford University Press. Reprinted by permission.

Stephen Macedo, The Moral Dilemma of U.S. Immigration Policy: Open Borders versus Social Justice, in Carol Swain (ed.), Debating Immigration (2006), at 63 et seq. Copyright © 2006 Cambridge University Press. Reprinted by permission.

Jana Mason, U.S. Committee for Refugees, Citizenship under Attack: Congress Investigates Motives Behind INS Initiative, 17 Refugee Reports #11, at 1 (Nov./Dec. 1996). Copyright © 1996 Immigration and Refugee Services of America. Reprinted by permission.

Robert A. Mautino, Acquisition of Citizenship, April 1990 Immigration Briefings. Copyright © 1990 Federal Publications Inc., Washington, D.C. Reprinted by permission of Immigration Briefings.

Migration Policy Institute, America's Challenge: Domestic Security, Civil Liberties, and National Unity After September 11 (2003). Copyright © 2003 The Migration Policy Institute.

Jennifer Moore, From Nation State to Failed State: International Protection from Human Rights Abuses by Non-State Agents, 31 Columbia Human Rights L. Rev. 81 (1999). Copyright © 1999 Columbia Human Rights Law Review. Reprinted by permission.

James A.R. Nafziger, Review of Visa Denials by Consular Officers, 66 Washington L.Rev. 1. Copyright © 1991 Washington Law Review. Reprinted by permission.

Roger Nett, The Civil Right We Are Not Ready For: The Right of Free Movement on the Face of the Earth, 81 Ethics 216. Copyright © 1971 University of Chicago Press. Reprinted by permission.

Gerald L. Neuman, Book Review, Back to Dred Scott?, 24 San Diego L.Rev. 485. Copyright © 1987 San Diego Law Review Association. Reprinted by permission.

Note, An Argument for the Application of Equal Protection Heightened Scrutiny to Classifications Based on Homosexuality, 57 Southern California L.Rev. 797. Copyright © 1984 Southern California Law Review. Reprinted by permission.

Michael A. Olivas, The Chronicles, My Grandfather's Stories, and Immigration Law: The Slave Traders Chronicle as Racial History, 34 St. Louis Univ. L.J. 425 (1990). Copyright © 1990 St. Louis University School of Law. Reprinted by permission.

Demetrios Papademetriou & Stephen Yale-Loehr, Balancing Interests: Rethinking U.S. Selection of Skilled Immigrants (1996). Copyright © 1996 Carnegie Endowment for International Peace, Washington, D.C. Reprinted by permission of the publisher.

Juan F. Perea, "Am I an American or Not?" Reflections on Citizenship, Americanization, and Race, in Noah M. Pickus (ed.), Immigration and Citizenship in the Twenty-First Century (1998), at 49 et seq. Copyright © 1998 Rowman & Littlefield Publishers, Inc. Reprinted by permission.

Sidney B. Rawitz, From Wong Yang Sung to Black Robes, 65 Interpreter Releases 453. Copyright © 1988 Federal Publications Inc. Reprinted by permission of Interpreter Releases.

Cristina M. Rodríguez, Language and Participation, 94 California L. Rev. 687 (2006). Copyright © 2006 California Law Review, Inc. All rights reserved. Reprinted by permission.

Victor C. Romero, Broadening Our World: Citizens and Immigrants of Color in America, 27 Capital Univ. L.Rev. 13 (1998). Copyright © 1998 Capital University Law Review. Reprinted by permission.

Natsu Taylor Saito, Alien and Non-Alien Alike: Citizenship, "Foreignness," and Racial Hierarchy in American Law, 76 Oregon L.Rev. 261 (1997). Copyright © 1997 The University of Oregon. Reprinted by permission.

Center for Applied Legal Studies of Georgetown University Law Center, Interviewing a Client, excerpted from Asylum Law Manual (2005 edition). Copyright © 2005 Philip G. Schrag. These excerpts are reprinted by permission.

Peter H. Schuck, A Case for Profiling, The American Lawyer at 59 (Jan. 2002). Copyright © 2002. This article was originally published in the January 2002 issue of The American Lawyer. ALM Properties, Inc. All rights reserved. Further duplication without permission is prohibited.

Peter H. Schuck, Diversity in America: Keeping Government at a Safe Distance, Cambridge, Mass.: The Belknap Press of Harvard University Press, Copyright © 2003 by the President and Fellows of Harvard College.

Peter H. Schuck, Membership in the Liberal Polity: The Devaluation of American Citizenship, in William R. Brubaker (ed.), Immigration and the Politics of Citizenship in Europe and North America. Copyright © 1989 University Press of America, Inc. and the German Marshall Fund of the United States. Reprinted by permission.

Peter H. Schuck and Rogers M. Smith, Citizenship Without Consent—Illegal Aliens in the American Polity. Copyright © 1985 Marcy Schuck (Trustee) and Rogers M. Smith. Reprinted by permission.

James P. Smith & Barry Edmonston (eds.), The New Americans—Economic, Demographic, and Fiscal Effects of Immigration (1997). Copyright © 1997 National Academy of Sciences. Reprinted with permission. Courtesy of the National Academy Press, Washington, D.C.

Margaret D. Stock, Driver Licenses and National Security: Myths and Reality, 10 Bender's Immigration Bulletin 422 (Mar. 1, 2005). Copyright © 2005 LexisNexis Matthew Bender.

Astri Suhrke, Global Refugee Movements and Strategies of Response, in Mary M. Kritz (ed.), U.S. Immigration and Refugee Policy. Copyright © 1983 D.C. Heath & Company. Reprinted by permission.

David Weissbrodt & Laura Danielson, Immigration Law and Procedure in a Nutshell (5th ed.). Copyright © 2005 West Publishing Company. Reprinted by permission.

*

SUMMARY OF CONTENTS

PREFACE TO FIFTH EDITION	iii
ACKNOWLEDGMENTS BY STEVE LEGOMSKY	ix
ACKNOWLEDGMENTS BY CRISTINA RODRÍGUEZ	xiii
TECHNICAL CONVENTIONS AND ABBREVIATIONS	xv
PERMISSIONS	xix
TABLE OF CASES	xliv
TABLE OF SECONDARY AUTHORITIES	lxi

Overview of United States Immigration Law

1

Sec.

A. Terminology	1
B. General Regulation of Immigration	2
C. Nationality	6
D. The Admission of Noncitizens to the United States	7
E. Expulsion	10
F. Other Sanctions	10

CHAPTER 1 The Immigration Debate: Goals, Strategies, and Impact

12

Sec.

A. The History	13
B. The Moral Dimensions of Immigration Control	24
C. Immigration, Race, Culture, and Language	38
D. The Economic Impact of Immigration	71
E. Immigration, Population, and the Environment	85
F. The Politics of Immigration	91
G. Immigration and National Security: An Introduction	97
H. Immigrants, Self-Identity, and Home	98

CHAPTER 2 Immigration and the Constitution

113

Sec.

A. Sources of the Federal Immigration Power	115
B. Limits to the Federal Immigration Power	132

CHAPTER 3 Immigrant Priorities

250

Sec.

A. The Fundamentals: Quotas and Preferences	251
B. Family Immigration	262
C. Employment-Based Immigration	304
D. Diversity Immigrants	348

CHAPTER 4 Nonimmigrant Priorities	355
<hr/>
Sec.
A. Commercial Categories of Nonimmigrants	358
B. Educational Categories	393
C. Tourists	404
D. Fiancés and Fiancées	407
E. A Few Other Nonimmigrant Categories	411
F. General Nonimmigrant Problems	413
CHAPTER 5 Exclusion Grounds and Waivers	420
<hr/>
Sec.
A. Grounds Related to Immigration Control	431
B. Political and National Security Grounds	436
C. Criminal Grounds	455
D. Economic Grounds	457
E. Public Health and Morals	461
CHAPTER 6 Admission Procedure	463
<hr/>
Sec.
A. The Early Days	463
B. Modern Procedure: Preliminary Comments	469
C. Visa Petitions	471
D. Visa Applications	480
E. Actual Admission	503
F. Adjustment of Status	508
CHAPTER 7 Deportability Grounds	514
<hr/>
Sec.
A. General Considerations	514
B. The Meaning and Significance of "Entry" and "Admission"	522
C. Deportability Grounds Concerned With Immigration Control	544
D. Crime-Related Deportability Grounds	548
E. Political and National Security Grounds	588
F. Other Deportability Grounds	589
G. Time Limits	589
CHAPTER 8 Relief From Deportability	593
<hr/>
Sec.
A. Lasting Relief	595
B. Limited Relief	629
C. Miscellaneous Defenses	645
D. A Perspective on Relief From Deportability	646

CHAPTER 9	Deportation Procedure	648
<hr/>
Sec.
A.	Overview	649
B.	A Sampling of Specific Procedural Ingredients	659
C.	A Simulated Removal Hearing	790
D.	Exceptions to Usual Removal Procedures	806
CHAPTER 10	Immigration and National Security	816
<hr/>
Sec.
A.	The Detention of Noncitizens	817
B.	Intelligence-Gathering	824
C.	Expansion of Removal Grounds	831
D.	Shrinking Procedural Rights	832
E.	Visas and Other Overseas Policies	840
F.	Enhanced Border Enforcement	845
G.	Profiling	845
H.	Immigration and National Security in Perspective	854
CHAPTER 11	Refugees	869
<hr/>
Sec.
A.	Overseas Refugees	872
B.	Asylum and Nonrefoulement	892
C.	Beyond Persecution: Protection Against Other Dangers	1095
CHAPTER 12	Undocumented Immigrants	1140
<hr/>
Sec.
A.	Enforcement of the Immigration Laws	1147
B.	Legalization	1178
C.	The Rights of Undocumented Immigrants and the Self-Deportation Strategy	1187
D.	Reducing Future Flow by Creating Alternatives to Illegal Immigration	1232
E.	Federalism and the Regulation of Undocumented Immigrants	1238
CHAPTER 13	Citizenship	1288
<hr/>
Sec.
A.	Acquiring Citizenship	1289
B.	Losing Citizenship	1336
C.	The Significance of Citizenship	1373
INDEX	1399

TABLE OF CONTENTS

PREFACE TO FIFTH EDITION	iii
ACKNOWLEDGMENTS BY STEVE LEGOMSKY	ix
ACKNOWLEDGMENTS BY CRISTINA RODRIGUEZ	xiii
TECHNICAL CONVENTIONS AND ABBREVIATIONS	xv
PERMISSIONS	xix
TABLE OF CASES	xliv
TABLE OF SECONDARY AUTHORITIES	lxi
Overview of United States Immigration Law	1
<hr/>
Sec.
A. Terminology	1
B. General Regulation of Immigration	2
C. Nationality	6
D. The Admission of Noncitizens to the United States	7
E. Expulsion	10
F. Other Sanctions	10
CHAPTER 1 The Immigration Debate: Goals, Strategies, and Impact	12
<hr/>
Sec.
A. The History	13
1 Charles Gordon, Stanley Mailman, and Stephen Yale-Loehr, Immigration Law and Procedure	14
B. The Moral Dimensions of Immigration Control	24
Roger Nett, The Civil Right We Are Not Ready For: The Right of Free Movement of People on the Face of the Earth	25
Stephen Macedo, The Moral Dilemma of U.S. Immigration Policy: Open Borders Versus Social Justice, in Carol Swain (Ed.), Debating Immigration	28
Notes and Questions	31
C. Immigration, Race, Culture, and Language	38
Peter H. Schuck, Diversity in America—Keeping Government at a Safe Distance	39
Cristina M. Rodríguez, Language and Participation	41
Peter Brimelow, Alien Nation—Common Sense About America’s Immigration Disaster	44
Kevin R. Johnson, Fear of an “Alien Nation”: Race, Immigration and Immigrants	50
Juan F. Perea, “Am I an American or Not?” Reflections on Citizenship, Americanization, and Race, in Noah M.J. Pickus (Ed.), Immigration and Citizenship in the Twenty-First Century	56
Notes and Questions	59
Note on the English-Only Movement	65

Sec.
D. The Economic Impact of Immigration	71
George J. Borjas, Heaven's Door—Immigration Policy and the American Economy	71
Howard F. Chang, Migration as International Trade: The Economic Gains From the Liberalized Movement of Labor	75
James P. Smith & Barry Edmonston (Eds.), National Research Council of the National Academy of Sciences, The New Americans—Economic, Demographic, and Fiscal Effects of Immigration	78
Notes and Questions	81
E. Immigration, Population, and the Environment	85
James P. Smith & Barry Edmonston (Eds.), National Research Council of the National Academy of Sciences, The New Americans—Economic, Demographic, and Fiscal Effects of Immigration	85
Ellen Percy Kraly, Research Paper for the U.S. Commission on Immigration Reform, U.S. Immigration and the Environment: Scientific Research and Analytic Issues	89
Notes and Questions	90
F. The Politics of Immigration	91
G. Immigration and National Security: An Introduction	97
H. Immigrants, Self-Identity, and Home	98
Henry Grunwald, Home Is Where You Are Happy	98
Berta Esperanza Hernández-Truyol, Natives, Newcomers and Nativism: A Human Rights Model for the Twenty-First Century	102
Michael A. Olivas, The Chronicles, My Grandfather's Stories, and Immigration Law: The Slave Traders Chronicle as Racial History	103
Natsu Taylor Saito, Alien and Non-Alien Alike: Citizenship, "Foreignness," and Racial Hierarchy in American Law	104
Victor C. Romero, Broadening Our World: Citizens and Immigrants of Color in America	106
Notes and Questions	107
CHAPTER 2 Immigration and the Constitution	113
<hr/>
Stephen H. Legomsky, Immigration and the Judiciary: Law and Politics in Britain and America	113
Sec.
A. Sources of the Federal Immigration Power	115
1. The Enumerated Powers	116
a. The Commerce Clause	116
b. The Migration or Importation Clause	118
c. The Naturalization Clause	118
d. The War Clause	119
2. Implied Constitutional Powers	119
Chae Chan Ping v. United States (The Chinese Exclusion Case)	120
Notes and Questions	123
Stephen H. Legomsky, Immigration and the Judiciary: Law and Politics in Britain and America	126
Note on the Public Reaction to Asian Immigration	127

Sec.
A. Sources of the Federal Immigration Power—Continued
3. Beyond the Constitution	130
4. Residual State Power	130
B. Limits to the Federal Immigration Power	132
1. The Foundation Cases	133
Ekiu v. United States	134
Questions	135
Fong Yue Ting v. United States	136
Notes and Questions	147
2. Modern Developments	155
a. Procedural Due Process in Exclusion Cases	155
Shaughnessy v. United States ex rel. Mezei	156
General Notes and Questions	163
Notes and Questions on the Exclusion of Returning Residents: Some Cracks in the Plenary Congressional Power	164
Notes and Questions on the Detention of Excluded Nonciti-zens	166
b. Procedural Due Process in Deportation Cases: More Cracks in the Plenary Congressional Power	171
Yamataya v. Fisher (The Japanese Immigrant Case)	171
Notes and Questions	173
c. Substantive Applications of the Plenary Power Doctrine	177
Harisiades v. Shaughnessy	177
Notes and Questions	184
Substantive Cracks in the Plenary Congressional Power	195
Francis v. INS	195
Notes and Questions	197
d. Still More Cracks	201
INS v. Chadha	201
Notes and Questions	204
Zadvydas v. Davis	206
Notes and Questions	218
Clark v. Martinez	223
Demore v. Hyung Joon Kim	226
Notes and Questions	239
e. Where Are We Now?	242
Gabriel J. Chin, Segregation's Last Stronghold: Race Dis-
crimination and the Constitutional Law of Immigration	244
Simulation Exercise	245
Concluding Note on the Plenary Power Over Immigration:
Historical Parallels From Across the Atlantic	247
CHAPTER 3 Immigrant Priorities	250

Sec.

A. The Fundamentals: Quotas and Preferences	251
1. Immigrants Exempt From the General Quotas	251
2. Immigrants Subject to the General Quotas	253
a. Programs and Ceilings	253
Problem 1	255

Sec.
A. The Fundamentals: Quotas and Preferences—Continued
b. Preference Categories and Sub-Ceilings	255
Problem 2	258
c. Selecting Individual Applicants	259
Questions	260
B. Family Immigration	262
1. The Basics	262
Problems 3–4	266
2. Spouses	267
a. Same-Sex Marriages	267
Adams v. Howerton	267
Notes and Questions	270
Note, An Argument for the Application of Equal Protection Heightened Scrutiny to Classifications Based on Homo- sexuality	276
Notes and Questions	278
b. Fraudulent Marriages	282
Problems 5–11	286
Notes and Questions	288
Notes and Questions on Marriages During Removal Pro- ceedings	290
3. Other Family Members	291
Matter of Mourillon	292
Notes and Questions	295
Problems 12–15	297
Note on Foreign Adoptions	298
4. Family Unification Policy in Perspective	302
Notes and Questions	302
C. Employment-Based Immigration	304
1. The First Three Preferences: Superstars, Stars and Others	305
a. General Eligibility Requirements	305
b. Labor Certification	307
i. Displacing American Workers	310
Matter of Marion Graham	310
Notes and Questions	314
David Isaacson, We're All Entitled: The Literary and Cultural Significance of the Dictionary of Occupa- tional Titles	324
ii. Adversely Affecting the Wages and Working Condi- tions of American Workers	327
Industrial Holographics, Inc. v. Donovan	327
Notes and Questions	330
c. Perspective on Employment-Based Immigration	332
Demetrios G. Papademetriou & Stephen Yale-Loehr, Bal- ancing Interests: Rethinking U.S. Selection of Skilled Immigrants	333
Notes and Questions	342
2. The Fourth Preference: Certain “Special Immigrants”	344
3. The Fifth Preference: Immigrant Investors	345

Sec.
D. Diversity Immigrants		348
Problem 16		350
Essay on Diversity Immigrants		351

CHAPTER 4 Nonimmigrant Priorities 355

Sec.

A. Commercial Categories of Nonimmigrants		358
1. Business Visitors		358
International Union of Bricklayers and Allied Craftsmen v. Meese		358
Notes and Questions		365
Problems 1-3		368
2. Treaty Traders and Investors		368
Nice v. Turnage		369
Notes and Questions		371
3. Temporary Workers		371
a. "Specialty Occupations," Athletes, and Entertainers: H-1B's, O's, and P's		372
b. Lesser Skills and Labor Shortages: H-2's		377
David Bacon, Be Our Guests		378
Matter of Artee Corporation		383
Notes and Questions		384
c. Trainees: H-3's		386
d. Miscellaneous Other Temporary Workers		386
Problems 4-5		388
4. Intra-Company Transferees		388
Karmali v. INS		388
Notes and Questions		390
5. Comparing Commercial Categories		391
Problems 6-7		391
B. Educational Categories		393
1. Students		393
2. Exchange Visitors		397
Sheku-Kamara v. Karn		398
Notes and Questions		401
Problems 8-9		403
C. Tourists		404
Matter of Healy and Goodchild		404
Notes and Questions		407
D. Fiancés and Fiancées		407
Moss v. INS		408
Notes and Questions		410
Problem 10		411
E. A Few Other Nonimmigrant Categories		411
F. General Nonimmigrant Problems		413
1. Intent to Remain Permanently		413
David Weissbrodt and Laura Danielson, Should the Lawyer Tell the Client About a Fixed Intent to Immigrate?, in Immigration Law and Procedure in a Nutshell		415

Sec.
F. General Nonimmigrant Problems—Continued
Problems 11–13 (Problems in Ethics)	416
2. Change of Nonimmigrant Status	418
Problem 14.....	419
CHAPTER 5 Exclusion Grounds and Waivers	420
<hr/>
Committee on the Judiciary, United States House of Representatives, Grounds for Exclusion of Aliens Under the Immigration and Na- tionality Act	422
Sec.
A. Grounds Related to Immigration Control	431
Problems 1–5	435
B. Political and National Security Grounds.....	436
Notes and Questions on the Political and National Security Grounds	439
Problems 6–8	442
The Terrorism Exclusions	443
Matter of S–K	444
Notes and Questions	450
C. Criminal Grounds.....	455
Problems 9–12.....	456
D. Economic Grounds.....	457
Notes and Questions	460
E. Public Health and Morals.....	461
Question.....	462
CHAPTER 6 Admission Procedure	463
<hr/>
Sec.
A. The Early Days.....	463
Him Mark Lai, Genny Lim & Judy Yung, Island—Poetry and History of Chinese Immigrants on Angel Island 1910–1940	463
B. Modern Procedure: Preliminary Comments	469
C. Visa Petitions.....	471
Linda Kelly, Stories From the Front: Seeking Refuge for Battered Immigrants in the Violence Against Women Act	473
Notes and Questions	475
Florida Bar v. Matus	476
Notes and Questions	478
Problems 1–3	479
D. Visa Applications	480
1 Charles Gordon, Stanley Mailman & Stephen Yale-Loehr, Immi- gration Law and Procedure	481
Notes and Questions	484
James A.R. Nafziger, Review of Visa Denials by Consular Officers H.R. 2567	487
Simulation Exercise	493
Hermina Sague v. United States	493
Notes and Questions	496

Sec.
E.	Actual Admission	503
	1. At the Border	503
	2. Hearings Before Immigration Judges	504
	3. Appeals From Immigration Judge Decisions	506
	4. Expedited Removal	506
	5. Other Special Removal Procedures	507
	a. National Security and Foreign Policy Cases	507
	b. Terrorism Cases	508
F.	Adjustment of Status	508
	Notes and Questions	511
	Problems 4-7	512
CHAPTER 7	Deportability Grounds	514

Sec.
A.	General Considerations	514
	1. Historical Overview of American Deportation Policy	516
	6 Charles Gordon, Stanley Mailman, and Stephen Yale-Loehr, Immigration Law and Procedure	516
	2. The Theory of Deportation	517
	3. Current Deportability Grounds	518
	4. Deportation and Statutory Interpretation	519
	Fong Haw Tan v. Phelan	519
	Notes and Questions	520
B.	The Meaning and Significance of "Entry" and "Admission"	522
	Matter of Ching and Chen	523
	Notes and Questions	526
	Problems 1-3	528
	Rosenberg v. Fleuti	529
	Notes and Questions	537
	Problems 4-6	543
C.	Deportability Grounds Concerned With Immigration Control	544
	1. Entry Without Inspection	544
	2. Entry While Inadmissible and Related Issues	545
	Notes and Questions	545
	Problems 7-13	546
	3. Post-entry Conduct Related to Immigration Control	548
D.	Crime-Related Deportability Grounds	548
	1. What Is a Conviction?	551
	a. Withdrawing Guilty Pleas	553
	United States v. Parrino	553
	Notes and Questions	556
	b. Expungements	557
	Questions	560
	c. Executive Pardons	560
	d. Miscellaneous Collateral Attacks	560

Sec.
D. Crime-Related Deportability Grounds—Continued
2. Crimes Involving Moral Turpitude	561
a. The Meaning of “Crime Involving Moral Turpitude”	561
Marciano v. INS	561
Notes and Questions	567
Problems 14–16	570
b. “Committed Within Five Years . . . After the Date of Ad- mission”	570
Problems 17–18	570
c. Sentencing Requirements	571
d. Two Crimes Involving Moral Turpitude	571
Problem 19	571
e. Judicial Recommendations Against Deportation	572
3. Drug Offenses	573
Problems 20–21	573
4. Aggravated Felonies	574
Leocal v. Ashcroft	576
Notes and Questions	580
Problems 22–24	585
5. Miscellaneous Criminal Grounds	585
Note on Comparative Law, Separation of Powers, and the Making of Immigration Policy	587
6. The Merits of Removing Noncitizen Criminal Offenders	587
Drafting Exercise	588
E. Political and National Security Grounds	588
F. Other Deportability Grounds	589
G. Time Limits	589
Problems 25–27	592
CHAPTER 8 Relief From Deportability	593
Sec.
A. Lasting Relief	595
1. Cancellation of Removal	595
a. Cancellation of Removal: Part A	595
i. General Applicability and Scope	595
ii. Timing	600
iii. Disqualifications	600
iv. Discretion	600
Questions	601
Problems 1–3	601
b. Cancellation of Removal: Part B	602
i. Continuous Physical Presence	603
Questions	605
Problem 4	606
ii. Hardship	608
INS v. Jong Ha Wang	612
Notes and Questions	618
Matter of Recinas	622
Notes and Questions	622

Sec.
A. Lasting Relief—Continued
iii. Other Hurdles: Good Moral Character, Disqualified Groups, Discretion, and Reporting to Congress	623
iv. NACARA	624
2. Registry	625
3. Legalization	626
4. Adjustment of Status	626
5. Private Bills	627
B. Limited Relief	629
1. Deferred Action	629
Notes and Questions	632
2. Voluntary Departure	633
Questions	637
Problems 5–6	637
3. Objections to Destination	638
Linnas v. INS	639
Notes and Questions	642
Problem 7	644
4. Stays of Removal	644
C. Miscellaneous Defenses	645
D. A Perspective on Relief From Deportability	646
CHAPTER 9 Deportation Procedure	648

Sec.
A. Overview	649
1. Apprehension	649
2. Before the Hearing	650
3. The Removal Hearing	654
4. Administrative Review	657
5. Judicial Review	657
6. The Execution of the Removal Order	658
B. A Sampling of Specific Procedural Ingredients	659
1. Immigration Judges	659
Sidney B. Rawitz, From Wong Yang Sung to Black Robes	659
Notes and Questions	665
2. Representation	668
a. Authorization to Practice	670
8 CFR §§ 1292.1, 1292.2 (2008)	670
Notes and Questions	671
b. Finding Lawyers for the Indigent	672
i. A Constitutional Right to Counsel?	673
Aguilera-Enriquez v. INS	673
Notes and Questions	678
ii. Legal Aid	680
iii. Pro Bono Legal Services	681
iv. Equal Access to Justice Act	683
Notes and Questions	683
c. Discipline of Immigration Practitioners	684
8 CFR § 1003.102 (2008)	684
Notes and Questions	687

Sec.
B.	A Sampling of Specific Procedural Ingredients—Continued
	d. Ineffective Assistance of Counsel..... 689
	People v. Pozo 689
	Notes and Questions..... 694
	Matter of Compean 698
	Notes and Questions..... 710
	3. Evidence and Proof..... 712
	a. Admissibility of Evidence..... 712
	INS v. Lopez-Mendoza 713
	Notes and Questions..... 728
	Other Illegally Obtained Statements..... 730
	Note on Judicial Politics..... 731
	b. Burden of Proof and Sufficiency of the Evidence..... 732
	Woodby v. INS 732
	Notes and Questions..... 738
	Problem 1..... 743
	4. Administrative Review: The Board of Immigration Appeals..... 744
	Notes and Questions..... 752
	5. Motions to Reopen or Reconsider..... 754
	Question..... 756
	6. Judicial Review of Removal Orders..... 756
	a. Petitions for Review..... 760
	i. Crime-Related Removal Orders..... 763
	ii. Denials of Discretionary Relief..... 765
	iii. Expedited Removal Orders..... 768
	iv. Voluntary Departure Regulations..... 769
	v. Prosecutorial Discretion..... 769
	vi. Detention Decisions..... 769
	b. Habeas Corpus..... 770
	Henry M. Hart, Jr., The Power of Congress to Limit the
	Jurisdiction of Federal Courts: An Exercise in Dialectic 771
	Question..... 775
	INS v. St. Cyr 775
	Notes and Questions..... 784
	c. Other Strategies..... 786
	i. General Federal Question Jurisdiction..... 786
	ii. Injunctions and Class Actions..... 787
	iii. Collateral Attack in Criminal Proceedings..... 788
	iv. Claims of United States Nationality..... 789
	d. Consolidating Reviewable Claims..... 790
	e. The Theory and the Consequences of Judicial Review..... 790
	Question..... 790
C.	A Simulated Removal Hearing..... 806
D.	Exceptions to Usual Removal Procedures..... 806
	1. Expedited Removal..... 807
	2. Criminal Cases..... 807
	a. Prison Hearings..... 809
	b. Administrative Removal..... 810
	c. Judicial Removal..... 810

Sec.

D. Exceptions to Usual Removal Procedures—Continued
3. In Absentia Removal Hearings	811
4. Noncitizens Reentering After Prior Removals	812
5. Crew Members	813
6. Terrorist Removal Proceedings	813
7. Rescission of Adjustment of Status	813
Notes and Questions	814

CHAPTER 10 Immigration and National Security

Sec.

A. The Detention of Noncitizens	817
1. Detention in Connection With Removal Proceedings	818
2. The Certification Program	822
Notes and Questions	823
B. Intelligence-Gathering	824
1. The Automated Entry-Exit System	825
2. NSEERS	825
3. SEVIS and Other Student-Related Programs	826
4. U.S. VISIT	828
5. Voluntary Interviews of Noncitizens	829
6. “Snitch” Visas and the “Responsible Cooperator” Program	830
Notes and Questions	831
C. Expansion of Removal Grounds	831
D. Shrinking Procedural Rights	832
1. Arriving Noncitizens	832
2. The Terrorist Removal Court	832
Simulation	835
3. Closed Removal Hearings	835
4. Secret Evidence Hearings	837
Notes and Questions	839
E. Visas and Other Overseas Policies	840
1. Country-Specific Strategies	840
2. Injecting DHS into the Visa Process	841
3. Heightened Scrutiny and Delay	841
4. Technological Innovation	842
5. Restrictions on the Visa Waiver Program	842
6. Slowdowns in the Admission of Overseas Refugees	844
F. Enhanced Border Enforcement	845
G. Profiling	845
Peter H. Schuck, A Case for Profiling	847
Notes and Questions	850
Simulation Exercise	853
H. Immigration and National Security in Perspective	854
Mark Krikorian, Keeping Terror Out—Immigration Policy and Asymmetric Warfare	854
Muzaffar A. Chishti, Doris Meissner, Demetrios G. Papademetriou, Jay Peterzell, Michael J. Wishnie & Stephen W. Yale-Loehr, Migration Policy Institute, America’s Challenge: Domestic Security, Civil Liberties, and National Unity After September 11 (2003)	861

Sec.
H. Immigration and National Security in Perspective—Continued
David Cole, The Priority of Morality: The Emergency Constitution's Blind Spot	864
Notes and Questions	866
CHAPTER 11 Refugees	869
Sec.
A. Overseas Refugees	872
Astri Suhrke, Global Refugee Movements and Strategies of Response in Mary M. Kritz (Ed.), U.S. Immigration and Refugee Policy	873
Robert A. Divine, American Immigration Policy, 1924–1952	876
Guy S. Goodwin-Gill & Jane McAdam, The Refugee in International Law	878
Notes and Questions	888
B. Asylum and Nonrefoulement	892
1. Persecution or Fear of Persecution	895
Matter of Acosta	895
Notes and Questions	901
Persecution Versus Prosecution	907
Matter of Izatula	907
Notes and Questions	911
Coercive Population Controls as Persecution	913
Question	915
2. “On Account of Race, Religion, Nationality, Membership in a Particular Social Group, or Political Opinion”	916
a. Race, Religion, Nationality	916
b. Political Opinion	918
INS v. Elias-Zacarias	918
Notes and Questions	922
Neutrality as Political Opinion	925
Notes and Questions	928
Refugees Sur Place	929
c. “Particular Social Group”	931
i. General Definition of “Social Group”	931
Matter of Acosta	931
Arthur C. Helton, Persecution on Account of Membership in a Social Group as a Basis for Refugee Status	933
Notes and Questions	934
ii. Sexual Orientation and “Social Group”	940
Matter of Toboso-Alfonso	940
Notes and Questions	943
iii. Gender and “Social Group”	945
Jacqueline Greatbatch, The Gender Difference: Feminist Critiques of Refugee Discourse	947
Notes and Questions	949
Fatin v. INS	950
Notes and Questions	955
Matter of Kasinga	959
Notes and Questions	967

Sec.

B. Asylum and Nonrefoulement—Continued
Domestic Violence and the Problem of the Non-State Actor.....	974
Jennifer Moore, From Nation State to Failed State: International Protection From Human Rights Abuses by Non-State Agents	977
Deborah Anker, Refugee Status and Violence Against Women in the “Domestic” Sphere: The Non-State Actor Question	978
Notes and Questions	983
d. “On Account of”: The Nexus Requirement.....	985
Islam v. Secretary of State for the Home Department	990
Notes and Questions	995
e. Problems	997
Problems 1–5	997
3. “Well-Founded” Fear and “Would be Threatened”: The Standards of Proof.....	999
Notes and Questions	1000
Problem 6	1002
4. Methods of Proof.....	1002
a. Material Facts	1002
i. Membership in a Persecuted Group.....	1002
ii. Past Persecution.....	1003
b. Relevant Evidence	1005
i. The Applicant’s Own Testimony	1005
Damaize-Job v. INS	1007
Notes and Questions	1009
ii. State Department Opinions.....	1011
iii. Advice From UNHCR.....	1014
iv. Other Sources of Information.....	1015
5. Exceptions to Eligibility	1016
a. Firm Resettlement.....	1016
b. Past Wrongdoing	1017
Matter of Carballe	1018
Notes and Questions	1021
6. Discretion in Asylum Cases.....	1025
7. Procedure.....	1029
a. General Principles of United States Asylum Procedure	1030
Notes and Questions	1040
b. Barring or Discouraging Access to the Asylum Process.....	1044
i. Filing Deadlines.....	1045
ii. Safe Countries of Origin	1046
iii. Returning Asylum-Seekers to Third Countries	1046
iv. Expedited Removal	1052
v. Detention	1056
vi. Criminal Prosecutions of Asylum-Seekers for Illegal Entry.....	1058
vii. Denying Employment Authorization.....	1060
viii. Sanctioning Frivolous Applications.....	1060
ix. Application Fees	1061

Sec.
B. Asylum and Nonrefoulement—Continued
x. Preinspection	1062
xi. Visas and Carrier Sanctions	1062
xii. Interdiction of Vessels on the High Seas	1062
Sale v. Haitian Centers Council	1065
Notes and Questions	1080
8. A Simulated Attorney–Client Asylum Interview	1085
C. Beyond Persecution: Protection Against Other Dangers	1095
1. The Convention Against Torture	1095
Convention Against Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman or
Degrading Treatment or Punishment	1098
Resolution of the United States Senate Ratifying the Convention
Against Torture	1101
Foreign Affairs Reform and Restructuring Act of 1998	1103
Notes and Questions	1104
Problems 7–9	1113
2. Temporary Protection	1114
a. United States Domestic Law: Temporary Protected Status and Its Predecessors	1114
Notes and Questions	1119
b. Global and Regional Approaches to Temporary Protection ...	1120
Joan Fitzpatrick, Temporary Protection of Refugees: Ele-
ments of a Formalized Regime	1121
Notes and Questions	1127
3. Other International Law Protection Mechanisms	1131
T.I. v. United Kingdom	1131
Notes and Questions	1137
CHAPTER 12 Undocumented Immigrants	1140

Sec.
A. Enforcement of the Immigration Laws	1147
1. Immigration Offenses Generally	1153
2. IRCA and Employer Misconduct	1158
a. Employer Sanctions	1158
United States General Accounting Office, Immigration Re-
form—Employer Sanctions and the Question of Discrimi-
nation	1165
Problems 1–7	1170
b. Prohibitions on Discrimination	1171
Problems 8–12	1177
B. Legalization	1178
Stephen H. Legomsky, Portraits of the Undocumented Immigrant:
Epiphany Through Dialectic	1179
Questions	1186

Sec.
C. The Rights of Undocumented Immigrants and the Self-Deportation Strategy	1187
1. The Legal and Social Identities of Undocumented Immigrants ..	1187
Linda S. Bosniak, Exclusion and Membership: The Dual Identity of the Undocumented Worker Under United States Law	1188
Notes	1190
2. Undocumented Immigrants and Public Assistance	1192
3. Undocumented Immigrants and Public Education	1193
Plyler v. Doe	1194
Notes and Questions	1207
Post-Secondary Education	1209
Notes and Questions	1212
4. Undocumented Immigrants and Labor Law	1213
Hoffman Plastic Compounds, Inc. v. National Labor Relations Board	1214
Notes and Questions	1223
5. Undocumented Immigrants and Drivers' Licenses	1225
Margaret D. Stock, Driver Licenses and National Security: Myths and Reality	1228
Questions	1231
D. Reducing Future Flow by Creating Alternatives to Illegal Immigration	1232
Questions	1238
E. Federalism and the Regulation of Undocumented Immigrants	1238
1. The General Legal Framework	1244
Graham v. Richardson	1244
Notes and Questions	1250
De Canas v. Bica	1251
Notes and Questions	1256
2. State Regulation of Employers and Landlords	1258
Lozano v. City of Hazleton	1259
Notes and Questions	1271
3. State and Local Participation in Immigration Policing	1274
4. State Regulation of Public Benefits	1283
Notes and Questions	1285
CHAPTER 13 Citizenship	1288

Sec.

A. Acquiring Citizenship	1289
1. Citizenship Acquired at Birth	1290
a. Jus Soli	1290
b. Jus Sanguinis	1293
Robert A. Mautino, Acquisition of Citizenship	1294
Problems 1-3	1295
Jus Sanguinis and the Constitution	1296

Sec.
A. Acquiring Citizenship—Continued
2. Citizenship Acquired After Birth	1300
a. Administrative Naturalization	1300
Citizenship USA	1302
Jana Mason, U.S. Committee for Refugees, Citizenship Un- der Attack: Congress Investigates Motives Behind INS Initiative	1302
i. Substantive Criteria	1305
In re Petition for Naturalization of Vafaei-Makhsos	1308
Notes and Questions	1311
ii. Procedure	1313
b. The Child Citizenship Act and Other Miscellaneous Forms of Naturalization	1315
c. A Swiss Perspective	1316
3. Dual Nationality	1317
4. Statelessness	1320
5. Who Should Be a United States Citizen?	1321
Peter H. Schuck & Rogers M. Smith, Citizenship Without Consent—Illegal Aliens in the American Polity	1321
Gerald L. Neuman, Book Review [of Schuck and Smith], Back to Dred Scott?	1328
Notes and Questions	1333
B. Losing Citizenship	1336
1. Revocation of Naturalization	1336
Kungys v. United States	1338
Notes and Questions	1354
2. Expatriation	1357
Vance v. Terrazas	1360
Later Developments	1367
Notes and Questions	1368
C. The Significance of Citizenship	1373
Citizenship and Welfare Reform	1377
Questions	1381
Peter H. Schuck, Membership in the Liberal Polity: The Devalua- tion of American Citizenship, in William R. Brubaker (Ed.), Immigration and the Politics of Citizenship in Europe and North America	1382
T. Alexander Aleinikoff, Citizens, Aliens, Membership and the Constitution	1388
Notes and Questions	1392
INDEX	1399

TABLE OF CASES

Principal cases are in bold type. Non-principal cases are in roman type. References are to Pages.

- A.A., Matter of, 20 I. & N. Dec. 492, Interim Decision 3176 (BIA 1992), 576
- Abankwah v. INS, 185 F.3d 18 (2nd Cir. 1999), 969
- Abay v. Ashcroft, 368 F.3d 634 (6th Cir. 2004), 968, 970
- Abbott Laboratories v. Gardner, 387 U.S. 136, 87 S.Ct. 1507, 18 L.Ed.2d 681 (1967), 498
- Abdelqadar v. Gonzales, 413 F.3d 668 (7th Cir.2005), 543
- Abdille v. Ashcroft, 242 F.3d 477 (3rd Cir. 2001), 1016
- Abebe v. Mukasey, 548 F.3d 787 (9th Cir. 2008), 198
- Abourezk v. Reagan, 785 F.2d 1043 (D.C.Cir. 1986), 502
- Abreu-Reyes v. INS, 292 F.3d 1029 (9th Cir. 2002), 713
- Abudu v. INS, 802 F.2d 1096 (9th Cir.1986), 612
- Acosta v. Ashcroft, 341 F.3d 218 (3rd Cir. 2003), 559
- Acosta v. Gaffney, 558 F.2d 1153 (3rd Cir. 1977), 645
- Acosta, Matter of, 19 I. & N. Dec. 211, Interim Decision 2986 (BIA 1985), 895, 931
- Adamiak, In re, 23 I. & N. Dec. 878, Interim Decision 3525 (BIA 2006), 558
- Adams v. Howerton, 673 F.2d 1036 (9th Cir.1982), 267
- Adetiba, Matter of, 20 I. & N. Dec. 506, Interim Decision 3177 (BIA 1992), 571
- Afroyim v. Rusk, 387 U.S. 253, 87 S.Ct. 1660, 18 L.Ed.2d 757 (1967), 1359
- A.G., Matter of, 19 I. & N. Dec. 502, Interim Decision 3040 (BIA 1987), 913
- Aguilar, United States v., 883 F.2d 662 (9th Cir.1989), 1155
- Aguilera-Cota v. INS, 914 F.2d 1375 (9th Cir.1990), 1010
- Aguilera-Enriquez v. INS, 516 F.2d 565 (6th Cir.1975), 673, 711
- Ahmed v. Ashcroft, 341 F.3d 214 (3rd Cir. 2003), 907
- Ahmed v. Ashcroft, 286 F.3d 611 (2nd Cir. 2002), 539
- Ahmetovic v. INS, 62 F.3d 48 (2nd Cir.1995), 1021
- A-K-, In re, 24 I. & N. Dec. 275, Interim Decision 3579 (BIA 2007), 970
- A.L.A. Schechter Poultry Corporation v. United States, 295 U.S. 495, 55 S.Ct. 837, 79 L.Ed. 1570 (1935), 636
- Alderete-Deras, United States v., 743 F.2d 645 (9th Cir.1984), 730
- Alexander v. Sandoval, 532 U.S. 275, 121 S.Ct. 1511, 149 L.Ed.2d 517 (2001), 67
- Ali v. Gonzales, 502 F.3d 659 (7th Cir.2007), 767
- Ali v. INS, 661 F.Supp. 1234 (D.Mass.1986), 474
- Ali v. Reno, 237 F.3d 591 (6th Cir.2001), 1106
- Allende v. Shultz, 845 F.2d 1111 (1st Cir. 1988), 439
- Almario v. Attorney General, 872 F.2d 147 (6th Cir.1989), 289
- Al-Salehi v. INS, 47 F.3d 390 (10th Cir. 1995), 1023
- Alvarez-Machain, United States v., 504 U.S. 655, 112 S.Ct. 2188, 119 L.Ed.2d 441 (1992), 731
- Amanfi v. Ashcroft, 328 F.3d 719 (3rd Cir. 2003), 917
- Ambach v. Norwick, 441 U.S. 68, 99 S.Ct. 1589, 60 L.Ed.2d 49 (1979), 1377
- A-M-E & J-G-U-, In re, 24 I. & N. Dec. 69, Interim Decision 3550 (BIA 2007), 935
- American Arab Anti-Discrimination Committee v. Meese, 714 F.Supp. 1060 (C.D.Cal. 1989), 190
- American Baptist Churches v. Thornburgh, 760 F.Supp. 796 (N.D.Cal.1991), 1033
- American Federation of Labor v. Chertoff, 552 F.Supp.2d 999 (N.D.Cal.2007), 1168
- ANA Intern., Inc. v. Way, 393 F.3d 886 (9th Cir.2004), 476
- Andazola, In re, 23 I. & N. Dec. 319, Interim Decision 3467 (BIA 2002), 622
- Anderson v. Conboy, 156 F.3d 167 (2nd Cir. 1998), 1172
- Anetekhai v. INS, 876 F.2d 1218 (5th Cir. 1989), 289
- Angco v. Haig, 514 F.Supp. 1328 (E.D.Pa. 1981), 259

- Apolinar v. Mukasey*, 514 F.3d 893 (9th Cir. 2008), 712
- Application of (see name of party)
- Aramark Facility Services v. Service Employees Intern. Union*, 530 F.3d 817 (9th Cir. 2008), 1169
- Arauz v. Rivkind*, 845 F.2d 271 (11th Cir. 1988), 1021, 1023
- Ardestani v. INS*, 502 U.S. 129, 112 S.Ct. 515, 116 L.Ed.2d 496 (1991), 683
- Aremu v. DHS*, 450 F.3d 578 (4th Cir.2006), 543
- Arguelles-Campos, In re*, 22 I. & N. Dec. 811, Interim Decision 3399 (BIA 1999), 634
- Arguelles-Vasquez v. INS*, 786 F.2d 1433 (9th Cir.1986), 729
- Aronson v. United States*, Civ. Action 073998/04 (Mag. Ct. Tel Aviv, Apr. 26, 2006), 454
- Arrozal v. INS*, 159 F.3d 429 (9th Cir.1998), 616
- Artee Corporation, Matter of, 18 I. & N. Dec. 366, Interim Decision 2934 (INS 1982), 383
- A-S-*, In re, 21 I. & N. Dec. 1106, Interim Decision 3336 (BIA 1998), 1006
- A-S-B-*, Matter of, 24 I. & N. Dec. 493, Interim Decision 3608 (2008), 750
- Asian American Business Group v. City of Pomona*, 716 F.Supp. 1328 (C.D.Cal.1989), 69
- A-T-*, Matter of, 24 I. & N. Dec. 617, Interim Decision 3622 (AG 2008), 973
- Attorney General for Canada v. Cain*, [1906] A.C. 542 (Privy Council 1906), 248
- Attorney-General of Canada and Ward, Matter of*, 103 D.L.R.4th 1 (S.C.C.1993), 923, 935
- Ayala-Arevalo, In re*, 22 I. & N. Dec. 398, Interim Decision 3371 (BIA 1998), 455
- Azizi v. Thornburgh*, 908 F.2d 1130 (2nd Cir.1990), 289
- Ba v. Gonzales*, 228 Fed.Appx. 7 (2nd Cir. 2007), 748
- Baehr v. Lewin*, 74 Haw. 530, 74 Haw. 645, 852 P.2d 44 (Hawai'i 1993), 273
- Baehr v. Milke*, Civ. No. 91-1394, 1996 WL 694235 (Hawai'i Cir.Ct.1996), 273
- Bah v. Mukasey*, 529 F.3d 99 (2nd Cir.2008), 973
- Baker v. Minister of Citizenship and Immigration*, [1999] 2 S.C.R. 817 (S.C.C.1999), 304
- Balasubramaniam v. INS*, 143 F.3d 157 (3rd Cir.1998), 1010
- Balbuena v. IDR Realty LLC*, 6 N.Y.3d 338, 812 N.Y.S.2d 416, 845 N.E.2d 1246 (N.Y. 2006), 1223, 1259
- Baldwin v. Hale*, 68 U.S. 223, 17 L.Ed. 531 (1863), 153
- Baliza v. INS*, 709 F.2d 1231 (9th Cir.1983), 712
- Balsys, United States v.*, 524 U.S. 666, 118 S.Ct. 2218, 141 L.Ed.2d 575 (1998), 731
- Balzac v. Porto Rico*, 258 U.S. 298, 42 S.Ct. 343, 66 L.Ed. 627 (1922), 151
- Bamidele v. INS*, 99 F.3d 557 (3rd Cir.1996), 815
- Bark v. INS*, 511 F.2d 1200 (9th Cir.1975), 283
- Barker v. Ashcroft*, 382 F.3d 313 (3rd Cir. 2003), 767
- Barraza Rivera v. INS*, 913 F.2d 1443 (9th Cir.1990), 917
- Barrera, et al. v. Voughton, et al.*, 3:07-cv-01436-RNC, Dkt. No. 129 (D. Conn. 2009), 1152
- Belenzo, Matter of*, 17 I. & N. Dec. 374, Interim Decision 2793 (BIA & A.G. 1980-81), 815
- Beltran-Zavala v. INS*, 912 F.2d 1027 (9th Cir.1990), 1022
- Benitez, Matter of*, 19 I. & N. Dec. 173, Interim Decision 2979 (BIA 1984), 741
- Berdo v. INS*, 432 F.2d 824 (6th Cir.1970), 440
- Berehe v. INS*, 114 F.3d 159 (10th Cir.1997), 764
- Berlin Democratic Club v. Rumsfeld*, 410 F.Supp. 144 (D.D.C.1976), 500
- Bernal v. Fainter*, 467 U.S. 216, 104 S.Ct. 2312, 81 L.Ed.2d 175 (1984), 1376
- Bhandari v. First Nat. Bank of Commerce*, 829 F.2d 1343 (5th Cir.1987), 1172
- Bhupinder Singh Kamboj, Matter of*, A27 887 288, AILA Monthly Mailing (Feb.1989), 1029
- Bilbao-Bastida, Matter of*, 11 I. & N. Dec. 615, Interim Decision 1586 (BIA 1966), 744
- Blancas, In re*, 23 I. & N. Dec. 458, Interim Decision 3477 (BIA 2002), 600
- Blanco v. INS*, 68 F.3d 642 (2nd Cir.1995), 615
- Blanco-Comarribas v. INS*, 830 F.2d 1039 (9th Cir.1987), 1010
- Blazina v. Bouchard*, 286 F.2d 507 (3rd Cir. 1961), 892
- Board of Regents of State Colleges v. Roth*, 408 U.S. 564, 92 S.Ct. 2701, 33 L.Ed.2d 548 (1972), 154
- Bobb v. Attorney General of United States*, 458 F.3d 213 (3rd Cir.2006), 580
- Bolanos-Hernandez v. INS*, 767 F.2d 1277 (9th Cir.1984), 904, 927
- Bolling v. Sharpe*, 347 U.S. 497, 74 S.Ct. 693, 98 L.Ed. 884 (1954), 185
- Booker, United States v.*, 543 U.S. 220, 125 S.Ct. 738, 160 L.Ed.2d 621 (2005), 575
- Borrero v. Aljets*, 325 F.3d 1003 (8th Cir. 2003), 221
- Botezatu v. INS*, 195 F.3d 311 (7th Cir.1999), 631, 769
- Boumediene v. Bush*, ___ U.S. ___, 128 S.Ct. 2229, 171 L.Ed.2d 41 (2008), 169
- Boutilier v. INS*, 387 U.S. 118, 87 S.Ct. 1563, 18 L.Ed.2d 661 (1967), 271

- Bowers v. Hardwick, 478 U.S. 186, 106 S.Ct. 2841, 92 L.Ed.2d 140 (1986), 279
- Brandenburg v. Ohio, 395 U.S. 444, 89 S.Ct. 1827, 23 L.Ed.2d 430 (1969), 191
- Bravo-Pedroza v. Gonzales, 475 F.3d 1358 (9th Cir.2007), 651
- Brignoni-Ponce, United States v., 422 U.S. 873, 95 S.Ct. 2574, 45 L.Ed.2d 607 (1975), 728
- Bugajewitz v. Adams, 228 U.S. 585, 33 S.Ct. 607, 57 L.Ed. 978 (1913), 517, 518, 646
- Bulk Farms, Inc. v. Martin, 963 F.2d 1286 (9th Cir.1992), 319
- Burrafato v. United States Dept. of State, 523 F.2d 554 (2nd Cir.1975), 501
- Bustos-Torres v. INS, 898 F.2d 1053 (5th Cir.1990), 652, 656, 713, 730
- C-A-, In re, 23 I. & N. Dec. 951, Interim Decision 3535 (BIA 2006), 935, 936
- Cabell v. Chavez-Salido, 454 U.S. 432, 102 S.Ct. 735, 70 L.Ed.2d 677 (1982), 1377
- Cabra-Avila v. INS, 589 F.2d 957 (9th Cir. 1978), 743
- Calcano-Martinez v. INS, 533 U.S. 348, 121 S.Ct. 2268, 150 L.Ed.2d 392 (2001), 764, 765
- Camins v. Gonzales, 500 F.3d 872 (9th Cir. 2007), 541
- Campos-Asencio, United States v., 822 F.2d 506 (5th Cir.1987), 678
- Canada (Minister of Employment & Immigration) v. Mayers, 1992 WL 1322370 (Fed. C.A.1992), 938
- Canadian Council for Refugees v. The Queen, [2007] F.C. 1262 (F.C.2007), 1052
- Canas-Segovia v. INS, 970 F.2d 599 (9th Cir.1992), 905, 917
- Canjura-Flores v. INS, 784 F.2d 885 (9th Cir.1985), 1009
- Cao v. United States Dept. of Justice, 421 F.3d 149 (2nd Cir.2005), 615
- Cardenas Abreu, Matter of, 24 I. & N. Dec. 795, Interim Decision 3641 (BIA 2009), 552
- Carrasca v. Pomeroy, 313 F.3d 828 (3rd Cir. 2002), 1277
- Carillo, Matter of, 17 I. & N.Dec. 30, 32-33 (BIA 1979), 730
- Carty v. Ashcroft, 395 F.3d 1081 (9th Cir. 2005), 764
- Castellano-Chacon v. INS, 341 F.3d 533 (6th Cir.2003), 935
- Castrinakis, Petition of, 179 F.Supp. 444 (D.Md.1959), 1312
- Castro-Louzan, United States ex rel. v. Zimmerman, 94 F.Supp. 22 (E.D.Pa.1950), 678
- Castro-O'Ryan v. United States Dept. of Immigration and Naturalization, 847 F.2d 1307 (9th Cir.1987), 679, 1042
- Cato v. INS, 84 F.3d 597 (2nd Cir.1996), 599
- Center for Nat. Sec. Studies v. United States Dept. of Justice, 331 F.3d 918 (D.C.Cir. 2003), 822
- Cevilla v. Gonzales, 446 F.3d 658 (7th Cir. 2006), 767
- Chae Chan Ping v. United States (The Chinese Exclusion Case), 130 U.S. 581, 9 S.Ct. 623, 32 L.Ed. 1068 (1889), 120, 1240
- Chang, Matter of, 20 I. & N. Dec. 38, Interim Decision 3107 (BIA 1989), 913
- Chavarria v. Gonzalez, 446 F.3d 508 (3rd Cir.2006), 923
- Chavez-Martinez, In re, 24 I. & N. Dec. 272, Interim Decision 3578 (BIA 2007), 560
- Chavez-Ramirez v. INS, 792 F.2d 932 (9th Cir.1986), 539
- Chen v. Ashcroft, 381 F.3d 221 (3rd Cir. 2004), 915
- Chen v. INS, 195 F.3d 198 (4th Cir.1999), 915
- Chen, Matter of, 20 I. & N. Dec. 16, Interim Decision 3104 (BIA 1989), 1003
- Chen, United States v., 2 F.3d 330 (9th Cir. 1993), 1082
- Cheng Fan Kwok v. INS, 392 U.S. 206, 88 S.Ct. 1970, 20 L.Ed.2d 1037 (1968), 789
- Chen Zhou Chai v. Carroll, 48 F.3d 1331 (4th Cir.1995), 527
- Chevron U.S.A., Inc. v. Natural Resources Defense Council, Inc., 467 U.S. 837, 104 S.Ct. 2778, 81 L.Ed.2d 694 (1984), 366, 521, 580
- Chew Heong v. United States, 112 U.S. 536, 5 S.Ct. 255, 28 L.Ed. 770 (1884), 128
- Chiaromonte v. INS, 626 F.2d 1093 (2nd Cir. 1980), 297
- Chicago, City of v. Shalala, 189 F.3d 598 (7th Cir.1999), 1250
- Chicanos por la Causa, Inc. v. Napolitano, 544 F.3d 976 (9th Cir.2008), 1259
- Chiles v. United States, 69 F.3d 1094 (11th Cir.1995), 1287
- Chinese Community Center, Matter of, 91-INA-99 (BALCA 1991), 318
- Ching and Chen, Matter of, 19 I. & N. Dec. 203, Interim Decision 2984 (BIA 1984), 523
- Cho v. INS, 649 F.2d 867 (9th Cir.1981), 615
- Chong Shin Chen v. Ashcroft, 378 F.3d 1081 (9th Cir.2004), 754
- Christopher, United States v., 239 F.3d 1191 (11th Cir.2001), 584
- Chy Lung v. Freeman, 92 U.S. 275, 2 Otto 275, 23 L.Ed. 550 (1875), 131
- Cisneros-Gonzalez, In re, 23 I. & N. Dec. 668, Interim Decision 3500 (BIA 2004), 601
- City of (see name of city)
- Clark v. Martinez, 543 U.S. 371, 125 S.Ct. 716, 160 L.Ed.2d 734 (2005), 223
- Cleanex House Cleaning Service, Inc., Matter of, No. 2003-INA-208 (BALCA 2004), 319
- Collado-Munoz, In re, 21 I. & N. Dec. 1061, Interim Decision 3333 (BIA 1998), 541

- Collins Foods Intern., Inc. v. INS, 948 F.2d 549 (9th Cir.1991), 1160
- Columbus Hospital, Matter of, 95-INA-282 (BALCA 1996), 332
- Comite de Jornaleros de Glendale v. City of Glendale, No. CV 04-3521-SJO (C.D. Cal. May 16, 2005), 1225
- Comite de Jornaleros de Redondo Beach v. City of Redondo Beach, 475 F.Supp.2d 952 (C.D.Cal.2006), 1225
- Compean, Matter of, 24 I. & N. Dec. 710, Interim Decision 3632 (AG 2009), 698
- Consolo v. Federal Maritime Commission, 383 U.S. 607, 86 S.Ct. 1018, 16 L.Ed.2d 131 (1966), 738
- Cordes v. Gonzales, 421 F.3d 889 (9th Cir. 2005), 199
- Cornejo-Merida v. Ashcroft, 116 Fed.Appx. 900 (9th Cir.2004), 945
- Corona-Palomera v. INS, 661 F.2d 814 (9th Cir.1981), 741
- Correa v. Thornburgh, 901 F.2d 1166 (2nd Cir.1990), 528
- Cortes-Castillo v. INS, 997 F.2d 1199 (7th Cir.1993), 597
- Cortez, Matter of, 16 I. & N. Dec. 289, Interim Decision 2603 (BIA 1977), 198, 744
- Cota-Vargas, In re, 23 I. & N. Dec. 849, Interim Decision 3522 (BIA 2005), 559, 584
- Cote, Matter of, 17 I. & N. Dec. 336, Interim Decision 2783 (BIA 1980), 367
- Council of Civil Service Unions v. Minister for the Civil Service, [1984] 3 All. E.R. 935 (HL 1984), 249
- Crammond, In re, 23 I. & N. Dec. 9, Interim Decision 3443 (BIA 2001), 575
- Cubillos-Gonzalez v. INS, Los Angeles, Cal., 352 F.2d 782 (9th Cir.1965), 413
- Cuello, Matter of, 20 I. & N. Dec. 94, Interim Decision 3117 (BIA 1989), 300
- Cunanan v. INS, 856 F.2d 1373 (9th Cir. 1988), 713
- Curtiss-Wright Export Corporation, United States v., 299 U.S. 304, 57 S.Ct. 216, 81 L.Ed. 255 (1936), 130
- C.V.T., In re, 22 I. & N. Dec. 7, Interim Decision 3342 (BIA 1998), 600
- C-Y-Z-, In re, 21 I. & N. Dec. 915, Interim Decision 3319 (BIA 1997), 914
- Dada v. Mukasey, — U.S. —, 128 S.Ct. 2307, 171 L.Ed.2d 178 (2008), 636
- Dalton v. Ashcroft, 257 F.3d 200 (2nd Cir. 2001), 764
- Damaize-Job v. INS, 787 F.2d 1332 (9th Cir.1986), 1007
- Dass, Matter of, 20 I. & N. Dec. 120, Interim Decision 3122 (BIA 1989), 1011
- Dastmalchi v. INS, 660 F.2d 880 (3rd Cir. 1981), 744
- Dawood-Haio v. INS, 800 F.2d 90 (6th Cir. 1986), 1005
- Day v. Bond, 500 F.3d 1127 (10th Cir.2007), 1212
- De Canas v. Bica, 424 U.S. 351, 96 S.Ct. 933, 47 L.Ed.2d 43 (1976), 130, 1223, 1251, 1376
- De Leon v. INS, 115 F.3d 643 (9th Cir.1997), 762
- De Leon-Reynoso v. Ashcroft, 293 F.3d 633 (3rd Cir.2002), 199, 456
- De Los Santos v. INS, 690 F.2d 56 (2nd Cir.1982), 296
- Del Rosario, United States v., 902 F.2d 55 (D.C.Cir.1990), 697
- Demore v. Kim, 538 U.S. 510, 123 S.Ct. 1708, 155 L.Ed.2d 724 (2003), 200, 226, 242, 243, 769, 785
- Dennis v. United States, 341 U.S. 494, 71 S.Ct. 857, 95 L.Ed. 1137 (1951), 181, 191
- Department of Commerce v. United States House of Representatives, 525 U.S. 316, 119 S.Ct. 765, 142 L.Ed.2d 797 (1999), 1191
- Design Kitchen and Baths v. Lagos, 388 Md. 718, 882 A.2d 817 (Md.2005), 1224
- Desir v. Ilchert, 840 F.2d 723 (9th Cir.1988), 902, 924
- Detroit Free Press v. Ashcroft, 303 F.3d 681 (6th Cir.2002), 837
- De Valle v. INS, 901 F.2d 787 (9th Cir.1990), 939, 1000
- Devison, In re, 22 I. & N. Dec. 1362, Interim Decision 3435 (BIA 2000), 557
- Diallo v. INS, 232 F.3d 279 (2nd Cir.2000), 1006
- Diaz v. Pan Am. World Airways, Inc., 442 F.2d 385 (5th Cir.1971), 316
- Diaz-Escobar v. INS, 782 F.2d 1488 (9th Cir.1986), 928
- Dillingham v. INS, 267 F.3d 996 (9th Cir. 2001), 199, 559
- Discipio v. Ashcroft, 417 F.3d 448 (5th Cir. 2005), 558
- Discipio v. Ashcroft, 369 F.3d 472 (5th Cir. 2004), 558
- Disu v. Ashcroft, 338 F.3d 13 (1st Cir.2003), 754
- D-J-, In re, 23 I. & N. Dec. 572, Interim Decision 3488 (A.G. 2003), 820, 895, 1058
- Downes v. Bidwell, 182 U.S. 244, 21 S.Ct. 770, 45 L.Ed. 1088 (1901), 151
- Drakes v. Zimski, 240 F.3d 246 (3rd Cir. 2001), 764
- Dred Scott v. Sandford, 60 U.S. 393, 19 How. 393, 15 L.Ed. 691 (1856), 1291
- Dunar, Matter of, 14 I. & N. Dec. 310, Interim Decision 2192 (BIA 1973), 999
- D-V-, In re, 21 I. & N. Dec. 77, Interim Decision 3252 (BIA 1993), 959
- E-A-G-, Matter of, 24 I. & N. Dec. 591, Interim Decision 3618 (BIA 2007), 936
- Echeverria-Hernandez v. United States INS, 923 F.2d 688 (9th Cir.1991), 1130

- Edwards v. People of State of California, 314 U.S. 160, 62 S.Ct. 164, 86 L.Ed. 119 (1941), 117
- E.E.O.C. v. Premier Operator Services, Inc., 113 F.Supp.2d 1066 (N.D.Tex.2000), 68
- Ekiu v. United States, 142 U.S. 651, 12 S.Ct. 336, 35 L.Ed. 1146 (1892), 134
- Elder, United States v., 601 F.Supp. 1574 (S.D.Tex.1985), 1155
- Elias v. United States Dept. of State, 721 F.Supp. 243 (N.D.Cal.1989), 1298
- Elk v. Wilkins, 112 U.S. 94, 5 S.Ct. 41, 28 L.Ed. 643 (1884), 1291
- El-Khader v. Monica, 366 F.3d 562 (7th Cir. 2004), 476
- El Rescate Legal Services, Inc. v. Executive Office of Immigration Review, 959 F.2d 742 (9th Cir.1991), 174, 656, 1035
- Equal Access Educ. v. Merten, 305 F.Supp.2d 585 (E.D.Va.2004), 1210, 1257
- Escobar Ruiz v. INS, 838 F.2d 1020 (9th Cir.1988), 683
- Eslamizar, In re, 23 I. & N. Dec. 684, Interim Decision 3502 (BIA 2004), 551
- Esperdy, United States ex rel. Piperkoff v., 267 F.2d 72 (2nd Cir.1959), 572
- Espinoza v. Farah Mfg. Co., Inc., 414 U.S. 86, 94 S.Ct. 334, 38 L.Ed.2d 287 (1973), 1172
- Espinoza-Franco v. Ashcroft, 394 F.3d 461 (7th Cir.2005), 582
- Estime, Matter of, 19 I. & N. Dec. 450, Interim Decision 3029 (BIA 1987), 476
- Estrada v. INS, 775 F.2d 1018 (9th Cir.1985), 1010
- Estrada-Posadas v. INS, 924 F.2d 916 (9th Cir.1991), 939
- Examining Bd. of Engineers, Architects and Surveyors v. Flores de Otero, 426 U.S. 572, 96 S.Ct. 2264, 49 L.Ed.2d 65 (1976), 1376
- Falcon Carriche v. Ashcroft, 335 F.3d 1009 (9th Cir.2003), 754
- Farmers Bros. Coffee v. Workers' Comp. Appeals Bd., 35 Cal.Rptr.3d 23 (Cal.App. 2 Dist.2005), 1224
- Fatin v. INS, 12 F.3d 1233 (3rd Cir.1993), 934, 935, 950
- Felczerek v. INS, 75 F.3d 112 (2nd Cir.1996), 712
- Feroz v. INS, 22 F.3d 225 (9th Cir.1994), 1023
- Fiallo v. Bell, 430 U.S. 787, 97 S.Ct. 1473, 52 L.Ed.2d 50 (1977), 188, 295
- Finau v. INS, 277 F.3d 1146 (9th Cir.2002), 456
- Firestone v. Howerton, 671 F.2d 317 (9th Cir.1982), 440
- Fisher v. INS, 79 F.3d 955 (9th Cir.1996), 958
- Flemming v. Nestor, 363 U.S. 603, 80 S.Ct. 1367, 4 L.Ed.2d 1435 (1960), 1375
- Flores v. Bowen, 790 F.2d 740 (9th Cir.1986), 365
- Flores-Figueroa v. United States, ___ U.S. ___, 129 S.Ct. 1886, ___ L.Ed.2d ___ (2009), 1156
- Florida Bar v. Matus, 528 So.2d 895 (Fla. 1988), 476
- Foley v. Connelie, 435 U.S. 291, 98 S.Ct. 1067, 55 L.Ed.2d 287 (1978), 1377
- Fong, Matter of, 17 I. & N. Dec. 212, Interim Decision 2749 (BIA 1980), 298
- Fong Haw Tan v. Phelan, 333 U.S. 6, 68 S.Ct. 374, 92 L.Ed. 433 (1948), 519
- Fong Yue Ting v. United States, 149 U.S. 698, 13 S.Ct. 1016, 37 L.Ed. 905 (1893), 136
- F-P-R-, Matter of, 24 I. & N. Dec. 681 (BIA 2008), 1045
- Francis v. INS, 532 F.2d 268 (2nd Cir. 1976), 195, 597
- Franklin v. INS, 72 F.3d 571 (8th Cir.1995), 569
- Frentescu, Matter of, 18 I. & N. Dec. 244, Interim Decision 2906 (BIA 1982), 1022
- G-, Matter of, 20 I. & N. Dec. 764, Interim Decision 3215 (BIA 1993), 526
- G.A., Matter of, 7 I. & N. Dec. 274, Interim Decision 808 (BIA 1956), 596
- Galvan v. Press, 347 U.S. 522, 74 S.Ct. 737, 98 L.Ed. 911 (1954), 187, 1244
- Gao v. Gonzales, 424 F.3d 122 (2nd Cir. 2005), 923
- Gaona-Romero v. Gonzales, 207 Fed.Appx. 386 (5th Cir.2006), 558
- Garberding v. INS, 30 F.3d 1187 (9th Cir. 1994), 199
- Garcia, Matter of, 17 I. & N. Dec. 319, Interim Decision 2778 (BIA 1980), 730
- Garcia-Garrocho, Matter of, 19 I. & N. Dec. 423, Interim Decision 3022 (BIA 1986), 1023, 1024
- Garcia-Lopez v. Ashcroft, 334 F.3d 840 (9th Cir.2003), 580
- Garcia-Martinez v. Ashcroft, 371 F.3d 1066 (9th Cir.2004), 995
- Garner, Matter of, 15 I. & N. Dec. 215, Interim Decision 2357 (BIA 1975), 296
- Garrett v. City of Escondido, 465 F.Supp.2d 1043 (S.D.Cal.2006), 1272
- Gastelum-Quinones v. Kennedy, 374 U.S. 469, 83 S.Ct. 1819, 10 L.Ed.2d 1013 (1963), 440
- Gattem v. Gonzales, 412 F.3d 758 (7th Cir. 2005), 581
- Gault, Application of, 387 U.S. 1, 87 S.Ct. 1428, 18 L.Ed.2d 527 (1967), 730
- Gebremichael v. INS, 10 F.3d 28 (1st Cir. 1993), 939
- Gegiow v. Uhl, 239 U.S. 3, 36 S.Ct. 2, 60 L.Ed. 114 (1915), 430
- Gharadaghi, Matter of, 19 I. & N. Dec. 311, Interim Decision 3001 (BIA 1985), 1025
- Gideon v. Wainwright, 372 U.S. 335, 83 S.Ct. 792, 9 L.Ed.2d 799 (1963), 678

- Gill v. Ashcroft, 335 F.3d 574 (7th Cir.2003), 559
- Giri v. Keisler, 507 F.3d 833 (5th Cir.2007), 762
- Git Foo Wong v. INS, 358 F.2d 151 (9th Cir.1966), 538
- Gjonaj v. INS, 47 F.3d 824 (6th Cir.1995), 599
- G-N-C-, In re, 22 I. & N. Dec. 281, Interim Decision 3366 (BIA 1998), 632
- Golden Jade Restaurant, Matter of, No. 88-INA-342 (BALCA 1989), 315
- Gomez-Lopez v. Ashcroft, 391 F.3d 1109 (9th Cir.2004), 767
- Gonzales v. City of Peoria, 722 F.2d 468 (9th Cir.1983), 1276
- Gonzales v. Duenas-Alvarez, 549 U.S. 183, 127 S.Ct. 815, 166 L.Ed.2d 683 (2007), 582, 583
- Gonzales-Vela, United States v., 276 F.3d 763 (6th Cir.2001), 576
- Gonzalez v. Reno, 212 F.3d 1338 (11th Cir.2000), 1036
- Gonzalez-Oropeza v. United States Atty. Gen., 321 F.3d 1331 (11th Cir.2003), 607
- Gonzalez-Rivera v. INS, 22 F.3d 1441 (9th Cir.1994), 729
- Gonzalez-Sandoval v. INS, 910 F.2d 614 (9th Cir.1990), 571
- Gonzalez, Matter of, 19 I. & N. Dec. 682, Interim Decision 3071 (BIA 1988), 1023
- Goodridge v. Department of Public Health, 440 Mass. 309, 798 N.E.2d 941 (Mass.2003), 275
- Gorbach v. Reno, No. C-98-0278R, 2001 WL 34145464 (W.D.Wash.2001), 1338
- Gorbach v. Reno, 219 F.3d 1087 (9th Cir.2000), 1338
- Graham v. Richardson, 403 U.S. 365, 91 S.Ct. 1848, 29 L.Ed.2d 534 (1971), 1244, 1376
- Graham, Matter of, 88-INA-102 (BALCA 1990), 310
- Graham, United States v., 169 F.3d 787 (3rd Cir.1999), 584
- Granados, Matter of, 16 I. & N. Dec. 726, Interim Decision 2701 (BIA 1979), 598
- Greyhound Lines v. INS, Civ. No. 95-1608 (NHJ) (D.D.C. Oct. 23, 1995), 368
- Griffin v. California, 380 U.S. 609, 85 S.Ct. 1229, 14 L.Ed.2d 106 (1965), 743
- Griffiths, Application of, 413 U.S. 717, 93 S.Ct. 2851, 37 L.Ed.2d 910 (1973), 1376
- Griggs v. Duke Power Co., 401 U.S. 424, 91 S.Ct. 849, 28 L.Ed.2d 158 (1971), 1175
- Griswold v. Connecticut, 381 U.S. 479, 85 S.Ct. 1678, 14 L.Ed.2d 510 (1965), 125
- Guerrero-Perez v. INS, 242 F.3d 727 (7th Cir.2001), 576, 764
- Guevara, Matter of, 20 I. & N. Dec. 238, Interim Decision 3143 (BIA 1990), 743
- Guinac v. INS, 179 F.3d 1156 (9th Cir.1999), 906
- Gunaydin v. INS, 742 F.2d 776 (3rd Cir.1984), 546
- Gur, Matter of, 16 I. & N. Dec. 123, Interim Decision 2560 (BIA 1977), 297, 298
- Gutierrez v. Mukasey, 521 F.3d 1114 (9th Cir.2008), 767
- Guzman-Landeros, United States v., 207 F.3d 1034 (8th Cir.2000), 582
- Hall v. McLaughlin, 864 F.2d 868 (D.C.Cir.1989), 318
- Hamid v. INS, 648 F.2d 635 (9th Cir.1981), 615
- Hampton v. Mow Sun Wong, 426 U.S. 88, 96 S.Ct. 1895, 48 L.Ed.2d 495 (1976), 1375
- Harisiades v. Shaughnessy, 342 U.S. 580, 72 S.Ct. 512, 96 L.Ed. 586 (1952), 177, 1393
- Hassan v. Gonzales, 484 F.3d 513 (8th Cir.2007), 968
- Hathaway Children's Services, Matter of, 91-INA-388 (BALCA 1994), 332
- He v. Ashcroft, 328 F.3d 593 (9th Cir.2003), 656
- Head Money Cases, 112 U.S. 580, 5 S.Ct. 247, 28 L.Ed. 798 (1884), 117
- Healy and Goodchild, Matter of, 17 I. & N. Dec. 22, Interim Decision 2716 (BIA 1979), 404
- Heckler v. Chaney, 470 U.S. 821, 105 S.Ct. 1649, 84 L.Ed.2d 714 (1985), 499
- Hee Yung Ahn v. INS, 651 F.2d 1285 (9th Cir.1981), 615
- Heitland v. INS, 551 F.2d 495 (2nd Cir.1977), 604
- Henderson v. Mayor of City of New York, 92 U.S. 259, 2 Otto 259, 23 L.Ed. 543 (1875), 117
- Hermina Sague v. United States, 416 F.Supp. 217 (D.Puerto Rico 1976), 493
- Hernandez v. Ashcroft, 345 F.3d 824 (9th Cir.2003), 602
- Hernandez-Cordero v. INS, 819 F.2d 558 (5th Cir.1987), 616
- Hernandez-Guadarrama v. Ashcroft, 394 F.3d 674 (9th Cir.2005), 713
- Hernandez-Herrera, United States v., 273 F.3d 1213 (9th Cir.2001), 528
- Hernandez-Montiel v. INS, 225 F.3d 1084 (9th Cir.2000), 936
- Hernandez-Ortiz v. INS, 777 F.2d 509 (9th Cir.1985), 904, 1026
- Hill v. INS, 714 F.2d 1470 (9th Cir.1983), 272
- Hilton v. Braunskill, 481 U.S. 770, 107 S.Ct. 2113, 95 L.Ed.2d 724 (1987), 762
- Hines v. Davidowitz, 312 U.S. 52, 61 S.Ct. 399, 85 L.Ed. 581 (1941), 1244
- H-M-V-, In re, 22 I. & N. Dec. 256, Interim Decision 3365 (BIA 1998), 1098, 1107
- Ho, In re, 22 I. & N. Dec. 206, Interim Decision 3362 (INS 1998), 347
- Ho, Matter of, 19 I. & N. Dec. 582 (BIA 1988), 476
- Hoffman Plastic Compounds, Inc. v. N.L.R.B., 535 U.S. 137, 122 S.Ct. 1275, 152 L.Ed.2d 271 (2002), 1214

- Hosseinpour, Matter of, 15 I. & N. Dec. 191, Interim Decision 2349 (BIA 1975), 414
- Hsiung, In re, 22 I. & N. Dec. 201, Interim Decision 3361 (INS 1998), 347
- Iao v. Gonzales, 400 F.3d 530 (7th Cir.2005), 748, 917
- Iavorski v. INS, 232 F.3d 124 (2nd Cir.2000), 755
- Illinois, United States v., 2009 WL 662703 (C.D.Ill.2009), 1271
- Industrial Holographics, Inc. v. Donovan, 722 F.2d 1362 (7th Cir.1983), 327
- Information Industries, Matter of, No. 88-INA-82 (BALCA 1989), 315
- In re (see name of party)
- INS v. Abudu, 485 U.S. 94, 108 S.Ct. 904, 99 L.Ed.2d 90 (1988), 613, 755
- INS v. Aguirre-Aguirre, 526 U.S. 415, 119 S.Ct. 1439, 143 L.Ed.2d 590 (1999), 1024
- INS v. Cardoza-Fonseca, 480 U.S. 421, 107 S.Ct. 1207, 94 L.Ed.2d 434 (1987), 999
- INS v. Chadha, 462 U.S. 919, 103 S.Ct. 2764, 77 L.Ed.2d 317 (1983), 201, 624, 789
- INS v. Elias-Zacarias, 502 U.S. 478, 112 S.Ct. 812, 117 L.Ed.2d 38 (1992), 918
- INS v. Jong Ha Wang, 450 U.S. 139, 101 S.Ct. 1027, 67 L.Ed.2d 123 (1981), 608, 755
- INS v. Lopez-Mendoza, 468 U.S. 1032, 104 S.Ct. 3479, 82 L.Ed.2d 778 (1984), 713
- INS v. Miranda, 459 U.S. 14, 103 S.Ct. 281, 74 L.Ed.2d 12 (1982), 646, 732
- INS v. Orlando Ventura, 537 U.S. 12, 123 S.Ct. 353, 154 L.Ed.2d 272 (2002), 1001
- INS v. Phinpathya, 464 U.S. 183, 104 S.Ct. 584, 78 L.Ed.2d 401 (1984), 604
- INS v. Rios-Pineda, 471 U.S. 444, 105 S.Ct. 2098, 85 L.Ed.2d 452 (1985), 613
- INS v. St. Cyr, 533 U.S. 289, 121 S.Ct. 2271, 150 L.Ed.2d 347 (2001), 198, 243, 521, 775
- INS v. Stevic, 467 U.S. 407, 104 S.Ct. 2489, 81 L.Ed.2d 321 (1984), 999
- INS v. Yueh-Shaio Yang, 519 U.S. 26, 117 S.Ct. 350, 136 L.Ed.2d 288 (1996), 546
- International Union of Bricklayers and Allied Craftsmen v. Meese, 616 F.Supp. 1387 (N.D.Cal.1985), 358
- Iran v. INS, 656 F.2d 469 (9th Cir.1981), 741
- Islami v. Gonzales, 412 F.3d 391 (2nd Cir. 2005), 913
- Islam (A.P.) v. Secretary of State for the Home Dept., [1999] 2 A.C. 629, [1999] 2 All E.R. 545, [1999] 2 W.L.R. 1015 (U.K. House of Lords 1999), 935, 990
- Itzcovitz v. Selective Service Local Bd. No. 6, New York, N. Y., 447 F.2d 888 (2nd Cir. 1971), 538
- Izatula, Matter of, 20 I. & N. Dec. 149, Interim Decision 3127 (BIA 1990), 907
- Izummi, In re, 22 I. & N. Dec. 169, Interim Decision 3360 (INS 1998), 346, 347
- Jama v. Immigration and Customs Enforcement, 543 U.S. 335, 125 S.Ct. 694, 160 L.Ed.2d 708 (2005), 639
- Janvier v. United States, 793 F.2d 449 (2nd Cir.1986), 572
- J-B-N- & S-M-, In re, 24 I. & N. Dec. 208, Interim Decision 3569 (BIA 2007), 997
- Jean v. Nelson, 727 F.2d 957 (11th Cir.1984), 190
- Jewell, United States v., 532 F.2d 697 (9th Cir.1976), 1160
- Jilin Pharmaceutical USA, Inc. v. Chertoff, 447 F.3d 196 (3rd Cir.2006), 476
- Jobson v. Ashcroft, 326 F.3d 367 (2nd Cir. 2003), 521
- J-S-, Matter of, 24 I. & N. Dec. 520, Interim Decision 3611 (AG 2008), 914
- Jubilado v. United States, 819 F.2d 210 (9th Cir.1987), 538
- J-W-S-, In re, 24 I. & N. Dec. 185, Interim Decision 3566 (BIA 2007), 915
- Kahane v. Secretary of State, 700 F.Supp. 1162 (D.D.C.1988), 1371
- Kahane v. Shultz, 653 F.Supp. 1486 (E.D.N.Y.1987), 1370
- Karmali v. INS, 707 F.2d 408 (9th Cir. 1983), 388
- Karouni v. Gonzales, 399 F.3d 1163 (9th Cir. 2005), 945
- Kasinga, In re, 21 I. & N. Dec. 357, Interim Decision 3278 (BIA 1996), 905, 959
- Kasravi v. INS, 400 F.2d 675 (9th Cir.1968), 1013
- Kawakita v. United States, 343 U.S. 717, 72 S.Ct. 950, 96 L.Ed. 1249 (1952), 1319
- Kellogg, United States ex rel. Ulrich v., 30 F.2d 984 (D.C.Cir.1929), 496
- Kennedy v. Mendoza-Martinez, 372 U.S. 144, 83 S.Ct. 554, 9 L.Ed.2d 644 (1963), 1359
- Kerrigan v. Commissioner of Public Health, 289 Conn. 135, 957 A.2d 407 (Conn.2008), 275
- Keungne v. United States Atty. Gen., 561 F.3d 1281 (11th Cir.2009), 567
- Khodagholian v. Ashcroft, 335 F.3d 1003 (9th Cir.2003), 539
- Kids "R" Us, Matter of, No. 89-INA-311 et al (BALCA 1991), 331
- Kim Ho Ma v. Ashcroft, 257 F.3d 1095 (9th Cir.2001), 220
- Kirby, United States v., 74 U.S. 482, 19 L.Ed. 278 (1868), 271
- Kiyemba v. Obama, 555 F.3d 1022 (D.C.Cir. 2009), 170
- Kleindienst v. Mandel, 408 U.S. 753, 92 S.Ct. 2576, 33 L.Ed.2d 683 (1972), 190, 193, 1298
- Knapik v. Ashcroft, 384 F.3d 84 (3rd Cir. 2004), 568

- Knauff, United States ex rel. v. Shaughnessy, 338 U.S. 537, 70 S.Ct. 309, 94 L.Ed. 317 (1950), 155
- Knezevic v. Ashcroft, 367 F.3d 1206 (9th Cir.2004), 1000
- Kofa v. INS, 60 F.3d 1084 (4th Cir.1995), 1023
- Kohama, Matter of, 17 I. & N. Dec. 257, Interim Decision 2761 (INS 1978), 459
- Koloamantangi, In re, 23 I. & N. Dec. 548, Interim Decision 3486 (BIA 2003), 600
- Kovac v. INS, 407 F.2d 102 (9th Cir.1969), 906
- Kowalczyk v. INS, 245 F.3d 1143 (10th Cir. 2001), 1015
- Kozminski, United States v., 487 U.S. 931, 108 S.Ct. 2751, 101 L.Ed.2d 788 (1988), 1223
- Kucana v. Holder, No. 08-911 (S.Ct. Apr. 27, 2009), 767
- Kucana v. Mukasey, 533 F.3d 534 (7th Cir. 2008), 767
- Kulle, Matter of, 19 I. & N. Dec. 318, Interim Decision 3002 (BIA 1985), 1009
- Kumar v. Gonzales, 444 F.3d 1043 (9th Cir. 2006), 923
- Kungys v. United States, 485 U.S. 759, 108 S.Ct. 1537, 99 L.Ed.2d 839 (1988), 1338
- L., Matter of, 1 I. & N. Dec. 1 (BIA & A.G. 1940), 596
- Ladha v. INS, 215 F.3d 889 (9th Cir.2000), 1006
- Landon v. Plasencia, 459 U.S. 21, 103 S.Ct. 321, 74 L.Ed.2d 21 (1982), 164, 732
- Lara-Ruiz v. INS, 241 F.3d 934 (7th Cir. 2001), 456
- Latu v. Ashcroft, 375 F.3d 1012 (10th Cir. 2004), 456
- Laureano, Matter of, 19 I. & N. Dec. 1, Interim Decision 2951 (BIA 1983), 283
- Lauvik v. INS, 910 F.2d 658 (9th Cir.1990), 414
- Lawrence v. Texas, 539 U.S. 558, 123 S.Ct. 2472, 156 L.Ed.2d 508 (2003), 279, 945
- Lawyers Committee for Human Rights v. INS, 721 F.Supp. 552 (S.D.N.Y.1989), 441
- Lazo-Majano v. INS, 813 F.2d 1432 (9th Cir. 1987), 924
- Le v. United States Atty. Gen., 196 F.3d 1352 (11th Cir.1999), 580
- League of United Latin American Citizens v. Wilson, 997 F.Supp. 1244 (C.D.Cal.1997), 1284
- League of United Latin American Citizens v. Wilson, 908 F.Supp. 755 (C.D.Cal.1995), 1257, 1283, 1284
- Lee Lung v. Patterson, 186 U.S. 168, 22 S.Ct. 795, 46 L.Ed. 1108 (1902), 155
- Legal Assistance for Vietnamese Asylum Seekers v. Department of State, Bureau of Consular Affairs, 45 F.3d 469 (D.C.Cir. 1995), 502
- Lem Moon Sing v. United States, 158 U.S. 538, 15 S.Ct. 967, 39 L.Ed. 1082 (1895), 155
- Leng May Ma v. Barber, 357 U.S. 185, 78 S.Ct. 1072, 2 L.Ed.2d 1246 (1958), 893
- Lennon v. INS, 527 F.2d 187 (2nd Cir.1975), 421
- Lennon, Matter of, 15 I. & N. Dec. 9, Interim Decision 2304 (BIA 1974), 199
- Leocal v. Ashcroft, 543 U.S. 1, 125 S.Ct. 377, 160 L.Ed.2d 271 (2004), 576, 764
- Lewis v. INS, 194 F.3d 539 (4th Cir.1999), 764
- Li v. Ashcroft, 356 F.3d 1153 (9th Cir.2004), 996
- Li, United States v., 206 F.3d 56 (1st Cir. 2000), 731
- Licea-Gomez v. Pilliod, 193 F.Supp. 577 (N.D.Ill.1960), 498
- Lieggi v. INS, 529 F.2d 530 (7th Cir.1976), 646
- Lignomat USA, Matter of, No. 88-INA-276 (BALCA 1989), 318
- Linnas v. INS, 790 F.2d 1024 (2nd Cir. 1986), 639
- Lippert Theatres, Matter of, No. 88-INA-433 (BALCA 1990), 318
- Liu v. United States Dept. of Justice, 455 F.3d 106 (2nd Cir.2006), 1061
- Lombera-Camorlinga, United States v., 206 F.3d 882 (9th Cir.2000), 731
- London, United States ex rel. v. Phelps, 22 F.2d 288 (2nd Cir.1927), 496
- Longstaff, Matter of, 716 F.2d 1439 (5th Cir. 1983), 272
- Lopes v. Mukasey, 517 F.3d 156 (2nd Cir. 2008), 811
- Lopez v. Gonzales, 549 U.S. 47, 127 S.Ct. 625, 166 L.Ed.2d 462 (2006), 583
- Lopez v. INS, 184 F.3d 1097 (9th Cir.1999), 812
- Lopez v. INS, 775 F.2d 1015 (9th Cir.1985), 928
- Lopez-Chavez v. INS, 259 F.3d 1176 (9th Cir.2001), 742
- Lopez-Elias v. Reno, 209 F.3d 788 (5th Cir. 2000), 582, 583
- Lopez-Meza, In re, 22 I. & N. Dec. 1188, Interim Decision 3423 (BIA 1999), 569
- Lopez-Rodriguez v. Mukasey, 536 F.3d 1012 (9th Cir.2008), 729
- Loza-Bedoya v. INS, 410 F.2d 343 (9th Cir. 1969), 498
- Lozada v. INS, 857 F.2d 10 (1st Cir.1988), 753
- Lozano v. City of Hazleton, 496 F.Supp.2d 477 (M.D.Pa.2007), 1259
- L-S-, In re, 22 I. & N. Dec. 645, Interim Decision 3386 (BIA 1999), 1022, 1023
- Lucky Horse Fashion, Matter of, No. 97-INA-182 (BALCA 2000), 317
- Lujan-Armendariz v. INS, 222 F.3d 728 (9th Cir.2000), 559
- Lukowski v. INS, 279 F.3d 644 (8th Cir. 2002), 456

- Lukwago v. Ashcroft, 329 F.3d 157 (3rd Cir. 2003), 1107
- Lutheran Ministries of Florida, Matter of, 20 I. & N. Dec. 185, Interim Decision 3132 (BIA 1990), 672
- Lwin v. INS, 144 F.3d 505 (7th Cir. 1998), 935, 939
- Ma v. Ashcroft, 361 F.3d 553 (9th Cir. 2004), 915
- M.A. v. INS, 899 F.2d 304 (4th Cir. 1990), 755, 913, 1032
- Mackenzie v. Hare, 239 U.S. 299, 36 S.Ct. 106, 60 L.Ed. 297 (1915), 1358, 1369
- Mada-Luna v. Fitzpatrick, 813 F.2d 1006 (9th Cir. 1987), 630
- Magallanes-Damian v. INS, 783 F.2d 931 (9th Cir. 1986), 678
- Mahler v. Eby, 264 U.S. 32, 44 S.Ct. 283, 68 L.Ed. 549 (1924), 517, 518
- Malagon de Fuentes v. Gonzales, 462 F.3d 498 (5th Cir. 2006), 541
- Maldonado-Cruz, Matter of, 19 I. & N. Dec. 509, Interim Decision 3041 (BIA 1988), 929
- Manwani v. United States Dept. of Justice, INS, 736 F.Supp. 1367 (W.D.N.C. 1990), 200, 284, 289
- Marbury v. Madison, 5 U.S. 137, 2 L.Ed. 60 (1803), 133
- Marcel Watch Corp., United States v., 1 OCA-HO 988 (ALJ 1990), 1176
- Marciano v. INS, 450 F.2d 1022 (8th Cir. 1971), 561
- Margalli-Olvera v. INS, 43 F.3d 345 (8th Cir. 1994), 698
- Marin-Navarette, United States v., 244 F.3d 1284 (11th Cir. 2001), 576
- Marriage Cases, In re, 76 Cal.Rptr.3d 683, 183 P.3d 384 (Cal. 2008), 275
- Marroquin-Garcia, In re, 23 I. & N. Dec. 705, Interim Decision 3507 (AG 2005), 558, 559
- Marquez, Matter of, 20 I. & N. Dec. 160, Interim Decision 3129 (BIA 1990), 300
- Martinez, Matter of, 18 I. & N. Dec. 399, Interim Decision 2941 (BIA 1983), 297
- Martinez-Lopez v. Gonzales, 454 F.3d 500 (5th Cir. 2006), 1131
- Martinez v. Regents of University of California, 83 Cal.Rptr.3d 518 (Cal.App. 3 Dist. 2008), 1211
- Martinez-Romero v. INS, 692 F.2d 595 (9th Cir. 1982), 1114
- Martirosyan v. INS, 229 F.3d 903 (9th Cir. 2000), 905
- Massieu v. Reno, 915 F.Supp. 681 (D.N.J. 1996), 176
- Mathews v. Diaz, 426 U.S. 67, 96 S.Ct. 1883, 48 L.Ed.2d 478 (1976), 24, 1250, 1288, 1375
- Mathews v. Eldridge, 424 U.S. 319, 96 S.Ct. 893, 47 L.Ed.2d 18 (1976), 153, 154, 678
- Matter of (see name of party)
- M-B-A-, Matter of, 23 I. & N. Dec. 474 (BIA 2002), 1107
- McBoyle v. United States, 283 U.S. 25, 51 S.Ct. 340, 75 L.Ed. 816 (1931), 440
- McColvin v. INS, 648 F.2d 935 (4th Cir. 1981), 604
- McDonnell Douglas Corp. v. Green, 411 U.S. 792, 93 S.Ct. 1817, 36 L.Ed.2d 668 (1973), 1175
- McMillan, Matter of, 17 I. & N. Dec. 605, Interim Decision 2844 (BIA 1981), 296
- McMullen v. INS, 788 F.2d 591 (9th Cir. 1986), 1024
- McMullen, Matter of, 19 I. & N. Dec. 90, Interim Decision 2967 (BIA 1984), 1017
- McNary v. Haitian Refugee Center, Inc., 498 U.S. 479, 111 S.Ct. 888, 112 L.Ed.2d 1005 (1991), 787
- Medina-Morales v. Ashcroft, 362 F.3d 1263 (9th Cir. 2004), 766
- Mejia v. Gonzales, 499 F.3d 991 (9th Cir. 2007), 456
- Mena v. City of Simi Valley, 332 F.3d 1255 (9th Cir. 2003), 1277
- Mendoza-Lopez, United States v., 481 U.S. 828, 107 S.Ct. 2148, 95 L.Ed.2d 772 (1987), 788, 1153
- Mendoza Perez v. INS, 902 F.2d 760 (9th Cir. 1990), 928
- Menghesha v. Gonzales, 450 F.3d 142 (4th Cir. 2006), 997
- Merkt, United States v., 764 F.2d 266 (5th Cir. 1985), 1155
- Mester Mfg. Co. v. INS, 879 F.2d 561 (9th Cir. 1989), 1160
- Meyer v. Nebraska, 262 U.S. 390, 43 S.Ct. 625, 67 L.Ed. 1042 (1923), 66
- M.G., Matter of, 5 I. & N. Dec. 531, Interim Decision 538 (BIA 1953), 572
- Michel, In re, 21 I. & N. Dec. 1101, Interim Decision 3335 (BIA 1998), 455
- Millard, Matter of, 11 I. & N. Dec. 175 (BIA 1965), 547
- Miller v. Albright, 523 U.S. 420, 118 S.Ct. 1428, 140 L.Ed.2d 575 (1998), 1299
- Miranda v. Arizona, 384 U.S. 436, 86 S.Ct. 1602, 16 L.Ed.2d 694 (1966), 652
- Miranda v. Reno, 238 F.3d 1156 (9th Cir. 2001), 786
- Mireles-Valdez v. Ashcroft, 349 F.3d 213 (5th Cir. 2003), 767
- Mistretta v. United States, 488 U.S. 361, 109 S.Ct. 647, 102 L.Ed.2d 714 (1989), 637
- Mitsugi Nishikawa v. Dulles, 356 U.S. 129, 78 S.Ct. 612, 2 L.Ed.2d 659 (1958), 1359
- Mogharrabi, Matter of, 19 I. & N. Dec. 439, Interim Decision 3028 (BIA 1987), 1000, 1005, 1114
- Mohammed v. Gonzales, 400 F.3d 785 (9th Cir. 2005), 934, 955, 968, 973, 1004
- Moin v. Ashcroft, 335 F.3d 415 (5th Cir. 2003), 539
- Monreal-Aguinaga, In re, 23 I. & N. Dec. 56, Interim Decision 3447 (BIA 2001), 622

- Montana v. Kennedy, 366 U.S. 308, 81 S.Ct. 1336, 6 L.Ed.2d 313 (1961), 646
- Montecino v. INS, 915 F.2d 518 (9th Cir. 1990), 1000, 1038
- Montero-Camargo, United States v., 208 F.3d 1122 (9th Cir.2000), 729
- Moore v. Ashcroft, 251 F.3d 919 (11th Cir. 2001), 456
- Morales-Alvarado v. INS, 655 F.2d 172 (9th Cir.1981), 552
- Morales-Izquierdo v. Ashcroft, 388 F.3d 1299 (9th Cir.2004), 813
- Morales-Morales v. Ashcroft, 384 F.3d 418 (7th Cir.2004), 767
- Moss v. INS, 651 F.2d 1091 (5th Cir.1981), 408
- Mourillon, Matter of, 18 I. & N. Dec. 122, Interim Decision 2882 (BIA 1981), 292
- Murillo-Espinoza v. INS, 261 F.3d 771 (9th Cir.2001), 559
- Murphy v. INS, 54 F.3d 605 (9th Cir.1995), 655, 742
- Musgrove v. Toy, [1891] A.C. 272 (PC 1891), 248
- Nai Cheng Chen v. INS, 537 F.2d 566 (1st Cir.1976), 652
- N-A-M-, In re, 24 I. & N. Dec. 336, Interim Decision 3588 (BIA 2007), 1022, 1023
- Narenji v. Civiletti, 617 F.2d 745 (D.C.Cir. 1979), 199
- Nath v. Gonzales, 467 F.3d 1185 (9th Cir. 2006), 558
- Naturalization of Vafaai-Makhsoos, In re Petition for, 597 F.Supp. 499 (D.Minn.1984), 1308
- Negeya v. Gonzales, 417 F.3d 78 (1st Cir. 2005), 935
- Negusie v. Holder, ___ U.S. ___, 129 S.Ct. 1159, 173 L.Ed.2d 20 (2009), 1017
- Nehme v. INS, 252 F.3d 415 (5th Cir.2001), 764
- New El Rey Sausage Co., Inc. v. INS, 925 F.2d 1153 (9th Cir.1991), 1160
- Newton v. INS, 736 F.2d 336 (6th Cir.1984), 199, 645
- New York, City of v. United States, 179 F.3d 29 (2nd Cir.1999), 1282
- New York State Dept. of Transportation, In re, 22 I. & N. Dec. 215, Interim Decision 3363 (BIA 1998), 306
- Ngengwe v. Mukasey, 543 F.3d 1029 (8th Cir.2008), 936
- Ng Fung Ho v. White, 259 U.S. 276, 42 S.Ct. 492, 66 L.Ed. 938 (1922), 645, 789
- Ngure v. Ashcroft, 367 F.3d 975 (8th Cir. 2004), 754
- Nguyen v. INS, 533 U.S. 53, 121 S.Ct. 2053, 150 L.Ed.2d 115 (2001), 189, 219, 295, 1299
- Niang v. Gonzales, 422 F.3d 1187 (10th Cir. 2005), 935
- Nice v. Turnage, 752 F.2d 431 (9th Cir. 1985), 369
- Nicholas v. INS, 590 F.2d 802 (9th Cir.1979), 631
- Nijhawan v. Holder, 2009 WL 1650187 (2009), 584
- New Jersey v. United States, 91 F.3d 463 (3rd Cir.1996), 1286
- Nken v. Holder, ___ U.S. ___, 129 S.Ct. 1749, ___ L.Ed.2d ___ (2009), 762
- N.M.A., In re, 22 I. & N. Dec. 312, Interim Decision 3368 (BIA 1998), 1001
- North Jersey Media Group, Inc. v. Ashcroft, 308 F.3d 198 (3rd Cir.2002), 836, 837
- Nyquist v. Mauclet, 432 U.S. 1, 97 S.Ct. 2120, 53 L.Ed.2d 63 (1977), 1376
- O, Matter of, 8 I. & N. Dec. 295, Interim Decision 991 (BIA 1959), 474
- O, Matter of, 8 I. & N. Dec. 291, Interim Decision 992 (Ass't Comm'r & BIA, 1959), 430
- Ocampo-Duran v. Ashcroft, 254 F.3d 1133 (9th Cir.2001), 543
- O.J.O., Matter of, 21 I. & N. Dec. 381 (BIA en banc 1996), 606, 617
- Olivares v. INS, 685 F.2d 1174 (9th Cir. 1982), 259
- Oloteo v. INS, 643 F.2d 679 (9th Cir.1981), 815
- Olowo v. Ashcroft, 368 F.3d 692 (7th Cir. 2004), 970
- Olsen v. Albright, 990 F.Supp. 31 (D.D.C. 1997), 485
- Onal, Matter of, 18 I. & N. Dec. 147, Interim Decision 2886 (BIA 1981), 814
- Ontunez-Tursios v. Ashcroft, 303 F.3d 341 (5th Cir.2002), 935, 1105
- Orantes-Hernandez v. Meese, 685 F.Supp. 1488 (C.D.Cal.1988), 635
- Ord, Matter of, 18 I. & N. Dec. 285, Interim Decision 2916 (Regional Comm'r 1982), 386
- Ordonez v. INS, 137 F.3d 1120 (9th Cir. 1998), 615
- Orhorhaghe v. INS, 38 F.3d 488 (9th Cir. 1994), 729
- Ortega-Mendez v. Gonzales, 450 F.3d 1010 (9th Cir.2006), 581
- Osmani v. INS, 14 F.3d 13 (7th Cir.1994), 642
- Osorio v. INS, 99 F.3d 928 (9th Cir.1996), 1009
- Osorio v. INS, 18 F.3d 1017 (2nd Cir.1994), 902
- Ozcelik, United States v., 527 F.3d 88 (3rd Cir.2008), 1156
- O.Z. & I.Z. In re, 22 I. & N. Dec. 23, Interim Decision 3346 (BIA 1998), 916
- Ozkok, Matter of, 19 I. & N. Dec. 546, Interim Decision 3044 (BIA 1988), 551
- Pacheco v. INS, 546 F.2d 448 (1st Cir.1976), 571
- Padavan v. United States, 82 F.3d 23 (2nd Cir.1996), 1286

- Padilla v. Kentucky, ___ U.S. ___, 129 S.Ct. 1317, ___ L.Ed.2d ___ (2009), 695
- Padilla-Agustin v. INS, 21 F.3d 970 (9th Cir. 1994), 753
- Palmer v. City of Euclid, Ohio, 402 U.S. 544, 91 S.Ct. 1563, 29 L.Ed.2d 98 (1971), 567
- Palmer v. Reddy, 622 F.2d 463 (9th Cir. 1980), 296
- Panama Refining Co. v. Ryan, 293 U.S. 388, 55 S.Ct. 241, 79 L.Ed. 446 (1935), 636
- Paris Bakery Corp., Matter of, No. 88-INA-337 (BALCA 1990), 319
- Parodi, Matter of, 17 I. & N. Dec. 608, Interim Decision 2845 (BIA 1980), 626
- Parrino, United States v., 212 F.2d 919 (2nd Cir.1954), 553
- Parussimova v. Mukasey, 533 F.3d 1128 (9th Cir.2008), 997
- Pasquini v. Morris, 700 F.2d 658 (11th Cir. 1983), 631
- Passenger Cases, 48 U.S. 283, 7 How. 283, 12 L.Ed. 702 (1849), 116
- Patel, Matter of, A74 974 011 at 10 (IJ Gosart, sitting at York, Pa., May 23, 1997), 958
- Patel, Matter of, 20 I. & N. Dec. 368, Interim Decision 3157 (BIA 1991), 528
- Patel, Matter of, 19 I. & N. Dec. 774, Interim Decision 3083 (BIA 1988), 740
- Patterson v. McLean Credit Union, 491 U.S. 164, 109 S.Ct. 2363, 105 L.Ed.2d 132 (1989), 1172
- Pazcoguín v. Radcliffe, 292 F.3d 1209 (9th Cir.2002), 163
- Pena v. Kissinger, 409 F.Supp. 1182 (S.D.N.Y.1976), 500
- Penuliar v. Ashcroft, 395 F.3d 1037 (9th Cir. 2005), 764
- People v. — (see opposing party)
- Perales-Cumpean v. Gonzales, 429 F.3d 977 (10th Cir.2005), 602, 765
- Perez v. Brownell, 356 U.S. 44, 78 S.Ct. 568, 2 L.Ed.2d 603 (1958), 1358, 1394
- Perez v. Elwood, 294 F.3d 552 (3rd Cir.2002), 194
- Perez, Matter of, 22 I. & N. Dec. 1325 (BIA 2000), 583
- Perez-Gonzales, Matter of, A73 128 867 (BIA 2000), 743
- Perlera-Escobar v. Executive Office for Immigration, 894 F.2d 1292 (11th Cir.1990), 929
- Pesikoff v. Secretary of Labor, 501 F.2d 757 (D.C.Cir.1974), 316
- Petition of (see name of party)
- Phelps, United States ex rel. London v., 22 F.2d 288 (2nd Cir.1927), 496
- Pickering v. Gonzales, 465 F.3d 263 (6th Cir. 2006), 558
- Pimentel v. Mukasey, 530 F.3d 321 (5th Cir. 2008), 456
- Pineda, Matter of, 20 I. & N. Dec. 70, Interim Decision 3112 (BIA 1989), 295
- Pinho v. Gonzales, 432 F.3d 193 (3rd Cir. 2005), 558
- Pino v. Landon, 349 U.S. 901, 75 S.Ct. 576, 99 L.Ed. 1239 (1955), 552
- Piperkoff, United States ex rel. v. Esperdy, 267 F.2d 72 (2nd Cir.1959), 572
- Pitcherskaia v. INS, 118 F.3d 641 (9th Cir. 1997), 905, 944
- Plyler v. Doe, 457 U.S. 202, 102 S.Ct. 2382, 72 L.Ed.2d 786 (1982), 1194, 1251, 1376
- Poll v. Lord Advocate, [1899] 1 F. 823 (Ct. of Sessions, Scotland 1899), 248
- Pozo, People v., 746 P.2d 523 (Colo.1987), 556, 689
- Pramatarov v. Gonzales, 454 F.3d 764 (7th Cir.2006), 748
- Price v. INS, 962 F.2d 836 (9th Cir.1991), 1299
- Puente-Salazar, In re, 22 I. & N. Dec. 1006, Interim Decision 3412 (BIA 1999), 580
- Pula, Matter of, 19 I. & N. Dec. 467, Interim Decision 3033 (BIA 1987), 1027
- Punu, In re, 22 I. & N. Dec. 224, Interim Decision 3364 (BIA 1998), 551
- Qu v. Gonzales, 399 F.3d 1195 (9th Cir.2005), 1004
- Quan, Matter of, 12 I. & N. Dec. 487, Interim Decision 1802 (Deputy Assoc. Comm'r 1967), 814
- R. v. Governor of Brixton Prison ex parte Soblen (No.2), [1963] 2 Q.B. 243 (U.K. Ct.App.1963), 249, 643
- R. v. Immigration Appeal Tribunal ex parte Khan, [1983] 2 All E.R. 420 (CA 1983), 249
- R. v. Secretary of State for Home Affairs ex parte Duke of Chateau Thierry, [1917] 1 K.B. 922 (U.K. Ct.App.1917), 249
- R. v. Secretary of State for the Home Dept., ex parte Adan and Aitseguer, [2001] W.L.R. 143 (U.K. House of Lords), 976
- R. v. Uxbridge Magistrates Court, ex parte Adimi, [2001] Q.B. 667 (QBD 1999), 1059
- R., Matter of, 6 I. & N. Dec. 444, Interim Decision 666 (1954), 568
- R., Matter of, 5 I. & N. Dec. 29, Interim Decision 411 (BIA 1953), 638
- R.A., In re, 23 I. & N. Dec. 694, Interim Decision 3504 (A.G. 2005), 975
- R.A., In re, 22 I. & N. Dec. 906, Interim Decision 3403 (BIA 1999, A.G. 2001), 922, 924, 936, 974
- R-A-, Matter of, 24 I. & N. Dec. 629, Interim Decision 3624 (AG 2008), 975
- Rafeedie v. INS, 795 F.Supp. 13 (D.D.C. 1992), 191
- Rafeedie v. INS, 880 F.2d 506 (D.C.Cir.1989), 166
- Ramirez, United States v., 250 Fed.Appx. 80 (5th Cir.2007), 1272
- Ramirez-Ramos v. INS, 814 F.2d 1394 (9th Cir.1987), 1021
- Ramirez Rivas v. INS, 899 F.2d 864 (9th Cir.1990), 923

- Ramos v. INS, 695 F.2d 181 (5th Cir.1983), 616
- Ramos, In re, 23 I. & N. Dec. 336, Interim Decision 3468 (BIA 2002), 581
- Rasul v. Bush, 542 U.S. 466, 124 S.Ct. 2686, 159 L.Ed.2d 548 (2004), 151, 169, 243
- Ratnayake v. Mack, 499 F.2d 1207 (8th Cir. 1974), 316
- Racinas, In re, 23 I. & N. Dec. 467, Interim Decision 3479 (BIA 2002), 618
- Recinos De Leon v. Gonzales, 400 F.3d 1185 (9th Cir.2005), 748
- Reid v. Covert, 354 U.S. 1, 77 S.Ct. 1222, 1 L.Ed.2d 1148 (1957), 151
- Reid v. INS, 420 U.S. 619, 95 S.Ct. 1164, 43 L.Ed.2d 501 (1975), 545
- Reno v. American-Arab Anti-Discrimination Committee, 525 U.S. 471, 119 S.Ct. 936, 142 L.Ed.2d 940 (1999), 92, 191, 769
- Reno v. Flores, 507 U.S. 292, 113 S.Ct. 1439, 123 L.Ed.2d 1 (1993), 199, 652
- Renteria-Gonzalez v. INS, 322 F.3d 804 (5th Cir.2002), 558, 572
- Resendiz, In re, 105 Cal.Rptr.2d 431, 19 P.3d 1171 (Cal.2001), 697
- Reyes, Matter of, 20 I. & N. Dec. 789, Interim Decision 3218 (BIA 1994), 576
- Reyes-Palacios v. INS, 836 F.2d 1154 (9th Cir.1988), 679
- Reyes-Reyes v. Ashcroft, 384 F.3d 782 (9th Cir.2004), 1106
- Reyes-Vasquez v. Ashcroft, 395 F.3d 903 (8th Cir.2005), 605, 754, 767
- Richardson v. Reno, 994 F.Supp. 1466 (S.D.Fla.1998), 542
- Richmond Newspapers, Inc. v. Virginia, 448 U.S. 555, 100 S.Ct. 2814, 65 L.Ed.2d 973 (1980), 836
- Rivera de Gomez v. Kissinger, 534 F.2d 518 (2nd Cir.1976), 500
- Rivera-Jimenez v. INS, 214 F.3d 1213 (10th Cir.2000), 541
- Rivera-Rioseco, Matter of, 19 I. & N. Dec. 833, Interim Decision 3092 (BIA 1988), 1028
- Rizal v. Gonzales, 442 F.3d 84 (2nd Cir.2006), 917
- Rao, Matter of, A77 249 526 (IJ 2000), 940
- Rodriguez v. INS, 204 F.3d 25 (1st Cir.2000), 283
- Rodriguez, Matter of, 10 I. & N. Dec. 488, Interim Decision 1328 (BIA 1964), 916
- Rodriguez-Coto, Matter of, 19 I. & N. Dec. 208, Interim Decision 2985 (BIA 1985), 1024
- Rodriguez-Padron v. INS, 13 F.3d 1455 (11th Cir.1994), 599
- Rodriguez-Roman v. INS, 98 F.3d 416 (9th Cir.1996), 930
- Rodriguez-Ruiz, In re, 22 I. & N. Dec. 1378, Interim Decision 3436 (BIA 2000), 558
- Rodriguez-Tejedor, In re, 23 I. & N. Dec. 153, Interim Decision 3454 (BIA 2001), 1316
- Rogers v. Bellei, 401 U.S. 815, 91 S.Ct. 1060, 28 L.Ed.2d 499 (1971), 1291, 1297, 1359
- Roldan-Santoyo, In re, 22 I. & N. Dec. 512, Interim Decision 3377 (BIA 1999), 557
- Romero-Torres v. Ashcroft, 327 F.3d 887 (9th Cir.2003), 607, 767
- Rosales-Garcia v. Holland, 322 F.3d 386 (6th Cir.2003), 221
- Rosas-Ramirez, In re, 22 I. & N. Dec. 616, Interim Decision 3384 (BIA 1999), 543
- Rosenberg v. Fleuti, 374 U.S. 449, 83 S.Ct. 1804, 10 L.Ed.2d 1000 (1963), 529
- Rowoldt v. Perfetto, 355 U.S. 115, 78 S.Ct. 180, 2 L.Ed.2d 140 (1957), 441
- Ruiz v. Hull, 191 Ariz. 441, 957 P.2d 984 (Ariz.1998), 67
- Ruiz-Lopez, United States v., 234 F.3d 445 (9th Cir.2000), 528
- Rusin, Matter of, 20 I. & N. Dec. 128, Interim Decision 3123 (BIA 1989), 440
- Russian Volunteer Fleet v. United States, 282 U.S. 481, 51 S.Ct. 229, 75 L.Ed. 473 (1931), 151
- S-A-, In re, 22 I. & N. Dec. 1328, Interim Decision 3433 (BIA 2000), 917, 976
- Saa, Matter of, A28 852 512 (BIA 1989), 506
- Saavedra Bruno v. Albright, 197 F.3d 1153 (D.C.Cir.1999), 501
- Saint Fort v. Ashcroft, 329 F.3d 191 (1st Cir.2003), 1110
- Saintha v. Mukasey, 516 F.3d 243 (4th Cir. 2008), 767
- S-A-K- and H-A-H-, Matter of, 24 I. & N. Dec. 464, Interim Decision 3602 (BIA 2008), 972
- Salazar-Regino, In re, 23 I. & N. Dec. 223, Interim Decision 3462 (BIA 2002), 559
- Sale v. Haitian Centers Council, Inc., 509 U.S. 155, 113 S.Ct. 2549, 125 L.Ed.2d 128 (1993), 1065
- Salerno, United States v., 481 U.S. 739, 107 S.Ct. 2095, 95 L.Ed.2d 697 (1987), 233
- Salim, Matter of, 18 I. & N. Dec. 311, Interim Decision 2922 (BIA 1982), 1025
- Sanchez-Trujillo v. INS, 801 F.2d 1571 (9th Cir.1986), 936
- Sangha v. INS, 103 F.3d 1482 (9th Cir.1997), 929
- San Pedro v. United States, 79 F.3d 1065 (11th Cir.1996), 698
- Santos, Matter of, 19 I. & N. Dec. 105, Interim Decision 2969 (BIA 1984), 730
- Santos-Lemus v. Mukasey, 542 F.3d 738 (9th Cir.2008), 936
- Sanudo, In re, 23 I. & N. Dec. 968, Interim Decision 3537 (BIA 2006), 569, 581
- Sarvia-Quintanilla v. INS, 767 F.2d 1387 (9th Cir.1985), 1010
- Saunders, Matter of, 16 I. & N. Dec. 326, Interim Decision 2610 (BIA 1977), 814
- Sayaxing v. INS, 179 F.3d 515 (7th Cir.1999), 903

- Schmidt v. Secretary of State for Home Affairs, [1969] 2 Ch. 149 (U.K.Ct.App.1968), 249
- Schneider v. Rusk, 377 U.S. 163, 84 S.Ct. 1187, 12 L.Ed.2d 218 (1964), 1359
- Schneiderman v. United States, 320 U.S. 118, 63 S.Ct. 1333, 87 L.Ed. 1796 (1943), 1336
- Schweiker v. Hansen, 450 U.S. 785, 101 S.Ct. 1468, 67 L.Ed.2d 685 (1981), 646
- Securities and Exchange Commission v. Chenery Corp., 318 U.S. 80, 63 S.Ct. 454, 87 L.Ed. 626 (1943), 612
- S-E-G-, Matter of, 24 I. & N. Dec. 579 (BIA 2008), 936
- Senathirajah v. INS, 157 F.3d 210 (3rd Cir. 1998), 1006
- Seven Star, Inc. v. United States, 873 F.2d 225 (9th Cir.1989), 386
- Shaker, Matter of, A27 560 431 (BIA 1989), 506
- Shamp Plumbing and Building, Matter of, No. 94-INA-530 (BALCA 1996), 317
- Shanks v. Dupont, 28 U.S. 242, 3 Pet. 242, 7 L.Ed. 666 (1830), 1357
- Shanu, In re, 23 I. & N. Dec. 754, Interim Decision 3513 (BIA 2005), 543
- Sharif v. INS, 87 F.3d 932 (7th Cir.1996), 906
- Shaughnessy v. Pedreiro, 349 U.S. 48, 75 S.Ct. 591, 99 L.Ed. 868 (1955), 757
- Shaughnessy v. United States ex rel. Mezei, 345 U.S. 206, 73 S.Ct. 625, 97 L.Ed. 956 (1953), 156
- Shaughnessy, United States ex rel. Knauff v., 338 U.S. 537, 70 S.Ct. 309, 94 L.Ed. 317 (1950), 155
- Sheku-Kamara v. Karn, 581 F.Supp. 582 (E.D.Pa.1984), 398
- Shelley v. Kraemer, 334 U.S. 1, 68 S.Ct. 836, 92 L.Ed. 1161 (1948), 711
- Shi Liang Lin v. USDOJ, 494 F.3d 296 (2nd Cir.2007), 914
- Shimizu v. Department of State, CV-89-2741-WMB (C.D.Cal.1990), 502
- Shivaraman v. Ashcroft, 360 F.3d 1142 (9th Cir.2004), 543
- Shoafera v. INS, 228 F.3d 1070 (9th Cir. 2000), 916
- Sierra v. Romaine, 347 F.3d 559 (3rd Cir. 2003), 221
- Silva, Matter of, 16 I. & N. Dec. 26, Interim Decision 2532 (BIA 1976), 198, 597
- Silva-Trevino, Matter of, 24 I. & N. Dec. 687, Interim Decision 3631 (AG 2008), 567, 1023
- Singh v. INS, 328 F.3d 1205 (9th Cir.2003), 839
- Siverts v. Craig, 602 F.Supp. 50 (D.Hawai'i 1985), 631
- S-K-, In re, 24 I. & N. Dec. 475 (BIA 2008), 450
- S-K-, In re, 24 I. & N. Dec. 289, Interim Decision 3581 (AG 2007), 450
- S-K-, In re, 23 I. & N. Dec. 936 (BIA 2006), 444
- Skafto v. Rorex, 191 Colo. 399, 553 P.2d 830 (Colo.1976), 1376
- S-L-L-, In re, 24 I. & N. Dec. 1, Interim Decision 3541 (BIA 2006), 914
- Smriko v. Ashcroft, 387 F.3d 279 (3rd Cir. 2004), 754
- Snyder v. Rosales-Garcia, 539 U.S. 941, 123 S.Ct. 2607, 156 L.Ed.2d 627 (2003), 222
- Soffici, In re, 22 I. & N. Dec. 158, Interim Decision 3359 (INS 1998), 347
- Solano-Godines, United States v., 120 F.3d 957 (9th Cir.1997), 743
- Soliman v. Gonzales, 419 F.3d 276 (4th Cir. 2005), 580
- Solis-Ramirez v. United States Dept. of Justice, 758 F.2d 1426 (11th Cir.1985), 251, 345
- Solorzano-Patlan v. INS, 207 F.3d 869 (7th Cir.2000), 583
- Song v. INS, 82 F.Supp.2d 1121 (C.D.Cal. 2000), 455
- Song, In re, 23 I. & N. Dec. 173, Interim Decision 3455 (BIA 2001), 584
- Sosa-Martinez v. United States Atty. Gen., 420 F.3d 1338 (11th Cir.2005), 568
- Southeastern Capital Corp., Matter of, No. 88-INA-198 (BALCA 1989), 315
- S-P-, In re, 21 I. & N. Dec. 486, Interim Decision 3287 (BIA 1996), 923
- S-S-, In re, 22 I. & N. Dec. 458, Interim Decision 3374 (BIA 1999), 1023
- State of (see name of state)
- Stone v. INS, 514 U.S. 386, 115 S.Ct. 1537, 131 L.Ed.2d 465 (1995), 761
- Sugarman v. Dougall, 413 U.S. 634, 93 S.Ct. 2842, 37 L.Ed.2d 853 (1973), 1376, 1377
- Sullivan v. INS, 772 F.2d 609 (9th Cir.1985), 273
- Sure-Tan, Inc. v. N.L.R.B., 467 U.S. 883, 104 S.Ct. 2803, 81 L.Ed.2d 732 (1984), 1213
- Sussex Engineering, Ltd. v. Montgomery, 825 F.2d 1084 (6th Cir.1987), 386
- S-V-, In re, 22 I. & N. Dec. 1306, Interim Decision 3430 (BIA 2000), 1106
- Takao Ozawa v. United States, 260 U.S. 178, 43 S.Ct. 65, 67 L.Ed. 199 (1922), 1306
- Tan, Matter of, 12 I. & N. Dec. 564, Interim Decision 1825 (BIA 1967), 916
- Tapia v. Ashcroft, 351 F.3d 795 (7th Cir. 2003), 541
- Tapia-Acuna v. INS, 640 F.2d 223 (9th Cir. 1981), 198, 597
- Tashnizi v. INS, 585 F.2d 781 (5th Cir.1978), 730
- Tayabji, Matter of, 19 I. & N. Dec. 264, Interim Decision 2994 (BIA 1985), 814
- Taylor v. United States, 495 U.S. 575, 110 S.Ct. 2143, 109 L.Ed.2d 607 (1990), 582
- Tejeda-Mata v. INS, 626 F.2d 721 (9th Cir. 1980), 174
- Tel-Ko Electronics, Matter of, No. 88-INA-416 (BALCA 1990), 317

- The Paquete Habana, 175 U.S. 677, 20 S.Ct. 290, 44 L.Ed. 320 (1900), 1130
- Thind, United States v., 261 U.S. 204, 43 S.Ct. 338, 67 L.Ed. 616 (1923), 1306
- Thomas v. Gonzales, 409 F.3d 1177 (9th Cir. 2005), 939, 984
- Thomas v. INS, 35 F.3d 1332 (9th Cir.1994), 698
- Thomas, Matter of (filed Jan. 25, 2007), 936
- T.I. v. United Kingdom, 43844/98 (Euro.Ct.Human Rts. Third Section 2000), 956, 1131
- Tiede, United States v., 86 F.R.D. 227 (U.S.Ct.Berlin 1979), 151
- Tineo v. Ashcroft, 350 F.3d 382 (3rd Cir. 2003), 541
- Toboso-Alfonso, Matter of, 20 I. & N. Dec. 819, Interim Decision 3222 (BIA 1990), 940
- Toll v. Moreno, 458 U.S. 1, 102 S.Ct. 2977, 73 L.Ed.2d 563 (1982), 1257, 1376
- Torres-Varela, In re, 23 I. & N. Dec. 78, Interim Decision 3449 (BIA 2001), 569
- Toyota v. United States, 268 U.S. 402, 45 S.Ct. 563, 69 L.Ed. 1016 (1925), 1306
- Tran v. Gonzales, 414 F.3d 464 (3rd Cir. 2005), 580
- Tran v. Mukasey, 515 F.3d 478 (5th Cir. 2008), 220
- Trias-Hernandez v. INS, 528 F.2d 366 (9th Cir.1975), 713
- Trop v. Dulles, 356 U.S. 86, 78 S.Ct. 590, 2 L.Ed.2d 630 (1958), 1358
- Tsegay v. Ashcroft, 386 F.3d 1347 (10th Cir. 2004), 754
- Tuan Thai v. Ashcroft, 366 F.3d 790 (9th Cir.2004), 220
- Turcios v. INS, 821 F.2d 1396 (9th Cir.1987), 1005, 1010
- Turcotte, Matter of, 12 I. & N. Dec. 206, Interim Decision 1728 (BIA 1967), 623
- Turner, United States ex rel. v. Williams, 194 U.S. 279, 24 S.Ct. 719, 48 L.Ed. 979 (1904), 193
- Tuskegee University, Matter of, No. 87-INA-561 (BALCA 1988), 331
- Tzimas, Matter of, 10 I. & N. Dec. 101, Interim Decision 1251 (BIA 1962), 744
- Ulrich, United States ex rel. v. Kellogg, 30 F.2d 984 (D.C.Cir.1929), 496
- Un v. Gonzales, 415 F.3d 205 (1st Cir.2005), 762
- Unauthorized Practice Committee, State Bar of Texas v. Cortez, 692 S.W.2d 47 (Tex. 1985), 478
- United States v. _____ (see opposing party)
- United States ex rel. v. _____ (see opposing party and relator)
- Valiyee, Matter of, 14 I. & N. Dec. 710, Interim Decision 2292 (IJ and BIA, 1974), 815
- Vance v. Terrazas, 444 U.S. 252, 100 S.Ct. 540, 62 L.Ed.2d 461 (1980), 1360
- Vargas-Garcia v. INS, 287 F.3d 882 (9th Cir. 2002), 753
- Varnum v. Brien, 763 N.W.2d 862 (Iowa 2009), 275
- Vasquez-Velezmoro v. INS, 281 F.3d 693 (8th Cir.2002), 559
- Velez-Lozano v. INS, 463 F.2d 1305 (D.C.Cir. 1972), 572
- Verdugo-Urquidez, United States v., 494 U.S. 259, 110 S.Ct. 1056, 108 L.Ed.2d 222 (1990), 151, 731
- Villanueva-Jurado v. INS, 482 F.2d 886 (5th Cir.1973), 1297
- Villas at Parkside Partners v. City of Farmers Branch, 577 F.Supp.2d 858 (N.D.Tex. 2008), 1272
- Vizcaino, Matter of, 19 I. & N. Dec. 644, Interim Decision 3061 (BIA 1988), 295
- V-K-, Matter of, 24 I. & N. Dec. 500, Interim Decision 3609 (2008), 750
- Wadman v. INS, 329 F.2d 812 (9th Cir.1964), 604
- Wall v. INS, 722 F.2d 1442 (9th Cir.1984), 730
- Walsh and Pollard, Matter of, 20 I. & N. Dec. 60, Interim Decision 3111 (BIA 1988), 371
- Wang v. Ashcroft, 320 F.3d 130 (2nd Cir. 2003), 1110
- Wang v. INS, 622 F.2d 1341 (9th Cir.1980), 612
- Wards Cove Packing Co., Inc. v. Atonio, 490 U.S. 642, 109 S.Ct. 2115, 104 L.Ed.2d 733 (1989), 1175
- Watkins v. INS, 63 F.3d 844 (9th Cir.1995), 615
- Wauchope v. USDOS, 985 F.2d 1407 (9th Cir.1993), 1299
- Waziri v. INS, 392 F.2d 55 (9th Cir.1968), 814
- Wickard v. Filburn, 317 U.S. 111, 63 S.Ct. 82, 87 L.Ed. 122 (1942), 118
- Wije v. Barton Springs/Edward Aquifer Conservation District, 5 OCAHO No. 785 at 21 (ALJ McGuire, July 21, 1995), 1176
- William v. Gonzales, 499 F.3d 329 (4th Cir. 2007), 755
- Williams, United States ex rel. Turner v., 194 U.S. 279, 24 S.Ct. 719, 48 L.Ed. 979 (1904), 193
- Winata & Li v. Australia, UN Doc. CCPR/C/72/D/930/2000 (Human Rights Committee, 2001), 304
- Windsor v. McVeigh, 93 U.S. 274, 3 Otto 274, 23 L.Ed. 914 (1876), 153
- Winship, In re, 397 U.S. 358, 90 S.Ct. 1068, 25 L.Ed.2d 368 (1970), 740
- Wong, Matter of, 12 I. & N. Dec. 271, Interim Decision 1745 (BIA 1967), 604
- Wong Kim Ark, United States v., 169 U.S. 649, 18 S.Ct. 456, 42 L.Ed. 890 (1898), 1292

- Wong Wing Hang v. INS, 360 F.2d 715 (2nd Cir.1966), 624
- Woodby v. INS, 385 U.S. 276, 87 S.Ct. 483, 17 L.Ed.2d 362 (1966), 732
- Xi v. INS, 298 F.3d 832 (9th Cir.2002), 221
- Xiao Kui Lin v. Mukasey, 553 F.3d 217 (2nd Cir.2009), 915
- X.P.T., Applicant, In re, 21 I. & N. Dec. 634, Interim Decision 3299 (BIA 1996), 914
- Yadegar-Sargis v. INS, 297 F.3d 596 (7th Cir.2002), 956
- Yamataya v. Fisher (The Japanese Immigrant Case), 189 U.S. 86, 23 S.Ct. 611, 47 L.Ed. 721 (1903), 171
- Yazdani, Matter of, 17 I. & N. Dec. 626, Interim Decision 2848 (BIA 1981), 394
- Ye v. INS, 214 F.3d 1128 (9th Cir.2000), 582, 583
- Yefremov v. NYC Dept. of Transportation, 3 OCAHO No. 562 at 22 (ALJ Morse, Sept. 21, 1993), 1176
- Y-L-, In re, 24 I. & N. Dec. 151, Interim Decision 3563 (BIA 2007), 1061
- Y-L-, In re, 23 I. & N. Dec. 270, Interim Decision 3464 (A.G. 2002), 1024
- Yñiguez v. Arizonans for Official English, 69 F.3d 920 (9th Cir.1995), 66
- Y-T-L-, In re, 23 I. & N. Dec. 601 (BIA 2003), 1004
- Yuen Sang Low v. Attorney General of United States, 479 F.2d 820 (9th Cir.1973), 537
- Yui Sing Tse v. INS, 596 F.2d 831 (9th Cir. 1979), 323
- Zadvydas v. Davis, 533 U.S. 678, 121 S.Ct. 2491, 150 L.Ed.2d 653 (2001), 206
- Zamora v. INS, 534 F.2d 1055 (2nd Cir.1976), 1014
- Zamora-Morel v. INS, 905 F.2d 833 (5th Cir. 1990), 1000
- Zhang v. Slattery, 55 F.3d 732 (2nd Cir. 1995), 527
- Zhao v. Gonzales, 404 F.3d 295 (5th Cir. 2005), 766
- Zimmerman, United States ex rel. Castro-Louzan v., 94 F.Supp. 22 (E.D.Pa.1950), 678
- Zinnanti v. INS, 651 F.2d 420 (5th Cir.1981), 552

TABLE OF SECONDARY AUTHORITIES

This table includes all books, articles (other than newspaper articles) and reports cited in this book, except for those that are cited only within reprinted materials. Most of the student Notes and Comments are listed as, and alphabetized under, "Note."

- Abourezk, James, The Congressional Veto: A Contemporary Response to Executive Encroachment on Legislative Prerogatives, 52 Indiana L.Rev. 323 (1977)—204
- Abraham, David, Constitutional Patriotism, Citizenship and Belonging in America and Germany, 7 Temple Political & Civil Rights L. Rev. 457 (2007)—60
- Abraham, David, International Decisions, González ex rel. González v. Reno, 95 Amer. J. Internat'l L. 204 (2001)—1036
- Abraham, David, The Good of Banality? The Emergence of Cost-Benefit Analysis and Proportionality in the Treatment of Aliens in the United States and Germany, 4 Citizenship Studies 237 (2000)—1392
- Abrams, Kerry, Immigration Law and the Regulation of Marriage, 91 Minnesota L. Rev. 1625 (2007)—261
- Abrams, Kerry, Immigration Status and the Best Interest of the Child Standard, 14 Virginia J. Social Policy & Law 87 (2006)—261
- Abrams, Kerry, Polygamy, Prostitution, and the Federalization of Immigration Law, 105 Columbia L. Rev. 641 (2005)—129, 276
- Abreu, Alice G., Taxing Exits, 29 U.C. Davis L.Rev. 1087 (1996)—457, 1372
- Abreu, Alice G., The Difference Between Expatriates and Mrs. Gregory—Citizenship Can Matter, 10 Tax Notes Internat'l 1612 (May 8, 1995)—1372
- Abriel, Evangeline G., Rethinking Preemption for Purposes of Aliens and Public Benefits, 42 UCLA L. Rev. 1597 (1995)—1286
- Abriel, Evangeline G., The Effect of Criminal Conduct upon Refugee and Asylum Status, 3 Southwestern J. L. & Trade in the Americas 359 (1996)—1022
- Ackerman, Bruce A., Social Justice in the Liberal State (1980)—35
- Adams, Laura S., Divergence and the Dynamic Relationship Between Domestic Immigration Law and International Human Rights, 51 Emory L.J. 983 (2002)—1138
- Adams, Laura S., Fleeing the Family: A Domestic Violence Victim's Particular Social Group, 49 Loyola L. Rev. 287 (2003)—983
- Adlerstein, JoAnne C., Immigration Crimes: A Practitioner's Guide, January 1989 Immigration Briefings—1154
- Administrative Office of the United States Courts, Judicial Business of the U.S. Courts, 2007 Ann. Rpt. of the Director—757
- Ahmad, Muneer I., A Rage Shared by Law: Post-September 11 Racial Violence as Crimes of Passion, 92 California L. Rev. 1259 (2004)—110, 111, 846
- Ahmad, Muneer I., Guantánamo is Here: The Military Commissions Act and Noncitizen Vulnerability, 2007 Univ. of Chicago Legal Forum 1—1375
- Ahmad, Muneer I., Interpreting Communities: Lawyering Across Language Difference, 54 UCLA L. Rev. 999 (2007)—176, 1034
- AILA, Boiling the Frog Slowly: Executive Branch Actions Since September 11, 2001, 7 BIB 1236 (Oct. 15, 2002)—818
- Akram, Susan M., Orientalism Revisited in Asylum and Refugee Claims, 12 Internat'l J. of Refugee L. 7 (2000)—92, 110
- Akram, Susan M., Palestinian Refugees and Their Legal Status: Rights, Politics, and Implications for a Just Solution, 31/3 J. Palestine Studies No. 123, at 36 et seq. (2002)—881
- Akram, Susan M., Reinterpreting Palestinian Refugee Rights Under International Law, in Naseer Aruri (ed.), Palestinian Refugees—The Right of Return, ch. 10 (2001)—1138
- Akram, Susan M., Scheherezade Meets Kafka: Two Dozen Sordid Tales of Ideological Exclusion, 14 Georgetown Immigration L.J. 51 (1999)—92, 110, 837
- Akram, Susan M. & Johnson, Kevin R., Race, Civil Rights, and Immigration Law After September 11, 2001: The Targeting of Arabs and Muslims, 58 NYU Ann. Survey Amer. L. 295 (2003)—845
- Akram, Susan M. & Karmely, Maritza, Immigration and Constitutional Consequences of Post-9/11 Policies Involving Arabs and Muslims in the United States: Is Alienage

- a Distinction Without a Difference?, 38 U.C. Davis L. Rev. 609 (2005)—845
- Akram, Susan M. & Rempel, Terry, Temporary Protection as an Instrument for Implementing the Right of Return for Palestinian Refugees, 22 Boston Univ. Internat'l L.J. 1 (2004)—1118
- Alcorn, Sophie, Landlords Beware, You May be Renting Your Own Room . . . in Jail: Landlords Should Not Be Prosecuted for Harboring Aliens, 7 Washington Univ. Global Studies L. Rev. 289 (2008)—1155
- Aldana, Raquel, Of Katz and "Aliens": Privacy Expectations and the Immigration Raids, 41 Univ. Calif. Davis L. Rev. 1081 (2008)—729, 1151
- Aldana, Raquel, On Rights, Federal Citizenship, and the "Alien," 46 Washburn L.J. 263 (2007)—115, 1375
- Aldana, Raquel, Silent Victims No More?: Moral Indignation and the Potential for Latino Political Mobilization in Defense of Immigrants, 45 Houston L. Rev. 73 (2008)—64
- Aldana, Raquel, The September 11 Immigration Detentions and Unconstitutional Executive Legislation, 29 Southern Illinois Univ. L.J. 5 (2004)—816
- Aldana-Pindell, Raquel, The 9/11 "National Security" Cases: Three Principles Guiding Judges' Decision-Making, 81 Oregon L. Rev. 985 (2002)—866
- Aleinikoff, T. Alexander, Aliens, Due Process and "Community Ties": A Response to Martin, 44 Univ. Pittsburgh L.Rev. 237 (1983)—34, 163
- Aleinikoff, T. Alexander, Between Principles and Politics: The Direction of U.S. Citizenship Policy (1998)—1318
- Aleinikoff, T. Alexander, Citizens, Aliens, Membership and the Constitution, 7 Constitutional Commentary 9 (1990)—187, 1387
- Aleinikoff, T. Alexander, Detaining Plenary Power: The Meaning and Impact of Zadvydas v. Davis, 16 Georgetown Immigration L.J. 365 (2002)—219
- Aleinikoff, T. Alexander, Legal Immigration Reform: Toward Rationality and Equity, in Richard D. Lamm & Alan Simpson, Center for Immigration Studies, Blueprints for an Ideal Legal Immigration Policy, Center Paper 17 (March 2001), <http://cis.org/articles/2001/blueprints/toc.html>—37, 260
- Aleinikoff, T. Alexander, Political Asylum in the Federal Republic of Germany and the Republic of France: Lessons for the United States, 17 Univ. Michigan J. L. Reform 183 (1984)—1012, 1013, 1014, 1041
- Aleinikoff, T. Alexander, Semblances of Sovereignty—The Constitution, the State, and American Citizenship (2002)—115, 150
- Aleinikoff, T. Alexander, The Meaning of "Persecution" in United States Asylum Law, 3 Internat'l J. Refugee L. 5 (1991)—902
- Aleinikoff, T. Alexander, Theories of Loss of Citizenship, 84 Michigan L. Rev. 1471 (1986)—1358, 1368, 1369
- Aleinikoff, T. Alexander & Chetail, Vincent (eds.), Migration and International Legal Norms (2003)—12, 148, 1120
- Aleinikoff, T. Alexander & Klusmeyer, Douglas (eds.), Citizenship Today: Global Perspectives and Practices (2001)—1374
- Aleinikoff, T. Alexander & Klusmeyer, Douglas (eds.), From Migrants to Citizens (2000)—1374
- Aleinikoff, T. Alexander & Martin, David A., Immigration: Process and Policy (1st ed. 1985)—125, 420, 514, 537, 636, 1116
- Aleinikoff, T. Alexander & Rumbaut, Ruben, Terms of Belonging: Are Models of Membership Self-Fulfilling Prophecies?, 13 Georgetown Immigration L.J. 1 (1998)—70
- Alston, Philip (ed.), The United Nations and Human Rights—A Critical Appraisal (1992)—1138
- American Bar Association Commission on Immigration Policy, Practice & Pro Bono, Seeking Meaningful Review: Findings and Recommendations in Response to Dorsey & Whitney Study of Board of Immigration Appeals Procedural Reforms (Oct. 2003)—745, 751
- American Friends Service Committee, Report, U.S.-Mexico Border Project (Nov. 1999)—1148
- Amnesty International, United States of America: Lost in the Labyrinth: Detention of Asylum-Seekers, Rpt. AMR51/51/99 (Sept. 1999)—1057
- Anderson, Stuart, The Multiplier Effect, Internat'l Educator 13 (Summer 2004)—85
- Anderson, Stuart, Widespread Abuse of H-1Bs and Employment-Based Immigration? The Evidence Says Otherwise, 73 IR 637 (May 13, 1996)—322, 374
- Anker, Deborah E., A Case Study on the Implementation of Legal Norms in an Unstructured Adjudicatory Environment, 19 NYU Rev. L. & Social Change 433 (1992)—1031
- Anker, Deborah E., Determining Asylum Claims in the United States—Summary Report of an Empirical Study of the Adjudication of Asylum Claims Before the Immigration Court, 2 Internat'l J. Refugee L. 252 (1990)—1014, 1034
- Anker, Deborah E., Discretionary Asylum: A Protection Remedy for Refugees Under the Refugee Act of 1980, 28 Virginia J. Internat'l L. 1 (1987)—892, 1025, 1027
- Anker, Deborah E., Gender and Social Group: Comments to Proposed Regulations, 6 BIB 185 (Feb. 15, 2001)—996

- Anker, Deborah E., Law of Asylum in the United States (3d ed. 1999)—868, 903, 916, 930, 945, 1004, 1014, 1015, 1016, 1028, 1095, 1120
- Anker, Deborah E., Refugee Status and Violence Against Women in the "Domestic" Sphere: The Non-State Actor Question, 15 Georgetown Immigration L.J. 391 (2001)—977
- Anker, Deborah E., Women Refugees: Forgotten No Longer?, 32 San Diego L.Rev. 771 (1995)—945
- Anker, Deborah E., Blum, Carolyn P., & Johnson, Kevin R., The Supreme Court's Decision in INS v. Elias-Zacarias: Is There any "There" There?, 69 IR 285 (Mar. 9, 1992)—924
- Anker, Deborah E., Fitzpatrick, Joan, & Shacknové, Andrew, Crisis and Cure: A Reply to Hathaway/Neve and Schuck, 11 Harvard Human Rights J. 295 (1998)—889
- Anker, Deborah E., Gilbert, Lauren, & Kelly, Nancy, Women Whose Governments are Unable or Unwilling to Provide Reasonable Protection from Domestic Violence May Qualify as Refugees under United States Asylum Law, 11 Georgetown Immigration L.J. 709 (1997)—975
- Anker, Deborah E., Kelly, Nancy, & Willshire-Carrerra, John, Defining "Particular Social Group" in Terms of Gender: The Shah Decision and U.S. Law, 76 IR 1005 (July 2, 1999)—996
- Anker, Deborah E., Kelly, Nancy, & Willshire-Carrerra, John, Rape in the Community as a Basis for Asylum: The Treatment of Women Refugees' Claims to Protection in Canada and the United States—Part 2, 2 BIB 608 (Aug. 1, 1997)—956-57, 958
- Anker, Deborah E. & Posner, Michael H., The Forty Year Crisis: A Legislative History of the Refugee Act of 1980, 19 San Diego L.Rev. 9 (1981)—881, 1011-12, 1014, 1040
- Anrig, Greg Jr. & Wang, Tova Andrea (eds.), Immigration's New Frontiers: Experiences from the Emerging Gateway States (2006)—1238
- Appiah, Kwame Anthony, Cosmopolitanism 158 (2006)—32
- Appleman, Irving A., Right to Counsel in Deportation Proceedings, 14 San Diego L.Rev. 130 (1976)—679
- Arnold, Fred, Unanswered Questions About the Immigration Multiplier, 23 Internat'l Migration Rev. 889 (1989)—301
- Aruri, Naseer (ed.), Palestinian Refugees—The Right of Return (2001)—1138
- Ashar, Sameer M., Public Interest Lawyers and Resistance Movements, 95 California L. Rev. 1879 (2007)—1233
- Augustine-Adams, Kif, The Plenary Power Doctrine After September 11, 38 U.C. Davis L. Rev. 701 (2005)—187
- Avery, Christopher, Refugee Status Decision-Making: The Systems of Ten Countries, 19 Stanford J. Internat'l L. 235 (1983)—1040
- Bach, Robert L., Building Community among Diversity: Legal Services for Impoverished Immigrants, 27 Univ. Michigan J. Law Reform 639 (1994)—680
- Bach, Robert L. & Meissner, Doris, America's Labor Market in the 1990's: What Role Should Immigration Play? (1990)—301
- Bach, Robert L. & Meissner, Doris, Employment and Immigration Reform: Employer Sanctions Four Years Later (1990)—1162, 1165, 1166
- Bacon, David, Be Our Guests, The Nation, at 22 et seq. (Sept. 27, 2004)—378
- Bar-Yaacov, Nissim, Dual Nationality (1961)—1318
- Batchelor, Carol A., Stateless Persons: Some Gaps in International Protection, 7 Internat'l J. Refugee L. 232 (1995)—1320
- Bau, Ignatius, This Ground is Holy—Church Sanctuary and Central American Refugees (1985)—1154
- Bean, Frank D. et al., Rand Corp. & Urban Institute, Opening and Closing the Doors—Evaluating Immigration Reform and Control (1989)—1164
- Bell, Alan P. et al., Sexual Preference—Its Development in Men and Women (1981)—278
- Benedetto, Michele, Crisis on the Immigration Bench, 73 Brooklyn L. Rev. 467 (2008)—655
- Benesch, Susan, & Chaffee, Devon, The Ever-Expanding Material Support Bar: An Unjust Obstacle for Refugees and Asylum Seekers, 83 IR 465 (Mar. 13, 2006)—443
- Benson, Lenni B., Back to the Future: Congress Attacks the Right to Judicial Review of Immigration Proceedings, 29 Connecticut L. Rev. 1411 (1997)—770
- Benson, Lenni B., Breaking Bureaucratic Borders: A Necessary Step Toward Immigration Law Reform, 54 Administrative L. Rev. 203 (2002)—471
- Benson, Lenni B., Making Paper Dolls: How Restrictions on Judicial Review and the Administrative Process Increase Immigration Cases in the Federal Courts, 51 New York Law School L. Rev. 37 (2006-07)—759-60
- Benson, Lenni B., The Invisible Worker, 27 North Carolina J. Internat'l L. & Commercial Regulation 483 (2002)—1144
- Benson, Lenni B., The New World of Judicial Review of Removal Orders, 12 Georgetown Immigration L.J. 233 (1998)—770
- Benson, Lenni B., You Can't Get There from Here: Managing Judicial Review of Immigration Cases, 2007 Univ. of Chicago Legal Forum 405—758

- Benson, Lenni B. & Bacon, Roxana C., A Practitioner's Guide to Successful Alien Labor Certifications, May 1988 Immigration Briefings—315, 322
- Berger, Raoul, The Presidential Monopoly of Foreign Relations, 71 Michigan L.Rev. 1 (1972)—130
- Berns, Walter, The Constitution and the Migration of Slaves, 78 Yale L.J. 198 (1968)—118
- Bernsen, Sam, Consular Absolutism in Visa Cases, 63 IR 388 (1986)—487
- Bhabha, Jacqueline, Demography and Rights: Women, Children and Access to Asylum, 16 Internat'l J. Refugee L. 227 (2004)—949
- Bhabha, Jacqueline, Embodied Rights: Gender Persecution, State Sovereignty, and Refugees, 9 Public Culture 3 (1996)—945, 957, 967, 970
- Bhabha, Jacqueline, European Harmonisation of Asylum Policy: A Flawed Process, 35 Virginia J. Internat'l L. 101 (1994)—1046
- Bhabha, Jacqueline, Lone Travelers: Rights, Criminalization, and the Transnational Migration of Unaccompanied Children, 7 Univ. Chicago L. School Roundtable 269 (2000)—1034
- Bhabha, Jacqueline, Minors or Aliens? Inconsistent State Intervention and Separated Child Asylum-Seekers, 3 European J. Migration & L. 283 (2001)—1034
- Bhabha, Jacqueline, "More than Their Share of Sorrows": International Migration Law and the Rights of Children, 22 St. Louis Univ. Public L. Rev. 253 (2003)—1034
- Bhabha, Jacqueline, "Not a Sack of Potatoes": Moving and Removing Children Across Borders, 15 Boston Univ. Public Interest L.J. 196 (2006)—1035
- Bhabha, Jacqueline & Young, Wendy A., Through a Child's Eyes: Protecting the Most Vulnerable Asylum Seekers, 75 IR 757 (June 1, 1998)—1035
- Bhagwati, Jagdish & Rao, Milind, The U.S. Brain Gain—At the Expense of Blacks?, 39 Challenge 50 (March 1996)—393, 394, 395
- Bhandari, Jagdeep S., Migration and Trade Policies: Symmetry or Paradox?, 6 Journal of Internat'l Business & Law 17 (2007)—344
- Bhandari, Jagdeep S., Strange Visions of Alien Shadows, 13 Southwestern J. of Law & Trade in the Americas 63 (2006)—1190
- Bickel, Alexander M., The Morality of Consent (1975)—1395
- Black, Robert N., Due Process and Deportation—Is there a Right to Assigned Counsel?, 8 U.C. Davis L.Rev. 289 (1975)—679
- Bleichmar, Javier, Deportation as Punishment: A Historical Analysis of the British Practice of Banishment and Its Impact on Modern Constitutional Law, 14 Georgetown Immigration L.J. 115 (1999)—517
- Bloemraad, Irene, Becoming a Citizen: Incorporating Immigrants and Refugees in the United States and Canada (2006)—63
- Blum, Carolyn Patty, A Question of Values: Continuing Divergences Between U.S. and International Refugee Norms, 15 Berkeley J. Internat'l L. 1 (1997)—924
- Bodenheimer, Edgar et al., An Introduction to the Anglo-American Legal System (2d ed. 1988)—1310
- Bogdan, Attila, Guilty Pleas by Non-Citizens in Illinois: Immigration Consequences Reconsidered, 53 DePaul L. Rev. 19 (2003)—556
- Bonnerjea, Lucy, Shaming the World—The Needs of Women Refugees (1985)—946
- Borjas, George J., Heaven's Door—Immigration Policy and the American Economy (1999)—71, 82, 1143, 1380
- Bosniak, Linda S., Citizenship Denationalized, 7 Indiana J. Global Legal Studies 447 (2000)—1318, 1396
- Bosniak, Linda S., Exclusion and Membership: The Dual Identity of the Undocumented Worker under United States Law, 1988 Wisconsin L. Rev. 955—1187, 1208
- Bosniak, Linda S., Human Rights, State Sovereignty and the Protection of Undocumented Immigrants under the International Migrant Workers Convention, 25 Internat'l Migration Rev. 737 (1991)—1223
- Bosniak, Linda S., Immigrants, Preemption and Equality, 35 Virginia J. Internat'l L. 179 (1994)—1255
- Bosniak, Linda S., Membership, Equality, and the Difference that Alienage Makes, 69 NYU L. Rev. 1047 (1994)—115, 1207, 1374
- Bosniak, Linda S., Multiple Nationality and the Postnational Transformation of Citizenship, 42 Virginia J. Internat'l L. 979 (2002)—1318
- Bosniak, Linda S., Opposing Prop. 187: Undocumented Immigrants and the National Imagination, 28 Connecticut L. Rev. 555 (1996)—1286
- Bosniak, Linda S., The Citizen and the Alien—Dilemmas of Contemporary Membership (2006)—1396
- Boswell, Richard A., Racism and U.S. Immigration Law: Prospects for Reform after "9/11"?, 7 J. Gender, Race & Justice 315 (2003)—91
- Boswell, Richard A., Restrictions on Noncitizens' Access to Public Benefits: Flawed Premise, Unnecessary Response, 42 UCLA L. Rev. 1475 (1995)—1145, 1286
- Boswell, Richard A., Rethinking Exclusion—The Rights of Cuban Refugees Facing Indefinite Detention in the United States, 17 Vanderbilt J. Transnat'l L. 925 (1984)—167

- Boyle, Daniel F., Labor Certification Pitfalls, 9 BIB 1354 (Nov. 15, 2004)—320
- Brady, Michael P., Asylum Adjudication: No Place for the INS, 20 Columbia Human Rights L. Rev. 129 (1988)—1040-41
- Brimelow, Peter, Alien Nation—Common Sense about America's Immigration Disaster (1995)—45
- Brown, Eleanor, Outsourcing Immigration Compliance, 77 Fordham L. Rev. 2475 (2009)—378
- Brown, Peter G. & Shue, Henry (eds.), Boundaries—National Autonomy and Its Limits (1981)—33, 35, 36, 1395
- Brubaker, William R. (ed.), Immigration and the Politics of Citizenship in Europe and North America (1989)—1317, 1319, 1381
- Buckner Innis, Lolita K., Tricky Magic: Blacks as Immigrants and the Paradox of Foreignness, 49 DePaul L. Rev. 85 (1999)—111
- Buckner Innis, Lolita K., California's Proposition 187—Does It Mean What It Says? Does It Say What It Means? A Textual and Constitutional Analysis, 10 Georgetown Immigration L.J. 577 (1996)—1286
- Buergenthal, Thomas & Murphy, Sean D., Public International Law in a Nutshell (4th ed. 2007)—894, 1097
- Burgess, Susan N., SEVIS: Is It Academic?, Feb. 2004 Immigration Briefings—825
- Butcher, Kristin F. & Piehl, Anne Morrison, Recent Immigrants: Unexpected Implications for Crime and Incarceration, NBER Working Paper No. 6067 (June 1997)—550
- Butterfield, Jeanne A., The New Asylum Regulations: A Practitioner's Guide, Jan. 1995 Immigration Briefings—1030
- Byrne, Rosemary et al. (eds.), New Asylum Countries? Migration Control and Refugee Protection in an Enlarged European Union (2002)—1046
- Byrne, Rosemary & Shacknove, Andrew, The Safe Country Notion in European Asylum Law, 9 Harvard Human Rights J. 185 (1996)—1045, 1046
- Calavita, Kitty, Employer Sanctions Violations: Toward a Dialectical Model of White-Collar Crime, 24 L. & Society Rev. 1041 (1990)—1164
- Calvo, Janet M., A Decade of Spouse-Based Immigration Laws: Covertures's Diminishment, But Not Its Demise, 24 Northern Illinois Univ. L. Rev. 153 (2004)—286, 472
- Calvo, Janet M., Immigrant Status and Legal Access for Health Care (1993)—1191
- Calvo, Janet M., Spouse-Based Immigration Laws: The Legacies of Coverture, 28 San Diego L.Rev. 593 (1991)—286
- Camayd-Freixes, Erik, Interpreting After the Largest ICE Raid in US History: A Personal Account (June 13, 2008), <http://graphics8.nytimes.com/images/2008/07/14/opinion/14ed-camayd.pdf>—1151, 1155
- Cameron, Christopher David Ruiz, How the Garcia Cousins Lost their Accents: Understanding the Language of Title 7 Decisions Approving English-Only Rules as the Product of Racial Dualism, Latino Invisibility, and Legal Indeterminacy, 85 California L. Rev. 261 (1997)—68
- Cao, Lan, Monkey Bridge (1997)—110
- Caprara, Alfonso et al. (eds.), AILA, Ethics and Your Immigration Practice: Have You Considered . . . ? (1998)—321
- Capriotti, Franco et al., Small-Time Crime, Big-Time Trouble: The New Immigration Laws, 13 Crim. Justice #2 (1998)—696
- Carens, Joseph H., Aliens and Citizens: The Case for Open Borders, 49 The Rev. of Politics 251 (1987)—31
- Carlier, Jean-Yves & Vanheule, Dirk (eds.), Europe and Refugees: A Challenge? (1997)—868
- Carlin, James L., Significant Refugee Crises Since World War II and the Response of the International Community, 1982 Michigan Yearbook Internat'l Legal Studies 3—880, 881
- Carliner, David et al., The Rights of Aliens and Refugees (2d ed. 1990)—650, 1191, 1374
- Carrasco, Gilbert Paul, Congressional Arrogation of Power: Alien Constellation in the Galaxy of Equal Protection, 74 Boston Univ. L. Rev. 591 (1994)—1381
- Carrasco, Gilbert Paul, Latinos in the United States—Invitation and Exile, in Juan F. Perea (ed.), Immigrants Out! The New Nativism and the Anti-Immigrant Impulse in the United States, at 190 et seq. (1997)—92, 377
- Carro, Jorge L., From Constitutional Psychopathic Inferiority to AIDS: What Is in the Future for Homosexual Aliens?, 7 Yale L. & Policy Rev. 201 (1989)—271, 279, 461
- Carro, Jorge L., Municipal and State Sanctuary Declarations: Innocuous Symbolism or Improper Dictates?, 16 Pepperdine L. Rev. 297 (1989)—1154
- Carro, Jorge L., Sanctuary: The Resurgence of an Age-Old Right or a Dangerous Misinterpretation of an Abandoned Ancient Privilege?, 54 Univ. Cincinnati L. Rev. 747 (1986)—1154
- Carter, Barry E. & Trimble, Phillip R., International Law (2d ed. 1995)—1097
- Catterson, Cathy, Changes in Appellate Caseload and its Processing, 48 Arizona L. Rev. 287 (2006)—731
- Chacón, Jennifer M., Citizenship and Family: Revisiting Dred Scott, 27 Washington Univ. J. L. & Policy 45 (2008)—261
- Chacón, Jennifer M., Loving Across Borders: Immigration Law and the Limits of Loving, 2007 Wisconsin L. Rev. 345—261

- Chacón, Jennifer M., Misery and Myopia: Understanding the Failures of U.S. Efforts to Stop Human Trafficking, 74 Fordham L. Rev. 2977 (2006)—412, 1149, 1156, 1212
- Chacón, Jennifer M., Unsecured Borders: Immigration Restrictions, Crime Control and National Security, 39 Conn. L. Rev. 1827 (2007)—549
- Chacón, Jennifer M., Whose Community Shield?: Examining the Removal of the "Criminal Street Gang Member," 2007 Univ. of Chicago Legal Forum 317—549
- Chander, Anupam, Diaspora Bonds, 76 NYU L. Rev. 1005 (2001)—1396
- Chander, Anupam, Flying the Mexican Flag in Los Angeles, 75 Fordham L. Rev. 2455 (2007)—63
- Chander, Anupam, Homeward Bound, 81 NYU L. Rev. 60 (2006)—1396
- Chang, Cindy, Note, Health Care for Undocumented Immigrant Children: Special Members of an Underclass, 83 Washington Univ. L.Q. 1271 (2005)—1191—92
- Chang, Gordon H. (ed.), Asian Americans and Politics (2001)—109
- Chang, Howard F., Immigration and the Workplace: Immigration Restrictions as Employment Discrimination, 78 Chicago-Kent L. Rev. 291 (2003)—344, 1162
- Chang, Howard F., Immigration Policy, Liberal Principles, and the Republican Tradition, 85 Georgetown L. Rev. 2101 (1997)—32, 92
- Chang, Howard F., Liberal Ideals and Political Feasibility: Guest-Worker Programs as Second-Best Policies, 27 North Carolina J. Internat'l & Commercial Regulation 465 (2002)—382, 1235
- Chang, Howard F., Liberalized Immigration as Free Trade: Economic Welfare and the Optimal Immigration Policy, 145 Univ. Pennsylvania L. Rev. 1147 (1997)—343—44
- Chang, Howard F., Migration as International Trade: The Economic Gains from the Liberalized Movement of Labor, 3 UCLA J. Internat'l L. & Foreign Affairs 371 (1998)—75, 344
- Chang, Howard F., Public Benefits and Federal Authorization for Alienage Discrimination by the States, 58 NYU Ann. Survey Amer. L. 357 (2002)—1381
- Chang, Howard F., The Immigration Paradox: Poverty, Distributive Justice, and Liberal Egalitarianism, 52 DePaul L. Rev. 759 (2003)—382
- Chang, Robert S., Disoriented: Asian Americans, Law, and the Nation-State (1999)—109
- Chang, Robert S., Toward an Asian American Legal Scholarship: Critical Race Theory, Post-Structuralism, and Narrative Space, 81 California L. Rev. 1241 (1993)—109
- Chetail, Victor & Gowlland-Debbas, Vera (eds.), Switzerland and the International Protection of Refugees (2002)—973
- Chiappari, Ted J., Survey of Labor Condition Application Enforcement Proceedings, 73 IR 673 (May 20, 1996)—374
- Chin, Gabriel J., Is There a Plenary Power Doctrine? A Tentative Apology and Prediction for Our Strange but Unexceptional Constitutional Immigration Law, 14 Georgetown Immigration L.J. 257 (2000)—241
- Chin, Gabriel J., Segregation's Last Stronghold: Race Discrimination and the Constitutional Law of Immigration, 46 UCLA L. Rev. 1 (1998)—244
- Chin, Gabriel J., The Civil Rights Revolution Comes to Immigration Law: A New Look at the Immigration and Nationality Act of 1965, 75 North Carolina L.Rev. 273 (1996)—18
- Chin, Gabriel J., Why Senator John McCain Cannot Be President: Eleven Months and a Hundred Yards Short of Citizenship, 107 Michigan L. Rev. First Impressions 1 (2008)—1290
- Chin, Gabriel J., & Holmes, Richard W., Effective Assistance of Counsel and the Consequences of Guilty Pleas, 87 Cornell L. Rev. 697 (2002)—556
- Chishti, Muzaffar A. et al., Migration Policy Institute, America's Challenge: Domestic Security, Civil Liberties, and National Unity after September 11 (2003)—860
- Cholewinski, Ryszard et al. (eds.), International Migration Law: Developing Paradigms and Key Challenges (2007)—12
- Choper, Jesse H. et al., Constitutional Law (10th ed. 2006)—188
- Christian, Bryan Paul, Visa Policy, Inspection and Exit Controls: Transatlantic Perspectives on Migration Management, 14 Georgetown Immigration L.J. 215 (1999)—502
- Chuman, Frank F., The Bamboo People (1976)—120
- Churgin, Michael J., Immigration Internal Decisionmaking: A View from History, 78 Texas L. Rev. 1633 (2000)—14
- Churgin, Michael J., Lobbying by Jewish Organizations Concerning Immigration: A Historical Study, 83 Univ. Detroit Mercy L. Rev. 947 (2006)—96
- Churgin, Michael J., Mass Exoduses: The Response of the United States, 30 Internat'l Migration Rev. 310 (1996)—1079
- Cianciarulo, Marisa Silenzi, Modern-Day Slavery and Cultural Bias: Proposals for Reforming the U.S. Visa System for Victims of International Human Trafficking, 7 Nevada L.J. 826 (2007)—1156
- Cimini, Christine N., Ask Don't Tell: Ethical Issues Surrounding Undocumented Workers' Status in Employment Litigation, 61 Stanford L. Rev. 355 (2008)—1212

- Clark, Dick, Foreword, in Elizabeth Hull, Without Justice For All—The Constitutional Rights of Aliens at ix et seq. (1985)—886
- Cleveland, Sarah H., Powers Inherent in Sovereignty: Indians, Aliens, Territories, and the Nineteenth-Century Origins of Plenary Power over Foreign Affairs, 81 Texas L. Rev. 1 (2002)—150
- Cleveland, Sarah H., The Plenary Power Background of Curtiss-Wright, 70 Univ. Colorado L. Rev. 1127 (1999)—150
- Cohen, Dara Kay, Cuéllar, Mariano-Florentino, & Weingast, Barry R., Crisis Bureaucracy, Homeland Security and the Political Design of Legal Mandates, 59 Stanford L. Rev. 673 (2007)—815–16
- Cole, David, Enemy Aliens, 54 Stanford L. Rev. 953 (2002)—816, 817, 845, 849, 850
- Cole, David, Enemy Aliens—Double Standards and Constitutional Freedoms in the War on Terrorism (2003)—816, 845, 866
- Cole, David, In Aid of Removal: Due Process Limits on Immigration Detention, 51 Emory L.J. 1003 (2002)—818, 822
- Cole, David, Jurisdiction and Liberty: Habeas Corpus and Due Process as Limits on Congress's Control of Federal Jurisdiction, 86 Georgetown L.J. 2481 (1998)—770
- Cole, David, The Priority of Morality: The Emergency Constitution's Blind Spot, 113 Yale L.J. 1753 (2004)—863
- Cole, Richard P. & Chin, Gabriel J., Emerging from the Margins of Historical Consciousness: Chinese Immigrants and the History of American Law, 17 Law & History Rev. 325 (1999)—129
- Colon, Jeffrey M., Changing U.S. Tax Jurisdiction: Expatriates, Immigrants, and the Need for a Coherent Tax Policy, 34 San Diego L. Rev. 1 (1997)—1372
- Colon-Navarro, Fernando, Familia e Inmigración: What Happened to Family Unity?, 19 Florida J. Internat'l L. 491 (2007)—261
- Commission for the Study of International Migration and Cooperative Economic Development, Report, Unauthorized Migration: An Economic Development Response (July 1990)—1231
- Commission of the European Communities, Proposal for a Council Directive on minimum standards for the qualification and status of third country nationals and stateless persons as refugees or as persons who otherwise need international protection, COM(2001), 510 final, 2001/0207 (CNS) (Dec. 9, 2001)—975
- Committee on Federal Courts, The Surge of Immigration Appeals and Its Impact on the Second Circuit Court of Appeals (2004)—758
- Conte, Francis J., Sink or Swim Together: Citizenship, Sovereignty, and Free Movement in the European Union and the United States, 61 Univ. Miami L. Rev. 331 (2007)—36
- Cooper, Bo, Procedures for Expedited Removal and Asylum Screening under the Illegal Immigration Reform and Immigrant Responsibility Act of 1996, 29 Connecticut L. Rev. 1501 (1997)—1055
- Cornelius, Wayne A., Controlling 'Unwanted' Immigration: Lessons from the United States, 1993–2004, 31 J. Ethnic & Migration Studies 775 (2005)—1148, 1149
- Cornelius, Wayne A., Impacts of Border Enforcement on Unauthorized Mexican Migration to the United States, 11 BIB 1135 (Oct. 1, 2006)—1148, 1149
- Costello, Patrick, Haiti: Prospects for Democracy, 15 Ref. Survey Q. 1 (1996)—1081
- Covington & Burling and National Asian Pacific American Legal Consortium, Protecting the Rights of Legal Permanent Residents: A First Amendment Analysis of Proposals to Prohibit Campaign Contributions and Expenditures by Legal Permanent Residents, 3 BIB 16 (Jan. 1, 1998)—1373
- Cox, Adam B., Citizenship, Standing, and Immigration Law, 92 California L. Rev. 373 (2004)—193
- Cox, Adam B., Deference, Delegation, and Immigration Law, 74 Univ. Chicago L. Rev. 1671 (2007)—748
- Cox, Adam B., Immigration Law's Organizing Principles, 157 Univ. Penn. L. Rev. 1101 (2008)—115, 1207, 1255
- Cox, Adam B. & Posner, Eric A., The Second-Order Structure of Immigration Law, 59 Stanford L. Rev. 809 (2007)—1145
- Craig, Barbara H., Chadha—The Story of an Epic Constitutional Struggle (1988)—205
- Crawley, Heaven, Refugees and Gender—Law and Process (2001)—945
- Crépeau, François, When Recourses Fail to Protect: Canadian Human Rights Obligations and the Remedies Offered to Foreigners against Immigration Decisions, 7 European J. Migration & Law 275 (2005)—131
- Crépeau, François & Janik, Kinga, Comparative Study on Immigration and Social Transformation—Canada (2004)—291
- Crépeau, François & Legomsky, Stephen H., North American Responses: A Comparative Study of U.S. and Canadian Refugee Policy, in Susan Kneebone & Felicity Rawlings-Sanaei (eds.), New Regionalism and Asylum Seekers—Challenges Ahead, chap. 6 (2007)—1051
- Crock, Mary, Apart from Us or a Part of Us? Immigrants' Rights, Public Opinion and the Rule of Law, 10 Internat'l J. Refugee L. 49 (1998)—912
- Crock, Mary, Contract or Compact: Skilled Migration and the Dictates of Politics and Ideology, 16 Georgetown Immigration L.J. 133 (2001)—343, 376

- Crock, Mary, Immigration and Refugee Law in Australia (1998)—1191
- Crock, Mary, Seeking Asylum Alone—Australia (2006)—1034
- Crock, Mary & Saul, Ben, Future Seekers—Refugees and the Law in Australia (2002)—1062
- Cuéllar, Mariano-Florentino, Refugee Security and the Organizational Logic of Legal Mandates, 37 Georgetown J. Internat'l L. 583 (2006)—879
- Cuéllar, Mariano-Florentino, The Limits of the Limits of Idealism: Rethinking American Refugee Policy in an Insecure World, 1 Harvard L. & Policy Rev. 401 (2007)—889
- Currie, David P. & Goodman, Frank I., Judicial Review of Federal Administrative Action: Quest for the Optimum Forum, 75 Columbia L.Rev. 1 (1975)—761
- d'Appollonia, Ariane Chebel & Reich, Simon (eds.), Immigration, Integration, and Security: America and Europe in Comparative Perspective (2008)—1239
- D'Emilio, John, Sexual Politics, Sexual Minorities—The Making of a Homosexual Minority in the United States 1940–1970 (1983)—279
- Davis, Martha F., Guttentag, Lucas & Wernick, Allan H., Report of the Committee on Immigration and Nationality Law of the Association of the Bar of the City of New York: An Analysis of Discrimination Resulting from Employer Sanctions and a Call for Repeal, 26 San Diego L. Rev. 711 (1989)—1165
- DeConcini, Christina & McKenna, Molly, BIA Pro Bono Project: Representing Detained Migrants Before the BIA and Uncovering Government Obstacles to Pro Se Detainees Appealing their Cases, 6 BIB 809 (Aug. 15, 2001)—681
- Demleitner, Nora V., How Much Do Western Democracies Value Family and Marriage?: Immigration Law's Conflicted Answers, 32 Hofstra L. Rev. 273 (2003)—303
- Demleitner, Nora V., Immigration Threats and Rewards: Effective Law Enforcement Tools in the "War" on Terrorism, 51 Emory L.J. 1059 (2002)—549
- Demleitner, Nora V., Power, Perceptions, and the Politics of Immigration and Welfare, 14 Industrial Development & Social Fabric 9 (1998)—1380
- Demleitner, Nora V., The Fallacy of Social "Citizenship," or the Threat of Exclusion, 12 Georgetown Immigration L.J. 35 (1997)—1375
- Demleitner, Nora V., The Law at a Crossroads: The Construction of Migrant Women Trafficked into Prostitution, in David Kyle & Rey Koslowski (eds.), Global Human Smuggling: Comparative Perspectives, chap. 10 (2001)—412, 1156
- Deng, Francis Mading, The Global Challenge of Internal Displacement, 5 Washington Univ. J. of L. & Policy 141 (2001)—890
- Divine, Robert A., American Immigration Policy, 1924–1952 (1957)—874, 875, 877
- Dobbs, Dan B., The Law of Torts (2000)—35, 985, 986, 1000
- Dorsey & Whitney LLP, Study Conducted for the American Bar Association Commission on Immigration Policy, Practice and Pro Bono, Re Board of Immigration Appeals: Procedural Reforms to Improve Case Management (July 22, 2003)—744, 745, 749, 751
- Dow, Mark, American Gulag—Inside U.S. Immigration Prisons (2004)—240
- Dowty, Alan, Closed Borders—The Contemporary Assault on Freedom of Movement (1987)—37
- Duignan, Peter & Gann, Lewis H. (eds.), The Debate in the United States over Immigration (1998)—1162
- Durand, Jorge & Massey, Douglas, Borderline Sanity, The Amer. Prospect (Sept. 23, 2001)—1231
- Durst, Ilene, Lost in Translation: Why Due Process Demands Deference to the Refugee's Narrative, 53 Rutgers L. Rev. 127 (2000)—1006
- Duvall, Donald K., Expatriation Under United States Law, Perez to Afroyim: The Search for a Philosophy of American Citizenship, 56 Virginia L. Rev. 408 (1970)—1358
- Einhorn, Bruce J., Political Asylum in the Ninth Circuit and the Case of Elias-Zacarias, 29 San Diego L. Rev. 597 (1992)—922
- Eisgruber, Christopher L., Birthright Citizenship and the Constitution, 72 NYU L. Rev. 54 (1997)—1335
- Elmore, Andrew J., Egalitarianism and Exclusion: U.S. Guest Workers Programs and a Non-Subordination Approach to the Labor-Based Admission of Nonprofessional Foreign Nationals, 21 Georgetown Immigration Law Journal 521 (2007)—1236
- Endelman, Gary, How to Prevent Loss of Citizenship: Part I, Nov. 1989 Immigration Briefings—1368
- Endelman, Gary, How to Prevent Loss of Citizenship: Part II, Dec. 1989 Immigration Briefings—1370
- Endelman, Gary, Mother Knows Best: A New Look at an Old Law, 13 Immigration J. 29 (Apr.–June 1990)—1298
- Endelman, Gary, Saying Goodbye to Uncle Sam: Formal Renunciation of U.S. Citizenship, 73 IR 709 (May 24, 1996)—1358, 1367
- Espenoza, Cecelia M., No Relief for the Weary: VAWA Relief Denied for Battered Im-

- migrants Lost in the Intersections, 83 Marquette L. Rev. 163 (1999)—472
- Espenosa, Cecelia M., The Illusory Provisions of Sanctions: The Immigration Reform and Control Act of 1986, 8 Georgetown Immigration L.J. 343 (1994)—1162
- Essay, Litigating as Law Students: An Inside Look at Haitian Centers Council, 103 Yale L.J. 2337 (1994)—1084
- Family, Jill E., A Broader View of the Immigration Adjudication Problem, 23 Georgetown Immigration L.J. — (forthcoming 2009)—756
- Family, Jill E., Another Limit on Federal Court Jurisdiction? Immigrant Access to Class-Wide Injunctive Relief, 53 Cleveland State L. Rev. 11 (2005-06)—787-88
- Family, Jill E., Stripping Judicial Review During Immigration Reform: The Certificate of Reviewability, 8 Nevada L.J. 499 (2008)—757
- Family, Jill E., Threats to the Future of the Immigration Class Action, 27 Washington Univ. J. L. & Policy 71 (2008)—788
- Fasano, H. Raymond & Madeo, Donald F., Why Are You Here? Jurisdiction in District Court for Mandamus Actions over Delayed Adjudications, 85 IR 1181 (Apr. 14, 2008)—788
- Feller, Erika et al. (eds.), Refugee Protection in International Law: UNHCR's Global Consultations on International Protection (2003)—303, 1058
- Feller, Erika, The Evolution of the International Refugee Protection Regime, 5 Washington Univ. J. of L. & Policy 129 (2001)—889
- Feroli, James, Habeas Corpus Subject Matter Jurisdiction over Final Orders of Removal Pursuant to 28 U.S.C. § 2241, Sept. 2004 Immigration Briefings—764
- Feroli, James, Unlawful Presence, Voluntary Departure, and Stays of Voluntary Departure, Jan. 2006 Immigration Briefings—432
- Fisk, Catherine L. & Wishnie, Michael J., Hoffman Plastic Compounds, Inc. v. NLRB: The Rules of the Workplace for Undocumented Immigrants, in David A. Martin & Peter H. Schuck (eds.), Immigration Stories, chap. 12 (2005)—1222
- Fitzpatrick, Joan, Flight from Asylum: Trends Toward Temporary "Refuge" and Local Responses to Forced Migrations, 35 Virginia J. Internat'l L. 13 (1994)—1120
- Fitzpatrick, Joan, Temporary Protection of Refugees: Elements of a Formalized Regime, 94 Amer. J. Internat'l L. 279 (2000)—1121
- Fitzpatrick, Joan, The End of Protection: Legal Standards for Cessation of Refugee Status, 13 Georgetown Immigration L.J. 343 (1999)—889
- Fitzpatrick, Joan, The Gender Dimension of U.S. Immigration Policy, 9 Yale J. Law & Feminism 23 (1997)—316
- Fitzpatrick, Joan & Bennett, William McKay, A Lion in the Path? The Influence of International Law on the Immigration Policy of the United States, 70 Washington L. Rev. 589 (1995)—244, 462
- Fitzpatrick, Joan & Kelly, Katrina, Gendered Aspects of Migration: Law and the Female Migrant, 22 Hastings Internat'l & Comparative L. Rev. 47 (1998)—316
- Fitzpatrick, Joan & Pauw, Robert, Foreign Policy, Asylum, and Discretion, 28 Willamette L.Rev. 751 (1992)—887
- Fix, Michael & Hill, Paul T., Enforcing Employer Sanctions: Challenges and Strategies (1990)—1162, 1165
- Fix, Michael & Zimmermann, Wendy, Patterns of Welfare Use Among Immigrants, 23 Migration World, No. 5, at 15 et seq. (1995)—1380
- Fix, Michael et al., Trends in Naturalization, 80 IR 1473 (Oct. 27, 2003)—1301
- Fix, Michael F., Zimmerman, Wendy & Passel, Jeffrey S., The Urban Institute, The Integration of Immigrant Families in the United States (2001), http://www.urban.org/UploadedPDF/immig_integration.pdf—261, 1142
- Fleissner, James P. & Shapiro, James A., Federal Sentences for Aliens Convicted of Illegal Reentry Following Deportation: Who Needs the Aggravation?, 9 Georgetown Immigration L.J. 451 (1995)—576
- Flynn, Eugene, Countries Which the U.S. Recognizes as Eligible (or soon to be eligible) for E-1 or E-2 Status (periodically updated)—369
- Flynn, William J. III & Patel, Dilip, Employers, Employees and Ethics, in Alfonso Caprara et al. (eds.), AILA, Ethics and Your Immigration Practice: Have you Considered . . . ?, at 31 et seq. (1998)—321
- Foster, Michelle, International Refugee Law and Socio-Economic Rights: Refuge from Deprivation (2007)—902
- Foster, Michelle, Protection Elsewhere: The Legal Implications of Requiring Refugees to Seek Protection in Another State, 28 Michigan J. Internat'l L. 223 (2007)—1047
- Fragomen, Austin T., The New OPT Rule: New Options, Lingering Uncertainties for Foreign Students, 85 IR 2173 (Aug. 11, 2008)—397
- Fragomen, Austin T. et al., Immigration Law and Business (updated periodically)—322, 358
- Fragomen, Austin T. et al., Proper Standards for Admission in the B-1 Category, 1990 Immigration & Nationality L.Rev. 363—367
- Fragomen, Austin T. & Robosson, Gwendolyn M., The Foreign Investor: Current Ap-

- proaches Toward United States Immigration Law*, 18 Vanderbilt J. Transnat'l L. 335 (1985)—345
- Francis, John J., Failure to Advise Non-Citizens of Immigration Consequences of Criminal Convictions: Should This Be Grounds to Withdraw a Guilty Plea?, 36 Univ. Michigan J. L. Reform 691 (2003)—556
- Franck, Thomas M., Clan and Superclan: Loyalty, Identity and Community in Law and Practice, 90 Amer. J. Internat'l L. 359 (1996)—1318, 1319
- Freeman, Gary P. & Birrell, Bob, Divergent Paths of Immigration Politics in the United States and Australia, 27 Population & Development Rev. 525 (2001)—93
- Frelick, Bill, "Abundantly Clear": Refoulement, 19 Georgetown Immigration L.J. 245 (2005)—1084
- Frelick, Bill, North America Considers Agreement to Deflect Asylum Seekers, 7 BIB 1404 (Nov. 15, 2002)—1051
- Frelick, Bill, U.S. Detention of Asylum Seekers: What's the Problem? What's the Solution?, 10 BIB 159 (Apr. 1, 2005)—1057
- Frelick, Bill, Who's on First? The Canada-U.S. Memorandum of Agreement on Asylum, 73 IR 217 (Feb. 26, 1996)—1050
- Frenzen, Niels W., National Security and Procedural Fairness: Secret Evidence and the Immigration Laws, 76 IR 1677 (Nov. 22, 1999)—836, 837, 838
- Frickey, Philip P., Domesticating Federal Indian Law, 81 Minnesota L.Rev. 31 (1996)—150
- Friedland, Bernard & Epps, Valerie, The Changing Family and the U.S. Immigration Laws: The Impact of Medical Reproductive Technology on the Immigration and Nationality Act's Definition of the Family, 11 Georgetown Immigration L.J. 429 (1997)—295
- Frisch, Max, Überfremdung I, Schweiz als Heimat? (1990)—371
- Fullerton, Maryellen, A Comparative Look at Refugee Status Based on Persecution Due to Membership in a Particular Social Group, 26 Cornell Internat'l L.J. 505 (1993)—937
- Fullerton, Maryellen, Cuban Exceptionalism: Migration and Asylum in Spain and the United States, 35 Inter-American L. Rev. 527 (2004)—167
- Fullerton, Maryellen, Failing the Test: Germany Leads Europe in Dismantling Refugee Protection, 36 Texas Internat'l L.J. 231 (2001)—1046
- Fullerton, Maryellen, Hungary, Refugees, and the Law of Return, 8 Internat'l J. Refugee L. 499 (1996)—887
- Fullerton, Maryellen, Inadmissible in Iberia: The Fate of Asylum Seekers in Spain and Portugal, 17 Internat'l J. Refugee L. 659 (2005)—1052
- Fullerton, Maryellen, Persecution Due to Membership in a Particular Social Group: Jurisprudence in the Federal Republic of Germany, 4 Georgetown Immigration L.J. 381 (1990)—937
- Fullerton, Maryellen & Kinigstein, Noah, Strategies for Ameliorating the Immigration Consequences of Criminal Convictions: A Guide for Defense Attorneys, 23 American Criminal L.Rev. 425 (1986)—549, 550
- Fullerton, Maryellen & Nafziger, James A.R., Draft Declaration on Internally Displaced Persons, in Immigration Law Conference, Scholarship Panels Works in Progress 187-95 (1996)—890
- Gabor, Francis A., Reflections on the Freedom of Movement in Light of the Dismantled "Iron Curtain," 65 Tulane L. Rev. 849 (1991)—1129
- Gabor, Francis A., The Immigration Reform and Control Act of 1986: An Analysis in the Light of Contemporary International Law, 23 Internat'l Lawyer 485 (1989)—1129
- Gagné, Chris, POTA: Lessons Learned from India's Anti-Terror Act, 25 Boston College Third World L. Rev. 261 (2005)—867
- Gallagher, Anna Marie, Immigration Consequences of Criminal Convictions: Protecting Your Client's Immigration Interests in Criminal Proceedings, April 2001 Immigration Briefings—549, 552
- Gallagher, Anna Marie, Practice and Procedure Before the Board of Immigration Appeals: An Update, Feb. 2003 Immigration Briefings—744, 745
- Gallagher, Anna Marie, Remedies of Last Resort: Private Bills and Pardons, Feb. 2006 Immigration Briefings—627
- Gallagher, Anna Marie, The Situation of Undocumented Immigrants in the United States, June 2005 Immigration Briefings—1142
- Gallagher, Anna Marie, Triply Exploited: Female Victims of Trafficking Networks—Strategies for Pursuing Protection and Legal Status in Countries of Destination, 19 Georgetown Immigration L.J. 99 (2004)—1156
- Galloway, J. Donald, Immigration Law (1997)—291
- Galloway, J. Donald, The Dilemmas of Canadian Citizenship Law, 13 Georgetown Immigration L.J. 201 (1999)—1374, 1396
- Gandada, Patricia & Contreras, Frances, The Latino Educational Crisis: The Consequences of Failed Social Policies (2009)—65
- Garcia, Juan R., Operation Wetback, The Mass Deportation of Mexican Undocumented Workers in 1954 (1980)—377

- Garcia, Ruben J., Across the Borders: Immigrant Status and Identity in Law and LatCrit Theory, 55 Fla. L. Rev. 511 (2003)—1171
- Garcia, Ruben J., Ghost Workers in an Interconnected World: Going Beyond the Dichotomies of Domestic Immigration and Labor Laws, 36 Univ. Michigan J. L. Reform 737 (2003)—1212
- Garcia, Ruben J., Labor as Property: Guestworkers, International Trade, and the Democracy Deficit, 10 J. Gender, Race & Justice 27 (2006)—378
- Garcia, Ruben J., Labor's Fragile Freedom of Association Post-9/11, 8 Univ. Penn. J. Labor & Employment L. 283 (2006)—1223
- Garis, Roy L., Immigration Restriction (1927)—35
- Gee, Harvey, Asian Americans, the Law, and Illegal Immigration to Post-Civil Rights America: A Review of Three Books, 77 Univ. Detroit Mercy L. Rev. 71 (1999)—109
- Gerety, Tom, Children in the Labyrinth: The Complexities of Plyler v. Doe, 44 Univ. Pittsburgh L. Rev. 379 (1983)—1208
- Germain, Regina, Perspectives on the Bush Administration's New Immigrant Guestworker Proposal, 32 Denver J. Internat'l L. & Policy 747 (2004)—1142
- Germain, Regina, Putting the "Form" in Immigration Court Reform, 84 Denver L. Rev. 1145 (2007)—654
- Gibney, Mark (ed.), Open Borders? Closed Societies? The Ethical and Political Issues (1988)—31
- Gibson, Paul, Gay Male and Lesbian Youth Suicide, 3 Report of the Secretary's Task Force on Youth Suicide 110 (Jan.1989)—281
- Gilbert, Lauren, Facing Justice: Ethical Choices in Representing Immigrant Clients, 20 Georgetown J. Legal Ethics 219 (2007)—416
- Gilbert, Lauren, Fields of Hope, Fields of Despair: Legisprudential and Historic Perspectives on the Agjobs Bill of 2003, 42 Harvard J. Legislation 417 (2005)—383
- Gilbert, Lauren, National Identity and Immigration Policy in the U.S. and the European Union, 14 Columbia J. European L. 99 (2007)—63, 1185
- Gilbert, Lauren, When Democracy Dies Behind Closed Doors: The First Amendment and "Special Interest" Hearings, 55 Rutgers L. Rev. 741 (2003)—836
- Gilboy, Janet A., Implications of "Third-Party" Involvement in Enforcement: The INS, Illegal Travelers, and International Airlines, 31 L. & Society Rev. 505 (1997)—504
- Gladstein, Hannah et al., Blurring the Lines: A Profile of State and Local Police Enforcement of Immigration Law Using the National Crime Information Center Database, 2002-2004 (Migration Policy Institute 2005)—1278
- Goddard, Christopher, Valuing Citizenship: The Case for Retaining a Citizenship-Based Electorate (unpublished student seminar paper, Washington University, 2005)—1376
- Gold, Eric, Leyes del "Inglés Solamente" ("English-Only Laws") (unpublished seminar paper, 2003)—70
- Goldberg, Pamela, Analytical Approaches in Search of Consistent Application: A Comparative Analysis of the Second Circuit Decisions Addressing Gender in the Asylum Law Context, 66 Brooklyn L. Rev. 309 (2000)—999
- Goldberg, Pamela, Anyplace But Home: Asylum in the United States for Women Fleeing Intimate Violence, 26 Cornell Internat'l L.J. 565 (1993)—945, 975
- Goldberg, Pamela, Women and Refugee Status: A Review Essay, 7 Internat'l J. Refugee L. 756 (1995)—945
- Goldberg, Pamela & Cissé, Bernadette Pasade, Gender Issues in Asylum Law after Matter of R.A., Feb. 2000 Immigration Briefings—975
- Gomez, Iris, The Consequences of Nonappearance: Interpreting New Section 242B of the Immigration and Nationality Act, 30 San Diego L.Rev. 75 (1993)—811
- González-Baker, Susan et al., Tomás Rivera Institute, The Making of Americans—Results of the Texas Naturalization Survey, Policy Brief (Aug. 2000)—1304
- Goodman, Ryan, Note, The Incorporation of International Human Rights Standards into Sexual Orientation Asylum Claims: Cases of Involuntary "Medical" Intervention, 105 Yale L.J. 255 (1995)—902, 943
- Goodwin-Gill, Guy S., Article 31 of the 1951 Convention Relating to the Status of Refugees: Non-penalization, Detention and Protection, in Erika Feller et al. (eds.), Refugee Protection in International Law: UNHCR's Global Consultations on International Protection, at 185 et seq. (2003)—1058
- Goodwin-Gill, Guy S., International Law and the Movement of Persons Between States (1978)—12, 148, 1120
- Goodwin-Gill, Guy S., Judicial Reasoning and Social Group after Islam and Shah, 11 Internat'l J. Refugee L. 537 (1999)—996
- Goodwin-Gill, Guy S., Non-Refoulement and the New Asylum Seekers, 26 Virginia J. Internat'l L. 897 (1986)—1130
- Goodwin-Gill, Guy S., The Obligations of States and the Protection Function of the Office of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees, 1982 Michigan Yearbook Internat'l Legal Studies 291—1013

- Goodwin-Gill, Guy S., Unaccompanied Refugee Minors: The Role and Place of International Law in the Pursuit of Durable Solutions, 3 Internat'l J. Children's Rights 405 (1995)—1034
- Goodwin-Gill, Guy S. & McAdam, Jane, The Refugee in International Law (3rd ed. 2007)—868, 877, 1120
- Gordon, Charles, Recent Developments in Judicial Review of Immigration Cases, 15 San Diego L.Rev. 9 (1977)—487
- Gordon, Charles, The Citizen and the State: Power of Congress to Expatriate American Citizens, 53 Georgetown L. Rev. 315 (1965)—1290, 1356, 1358-59
- Gordon, Charles, The Marriage Fraud Act of 1986, 4 Georgetown Immigration L.J. 183 (1990)—288
- Gordon, Charles, Who Can Be President of the United States: The Unresolved Enigma, 28 Maryland L. Rev. 1 (1968)—1289
- Gordon, Charles, Mailman, Stanley, & Yale-Loehr, Stephen, Immigration Law and Procedure (revised periodically)—14, 299, 301, 358, 367-68, 371, 481, 516, 539, 569, 625, 630, 638, 653, 868, 885, 1118, 1288, 1289, 1290, 1296, 1299, 1305, 1306, 1307, 1314, 1319
- Gordon, Howard W. & Morowitz, Nancy H., Special Registration: A Nightmare for Foreign Visitors, Immigration Law Today, at 42 et seq. (Mar/Apr 2003)—825
- Gordon, Jennifer, Suburban Sweatshops—The Fight for Immigrant Rights (2005)—1233, 1238
- Gordon, Jennifer, Transnational Labor Citizenship, 80 Southern Calif. L. Rev. 503 (2007)—1233
- Gordon, Jennifer & Lenhardt, R.A., Citizenship Talk: Bridging the Gap Between Race and Immigration Perspectives, 75 Fordham L. Rev. 2493 (2007)—61, 1396
- Gordon, Jennifer & Lenhardt, R.A., Rethinking Work and Citizenship, 55 UCLA L. Rev. 1161 (2008)—96
- Gotanda, Neil, "Other Non-Whites" in American Legal History: A Review of Justice at War, 85 Columbia L. Rev. 1186 (1985)—109
- Goyle, Rajeev & Jaeger, David A., Center for American Progress, Deporting the Undocumented—A Cost Assessment (July 2005)—1147
- Gragert, Michael D. & Harvey, Kathleen, Asylum Granted in "Honor Killing" Case, 7 BIB 513 (May 1, 2002)—946
- Grahl-Madsen, Atle, The Status of Refugees in International Law (1966 & 1972)—868, 1120
- Grant, Edward R., Laws of Intended Consequences: IIRIRA and Other Unsung Contributors to the Current State of Immigration Litigation, 55 Catholic Univ. L. Rev. 923 (2006)—745
- Graves, Maureen, From Definition to Exploration: Social Groups and Political Asylum Eligibility, 20 San Diego L.Rev. 740 (1989)—902, 903
- Greatbatch, Jacqueline, The Gender Difference: Feminist Critiques of Refugee Discourse, 1 Internat'l J. Refugee L. 518 (1989)—946
- Green, Brian S., *Circuit Courts Split on Mens Rea Requirement after *Leocal v. Ashcroft, Immigration Law Today at 8 et seq. (July/August 2006)—582
- Green, Richard, The "Sissy Boy Syndrome" and the Development of Homosexuality (1987)—278
- Greenberg, David F., The Construction of Homosexuality (1988)—278
- Greer, Anne J. & Donovan, Teresa L., "Conviction" as Defined Under the Immigration and Nationality Act: An Evolving Meaning, Mar. 2006 Immigration Briefings—557
- Griffith, Elwin, Admission and Cancellation of Removal under the Immigration and Nationality Act, 2005 Michigan State L. Rev. 979—543
- Griffith, Elwin, Asylum and Withholding of Deportation—Challenges to the Alien After the Refugee Act of 1980, 12 Loyola L.A. Internat'l & Comp. L.J. 515 (1990)—892, 1005
- Griffith, Elwin, Deportation and the Refugee, 1982 Michigan Yearbook Internat'l Legal Studies 125—891
- Griffith, Elwin, Expatriation and the American Citizen, 31 Howard L.J. 453 (1988)—1359
- Griffith, Elwin, The Road between the Section 212(c) Waiver and Cancellation of Removal under Section 240A of the Immigration and Nationality Act—The Impact of the 1996 Reform Legislation, 12 Georgetown Immigration L.J. 65 (1997)—595
- Griffith, Elwin, The Transition Between Suspension of Deportation and Cancellation of Removal for Nonpermanent Residents under the Immigration and Nationality Act: The Impact of the 1996 Reform Legislation, 48 Drake L. Rev. 79 (1999)—602
- Grunwald, Henry, Home is Where You Are Happy, Time (July 8, 1985)—98
- Guendelsberger, John W., Access to Citizenship for Children Born within the State to Foreign Parents, 40 Amer. J. Comparative L. 379 (1992)—1335
- Guendelsberger, John W., Equal Protection and Resident Alien Access to Public Benefits in France and the United States, 67 Tulane L. Rev. 669 (1993)—1374
- Guendelsberger, John W., Implementing Family Unification Rights in American Immigration Law: Proposed Amendments, 25 San Diego L.Rev. 253 (1988)—302
- Guendelsberger, John W., Judicial Deference to Agency Decisions in Removal Proceed-

- ings in Light of INS v. Ventura, 18 Georgetown Immigration L.J. 605 (2005)—521
- Guendelsberger, John W., The Right to Family Reunification in French and United States Immigration Law, 21 Cornell Internat'l L.J. 1 (1988)—302
- Guild, Elspeth, The Impetus to Harmonize: Asylum Policy in the European Union, in Frances Nicholson & Patrick Twomey (eds.), Refugee Rights and Realities, at 313 et seq. (1999)—1044
- Gulasekaram, Pratheepan, Aliens with Guns: Equal Protection, Federal Power, and the Second Amendment, 92 Iowa L. Rev. 891 (2007)—1374
- Gunning, Isabelle R., Arrogant Perception, World-Travelling and Multicultural Feminism: The Case of Female Genital Surgeries, 23 Columbia Human Rights L.Rev. 189 (1992)—970
- Gunning, Isabelle R., Expanding the International Definition of Refugee: A Multicultural View, 13 Fordham Internat'l L.J. 35 (1989-90)—1119-20
- Gunning, Isabelle R., Global Feminism at the Local Level: Criminal and Asylum Laws Regarding Female Genital Surgeries, 3 J. Gender, Race & Justice 45 (1999)—971
- Gunning, Isabelle R., Modernizing Customary International Law and the Challenge of Human Rights, 31 Virginia J. Internat'l L. 301 (1991)—1120, 1129
- Gunther, Gerald & Sullivan, Kathleen M., Constitutional Law (13th ed. 1997)—1192
- Gyory, Andrew, Closing the Gate—Race, Politics, and the Chinese Exclusion Act (1998)—129
- Hailbronner, Kay, Fifty Years of the Basic Law—Migration, Citizenship and Asylum, 53 Southern Methodist Univ. L. Rev. 519 (2000)—14
- Hailbronner, Kay, Labor Transfer Schemes—In Whose National Interest? Globalization and the Transfer of Labor—The European Experience, 16 Georgetown Immigration L.J. 773 (2002)—343, 376
- Hailbronner, Kay, New Techniques for Rendering Asylum Manageable, in 4 Kay Hailbronner, David A. Martin & Hiroshi Motomura (eds.), Immigration Controls, at 59 et seq. (1998)—1044
- Hailbronner, Kay, Non-Refoulement and "Humanitarian" Refugees: Customary International Law or Wishful Legal Thinking?, 26 Virginia J. Internat'l L. 857 (1986)—1130
- Hailbronner, Kay, The Concept of "Safe Country" and Expeditious Asylum Procedures: A Western European Perspective, 5 Internat'l J. Refugee L. 31 (1993)—1045, 1046
- Hailbronner, Kay, Martin, David A., & Motomura, Hiroshi (eds.), Immigration Controls (1998)—1044
- Haines, David W. & Rosenblum, Karen E. (eds.), Illegal Immigration in America—A Reference Handbook (1999)—1141
- Hake, Bruce A., "Attorney Misconduct"—A Rebuttal, 4 Georgetown Immigration L.J. 727 (1990)—318, 688
- Hake, Bruce A., Dual Representation in Immigration Practice: The Simple Solution is the Wrong Solution, 5 Georgetown Immigration L.J. 581 (1991)—321
- Hall, Lee, Aliens on Spaceship Earth: The Controversial Sierra Club Elections, 10 BIB 1091 (July 1, 2005)—90
- Hall, Lee, Nomads under the Tent of Blue: Migrants Fuel the U.S. Prison Industry, 6 Rutgers Race & L. Rev. 265 (2004)—820
- Hall, Lee, Shackles and Shareholders: Developments in the Business of Immigration Detentions, 9 BIB 394 (Apr. 1, 2004)—820
- Hall, Lee, Update to "Shackles and Shareholders: Developments in the Business of Immigration Detentions," 9 BIB 565 (May 1, 2004)—820
- Hammar, Tomas, Democracy and the Nation State (1990)—1317
- Hammar, Tomas, State, Nation, and Dual Citizenship, in William R. Brubaker (ed.), Immigration and the Politics of Citizenship in Europe and North America, at 81 et seq. (1989)—1317, 1319
- Hammond, Denise C., Immigration and Sexual Orientation: Developing Standards, Options and Obstacles, 77 IR 113 (Jan. 24, 2000)—281
- Hansen, Randall et al., Report on the Workshop on Refugee and Asylum Policy in Practice in Europe and North America, 14 Georgetown Immigration L.J. 801 (2000)—1028
- Hansen, Randall & Weil, Patrick, Dual Nationality, Social Rights and Federal Citizenship in the U.S. and Europe (2002)—1318
- Hansen, Randall & Weil, Patrick (eds.), Towards a European Nationality—Citizenship, Immigration and Nationality Law in the EU (2001)—1396
- Hanson, Gordon H., The Economic Logic of Illegal Immigration, Council Special Report No. 26, Council on Foreign Relations (April 2007)—1143
- Hart, Henry, The Power of Congress to Limit the Jurisdiction of the Federal Courts: An Exercise in Dialectic, 66 Harvard L.Rev. 1362 (1953)—163, 756, 771
- Harvard Law Student Advocates for Human Rights & Centro de Justico Global, Keeping the Peace in Haiti? (Mar. 2005)—1081
- Hathaway, James C., A Reconsideration of the Underlying Premise of Refugee Law, 31 Harvard Internat'l L.J. 129 (1990)—869

- Hathaway, James C., International Refugee Law: The Michigan Guidelines on the Internal Protection Alternative, 21 Michigan J. Internat'l L. 131 (1999)—1000
- Hathaway, James C., The Causal Nexus in International Refugee Law, 23 Michigan J. Internat'l L. 207 (2002)—988
- Hathaway, James C., The Law of Refugee Status (1991)—868, 902, 1120
- Hathaway, James C., The Michigan Guidelines on Protection Elsewhere, Adopted January 3, 2007, 28 Michigan J. Internat'l L. 207 (2007)—1047
- Hathaway, James C., The Relationship Between Human Rights and Refugee Law: What Refugee Law Judges Can Contribute, 8 Human Rights & Refugee L. 80 (1998)—902
- Hathaway, James C., The Right of States to Repatriate Former Refugees, 20 Ohio State J. Dispute Resolution 175 (2005)—888
- Hathaway, James C., The Rights of Refugees under International Law (2005)—868, 1120
- Hathaway, James C., Who Should Watch Over Refugee Law?, 14 Forced Migration Rev. 23 (2002)—879
- Hathaway, James C. & Cusick, Anne K., Refugee Rights Are Not Negotiable, 14 Georgetown Immigration L.J. 481 (2000)—1001
- Hathaway, James C. & Foster, Michelle, The Causal Connection ("Nexus") to a Convention Ground, 15 Internat'l J. Refugee L. 461 (2003)—988
- Hathaway, James C. & Harvey, Colin J., Framing Refugee Protection in the New World Disorder, 34 Cornell Internat'l L.J. 257 (2001)—1016
- Hathaway, James C. & Hicks, William S., Is There a Subjective Element in the Refugee Convention's Requirement of "Well-Founded Fear?", 26 Michigan J. Internat'l L. 505 (2005)—901
- Hathaway, James C. & Neve, R. Alexander, Making International Refugee Law Relevant Again: A Proposal for Collectivized and Solution-Oriented Protection, 10 Harvard Human Rights J. 115 (1997)—889
- Hawley, D.L., Gays, Lesbians and Immigration, August 1999 Immigration Briefings—273
- Haycraft, Thomas W., Alien Legislation and the Prerogative of the Crown, 13 L.Q. Rev. 165 (1897)—248
- Haynes, Dina Francesca, (Not) Found Chained to a Bed in a Brothel: Conceptual, Legal, and Procedural Failures to Fulfill the Promise of the Trafficking Victims Protection Act, 21 Georgetown Immigration L.J. 337 (2007)—1156
- Haynes, Dina Francesca, Used, Arrested and Deported: Extending Immigration Benefits to Protect the Victims of Trafficking and to Secure the Prosecution of Traffickers, 26 Human Rights Q. 221 (2004)—1156
- Hebrew Immigrant Aid Society, Faithful but Forsaken: Real ID Act Harms Victims of Religious Persecution (Jan. 24, 2005)—917
- Helton, Arthur C., Persecution on Account of Membership in a Social Group as a Basis for Refugee Status, 15 Columbia Human Rights L. Rev. 39 (1983)—932
- Helton, Arthur C., Political Asylum under the 1980 Refugee Act: An Unfulfilled Promise, 17 Univ. Michigan J. L. Reform 243 (1984)—1013, 1014
- Helton, Arthur C., Reconciling the Power to Bar or Expel Aliens on Political Grounds with Fairness and the Freedoms of Speech and Association: An Analysis of Recent Legislative Proposals, 11 Fordham Internat'l L.J. 467 (1988)—438
- Helton, Arthur C., Resistance to Military Conscription or Forced Recruitment by Insurgents as a Basis for Refugee Protection: A Comparative Perspective, 29 San Diego L. Rev. 581 (1992)—924
- Helton, Arthur C., The CIS Migration Conference: A Chance to Prevent and Ameliorate Forced Movements of People in the Former Soviet Union, 8 Internat'l J. Refugee L. 169 (1996)—890
- Helton, Arthur C., The Price of Indifference—Refugees and Humanitarian Action in the New Century (2002)—869
- Helton, Arthur C., The Proper Role of Discretion in Political Asylum Determinations, 22 San Diego L. Rev. 999 (1985)—1025
- Helton, Arthur C. & Nicoll, Alison, Female Genital Mutilation as Ground for Asylum in the United States: The Recent Case of In re Fauziya Kasinga and Prospects for More Gender Sensitive Approaches, 28 Columbia Human Rights L. Rev. 375 (1997)—967
- Henkin, Louis et al., Human Rights (1999)—1083, 1138
- Henkin, Louis, Foreign Affairs and the Constitution (1972)—124, 130
- Hernández López, Ernesto, Sovereignty Migrates in U.S. and Mexican Law: Transnational Influences in Plenary Power and Non-Intervention, 40 Vanderbilt J. Transnat'l L. 1345 (2007)—221
- Hernandez-Truyol, Berta Esperanza, Borders (En)gendered: Normativities, Latinas, and the LatCrit Paradigm, 72 NYU L. Rev. 882 (1997)—108
- Hernández-Truyol, Berta Esperanza, Building Bridges: Bringing International Human Rights Home, 9 La Raza L.J. 69 (1996)—96
- Hernández-Truyol, Berta Esperanza, Building Bridges—Latinas and Latinos at the Crossroads: Realities, Rhetoric and Replacement, 25 Columbia Human Rights L. Rev. 369 (1994)—96

- Hernández-Truyol, Berta Esperanza, Building Bridges III: Personal Narratives, Incoherent Paradigms, and Plural Citizens, 19 Chicano-Latino L. Rev. 303 (1998)—96
- Hernández-Truyol, Berta Esperanza, Glocalizing Terror, 81 Oregon L. Rev. 941 (2002)—866
- Hernández-Truyol, Berta Esperanza, Natives, Newcomers and Nativism: A Human Rights Model for the Twenty-First Century, 23 Fordham Urban L.J. 1075 (1996)—102
- Hernández-Truyol, Berta Esperanza, Nativism, Terrorism, and Human Rights: The Global Wrongs of Reno v. American-Arab Anti-Discrimination Committee, 31 Columbia Human Rights L. Rev. 521 (2000)—92-93
- Hernández-Truyol, Berta Esperanza, On Becoming the Other: Cubans, Castro, and Elian—A LatCritical Analysis, 78 Denver Univ. L. Rev. 687 (2001)—1036
- Hernández-Truyol, Berta Esperanza, Querying Lawrence, 65 Ohio State L.J. 1151 (2004)—279
- Hernandez-Truyol, Berta Esperanza & Johns, Kimberly A., Global Rights, Local Wrongs, and Legal Fixes: An International Human Rights Critique of Immigration and Welfare "Reform," 71 Southern California L. Rev. 547 (1998)—244, 1380
- Hernández-Truyol, Berta Esperanza & Luna, Justin, Children and Immigration: International, Local, and Social Responsibilities, 15 Boston Univ. Public Interest L.J. 297 (2006)—1035
- Heyman, Michael G., Asylum, Social Group Membership and the Non-State Actor: The Challenge of Domestic Violence, 36 Univ. Michigan J. L. Reform 767 (2003)—937
- Heyman, Michael G., Domestic Violence and Asylum: Toward a Working Model of Affirmative State Obligations, 17 Internat'l J. Refugee L. 729 (2005)—983
- Heyman, Michael G., Immigration Law in the Supreme Court: The Flagging Spirit of the Law, 28 J. of Legislation 113 (2002)—617
- Heyman, Michael G., Language and Silence: The Supreme Court's Search for the Meaning of American Denaturalization Law, 5 Georgetown Immigration L.J. 409 (1991)—1355
- Heyman, Michael G., Redefining Refugee: A Proposal for Relief for the Victims of Civil Strife, 24 San Diego L.Rev. 449 (1987)—1115
- Higham, John, Send These to Me: Immigrants in Urban America (rev. ed. 1984)—458
- Hing, Bill Ong, Answering Challenges of the New Immigrant-Driven Diversity: Considering Integration Strategies, 40 Univ. Louisville Brandeis L.J. 861 (2002)—64
- Hing, Bill Ong, Beyond the Rhetoric of Assimilation and Cultural Pluralism: Addressing the Tension of Separatism and Conflict in an Immigration-Driven Multiracial Society, 81 California L. Rev. 863 (1993)—351
- Hing, Bill Ong, Detention to Deportation—Rethinking the Removal of Cambodian Refugees, 38 U.C. Davis L. Rev. 891 (2005)—890
- Hing, Bill Ong, Estoppel in Immigration Proceedings—New Life from Akbarin and Miranda, 20 San Diego L.Rev. 11 (1982)—646
- Hing, Bill Ong, Immigration Policies: Messages of Exclusion to African Americans, 37 Howard L.J. 237 (1994)—94, 96, 348
- Hing, Bill Ong, Immigration Policy: Thinking Outside the (Big) Box, 39 Connecticut L. Rev. 1401 (2007)—1141
- Hing, Bill Ong, Legal Services Support Centers and Rebellious Advocacy: A Case Study of the Immigrant Legal Resource Center, 28 Washington Univ. J. L. & Policy 265 (2008)—682
- Hing, Bill Ong, Making and Remaking Asian America Through Immigration Policy, 1850-1990 (1993)—129, 890
- Hing, Bill Ong, No Place for Angels: In Reaction to Kevin Johnson, 2000 Univ. Illinois L. Rev. 559—92, 109-10, 874
- Hing, Bill Ong, Refugee Policy and Cultural Identity: In the Voice of Hmong and Iu Mein Young Adults, 1 Race & Poverty L.J. 111 (2003)—110
- Hing, Bill Ong, The Case for Amnesty, 3 Stanford Journal of Civil Rights & Civil Liberties 233 (2007)—1185
- Hing, Bill Ong, The Dark Side of Operation Gatekeeper, 7 U.C. Davis J. Internat'l L. & Policy 121 (2001)—1148
- Hing, Bill Ong, The Economic Impact of Immigration: A Brief Survey of the Literature (1989)—71, 1143
- Hing, Bill Ong, The Emma Lazarus Effect: A Case Study in Philanthropic Revitalization of the Immigrant Rights Community, 15 Georgetown Immigration L.J. 47 (2001)—1380
- Hing, Bill Ong, Vigilante Racism: The De-Americanization of Immigrant America, 7 Michigan J. Race & Law 441 (2002)—110
- Hirson, David & Mayou, Catherine I., The Sinking of the Titanic or the Rising of the Phoenix?—An Update on Immigrant Investor Visas, September 1998 Immigration Briefings—347
- Hollifield, James F. & Osang, Thomas, Trade and Migration in North America: The Role of NAFTA, 11 Law & Business Rev. of the Americas 327 (2005)—1232
- Holy Bible, Leviticus—1287
- Hopper, Robert & Osuna, Juan P., Remedies of Last Resort: Private Bills and Deferred Action, June 1997 Immigration Briefings—627, 628, 632

- Horne, Daniel C., Requests for Evidence, 8 BIB 1626 (Oct. 15, 2003)—373
- Hudson, David M., Tax Problems for Departing Aliens, March 1997 Immigration Briefings—1372
- Hughes, Joyce A., Flight from Cuba, 36 Calif. Western L. Rev. 39 (1999)—168, 887, 1031
- Hughes, Joyce A. & Crane, Linda P., Haitians: Seeking Refuge in the United States, 7 Georgetown Immigration L.J. 747 (1993)—1079
- Hull, Elizabeth, Without Justice For All—The Constitutional Rights of Aliens (1985)—886
- Human Rights First, In Liberty's Shadow—U.S. Detention of Asylum Seekers in the Era of Homeland Security (2004)—1057
- Human Rights Watch & Lawyers Committee for Human Rights, Critique—Review of the Department of State's Country Reports on Human Rights Practices for 1987 (1988)—1011
- Huntington, Clare, The Constitutional Dimension of Immigration Federalism, 61 Vanderbilt L. Rev. 787 (2008)—132, 1242, 1255, 1277
- Hurwitz, Agnes, The Dublin Convention: A Comprehensive Assessment, 11 Internat'l J. Refugee L. 646 (1999)—1046
- Hutchins, Thomas, Detention of Aliens: An Overview of Current Law, April 2003 Immigration Briefings—220
- Ignatius, Sarah B. & Stickney, Elisabeth S., Immigration Law and the Family (1995, continually updated)—261
- Institute for Global Legal Studies, The UN and the Protection of Human Rights, 5 Washington Univ. J. Law & Policy [symposium issue] (2001)—1138
- Institute for the Study of International Migration of Georgetown University & European Forum for Migration Studies of Univ. of Bamberg, Transatlantic Workshop on Human Smuggling, 15 Georgetown Immigration L.J. 167 (2001)—1156
- Institute of International Education, Open Doors 2008: International Students in the United States (2008)—393, 394, 396
- Int'l Ass'n of Chiefs of Police, Police Chiefs Guide to Immigration Issues (2007)—1278
- Internat'l Lesbian & Gay Association, World Legal Survey, http://www.ilga.org/Information/legal_survey/summary_information_by_subject.htm—281
- Isaacson, David, We're All Entitled: The Literature and Cultural Significance of the Dictionary of Occupational Titles, 27 Reference Quarterly 226 (1987)—323
- Isgro, Francesco, Italy Enacts Law to Protect Basic Human Rights of Foreign Workers, 1 Georgetown Immigration L.J. 693 (1986)—1169, 1178
- Isgro, Francisco, Seeking Relief Under the Convention Against Torture, 27 Migration World #3 at 44 (1999)—1095
- Jacobson, Jon L., At-Sea Interception of Alien Migrants: International Law Issues, 28 Willamette L. Rev. 811 (1992)—1083
- James, Alan G., The Board of Appellate Review of the Department of State: The Right to Appellate Review of Administrative Determinations of Loss of Nationality, 23 San Diego L. Rev. 261 (1986)—1368, 1371
- Janis, Mark W., An Introduction to International Law (4th ed. 2003)—1096
- Jarvis, Robert J., Resting in Drydock: Stowaways, Shipowners and the Administrative Penalty Provision of INA Section 273(d), 13 Tulane Maritime L.J. 25 (1988)—1157
- Jastram, Kate, Considering the Circumstances: The Credibility of Prior Statements under the REAL ID Act, 10 BIB 1360 (Sept. 1, 2005)—1005
- Jastram, Kate & Newland, Kathleen, Family Unity and Refugee Protection, in Erika Feller et al (eds.), Refugee Protection in International Law at 555 et seq. (2003)—303
- Joaquin, Linton, The 1996 Immigration Act: Grounds of Inadmissibility and Deportability and Available Waivers, 73 IR 1641 (Nov. 25, 1996)—421
- Joaquin, Linton & Wheeler, Charles, Document Fraud Enforcement the Second Time Around: Will the Right Lessons Be Learned?, 78 IR 473 (Mar. 12, 2001)—1153
- Joe, Harry J., Ethics in Immigration Law: Immigration Benefit Fraud and the Peril of Conscious Avoidance, June 2002 Immigration Briefings—416
- Joe, Harry J., Temporary Entry of Business Persons to the United States under the North American Free Trade Agreement, 8 Georgetown Immigration L.J. 391 (1994)—387
- Johnson, Kevin R., A Handicapped, Not "Sleeping," Giant: The Devastating Impact of the Initiative Process on Latino and Immigrant Communities, 96 California L. Rev. 1259 (2008)—92
- Johnson, Kevin R., A "Hard Look" at the Executive Branch's Asylum Decisions, 1991 Utah L. Rev. 279—1043
- Johnson, Kevin R., "Aliens" and the U.S. Immigration Laws: The Social and Legal Construction of Nonpersons, 28 Univ. Miami Inter-Amer. L. Rev. 263 (1996-97)—1, 1140
- Johnson, Kevin R., Driver's Licenses and Undocumented Immigrants: The Future of Civil Rights Law?, 5 Nevada L.J. 213 (2004)—1226

- Johnson, Kevin R., Fear of an "Alien Nation": Race, Immigration and Immigrants, 7 Stanford L. & Policy Rev. 111 (1996)—50
- Johnson, Kevin R., Free Trade and Closed Borders: NAFTA and Mexican Immigration to the United States, 27 U.C. Davis L. Rev. 937 (1994)—387, 1232
- Johnson, Kevin R., How Did You Get to Be Mexican? (1999)—108
- Johnson, Kevin R., Hurricane Katrina: Lessons About Immigrants in the Administrative State, 45 Houston L. Rev. 11 (2008)—64
- Johnson, Kevin R., Immigration and Latino Identity, 19 Chicano-Latino L. Rev. 197 (1998)—108
- Johnson, Kevin R., International Human Rights Class Actions: New Frontiers for Group Litigation, 2004 Michigan State L. Rev. 643—377
- Johnson, Kevin R., Judicial Acquiescence to the Executive Branch's Pursuit of Foreign Policy and Domestic Agendas in Immigration Matters: The Case of the Haitian Asylum-Seekers, 7 Georgetown Immigration L.J. 1 (1993)—1080
- Johnson, Kevin R., Legal Immigration in the 21st Century, in Richard D. Lamm & Alan Simpson, Center for Immigration Studies, Blueprints for an Ideal Legal Immigration Policy, Center Paper 17 (March 2001), <http://cis.org/articles/2001/blueprints/toc.html>—37
- Johnson, Kevin R., Los Olvidados: Images of the Immigrant, Political Power of Noncitizens, and Immigration Law and Enforcement, 1993 Brigham Young Univ. L. Rev. 1139—93
- Johnson, Kevin R., Maria and Joseph Plasencia's Lost Weekend: The Case of Landon v. Plasencia, in David A. Martin & Peter H. Schuck (eds.), Immigration Stories, chap. 9 (2005)—165
- Johnson, Kevin R., "Melting Pot" or "Ring of Fire"?: Assimilation and the Mexican-American Experience, 85 California L. Rev. 1259 (1997)—63
- Johnson, Kevin R., Open Borders?, 51 UCLA L. Rev. 193 (2003)—32
- Johnson, Kevin R., Opening the Floodgates: Why America Needs to Eliminate its Borders and Rethink Immigration Law (2007)—37, 1232
- Johnson, Kevin R., Protecting National Security through More Liberal Admission of Immigrants, 2007 Univ. Chicago Legal Forum 157—866
- Johnson, Kevin R., Public Benefits and Immigration: The Intersection of Immigration Status, Ethnicity, Gender, and Class, 42 UCLA L. Rev. 1509 (1995)—1145, 1286
- Johnson, Kevin R., Race and Immigration Law and Enforcement: A Response to Is There a Plenary Power Doctrine?, 14 Georgetown Immigration L.J. 289 (2000)—241
- Johnson, Kevin R., Race Matters: Immigration Law and Policy Scholarship, Law in the Ivory Tower, and the Legal Indifference of the Race Critique, 2000 Univ. Illinois L. Rev. 525—111
- Johnson, Kevin R., Race, The Immigration Laws, and Domestic Race Relations: A "Magic Mirror" into the Heart of Darkness, 73 Indiana L.J. 1111 (1998)—62
- Johnson, Kevin R., Racial Hierarchy, Asian Americans and Latinos as "Foreigners" and Social Change: Is Law the Way to Go?, 76 Oregon L. Rev. 347 (1997)—109
- Johnson, Kevin R., Racial Profiling After September 11: The Department of Justice's 2003 Guidelines, 50 Loyola L. Rev. 67 (2004)—852
- Johnson, Kevin R., Responding to the Litigation Explosion: The Plain Meaning of Executive Branch Primacy over Immigration, 71 North Carolina L. Rev. 413 (1993)—187, 683
- Johnson, Kevin R., September 11 and Mexican Immigrants: Collateral Damage Comes Home, 52 DePaul L. Rev. 849 (2003)—815, 845
- Johnson, Kevin R., Something Old, Something New, Something Borrowed, Something Blue, in Juan F. Perea (ed.), Immigrants Out! The New Nativism and the Anti-Immigrant Impulse in the United States, at 165 et seq. (1997)—1286
- Johnson, Kevin R., The Antiterrorism Act, the Immigration Reform Act, and Ideological Regulation in the Immigration Laws: Important Lessons for Citizens and Noncitizens, 28 St. Mary's L.J. 833 (1997)—242, 442
- Johnson, Kevin R., The Case Against Race Profiling in Immigration Enforcement, 78 Washington Univ. L.Q. 675 (2000)—108, 845
- Johnson, Kevin R., The Case for African American and Latino Cooperation in Challenging Racial Profiling in Law Enforcement, 55 Florida L. Rev. 341 (2003)—96
- Johnson, Kevin R., The "Huddled Masses" Myth—Immigration and Civil Rights (2004)—13, 93
- Johnson, Kevin R. & Trujillo, Bernard, Immigration Reform, National Security After September 11, and the Future of North American Integration, 91 Minnesota L. Rev. 1369 (2007)—815
- Jones, Maldwyn A., American Immigration (1960)—35
- Juss, Satvinder Singh, Free Movement and the World Order, 16 Internat'l J. Refugee L. 289 (2004)—32
- Juss, Satvinder Singh, International Migration and Global Justice (2006)—37

- Juss, Satvinder Singh, Toward a Morally Legitimate Form of Refugee Law: The Uses of Cultural Jurisprudence, 11 Harvard Human Rights J. 311 (1998)—889
- Justman, Rob A., The Effects of AEDPA and IIRIRA on Ineffective Assistance of Counsel Claims for Failure to Advise Alien Defendants of Deportation Consequences of Pleading Guilty to an Aggravated Felony, 2004 Utah L. Rev. 701, reprinted, 10 BIB 73 (Feb. 1, 2005)—695
- Kalhan, Anil, Immigration Enforcement and Federalism After September 11, 2001, in Ariane Chebel d'Appollonia & Simon Reich (eds.), Immigration, Integration, and Security: America and Europe in Comparative Perspective (2008)—1239, 1280
- Kalhan, Anil, The Fourth Amendment and Privacy Implications of Interior Immigration Enforcement, 41 U.C. Davis L. Rev. 1137 (2008)—729, 1186
- Kälén, Walter, Committee on Refugee Procedures, International Law Association, Third Interim Report on Temporary Protection, in International Law Association, Report of the Sixty-Ninth Conference at 902 et seq. (2000)—1128
- Kälén, Walter, Non-State Agents of Persecution and the Inability of the State to Protect, 15 Georgetown Immigration L.J. 415 (2001)—973
- Kälén, Walter, Troubled Communication: Cross-Cultural Misunderstandings in the Asylum-Hearing, 20 Internat'l Migration Rev. 230 (1986)—1040
- Kanstrom, Daniel, Criminalizing the Undocumented: Ironic Boundaries of the Post-September 11th "Pale of Law," 29 No. Carolina J. Internat'l L. & Commercial Regulation 639 (2004)—549, 1280
- Kanstrom, Daniel, Dangerous Undertones of the New Nativism: Peter Brimelow and the Decline of the West, in Juan F. Perea, Immigrants Out! The New Nativism and the Anti-Immigrant Impulse in the United States, at 300 et seq. (1997)—64
- Kanstrom, Daniel, Deportation Nation—Outsiders in American History (2007)—516, 647
- Kanstrom, Daniel, Deportation, Social Control, and Punishment: Some Thoughts about Why Hard Cases Make Bad Laws, 113 Harvard L. Rev. 1890 (2000)—517, 549
- Kanstrom, Daniel, Hello Darkness: Involuntary Testimony and Silence as Evidence in Deportation Proceedings, 4 Georgetown Immigration L.J. 599 (1990)—730, 742, 743
- Kanstrom, Daniel, Judicial Review of Amnesty Denials: Must Aliens Bet Their Lives to Get into Court?, 25 Harvard Civil Rights—Civil Liberties L.Rev. 53, 97 (1990)—787
- Kanstrom, Daniel, Surrounding the Hole in the Doughnut: Discretion and Deference in U.S. Immigration Law, 71 Tulane L. Rev. 703 (1997)—647, 765
- Kanstrom, Daniel, The Better Part of Valor: The REAL ID Act, Discretion, and the "Rule" of Immigration Law, 51 New York Law School L. Rev. 161 (2006-07), reprinted, 12 BIB 530 (May 1, 2007)—765
- Kanstrom, Daniel, The Long, Complex, and Futile Deportation Saga of Carlos Marcello, in David A. Martin & Peter H. Schuck (eds.), Immigration Stories, chap. 5 (2005)—757
- Kanstrom, Daniel, Wer Sind Wir Wieder? Laws of Asylum, Immigration, and Citizenship in the Struggle for the Soul of the New Germany, 18 Yale J. Internat'l L. 155 (1993)—351
- Kaplan, Harvey & O'Sullivan, Maureen, The Role of the BIA in Reviewing Negative Credibility Findings: Circumventing the Well-Founded Fear Standard, 75 IR 1181 (Aug. 31, 1998)—1005
- Kaplan, Harvey, Immigration Marriage Fraud Practice Advisory, Feb. 1990 AILA Monthly Mailing 77—290
- Karlen, Arno, Homosexuality in History, in Judd Marmor, Homosexual Behavior—A Modern Reappraisal, at 75 et seq. (1980)—279, 280
- Karst, Kenneth L., Equality and Community: Lessons from the Civil Rights Era, 56 Notre Dame Lawyer 183 (1980)—33
- Kassindya, Fauziya & Bashir, Layli Miller, Do They Hear You When You Cry? (1999)—967
- Kelly, H. Ansgar, Dual Nationality, the Myth of Election, and a Kinder, Gentler State Department, 23 Univ. Miami Inter-American L.Rev. 421 (1991-92)—1317, 1367
- Kelly Hill, Linda, Holding the Due Process Line for Asylum, 36 Hofstra L. Rev. 85 (2007)—748
- Kelly, Linda, Domestic Violence Survivors: Surviving the Beatings of 1996, 11 Georgetown Immigration L.J. 303 (1997)—472
- Kelly, Linda, Family Planning: American Style, 52 Alabama L. Rev. 943 (2001)—302
- Kelly, Linda, Preserving the Fundamental Right to Family Unity: Championing Notions of Social Contract and Community Ties in the Battle of Plenary Power versus Aliens' Rights, 41 Villanova L. Rev. 725 (1996)—115
- Kelly, Linda, Republican Mothers, Bastards' Fathers and Good Victims: Discarding Citizens and Equal Protection through the Failures of Legal Images, 51 Hastings L.J. 557 (2000)—189
- Kelly, Linda, Stories from the Front: Seeking Refuge for Battered Immigrants in the Vi-

- olence against Women Act, 92 Northwest-ern L. Rev. 665 (1998)—472, 473
- Kelly, Linda, The Alienation of Fathers, 6 Michigan J. Race & L. 181 (2000)—1298
- Kelly, Linda, The Fantastic Adventure of Supermom and the Alien: Educating Immigration Policy on the Facts of Life, 31 Connecticut L. Rev. 1045 (1999)—403
- Kelly, Nancy & Anker, Deborah E. (directing eds.), Refugee Law Center, 1 Gender Asylum Law in Different Countries—Decisions and Guidelines (1999)—945
- Kenney, David Ngaruri & Schrag, Philip G., Asylum Denied: A Refugee's Struggle for Safety in America (2008)—1029
- Kerwin, Donald M., Charitable Legal Immigration Programs: Can They Survive?, 74 IR 813 (May 19, 1997)—672
- Kerwin, Donald M., Charitable Legal Programs for Immigrants: What They Do, Why They Matter and How They Can Be Expanded, June 2004 Immigration Briefings—669
- Kerwin, Donald M., Don't Give Me Your Tired, Your Poor or Your Huddled Masses: The Impact of Pending Legislation, 73 IR 181 (Feb. 12, 1996)—672
- Kerwin, Donald M. & Wheeler, Charles, The Case for Legalization, Lessons from 1986, Recommendations for the Future, 12 BIB 138 (Feb. 1, 2007)—1185
- Kesselbrenner, Dan & Rosenberg, Lory D., National Lawyers Guild, Immigration Law and Crimes (originally published in 1984, updated periodically)—548-49, 552
- Kidane, Won, Committing a Crime While a Refugee: Rethinking the Issue of Deportation in Light of the Principle Against Double Jeopardy, 34 Hastings Const. L.Q. 383 (2007)—518
- Kidane, Won, Revisiting the Rules of Procedure and Evidence Applicable in Adversarial Administrative Deportation Proceedings: Lessons from the Department of Labor Rules of Evidence, 57 Catholic Univ. L. Rev. 93 (2007)—712
- Kidane, Won, The Challenges of Representing Detained Noncitizens in Expedited Removal Proceedings from the Perspective of the Dickinson School of Law Immigration Clinic, 17 Widener L.J. 391 (2008)—681, 1055
- Kidane, Won, The Terrorism Exception to Asylum: Managing the Uncertainty in Status Determination, 41 Univ. Michigan J. L. Reform 669 (2008)—1017
- King, Timothy, Immigration from Developing Countries: Some Philosophical Issues, 93 Ethics 525 (1983)—32
- Kittrie, Orde F., Federalism, Deportation, and Crime Victims Afraid to Call the Police, 91 Iowa L. Rev. 1449 (2006)—1280
- Kleven, Thomas, Why International Law Favors Emigration over Immigration, 33 U. Miami Inter-Amer. L. Rev. 69 (2002)—37
- Knauff, Ellen R., The Ellen Knauff Story (1952)—155
- Kneebone, Susan, Moving Beyond the State: Refugees, Accountability and Protection, in Susan Kneebone (ed.), The Refugee Convention 50 Years On: Globalisation and International Law, ch. 11 (2003)—973
- Kneebone, Susan (ed.), The Refugee Convention 50 Years On: Globalisation and International Law (2003)—973
- Kneebone, Susan, The Refugee Review Tribunal and the Assessment of Credibility: An Inquisitorial Role?, 5 Australian J. Administrative L. 78 (1998)—1008
- Kneebone, Susan, Women Within the Refugee Construct: 'Exclusionary Inclusion' in Policy and Practice—The Australian Experience, 17 Internat'l J. Refugee L. 7 (2005)—949
- Kneebone, Susan & Rawlings-Sanaei, Felicity (eds.), New Regionalism and Asylum Seekers—Challenges Ahead (2007)—1051
- Knight, Stephen M., Shielded from Review: The Questionable Birth and Development of the Asylum Standard of Review under Elias-Zacarias, 20 Georgetown Immigration L.J. 133 (2005)—1029
- Kobach, Kris W., Attrition through Enforcement: A Rational Approach to Illegal Immigration, 15 Tulsa J. Comparative & Internat'l L. 155 (2008)—1186
- Kobach, Kris W., Immigration Bill Rewards Lawbreaking, Human Events Online (Aug. 15, 2006), <http://www.humanevents.com/article.php?id=16505-1211>
- Kobach, Kris W., Immigration Nullification: In-State Tuition and Lawmakers Who Disregard the Law, 10 NYU J. Legislation & Public Policy 473 (2007)—1210
- Kobach, Kris W., Reinforcing the Rule of Law: What States Can and Should Do to Reduce Illegal Immigration, 22 Georgetown Immigration Law Journal 459 (2008)—1277, 1282
- Kobach, Kris W., The Quintessential Force Multiplier: The Inherent Authority of Local Police to Make Immigration Arrests, 69 Albany L. Rev. 179 (2005)—1280
- Koehler, Sean & Yale-Loehr, Stephen, National Interest Waiver Petitions for Researchers: Demonstrating a Measurable Impact on the Larger Field, 9 BIB 1341 (Nov. 15, 2004)—306
- Koh, Harold Hongju, Reflections on Resoulement and Haitian Centers Council, 35 Harvard Internat'l L.J. 1 (1994)—1083-84
- Koh, Harold Hongju, The "Haiti Paradigm" in United States Human Rights Policy, 103 Yale L.J. 2391 (1994)—1080, 1084
- Koh, Harold Hongju, The Human Face of the Haitian Interdiction Program, 33 Virginia J. Internat'l L. 483 (1993)—1084
- Kohli, Aarti & Sullivan, Kathleen M., Inter-country Adoption: A Practitioner's Update, July 2001 Immigration Briefings—301

- Kondo, Atsushi (ed.), Citizenship in a Global World—Comparing Citizenship Rights for Aliens (2001)—1374
- Konvitz, Milton R., The Alien and the Asiatic in American Law (1946)—128
- Kraly, Ellen Percy, Research Paper for the U.S. Commission on Immigration Reform, U.S. Immigration and the Environment: Scientific Research and Analytic Issues (1995)—89
- Kranc, Benjamin A., The New Canadian Immigration and Refugee Protection Act, 79 IR 1565 (Oct. 21, 2002)—347
- Kremer, James D., Moccio, Kathleen A. & Hammell, Joseph W., Severing a Lifeline: The Neglect of Citizen Children in America's Immigration Enforcement Policy, A Report by Dorsey & Whitney LLP to the Urban Institute (2009)—1151
- Krikorian, Mark, Downsizing Illegal Immigration—A Strategy of Attrition through Enforcement, CIS Backgrounder (May 2005)—1186
- Krikorian, Mark, Keeping Terror Out—Immigration Policy and Asymmetric Warfare, The National Interest (Spring 2004)—853
- Kritz, Mary M. (ed.), U.S. Immigration and Refugee Policy (1983)—872
- Kurzban, Ira J., A Critical Analysis of Refugee Law, 36 Univ. Miami L. Rev. 865 (1982)—1031
- Kurzban, Ira J., Kurzban's Immigration Law Sourcebook—A Comprehensive Outline and Reference Tool (9th ed. 2004)—868
- Kurzban, Ira J., Restructuring the Asylum Process, 19 San Diego L. Rev. 91 (1981)—1033, 1034, 1040
- Kwong, Peter, Forbidden Workers: Illegal Chinese Immigrants and American Labor (1999)—109
- Kyle, David & Koslowski, Rey (eds.), Global Human Smuggling: Comparative Perspectives (2001)—412, 1156
- LaFave, Wayne R., Criminal Law (4th ed. 2003)—1000, 1370
- Laglagaron, Laureen, Rodriguez, Cristina M., Silver, Alexa & Thanasombat, Sirithon, Regulating Immigration at the State Level, Migration Policy Institute Paper (2008), available at <http://www.migrationpolicy.org/pubs/2007methodology.pdf>—1237
- Lai, Him Mark et al., Island—Poetry and History of Chinese Immigrants on Angel Island 1910–40 (1986)—463
- Lam, Julie, Note, Show Me the Green: Civil RICO Actions against Employers Who Knowingly Hire Undocumented Workers, 84 Washington Univ. L. Rev. 717 (2006)—1168
- Lambert, Hélène, The European Court of Human Rights and the Right of Refugees and Other Persons in Need of Protection to Family Reunion, 11 Internat'l J. Refugee L. 427 (1999)—303, 1137
- Lamm, Richard D. & Simpson, Alan, Center for Immigration Studies, Blueprints for an Ideal Legal Immigration Policy (March 2001), <http://cis.org/articles/2001/blueprints/toc.html>—37, 260
- Lau, Estelle T., Excavating the "Chinese Wall": Towards a Socio-Historical Perspective on the Development of United States Immigration Administration and Chinese Exclusion, 92 Northwestern Univ. L. Rev. 1068 (1998)—109
- Law, Anna O., The Diversity Visa Lottery: A Cycle of Unintended Consequences in U.S. Immigration Policy, 21 J. Amer. Ethnic History, issue no. 4, at 3 et seq. (2002)—348
- Lawyer's Committee for Human Rights, Slamming "The Golden Door": A Year of Expedited Removal (1998)—1055
- Lawyers Committee for Human Rights, Refugee Refoulement: The Forced Return of Haitians Under the U.S.–Haitian Interdiction Agreement (Feb. 1990)—1062
- Lawyers Committee for Human Rights, The Alien Blacklist: A Dangerous Legacy of the McCarthy Era (1990)—441
- Lee, Stephen, Private Immigration Screening in the Workplace, 61 Stanford L. Rev. 1103 (2009)—1163
- Legomsky, Stephen H., An Asylum Seeker's Bill of Rights for a Non-Utopian World, 14 Georgetown Immigration L.J. 619 (2000)—1028
- Legomsky, Stephen H., Deportation and the War on Independence, 91 Cornell L. Rev. 369 (2006)—751, 754
- Legomsky, Stephen H., Dual Nationality and Military Service: Strategy Number Two, in David A. Martin & Kay Hailbronner (eds.), Rights and Duties of Dual Nationals: Evolution and Prospects, at 79 et seq. (2003)—1318, 1319
- Legomsky, Stephen H., E Pluribus Unum: Immigration, Race, and Other Deep Divides, 21 Southern Illinois Univ. L. Rev. 101 (1996)—94
- Legomsky, Stephen H., Emigration, Obligation, and Evil, 83 Univ. Detroit Mercy L. Rev. 849 (2006)—37, 1287
- Legomsky, Stephen H., Employer Sanctions: Past and Future, in Peter Duignan & Lewis H. Gann (eds.), The Debate in the United States over Immigration, chap. 6 (1998)—1162
- Legomsky, Stephen H., Forum Choices for the Review of Agency Adjudication: A Study of the Immigration Process, 71 Iowa L. Rev. 1297 (1986)—474, 744, 761
- Legomsky, Stephen H., Immigrants, Minorities, and Pluralism: What Kind of Society Do We Really Want?, 6 Willamette J. Internat'l L. & Dispute Resolution 153 (1998)—60, 111

Legomsky, Stephen H., Immigration and the Judiciary—Law and Politics in Britain and America (1987)—113, 126, 163, 217, 487, 497, 502, 521, 644, 647, 1238, 1239

Legomsky, Stephen H., Immigration, Equality and Diversity, 31 Columbia J. Transnat'l Law 319 (1993)—112, 351

Legomsky, Stephen H., Immigration Exceptionalism: Commentary on Is There a Plenary Power Doctrine?, 14 Georgetown Immigration L.J. 307 (2000)—241-42

Legomsky, Stephen H., Immigration, Federalism, and the Welfare State, 42 UCLA L.Rev. 1453 (1995)—1192, 1286, 1380

Legomsky, Stephen H., Immigration Law and the Principle of Plenary Congressional Power, 1984 Supreme Ct. Rev. 255—92, 114, 124, 149, 170, 176, 187, 205, 243

Legomsky, Stephen H., Learning to Live with Unequal Justice: Asylum and the Limits to Consistency, 60 Stanford L. Rev. 413 (2007)—1039

Legomsky, Stephen H., Political Asylum and the Theory of Judicial Review, 73 Minnesota L. Rev. 1205 (1989)—790, 1043

Legomsky, Stephen H., Portraits of the Undocumented Immigrant: Epiphany through Dialectic, 44 Georgia L. Rev. — (2009)—1178, 1189, 1190

Legomsky, Stephen H., Recent Development, Deportation of an Alien for a Marihuana Conviction Can Constitute Cruel and Unusual Punishment, 13 San Diego L. Rev. 454 (1976)—517, 549

Legomsky, Stephen H., Reforming the Criteria for the Exclusion and the Deportation of Alien Criminal Offenders, 12 In Defense of the Alien 64 (1990)—574, 588

Legomsky, Stephen H., Refugees, Administrative Tribunals, and Real Independence: Dangers Ahead for Australia, 76 Washington Univ. L.Q. 243 (1998)—751

Legomsky, Stephen H., Secondary Refugee Movements and the Return of Asylum Seekers to Third Countries: The Meaning of Effective Protection, 15 Internat'l J. Refugee L. 567 (2003)—890, 1047, 1050

Legomsky, Stephen H., Specialized Justice—Courts, Administrative Tribunals, and a Cross-National Theory of Specialization (1990)—696, 1040

Legomsky, Stephen H., Ten More Years of Plenary Power: Immigration, Congress, and the Courts, 22 Hastings Const. L.Q. 925 (1995)—115, 243

Legomsky, Stephen H., Testimony before the Subcommittee on Immigration, Citizenship, Refugees, Border Security, and International Law of the Committee on the Judiciary of the U.S. House of Representatives (Apr. 19, 2007)—302, 1232

Legomsky, Stephen H., Testimony Before U.S. House of Representatives Subcommittee on Immigration, Citizenship, Refugees, Border Security, and International

Law (Sept. 23, 2008), http://judiciary.

house.gov/hearings/pdf/Legomsky080923.pdf;—745, 751-52

Legomsky, Stephen H., The Alien Criminal Defendant, 14 San Diego L. Rev. 105 (1977)—517, 549

Legomsky, Stephen H., The Detention of Aliens: Theories, Rules, and Discretion, 30 Univ. Miami Inter-American L. Rev. 531 (1999)—239, 240, 651, 816-17, 823

Legomsky, Stephen H., The Ethnic and Reli- gious Profiling of Noncitizens: National Security and International Human Rights, 25 Boston College Third World L.J. 161 (2005)—845, 852

Legomsky, Stephen H., The Haitian Interdiction Programme, Human Rights, and the Role of Judicial Protection, Int'l J. Refugee L. at 182 et seq. (special ed.1990)—1064

Legomsky, Stephen H., The Making of United States Refugee Policy: Separation of Powers in the Post-Cold War Era, 70 Washington L. Rev. 675 (1995)—343, 887, 889

Legomsky, Stephen H., The New Path of Immigration Law: Asymmetric Incorporation of Criminal Justice Norms, 64 Washington & Lee L. Rev. 469 (2007)—549

Legomsky, Stephen H., The New Techniques for Managing High-Volume Asylum Systems, 81 Iowa L. Rev. 671 (1996)—1044

Legomsky, Stephen H., The USA and the Caribbean Interdiction Program, 18 Internat'l J. Refugee L. 677 (2006)—1084

Legomsky, Stephen H., Why Citizenship?, 35 Virginia J. Internat'l L. 279 (1994)—34, 1312, 1395

Leibowitz, Arnold H., A Time for Decision: Citizenship at the Millennium (Office of Refugee Resettlement, Nov. 1998)—1395

Levinson, Peter J., A Specialized Court for Immigration Hearings and Appeals, 56 Notre Dame Lawyer 644 (1981)—751, 752

Levinson, Peter J., The Facade of Quasi-Judicial Independence in Immigration Appellate Adjudications, 9 BIB 1154 (Oct. 1, 2004)—745, 750

Levitan, David M., The Foreign Relations Power: An Analysis of Mr. Justice Sutherland's Theory, 55 Yale L.J. 467 (1946)—130

Levy, Daniel, The Child Citizenship Act of 2000, 6 BIB 293 (Mar. 15, 2001)—1314, 1315

Lewis, Anthony Lewis, A Bad Time for Civil Liberties, 5 Annual Survey Internat'l & Comp. L. 1 (1999)—1055

Lewis, Hope, Between Irua and "Female Genital Mutilation": Feminist Human Rights Discourse and the Cultural Divide, 8 Harvard Human Rights J. 1 (1995)—970

Lewis, Hope & Gunning, Isabelle R., Cleaning Our Own House: "Exotic" and Famil-

- ial Human Rights Violations*, 4 Buffalo Human Rights L. Rev. 123 (1998)—967
- Lichtenberg, Judith, National Boundaries and Moral Boundaries: A Cosmopolitan View, in Peter G. Brown & Henry Shue (eds.), Boundaries—National Autonomy and Its Limits, at 79 et seq. (1981)—35, 1395
- Lillich, Richard B., The Human Rights of Aliens in Contemporary International Law (1984)—1373
- Lipman, Francine J., Taxing Undocumented Immigrants: Separate, Unequal and Without Representation, 59 Tax Lawyer 813 (2006), reproduced, 9 Harvard Latino L. Rev. 1 (2006)—1144
- Lloyd, Angela, Regulating Consent: Protecting Undocumented Immigrant Children from their (Evil) Step-Uncle Sam, or How to Ameliorate the Impact of the 1997 Amendments to the SIJ Law, 15 Boston Univ. Public Interest L.J. 237 (2006)—297, 1035
- Loescher, Gil & Scanlan, John A., Calculated Kindness—Refugees and America's Half-Open Door 1945–Present (1986)—886, 887, 1031
- Lonegan, Bryan, American Diaspora: The Deportation of Lawful Residents from the United States and the Destruction of Their Families, 32 NYU Rev. L. & Social Change 55 (2007)—588
- López, Gerald P., Learning about Latinos, 19 Chicano-Latino L. Rev. 363 (1998)—95
- López, Gerald P., Undocumented Mexican Migration: In Search of a Just Immigration Law and Policy, 28 UCLA L.Rev. 615 (1981)—92
- López, María Pabón, A Tale of Two Systems: Analyzing the Treatment of Noncitizen Families in State Family Law Systems and under the Immigration Law System, 11 Harvard Latino L. Rev. 229 (2008)—261
- López, María Pabón, Immigration Law Spanish-Style: A Study of Spain's Normalización of Undocumented Workers, 2007 Univ. of Chicago Legal Forum 571—1185
- López, María Pabón, More than a License to Drive: State Restrictions on the Use of Driver's Licenses by Noncitizens, 29 Southern Illinois Univ. L.J. 91 (2004)—1227
- López, María Pabón, Reflections on Educating Latino and Latina Undocumented Children: Beyond Plyler v. Doe, 35 Seton Hall L. Rev. 1373 (2005)—1208
- López, María Pabón, The Intersection of Immigration Law and Civil Rights Law: Noncitizen Workers and the International Human Rights Paradigm, 44 Univ. Louisville Brandeis L.J. 611 (2006)—1223
- López, María Pabón, The Phoenix Rises from El Cenizo: A Community Creates and Affirms Its Latino/a Border Cultural Citizenship through its Language and Safe Haven Ordinances, 78 Denver Univ. L. Rev. 1017 (2001)—68
- López, María Pabón, The Place of the Undocumented Worker in the United States Legal System After Hoffman Plastic Compounds: An Assessment and Comparison with Argentina's Legal System, 15 Indiana Internat'l & Comparative L. Rev. 301 (2005)—1223
- Loue, Sana, Alien Rights and Government Authority: An Examination of the Conflicting Views of the Ninth Circuit Court of Appeals and the United States Supreme Court, 22 San Diego L.Rev. 1021 (1985)—732
- Lowell, B. Lindsay & Martin, Susan, Transatlantic Roundtable on High Skilled Migration: A Report on the Proceedings, 15 Georgetown Immigration L.J. 649 (2001)—343
- Luna, Guadalupe T., "Agricultural Underdogs" and International Agreements: The Legal Context of Agricultural Workers within the Rural Economy, 26 New Mexico L. Rev. 9 (1996)—378, 1223
- Luna, Guadalupe T., Immigrants, Cops and Slumlords in the Midwest, 29 Southern Illinois Univ. L.J. 61 (2004)—62
- Luna, Guadalupe T., "Zoo Island:" Latcrit Theory, "Don Pepe" and Señora Peralta, 19 Chicano-Latino L. Rev. 339 (1998)—111
- Macedo, Stephen, The Moral Dilemma of U.S. Immigration Policy: Open Borders Versus Social Justice, in Carol Swain (ed.), Debating Immigration, at 63 et seq. (2006)—28
- Mackler, Ian & Weeks, James K., The Fleeing Political Refugee's Final Hurdle—the Immigration and Nationality Act, 5 No. Kentucky L. Rev. 9 (1978)—892
- Macklin, Audrey, Cross-Border Shopping for Ideas: A Critical Review of United States, Canadian, and Australian Approaches to Gender-Related Asylum Claims, 13 Georgetown Immigration L.J. 25 (1998)—956
- Macklin, Audrey, Disappearing Refugees: Reflections on the Canada-U.S. Safe Third Country Agreement, 36 Columbia Human Rights L. Rev. 365 (2005)—1051
- Maguire, Bernadette, Immigration: Public Legislation and Private Bills (1997)—627
- Mailman, Stanley, The Employer as Immigration Inspector, 1 BIB #8 at 20–25 (July 1996)—1162
- Mailman, Stanley & Yale-Loehr, Stephen, Controversy over Investor Category, 3 BIB 491 (May 15, 1998)—346
- Mailman, Stanley & Yale-Loehr, Stephen, Criminalizing Employer Sanctions: Em-

- ployers Walk a Tightrope, 11 BIB 1089 (Sept. 15, 2006)—1162
- Mailman, Stanley & Yale-Loehr, Stephen, Detaining and Criminalizing Asylum Seekers, 8 BIB 764 (May 1, 2003)—894
- Mailman, Stanley & Yale-Loehr, Stephen, Immigrant Investor Green Cards: Rise of the Phoenix, 10 BIB 801 (May 15, 2005)—347
- Mailman, Stanley & Yale-Loehr, Stephen, Immigration Appeals Overwhelm Federal Courts, 10 BIB 45 (Jan. 15, 2005)—758, 759
- Mailman, Stanley & Yale-Loehr, Stephen, Immigration Functions in the Department of Homeland Security, 8 BIB 663 (Apr. 15, 2003)—2
- Mailman, Stanley & Yale-Loehr, Stephen, The "National Interest" Waiver, 4 BIB 271 (Apr. 1, 1999)—306
- Mailman, Stanley & Yale-Loehr, Stephen, The Price of Tracking Overstays, 3 BIB 179 (Mar. 1, 1998)—824
- Major Cities Chiefs Immigration Committee, Recommendations for Enforcement of Immigration Law by Local Police Agencies (2006)—1278
- Malpert, Rodney A. & Petersen, Amanda (eds.), Business Immigration Law: Strategies for Employing Foreign Nationals (2000)—358
- Margulies, Peter, Asylum, Intersectionality, and AIDS: Women with HIV as a Persecuted Social Group, 8 Georgetown Immigration L.J. 521 (1994)—945
- Margulies, Peter, Children, Parents, and Asylum, 15 Georgetown Immigration L.J. 289 (2001)—1036
- Margulies, Peter, Democratic Transitions and the Future of Asylum Law, 71 Univ. Colorado L. Rev. 3 (2000)—1000
- Margulies, Peter, Difference and Distrust in Asylum Law: Haitian and Holocaust Refugee Narratives, 6 St. Thomas L.Rev. 135 (1993)—1079
- Margulies, Peter, Stranger and Afraid: Undocumented Workers and Federal Employment Law, 38 DePaul L. Rev. 553 (1989)—1212
- Margulies, Peter, Uncertain Arrivals: Immigration, Terror, and Democracy after September 11, 2002 Utah L. Rev. 481—866
- Marks, Dana Leigh, An Urgent Priority: Why Congress Should Establish an Article I Immigration Court, 13 BIB 3 (Jan. 1, 2008)—655, 751
- Marmor (ed.), Judd, Homosexual Behavior—A Modern Reappraisal (1980)—278, 279
- Marmor, Judd, Overview: The Multiple Roots of Homosexual Behavior, in Judd Marmor (ed.), Homosexual Behavior—A Modern Reappraisal at 19 et seq. (1980)—278
- Martin, David A., Adelaide Abankwah, Fauziya Kasinga, and the Dilemmas of Political Asylum, in David A. Martin & Peter H. Schuck (eds.), Immigration Stories, chap. 10 (2005)—967
- Martin, David A., Asylum Case Law Sourcebook (4th ed. 2003)—868
- Martin, David A., Book Review, The Law of Refugee Status, 87 Amer. J. Internat'l L. 348 (1993)—902
- Martin, David A., Due Process and Membership in the National Community: Political Asylum and Beyond, 44 Univ. Pittsburgh L.Rev. 165 (1983)—33, 163
- Martin, David A., Effects of International Law on Migration Policy and Practice: The Uses of Hypocrisy, 23 Internat'l Migration Rev. 547 (1989)—1120
- Martin, David A., Eight Myths about Immigration Enforcement, 10 NYU J. Legislation & Public Policy 525 (2007)—1146
- Martin, David A., Graduated Application of Constitutional Protections for Aliens: The Real Meaning of Zadvydas v. Davis, 2001 Supreme Ct. Rev. 47—164, 221, 837
- Martin, David A., Immigration Policy and the Homeland Security Act Reorganization: An Early Agenda for Practical Improvements, 80 IR 601 (Apr. 28, 2003)—2
- Martin, David A., Major Developments in Asylum Law Over the Past Year, 83 IR 1889 (Sept. 1, 2006)—453, 1017
- Martin, David A., Making Asylum Policy: The 1994 Reforms, 70 Washington L. Rev. 725 (1995)—1030
- Martin, David A., Membership and Consent: Abstract or Organic?, 11 Yale J. Internat'l L. 278 (1985)—1335, 1371
- Martin, David A., New Rules on Dual Nationality for a Democratizing Globe: Between Rejection and Embrace, 14 Georgetown Immigration L.J. 1 (1999)—1318
- Martin, David A., On Counterintuitive Consequences and Choosing the Right Control Group: A Defense of Reno v. AADC, 14 Georgetown Immigration L.J. 363 (2000)—192
- Martin, David A., Reforming Asylum Adjudication: On Navigating the Coast of Bohemia, 138 Univ. Pennsylvania L. Rev. 1247 (1990)—1010, 1011, 1013, 1028, 1032, 1033, 1034, 1040
- Martin, David A., The United States Refugee Admission Program: Reforms for a New Era of Refugee Resettlement (2003)—889
- Martin, David A., Two Cheers for Expedited Removal in the New Immigration Laws, 40 Virginia J. Internat'l L. 673 (2000)—1055
- Martin, David A., Waiting for Solutions: Extending the Period of Time for Migrants to Apply for Green Cards Doesn't Get at the Real Problem, Legal Times at 66 (May 28, 2001)—434, 510
- Martin, David A., What Lures Them Here: Changes to Immigration Law Should Focus Less on the Border and More on the Job, Legal Times 58 (May 29, 2006)—1236

- Martin, David A., Aleinikoff, T. Alexander, Motomura, Hiroshi, & Fullerton, Maryellen, Forced Migration Law and Policy (2007)—868
- Martin, David A. & Hailbronner, Kay (eds.), Rights and Duties of Dual Nationals: Evolution and Prospects (2003)—1318, 1319
- Martin, David A. & Schuck, Peter H. (eds.), Immigration Stories, chap. 9 (2005)—165, 186, 193, 591, 757, 967, 1208, 1222, 1291, 1358
- Martin, Philip, Does the U.S. Need a New Bracero Program?, 9 J. Internat'l L. & Policy 127 (2003)—378
- Martin, Philip, Guest Workers: New Solution or New Problem?, 2007 Univ. of Chicago Legal Forum 289—378
- Martin, Susan F., Forced Migration and Professionalism, 35 Internat'l Migration Rev. 226 (2001)—879
- Martin, Susan F., Refugee Women (2d ed. 2004)—945
- Martin, Susan F., Lowell, B. Lindsay & Martin, Philip, U.S. Immigration Policy: Admission of High Skilled Workers, 16 Georgetown Immigration L.J. 619 (2002)—343
- Martin, Susan F. & Schoenholtz, Andrew I., Asylum in Practice: Successes, Failures, and the Challenges Ahead, 14 Georgetown Immigration L.J. 589 (2000)—1028-29
- Martin, Susan F., Schoenholtz, Andy, & Meyers, Deborah Waller, Temporary Protection: Towards a New Regional and Domestic Framework, 12 Georgetown Immigration L.J. 543 (1998)—889
- Martínez, George A., African-Americans, Latinos, and the Construction of Race: Toward an Epistemic Coalition, 19 Chicano-Latino L. Rev. 213 (1998)—96
- Martínez, George A., Immigration and the Meaning of United States Citizenship: Whiteness and Assimilation, 46 Washburn L.J. 335 (2007)—1305
- Martínez, George A., Immigration: Deportation and the Pseudo-Science of Unassimilable Peoples, 61 SMU L. Rev. 7 (2008)—63-64
- Martínez, George A., Latinos, Assimilation and the Law: A Philosophical Perspective, 20 Chicano-Latino L. Rev. 1 (1999)—64
- Martínez, George A., Race and Immigration Law: A Paradigm Shift, 2000 Univ. Illinois L. Rev. 517—111
- Marx, Reinhard & Lump, Katharina, The German Constitutional Court's Decision of 14 May 1996 on the Concept of "Safe Third Countries"—A Basis for Burden-Sharing in Europe, 8 Internat'l J. Refugee L. 419 (1996)—1044, 1046
- Mason, Jana, U.S. Committee for Refugees, Citizenship Under Attack: Congress Investigates Motives Behind INS Initiative, 17 Refugee Reports, No. 11, at 1 et seq. (Nov./Dec. 1996)—1301
- Massey, Douglas (ed.), New Faces in New Places: The Changing Geography of American Immigration (2008)—1238
- Massey, Douglas et al., Beyond Smoke and Mirrors: Mexican Immigration in an Era of Economic Integration (2003)—1147, 1149, 1232, 1233, 1235
- Masters, Suzette Brooks, Environmentally Induced Migration: Beyond a Culture of Reaction, 14 Georgetown Immigration L.J. 855 (2000)—91
- Masters, Suzette Brooks & Ruthizer, Ted, The H-1-B Straitjacket: Why Congress Should Repeal the Cap on Foreign-Born Highly Skilled Workers, Immigration Briefings (May 2000)—376
- Mathew, Penelope, Address—Legal Issues Concerning Interdiction, 17 Georgetown Immigration L.J. 221 (2003)—1062
- Mathew, Penelope, The High Court and "Particular Social Groups": Lessons for the Future, 21 Melbourne Univ. L. Rev. 277 (1997)—937
- Matsuda, Mari J., Voices of America: Accent, Antidiscrimination Law, and a Jurisprudence for the Last Reconstruction, 100 Yale L.J. 1329 (1991)—70
- Mautino, Robert A., Acquisition of Citizenship, Immigration Briefings (April 1990)—1293
- Mautino, Robert A., Naturalization Changes Effected by Immigration Act of 1990, in AILA, Understanding the Immigration Act of 1990, at 277 et seq. (1991)—1312
- Mazzoli, Romano L. & Trucios-Haynes, Enid, Public Sentiment and Congressional Response: 15 Years of Immigration Policy-making, 73 IR 469 (Apr. 12, 1996)—94
- McAdam, Jane, Complementary Protection in International Refugee Law (2007)—1094
- McCaffrey, Angela, Don't Get Lost in Translation: Teaching Law Students to Work with Language Interpreters, 6 Clinical L. Rev. 347 (2000)—1034
- McCaffrey, Angela, Hmong Veterans' Naturalization Act: Precedent for Waiving the English Language Requirement for the Elderly, 19 Georgetown Immigration L.J. 495 (2005)—1306
- McCallum, Ron, Australian Labor Law, Migration and the Performance of Work, 16 Georgetown Immigration L.J. 637 (2002)—343
- McCormick, Elizabeth & McCormick, Patrick, Hospitality: How a Biblical Virtue Could Transform United States Immigration Policy, 83 Univ. Detroit Mercy L. Rev. 857 (2006)—37, 1287
- McCormick, Margaret H. & Stanton, David, Finding the Correct Wage for LCAs: Recent Developments in H-1B Practice, April 1995 Immigration Briefings—374
- McDermid, Lea, Deportation is Different: Noncitizens and Ineffective Assistance of

- Counsel*, 89 California L. Rev. 741 (2001)—556
- McKee, Estelle & Yale-Loehr, Stephen, Federal Court Review of Summary Dismissal and Streamlined BIA Decisions, 12 BIB 769 (June 15, 2007)—747
- Medina, M. Isabel, At the Border: What Tres Mujeres Tell Us about Walls and Fences, 10 J. Gender, Race & Justice 245 (2007)—1150
- Medina, M. Isabel, Demore v. Kim—A Dance of Power and Human Rights, 18 Georgetown Immigration L.J. 697 (2004)—240
- Medina, M. Isabel, Employer Sanctions in the United States, Canada and Mexico: Exploring the Criminalization of Immigration Law, 3 Southwestern J. L. & Trade in the Americas 333 (1996)—1168-69
- Medina, M. Isabel, Exploring the Use of the Word "Citizen" in Writings on the Fourth Amendment, 83 Indiana L.J. 1557 (2008)—729
- Medina, M. Isabel, Judicial Review—A Nice Thing? Article III, Separation of Powers and the Illegal Immigration Reform and Immigrant Responsibility Act of 1996, 29 Connecticut L. Rev. 1525 (1997)—770
- Medina, M. Isabel, Of Constitutional Amendments, Human Rights, and Same-Sex Marriages, 64 Louisiana L. Rev. 459 (2004)—276
- Medina, M. Isabel, Real Differences and Stereotypes—Two Visions of Gender, Citizenship, and International Law, 7 N.Y. City L. Rev. 315 (2004)—1298-99
- Medina, M. Isabel, The Criminalization of Immigration Law: Employer Sanctions and Marriage Fraud, 5 George Mason L. Rev. 669 (1997)—291, 549, 1162
- Medina, M. Isabel, Wal-Mart, Immigrant Workers and the U.S. Government: A Case of Split Personality?, 39 Connecticut L. Rev. 1443 (2007)—1162, 1212
- Meissner, Doris & Kerwin, Donald, DHS and Immigration: Taking Stock and Correcting Course, Report for the Migration Policy Institute (February 2009), available at http://www.migrationpolicy.org/pubs/DHS_Feb09.pdf—1150
- Melloy, Katherine F., Note, Telling Truths: How the REAL ID Act's Credibility Provisions Affect Women Asylum Seekers, 92 Iowa L. Rev. 637 (2007)—1005
- Michigan Guidelines on Nexus to a Convention Ground*, 23 Michigan J. Internat'l L. 210 (2002)—988
- Michigan Guidelines on Well-Founded Fear*, Third Colloquium on Challenges in International Refugee Law, 26 Michigan J. Internat'l L. 492 (2005)—901
- Miller, Mark J., Employer Sanctions in Western Europe (1987)—1169
- Miller, Teresa A., Blurring the Boundaries Between Immigration and Crime Control After September 11, 25 Boston College Third World L. Rev. 81 (2005)—549
- Miller, Teresa A., Citizenship and Severity: Recent Immigration Reforms and the New Penology, 17 Georgetown Immigration L.J. 611 (2003)—549
- Miltner, Barbara, Irregular Maritime Migration: Refugee Protection Issues in Rescue and Interception, 30 Fordham Internat'l L.J. 75 (2006)—1083
- Miranda, Carlos Ortiz, Administrative Appeals and Judicial Review in Immigration Law: Where Matters Stand at the Beginning of the 21st Century, 55 Catholic Univ. L. Rev. 917 (2006)—745
- Miranda, Carlos Ortiz, An Agenda for the Commission on Immigration Reform, 29 San Diego L. Rev. 701 (1992)—97
- Miranda, Carlos Ortiz, Haiti and the United States During the 1980s and 1990s, Refugees, Immigration, and Foreign Policy, 32 San Diego L.Rev. 673 (1995)—1081
- Miranda, Carlos Ortiz, United States Commission on Immigration Reform: The Interim and Final Reports, 38 Santa Clara L. Rev. 645 (1998)—97
- Money, Jeanette, Fences and Neighbors: The Political Geography of Immigration Control (1999)—93
- Money, John, Genetic and Chromosomal Aspects of Homosexual Etiology, in Judd Marmor, Homosexual Behavior—A Modern Reappraisal, at 59 et seq. (1980)—278
- Money, John & Ehrhardt, Anke A., Man and Woman, Boy and Girl (1972)—278
- Moore, Andrew F., Criminal Deportation, Post-Conviction Relief and the Lost Cause of Uniformity, 22 Georgetown Immigration L.J. issue 4 (forthcoming 2009)—558
- Moore, Andrew F., Fraud, The Unauthorized Practice of Law and Unmet Needs: A Look at State Laws Regulating Immigration Assistants, 19 Georgetown Immigration L.J. 1 (2004)—669
- Moore, Andrew F., Unsafe in America: A Review of the U.S.-Canada Safe Third Country Agreement, 47 Santa Clara L. Rev. 201 (2007)—1051
- Moore, Andrew, Matter of Jacques Martin, 7 BIB 1502 (Dec. 1, 2002)—581
- Moore, Jennifer, From Nation State to Failed State: International Protection for Human Rights Abuses by Non-State Agents, 31 Columbia Human Rights L. Rev. 81 (1999)—976
- Moore, Jennifer, Restoring the Humanitarian Character of U.S. Refugee Law Lessons from the International Community, 15 Berkeley J. Internat'l L. 51 (1997)—924
- Moore, Jennifer, Whither the Accountability Theory: Second-Class Status for Third-Party Refugees as a Threat to International Refugee Protection, 13 Internat'l J. Refugee L. 32 (2001)—1137

- Morawetz, Nancy, Citizenship and the Courts, 2007 Univ. of Chicago Legal Forum 447 (2007)—1313
- Morawetz, Nancy, INS v. St. Cyr: The Campaign to Preserve Court Review and Stop Retroactive Deportation Laws, in David A. Martin & Peter H. Schuck (eds.), Immigration Stories (2005)—591
- Morawetz, Nancy, Predicting the Meaning of INA § 242(b)(9), 14 Georgetown Immigration L.J. 453 (2000)—769
- Morawetz, Nancy, Rethinking Drug Inadmissibility, 50 William & Mary L. Rev. 163 (2008)—455
- Morawetz, Nancy, Rethinking Retroactive Deportation Laws and the Due Process Clause, 73 NYU L. Rev. 97 (1998)—591
- Morawetz, Nancy, The Invisible Border: Restrictions on Short-Term Travel by Non-citizens, 21 Georgetown Immigration L.J. 201 (2007)—543
- Morawetz, Nancy, Understanding the Impact of the 1996 Deportation Laws and the Limited Scope of Proposed Reforms, 113 Harvard L. Rev. 1936 (2000)—575
- Motomura, Hiroshi, Americans in Waiting: The Lost Story of Immigration and Citizenship in the United States (2006)—1396
- Motomura, Hiroshi, Book Review, Whose Alien Nation?: Two Models of Constitutional Immigration Law, 94 Michigan L. Rev. 1927 (1996)—64
- Motomura, Hiroshi, Federalism, International Human Rights, and Immigration Exceptionalism, 70 Univ. Colorado L. Rev. 1361 (1999)—1138
- Motomura, Hiroshi, Immigration and Alienage, Federalism and Proposition 187, 35 Virginia J. Internat'l. L. 201 (1994)—1255
- Motomura, Hiroshi, Immigration Law After a Century of Plenary Power: Phantom Constitutional Norms and Statutory Interpretation, 100 Yale L.J. 545 (1990)—242
- Motomura, Hiroshi, Immigration Outside the Law, 108 Colum. L. Rev. 2037 (2008)—1190
- Motomura, Hiroshi, Judicial Review in Immigration Cases after AADC: Lessons from Civil Procedure, 14 Georgetown Immigration L.J. 385 (2000)—769
- Motomura, Hiroshi, The Curious Evolution of Immigration Law: Procedural Surrogates for Substantive Constitutional Rights, 92 Columbia L.Rev. 1625 (1992)—176
- Motomura, Hiroshi, The Family and Immigration: A Roadmap for the Ruritanian Lawmaker, 43 American J. Comp.L. 511 (1995)—261, 302
- Motomura, Hiroshi, The Year is 2020: Looking Back on the Elian Gonzalez Case (A Fantasy), 77 IR 853 (2000)—1036
- Motomura, Hiroshi, We Asked for Workers but Families Came: Time, Law, and the Family in Immigration and Citizenship, 14 Virginia J. Social Policy & Law 103 (2006)—261
- Mousin, Craig B., A Clear View from the Prairie: Harold Washington and the People of Illinois Respond to Federal Encroachment of Human Rights, 29 Southern Illinois Univ. L. Rev. 285 (2005)—1281
- Mousin, Craig B., Standing with the Persecuted: Adjudicating Religious Asylum Claims after the Enactment of the International Religious Freedom Act of 1998, 2003 BYU L. Rev. 541—917
- Moyers, Peter R., Butchering Statutes: The Postville Raid and the Misinterpretation of Federal Criminal Law, 32 Seattle L. Rev. 651 (2009)—1155
- Mulcahy, Elizabeth & Schmidt-Nowara, Mary, Law Students Work to Repeal Jim Crow-Era Anti-Asian Alien Land Laws, 6 BIB 611 (June 15, 2001)—109
- Musalo, Karen, Claims for Protection Based on Religion or Belief, 16 Internat'l J. Refugee L. 165 (2004)—915
- Musalo, Karen, Conscientious Objection as a Basis for Refugee Status: Protection for the Fundamental Right of Freedom of Thought, Conscience and Religion, 20 Refugee Survey Quarterly 69 (2007)—904
- Musalo, Karen, Gender-Based Asylum: An Analysis of Recent Trends, 77 IR 1533 (Oct. 30, 2000)—945
- Musalo, Karen, In re Kasinga: A Big Step Forward for Gender-Based Asylum Claims, 73 IR 853, 856 (July 1, 1996)—964, 967
- Musalo, Karen, Matter of R.A.: An Analysis of the Decision and Its Implications, 76 IR 1177 (Aug. 9, 1999)—975
- Musalo, Karen, Protecting Victims of Gendered Persecution: Fear of Floodgates or Call to (Principled) Action?, 14 Virginia J. Social Policy & the Law 119 (2007)—949
- Musalo, Karen, Revisiting Social Group and Nexus in Gender Asylum Claims: A Unifying Rationale for Evolving Jurisprudence, 52 DePaul L. Rev. 777 (2003)—996
- Musalo, Karen, Swords into Ploughshares: Why the United States Should Provide Refuge for Young Men Who Refuse to Bear Arms for Reasons of Conscience, 26 San Diego L.Rev. 849 (1989)—916
- Musalo, Karen et al., The Expedited Removal Study, Evaluation of the General Accounting Office's Second Report on Expedited Removal (Oct. 2000)—1053
- Musalo, Karen et al., The Expedited Removal Study, Report on the First Three Years of Implementation of Expedited Removal (May 2000)—1052
- Musalo, Karen, Moore, Jennifer, & Boswell, Richard A., Refugee Law and Policy: A Comparative and International Approach (2d ed. 2002)—868

- Musalo, Karen & Rice, Marcelle, Center for Gender & Refugee Studies: The Implementation of the One-Year Bar to Asylum, 31 Hastings Internat'l & Comp. L. Rev. 693 (2008)—1045
- Mutharika, A. Peter, The Alien under American Law (2 vols., 1980 & 1981, with 1985 Supplement)—1191, 1374
- Nafziger, James A.R., A Commentary on American Legal Scholarship Concerning the Admission of Migrants, 17 Univ. Michigan J.L. Reform 165 (1984)—148, 1119
- Nafziger, James A.R., A Comparison of Processes for Reforming Migration Laws in Transitional States: China, Kazakhstan, and Albania, 70 Washington L. Rev. 757 (1995)—97
- Nafziger, James A.R., Review of Visa Denials by Consular Officers, 66 Washington L.Rev. 1 (1991)—481, 486, 487
- Nafziger, James A.R., The General Admission of Aliens Under International Law, 77 Amer. J. Internat'l L. 804 (1983)—244, 1120
- Nafziger, James A.R. & Yimesgen, Michael, The Effect of Expungement on Removability of Non-Citizens, 36 Univ. Michigan J. L. Reform 915 (2003)—557
- Narvaez-Hasfura, Carlos, Immigration in Mexico and America: Constitutional Reciprocity within a Plenary Power (J.S.D. dissertation, Washington University School of Law (1995))—587
- National Conference of State Legislatures, State Laws Related to Immigrants and Immigration (2008), available at <http://www.ncsl.org/print/immig/immigreportapril2008.pdf>—1237
- Neal, David L., Women as a Social Group: Sex-Based Persecution as Grounds for Asylum, 20 Columbia Human Rights L.Rev. 203 (1988)—949
- Nessel, Lori A., Families at Risk: How Errant Enforcement and Restrictionist Integration Policies Threaten the Immigrant Family in the European Union and the United States, 36 Hofstra L. Rev. 1271 (2008)—261
- Nessel, Lori A., Forced to Choose: Torture, Family Unification, and United States Immigration Policy, 78 Temple L. Rev. 897 (2005)—1108
- Nessel, Lori A., Undocumented Immigrants in the Workplace: The Fallacy of Labor Protection and the Need for Reform, 36 Harvard Civil Rights—Civil Liberties L. Rev. 345 (2001)—1212
- Nessel, Lori A., "Wilful Blindness" to Gender-Based Violence Abroad: United States' Implementation of Article III of the United Nations Convention Against Torture, 89 Minnesota L. Rev. 71 (2004)—974, 1095–96
- Nett, Roger, The Civil Right We Are Not Ready For: The Right of Free Movement of People on the Face of the Earth, 81 Ethics 212 (1971)—25
- Neuborne, Burt, Harisiades v. Shaughnessy: A Case Study in the Vulnerability of Resident Aliens, in David A. Martin & Peter H. Schuck (eds.), Immigration Stories (2005), at 87 et seq.—186
- Neuman, Gerald L., Aliens as Outlaws: Government Services, Proposition 187, and the Structure of Equal Protection Doctrine, 42 UCLA L. Rev. 1425 (1995)—1140, 1240, 1286
- Neuman, Gerald L., Book Review [of Schuck & Smith], Back to Dred Scott?, 24 San Diego L. Rev. 485 (1987)—1327
- Neuman, Gerald L., Discretionary Deportation, 20 Georgetown Immigration L.J. 611 (2006)—647
- Neuman, Gerald L., Extraterritorial Violations of Human Rights by the United States, in Amer. Univ. J. Internat'l L. & Policy and Loyola L.A. Internat'l & Comp. L.J. (eds.), Immigration Law: International Perspectives on Asylum and Refugee Status at 213 et seq. (1994)—1083
- Neuman, Gerald L., Habeas Corpus, Executive Detention, and the Removal of Aliens, 98 Columbia L. Rev. 961 (1998)—770
- Neuman, Gerald L., Immigration and Judicial Review in the Federal Republic of Germany, 23 NYU J. Internat'l L. & Politics 35 (1990)—248
- Neuman, Gerald L., Justifying U.S. Naturalization Policies, 35 Virginia J. Internat'l L. 237 (1994)—1312, 1319
- Neuman, Gerald L., On the Adequacy of Direct Review after the REAL ID Act of 2005, 51 New York Law School L. Rev. 133 (2006–07)—768, 784
- Neuman, Gerald L., Strangers to the Constitution: Immigrants, Borders, and Fundamental Law (1996)—115, 1238
- Neuman, Gerald L., Terrorism, Selective Deportation and the First Amendment after Reno v. AADC, 14 Georgetown Immigration L.J. 313 (2000)—192
- Neuman, Gerald L., The Constitutional Requirement of "Some Evidence," 25 San Diego L. Rev. 631 (1988)—738, 784
- Neuman, Gerald L., The Habeas Corpus Suspension Clause After INS v. St. Cyr, 33 Columbia Human Rights L. Rev. 555 (2002)—770
- Neuman, Gerald L., The Lost Century of American Immigration Law (1776–1875), 93 Columbia L.Rev. 1833 (1993)—14, 116, 1239
- Neuman, Gerald L., Whose Constitution?, 100 Yale L.J. 909 (1991)—152
- New York State Inter-Agency Task Force on Immigration Affairs, Workplace Discrimination Under the Immigration Reform and Control Act of 1986: A Study of Im-

- pacts on New Yorkers (Nov. 4, 1988)—1165
- Newland, Kathleen, The Impact of U.S. Refugee Policies on U.S. Foreign Policy: A Case of the Tail Wagging the Dog?, in Michael S. Teitelbaum & Myron Weiner (eds.), Threatened Peoples, Threatened Borders, ch. 5 (1995)—1064, 1080-81
- Newman, Edward & van Selm, Joanne (eds.), Refugees and Forced Displacement (2003)—868
- Newman, Frank, & Weissbrodt, David, International Human Rights: Law, Policy, and Process (2d ed. 1996)—973
- Newton, Andowah A., Injecting Diversity into U.S. Immigration Policy: The Diversity Visa Program and the Missing Discourse on its Impact on African Immigration to the United States, 38 Cornell Internat'l L.J. 1049 (2005)—354
- Ngai, Mae, Birthright Citizenship and the Alien Citizen, 75 Fordham L. Rev. 2521 (2007)—112
- Ngai, Mai, Impossible Subjects: Illegal Aliens and the Making of Modern America (2004)—1141, 1236
- Nicholson, Frances & Twomey, Patrick (eds.), Refugee Rights and Realities (1999)—1044
- North, Anthony M. & Chia, Joyce, Towards Convergence in the Interpretation of the Refugee Convention: A Proposal for the Establishment of an International Judicial Commission for Refugees, 25 Australian Yearbook of Internat'l L. 105 (2007)—879-80
- North, David S., Alien Legalization and Naturalization: What the United States can Learn from Down Under (1984)—1178, 1314
- North, David S., The Long Gray Welcome: A Study of the American Naturalization Program (1985)—1314
- Note, An Argument for the Application of Equal Protection Heightened Scrutiny to Classifications Based on Homosexuality, 57 So. Calif. L. Rev. 797 (1984)—276
- Note, Basing Asylum Claims on a Fear of Persecution Arising from a Prior Asylum Claim, 56 Notre Dame Lawyer 719 (1981)—929
- Note, Coming to America: The Immigration Obstacle Facing Binational Same-Sex Couples, 73 Southern Calif. L. Rev. 811 (2000)—281
- Note, Developments in the Law, Immigration Policy and the Rights of Aliens, 96 Harvard L.Rev. 1286 (1983)—36, 616
- Note, Ethical Problems in Representing Aliens Applying for Visas Based on Marriages to United States Citizens, 28 Santa Clara L.Rev. 709 (1988)—291
- Note, Exclusion and Deportation of Resident Aliens: The Re-Entry Doctrine and the Need for Reform, 13 San Diego L.Rev. 192 (1975)—537
- Note, Ideological Exclusion, Plenary Power, and the PLO, 77 California L.Rev. 831 (1989)—194
- Note, Immigration for Investors: A Comparative Analysis of U.S., Canadian, and Australian Policies, 7 Boston College Internat'l & Comp. L. Rev. 113 (1984)—345
- Note, INS Transfer Policy: Interference with Detained Aliens' Due Process Right to Retain Counsel, 100 Harvard L. Rev. 2001 (1987)—672
- Note, Legal Fictions Mask Human Suffering: The Detention of the Mariel Cubans—Constitutional, Statutory, International Law, and Human Considerations, 62 Southern California L.Rev. 1733 (1989)—167
- Note, Queer Reasoning: Immigration Policy, Baker v. State of Vermont, and the (Non)Recognition of Same-Gender Relationships, 10 Law & Sexuality 211 (2001)—275
- Note, Survey on the Constitutional Right to Privacy in the Context of Homosexual Activity, 40 Univ. Miami L.Rev. 521 (1986)—279
- Note, The Constitutionality of the INS Sham Marriage Investigation Policy, 99 Harvard L.Rev. 1238 (1986)—283
- Note, The Propriety of Denying Entry to Homosexual Aliens: Examining the Public Health Service's Authority over Medical Exclusions, 17 Univ. Michigan J.L. Reform 331 (1984)—271
- Note, Ulin, Jacqueline P., A Common Sense Reconstruction of the INA's Crime-Related Removal System: Eliminating the Caveats from the Statue of Liberty's Welcoming Words, 78 Washington Univ. L.Q. 1549 (2000)—588
- Novotny, Ann, Strangers at the Door: Ellis Island, Castle Garden, and the Great Migration to America (1971)—463
- Nugent, Christopher, Strengthening Access to Justice: Prehearing Rights Presentations for Detained Respondents, 76 IR 1077 (July 19, 1999)—682
- O'Sullivan, Maria, Withdrawing Protection under Article 1C(5) of the 1951 Convention: Lessons from Australia, 20 Internat'l J. Refugee L. 586 (2008)—889-90
- Ogletree, Jr., Charles J., America's Schizophrenic Immigration Policy: Race, Class, and Reason, 41 Boston College L. Rev. 755 (2000)—91
- Okeke, Chris Nwachukwu & Nafziger, James A.R., United States Migration Law: Essentials for Comparison, 54 American J. Comparative L. 531 (2006)—12
- Oldham, James & Wishnie, Michael J., The Historical Scope of Habeas Corpus and

- INS v. St. Cyr*, 16 Georgetown Immigration L.J. 485 (2002)—785
- Olivas, Michael A., A Rebuttal to FAIR: States Can Enact Residency Statutes for the Undocumented, 7 BIB 652 (June 1, 2002)—1210
- Olivas, Michael A., "Breaking the Law" on Principle: An Essay on Lawyers' Dilemmas, Unpopular Causes, and Legal Regimes, 52 Univ. Pittsburgh. L. Rev. 815 (1991)—1034
- Olivas, Michael A., IIRIRA, the DREAM Act, and Undocumented College Student Residency, 30 J. College & University L. 435 (2004)—1211
- Olivas, Michael A., Immigration Law Teaching and Scholarship in the Ivory Tower: A Response to Race Matters, 2000 Univ. Illinois 613—111
- Olivas, Michael A., Immigration-Related State and Local Ordinances: Preemption, Prejudice, and the Proper Role for Enforcement, 2007 Univ. Chicago Legal Forum 27—1241
- Olivas, Michael A., Lawmakers Gone Wild? College Residency and the Response to Professor Kobach, 61 Southern Methodist Univ. L. Rev. 99 (2008)—1207, 1210
- Olivas, Michael A., Plyler v. Doe, the Education of Undocumented Children, and the Polity, in David A. Martin & Peter H. Schuck (eds.), Immigration Stories, chap. 8 (2005)—1208
- Olivas, Michael A., Plyler v. Doe, Toll v. Moreno, and Post-secondary Admissions: Undocumented Aliens and Enduring Disability, 15 J.L. & Education 19 (1986)—1208
- Olivas, Michael A., Preempting Preemption: Foreign Affairs, State Rights and Alienage Classifications, 35 Virginia J. Internat'l L. 217 (1994)—1241
- Olivas, Michael A., Storytelling Out of School: Undocumented College Residency, Race, and Reaction, 22 Hastings Const. L.Q. 1019 (1995)—1209
- Olivas, Michael A., The Chronicles, My Grandfather's Stories, and Immigration Law: The Slave Traders Chronicle as Racial History, 34 St. Louis L.J. 425 (1990)—103, 377
- Olivas, Michael A., The War on Terrorism Touches the Ivory Tower—Colleges and Universities After September 11, 30 J. Colleges & Universities L. 233 (2004)—825
- Olivas, Michael A., Unaccompanied Refugee Children: Detention, Due Process, and Disgrace, 2 Stanford L. & Policy Rev. 159 (1990)—1034—35
- Ontiveros, Maria L., Immigrant Workers' Rights in a Post-Hoffman World—Organizing Around the Thirteenth Amendment, 18 Georgetown Immigration L.J. 651 (2005)—1212
- Ontiveros, Maria L., Noncitizen Immigrant Labor and the Thirteenth Amendment: Challenging Guest Worker Programs, 38 Univ. Toledo L. Rev. 923 (2007)—378
- Ontiveros, Maria L. & Drexler, Joshua R., The Thirteenth Amendment and Access to Education for Children of Undocumented Workers: A New Look at Plyler v. Doe, 42 Univ. of San Francisco L. Rev. 1045 (2008)—1208
- Osuna, Juan P., The 1996 Immigration Act: Employer Sanctions, Antidiscrimination and Work Verification, 73 IR 1749 (Dec. 20, 1996)—1168, 1172
- Osuna, Juan P., The Exclusion from the United States of Aliens Infected with the AIDS Virus: Recent Developments and Prospects for the Future, 16 Houston J. Internat'l L. 1 (1993)—461—62
- Osuna, Juan P. & Mariani, Patricia, Expedited Removal: Authorities, Implementation, and Ongoing Policy and Practice Issues, Nov. 1997 Immigration Briefings—1055
- Ottaviano, Gianmarco I.P. & Peri, Giovanni, Rethinking the Effects of Immigration on Wages, NBER Working Paper 12497 (Aug. 2006)—1143
- Palmer, Geoffrey W.R., Unbridled Power—An Interpretation of New Zealand's Constitution and Government (2d ed. 1987)—587
- Palmer, John R.B., The Nature and Causes of the Immigration Surge in the Federal Courts of Appeals: A Preliminary Analysis, 51 New York L. School L. Rev. 13 (2006—07)—759
- Palmer, John R.B., The Second Circuit's "New Asylum Seekers": Responses to an Expanded Immigration Docket, 55 Catholic Univ. L. Rev. 965 (2006)—758—59
- Palmer, John R.B. et al., Why Are So Many People Challenging Board of Immigration Appeals Decisions in Federal Court? An Empirical Analysis of the Recent Surge in Petitions for Review, 20 Georgetown Immigration L.J. 1 (2005)—759
- Papademetriou, Demetrios G. & Yale-Loehr, Stephen, Balancing Interests: Rethinking U.S. Selection of Skilled Immigrants (1996)—332, 347, 374
- Papandrea, Mary-Rose, Under Attack: The Public's Right to Know and the War on Terror, 25 Boston College Third World L. Rev. 35 (2005)—836
- Paral, Rob, Naturalization: New Demands and New Directions at the INS, 72 IR 937 (July 17, 1995)—1301—02
- Passel, Jeffrey S., Estimates of the Size and Characteristics of the Undocumented Population (Mar. 21, 2005)—1142, 1143
- Passel, Jeffrey S., Recent Efforts to Control Illegal Immigration to the United States (unpublished paper, presented to OECD Working Party on Migration, Paris, June 13—14, 1996)—1141, 1147

- Passel, Jeffrey S. & Clark, Rebecca L., How Much Do Immigrants Really Cost? A Reappraisal of Huddle's "The Cost of Immigrants" (Feb. 1994)—1144
- Passel, Jeffrey S. & Cohn, D'Vera, Trends in Unauthorized Immigration: Undocumented Inflow Now Trails Legal Inflow (Oct. 2, 2008), <http://pewhispanic.org/files/reports/94.pdf>—1142
- Passel, Jeffrey S. & Cohn, D'Vera, United States Population Projections 2005–2050, Pew Hispanic Center Paper (2008), available at <http://www.pewhispanic.org/files/reports/96.pdf>—60
- Pauw, Robert, A New Look at Deportation as Punishment: Why at Least Some of the Constitution's Criminal Procedure Provisions Must Apply, 52 Administrative L. Rev. 305 (2000)—518, 549
- Pauw, Robert, Gete v. INS: Vehicle Seizure Class Action, 4 BIB 844 (Aug. 15, 1999)—1147
- Pauw, Robert, Judicial Review of "Pattern and Practice" Cases: What to Do When the INS Acts Unlawfully, 70 Washington L. Rev. 779 (1995)—787
- Pauw, Robert, Plenary Power: An Outmoded Doctrine that Should Not Limit IIRIRA Reform, 51 Emory L.J. 1095 (2002)—115
- Pauw, Robert & Boos, Greg, Conveyance Seizures and Forfeitures: Constitutional Limits on Agency Decision-Making, Immigration Briefings (Apr. 1996)—1147
- Perea, Juan F., "Am I an American or Not?" Reflections on Citizenship, Americanization, and Race, in Noah M.J. Pickus (ed.), Immigration and Citizenship in the Twenty-First Century, at 49 et seq. (1998)—56
- Perea, Juan F., Demography and Distrust: An Essay on American Languages, Cultural Pluralism, and Official English, 77 Minnesota L. Rev. 269 (1992)—70
- Perea, Juan F., Immigrants Out! The New Nativism and the Anti-Immigrant Impulse in the United States, at 300 et seq. (1997)—64, 92, 377, 1286
- Perluss, Deborah & Hartman [Fitzpatrick], Joan F., Temporary Refuge: Emergence of a Customary Norm, 26 Virginia J. International L. 551 (1986)—1120, 1129
- Pham, Huyen, The Constitutional Right Not to Cooperate? Local Sovereignty and the Federal Immigration Power, 74 Univ. Cincinnati L. Rev. 1373 (2006)—1281
- Pham, Huyen, The Inherent Flaws in the Inherent Authority Position: Why Inviting Local Enforcement of the Immigration Laws Violates the Constitution, 31 Florida State Univ. L. Rev. 965 (2004)—132, 1277
- Pham, Huyen, The Private Enforcement of Immigration Laws, 96 Georgetown L. Rev. 777 (2008)—1163
- Phuong, Catherine, Persecution by Non-State Agents: Comparative Judicial Interpretations of the 1951 Refugee Convention, 4 Euro. J. Migration & L. 521 (2003)—973
- Phuong, Catherine, The International Protection of Internally Displaced Persons (2004)—890
- Piatt, Bill, Only English? Law and Language Policy in the United States (1990)—70
- Pickus, Noah M.J. (ed.), Immigration and Citizenship in the Twenty-First Century (1998)—56
- Pilcher, Susan L., Justice without a Blindfold: Criminal Proceedings and the Alien Defendant, 50 Arkansas L. Rev. 269 (1997)—696
- Pinnix, John L. (ed.), Ethics in a Brave New World (2004)—321
- Pistone, Michele R., A Times Sensitive Response to Professor Aleinikoff's Detaining Plenary Power, 16 Georgetown Immigration L.J. 391 (2002)—219
- Pistone, Michele R., Asylum Filing Deadlines: Unfair and Unnecessary, 10 Georgetown Immigration L.J. 95 (1996)—1045
- Pistone, Michele R., Justice Delayed is Justice Denied: A Proposal for Ending the Unnecessary Detention of Asylum Seekers, 12 Harvard Human Rights J. 197 (1999)—1057
- Pistone, Michele R. & Hoeffner, John J., Rethinking Immigration of the Highly-Skilled and Educated in the Post-9/11 World, 5 Georgetown J. L. & Public Policy 495 (2007)—374
- Pistone, Michele R. & Hoeffner, John J., Rules are Made to be Broken: How the Process of Expedited Removal Fails Asylum Seekers, 20 Georgetown Immigration L.J. 167 (2006)—1055
- Pistone, Michele R. & Hoeffner, John J., Stepping out of the Brain Drain—Applying Catholic Social Teaching in a New Era of Migration (2007)—37
- Pistone, Michele R. & Hoeffner, John J., The Acceptance of Immigrants: Lessons from the Past and Questions for the Future, 10 Mediterranean J. Human Rights 7 (2006)—61
- Pitkin, Thomas M., Keepers of the Gate: A History of Ellis Island (1975)—463
- Plascencia, Luis F.B., et al., Restricting Immigrant Access to Employment: An Examination of Regulations in Five States (Aug. 1999)—1374
- Plender, Richard, International Migration Law (rev. 2d ed. 1988)—36, 148, 112
- Portes, Alejandro & Rumbaut, Rubén G., Immigrant America: A Portrait (2006)—1141
- Portes, Alejandro & Schauflier, Richard, Language and the Second Generation: Bilingualism Yesterday and Today, 28 International Migration Rev. 640 (1994)—70

- Pitman, Robert D., E Pluribus Unum: Diversity and Community in the Twenty-first Century, 30 Scandinavian Political Studies 137 (2007)—61
- Quinn, Ryan & Yale-Loehr, Stephen, Private Immigration Bills: An Overview, 9 BIB 1147 (Oct. 1, 2004)—627, 629
- Raffonelli, Lisa, INS Final Rule to Assist Victims of Trafficking, 23 Refugee Reports 1 (Apr. 2002)—1156
- Ramji-Nogales, Jaya, A Global Approach to Secret Evidence: How Human Rights Law Can Reform Our Immigration System, 39 Columbia Human Rights L. Rev. 287 (2008)—838
- Ramji-Nogales, Jaya, Schoenholtz, Andrew I. & Schrag, Philip G., Refugee Roulette: Disparities in Asylum Adjudication, 60 Stanford L. Rev. 295 (2007)—1038
- Rana, Shruti, "Streamlining" the Rule of Law: How the Department of Justice is Undermining Judicial Review of Agency Action, 2009 Univ. Illinois L. Rev. 101 (2009)—745
- Rawitz, Sidney B., From Wong Yang Sung to Black Robes, 65 IR 453 (1988)—659
- Rawls, John, A Theory of Justice (1971)—36
- Reich, Peter L., Environmental Metaphor in the Alien Benefits Debate, 42 UCLA L. Rev. 1577 (1995)—1145, 1286
- Reich, Peter L., Jurisprudential Tradition and Undocumented Alien Entitlements, 6 Georgetown Immigration L.J. 1 (1992)—1192
- Reich, Peter L., Public Benefits for Undocumented Aliens: State Law into the Breach Once More, 21 New Mexico L. Rev. 219 (1991)—1192
- Ressler, Everett M., Boothby, Neil, & Steinbock, Daniel J., Unaccompanied Children: Care and Protection in Wars, Natural Disasters, and Refugee Movements (1988)—1035
- Rice, Marcelle, Protecting Parents: Why Mothers and Fathers Who Oppose Female Genital Cutting Qualify for Asylum, Nov. 2004 Immigration Briefings—969-70
- Robbins, Ira P., The Revitalization of the Common Law Civil Writ of Audita Quere-la as a Post-Conviction Remedy in Criminal Cases: The Immigration Context and Beyond, 6 Georgetown Immigration L.J. 643 (1992)—560
- Roberts, Maurice A., Proposed: A Specialized Statutory Immigration Court, 18 San Diego L. Rev. 1 (1980)—751
- Roberts, Maurice A., The Exercise of Administrative Discretion Under the Immigration Laws, 13 San Diego L.Rev. 144 (1975)—623-24
- Roberts, Maurice A. & Yale-Loehr, Stephen, Employers as Junior Immigration Inspectors: The Impact of the 1986 Immigration Reform and Control Act, 21 Internat'l Lawyer 1013 (1987)—1165
- Roberts, Maurice A. & Yale-Loehr, Stephen, Understanding the 1986 Immigration Law (1987)—1158, 1178
- Robie, William R., The Purpose and Effect of the Proposed Rules of Procedure for Proceedings Before Immigration Judges, 1 Georgetown Immigration L.J. 269 (1986)—656
- Robin-Olivier, Sophie, Citizens and Noncitizens in Europe: European Union Measures Against Terrorism After September 11, 25 Boston College Third World L. Rev. 197 (2005)—867
- Rochvarg, Arnold, Report to the Administrative Conference—Reforming the Administrative Naturalization Process: Reducing Delays While Increasing Fairness, 9 Georgetown Immigration L.J. 397 (1995)—1314
- Rodríguez, Cristina M., E Pluribus Unum: How Bilingualism Strengthens American Democracy, in Democracy: A Journal of Ideas at 34 et seq. (March 2007)—61, 70
- Rodríguez, Cristina M., Guest Workers and Integration: Toward a Theory of What Migrants and Americans Owe One Another, 2007 Univ. Chicago Legal Forum 219—32, 62, 382-83, 1234, 1236
- Rodríguez, Cristina M., Language and Participation, 94 California L. Rev. 687 (2006)—41, 64, 65, 66, 67, 68
- Rodríguez, Cristina M., Language Diversity in the Workplace, 100 Northwestern Univ. L. Rev. 1689 (2006)—68
- Rodríguez, Cristina M., Latinos and Immigrants, 11 Harvard Latino L. Rev. 247 (2008)—96
- Rodríguez, Cristina M., The Citizenship Paradox in a Transnational Age, 106 Mich. L. Rev. 1111 (2008)—1146
- Rodríguez, Cristina M., The Significance of the Local in Immigration Regulation, 106 Michigan L. Rev. 567 (2008)—12, 132, 1224, 1241, 1242, 1255, 1277, 1285
- Rodríguez, Cristina M. et al., Testing the Limits: A Framework for Assessing the Legality of State and Local Immigration Measures, Migration Policy Institute Paper (2007), available at migrationpolicy.org/pubs/NCIIP..AssessingtheLegalityofStateandLocalImmigrationMeasures121307.pdf—1257, 1276, 1280, 1281, 1282, 1286
- Rollin, Joseph Justin, Humpty Dumpty Logic: Arguing Against the "Aggravated Misdemeanor" in Immigration Law, 6 BIB 445 (May 15, 2001)—584
- Román, Ediberto, Coalitions and Collective Memories: A Search for Common Ground, 58 Mercer L. Rev. 637 (2007)—97
- Román, Ediberto, The Alien Invasion?, 45 Houston L. Rev. 841 (2008)—64

- Román, Ediberto, Who Exactly is Living La Vida Loca?: The Legal and Political Consequences of Latino-Latina Ethnic and Racial Stereotypes in Film and Other Media, 4 Iowa J. Race, Gender & Justice 37 (2000)—64
- Romero, Victor C., Alienated—Immigrant Rights, the Constitution, and Equality in America (2005)—115
- Romero, Victor C., "Aren't You Latino?" Building Bridges upon Common Misperceptions, 33 U.C. Davis L. Rev. 837 (2000)—97, 110
- Romero, Victor C., Broadening Our World: Citizens and Immigrants of Color in America, 27 Capital Univ. L. Rev. 13 (1998)—106
- Romero, Victor C., Critical Race Theory in Three Acts: Racial Profiling, Affirmative Action, and the Diversity Visa Lottery, 66 Albany L. Rev. 375 (2003)—845
- Romero, Victor C., Crossing Borders: Loving v. Virginia as a Story of Migration, 51 Howard L.J. 53 (2007)—282
- Romero, Victor C., Decoupling "Terrorist" from "Immigrant": An Enhanced Role for the Federal Courts Post 9/11, 7 Univ. of Iowa J. of Gender, Race & Justice 201 (2003)—839
- Romero, Victor C., Everyday Law for Immigrants (2009)—649
- Romero, Victor C., Expanding the Circle of Membership by Reconstructing the "Alien": Lessons from Social Psychology and the "Promise Enforcement" Cases, 32 Univ. Mich. Journal of Law Reform 1 (1998)—698
- Romero, Victor C., Noncitizen Students and Immigration Policy Post-9/11, 17 Georgetown Immigration L.J. 357 (2003)—396, 825
- Romero, Victor C., On Elián and Aliens: A Political Solution to the Plenary Power Problem, 4 NYU J. of Legislation & Public Policy 343 (2000-01)—97
- Romero, Victor C., Post-secondary School Education Benefits for Undocumented Immigrants: Promises and Pitfalls, 27 North Carolina J. Internat'l L. & Commercial Regulation 393 (2002)—1209
- Romero, Victor C., Proxies for Loyalty in Constitutional Immigration Law: Citizenship and Race After September 11, 52 DePaul L. Rev. 871 (2003)—845, 850
- Romero, Victor C., On Elián and Aliens: A Political Solution to the Plenary Power Problem, 4 NYU J. Legislation & Public Policy 343 (2000-01)—1036
- Romero, Victor C., Racial Profiling: "Driving While Mexican" and Affirmative Action, 6 Michigan J. Race & Law 195 (2000)—108, 845
- Romero, Victor C., Restricting Hate Speech Against "Private Figures": Lessons in Power-Based Censorship from Defamation Law, 33 Columbia Human Rights L. Rev. 1 (2001)—108
- Romero, Victor C., The Child Citizenship Act and the Family Reunification Act: Valuing the Citizen Child as Well as the Citizen Parent, 55 Fla. L. Rev. 489 (2003)—1314
- Romero, Victor C., The Congruence Principle Applied: Rethinking Equal Protection Review of Federal Alienage Classifications after Adarand Constructors, Inc. v. Peña, 76 Oregon L. Rev. 425 (1997)—1140, 1375
- Romero, Victor C., The Selective Deportation of Same-Gender Partners: In Search of the "Rara Avis", 56 Univ. Miami L. Rev. 537 (2002)—272
- Romero, Victor C., Whatever Happened to the Fourth Amendment? Undocumented Immigrants' Rights after INS v. Lopez-Mendoza and United States v. Verdugo-Urquidez, 65 Southern California L. Rev. 999 (1992)—731
- Rooney, Kevin, Testimony before Subcomm. on Immigration, Border Security, and Claims, Comm. on the Judiciary, U.S. House of Reps. (May 8, 2003)—835
- Rosati, Kristen B., Article 3 of the United Nations Convention Against Torture: A Powerful Tool to Prevent Removal Just Became More Powerful, 4 BIB 137 (Feb. 15, 1999)—1095, 1097, 1105, 1107, 1109
- Rosati, Kristen B., The United Nations Convention Against Torture: A Self-Executing Treaty that Prevents the Removal of Persons Ineligible for Asylum and Withholding of Removal, 26 Denver J. Internat'l L. 533 (1998)—1097
- Rosberg, Gerald M., Aliens and Equal Protection: Why Not the Right to Vote?, 75 Michigan L. Rev. 1092 (1977)—1375
- Rose, Linda, De-Mystifying Reduction in Recruitment, 19 Immigration Law Today 205 (April 2000)—307
- Rosenberg, Lory Diana, Administrative Deportation Proceedings: Accomplishment or Abomination?, 72 IR 721 (May 25, 1996)—809
- Rosenberg, Lory Diana, Arrests, Jails, and Video Hearings, 9 BIB 1233 (Oct. 15, 2004)—654
- Rosenberg, Lory Diana, Ask Lory—Clash of Intentions, 8 BIB 1881 (Dec. 15, 2003)—539
- Rosenberg, Lory Diana, Credibility Determinations in Asylum Cases: Evidentiary Factors and Regulatory Limits Under the Clearly Erroneous Standard, 8 BIB 573 (Apr. 1, 2003)—749
- Rosenberg, Lory Diana, It's Alive: A Noncitizen's Right to Competent Counsel Before the EOIR and BCIS After Matter of Asaad, 8 BIB 943 (June 1, 2003)—712
- Rosenberg, Lory Diana, Love and Marriage After Judicial Review: Challenging the Logistics of Unlawful Presence, 10 BIB 1781 (Dec. 1, 2005)—432

- Rosenberg, Lory Diana, Recognition of Vacation of Conviction and Matter of Pickering: Comity or Tragedy?, 8 BIB 1103 (July 1, 2003)—557
- Rosenberg, Lory Diana, The Courts and Interception: The United States' Interdiction Experience and Its Impact on Refugees and Asylum Seekers, 17 Georgetown Immigration L.J. 199 (2003)—806, 1064
- Rosenberg, Lory Diana & Sabagh, Denise, A Practitioner's Guide to INA § 212(c), Immigration Briefings (April 1993)—595
- Rosenberg, Lory Diana & Vargas-Padilla, Nelson, An Odyssey of Immigration Consequences of Crime: The BIA's 2001 Interpretations, 78 IR 909 (June 4, 2001)—549, 574
- Rosenberg, Lory Diana & Vargas-Padilla, Nelson, Immigration Consequences of Crimes on the Doorstep of the Twenty-First Century, 77 IR 685 (May 26, 2000)—549, 574
- Rosenfield, Harry N., Consular Non-Reviewability: A Case Study in Administrative Absolutism, 41 A.B.A.J. 1109 (1955)—487
- Roth, Charles Roth, Worldwide Liberalization of Dual Citizenship Rules and Potential Side Effects on U.S. Citizenship, 83 IR 2529 (Nov. 20, 2006)—1317
- Rubenstein, Kim, Citizenship in Australia: Unscrambling Its Meaning, 20 Melbourne L. Rev. 503 (1995)—1374
- Rubenstein, Kim & Adler, Daniel, International Citizenship: The Future of Nationality in a Globalized World, 7 Indiana J. Global Legal Studies 519 (2000)—1318
- Ruhs, Martin, Temporary foreign worker programmes: Policies, adverse consequences, and the need to make them work, 6 Perspectives on Labour Migration 10 (2003), available at <http://www.ilo.org/public/english/protection/migrant/download/pom/pom6e.pdf>—1235
- Rumbaut, Ruben G. & Ewing, Walter A., Immig. Policy Center, Amer. Immig. Law Foundation, The Myth of Immigrant Criminality and the Paradox of Assimilation (2007)—550, 1145
- Ruse, Michael, Homosexuality—A Philosophical Inquiry (1988)—278
- Sadat, Leila, Official English, Nationalism and Linguistic Terror: A French Lesson, 71 Washington L.Rev. 285 (1996)—66, 70
- Saito, Natsu Taylor, Alien and Non-Alien Alike: Citizenship, "Foreignness," and Racial Hierarchy in American Law, 76 Oregon L. Rev. 261 (1997)—104
- Saito, Natsu Taylor, Asserting Plenary Power over the "Other": Indians, Immigrants, Colonial Subjects, and Why U.S. Jurisprudence Needs to Incorporate International Law, 20 Yale L. & Policy Rev. 427 (2002)—150
- Saito, Natsu Taylor, Border Constructions: Immigration Enforcement and Territorial Presumptions, 10 J. Gender, Race & Justice 193 (2007)—1150
- Saito, Natsu Taylor, Whose Liberty? Whose Security? The USA PATRIOT Act in the Context of COINTELPRO and the Unlawful Suppression of Political Dissent, 81 Oregon L. Rev. 1051 (2002)—867
- Saito, Natsu Taylor, Will Force Trump Legality After September 11? American Jurisprudence Confronts the Rule of Law, 17 Georgetown Immigration L.J. 1 (2002)—817, 820
- Salzer, Lucy E., Laws Harsh as Tigers: Chinese Immigrants and the Shaping of Modern Immigration Law (1995)—129
- Salzer, Lucy E., Wong Kim Ark: The Contest over Birthright Citizenship, in David A. Martin & Peter H. Schuck (eds.), Immigration Stories, chap. 3 (2005)—1291
- Sassen, Saskia, Territory, Authority, Rights (2006)—12
- Saucedo, Leticia M., A New "U": Organizing Victims and Protecting Immigrant Workers, 42 Univ. of Richmond L. Rev. 891 (2008)—412
- Saucedo, Leticia M., Addressing Segregation in the Brown Collar Workplace: Toward a Solution for the Inexorable 100%, 41 Univ. Michigan J. L. Reform 447 (2008)—382
- Saucedo, Leticia M., The Employer Preference for the Subservient Worker and the Making of the Brown Collar Workplace, 67 Ohio State L.J. 961 (2006)—382
- Savin-Williams, Ritch C., Theoretical Perspectives Accounting for Adolescent Homosexuality, 9 J. Adolescent Health Care 95 (1988)—278
- Scanlan, John A., Aliens in the Marketplace of Ideas: The Government, The Academy, and the McCarran-Walter Act, 66 Texas L.Rev. 1481 (1988)—193-94, 438, 441
- Scanlan, John A., American-Arab—Getting the Balance Wrong—Again!, 52 Administrative L. Rev. 347 (2000)—192
- Scanlan, John A., Book Review, Something Happened: Descent into the Immigration Maelstrom, 4 Indiana J. Global Legal Studies 239 (1996)—92
- Scanlan, John A., Call and Response: The Particular and the General, 2000 Univ. Illinois 639—111
- Scanlan, John A., & Kent, O.T., The Force of Moral Arguments for a Just Immigration Policy in a Hobbesian Universe: The Contemporary American Example, in Mark Gibney (ed.), Open Borders? Closed Societies? The Ethical and Political Issues, at 61 et seq. (1988)—31
- Scaperlanda, Michael, Are We That Far Gone?: Due Process and Secret Deportation Proceedings, 7 Stanford L. & Policy Rev. 23 (1996)—831

- Scaperlanda, Michael, Immigration and Evil: The Religious Challenge, 83 Univ. Detroit Mercy L. Rev. 835 (2006)—37
- Scaperlanda, Michael, Kulturkampf in the Backwaters: Homosexuality and Immigration Law, 11 Widener J. Pub. L. 475 (2002)—281-82, 944
- Scaperlanda, Michael, Partial Membership: Aliens and the Constitutional Community, 81 Iowa L. Rev. 707 (1996)—115, 1207, 1375
- Scaperlanda, Michael, Polishing the Tarnished Golden Door, 1993 Wisconsin L. Rev. 965—187, 244
- Scaperlanda, Michael, Who is My Neighbor? An Essay on Immigrants, Welfare Reform, and the Constitution, 29 Conn. L. Rev. 1587 (1997)—194
- Scharf, Irene, Commentary by Irene Scharf on Anderson v. Conboy, 3 BIB 1102 (Nov. 1, 1998)—1171
- Scharf, Irene, Commentary on United States v. Balsys, 3 BIB 886 (Sept. 1, 1998)—731
- Scharf, Irene, Nourishing Justice and the Continuum: Implementing a Blended Model in an Immigration Law Clinic, 12 Clinical L. Rev. 243 (2005)—681
- Scharf, Irene, The Case for Naturalization, 12 BIB 853 (July 1, 2007)—1312
- Scharf, Irene, Tired of Your Masses: A History of and Judicial Responses to Early 20th Century Anti-Immigrant Legislation, 21 Univ. Hawaii L. Rev. 131 (1999)—66, 92
- Scharf, Irene & Hess, Christine, What Process is Due? Unaccompanied Minors' Rights to Deportation Hearings, 1988 Duke L.J. 114—635
- Schauer, Frederick, Community, Citizenship, and the Search for National Identity, 84 Michigan L. Rev. 1504 (1986)—1395
- Scheppele, Kim Lane, Other People's PATRIOT Acts: Europe's Response to September 11, 50 Loyola L. Rev. 67 (2004)—867
- Schmidt, Paul W., Immigration Benefits for Children Born Out of Wedlock and for their Natural Fathers: A Survey of the Law, 16 San Diego L.Rev. 11 (1978)—295
- Schmidt, Paul W., Detention of Aliens, 24 San Diego L. Rev. 305 (1987)—167
- Schoenholtz, Andrew I., Aiding and Abetting Persecutors: The Seizure and Return of Haitian Refugees in Violation of the U.N. Refugee Convention and Protocol, 7 Georgetown Immigration L.J. 67 (1993)—1083
- Schoenholtz, Andrew I., Beyond the Supreme Court: A Modest Plea to Improve Our Asylum System, 14 Georgetown Immigration L.J. 541 (2000)—1001
- Schoenholtz, Andrew I., Refugee Protection in the United States Post-September 11, 36 Columbia Human Rights L. Rev. 323 (2005)—843, 1033, 1084
- Schoenholtz, Andy, Supreme Court Orders Ninth Circuit to Defer to the BIA in Refugees Cases, 4 BIB 615 (June 15, 1999)—1023
- Schoenholtz, Andrew I. & Jacobs, Jonathan, The State of Asylum Representation: Ideas for Change, 16 Georgetown Immigration L.J. 739 (2002)—669
- Schorr, Naomi & Yale-Loehr, Stephen, The Odyssey of the J-2: Forty-Three Years of Trying Not to Go Home Again, 18 Georgetown Immigration L.J. 221 (2004)—398
- Schrag, Philip G., A Well-Founded Fear—The Congressional Battle to Save Asylum in America (2000)—1028
- Schrag, Philip G., Interviewing a Client, Asylum Law Manual, Center for Applied Legal Studies of Georgetown University Law Center (2005 ed.)—1087
- Schrag, Philip G., The Summary Affirmance Proposal of the Board of Immigration Appeals, 12 Georgetown Immigration L.J. 531 (1998)—745
- Schrag, Philip G. & Pistone, Michele R., The New Asylum Rule: Not Yet a Model of Fair Procedure, 11 Georgetown Immigration L.J. 267 (1997)—1055
- Schrag, Philip G. & Pistone, Michele R., The 1996 Immigration Act: Asylum Application Deadlines and Expedited Removal—What the INS Should Do, 73 IR 1565 (Nov. 11, 1996)—1045
- Schuck, Peter H., A Case for Profiling, The American Lawyer, at 59 et seq. (Jan. 2002)—846
- Schuck, Peter H., Alien Rumination, 105 Yale L.J. 1963 (1996)—64
- Schuck, Peter H., Citizens, Strangers, and In-Betweens: Essays on Immigration and Citizenship (1998)—1318
- Schuck, Peter H., Citizenship in Federal Systems, 48 American J. Comparative L. 195 (2000)—1396
- Schuck, Peter H., Diversity in America—Keeping Government at a Safe Distance (2003)—39, 59, 60, 70, 348, 354
- Schuck, Peter H., INS Detention and Removal: A "White Paper," 11 Georgetown Immigration L.J. 667 (1997)—240, 817
- Schuck, Peter H., Kleindienst v. Mandel: Plenary Power v. the Professors, in David A. Martin & Peter H. Schuck (eds.), Immigration Stories, chap. 7 (2005)—193
- Schuck, Peter H., Membership in the Liberal Polity: The Devaluation of American Citizenship, in William R. Brubaker (ed.), Immigration and the Politics of Citizenship in Europe and North America, at 51 et seq. (1989), reprinted, 3 Georgetown Immigration L.J. 1 (1989)—1381
- Schuck, Peter H., Plural Citizenships, in Peter H. Schuck, Citizens, Strangers, and In-Betweens: Essays on Immigration and Citizenship, ch. 10 (1998)—1318
- Schuck, Peter H., Refugee Burden-Sharing: A Modest Proposal, 22 Yale J. Internat'l L. 243 (1997)—889, 1120

- Schuck, Peter H., Taking Immigration Federalism Seriously, 2007 Univ. of Chicago Legal Forum 57—132, 1239—40, 1277
- Schuck, Peter H., The Emerging Political Consensus on Immigration Law, 5 Georgetown Immigration L.J. 1 (1991)—93, 1143
- Schuck, Peter H., The Message of Proposition 187, 26 Pacific L.J. 989 (1995)—1286
- Schuck, Peter H., The Morality of Immigration Policy, 45 San Diego L. Rev. 865 (2008)—32
- Schuck, Peter H., The Politics of Rapid Legal Change: Immigration Policy in the 1980's, 6 Studies in Amer. Political Development 37 (1992)—93
- Schuck, Peter H., The Re-Evaluation of American Citizenship, 12 Georgetown Immigration L.J. 1 (1997)—1387
- Schuck, Peter H., The Transformation of Immigration Law, 84 Columbia L.Rev. 1 (1984)—33, 35, 115, 187, 1208
- Schuck, Peter H., Whose Membership Is It, Anyway? Comments on Gerald Neuman, 35 Virginia J. Internat'l L. 321 (1994)—1335
- Schuck, Peter H. & Elliott, E. Donald, Studying Administrative Law: A Methodology for, and Report on, New Empirical Research, 42 Administrative L.Rev. 519 (1990)—502, 789—90
- Schuck, Peter H. & Smith, Rogers M., Citizenship Without Consent—Illegal Aliens in the American Polity (1985)—1291, 1320, 1335, 1371
- Schuck, Peter H. & Smith, Rogers M., Membership and Consent: Actual or Mythic?, 11 Yale J. Internat'l L. 545 (1986)—1335
- Schuck, Peter H. & Wang, Theodore H., Continuity and Change: Patterns of Immigration Litigation in the Courts, 1979—1990, 45 Stanford L.Rev. 115 (1992)—790
- Schuck, Peter H. & Williams, John, Removing Criminal Aliens: The Pitfalls and Promises of Federalism, 22 Harvard J. L. & Public Policy 367 (1999)—550
- Schwartz, Liam & Lazerow, Michelle L., The Consul and the Visas Condor—Closely Scrutinizing, Immigration Law Today, at 24 (May/June 2003)—839
- Schwartz, Warren F. (ed.), Justice in Immigration (1995)—31
- Seltzer, Suzanne, Demystifying the HHS Waiver Process, 9 BIB 1165 (Oct. 1, 2004)—402
- Shachar, Ayelet, The Birthright Lottery—Citizenship and Global Inequality (2009)—33
- Shachar, Ayelet, The Shifting Border of Immigration Regulation, 3 Stanford Journal of Civil Rights & Civil Liberties 165 (2007)—37
- Shachar, Ayelet, Whose Republic?: Citizenship and Membership in the Israeli Polity, 13 Georgetown Immigration L.J. 233 (1999)—1374
- Shah, Ragini, Sharing the American Dream: Towards Formalizing the Status of Long-Term Resident Undocumented Children in the United States, 39 Columbia Human Rights L. Rev. 637 (2008)—1209
- Shapiro, Steven R., Ideological Exclusions: Closing the Border to Political Dissidents, 100 Harvard L.Rev. 930 (1987)—194, 442
- Sharpless, Rebecca, Toward a True Elements Test: Taylor and the Categorical Analysis of Crimes in Immigration Law, 62 Univ. Miami L. Rev. 979 (2008)—581
- Shavers, Anna Williams, The Invisible Others and Immigrant Rights: A Commentary, 45 Houston L. Rev. 99 (2008)—64
- Shusterman, Carl M. & Neal, David L., Survey and Analysis of H-1B Labor Condition Application Decisions, 72 IR 49 (Jan. 9, 1995)—374
- Silverman, Andrew, An Historical and Legal Perspective of Mexican Migration, 1988 Arizona J. Internat'l & Comp. L. 138—92
- Simon, Julian L., The Economic Consequences of Immigration (2d ed. 1999)—83, 1143, 1145
- Singer, Audrey (ed.), Immigrants, Their Families, and Their Communities in the Aftermath of Welfare Reform, Research Perspectives in Migration (Carnegie Endowment for International Peace 2001)—1380
- Sinha, S. Prakash, Asylum and International Law (1971)—926
- Sklar, Morton, New Convention Against Torture Procedures and Standards, July 1999 Immigration Briefings—1095
- Slocum, Brian G., Canons, The Plenary Power Doctrine and Immigration Law, 34 Florida State Univ. L. Rev. 363 (2007)—242
- Slocum, Brian G., Courts vs. the Political Branches: Immigration "Reform" and the Battle for the Future of Immigration Law, 5 Georgetown J. L. & Public Policy 509 (2007)—783
- Slocum, Brian G., The Immigration Rule of Lenity and Chevron Deference, 17 Georgetown Immigration L.J. 515 (2003)—521
- Slocum, Brian G., The War on Terrorism and the Extraterritorial Application of the Constitution in Immigration Law, 84 Denver L. Rev. 1017 (2007)—152
- Smith, Debbie & ABC Legal Team, The ABC Settlement: A Guide for Class Members and Advocates, 72 IR 1497 (Nov. 6, 1995)—1032
- Smith, James F., A Nation that Welcomes Immigrants? An Historical Examination of United States Immigration Policy, 1 U.C. Davis J. Internat'l L. & Policy 227 (1995)—13
- Smith, James F., NAFTA and Human Rights: A Necessary Linkage, 27 U.C. Davis L.Rev. 793 (1994)—387

- Smith, James F., United States Immigration Law As We Know It: El Clandestino, The American Gulag, Rounding Up the Usual Suspects, 38 U.C. Davis L. Rev. 747 (2005)—1140
- Smith, James M., Freedom's Fetters (1956)—436
- Smith, James P. & Edmonston, Barry (eds.), National Research Council of the National Academy of Sciences, The New Americans—Economic, Demographic, and Fiscal Effects of Immigration (1997)—78, 85
- Smith, Rogers M., Civic Ideals: Conflicting Visions of Citizenship in U.S. History (1997)—1395
- Smolla, Rodney A., The Reemergence of the Right-Privilege Distinction in Constitutional Law: The Price of Protesting Too Much, 35 Stanford L.Rev. 69 (1982)—154
- Song, Julie M., In re L: Overcoming an Aggravated Felony Conviction through the Common Law Remedy of Coram Nobis, 77 IR 993 (July 24, 2000)—560
- Sopf, Davor, Temporary Protection in Europe after 1990: The "Right to Remain" of Genuine Convention Refugees, 6 Washington Univ. J. L. & Policy 109 (2001)—1120
- Southern Poverty Law Center, Close to Slavery: Guest Worker Programs in the United States 5 (2007), available at <http://www.splcenter.org/pdf/static/SPLCguestworker.pdf>—1236
- Spiro, Peter J., Afroyim: Vaunting Citizenship, Presaging Transnationality, in David A. Martin & Peter H. Schuck (eds.), Immigration Stories, chap. 6 (2005)—1358
- Spiro, Peter J., Beyond Citizenship—American Identity after Globalization (2008)—1396
- Spiro, Peter J., Dual Nationality and the Meaning of Citizenship, 46 Emory L.J. 1411 (1997)—1318, 1319
- Spiro, Peter J., Explaining the End of Plenary Power, 16 Georgetown Immigration L.J. 339 (2002)—219
- Spiro, Peter J., Learning to Live with Immigration Federalism, 29 Connecticut L. Rev. 1627 (1997)—132, 1239
- Spiro, Peter J., Perfecting Political Diaspora, 81 NYU L. Rev. 207 (2006)—1396
- Spiro, Peter J., Questioning Barriers to Naturalization, 13 Georgetown Immigration L.J. 479 (1999)—1307
- Spiro, Peter J., The Citizenship Dilemma, 51 Stanford L. Rev. 597 (1999)—1396
- Spiro, Peter J., The States and Immigration in an Era of Demi-Sovereignities, 35 Virginia J. Internat'l L. 121 (1994)—132, 1239
- Srikantiah, Jayashri, Perfect Victims and Real Survivors: The Iconic Victim in Domestic Human Trafficking Law, 87 Boston Univ. L. Rev. 157 (2007)—1156
- Starr, Lynn Acker, The Ineffectiveness and Impact of the Human Immunodeficiency Virus (HIV) Exclusion in U.S. Immigration Law, 3 Georgetown Immigration L.J. 87 (1989)—462
- Stein, Dan & Bauer, John, Interpreting the 14th Amendment: Automatic Citizenship for Children of Illegal Immigrants?, 7 Stanford L. & Policy Rev. #2 at 127 et seq. (1996)—1335
- Steinbock, Daniel J., Interpreting the Refugee Definition, 45 UCLA L. Rev. 733 (1998)—868, 1083
- Steinbock, Daniel J., National Identity Cards: Fourth and Fifth Amendment Issues, 56 Florida L. Rev. 697 (2004), reproduced, 10 BIB 1467 (Oct. 1, 2005)—1168
- Steinbock, Daniel J., Separated Children in Mass Migration: Causes and Cures, 22 St. Louis Univ. Public L. Rev. 297 (2003)—1035
- Steinbock, Daniel J., The Admission of Unaccompanied Children into the United States, 7 Yale L. & Policy Rev. 137 (1989)—1035
- Steinbock, Daniel J., The Qualities of Mercy: Maximizing the Impact of U.S. Refugee Resettlement, 36 Univ. Michigan J. L. Reform 951 (2003)—869
- Stevenson, Andrew, DREAMing of an Equal Future for Immigrant Children: Federal and State Initiatives to Improve Undocumented Students' Access to Post-secondary Education, 46 Arizona L. Rev. 551 (2004)—1209
- Stock, Margaret D., Driver Licenses and National Security: Myths and Reality, 10 BIB 422 (Mar. 1, 2005)—1227
- Stock, Margaret D., Providing Material Support to a Foreign Terrorist Organization: The Pentagon, The Department of State, The People's Mujahedin of Iran, & the Global War on Terrorism, 11 BIB 521 (June 1, 2006)—443
- Stock, Margaret D., Ten Things that Immigration Lawyers Should Know about the Army's New Non-Citizen Recruiting Program, 14 BIB 347 (Mar. 15, 2009)—1306
- Stock, Margaret D., The "REAL ID" Act—A Real Nightmare for DoD, The Officer (Apr. 2005)—1227
- Stock, William A., So, Now What? A Lighthearted Look at Strategies for Dealing with the H-1B Cap, 10 BIB 471 (Mar. 15, 2005)—375
- Storchevoy, Leonard, The Right to Family Reunification in the Immigration Law of the Commonwealth Caribbean and the United States: A Comparative Study, 7 Touro Internat'l L. Rev. 177 (1997)—302-03
- Stotzky, Irwin P., Silencing the Guns in Haiti (1997)—1081
- Strauss, Peter L., Was there a Baby in the Bathwater? A Comment on the Supreme Court's Legislative Veto Decision, 1983 Duke L.J. 789—204

- Strojny, Andrew M., Papers, Papers ... Please: A National ID or an Electronic Tattoo, 72 IR 617 (May 8, 1995)—1168
- Stumpf, Juliet P., Fitting Punishment, 66 Wash. & Lee L. Rev., issue 4 (2009)—517
- Stumpf, Juliet P., States of Confusion: The Rise of State and Local Power over Immigration, 86 No. Car. L. Rev. 1557 (2008)—1242
- Stumpf, Juliet P., The Crimmigration Crisis: Immigrants, Crime, and Sovereign Power, 56 American Univ. L. Rev. 367 (2006)—549
- Su, Rick, A Localist Reading of Local Immigration Regulations, 86 No. Car. L. Rev. 1619 (2008)—1242
- Suárez-Orozco, Carola, Suárez-Orozco, Marcelo, & Todorova, Irina, Learning a New Land: Immigrant Students in American Society (2008)—65
- Suhrke, Astri, Global Refugee Movements and Strategies of Response, in Mary M. Kritz (ed.), U.S. Immigration and Refugee Policy, at 163 et seq. (1983)—872
- Sullivan, Kathleen M., Commentary on Reno v. American-Arab Anti-Discrimination Committee, 4 BIB 249 (Mar. 15, 1999)—770
- Sullivan, Kathleen M., Congress Streamlines Procedures for Certain Intercountry "Orphan" Adoptions, 1 BIB #3 (1996)—301
- Sullivan, Kathleen M., Intercountry Adoption Act Becomes Law, 5 BIB 977 (Dec. 1, 2000)—301
- Sullivan, Kathleen M., The Year in Detention Law and Policy: Immigration Detention Developments May 2003–April 2004, 9 BIB 851 (July 15, 2004)—1058
- Swain, Carol (ed.), Debating Immigration (2006)—28
- Takaki, Ronald T., Strangers from a Different Shore—A History of Asian Americans (1989)—129, 1145
- Taylor, Margaret H., Behind the Scenes of St. Cyr and Zadvydas: Making Policy in the Midst of Litigation, 16 Georgetown Immigration L.J. 271 (2002)—242
- Taylor, Margaret H., Dangerous by Decree: Detention Without Bond in Immigration Proceedings, 50 Loyola L. Rev. 149 (2004)—822
- Taylor, Margaret H., Detained Aliens Challenging Conditions of Confinement and the Porous Border of the Plenary Power Doctrine, 22 Hastings Constitutional L.Q. 1087 (1995)—115, 240, 1207, 1375
- Taylor, Margaret H., Promoting Legal Representation for Detained Aliens: Litigation and Administrative Reform, 29 Connecticut L. Rev. 1647 (1997)—681
- Taylor, Margaret H., Refugee Roulette in an Administrative Law Context: The Déjà Vu of Decisional Disparities in Agency Adjudication, 60 Stanford L. Rev. 475 (2007)—1039
- Taylor, Margaret H., Symbolic Detention, 20 In Defense of the Alien 153 (1998)—240
- Taylor, Margaret H., The 1996 Immigration Act: Detention and Related Issues, 74 IR 209 (Feb. 3, 1997)—240
- Taylor, Margaret H. & Wright, Ronald F., The Sentencing Judge as Immigration Judge, 51 Emory L.J. 1131 (2002)—810
- Teitelbaum, Michael S., Political Asylum in Theory and Practice, 76 Pub. Interest 74 (1984)—1033
- Teitelbaum, Michael S., Right versus Right: Immigration and Refugee Policy in the United States, 59 Foreign Affairs 21 (1980)—35
- Teitelbaum, Michael S., Skeptical Noises about the Immigration Multiplier, 23 Internat'l Migration Rev. 893 (1989)—301, 352
- Teitelbaum, Michael S. & Weiner, Myron (eds.), Introduction, Threatened Peoples, Threatened Borders 32 (1995)—924, 1064, 1081
- Teran, Lee J., Barriers to Protection at Home and Abroad: Mexican Victims of Domestic Violence and the Violence Against Women Act, 17 Boston Univ. Internat'l L.J. 1 (1999)—603
- Thornberry, Cedric H.R., Dr. Soblen and the Alien Law of the United Kingdom, 12 Internat'l & Comparative L.Q. 414 (1963)—248
- Thronson, David B., Choiceless Choices: Deportation and the Parent-Child Relationship, 6 Nevada L.J. 1165 (2006)—297, 645
- Thronson, David B., Creating Crisis: Immigration Raids and the Destabilization of Immigrant Families, 43 Wake Forest L. Rev. 391 (2008)—645, 1151
- Thronson, David B., Custody and Contradictions: Exploring Immigration Law as Federal Family Law in the Context of Child Custody, 59 Hastings L.J. 453 (2008)—261
- Thronson, David B., Kids Will Be Kids? Reconsidering Conceptions of Children's Rights Underlying Immigration Law, 63 Ohio State L.J. 979 (2002)—297
- Thronson, David B., Of Borders and Best Interests: Examining the Experiences of Undocumented Immigrants in U.S. Family Courts, 11 Texas Hispanic J. L. & Policy 45 (2005), reproduced and updated, 11 BIB 7 (Jan. 1, 2006)—1191
- Thronson, David B., You Can't Get Here from Here: Toward a More Child-Centered Immigration Law, 14 Virginia J. Social Policy & Law 58 (2006)—261
- Tilghman, Shirley M., Testimony before Comm. on Science, U.S. House of Reps. (Mar. 26, 2003)—840
- Ting, Jan C., "Other than a Chinaman": How U.S. Immigration Law Resulted from and Still Reflects a Policy of Excluding

- and Restricting Asian Immigration, 4 Temple Political & Civil Rights L. Rev. 301 (1995)—110, 129
- Ting, Jan C., Testimony to Subcomm. on Immigration, Border Security, and Claims, Comm. on the Judiciary, U.S. House of Reps. (Apr. 29, 2004)—354
- Ting, Jan C., Unobjectionable But Insufficient—Federal Initiatives in Response to the September 11 Terrorist Attacks, 34 Connecticut L. Rev. 1145 (2002)—821, 835, 842, 845
- Tooby, Norton & Rollin, J.J., Crimes of Moral Turpitude—The Complete Guide (2008 ed.)—560
- Torpey, John, The Invention of the Passport (2000)—14
- Tourney, Garfield, Hormones and Homosexuality, in Judd Marmor, Homosexual Behavior—A Modern Reappraisal, at 41 et seq. (1980)—278
- TRAC Immigration, Asylum Disparities Persist, Regardless of Court Location and Nationality (2007), <http://trac.syr.edu/immigration/reports/183>—1039
- Trillin, Calvin, Making Adjustments, The New Yorker, at 50 (May 28, 1984)—320
- Trucios-Haynes, Enid, Civil Rights, Latinos, and Immigration: Cybercascades and Other Distortions in the Immigration Reform Debate, 44 Univ. Louisville Brandeis L.J. 637 (2006)—306
- Trucios-Haynes, Enid, "Family Values" 1990s Style: U.S. Immigration Reform Proposals and the Abandonment of the Family, 36 Brandeis J. Family L. 241 (1997-98)—302
- Trucios-Haynes, Enid, National Interest Waivers, July 1995 Immigration Briefings—306
- Trucios-Haynes, Enid, Religion and the Immigration and Nationality Act: Using Old Saws on New Bones, 9 Georgetown Immigration L.J. 1 (1995)—344, 387
- Trucios-Haynes, Enid, Temporary Workers and Future Immigration Policy Conflicts: Protecting U.S. Workers and Satisfying the Demand for Global Human Capital, 40 Univ. Louisville Brandeis L.J. 967 (2002)—376
- Trucios-Haynes, Enid, The Legacy of Racially Restrictive Immigration Laws and Policies and the Construction of the American National Identity, 76 Oregon L. Rev. 369 (1997)—64
- Trucios-Haynes, Enid, The Rhetoric of Reform: Noncitizen Workers in the United States, 29 SIU L.J. 43 (2004)—383
- Trucios-Haynes, Enid & Shaukat, Lois Gimpel, Grounds of Inadmissibility under the Illegal Immigration Reform and Immigrant Responsibility Act of 1996, January & February 1998 Immigration Briefings—421
- Trujillo, Bernard, Immigrant Visa Distribution: The Case of Mexico, 2000 Wisconsin L. Rev. 713—260
- Tucker, Joe A., Assimilation to the United States: A Study of the Adjustment of Status and the Immigration Marriage Fraud Statutes, 7 Yale L. & Policy Rev. 20 (1989)—282, 509
- Türk, Volker, Forced Migration and Security, 15 Internat'l J. Refugee L. 113 (2003)—890
- Türk, Volker, Non-State Agents of Persecution, in Victor Chetail & Vera Gowlland-Debbas (eds.), Switzerland and the International Protection of Refugees, at 95 et seq. (2002)—973
- Türk, Volker, UNHCR'S Supervisory Responsibility, 14 Revue Québécoise de Droit International 135 (2001)—879
- Uchimiya, Diane, A Blackstone's Ratio for Asylum: Fighting Fraud While Preserving Procedural Due Process for Asylum Seekers, 26 Penn State Internat'l L. Rev. 383 (2007)—1033
- Ueda, Reed, Postwar Immigrant America—A Social History (1994)—13
- UNHCR, 2007 UNHCR Statistical Yearbook, <http://www.unhcr.org/cgi-bin/texis/vtx/home/openssl.pdf?id=4981c3252> & tbl=STATISTICS—890
- UNHCR, Centre for Documentation & Research, Internal Displacement in Africa, 18 Refugee Survey Q., issue #1 (entire issue) (1999)—890
- UNHCR, Executive Committee, Ex. Com. Conclusion 44, Detention of Refugees and Asylum-Seekers, No. 44 (XXXVII) (1986)—1056
- UNHCR, Guidance Note on Refugee Claims Relating to Sexual Orientation and Gender Identity (21 Nov. 2008)—967
- UNHCR, Guidelines on International Protection: "Membership of a particular social group" within the context of article IA(2) of the 1951 Convention and/or its 1967 Protocol relating to the Status of Refugees, U.N. Doc. HCR/GIP/02/02 (May 7, 2002)—933, 934, 936, 938, 954, 975, 983
- UNHCR, Guidelines on International Protection: Gender-Related Persecution within the context of Article 1A(2) of the 1951 Convention and/or its 1967 Protocol relating to the Status of Refugees, U.N. Doc. HCR/GIP/02/01 (May 7, 2002)—933, 954
- UNHCR, Handbook on Procedures and Criteria for Determining Refugee Status (1979)—915, 916, 975, 1002, 1015, 1016, 1023, 1024
- UNHCR, Revised Guidelines on Applicable Criteria and Standards Relating to the Detention of Asylum-Seekers (Feb. 1999)—1056

- U.S. Bureau of the Census, Enumeration and Residence Rules for the 1990 Census, 1990 Decennial Census Policy Memorandum No. 12 (1987)—1190
- U.S. Bureau of the Census, The Foreign-Born Population of the United States (Feb. 2005)—60
- U.S. Citizenship and Immigration Services, 2003 Yearbook of Immigration Statistics—23, 299, 347, 883, 885, 1033
- U.S. Citizenship and Immigration Services, 2007 Yearbook of Immigration Statistics—23, 24, 250, 350, 355, 356, 393, 519, 635, 868, 869, 1300, 1301
- U.S. Commission on Civil Rights, The Immigration Reform and Control Act: Assessing the Evaluation Process (Sept. 1989)—1165
- U.S. Commission on Immigration Reform, Becoming an American: Immigration and Immigrant Policy (Sept. 1997)—471, 487, 1380
- U.S. Commission on Immigration Reform, Legal Immigration: Setting Priorities (June 1995)—302, 343, 378
- U.S. Commission on Immigration Reform, U.S. Immigration Policy: Restoring Credibility (Sept. 1994)—1162, 1166
- U.S. Commission on Immigration Reform, U.S. Refugee Policy: Taking Leadership (June 1997)—889, 1022, 1055, 1057
- U.S. Commission on International Religious Freedom, Report on Asylum Seekers in Expedited Removal (Feb. 2005)—1053
- U.S. Congressional Budget Office, The Impact of Undocumented Immigrants on State/Local Budgets (Dec. 2007)—1144
- U.S. Congressional Research Service, 9/11 Commission: Implications for U.S. Immigration Law and Policy (Sept. 30, 2004)—866
- U.S. Congressional Research Service, Cost Estimates of Unauthorized (Illegal) Immigration (Aug. 11, 2005)—1144
- U.S. Congressional Research Service, Illegal Aliens: Analysis and Background, U.S. House Comm. on the Judiciary, 95th Cong., 1st Sess. (1977)—1141
- U.S. Congressional Research Service, Review of U.S. Refugee Resettlement Programs and Policies (Comm. Print, Senate Comm. on the Judiciary, 1980)—880, 881, 1114
- U.S. Congressional Research Service, Temporary Protected Status: Current Immigration Policy and Issues (Sept. 18, 2008), <http://fpc.state.gov/documents/organization/110760.pdf>—1118
- U.S. Congressional Research Service, Unauthorized Alien Students: Issues and "DREAM Act" Legislation (Jan. 30, 2007)—1209
- U.S. Council of Economic Advisers, Immigration's Economic Impact (June 20, 2007)—85
- U.S. Defense Security Agency, Citizenship of 206 Foreign Countries, available at <http://www.dss.mil/training/adr/forpref/forprefF.htm>—1317
- U.S. Dept. of Homeland Security, Estimates of the Unauthorized Immigrant Population Residing in the United States: January 2006 (Aug. 2007)—1142, 1151
- U.S. Dept. of Homeland Security, Office of the Inspector General, DHS Challenges in Consolidating Terrorist Watch List Information, No. OIG-04-31 (Aug. 2004)—840
- U.S. Dept. of Homeland Security, Refugees and Asylees: 2007, Annual Flow Report (2008), http://www.dhs.gov.xlibrary/assets/statistics/publications/ois.rfa_fr_2007.pdf—886
- U.S. Dept. of Justice, An Investigation of Allegations of Politicized Hiring by Monica Goodling and Other Staff in the Office of the Attorney General (July 28, 2008)—668
- U.S. Dept. of Justice, Office of the Inspector General, Inspection Report, The Potential for Fraud and INS's Efforts to Reduce the Risks of the Visa Waiver Pilot Program, Rpt. No. I-99-10 (Mar. 1999)—842
- U.S. Dept. of Justice, Office of the Inspector General, The September 11 Detainees: A Review of the Treatment of Aliens Held on Immigration Charges in Connection with the Investigation of the September 11 Attacks (April 2003)—818, 819
- U.S. Dept. of Labor, Dictionary of Occupational Titles (4th ed. 1991)—323
- U.S. Dept. of State, 2006 Report on International Religious Freedom, <http://www.state.gov/g/drl/rls/irf/2006/>—916
- U.S. Dept. of State, Dept. of Homeland Security, and Dept. of Health & Human Services, Proposed Refugee Admissions for Fiscal Year 2005, Report to the Congress (2004)—888
- U.S. Dept. of State et al., Proposed Refugee Admissions for Fiscal Year 2009, Report to the Congress—888
- U.S. Dept. of State, Trafficking in Persons Report (June 14, 2004)—1156
- U.S. General Accountability Office, U.S. Asylum System—Significant Variation Existed in Asylum Outcomes Across Immigration Courts and Judges, GA-08-940 (Sept. 2008)—1039
- U.S. General Accounting Office, Asylum Approval Rates for Selected Applicants (1987)—669
- U.S. General Accounting Office, Better Controls Needed Over Program Authorizing State and Local Enforcement of Federal Immigration Laws (January 2009), available at <http://www.gao.gov/new.items/09109.pdf>—1274, 1280

- U.S. General Accounting Office, Border Security—Implications of Eliminating the Visa Waiver Program, No. GAO-03-38 (Nov. 2002)—843
- U.S. General Accounting Office, Criminal Aliens—Prison Deportation Hearings Include Opportunities to Contest Deportation, Report No. GAO/GGD-90-79 (1990)—807, 808
- U.S. General Accounting Office, Illegal Aliens—Information on Selected Countries' Employment Prohibition Laws, No. GAO/GGD-86-17BR (Oct. 1985)—1168
- U.S. General Accounting Office, Illegal Aliens: Opportunities to Improve the Expedited Removal Process (Sept. 2000)—1053
- U.S. General Accounting Office, Immigration Reform—Employer Sanctions and the Question of Discrimination (Mar. 1990)—1164
- U.S. General Accounting Office, Naturalized Aliens: Efforts to Determine If INS Improperly Naturalized Some Aliens, GAO/GGD-98-62 (March 1998)—1304
- U.S. General Accounting Office, Report to Congressional Committees, Homeland Security—Justice Department's Project to Interview Aliens after September 11, 2001, No. GAO-03-459 (April 2003)—828, 829
- U.S. House of Reps. Comm. on the Judiciary, Grounds for Exclusion of Aliens under the Immigration and Nationality Act, Serial No. 7 (1988)—422, 438
- U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement, Parole of Arriving Aliens Found to Have a "Credible Fear" of Persecution or Torture (Nov. 6, 2007)—1054
- U.S. INS, 1987 Statistical Yearbook—883
- U.S. INS, 1989 Statistical Yearbook—883, 886
- U.S. INS, 1994 Statistical Yearbook—1178, 1301
- U.S. INS, 1998 Statistical Yearbook—347, 628
- U.S. INS, Guidelines for Children's Asylum Claims (Dec. 10, 1998)—1035
- U.S. INS, Immigration Reform and Control Act: Report on the Legalized Alien Population (1992)—1178
- U.S. Legal Services Corporation, The Erlenborn Commission Report, 15 Georgetown Immigration L.J. 99 (2001)—673, 680
- U.S. Office of Personnel Management, Investigations Service, Citizenship Laws of the World, <http://www.opm.gov/extra/investigate/IS-01.pdf>—1374
- U.S. Select Commission on Immigration and Refugee Policy, Immigration Policy and the National Interest: Final Report and Recommendations (Mar. 1, 1981)—345, 1150, 1157
- U.S. Social Security Administration, Congressional Response Report: Accuracy of the Social Security Administration's NUMIDENT File (Dec. 2006), available at <http://www.socialsecurity.gov/oig/ADOBEPDF/auditxt/A-08-06-26100.htm>—1167
- U.S. Visa Office, Report of the Visa Office 2007, <http://travel.state.gov/pdf/FY07AnnualReportTableXX.pdf>—430
- Van Alstyne, William W., The Demise of the Right-Privilege Distinction in Constitutional Law, 81 Harvard L.Rev. 1439 (1968)—154
- Van Selm, Joanne & Cooper, Betsy, Migration Policy Institute, The New "Boat People"—Ensuring Safety and Determining Status (Jan. 2006)—1062
- Vanheule, Dirk, A Comparison of the Judicial Interpretations of the Notion of Refugee, in Jean-Yves Carlier & Dirk Vanheule (eds.), Europe and Refugees: A Challenge?, chap. 5 (1997)—868
- Vargas, Jorge A., Consular Protection to Illegal Migratory Workers and Mexican Undocumented Minors: Two Sensitive Issues Addressed by the Thirteenth Annual Meeting of the United States-Mexico Binational Commission, 6 Florida State Univ. J. Transnat'l L. & Policy 143 (1996)—653
- Vargas, Jorge A., Dual Nationality for Mexicans, 35 San Diego L. Rev. 823 (1998)—1318
- Vargas, Jorge A., NAFTA, the Chiapas Rebellion, and the Emergence of Mexican Ethnic Law, 25 California Western Internat'l L.J. 1 (1994)—387
- Vargas, Jorge A., U.S. Border Patrol Abuses, Undocumented Mexican Workers, and International Human Rights, 2 San Diego Internat'l L.J. 1 (2001)—1148
- Varsanyi, Monica (ed.), State and Local Immigration Policy Activism in the U.S.: Interdisciplinary Perspectives (2009)—1238
- Vaughns, Katherine L., A Tale of Two Opinions: The Meaning of Statutes and the Nature of Judicial Decision-Making in the Administrative Context, 1995 Brigham Young Univ. L. Rev. 139—502
- Vaughns, Katherine L., Restoring the Rule of Law: Reflections on Fixing the Immigration System and Exploring Failed Policy Choices, 5 Univ. Maryland J. of Race, Religion, Gender and Class 151 (2005)—306
- Vaughns, Katherine L., Retooling the "Refugee" Definition: The New Immigration Reform Law's Impact on United States Domestic Asylum Policy, 1 Rutgers Race & L. Rev. 41 (1998)—912
- Vaughns, Katherine L., Taming the Asylum Adjudication Process: An Agenda for the Twenty-First Century, 30 San Diego L. Rev. 1 (1993)—1036
- Vazquez, Carlos M., The "Self-Executing" Character of the Refugee Protocol's Nonrefoulement Obligation, 7 Georgetown Immigration L.J. 39 (1993)—1083
- Vazquez-Aspiri, A. James & Horne, Daniel C., The Doorkeeper of Homeland Security:

- Proposals for the Visa Waiver Program*, 16 Stanford L. & Policy Rev. 513 (2005)—842
- Vera Institute of Justice, The Appearance Assistance Program (1998)—240
- Vidal, Mavelyn, Membership of a 'Particular Social Group' and the Effect of Islam and Shah, 11 Internat'l J. Refugee L. 528 (1999)—996
- Villazor, Rose Cuison, What Is a "Sanctuary"?, 61 Southern Methodist Univ. L. Rev. 133 (2008)—1154
- Villiers, Janice D., Closed Borders, Closed Ports: The Plight of Haitians Seeking Political Asylum in the United States, 60 Brooklyn L. Rev. 841 (1994)—1079
- Volpp, Leti, Blaming Culture for Bad Behavior, 12 Yale J. L. & Humanities 89 (2000)—971
- Volpp, Leti, Book Review, Impossible Subjects: Illegal Aliens and the Making of Modern America, 103 Michigan L. Rev. 1595 (2005)—1141
- Volpp, Leti, Citizenship Undone, 75 Fordham L. Rev. 2579 (2007)—1287
- Volpp, Leti, Court-Stripping and Class-Wide Relief: A Response to Judicial Review in Immigration Cases after AADC, 14 Georgetown Immigration L.J. 463 (2000)—769, 786
- Volpp, Leti, Divesting Citizenship: On Asian American History and the Loss of Citizenship through Marriage, 53 UCLA L. Rev. 405 (2005)—1357
- Volpp, Leti, Feminism versus Multiculturalism, 101 Columbia L. Rev. 1181 (2001)—971
- Volpp, Leti, 'Obnoxious to Their Very Nature': Asian Americans and Constitutional Citizenship, 5 Citizenship Studies 57 (2001)—108
- Volpp, Leti, The Citizen and the Terrorist, 49 UCLA L. Rev. 1575 (2002)—110
- Wadhia, Shoba Sivaprasad, The Policy and Politics of Immigrant Rights, 16 Temple Political & Civil Rights L. Rev. 387 (2007)—241, 575
- Wadhia, Shoba Sivaprasad, Under Arrest: Immigrants' Rights and the Rule of Law, 38 Univ. of Memphis L. Rev. 853 (2008)—651-52, 822
- Walzer, Michael J., Spheres of Justice: A Defense of Pluralism and Equality 60 (1983)—1233
- Walzer, Michael J., The Distribution of Membership, in Peter G. Brown & Henry Shue (eds.), Boundaries—National Autonomy and Its Limits, at 1 et seq. (1981)—33, 36, 1395
- Warren, Carol, Homosexuality and Stigma, in Judd Marmor, Homosexual Behavior—A Modern Reappraisal, at 123 et seq. (1980)—278
- Wasem, Ruth Ellen, CRS Report for Congress, Immigration Reform: Brief Synthesis of Issue (Jan. 22, 2007)—12
- Watkins, Henry G., Credibility Findings in Deportation Proceedings: "Bear[ing] Witness Unto the Truth", 2 Georgetown Immigration L.J. 231 (1987)—1004-05
- Watkins, Henry G., Streamlining Deportation Proceedings: Self-Incrimination, Immunity from Prosecution, and the Duty to Testify in a Deportation Context, 22 San Diego L.Rev. 1075 (1985)—742
- Waxman, Nathan A., New York State Department of Transportation: National Interest Waivers One Year Down the Road, 76 IR 1641 (Nov. 15, 1999)—306
- Weil, Patrick, Races at the Gate: A Century of Racial Distinctions in American Immigration Policy, 15 Georgetown Immigration L.J. 625 (2001)—91
- Weis, Paul, The Development of Refugee Law, 1982 Mich. Yearbook Int'l Legal Studies 27—873
- Weissbrodt, David & Danielson, Laura, Immigration Law and Procedure in a Nutshell (5th ed. 2005)—95, 321, 414, 415, 627-28, 649, 688, 1120, 1152, 1374, 1375
- Weisselberg, Charles D., The Detention and Treatment of Aliens Three Years After September 11: A New New World?, 38 U.C. Davis L. Rev. 815 (2005)—817
- Weisselberg, Charles D., The Exclusion and Detention of Aliens: Lessons from the Lives of Ellen Knauff and Ignatz Mezei, 143 Univ. Penn. L. Rev. 933 (1995)—155, 163
- Westat, Findings of the Web Basic Pilot Evaluation, Report to DHS (Sept. 2007)—1166
- Wettstein, Nadine, The Peddler Sells His Caps: The EOIR and INS Issue a New Rule on the Suspension/Cancellation Ceiling, 3 BIB 1083 (Nov. 1, 1998)—603
- Whiteman, Marjorie M., Digest of International Law (1967)—1356
- Wiebe, Virgil O., Maybe You Should, Yes You Must, No You Can't: Shifting Standards and Practices for Assuring Document Reliability in Asylum and Withholding of Removal Cases, Nov. 2006 Immigration Briefings—712, 1005
- Wiebe, Virgil O. (with Serena Parker), Asking for a Note from Your Torturer: Corroboration and Authentication Requirements in Asylum, Withholding, and Torture Convention Cases, Oct. 2001 Immigration Briefings—1005-06
- Wildes, Leon, Consular Nonreviewability—A Reexamination, 64 IR 1012 (1987)—487
- Wildes, Leon, The Deferred Action Program of the Bureau of Citizenship and Immigration Services: A Possible Remedy for Impossible Immigration Cases, 41 San Diego L. Rev. 819 (2004)—632
- Wildes, Leon, The Nonpriority Program of the Immigration and Naturalization Service

- Goes Public: The Litigative Use of the Freedom of Information Act*, 14 San Diego L. Rev. 42 (1976)—630
- Wildes, Leon, The Operations Instructions of the Immigration Service: Internal Guides or Binding Rules?, 17 San Diego L. Rev. 99 (1979)—631
- Wing, Adrien Katherine, Reno v. American-Arab Anti-Discrimination Committee: A Critical Race Perspective, 31 Columbia Human Rights L. Rev. 561 (2000)—93
- Wishnie, Michael J., Emerging Issues for Undocumented Workers, 6 Univ. Pennsylvania J. Labor & Employment L. 497 (2004), reproduced in 9 BIB 1289 (Nov. 1, 2004)—1222
- Wishnie, Michael J., Immigrant Workers and the Domestic Enforcement of International Labor Rights, 4 Univ. Pennsylvania J. Labor & Employment L. 529 (2002)—1223
- Wishnie, Michael J., Immigrants and the Right to Petition, 78 NYU L. Rev. 667 (2003)—1212
- Wishnie, Michael J., Laboratories of Bigotry? Devolution of the Immigration Power, Equal Protection, and Federalism, 76 N.Y.U. L. Rev. 493 (2001)—132, 1240, 1381
- Wishnie, Michael J., Prohibiting the Employment of Unauthorized Immigrants: The Experiment Fails, 2007 Univ. of Chicago Legal Forum 193—1162
- Wishnie, Michael J., State and Local Police Enforcement of Immigration Laws, 6 U. Pennsylvania Journal of Con. Law 1084 (2004)—1276, 1277
- Women's Commission for Refugee Women and Children, An Uncertain Future, A Cruel Present: Women in INS Detention (1996)—1057
- Women's Commission for Refugee Women and Children, Liberty Denied: Women Seeking Asylum Imprisoned in the United States (April 1997)—1057
- Wood, Charles, Losing Control of America's Future—The Census, Birthright Citizenship, and Illegal Aliens, 22 Harvard J. L. & Pub. Policy 465 (1999)—1190
- Woodhouse, Barbara Bennett, "Who Owns the Child?": Meyer and Pierce and the Child as Property, 33 William & Mary L.Rev. 995 (1992)—66
- Woodward, David R. & Levin, Ronald M., In Defense of Deference: Judicial Review of Agency Action, 31 Administrative L. Rev. 329 (1979)—521
- Wouters, Kees, International Legal Standards for the Protection from Refoulement (2009)—868
- Wright, R. George, Federal Immigration Law and the Case for Open Entry, 27 Loyola L.A. L.Rev. 1265 (1994)—32
- Wu, Frank H., Difficult Decisions During Wartime: A Letter from a Non-Alien in an Internment Camp to a Friend Back Home, 54 Case Western Reserve L. Rev. 1301 (2004)—109
- Wu, Frank H., Neither Black Nor White: Asian Americans and Affirmative Action, 15 Boston College Third World L.J. 225 (1995)—109
- Wu, Frank H., The Future of the American Mosaic: Issues in American Immigration Reform, 7 Stanford L. & Policy Rev. 35 (1996)—115
- Wu, Frank H. & Youngberg, Francey Lim, People from China Crossing the River: Asian American Political Empowerment and Foreign Influence, in Gordon H. Chang (ed.), Asian Americans and Politics, ch. 12 (2001)—109
- Yale-Loehr, Stephen, An Overview of INA § 212(c), Immigration Briefings (Feb. 1995)—595
- Yale-Loehr, Stephen, Statement on the Operations of the Executive Office for Immigration Review (EOIR) Before the House Committee on the Judiciary, Subcommittee on Immigration and Claims (Feb. 6, 2002)—745, 749, 752
- Yale-Loehr, Stephen, USCIS Vows to Improve EB-5 Immigrant Investor Programs, 10 BIB 169 (Feb. 15, 2005)—347
- Yale-Loehr, Stephen et al., T, U and V Visas: More Alphabet Soup for Immigration Practitioners, 6 BIB 113 (Feb. 1, 2001)—411, 412
- Yale-Loehr, Stephen & Hoashi-Erhardt, Cristoph, A Comparative Look at Immigration and Human Capital Assessment, 16 Georgetown Immigration L.J. 99 (2001)—343
- Yale-Loehr, Stephen & Palmer, Bryan, Asylum Law Update, 5 BIB 633 (July 15, 2000)—915, 916
- Yale-Loehr, Stephen & Palmer, John R.B., Evidentiary Issues in Asylum Cases, 6 BIB 595 (June 15, 2001)—1004
- Yale-Loehr, Stephen & Reed, Roni, Preserving Permanent Residency, 1 BIB 14 (1996)—539
- Yale-Loehr, Stephen & Schoonmaker, Lindsay, EB-5 Immigrant Investor Green Cards: An Update, 13 BIB 1373 (Nov. 1, 2008)—347
- Yamamoto, Eric K., Interracial Justice: Conflict and Reconciliation in Post-/Civil Rights America (1999)—109
- Yamamoto, Eric K. et al., Race, Rights and Reparation: Law and the Japanese American Internment (2001)—109
- Yates, Laura S., Plyler v. Doe and the Rights of Undocumented Immigrants to Higher Education: Should Undocumented Students Be Eligible for In-State College Tuition Rates?, 82 Washington Univ. L.Q. 585 (2004)—1209

- Yin, Tung, Procedural Due Process to Determine "Enemy Combatant" Status in the War on Terrorism, 73 Tennessee L. Rev. 351 (2006)—166
- Zall, Barnaby W., Asylum and Sanctuary—the American Dilemma, 72 A.B.A.J. 66 (Aug 1, 1986)—1154
- Zappalà, Gianni & Castles, Stephen, Citizenship and Immigration in Australia, 13 Georgetown Immigration L.J. 273 (1999)—1374
- Zieck, Marjoleine, UNHCR's Worldwide Presence in the Field (2006)—878
- Zilbershats, Yaffa, Extraditing Israeli Citizens to the United States—Extradition and Citizenship Dilemmas, 21 Michigan J. Internat'l L. 297 (2000)—1320, 1374
- Zolberg, Aristide, Book Review, 21 Population & Development Rev. 659 (1995)—64
- Zoltan, Paul et al., Fugitive Disentitlement, 13 BIB 681 (June 1, 2008)—762

*

IMMIGRATION AND REFUGEE LAW AND POLICY

*

OVERVIEW OF UNITED STATES IMMIGRATION LAW

The Immigration and Nationality Act (INA), passed in 1952 and amended many times since, is a hideous creature. Its hundreds of pages contain excruciating technical provisions that are often hopelessly intertwined. Other sources of immigration law are similarly byzantine. The extensive inter-relationships make it hard to separate the law into discrete components that newcomers can comprehend without frequent cross-references and asides. This Overview addresses that problem. Superficial as it necessarily is, it acquaints you with a few basic concepts that will hopefully make the later discussion more comprehensible.

SECTION A. TERMINOLOGY

As explained more fully below, the INA defines “aliens” as all people who are not nationals of the United States. It then uses the word “alien” frequently and consistently. The term covers even people who have been admitted as permanent residents and who have lived lawfully in the United States for decades. Further, because the word “alien” is used in the INA and other federal statutes, it also appears often in agency regulations, judicial opinions, and other legal materials. In addition, the word is frequently used in public and academic discourse.

Early editions of this book, striving for precision and for consistency with the statutory terminology, similarly used the word “alien” in that technical sense. (Even the first edition drew the line at the pejorative, irritating, and technically meaningless term “illegal alien” and explained why. See pages 984–85 of the first edition (1992), or pages 1140–41 of the present edition.) But the word “alien,” even when not adorned with the modifier “illegal,” has always struck a disturbing chord. Many feel that the term connotes dehumanizing qualities of either strangeness or inferiority (space aliens come readily to mind) and that its use builds walls, strips human beings of their essential dignity, and needlessly reinforces an “outsider” status. Some believe that its constant use and repetition also solidify racial and cultural stereotypes. See especially the thoughtful examination of the term “alien” by Professor Kevin R. Johnson, “Aliens” and the U.S. Immigration Laws: The Social and Legal Construction of Nonpersons, 28 Univ. of Miami Inter-American L. Rev. 263 (1996–97).

Beginning with the third edition (2002), therefore, this book stopped using the word “alien” except in direct quotations. The word “noncitizen” conveys essentially the same technical meaning without the same baggage. (As explained below, “non-national” is more precise, but the word “noncitizen” is in far more common use and will be employed here.)

One acronym that you will see repeatedly in this book is “LPR.” It stands for “lawful permanent resident” and is used here to refer to those noncitizens whom the United States has formally admitted as permanent residents. As proof of their status, LPRs carry so-called “green cards” (which actually have been various colors over the years).

Throughout this book you will also see repeated references to the INA, to certain other crucial statutes that have amended the INA, and to some important international conventions. Because these statutes and conventions are mentioned frequently, the book refers to them in shorthand terms that immigration lawyers commonly use. Among those you will see abbreviated are the REAL ID Act, the HSA, the USA PATRIOT Act, Imm. Act 1990, IRCA, IMFA, AEDPA, the Welfare Reform Act, IIRIRA, NACARA, LIFE, CAT, the 1951 Refugee Convention, and the 1967 Refugee Protocol. At first they will blur together, but after repeated exposure they will become old friends. Until that happens, consult the Table of Abbreviations. It contains the full citations to these statutes and conventions, as well as some other immigration jargon.

SECTION B. GENERAL REGULATION OF IMMIGRATION

Until the late 1800’s, United States immigration law was largely a matter for the states. Today it is almost entirely federal (and to an increasing extent international) law, although the fifty states still have some leeway to regulate the activities of noncitizens within their borders. For more than a century, the Supreme Court has held that Congress’s power over immigration is exceptionally broad, both relative to the states and relative to the courts.

Several federal agencies have roles in administering the INA. From 1940 until 2003, the lion’s share of the responsibility rested with the Attorney General, whose functions in turn were delegated to various Justice Department agencies and officials. The best known of the Department’s immigration agencies was the Immigration and Naturalization Service (INS), headquartered in Washington, D.C. Its functions included law enforcement, inspection of arriving passengers, prosecution at administrative hearings, detention of noncitizens in connection with immigration proceedings, and processing applications for various immigration benefits.

The events of September 11, 2001 led eventually to a radical restructuring of the myriad federal government agencies whose missions relate to national security. The Homeland Security Act of 2002 (HSA) brought almost all of those agencies under a single new umbrella, the Department of Homeland Security (DHS). Some 22 federal agencies, 185,000 government employees, and countless specific functions were transferred. See Stanley Mailman & Stephen Yale-Loehr, Immigration Functions in the Department of Homeland Security, 8 BIB 663 (Apr. 15, 2003); David A. Martin, Immigration Policy and the Homeland Security Act Reorganization: An Early Agenda for Practical Improvements, 80 IR 601 (Apr. 28, 2003).

Most relevant here, the Act dissolved the INS and transferred almost all its functions to the DHS. See HSA § 471(a).

Even before September 11, ideologically diverse voices had called persistently for splitting the INS into two separate agencies—one for law enforcement, and one for service functions, such as the processing of applications for permanent residence, asylum, naturalization, and other immigration benefits. When Congress passed the HSA, therefore, it divided the immigration enforcement and service functions between two different entities within DHS. See HSA §§ 442, 451. The HSA also authorized the President to modify the statutory departmental structure further, see HSA §§ 872, 1502, with the caveat that neither the two separate entities themselves, nor their specific functions, could be combined. HSA § 471(b). Acting on that authority, the President converted the two original DHS immigration agencies into three—two bureaus for the various enforcement functions, and one other bureau for service functions. See U.S. Department of Homeland Security Press Release, Border Reorganization Fact Sheet (Jan. 30, 2003) (DHS Press Release); see generally 6 USC.

The two immigration enforcement entities are U.S. Customs and Border Protection (CBP) and U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement (ICE). See 72 Fed. Reg. 20131 (Apr. 23, 2007). They are responsible for border enforcement and interior enforcement, respectively. CBP took over the functions of the INS Border Patrol and also consolidated the border inspections that were formerly carried out by the INS, the Customs Service, and the Agricultural Quarantine Program. CBP “border” inspections take place at all “ports of entry”—land borders, airports, and seaports. In contrast, ICE functions mainly in the interior. It is responsible for investigations, intelligence-gathering, detention, certain elements of the deportation process, the registration of noncitizens, and other interior enforcement operations. See DHS Press Release, above. You will see much more on the subject of immigration enforcement in chapter 12 below.

The new immigration service entity is called U.S. Citizenship and Immigration Services (USCIS). See HSA § 451; 69 Fed. Reg. 60937 (Oct. 13, 2004) (changing the name). USCIS handles a variety of applications for immigration benefits. See HSA § 451(b). Like the former INS, USCIS operates through a network of regional and district offices dispersed throughout the United States and, in a few instances, overseas.

Although the Department of Justice has lost the INS, it retains an agency called the Executive Office for Immigration Review (EOIR). In fact the HSA gave the EOIR statutory recognition for the first time. HSA § 1101. (EOIR had been solely a creature of administrative regulation.)

The EOIR does only one thing—adjudication. It comprises three units, all headquartered in Falls Church, Virginia. One unit is the Office of the Chief Immigration Judge. This Office coordinates the work of a cadre of immigration judges dispersed throughout the United States. Their main function is to preside over “removal” hearings. These are formal evidentiary hearings in which immigration judges decide whether to admit noncitizens to the United States and whether to expel certain noncitizens who are already present. A second EOIR unit, the Board of Immigration Appeals (BIA), hears appeals from the decisions of the immigration judges as well as appeals from certain USCIS decisions. A third unit, the Office of the Chief Administrative Hearing Officer (OCAHO), conducts evidentiary hearings in certain cases that involve the unauthorized employment of noncitizens and cases that involve certain forms of job discrimination.

The HSA also codifies the Attorney General's power to direct and regulate the EOIR. See HSA §§ 1101, 1102(3) (adding INA § 103(g)). This power includes the authority to review individual decisions of the BIA. See 8 CFR § 1003.1(h) (2008). Importantly, BIA decisions (and Attorney General modifications of those decisions) are binding on immigration judges and on all DHS officers and employees. 8 CFR § 1003.1(g) (2008).

The Department of State still plays a major role in the administration of the immigration laws, most notably by issuing or denying visas to noncitizens who wish to enter the United States. Visa applications are decided by consular officers at United States embassies and consulates around the world. See INA §§ 221, 222. Shaken by the State Department's lapses in issuing visas to the individuals who perpetrated the September 11 attacks, however, Congress gave DHS a major role in the visa process. The Secretary of Homeland Security is now principally responsible for the administration and enforcement of the visa process, HSA § 428(b), and may assign DHS employees to consular posts to advise, train, and review the decisions of consular officers, HSA § 428(e). The State Department also plays key roles in the various educational exchange programs and in refugee affairs (the latter through its Bureau of Population, Refugees, and Migration, or PRM).

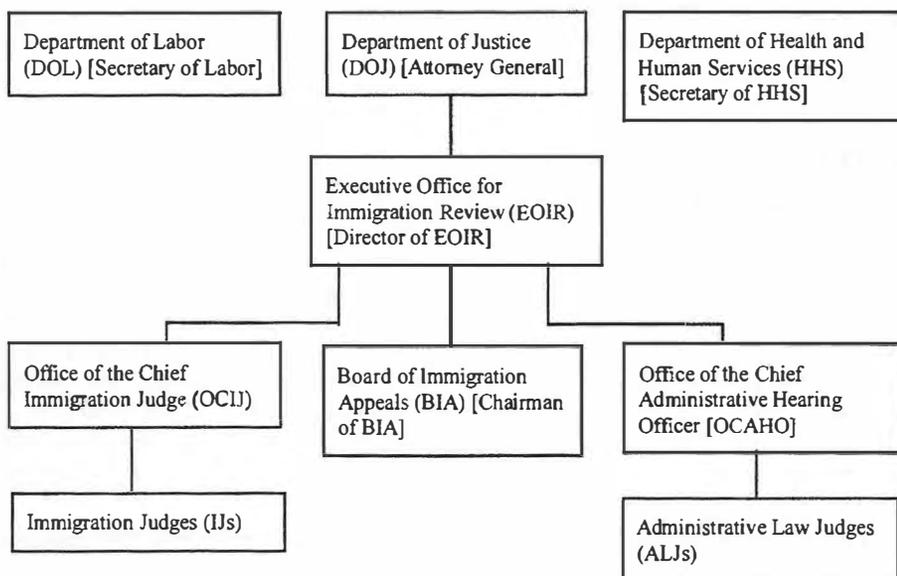

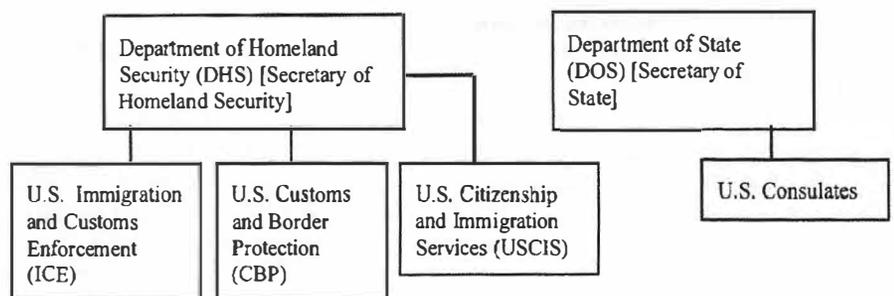

The role of the Department of Labor is also significant. As you will see in chapter 3, it is normally the first step in the process when a noncitizen seeks admission to the United States on the basis of occupational qualifications.

The Department of Health and Human Services has a more limited role. Its Office of Refugee Resettlement is responsible for unaccompanied noncitizen children. The Department's Public Health Service makes the necessary medical judgments when a noncitizen is alleged to be inadmissible on health-related grounds. See INA § 212(a)(1).

An organization chart for the main federal immigration agencies appears on the following page.

Finally, a few words on the statute and regulations: As noted earlier, the main statute that governs United States immigration law (including refugee law and citizenship law) is the INA, originally enacted in 1952 and amended frequently since then. Its essential provisions are reproduced in title 8 of the United States Code.

ORGANIZATION CHART FEDERAL IMMIGRATION AGENCIES

The recent reorganization of immigration functions requires two technical warnings. First, even though the HSA transferred almost all INS functions to DHS, both the INA and the agency regulations on immigration are still chock full of references to the “Attorney General,” the “Department of Justice,” the “Immigration and Naturalization Service,” the “Service,” the “Commissioner,” and other INS officials. Rather than correct every one of these references individually, the HSA did so in one fell swoop. Under HSA § 1517, whenever a federal law refers to a “department, commission, or agency or any officer or office” whose functions the HSA has transferred elsewhere, that law is “deemed” to refer to the Secretary or the particular official or component of the Department to which the function was transferred. For example, with respect to any transferred immigration function, most references to the Attorney General in either the INA or the regulations should be read as if they referred to the Secretary of Homeland Security. References to the INS should be read as if they referred to USCIS, ICE, or CBP, depending on which component has been assigned the particular function. See also HSA § 456(a); 8 CFR § 1.1(c, d, o) (2008).¹

Second, the federal immigration regulations have been slightly reorganized. The vast bulk of them are issued by DHS and DOJ. These appear in 8 CFR. The provisions that affect only the former INS (now issued by DHS) are in chapter 1 of 8 CFR. Those that affect only the EOIR (issued by DOJ) appear in chapter 5 of 8 CFR. Those that affect both DHS and EOIR are duplicated; they now appear in both chapter 1 and chapter 5. (When a provision that appears in chapter 1 is duplicated in chapter 5, the latter provision carries the same section number plus 1000. Section 3, for example, is duplicated as section 1003.)

In addition to the DHS and DOJ regulations in 8 CFR, the State Department regulations appear in 22 CFR. The relevant Labor Department regulations are in 20 CFR. The regulations that lay out the basic organization of DHS are contained in 6 CFR.

SECTION C. NATIONALITY²

According to the Immigration and Nationality Act (the INA), every person in the world is either a United States “national” or an “alien.” Nationals are further divided into those who are “citizens” and those who are not. Today almost all nationals of the United States are also citizens; the few who are not are almost entirely natives of American Samoa and Swains Island. Since the number of noncitizen nationals is so small, and since their rights so closely resemble those of citizens anyway, the terms “national” and “citizen” are often used interchangeably. That practice is technically incorrect, but the distinction is rarely important. The INA lays out various categories of citizens (and of non-citizen nationals) and defines “aliens” as everyone else.

The vast majority of United States citizens acquired their citizenship at birth. The most common way in which to acquire citizenship at birth is to be born on United States soil. Several provisions of the INA also bestow citizenship by descent. With important qualifications, these provisions automatically transmit citizenship from one or two citizen parents to a child born abroad.

Many other people obtain citizenship at some time after birth. They are said to be “naturalized.” The INA sets forth a number of prerequisites. With some exceptions, naturalization is something for which one must affirmatively apply. Also with exceptions, the applicant must first become an LPR, must thereafter reside in the United States for at least five years, and must satisfy other requirements concerning physical presence in the United States, age, literacy, knowledge of American history and government, moral character, and attachment to American constitutional principles.

1. The author thanks Eugene J. Flynn, Esq., for figuring this out and sharing his research.

2. See chapter 13 below.

Once acquired, citizenship can be lost. If citizenship was acquired by naturalization, the naturalization order can be revoked because of defects in the original order. Regardless whether citizenship was acquired at birth or by naturalization, one can voluntarily relinquish citizenship by a process known as expatriation.

Citizenship has important legal consequences, both in domestic United States law and in international law. Apart from its capacity to be transmitted, citizenship can affect one's voting and other political rights, one's tax, military, and jury obligations, one's susceptibility to extradition for crime, and one's eligibility for certain publicly funded programs, for certain government jobs, and for certain occupations. Congress, the state legislatures, and the federal courts have all helped to shape the boundaries. Most important here, United States citizens are not subject to immigration restrictions. They may come, go, and stay as they please. Additionally, as noted below, citizens may sponsor certain of their noncitizen family members for admission to the United States.

SECTION D. THE ADMISSION OF NONCITIZENS TO THE UNITED STATES³

Within the class of noncitizens, the most fundamental distinction drawn by the United States immigration law is between immigrants and nonimmigrants. The INA defines nonimmigrants as those who fall within any of several specifically enumerated categories of (typically) temporary entrants. Common examples are tourists, business visitors, students, and temporary workers, but there are many others as well. By statute, every other noncitizen is an "immigrant." The term includes both those who have been lawfully admitted as immigrants ("LPRs") and those who have not ("undocumented immigrants"). LPRs may reside in the United States permanently unless later found deportable (see section E below), and they may work.

With some exceptions (relating to temporary workers), the admission of nonimmigrants is numerically unrestricted. To qualify for admission, however, a nonimmigrant must still clear two major hurdles: He or she must fit within one of the statutory pigeonholes, most of which require an intent to leave the United States by the end of the authorized time period. In addition, the person must not fall within any of the "inadmissibility" grounds—for example, those that relate to crime, national security, health, or public assistance—unless he or she also fits one of several statutory provisions that authorize waivers of the relevant grounds.

An immigrant similarly has to fit within one of several statutory pigeonholes. The three main programs are family reunification, employment, and “diversity” (more on these below). Generally, each of the qualifying categories is numerically limited. Those limits, sometimes known as quotas, are of two types. First, for each category, no more than a specified number may be admitted worldwide in a given fiscal year. Second, the law limits the number of immigrants who may be admitted from a single country in a given fiscal year. As will be seen in chapter 3, the combination of those quotas and the high demand from particular countries has meant that many noncitizens who meet all the qualitative admission criteria must wait several years to get in.

3. See generally chapters 3–6 below.

Numerical limits are subject to several exceptions. Two are important enough to mention here. Certain close family members of United States citizens qualify as “immediate relatives;” they are exempt from the numerical constraints. Another group of noncitizens—refugees fleeing statutorily defined forms of persecution at home—are admitted under a separate quota system.

Among those immigrants who are subject to the general quotas, admission is not awarded on a strict first-come, first-served basis. Instead, the INA gives “preference” to various categories of immigrants. Some such preferences are for noncitizens who have certain specified family relationships to United States citizens or to LPRs, but who for various reasons do not qualify as “immediate relatives.” Other preference categories are for noncitizens whose occupational skills fill economic needs and for certain individuals who are favored for other economic reasons. A third program admits “diversity immigrants”—noncitizens who come from countries that have sent relatively few immigrants to the United States in recent years.

With some specific exceptions—the most important being refugees—a noncitizen must fit one of the above preferences in order to immigrate. Moreover, like the nonimmigrant, even an immigrant who fits one of the qualifying categories will be ineligible if he or she falls within any of the various inadmissibility grounds and does not qualify for a statutory waiver.

The procedure for admitting noncitizens depends on the substantive basis for admission. When an immigrant seeks admission on the basis of a family relationship, the process begins with a “visa petition” filed by the United States citizen or LPR sponsor in a regional office of USCIS, normally in the United States. The purpose of the visa petition is to establish that the beneficiary in fact has the claimed relationship. If USCIS approves the visa petition, the beneficiary may then apply for a visa at whichever United States consulate serves the applicable region of his or her home country. Shortly before the applicant’s position in the queue is reached, a consular officer adjudicates the application. The consular officer decides whether the person falls within any of the various inadmissibility grounds. If the application is approved, the consular officer issues an entry document called an immigrant “visa.” The applicant eventually presents the visa to a CBP inspector at the port of entry. That official has the authority to duplicate the searching examination conducted abroad by the consular officer, but in practice the border inspection of a person who presents what appears to be a valid visa is much less rigorous.

When an immigrant seeks admission under one of the employment-based categories, a roughly similar process is used. For certain of those categories, however, the immigrant must first obtain from the Department of Labor a certification that (a) the job he or she proposes to take is one for which not enough qualified United States workers are available and (b) the immigrant's employment will not adversely affect the wages and working conditions of United States workers.

In certain instances a noncitizen who is already present in the United States and who meets all the substantive requirements for admission as an immigrant may perform all the necessary steps without leaving the country. The process is called "adjustment of status."

Refugees, generally defined to require a "well-founded fear of persecution on account of race, religion, nationality, membership in a particular social group, or political opinion," are admitted under two separate programs. The overseas refugee program, for which the President annually announces numerical limits, admits refugees who apply from outside United States territory. The asylum program, which is not subject to numerical limits, is used to admit certain refugees who have already arrived at United States ports of entry or the interior on their own. Both programs are discussed in chapter 11.

Ordinarily, nonimmigrants are not required to file visa petitions with USCIS. They generally apply directly to the applicable consulates for visas that they will ultimately present to the immigration inspectors at their points of entry. A few categories of nonimmigrants, however, must go through the visa petition process, and some must first complete the labor certification process as well.

Once admitted as a nonimmigrant, one will sometimes be able to alter the conditions or duration of his or her stay, or change status entirely to a different nonimmigrant category ("change of status") or to an immigrant classification ("adjustment of status"). The processes for accomplishing those changes involve USCIS and, in some instances, the Labor Department.

As you have probably noticed already, there are several stages at which a person seeking admission can be turned down. Depending on the particular stage, the applicant might or might not have a right to a hearing or an appeal. Depending on several other variables, the applicant might or might not be detained by USCIS pending the final outcome of his or her case. The procedural details appear in chapter 6.

In recent years, Congress has created exceptions to the admission process just described. Probably the most significant is "expedited removal," an abbreviated procedure that has its greatest impact on asylum seekers. This and other exceptions will be taken up at various points in the text.

SECTION E. EXPULSION⁴

The INA lists many different grounds for the removal of “deportable” noncitizens. Like the (slightly different) grounds for inadmissibility, the “deportability” grounds reflect a range of national concerns relating to economics, crime, health, morality, politics, and national security. Additional deportability grounds are designed to secure the integrity of the immigration inspection system itself. The deportability grounds are accompanied by a network of statutory provisions that authorize discretionary waivers of specified grounds when certain circumstances exist. Eligibility for these waivers has shrunk considerably in recent years.

When noncitizens already in the United States are removed, it is usually because they overstayed or otherwise violated the terms of their nonimmigrant visas, or because they never were admitted and are not admissible. But lawfully admitted noncitizens—even LPRs—can also be deported for conduct or circumstances not concerned with the immigration system itself; a criminal conviction is the most common example.

As discussed in detail later, the vast majority of deportable noncitizens apprehended by the government are expelled by means of an informal procedure known as “voluntary departure.” In well over 100,000 cases every year, however, formal removal hearings are held. DHS (usually ICE) initiates those proceedings, which entail evidentiary hearings before the immigration judges mentioned earlier. The job of the immigration judge in those proceedings is to determine whether the individual falls within any of the charged “deportability” grounds and, if so, whether he or she is statutorily eligible for, and deserving of, asylum, voluntary departure, or some other form of discretionary relief. In most cases, the principal issues at the hearing concern applications for relief. Either the noncitizen or ICE may appeal the decision of the immigration judge to the BIA. Subject to many recently enacted exceptions, the noncitizen may also obtain judicial review of the BIA decision in the court of appeals.

SECTION F. OTHER SANCTIONS⁵

The INA and provisions of other federal statutes establish a range of civil and criminal sanctions for immigration-related misconduct. Some such sanctions are imposed on the noncitizens themselves; others are visited upon designated individuals or companies with whom they interact. The best known of the latter are those imposed on employers by the Immigration Reform and Control Act of 1986, popularly known as IRCA. IRCA punishes employers and certain others for knowingly employing noncitizens who are not authorized to work, for hiring persons without observing

4. See chapters 7–9 below.

5. See chapter 12 below.

specified paperwork requirements (even if the employees turn out to be authorized to work), or for discriminating on the basis of national origin or, in certain cases, citizenship status.

Apart from IRCA, the immigration laws create a number of criminal offenses concerned with maintaining a workable system of immigration control. They include illegal entry; transporting, smuggling, or harboring noncitizens who are in the United States unlawfully; and fraud, including marriage fraud. In recent years, the government has made dramatically increased use of these criminal sanctions. In addition, commercial carriers (airlines, shipping lines, bus companies, railroad companies, etc.) that transport improperly documented noncitizen passengers are subject to civil penalties, usually fines.

THE IMMIGRATION DEBATE: GOALS, STRATEGIES, AND IMPACT

Permanent international migration is a worldwide phenomenon. The United Nations Population Division reports that by the year 2000 some 175,000,000 people—almost 3% of the world's population—had migrated from their countries of birth. See <http://www.un.org/esa/population/publications/migstock/2003TrendsMigstock.pdf>. Such massive population movements present challenges. For the most part, those challenges are managed at the national level. Increasingly, they are becoming the subjects of international cooperation, as well as local regulation.¹

As of March 2005, approximately 37 million United States residents—12.4% of the permanent population—were foreign born. That percentage is the highest since the early 20th century. Of these foreign born residents, approximately one-third were naturalized citizens, another one-third LPRs, and another one-third undocumented. Ruth Ellen Wasem, CRS Report for Congress, Immigration Reform: Brief Synthesis of Issue, Order Code RS22574 (Jan. 22, 2007).

In the United States, where immigration has been both part of the historical core and a continuing national ethic, the debate over its impact and its future remains contentious. This chapter introduces you to that debate. It deals with the “big picture” policy questions: What is the real

1. For discussions of international cooperation, see generally T. Alexander Aleinikoff & Vincent Chetail (eds.), Migration and International Legal Norms (2003); Ryszard Cholewinski et al. (eds.), International Migration Law: Developing Paradigms and Key Challenges (2007); Guy S. Goodwin-Gill, International Law and the Movement of Persons Between States (1978); Chris Nwachukwu Okeke & James A.R. Nafziger, United States Migration Law: Essentials for Comparison, 54 American J. Comparative L. 531, 532–39 (2006). The International Organization for Migration (IOM), an intergovernmental association established in 1951, now has 105 member states (including the U.S.) and another 27 observer states, in addition to formal affiliations with a long list of other international organizations and NGOs. Based in Geneva, IOM has more than 200 field offices around the world and an operational staff of more than 4000. It helps governments manage the logistics of large migrations, especially in times of emergency. See <http://www.iom.int/en/who/main-members.shtml>. In 2004, UN Secretary General Kofi Annan established a Global Commission on International Migration to study the future of both voluntary and involuntary population movements. The work of the Office of the UN High Commissioner for Refugees (UNHCR) is integral to refugee protection and assistance worldwide and figures prominently in chapter 11 below. For a discussion of the intersection of the global and the local in migration management, see generally Saskia Sassen, Territory, Authority, Rights (2006); Cristina M. Rodríguez, The Significance of the Local in Immigration Regulation, 106 Michigan L. Rev. 567 (2008).

meaning of immigration? Are any immigration controls morally defensible? What is the proper mission of an immigration policy? What sorts of strategies are most likely to further that mission? What are the practical consequences of immigration—racial, cultural, linguistic, sociological, demographic, economic, environmental, and political? What have been the effects of U.S. immigration policy on the immigrants themselves?

Given the breadth of these subjects, this chapter obviously does not attempt comprehensive treatment. The goal here is just broad exposure to some of the issues that have generated public or scholarly debate. Further, this chapter confines itself to the subject of permanent, “voluntary,” legal migration; later chapters deal with the admission of temporary visitors (chapter 4), forced migration (refugees, covered in chapter 11), and irregular migration (chapter 12).

Of course immigration law is also about “little picture” policy questions. Precisely which family priorities, and which labor-related priorities, are optimal? What role, if any, should national origin play in an immigrant selection system? How many refugees should be admitted, and which ones? How should an asylum system work? What should be the criteria for admitting temporary visitors such as tourists, business visitors, students, and guest workers? On what grounds should noncitizens be subject to deportation? What provision should the law make for granting discretionary relief in exceptional cases? Who should receive citizenship? Who should lose it? What should turn on citizenship? What procedures should the law establish for applying all these substantive criteria to individuals? When should immigration-related misconduct be a criminal offense? How great a problem is irregular immigration, and what policy responses are appropriate? Do specific statutory provisions, or specific elements of those provisions, make sense? Those sorts of questions are dispersed throughout the remainder of the book.

A. THE HISTORY

Modern U.S. immigration policy cannot be understood without at least brief exposure to its historical roots. The following excerpt from the leading immigration law treatise summarizes the path that led to the current version of the Immigration and Nationality Act. In keeping with the scope of this chapter, this historical summary will focus primarily on the admission of immigrants. Significant developments on such related issues as nonimmigrants, exclusion, and expulsion will also be noted. As you will discover, public attitudes toward immigration have fluctuated. United States history gives both cause for congratulation and cause for shame.²

2. On the latter score, see the well-written, highly critical accounts by Kevin R. Johnson, The “Huddled Masses” Myth—Immigration and Civil Rights (2004); and James F. Smith, A Nation that Welcomes Immigrants?

An Historical Examination of United States Immigration Policy, 1 U.C. Davis J. Internat’l L. & Policy 227 (1995). See also Reed Ueda, Postwar Immigrant America—A Social History (1994). For a history of pass-

1 Charles Gordon, Stanley Mailman, and Stephen Yale-Loehr, Immigration Law and Procedure

§§ 2.02–2.04 (2004).

[1]—1776–1875: One Hundred Years of Open Frontier

The first one hundred years of our national existence was a period of generally unimpeded immigration. New settlers were important to the young nation and immigrants were welcomed. The gates were open and unguarded and all were free to come. This national policy paid rich dividends as the immigrants and their descendants contributed heavily to the growth of our nation.

During this period there was little federal legislation. An early attempt at restriction was the Alien Act of 1798, a part of the Alien and Sedition Laws, which authorized the President to expel from the United States any alien he deemed dangerous. This legislation was very unpopular and was allowed to expire at the end of its two-year term. Subsequent statutes, commencing in 1819, sought to improve conditions on ships bringing immigrants to the United States. As late as 1864, Congress passed legislation designed to encourage immigration, and some of the states had active programs to promote immigration.

* * *

Even during this period of tolerance the policy favoring immigration was by no means unopposed. From the earliest days there were groups counseling restriction. As immigration continued to increase these groups gained adherents, and they were most potent during times of economic depression. Some of the states were disturbed at the influx of immigrants and sought to impose local controls from time to time.³ However, the Supreme Court declared some of these state statutes unconstitutional as an invasion of the exclusive federal power to regulate foreign commerce.

[2]—1875–1917: Institution of Federal Controls on Immigration

Continued demand for federal action finally resulted in legislation. An 1875 statute barring convicts and prostitutes was quickly followed by the adoption of the first general immigration statute in 1882. The 1882 Act imposed a head tax of 50 cents and excluded idiots, lunatics, convicts, and persons likely to become a public charge. Another important enactment in ports, see John Torpey, The Invention of the Passport (2000). For a thoughtful account of the history of the INS and its predecessor institutions, see Michael J. Churgin, Immigration Internal Decisionmaking: A View from History, 78 Texas L. Rev. 1633 (2000). The analogous German immigration history is well recounted in Kay Hailbronner, Fifty Years of the Basic Law—Migration, Citizen- ship and Asylum, 53 Southern Methodist Univ. L. Rev. 519 (2000).

3. See also Gerald L. Neuman, The Lost Century of American Immigration Law (1776–1875), 93 Columbia L. Rev. 1833 (1993) (emphasizing and describing the many state-imposed immigration restrictions during this era).—Ed.

1882 was the Chinese Exclusion Act, which remained an important facet of immigration policy until it was repealed in 1943.

In 1885 and 1887, Congress passed the contract labor laws, aimed at the practice of importing cheap foreign labor under labor contracts which depressed the labor market in the United States. * * * [Later statutes expanded the list of exclusion grounds. See chapter 5 below.—Eds.]

* * *

In the first decade of the twentieth century there was a vast increase in immigration, more than doubling the previous decade's arrivals. During four years of this decade annual immigration exceeded a million. In addition, the new immigrants were coming predominantly from southern and eastern Europe, instead of the previous migrations from northern Europe. The antagonisms which previously had been directed against the Irish-Catholic and German migrants were transferred to this "new" immigration. The vast tide of immigrants created uneasiness, which was accentuated during periods of economic crisis. The demand for further restrictions increased.

* * *

[3]—1917–1924: Solidification of Restrictive Immigration Policies

The development of the restrictive immigration policy reached fruition between 1917 and 1924. In 1917 Congress passed another comprehensive revision of the immigration laws over the veto of President Wilson. The most controversial innovation of this legislation was the literacy test, which previously had summoned vetoes by Presidents Cleveland, Taft and Wilson. Another new feature was the creation of an Asiatic Barred Zone to shut out Orientals. Japan alone was not included, since Japanese were dealt with by the so-called Gentleman's Agreement between the Governments of the United States and Japan. * * *

The 1917 Act was followed shortly by the Anarchist Act of 1918, which expanded the provisions for exclusion and deportation of subversive aliens and authorized their expulsion without time limitations.

Until now the law had dealt only with the quality of the aliens who sought to enter. No attempt had been made to limit the number of entrants. At the conclusion of World War I immigration again began to increase. There was widespread fear of inundation by a flood of immigrants from the war-devastated countries of Europe. The isolationist mood of the period and a severe post-war depression augmented the already large sentiment for further restrictions. The result was the Quota Law of 1921, enacted as a temporary measure. This legislation introduced for the first time numerical limitations on immigration. With certain enumerated exceptions it allocated quotas to each nationality totaling 3% of the foreign born persons of that nationality residing in the United States in 1910, for an annual total of approximately 350,000. This law was scheduled to expire in 1922, but was extended to June 30, 1924.

In the meantime Congress enacted a permanent policy of numerical restriction in 1924. The 1924 legislation adopted a national origins formula that eventually based the quota for each nationality on the number of persons of their national origin in the United States in 1920. This formula resulted in a sharp curtailment of immigrants from southern and eastern Europe. Quota immigrants were limited to approximately 150,000 per year. However, natives of Western Hemisphere countries could enter without numerical restriction. Other nonquota groups included alien wives and children of American citizens and returning lawful residents. Aliens seeking to enter were required to obtain immigration visas from American consuls overseas. Those who entered in violation of the visa and quota requirements were deportable without time limitation. Another provision aimed at Orientals barred all aliens ineligible to citizenship, thus affronting the Japanese, who felt that they had dealt with the problem cooperatively through the Gentleman's Agreement.⁴

[4]—1924–1952 Legislation

The Immigration Acts of 1917 and 1924 became the twin elements of immigration policy, the one proclaiming qualitative restrictions and the other numerical limitations. They remained substantially unchanged until 1952. * * * [Statutes passed in 1940 and 1950 expanded the grounds for excluding, and for deporting, those noncitizens thought to be subversive. These and other World War II–Era and McCarthy Era events are taken up in chapter 5, section B below.—Eds.]

* * *

During this period there were some relaxations of the prevailing restrictions in measures generated by World War II and its aftermath. The major liberalization was the Displaced Persons Act. Enacted in 1948 and substantially amended in 1950, this humanitarian program ultimately brought over 400,000 refugees to our shores in three and a half years. They were admitted, however, under a system that mortgaged the quotas for their countries far into the future.

Another relaxation benefited the alien spouses and children and fiancées of World War II American servicemen, facilitating their admission to the United States. One hundred and eighteen thousand aliens were admitted to the United States under the War Brides Act and over 5000 were admitted under the Fiancées Act. * * *

§ 2.03 The Immigration and Nationality Act of 1952

[1]—Consideration and Enactment

The Act of 1952 had its genesis in a two-year study of the Senate Judiciary Committee, then headed by Senator Pat McCarran of Nevada.

4. A prior Act had limited naturalization to "free white persons". In Ozawa v. United States, 260 U.S. 178, 43 S.Ct. 65, 67 L.Ed. 199 (1922), the Supreme Court held that persons of Japanese descent were non-white and therefore ineligible for citizenship. The 1924 legislation barring noncitizens who were "ineligible for citizenship" was thus Congress's way of excluding the Japanese.—Eds.

The resulting legislative proposals were sponsored in the Senate by Senator McCarran and in the House by Representative Francis E. Walter of Pennsylvania, Chairman of the Immigration Subcommittee of the House Judiciary Committee. The bill encountered opposition in both chambers, led in the House by Representative Emanuel Celler, Chairman of the House Judiciary Committee, and in the Senate by Senator Hubert Humphrey of Minnesota and Senator Herbert H. Lehman of New York. However, the bill was approved by substantial majorities in both Houses.

President Truman vetoed the bill. He castigated the national origins quota system that it carried over from the 1924 Act, criticized the severity of the grounds prescribed for exclusion, deportation, and denaturalization, and opposed the limitations on the authority to alleviate hardships. However the McCarran-Walter bill became law when Congress overrode the President's veto, and it was enacted on June 27, 1952, as Pub.L. 414, 82d Cong., 2d Sess. Under its terms the law was designated the Immigration and Nationality Act. * * * Although the McCarran-Walter Act has been repeatedly amended, it is still the basic statute dealing with immigration and nationality. The amendments have been fitted into the structure of the parent statute. * * *

[2]—Basic Features of the 1952 Act

* * *

[c]—Immigrants and Quotas

Every alien seeking to enter the United States was deemed an immigrant unless he established that he was a nonimmigrant. A nonimmigrant is one who establishes that he sought to come temporarily and originally included foreign government and international organization officials, visitors, aliens in transit to other countries, students, crewmen, treaty traders and temporary workers.

Every immigrant is deemed subject to the prescribed numerical limitations unless he is exempted from such limitations. The principal classes exempted from numerical restrictions by the Act of 1952 were alien spouses and children of American citizens, returning lawful residents, and natives of Western Hemisphere countries.

The Act established annual quotas based on a system of national origins for immigrants who came from all countries except those in the Western Hemisphere. It enacted special racial quotas for Asians. The law also established preferences within the quotas for immigrants with specialized skills and certain relatives of American citizens and of resident aliens.

* * *

§ 2.04 Legislative Activity After 1952

* * *

The movement for legislative reform received its major stimulus on July 23, 1963, when President Kennedy submitted to Congress a comprehensive program for revision of the immigration laws. His major proposals were for abolition of the national origins quota system and of discriminations against Asians and allocation of immigrant visas on a first come, first served basis, subject to preferences for relatives of American citizens and persons with special skills.

President Kennedy had long been interested in immigration problems. Moreover, several factors contributed to produce a more favorable climate. In the first place, the most powerful champions of the McCarran-Walter Act had left the scene, since Senator McCarran and Representative Walter were both dead. In addition, Congress had enacted a number of amelioratory laws, described in § 2.04[2]. Nevertheless there was strong resistance to change, and progress was slow and uncertain.

After President Kennedy's death, his proposals for reform of the immigration laws were adopted and pressed by President Johnson. His effort finally achieved fruition in a major revision enacted in 1965, which abolished the national origins quota system. The 1965 amendments are discussed [below].

[2]—1952–1964 Legislation

* * *

The 1961 amendments included:

* * *

- Elimination of ceiling of 2,000 visas that could be issued for countries in the Asia Pacific Triangle;

* * *

[3]—The 1965 Amendments⁵

In 1965, Congress enacted far-reaching legislative changes. In large measure these changes responded to the proposals of Presidents Kennedy and Johnson to eliminate discriminations based on race or national origin. [In that respect, the reforms reflected the spirit of the 1964 Civil Rights Act, passed just one year earlier—Eds.] In other respects, however, the 1965 amendments were restrictive, imposing additional limitations on the entry of persons seeking to perform labor and restrictions on the entry of aliens from the Western Hemisphere. The major revisions of the 1965 enactment:

- Ended the national origins quota system, effective June 30, 1968.

5. The abolition of the national origins quota system dramatically changed the composition of the immigrant stream. For an insightful look at the history of (and assumptions underlying) the 1965 legislation, see Gabriel J. Chin, The Civil Rights Revolution Comes to Immigration Law: A New Look at the Immigration and Nationality Act of 1965, 75 North Carolina L.Rev. 273 (1996)—Eds.

- Abolished the special immigration restrictions relating to Orientals and forbade immigration discriminations because of race, sex, nationality, place of birth, or place of residence.
- Fixed a unified immigration quota, for areas outside the Western Hemisphere, of 170,000 annually. However, no more than 20,000 of these visas could be allocated to the natives of any single foreign state.
- * * * Established the following categories of immigrants exempt from the worldwide numerical restrictions:
 - Immediate relatives of United States Citizens. Defined as the spouses and children of U.S. citizens, and parents of U.S. citizens who are at least 21 years of age.
 - Special immigrants. Additional groups formerly designated as nonquota immigrants and including aliens born in Western Hemisphere countries, returning lawful residents, certain former citizens of the United States, ministers of religion, and employees of the United States.
- Abolished the system of quota priorities under the 1952 Act and established new priorities, based on family relationships and selective skills, in issuing immigrant visas within the established numerical limitations for countries other than those in the Western Hemisphere.

* * *

- * * * [Ended] the exemption of Western Hemisphere natives, other than immediate relatives of American citizens, from numerical restrictions. * * * [C]ommencing July 1, 1968 a numerical limitation of 120,000 annually would apply to this class of special immigrants.
- [Barred the admission of most non-family immigrants] if they were coming to perform skilled or unskilled labor unless the Secretary of Labor determined or certified that qualified workers were not available at the place of destination and that the employment of such prospective immigrants would not adversely affect wages and working conditions in the United States. * * *

* * *

[A combination of amendments enacted in 1976 and 1978 eliminated the remaining distinctions between Western and Eastern Hemisphere immigrants. The Eastern Hemisphere immigration criteria became applicable worldwide.—Eds.]

[7]—The Refugee Act of 1980

[Refugees and asylees are discussed in chapter 11 below.—Eds.]

* * *

[The Immigration Reform and Control Act of 1986 made sweeping changes. The most important concerned the imposition of sanctions on employers of undocumented workers; prohibitions on certain forms of discrimination; legalization, or amnesty; and agricultural workers. Those subjects are discussed in various places throughout this book.—Eds.]

* * *

[d]—The Immigration Marriage Fraud Amendments of 1986

Reports of widespread frauds on the part of aliens seeking to obtain immigration benefits through marriage to American citizens and resident aliens have led to corrective action. The resulting legislation, designated as the Immigration Marriage Fraud Amendments of 1986, Pub.L. 99-639, 100 Stat. 3537 (November 10, 1986), made significant changes in the immigration laws * * * [to be discussed later.—Eds.]

* * *

[11]—The Immigration Act of 1990

* * *

* * * [T]he Immigration Act of 1990, unquestionably, was the most important immigration statute in many years. Most observers will agree that in many respects Congress rejected the suspicion and hostility which characterized the McCarran-Walter Act of 1952. In their place Congress adopted new measures that generally are more consonant with modern humanitarian concerns and enlightened national needs. But at the same time, many objected to some features of the statute which unjustifiably curtailed due process rights in deportation proceedings.

* * *

A striking and much publicized feature of the new law was the marked increase in the number of immigrants who will be admitted each year. This increase reflected the confidence of Congress in the future of the United States and its capacity for continuing to absorb new immigrants.

The 1990 law established an annual limit for worldwide immigration of 700,000 for three years, which would decrease to 675,000 thereafter [not counting overseas refugees, who at that time numbered approximately 125,000 per year]. * * *

As the authors of the above excerpt note, the 1990 law altered the various numerical ceilings on the immigrant admissions. It made a minimum of 480,000 visas available for family reunification, a slight increase over the previous admission levels. It set aside a minimum of 140,000 visas for “employment-based” immigrants—more than twice the previous ceiling. And it allocated 55,000 visas for “diversity” immigrants—nationals of countries from which relatively few people have immigrated to the United States in recent years. Details of each of these three programs appear in chapter 3 below.

The Immigration Act of 1990 made other fundamental changes as well. It codified “temporary protected status,” a discretionary remedy designed for noncitizens who have fled war, natural disaster, or certain other dangers but who do not qualify for asylum. See chapter 11, section C, below. It made several, generally restrictive changes to the nonimmigrant provisions. See chapter 4 below. To reduce delays, it reformulated the naturalization process by transferring some of the procedural steps from the courts to the INS. See chapter 13 below.

The Act also revamped the exclusion grounds (now called grounds of “inadmissibility”). It repealed a provision that had been interpreted as excluding homosexuals, narrowed some of the ideological exclusion grounds, and added new exclusion grounds related to terrorism and to foreign policy. See chapter 5 below. It made miscellaneous changes to the deportation grounds. See chapter 7 below. It amended the conditional residence requirements for spouses and children by adding a specific waiver for certain battered spouses and children. See chapter 3, section B.2.b below. The Act generally toughened the substantive rules, and removed various procedural safeguards, for noncitizens deportable on crime-related grounds. See chapters 7, 8, and 9 below. It also created a Commission on Immigration Reform to study the impact of the present immigration law and to report periodically to Congress.

In 1994 the voters of California sent shock waves through immigrant and ethnic communities by passing Proposition 187. It prohibited public school districts from enrolling undocumented children and made all undocumented migrants ineligible for almost all public medical and health services. It also required school, health, and medical officials to make the necessary immigration status determinations. As discussed in chapter 12, the courts ultimately invalidated Proposition 187 on equal protection grounds. Still, the political mood it reflected and the fears it created persist.

In 1995 and 1996, anti-immigrant sentiments continued to escalate, fed in part by an interim report from Congress’s Commission on Immigration Reform recommending reduced immigration levels. In response, various bills were introduced in Congress to cut legal immigration drastically. In the end, those efforts did not come to fruition. Other bills with substantial adverse impact on immigrants, however, did become law in 1996.

The Antiterrorism and Effective Death Penalty Act of 1996 (AEDPA), a comprehensive bill concerned generally with terrorism and other crime, contained numerous provisions relevant to immigration (many of which had nothing to do with either terrorism or crime). For noncitizens convicted of crimes, this legislation further expanded the deportation grounds and narrowed the provisions for discretionary relief. See chapters 7 and 8 below. It also eliminated some of the procedural safeguards for certain noncitizens found in the United States without having been inspected, and for asylum seekers who appear at ports of entry without proper documents. See chapters 9 and 11, respectively.

But the harshness of the 1996 reforms extended to LPRs as well. In that year Congress passed a welfare reform bill, the Personal Responsibility and Work Opportunity Reconciliation Act of 1996. Title IV of the Act deals specifically with noncitizens. With some exceptions, it makes even LPRs ineligible for most federal means-tested benefits, including food stamps and supplemental security income (SSI), and it authorizes states to adopt similar disqualifications with respect to state benefits. See chapter 13 below. The same legislation makes it harder for prospective immigrants to overcome the public charge exclusion through use of affidavits of support from American family members and other sponsors. See chapter 5 below.

AEDPA and welfare reform notwithstanding, the major event of the year—indeed one of the most sweeping immigration reform packages ever enacted—was the Illegal Immigration Reform and Immigrant Responsibility Act of 1996 (IIRIRA). As its name implies, most of its provisions focused on the apprehension and speedy removal of undocumented immigrants. In the process, however, Congress transformed several other areas of immigration law. You will encounter most of the changes in other chapters. Congress expanded the substantive criteria for removing noncitizens, further restricted discretionary relief, introduced a number of “expedited” procedures for noncitizens facing removal from the United States, imposed additional restrictions on asylum seekers, and sought to immunize a range of federal immigration determinations from judicial review. Important court decisions and subsequent legislation discussed in chapter 9 have modified some of those provisions. IIRIRA did not, however, significantly change the definitions of the qualifying categories for immigrants. See generally Juan P. Osuna, Understanding the 1996 Immigration Act (1997).

Since then, by far the most significant changes to the U.S. immigration laws have been the sweeping national security measures adopted in response to the terrorist attacks of September 11, 2001. The reorganization of the executive branch immigration functions, entailing the dissolution of the INS and the transfer of almost all its functions to various agencies within the new Department of Homeland Security, was described in the Overview chapter. The substantive and procedural changes are too far-reaching to be summarized here; they are considered in chapter 10 below.

What are the numbers? The following will summarize the changing ethnic composition of the U.S. immigrant stream:

IMMIGRATION FROM SELECTED COUNTRIES AND REGIONS^a

FISCAL YEARS 1821-2007

(All figures are in thousands.)

	Mexico ^b	Canada	Caribbean	Central America	Northern Europe	Southern Europe	Asia	Africa	Other	Worldwide
1821-30	5	2	4	0	96	3	0	0	33	143
1831-40	7	14	12	0	491	5	0	0	70	599
1841-50	3	42	14	0	1592	5	0	0	57	1713
1851-60	3	59	11	0	2433	20	42	0	30	2598
1861-70	2	154	9	0	2044	21	65	0	20	2315
1871-80	5	384	14	0	2197	75	124	0	13	2812
1881-90	2	393	29	0	4398	337	70	1	17	5247
1891-1900	1	3	33	1	2838	717	75	0	20	3688
1901-10	50	179	108	8	5693	2363	324	7	63	8795
1911-20	219	742	123	17	2855	1467	247	8	58	5736
1921-30	459	925	75	16	1869	594	112	6	51	4107
1931-40	22	109	16	6	255	93	17	2	8	528
1941-50	61	172	50	22	547	74	37	7	65	1035
1951-60	300	378	123	45	1056	270	153	14	176	2515
1961-70	454	413	470	101	679	444	428	29	304	3322
1971-80	640	170	741	135	394	406	1588	81	338	4493
1981-90	1656	157	872	468	545	216	2738	177	509	7338
1991-2000	2249	192	979	527	1112	247	2796	355	638	9095
2001-07	1182	171	691	435	872	192	2373	496	821	7233
Total
1821-2003	7320	4659	4374	1781	31,966	7549	11189	1183	3291	73,312

- a. These figures were obtained by combining data from the 2003 Yearbook of Immigration Statistics, Table 2 (covering 1821 through 2003), with corresponding data from the 2007 Yearbook of Immigration Statistics, Table 2 (covering 2004 through 2007). Technical qualifications are set out in the original sources.
- b. An ad hoc legalization program resulted in unusually high figures for Mexico for fiscal years 1990 and 1991. Since then, annual immigration has reverted to modern historical levels.
- c. For purposes of this chart, Southern Europe encompasses Greece, Italy, Portugal, Romania, Spain, and the former Yugoslavia. Northern Europe comprises all other European nations, including those lumped together in the Yearbook under the heading "Other Europe."
- d. The total for each column equals the sum of the entries. Because of rounding, these totals sometimes differ slightly from the ones that appear in the Yearbook.

The chart permits some useful generalizations. First, the overall immigration history of the United States has been heavily Northern European—44% of the worldwide total from 1821 to 2007. When Northern Europeans and Canadians are combined, the figure rises to 50%.

Taken alone, however, those figures would be misleading. They conceal dramatic changes over time. From 1991 on, for example, Northern Europeans and Canadians together have comprised only 14% of all immigrants; the dominant regions have become Asia and Latin America. In order, the countries of latest residence of the greatest numbers of immigrants admit-

Country	Number Admitted (in thousands)
Mexico	149
People's Republic of China	77
Philippines	73
India	65
Colombia	33
Haiti	30
Cuba	29
Vietnam	29
Dominican Republic	28
Korea	22

Source: 2007 Yearbook of Immigration Statistics, Supplemental Table 1.

The historical table also illustrates radical changes in the immigration levels of two particular groups: Asians and Southern Europeans. You might have noticed that significant numbers of Asians began arriving in the 1850's (mainly to work on the inter-Continental railroad after the discovery of gold in California), and that those numbers increased in the 1860's and 1870's. During those years, virtually all the Asian immigrants were from China. The Chinese Exclusion Act, passed in 1882, diminished that migration. Soon afterwards, large numbers of immigrants began to arrive from Japan, particularly from 1900 until 1924. In that latter year, Congress barred the entry of most Japanese immigrants, thus producing the much lower figures that appear in the chart for Asian immigration in the 1930's and 1940's. The 1952 Act relaxed (but did not eliminate) the anti-Asian provisions, and from that point on, the chart shows steadily increasing numbers. As you can see from the chart, Chinese immigration has enjoyed a resurgence, but modern Asian immigrants to the United States are much more likely to come from India and the Philippines than from Japan.

There are similar statutory explanations for the sudden changes in numbers of Southern Europeans. You can see from the historical chart that immigration from Southern Europe began to escalate in the 1870's, peaking from 1900 to 1920. The sharp drop in the 1920's was no coincidence. In 1921 Congress enacted temporary legislation, made permanent in 1924, which established the national origins quota system described earlier. Since the new scheme based each country's quota on the proportion of persons in the United States whose ancestry could be traced to that country, and since at that time only a small proportion of people in the United States had Southern European roots, the (fully intended) effect of the new quota system was to stem the influx of Southern Europeans. Notice how sharp the drop-off was. With the exception of some unusual post-war migration patterns, the low numbers of Southern European immigrants persisted until Congress abolished the national origins quota system in 1965. That action explains the increased levels of Southern European immigration during the 1960's and 1970's.

B. THE MORAL DIMENSIONS OF IMMIGRATION CONTROL

Citizens of the United States are generally free to come and go as they please and to remain in the country as long as they wish. See, e.g., Mathews

v. Diaz, 426 U.S. 67, 80, 96 S.Ct. 1883, 48 L.Ed.2d 478 (1976). In contrast, as you have already begun to discover, noncitizens are subject to a complex set of rules that restrict their admission and the duration and other terms of their stay. While many people dispute either the wisdom or the justice of particular provisions of the immigration laws, relatively few have questioned the underlying premise that a sovereign state has the moral power to enact restrictions. But is the moral basis for such a power really that clear? The following materials explore that question:

Roger Nett, The Civil Right We Are Not Ready For: The Right of Free Movement of People on the Face of the Earth

81 Ethics 212, at 216, 218–20, 225–27 (1971).

* * *

Whereas, in the past, civil rights were defined largely as devices by which people might escape from tyranny and direct abuse, the right of people to equal opportunities is rather clearly the underlying theme of all civil rights today. We still talk about free speech, religion, and the right to vote as though they were ends in themselves, and indeed they can be. But people have become conscious that their purpose in seeking or maintaining them is to equalize opportunities, to make possible a life that would otherwise be denied, and that it is in this sense that we are most likely to define justice today. The phrase “life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness” in the American constitution, whether intentionally or not, implies an order of security in which opportunity rests on liberty, which in turn rests on the right to exist. People are looking more and more at the goal as they enunciate the means.

It is therefore correct to say that, commensurate with the times, we find ourselves discovering new rights, meaning new fundamental conditions which insure some amount of justice and equity among people. * * *

* * *

If the set of rights is not functionally complete, what needs to be added to the rights we now recognize in order to make a working set? What rights might we expect some future Magna Carta to include? We suggest that one other “right” relates directly to opportunity and would go a long way, virtually all the way, to close the existing set of rights and make it functionally much more viable. At some future point in world civilization, it may well be discovered that the right to free and open movement of people on the surface of the earth is fundamental to the structure of human opportunity and is therefore basic in the same sense as is free religion, speech, and the franchise. * * *

What is implied in the right to free movement as it relates to fair opportunity? One dimension is material, the right of people who are trapped in overcrowded areas or areas without sufficient resources to go where resources are not so taken up. The other, more purely political, is the right of people to move away from oppression, persecution, unfair restriction, or even disagreeable social environments and social orders. One involves the right to come; the other, the right to go.

I think people have always recognized this right de facto, and ancient as well as modern history is full of instances of migration to avoid persecution and in search of better opportunities. * * *

* * *

Do we have any knowledge of how an open system of world migration might work? We have limited cases. One might think of free movement of people within the British system. A clearer example, however, is within the United States of America, where people have, and have had, the right of free movement since slavery was abolished more than a century ago. Here we have a fair-sized experiment to see how free movement operates in one instance. It works surprisingly well on one subcontinent anyway. When there is a drought in one region, as in the dust-bowl days of the 1930s, people move to another region, and opportunities are somewhat equalized. When clumsy state officials or demagogues disrupt a school system, teachers move to another state. This has a corrective effect on state policies or, if it does not, enriches the states which have better policies or more to offer. Imagine what it would be like if everybody were kept within the boundaries of his own state, and you have a fair picture of most of the rest of the world today!

* * *

What disadvantages and what benefits would there be in a desegregated or even less segregated world? We begin by noting some of the advantages. One certain benefit is that a system of open migration would further remove the unrealistic ideas that people have about others and enable their governments to focus more on real rather than imagined problems of human intention and welfare. Once the pain of giving up an "Old South" mentality subsided in the privileged nations, a number of beneficial effects could be expected to ensue. People in more ordinary circumstances would discover or rediscover that humans on the surface of the earth are indeed one species not too different from themselves. As generations with hardened attitudes died out, new generations would soon come to feel that the right to movement about the surface of the earth is normal and beneficial. The incentive for war could possibly be greatly lowered, as it is, say between California and New York, who now allow free cross-migration.

A second and highly related consideration of the utmost importance is that nationalism, the dominant and perhaps most effective institution of our time—certainly the most cherished—could continue ostensibly in its present form, although in a denatured, and to a few culture purists, debased form. Instead of doing away with her, the "sacred cow" of nationalism might only be dehorned. One would not have to tackle head-on the greater problem of uniting the world or to interfere unnecessarily with the diversity of cultures or cultural pluralism, although the latter would certainly be affected, again as the inclusion of the American Negro affects both Negro and white customs.

The main and most concrete advantage to all societies, however, is that a major type of social waste would begin to dry up. Adding open migration to the basic human rights would be a giant step, perhaps the biggest we could now seriously imagine, toward providing a functional basis for doing away with situational inopportunity at relatively low world cost. Any other social device for doing the same, including laissez faire, would probably cause much more dislocation and entail more effort. By eliminating one primal cause of poverty and involuntary subordination, it would allow individuals to rise by their individual energies and give hope of real betterment to untold numbers where little now exists. All of this might be done by changing only one key factor.

The social waste referred to is of two parts; one is the loss of contributions to overall human purposes—talent for science, production, higher humanistic efforts—from people who are so disadvantaged that they spend virtually all their time and energies just maintaining life. The other is the amount of concrete effort, including emotional energy, spent by those who try to contain the former. It is hardly possible to measure the costs of all the different kinds of reaction, which may well include undeclared and cold wars and more generally noncooperation, where cooperation could reasonably be hoped for.

Finally, and closely connected is that such a right if properly deployed could solve another of our greatest problems, that of overpopulation. Here we would argue that, at the moment, the earth is not necessarily overpopulated in terms of its resources. Rather, some parts of it are, and people are multiplying rapidly to fill up parts of it that are relatively vacant. Would it not be better to move the population over to the more open parts and at the same time, for the privilege, demand more responsible reproductive behavior? Are we not losing one of the world's great opportunities? To be sure, a way for doing this is yet to be worked out and the difficulties should not be under-rated.

The Costs of a System of Open Migration

What would be the principal liabilities to a system of free and open migration? What would be the problems of getting existing nations to agree to a more open system? Does the question really pertain to today's structure of power and politics?

Any extension of civil rights also increases disequilibrium and brings new stresses into a society or societies—at the present time into the world at large. It is quite possible that the world needs time to adjust to present levels of acculturation and to assimilate peoples already displaced. In addition to the practical problems, there is a psychological problem which must be mentioned first—the preoccupation with national systems has convinced most politicians that there is a futility or utopian unreality to any treatment of mankind as a single group and to giving international planning, especially world planning, its just due. There is thus an ideological problem that may inhibit consideration of the practical problems. Social scientists do not yet know how to measure this type of variable.

The right to free movement would present two sets of practical problems, one connected with the right to leave a country—brain drain, political use of information, loss of subjects (e.g., military draftees), and the implied rejection or loss of popularity of a country or its leaders when people have left it. The other set, connected with the right to be let into a country, involves problems of finding housing and employment, of graduating political participation in order to prevent the “swamping” of a social or cultural system, of extending educational, health, and other social facilities. Finally, there is a separate problem of limiting births to culturally acceptable levels so that people would not feel they were being displaced by raw Darwinian tactics. * * *

The problem of getting nations to agree to a system of open migration is harder to assess. Initially, one might have the impression that progress in that direction is now virtually impossible. There are a few indicators to the contrary. One is that the demands for opportunity are coming more and more from those who feel most offended by the world system—those in the poor countries. More privileged nations may increasingly be forced to react to demands which anticipate such a shape of the future. In this century, powerful nations as well as classes have already been seen to relinquish empires and privileges which they once thought were secure, sometimes reluctantly but often willingly as the costs became too great. It is no longer utopian to want to get rid of poverty and lack of opportunity; the question has rather become by what means, and there is now more willingness to look at solutions once considered unlikely. Individual nations do not always have control over social change, and a map of present conditions may indicate the likelihood or even inevitability of introducing new elements into the world system.

But suppose there were a rational choice. It could be described as one between the costs of maintaining many people whose chances are restricted by underprivilege as against the alternative providing for their assimilation into a new and less wasteful world system in which the potential of all could be realized—or, if the latter should prove too remote an ideal, at least to get the unhappy ones to quit throwing bricks at the rest of organized society. It is surely not unimaginable that responsible nations might deliberately strive for a relatively quick assimilation of the underprivileged as against the high cost of maintaining present restrictions. What seems radical in terms of past policies may come to seem more like common sense in a world situation with fewer alternatives. A policy of gradualism extending intermigration privileges between select nations would be one type of beginning. If some nations were to begin opening their boundaries, it would probably put others at a political disadvantage so that they could not stand still. A new geopolitics could begin on that basis, one with sufficient latitude for political realism.

Stephen Macedo, The Moral Dilemma of U.S. Immigration Policy: Open Borders Versus Social Justice, in Carol Swain (Ed.), Debating Immigration
63-64, 66-67, 73-75, 76 (2006).

According to influential arguments * * * by admitting large numbers of relatively poorly educated and low-skilled workers, we have increased competition for low-skilled jobs, lowering the wages of the poor and increasing the gap between rich and poor Americans. The high proportion of noncitizens among the poor may also lessen political support for social welfare policies.

How should we think about the apparent ethical conflict between, on the one hand, the cosmopolitan humanitarian impulse to admit less well-off persons from abroad who wish to immigrate to the United States and, on the other hand, the special obligations we have to less well-off Americans, including or especially African Americans? Those with liberal sensibilities need to consider whether all the things that they might favor—humanitarian concern for the world's poor, an openness to an every-widening social diversity, and concern for distributive justice within our political community—necessarily go together.

These are vexing questions not only in politics but in contemporary political theory and moral philosophy, and what I say will be controversial. * * * I argue that if high levels of immigration have a detrimental impact on our least well-off fellow citizens, that is a reason to limit immigration, even if those who seek admission seem to be poorer than our own poor whose condition is worsened by their entry. Citizens have special obligations to one another: we have special reasons to be concerned with the distribution of wealth and opportunities among citizens. The comparative standing of citizens matters in some ways that the comparative standing of citizens and non-citizens does not. Of course, distributive justice is only one consideration bearing on immigration policy, though a weighty one.

I argue against what is sometimes characterized as a “cosmopolitan” position with respect to distributive justice and defend the idea that distributive justice is an obligation that holds among citizens, a position that has also been defended by Michael Walzer, John Rawls, and David Miller, among others. What is the basis of these special obligations among citizens? I argue that it is as members or co-participants in self-governing political communities that we have special obligations to our fellow members.

Do we conclude, therefore, that the borders should be closed and immigration by the poor restricted? That conclusion would be far too hasty. For one thing, we do have significant moral obligations to poor people abroad, although these are different from what we owe to fellow citizens. In addition, measures designed to “tighten up” the borders may do more harm than good. On balance, we should perhaps accept ongoing high levels of movement back and forth across the U.S.–Mexico border, as Douglas Massey recommends. But we also need to consider whether high levels of immigration by low-skilled workers make it less likely that we will fulfill our moral obligations to the poorest Americans. * * *

* * * The perspective adopted and defended here is politically liberal. John Rawls and Michael Walzer * * * are philosophers of the Left in American politics. It might be thought that this limits the relevance of my argument, but this may not be so. For one thing, the vast majority of Americans profess a belief in some liberal principles, such as equality of opportunity. * * * The question of whether we have special obligations to our fellow citizens is important independently of the details of one's convictions about what justice requires among citizens. Even those who believe that "equality of opportunity" mandates only a modest level of educational and social services may still think that the mandate holds among fellow citizens and not all of humanity. * * *

* * *

The Contours of the Immigration Dilemma

* * *

The composition of the growing immigrant pool has changed markedly in recent decades, with the skill level and earnings of immigrants declining relative to that of the native U.S. population. Whereas in 1960 the average immigrant man living in the United States earned 4 percent more than the average native-born American, by 1998 the average immigrant earned 23 percent less. Most of the growth in immigration since 1960 has been among people entering at the bottom 20 percent of the income scale. This is partly because, as George Borjas observes, "[s]ince the immigration reforms of 1965, U.S. immigration law has encouraged family reunification and discouraged the arrival of skilled immigrants." At the same time, the ethnic make-up of immigration has also changed, with the percentage arriving from Europe and Canada falling sharply and the percentage from Latin America and Asia rising.

* * *

Let me add one other element to this admittedly controversial account before moving on. Nations with notably more progressive domestic policies often have immigration laws that are quite different from those of the United States. American immigration policy emphasizes family reunification (including children, spouses, parents, and adult siblings), with a very small percentage of immigrants—around 5 percent in recent decades—receiving visas based on the possession of desirable skills. Canada, by contrast, has a quota system that gives greater weight to educational background, occupation, and English-language proficiency of applicants for admission. Canada's policy favors better-educated and higher-skilled workers, and this seems likely to have distributive effects that are the opposite of U.S. policy. By increasing the pool of skilled workers relative to the unskilled, Canadian policy tends to lower the wages of the better-off to raise the relative wage levels of the worse-off.

* * *

The Moral Significance of Collective Self-Governance

Borders are morally significant because they bound systems of collective self-governance. * * * Co-participation in governance is an important moral relation. As members of a political community, we are joined in a collective enterprise across generations through which we construct and sustain a comprehensive system of laws and institutions that regulate and shape all other associations, including religious communities and families. We are born into political communities and are formed by them. * * *

* * *

Citizens have powerful obligations of mutual concern and respect, and mutual justification, to one another because they are joined together—as constituent members of a sovereign people—in creating binding political institutions that determine patterns of opportunities and rewards for all. A self-governing political society is a hugely significant joint venture, and we understand it as such. We have strong common obligations as fellow citizens because we collectively govern one another: we collectively make huge consequential decisions. This could not simultaneously be true of the international society, and it is not. * * *

* * *

Cosmopolitan distributive justice (as opposed to a duty to assist other peoples to become self-governing) makes no sense absent a cosmopolitan state and a cosmopolitan political community, for which hardly anyone seriously argues and we are not obliged to bring into being, though there are good reasons for strengthening international institutions. It is, moreover, hard to understand the reasonableness of making people responsible for the welfare of others without also making them responsible for their governance. * * *

* * *

* * * [I]t is not implausible to think that U.S. immigration policy of the last 40 years has been bad for distributive justice within the United States. It may have worsened income inequalities by admitting large numbers of poor people. Those poor immigrants are better off for having been allowed to immigrate, but the burdens of funding some social welfare programs are increased, and those programs may be less politically popular as a consequence. What, from an egalitarian perspective at least, could possibly be wrong in making the United States more like Canada by reducing overall levels of immigration and giving greater priority to immigration by the better-educated and the higher-skilled?

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. Are moral considerations that reflect the individual interests of would-be immigrants even relevant, or should a nation's immigration policy be viewed simply as an instrument for promoting the welfare of its own citizens?⁶ What justifies the privileging of the interests of fellow citizens

6. See John A. Scanlan & O.T. Kent, The Force of Moral Arguments for a Just Immigration Policy in a Hobbesian Universe: The Contemporary American Example, in

Mark Gibney (ed.), Open Borders? Closed Societies? The Ethical and Political Issues, at 61, 78-82 (1988) (moral considerations are not only relevant but are themselves part of

over the interests of would-be immigrants? Is it appropriate to analogize a nation-state to a family and to therefore conclude that citizens are justified in prioritizing the well being of one another above the interests of noncitizens? See, e.g., Kwame Anthony Appiah, Cosmopolitanism 158 (2006) (“[A]s Adam Smith saw, to say that we have obligations to strangers isn’t to demand that they have the same grip on our sympathies as our nearest and dearest. We’d better start with the recognition that they don’t.”). For an argument that increased international interdependence gives rise to obligations of reciprocity according to which some noncitizens are entitled to the same respect as citizens, see Cristina M. Rodríguez, Guest Workers and Integration: Toward a Theory of What Immigrants and Americans Owe One Another, 2007 Univ. Chicago Legal Forum 219, 252–57 (observing that migration, particularly from Mexico and Latin America, “is the product not only of our own current economic needs and choices, but also of the economic and foreign policy choices that preceded us. In other words, immigration to the United States is the function of choices of which we as a society are the authors. These choices have given rise to an interdependence not only with immigrants who have already arrived, but also with future immigrants, which in turn requires us to recognize certain reciprocal obligations that arise from our associations with others, regardless of borders” and citizenship status).

2. Although Nett’s prescriptions are rooted in human rights arguments, he also maintains that, at any rate, the actual benefits of open migration would outweigh the costs. In making that argument, is Nett comparing the global benefits and costs, or the benefits and costs to the receiving nation? Which type of utilitarianism—global or national—strikes you as more relevant to the question of open migration? See Timothy King, Immigration from Developing Countries: Some Philosophical Issues, 93 Ethics 525, 526–31 (1983). If immigration has net social benefits for a given society, what justifies focusing on its distributional costs among citizens? Peter Schuck argues that “the overall growth of our economy—its production of goods and services—is the single most important goal of a rational and morally-justified immigration policy.” Peter H. Schuck, The Morality of Immigration Policy, 45 San Diego L. Rev. 865, 886 (2008). What justifies this position, and can it be reconciled with Macedo’s views?

3. Our society generally disdains social clubs that exclude prospective members because of race, ethnicity, gender or other disfavored criteria. In national interest). See generally Warren F. Schwartz (ed.), Justice in Immigration (1995); Joseph H. Carens, Aliens and Citizens: The Case for Open Borders, 49 The Rev. of Politics 251 (1987); Howard F. Chang, Immigration Policy, Liberal Principles, and the Republican Tradition, 85 Georgetown L.J. 2105 (1997) (history of immigration restrictions generally, and discriminatory immigration restrictions in particular, are incompatible with liberal principles of political theory on which republic was based); Kevin R. Johnson, Open Borders?, 51 UCLA L. Rev. 193 (2003); Peter H. Schuck, The Morality of Immigration Policy, 45 San Diego L. Rev. 865 (2008); R. George Wright, Federal Immigration Law and the Case for Open Entry, 27 Loyola L.A.L.Rev. 1265 (1994). Presenting an historical case for open borders is Satvinder S. Juss, Free Movement and the World Order, 16 Internat’l J. Refugee L. 289 (2004).

certain economic contexts—including employment, education, housing, and public accommodations—society’s disapproval has even been codified into law. And, generally speaking, the Constitution prohibits the government itself from engaging in such discrimination unless there is an especially close connection between the classification used and a legitimate and sufficiently important goal.

The most disfavored forms of discrimination tend to be those based on circumstances of birth. To be sure, we often treat one another differently because of characteristics shaped at least partially by accident of birth. Intelligence and other personal traits influence decisions on university admissions, jobs, and other benefits, when native ability is relevant to likely performance level. The laws of nature that endow some individuals with greater talents than others might be unfair, but society accepts selection criteria that reflect those disparities when the reasons for employing such criteria are strong enough. Moreover, our free enterprise system inevitably results in a resource distribution based partly on circumstances of birth. But we don’t usually applaud that feature of the system. We accept it as an unfortunate side effect of an economic model that, in society’s view, contains enough offsetting advantages to commend it.

Yet, one of the most crucial policy decisions the nation must make—who will be allowed to be here—is based on citizenship. As you will see in more detail in chapter 13, citizenship in turn is legally determined in the vast majority of cases by the circumstances of one’s birth: Place of birth and identity of parents are usually dispositive. Unlike most of the other laws that in their practical operation permit important consequences to turn on accident of birth, the immigration laws expressly mandate such differential treatment. By law, one’s place of birth and one’s parentage are relevant to, and often conclusive of, one’s rights to enter and to remain. See chapter 13, § A. If Nett is right to call ours a segregated world, then the segregation is de jure, not merely de facto. See Ayelet Shachar, The Birthright Lottery—Citizenship and Global Inequality (2009) (elaborating on the accident of birth phenomenon, identifying the resulting inequities, and suggesting obligations that flow from them—including either relaxing immigration restrictions or reallocating economic resources).

Several writers see the power to restrict immigration as a basic freedom of a nation’s existing members. In varying ways, they have depicted this freedom as akin to the freedom to choose the people with whom one will associate or contract. Immigration restrictions have also been portrayed as a vehicle to achieve the “communal independence” vital to fostering both a sense of belonging and a sense of commitment to the common good.⁷

7. See e.g., Kenneth L. Karst, Equality and Community: Lessons from the Civil Rights Era, 56 Notre Dame Lawyer 183, 183–84 (1980); David A. Martin, Due Process and Membership in the National Community: Political Asylum and Beyond, 44 Univ. Pittsburgh L.Rev. 165, 194–208 (1983); Peter H.

Schuck, The Transformation of Immigration Law, 84 Columbia L.Rev. 1, 85–90 (1984); Michael Walzer, The Distribution of Membership, in Peter G. Brown & Henry Shue (eds.), Boundaries—National Autonomy and Its Limits, at 1, 32 (1981).

All those rationales—freedom of association, freedom of contract, and the benefits of achieving a sense of community—can also be, and have been, invoked in debates over civil rights legislation. To prohibit private job discrimination based on race, for example, Congress had to restrict the freedom of the employer to choose the people with whom he or she would associate or contract. In the contexts with which the various civil rights laws are concerned, Congress decided that those freedoms were less compelling than the corresponding equality interests. Constitutional limitations on government-sponsored discrimination similarly reflect the triumph of equality interests over other concerns. The question here is whether immigration policy should be seen any differently. Is the government on any firmer a moral footing when it excludes individuals because of their place of birth or their parentage than either a private or governmental employer or university is when it rejects applicants because of their race? Why is it, exactly, that equality interests come out ahead in one context but not the other? Is a nation that acts in its sovereign capacity morally different from other groups of individuals? Alternatively, is discrimination based on citizenship morally different from discrimination based on other accidents of birth?

Consider also some of the following possible moral justifications for restricting immigration. For each, decide first whether you find the argument persuasive and, second, whether the argument applies with any more force to immigration than to any of the civil rights contexts in which society has condemned discrimination based on other accidents of birth.

- a. We were here first.
- b. Our parents contributed to this society and thus earned the right to pass on the fruits of their labor to us. Those fruits include the right to remain in the United States to enjoy the society they helped create.
- c. Those of us who are already here have stronger ties to the national community in which we live than do those who wish to enter that community for the first time. If the nation's resources are not sufficient to accommodate everyone who wants to live here, excluding newcomers is therefore preferable to severing existing ties. See generally T. Alexander Aleinikoff, Aliens, Due Process and "Community Ties": A Response to Martin, 44 Univ. Pittsburgh L.Rev. 237 (1983).
- d. It is true that immigration laws ultimately are based on accident of birth, but only because the particular accident of birth defines the person's citizenship. In a world composed of nation-states, citizenship has significance. For example, citizenship legally implies allegiance. It is right that a nation extend special protection to those who owe it allegiance. On this issue, see generally Stephen H. Legomsky, Why Citizenship?, 35 Virginia J. Internat'l L. 279 (1994).
- e. Our own citizens, having usually been born and raised in the United States, are more likely to have values compatible with those of the existing culture. And we have as much right to form a culturally homogeneous nation as a social club does to maintain a culturally homogeneous membership.

f. It is unlikely that all countries would agree to open migration, and one prosperous country could not go it alone. If it tried, it would receive more immigrants than it could absorb, and that would unfairly place the citizens of the receiving country at a disadvantage vis a vis those of other prosperous nations who continued to restrict immigration. (As a side point, do you think Nett's assessment of the chances of worldwide agreement on this subject is realistic?)

4. Professor Bruce Ackerman has argued that immigration can morally be restricted only to the extent necessary to preserve the liberal polity itself. Bruce A. Ackerman, Social Justice in the Liberal State 95 (1980). He defines a liberal polity as one in which anyone asserting power over another must provide a rational defense of his or her decision; for this purpose, rationality precludes assertions that the power-holder has morally superior interests. Id. at 93. Whether he is right or wrong to exclude other possible justifications, do you agree with him that admission restrictions are morally defensible even then? Such thoughts were expressed in the early days of the United States by those who feared the immigration of "monarchists" intent on destroying the fledgling democracy. See, e.g., Roy L. Garis, Immigration Restriction 25–26 (1927); Maldwyn A. Jones, American Immigration 80 (1960). In modern times, although commentators have not argued that open borders would literally topple the American liberal polity, some have suggested that too liberal an immigration policy could trigger a serious political backlash.⁸

5. Is freedom of association an argument for or against open borders? Do you think freedom of association is more important at the small group level or at the national level?⁹

6. Who has the burden of proof here—those who assert the morality of restricting immigration, or those who believe such restrictions are immoral? Is the admission of an immigrant an act of affirmative assistance, or is exclusion an act of affirmative interference with personal freedom? Is the distinction merely semantic, or does it have moral significance?

You might recall from your study of either torts or criminal law that in the United States the legal system generally imposes no obligation to render affirmative assistance to others. See, e.g., Dan B. Dobbs, The Law of Torts, chap. 21 (2000). But the line that separates action from inaction is not always easy to draw. Moreover, the law has recognized exceptions to the no-duty-to-rescue rule. Id. One exception is that a person who even innocently created the peril to another has a duty to render reasonable assistance. Id. Does that principle have any applicability to the issue of open borders? Some have argued that a nation's exploitative economic policies, when responsible for modern day disparities in wealth, create an obligation to admit immigrants from third world countries. See, e.g., Developments in the Law, Immigration Policy and the Rights of Aliens, 96 Harv.L.Rev. 1286, 1465 n. 13 (1983).

8. See, e.g., Peter H. Schuck, The Transformation of Immigration Law, 84 Columbia L.Rev. 1, 81 (1984); Michael S. Teitelbaum, Right versus Right: Immigration and Refugee Policy in the United States, 59 Foreign Affairs 21, 51–52 (1980).

9. See Judith Lichtenberg, National Boundaries and Moral Boundaries: A Cosmopolitan View, in Peter G. Brown & Henry Shue (eds.), Boundaries—National Autonomy and Its Limits, at 79, 96–97 (1981) (capacity for equal commitment to others affected by intimacy of contact).

Legalities aside, it has often been argued that one has a moral obligation to render reasonable assistance to those in distress. The principle of "mutual aid," posited by John Rawls in A Theory of Justice, at 114 (1971), holds that positive assistance is morally required when one person needs aid and another person is in a position to give it without "excessive risk or loss." Do you agree? If so, should this principle extend to the immigration policies of nation-states? See generally Michael Walzer, The Distribution of Membership, in Peter G. Brown & Henry Shue (eds.), Boundaries—National Autonomy and Its Limits, at 1, 15–23 (1981).

7. Although most of the analogies have been to families, or to clubs, or to neighborhoods, or to commercial transactions, it is possible also to analogize immigration law to property law. Would Nett recognize a human right to move onto another person's private property, as long as the move expanded the mover's opportunities for happiness without causing excessive harm to the original owner? If not, how would Nett distinguish migration across national boundaries? Should the citizens of a country be regarded as the "owners" of the nation's territory, possessed of a right to exclude unwanted visitors?

8. No country today has open borders, but there are arrangements in which groups of two or more countries have agreed to virtually free migration within the group. The best known arrangement of that type is the European Union, which allows free movement of workers who are nationals of EU member states. For a thoughtful normative comparison of free movement within the European Union and the United States, see Francis J. Conte, Sink or Swim Together: Citizenship, Sovereignty, and Free Movement in the European Union and the United States, 61 Univ. Miami L. Rev. 331 (2007). In December 2003, the Southern Cone Common Market (MERCOSUR), a trade bloc composed of Argentina, Brazil, Paraguay, and Uruguay (with Chile and Bolivia as associate members), agreed to establish a migration system much like that of the European Union. The agreement obligates the member states to grant freedom of movement and freedom of employment to each other's nationals. The total population of the Mercosur countries is 230 million. The agreement hinges on the (expected) assent of each of the national parliaments. See Gonzalo Baeza, Latin America nears broad immigration pact, UPI Release (Nov. 27, 2002). Other regional arrangements providing for either free or less restricted migration have been undertaken in West Africa, Central Africa, the Andean Pact (several South American countries), and the Nordic Community. See generally Richard Plender, International Migration Law, chs. 6, 8 (rev. 2d ed. 1988). New Zealand and Australia permit their nationals to travel freely between the two countries. See, e.g., (New Zealand) Immigration Regulations 1987, No. 301, 1st Sched., Part II.

In 1993 the governments of Mexico, the United States, and Canada signed the North American Free Trade Agreement [NAFTA]. Except for some provisions on nonimmigrants (see page 387 below), there was no attempt to address immigration.

Should there be some sort of North American free movement treaty? Two respected commentators have suggested both the wisdom and the long-term inevitability of the free movement of labor within North America.¹⁰

9. In recent years several leading scholars have argued for open borders.¹¹

10. Professor Ayelet Shachar has identified ways in which the “borders” that have traditionally generated an array of legal consequences have shifted further and further abroad—not only in U.S. immigration law, but in the laws of the United Kingdom and Australia as well. See Ayelet Shachar, The Shifting Border of Immigration Regulation, 3 Stanford Journal of Civil Rights & Civil Liberties 165 (2007).

11. The broad question raised by this section has been whether, given the existing criteria for citizenship, the exclusion of noncitizens is morally defensible. In chapter 13 you will have the opportunity to consider what the criteria for citizenship ought to be and whether the law should even embody the concept of citizenship at all.

12. A related question is the morality of emigration restrictions.¹² Conversely, Pope Paul II questioned the morality of emigration itself, calling it a potential “evil.”¹³

10. See T. Alexander Aleinikoff, Legal Immigration Reform: Toward Rationality and Equity, in Richard D. Lamm & Alan Simpson, Center for Immigration Studies, Blueprints for an Ideal Legal Immigration Policy, Center Paper 17 (March 2001), <http://cis.org/articles/2001/blueprints/toc.html>; Kevin R. Johnson, Legal Immigration in the 21st Century, in Lamm & Simpson, above.

11. See, e.g., Kevin R. Johnson, Opening the Floodgates: Why America Needs to Eliminate its Borders and Rethink Immigration Law (2007) (fundamentally reconceptualizing the border, recasting it as merely a monitoring device rather than an admission hurdle, and proposing open borders but with narrow exceptions for compelling national security and other reasons); Satvinder Singh Juss, International Migration and Global Justice, ch. 2 (2006) (offering both historical and philosophical arguments for free movement).

12. For an effective criticism of national policies that prevent people from leaving, see Alan Dowty, Closed Borders—The Con- temporary Assault on Freedom of Movement (1987). For a thoughtful analysis of both the conceptual and the political links between emigration and immigration, see Thomas Kleven, Why International Law Favors Emigration over Immigration, 33 U. Miami Inter-Amer. L. Rev. 69 (2002).

13. See Michael Scaperlanda, Immigration and Evil: The Religious Challenge, 83 Univ. Detroit Mercy L. Rev. 835 (2006) (agreeing). For a reply, see Stephen H. Legomsky, Emigration, Obligation, and Evil, 83 Univ. Detroit Mercy L. Rev. 848 (2006); see also Elizabeth McCormick, Hospitality: How a Biblical Virtue Could Transform United States Immigration Policy, 83 Univ. Detroit Mercy L. Rev. 858 (2006) (exploring the Biblical injunction to extend hospitality to strangers); cf. Michele R. Pistone & John J. Hoeffner, Stepping out of the Brain Drain—Applying Catholic Social Teaching in a New Era of Migration (2007) (arguing that emigration of skilled migrants actually benefits both sending and receiving countries).

C. IMMIGRATION, RACE, CULTURE, AND LANGUAGE

The immigration policies of any nation obviously affect its racial, cultural, and linguistic composition. Conversely, considerations of race, culture, and language influence immigration policies. Official government policy aside, public sentiments about immigration profoundly affect the daily lives of immigrants, the daily lives of those native-born ethnic minorities who are publicly perceived as associated with immigration, and the national community as a whole. In this book, the materials on the relationship of immigration policy to race, culture, and language are organized in the following way:

The present subsection considers questions broadly related to multiculturalism. Do we want a multicultural society? What does the term really mean? How much do we value assimilation? How much do we value cultural pluralism? Do the two values conflict? What does it mean to be a nation? How important is a common racial or cultural heritage? How important is a common language? Normative values aside, how do immigrants affect the racial, cultural, or linguistic life of the nation?

A separate but related subject is how public attitudes on race, culture, and language have actually shaped United States immigration policy, both historically and today. This book explores that subject in two ways. It is treated explicitly as part of the more general discussion, in section F below, of the politics of immigration. The subject is also considered pervasively, in connection with several specific historical and contemporary immigration developments—for example, the effects of anti-Asian sentiments on the early Asian exclusion laws (chapter 2); the relationship between race and such programs as the national origins quota system, per-country limits, and the admission of “diversity” immigrants (chapter 3); the abuse of Mexican guest workers under the Bracero program (chapter 4); the issues surrounding the profiling of Muslims, Arabs, and others in the context of immigration and national security (chapter 10); the racial underpinnings of the Haitian interdiction program (chapter 11); the racial issues that surfaced in California during the Proposition 187 campaign (chapter 12); the racial implications of employer sanctions (chapter 12); and the race discrimination remedies established by IRCA and by the Civil Rights Act of 1964 (chapter 12).

A third set of related issues concerns the impact of public attitudes and behavior on immigrants themselves and on those ethnic minorities whom many members of the public consciously or unconsciously treat as foreign. Native-born and naturalized United States citizens of Asian, Latino, or Arab descent are especially likely to experience such treatment, as the literature you will see illustrates. This subject is part of subsection H, which deals generally with immigrants' self-identities and the concept of "home."

With that introduction, we return to the theme of the present subsection—the link between immigration and multiculturalism. The writings excerpted below display the views of five commentators on the roles that race, culture, and language have played, and should play, in American immigration and integration policy. Because several of those pieces refer to the 1965 immigration reforms, here is a one-paragraph refresher on what those reforms were:

Since 1921, United States law has limited the number of immigrants who could be admitted to the United States from any one country in any one year. Until 1965, those limits varied from country to country. United States law made each country's limit proportional to the number of Americans whose national origins could be traced to that country. The objective was to preserve the existing ethnic composition of the United States population and, in particular, to minimize the immigration of southern Europeans, eastern Europeans (particularly Jews), and Asians. But in 1965, in the anti-discriminatory spirit of the 1964 Civil Rights Act, Congress repealed these "national origins" quotas and substituted a uniform per-country limit of (then) 20,000 immigrants per year. The moment the national origins constraints were removed, both the absolute numbers and the percentages of immigrants who were from southern Europe, eastern Europe, and Asia all rapidly increased. Ever since, immigration commentators and public officials have vigorously debated the pros and cons of the 1965 reforms.

The first excerpt, from a book by Peter Schuck, provides some of the critical background on the subject of diversity. The second excerpt, by Cristina Rodríguez, explores the relationship between democratic self-government and the linguistic and cultural diversity generated by immigration. The third excerpt is from one of the most attention-getting of recent anti-immigration writings. The author, Peter Brimelow, is himself an immigrant from England. Responses from Kevin Johnson and Juan Perea follow.

Peter H. Schuck, Diversity in America—Keeping Government at a Safe Distance

Pages 3–7 (2003).

America is probably the most diverse society on earth—certainly the most diverse industrial one. This is true regardless of how one thinks about or measures diversity or which kind of diversity is under discussion. * * *

This diversity is itself remarkably diverse—and dynamic. Like a blastula of cells undergoing mitosis, American society constantly proliferates new divisions and differentiations. * * *

Remarkably, this diversification is occurring amid social developments that commentators usually consider homogenizing. The national mass media, advertising, and popular culture penetrate every nook and cranny of our lives. Latinos, Asians, and other groups increasingly intermarry with whites and with each other. The federal government deploys much of its political, fiscal, and regulatory power in a quest for national uniformity. A steadily aging population buttresses familiar demographic patterns. Some pundits, eager to debunk Arthur Schlesinger's claim that diversity is unraveling the social fabric, even assert that "[w]hile ideologically 'all are different,' Americans in fact are remarkably 'all the same.'"

Yet diversity grows apace despite these homogenizing factors, and sometimes because of them. While the number of daily newspapers has declined, the number and variety of other mass media outlets—cable, radio, satellite, the Internet, films—have vastly increased. Advertising is more highly differentiated in order to reach diverse audiences, specialized interests, and niche markets. More diverse immigrants, religious sectarianism, linguistic enclaves, and ideological shifts make ethnic identity—a term hardly used before the 1950s—more salient. Women have entered and transformed previously all-male occupations. Congress has permitted states, localities, and private actors to go their own separate ways in many policy domains. Economic and medical advances for the elderly have multiplied their lifestyle choices. Fringe groups, free to purify their political ideologies, can appeal to narrow, discontented voter blocs. Suburbs, long derided by urban elites as the triumph of bland uniformity over piquant diversity, increasingly mimic the heterogeneous cities they surround. Corporate culture, traditionally conformist, now deploys the theory, practice, and rhetoric of diversity. Popular culture has become so transracial, according to one black commentator, that it spells "the end of white America."

The growing social acceptance of diversity is nowhere more striking than in the evolving views of openly gay relationships and lifestyles by a society that harshly repressed them—and to an extent still does. * * *

* * *

The traditional resistance to diversity should not surprise us. * * * [F]ew thinkers and fewer political or religious leaders in world history have considered diversity to be anything but a threat that should be suppressed or contained. Even today, most societies would view the claim that diversity is a social virtue as subversive, if not suicidal, nonsense. For them, toleration is but a survival tactic, a temporary expedient. * * *

One can easily understand, then, why Crèvecoeur, Tocqueville, James Bryce, Dickens, and many other visitors to America have been perplexed as well as intrigued by our diversity. So far as one can tell from their writings, none of these close observers of American diversity ever endorsed it for their own societies. Even those who most admired it seriously doubted whether the United States could sustain a strong civil society and a democracy built with such disparate social materials. Tocqueville, who uncannily prophesied the long Russo-U.S. struggle, also predicted that America's diversity would culminate in a race war. The notion that American democracy and civil society could coexist with a far greater diversity than they or anyone else could then imagine would have struck them as lunacy.

Yet this is precisely what happened in the decades following Appomattox. Despite (or perhaps because of) a succession of crises—industrialization, mass immigration, the Great Depression, wars, the McCarthy era, the civil rights and antiwar movements, new waves of even more diverse immigration, and now a war on terrorism waged in regions from which many Americans and new immigrants come—the American polity's enduring stability and unity remain the envy of the world. At the dawn of the twenty-first century, every other polyglot nation—India, Indonesia, Russia, Nigeria, Turkey, South Africa, Sri Lanka, and even Canada—is at serious risk of fragmenting into ethnic shards. (Australia and Switzerland stand, so far, as notable exceptions.) Indeed, even strong unitary states like the United Kingdom, Spain, France, and China, and religiously homogeneous states like Belgium, are being roiled by militant demands for devolution or even full independence. In sharp contrast, the United States has maintained its social and political cohesion, even achieving a kind of cultural coherence (though this is more debatable). Moreover, it has done so without sacrificing its economic, social, and cultural dynamism.

How has this singular feat been accomplished? That question is among the most compelling and complex issues facing diverse societies like ours. This book analyzes an important part of the answer: the role of law. It examines the different ways and policy contexts in which we have used law to protect, import, define, certify, subsidize, mandate, exploit—in a word, manage—diversity. “Manage” is a serviceable term to characterize how government self-consciously approaches diversity—so long as one bears in mind that “manage” includes both decisions to make diversity a subject of active legal intervention and decisions to leave diversity to informal unregulated choices.

Cristina M. Rodríguez, Language and Participation

94 California Law Rev. 687, 689–93, 694–95 (2006).

In recent years, language diversity has become a particularly salient and controversial feature of American demography, because dramatic rates of immigration are reshaping our social, political, and aesthetic environments. The foreign-born and their children now constitute approximately twenty percent of the U.S. population. * * * Of that population, almost 43% arrived in the United States in the past ten years, and 46% of that population speaks a language other than English at home. In other, smaller cities, such as San Antonio, Texas, the Latino population has climbed to sixty percent—a trend due, in large part, to recent immigration from Mexico and Central America.

* * * One of the standard responses to the immigrant influx, repeated at various stages of American history, recently has found high-profile expression in Samuel Huntington's plea for the soul of American, in which he warns, “There is no Americano dream. There is only the American dream created by an Anglo-Protestant society. Mexican Americans will share in that dream and in that society only if they dream in English.” According to Huntington, American democracy now faces the possibility of its own unraveling, brought on by the failure of an unprecedented number of recent immigrants, mostly from Latin America, to assimilate linguistically and culturally into an English-speaking mainstream. Whatever one thinks of Huntington’s dire predictions, he broaches an important question—is there a relationship between linguistic diversity and the future of our democracy?

The mainstream liberal response to Huntington’s argument insists that linguistic assimilation continues apace—that the grandchildren of Latin American immigrants “could not dream in Spanish even if they wanted to.” Despite the fact that this retort has strong sociological data on its side, it elides an important point, and the account of language diversity it offers is incomplete. Even as the children and grandchildren of immigrants become native English speakers, the United States will remain, as it has always been, a multilingual society. Statistics documenting assimilation cannot explain away the tension Huntington has identified, for two reasons. First, at least with respect to immigrants from Latin America, bilingualism persists strongly in the second generation and even somewhat in the third. * * *

Second, and more universally, continued immigration will ensure the ongoing replenishment of immigrant communities—a phenomenon not characteristic of the experience of European immigrants in the twentieth century. This change in the nature of immigration means that multiple generations of Americans, possessing varying levels of facility with non-English languages, will remain present in the body politic, even as individual family lines assimilate linguistically. Speech communities comprised of non-English-speaking immigrants, their monolingual-in-English descendants, and a wide array of bilinguals in between will persist—a phenomenon I have called the mutability continuum of language. In fact, the 2000 Census predicted that, by 2044, a majority of people residing in the United States will speak a language other than English, though not necessarily to the exclusion of English. For the foreseeable future, bilingualism will remain a demographic characteristic that complicates our cultural, social, and political interactions.

In light of these observations, neither the Anglo-Protestant “idea” nor the liberal version of the assimilation story can account for the modern reality of the United States as a truly multilingual society. The former yearns for a homogeneous national identity that bears little resemblance to demographic reality and that has never quite existed. The latter, while descriptively accurate, does not provide the necessary substantive account of how individual bilingualism and social multilingualism may be changing the character of our political and social institutions. The presence of speakers of languages other than English is reshaping important social settings, such as the workplace, the schools, and the countless different fora in which politics occur. * * *

Despite an ever-present and increasingly present need for this type of thinking in the United States, our understanding of the relationship between linguistic diversity and democracy remains thin. We resort too often to general discussions of multiculturalism and assimilation to answer the challenges of multilingualism. Whereas that ongoing debate forms an important context for discussions of language rights and policy, the language question must be confronted independently. In both an instrumental and affective sense, language serves as the fundamental medium of social interaction. At the same time, though certain languages may correlate with worldviews, they are not themselves values or practices. As a result, debates concerning the extent to which we should accommodate conflicting cultural values will not point to the best way to manage multilingualism.

* * * I reconceptualize the social significance of language difference by offering a positive theory of how a democratic society like the United States should approach the multilingualism of its population. Whereas existing models of language rights focus primarily on correcting injustices against particular minority groups, my central claim is that our legal and political framework for managing multilingualism should be built around the value of participation in public life. In the spirit of interpersonal engagement at the heart of language itself, the best model for the United States will strive to make linguistic pluralism, whatever its source, socially functional.

* * *

The alternative account I offer * * * engages several key issues: (1) how linguistic diversity affects participation in social and political life; (2) how we should regulate multilingualism to promote participation in those spheres; and (3) whether we should emphasize monolingualism or multilingualism in our institutions to achieve these participatory ends. At first glance, it may seem obvious that participation, because it requires interaction, would be more effective and efficient if everyone used the same language. My ultimate conclusion, however is that this initial, monolingual instinct cannot survive a second look into the nature of participation. * * * A multilingual conception of participation will better advance two important objectives of American democracy: social investment by minority language groups and personal control or autonomy over matters of deeply personal concern, including cultural destiny.

* * *

In developing my participatory account, I emphasize two important dimensions of participation that transform the counterintuitive into the self-evident. First, I focus on mid-level social institutions—workplaces, schools, and the scenes of everyday politics and government, or the arenas through which most citizens live their daily lives—rather than on national political institutions. Second, I conceptualize participation as access to social institutions, not as conversation over issues of common concern. This approach deemphasizes the idea that all conversations of public concern must be mutually intelligible to all people at all times, recognizing instead that any given public debate will occur through simultaneous, overlapping conversations by multiple communities. This framework ultimately contemplates that particular languages may differ in their social status and may not be used to the same degree at all levels of civic society.

* * *

Peter Brimelow, Alien Nation—Common Sense About America’s Immigration Disaster

Pages 116–19, 123–26, 202–03, 206–09, 216–17, 264–65 (1995).

Race! RACE!! As an immigrant, I was fascinated, once again, to watch the mere threat of an accusation of racism send the native born Americans scattering for cover like hightailing rabbits. * * *

Similarly, * * * an implicit accusation of racism is the common reaction of a vocal minority of Americans to news of their country’s shifting ethnic balance: “So what?” And, given prevailing sensitivities, it is the most dangerous response to answer.

I say a vocal minority because I think the vast majority of Americans regard as just a matter of common sense that the composition of a country’s population cannot, in fact, be changed without risking dramatic consequences. You can tell from the momentary perplexity that comes into their eyes when confronted with the “So What?” reflex.

But they lack the language to express their concerns. So they hesitate and fall silent. Time and again, the “So What?” reflex succeeds in effectively crippling all discussion of America’s impeding ethnic revolution in particular—and, indeed, of immigration in general.

This happens although there are some extraordinary aspects of the impeding ethnic revolution that, by any standard, deserve discussion in a democracy:

- It is unprecedented in history. No sovereign state has ever undergone such a radical and rapid transformation.
- It is wholly and entirely the result of government policy. Immigration is causing both the shifting American ethnic balance and also the projected massive increase of overall population. Left to themselves, pre-1965 Americans would be stabilizing both their ethnic proportions and their overall numbers.

* * *

The entire question needs to be refocused as follows:

- The onus should not be on critics of current immigration policy to explain their motives. Instead, supporters of current policy must explain why they wish to transform the American nation as it had evolved by 1965.

In other words, the answer to the “So What?” reflex is “So why?” Why does America have to be transformed? What have you got against it?

There is a class of people in America who absolutely, positively (as it says in the Federal Express TV ads) do want to transform America. And they look to immigration to help them achieve this object. Their alienation from America as it currently exists is so powerful as to justify calling them "alienists"—the opposite of the much-denounced "nativists" whose attachment to America is so intense that they distrust anyone who might conceivably change it.

Alienists, therefore, do have answers to the question "So why?" One common alienist answer: because American whites must be swamped by immigration to make it impossible for them to act on their racist impulses.

* * *

Over three years after I first met Julian Simon [an advocate of increased immigration—Eds.], I was having dinner with him to debate our differences. We got on the question of whether multiethnic and multiracial societies can work.

"Yugoslavia . . .," I began, thinking of the Serb-Croatian-Bosnian war that had exploded into the headlines.

"Yes! Yugoslavia!" he interrupted gleefully. "That supports my case, doesn't it?"

I was so surprised that I felt my jaw drop—something that really happens, I find, and not just in cartoons. It took me several seconds to realize what he meant:

- The former Yugoslavs are fighting despite the fact that they are all the same race (white). Indeed, they are all members of the same general ethnic group (South Slav). Even the language spoken by the two major contestants (Serbs and Croats) is basically the same (although written, respectively, in Cyrillic and Roman script).

So—Simon is saying—you can't blame all civil conflict or the divisive results on nontraditional immigration. Homogeneity is no guarantee against strife.

All right, all right! For the record, let me admit (in fact, assert): you can't blame everything on immigration or on racial differences.

But who said you could? The fact remains that the Yugoslav spectacle can only be seen as chilling—and as a Horrid Warning about current U.S. immigration policy. The differences between the Yugoslavs are indeed relatively minor—certainly compared to the differences between the American nation of 1965 and the immigrants who are now arriving. And that's the point. Those minor differences were still enough to tear the country apart.

* * *

Of course, our follow-up question, about whether multiracial societies work, is a fairly shocking one.

It's actually much more shocking than the original question—why do the immigration enthusiasts want to transform America? No one ever thinks to ask that. But asking about whether multiracial societies work is quite obviously a direct challenge to America's recently established religion. And, since America has been biracial since Colonial times, it appears to imply a pessimistic view of the prospects for black-white harmony—the greatest problem of American life (until the post-1965 immigration).

But there's a plain fact to be considered: the evidence that multiracial societies work is—what shall we say?—not very encouraging.

There have, of course, been multiracial societies (strictly speaking, usually multiethnic) in the past. Famous examples are the Roman Empire, or the Arab Caliphate, which briefly ruled from Spain to Samarkand in the name of Muhammad. But these were old-fashioned despotisms, not modern democracies. And, even so, ethnic divisions still kept surfacing. * * *

Heterogeneous empires that lasted, such as the Eastern Roman Empire of Byzantium, which survived until 1453, were generally based on a core ethnic-group—distinctly like our old friend the “racial hegemony of white Americans.” In the case of Byzantium, for instance, this core group was Greek.

In modern times, there has been a lot of seductive murmuring about internationalism, united nations, new world orders, and so on. But, meanwhile, the role of ethnicity and race has proved to be elemental—absolute—fundamental. Look at the record, working back from the present:

[Here Brimelow cites examples of multi-ethnic countries that have eventually broken up. His list includes Czechoslovakia, the Soviet Union, Yugoslavia, Lebanon, Cyprus, Pakistan, and Malaysia.—Eds.]

And these are just the cases where ethnic and racial differences have actually succeeded in breaking a country up. Many other cases are not yet resolved, because of often-bloody repression.

* * *

It is commonly said that America is more than a nation; it is an idea. My thesis today is the precise opposite: America is more than an idea; it is a nation.

—John O'Sullivan,

Boston University, March 31, 1993

There is no room in this country for hyphenated Americanism. . . . The one absolutely certain way of bringing this nation to ruin, of preventing all possibility of its continuing to be a nation at all, would be to permit it to become a tangle of squabbling nationalities.

—Theodore Roosevelt,

* * *

speech before the Knights of Columbus, New York, October 12, 1915

* * *

* * *

Let's start with a definition. What is a "nation-state"? It is the political expression of a nation. And what is a "nation"? It is an ethnocultural community—an interlacing of ethnicity and culture. Invariably, it speaks one language.

In recent years in the United States, there has been a tendency to emphasize the cultural part of the equation. But this is to miss a critical point. The word "nation" is derived from the Latin nescare, to be born. It intrinsically implies a link by blood. A nation in a real sense is an extended family. The merging process by which all nations are created is not merely cultural, but to a considerable extent biological, through intermarriage.

* * *

Some American commentators, for various reasons, find the idea of a nation's common ethnicity deeply distressing. They regularly denounce references to the subject as "nativism" or "tribalism."

* * *

* * * Ben Wattenberg is able to get away with talking about the United States becoming a "Universal Nation."

On its face, this is a contradiction in terms. A nation cannot be universal because it is, of its essence, specific—ethnically and culturally.
* * *

It's possible, as Wattenberg variously implies, that he means the diverse immigrant groups will eventually intermarry, producing what he calls, quoting the English poet John Masefield, a "wondrous race." Or that they will at least be assimilated by American culture, which, while globally dominant, is hardly "universal." But meanwhile there are hard questions:

- What language is this "universal nation" going to speak? How is it going to avoid ethnic strife? dual loyalties? collapsing like the Tower of Babel?

Wattenberg is not asked to reconcile these contradictions, although he is aware of at least some of them, because the ideal of an American nation-state is in eclipse in the American political conversation.

Ironically, the same weaknesses were apparent in the rather similar concept of "cultural pluralism" which was invented by Horace M. Kallen at the height of the last great immigration debate, before the Quota Acts of the 1920s. * * *

* * *

And Kallenism underlies another helpful remark that someone always makes in any discussion of U.S. immigration policy: "America isn't a nation like the other nations—it's an idea."

Once more, this American exceptionalism is really more a matter of degree than kind. Many other nations have some sort of ideational reinforcement. Quite often it is religious, such as Poland's Roman Catholicism; sometimes cultural, such as France's ineffable Frenchness. And occasionally it is political.

* * *

What is unusual in the current American immigration debate, however, is that Americans are now being urged to abandon the bonds of a common ethnicity so completely and to trust instead entirely to ideology to hold together their state (. . . polity).

This is an extraordinary experiment, like suddenly replacing all the blood in a patient's body. History suggests little reason to suppose it will succeed. * * *

* * *

Let's be clear about this: the American experience with immigration has been a triumphant success. It has so far transcended anything seen in Europe as to make the application of European lessons an exercise to be performed with care.

But there are very clear reasons why the American nation has been able to absorb and assimilate immigrants. In considering further immigration, its enthusiasts must ask themselves honestly: do these reasons still apply?

One reason America could assimilate immigrants, as we have seen, is that there were regular pauses for digestion. Another reason is that the American political elite wanted the immigrants to assimilate. And it did not hesitate to ensure that they did.

Over two hundred years of U.S. history, a number of tried-and-true, but undeniably tough, assimilation techniques had been perfected. But today, they have been substantially abandoned.

The economic culture of the United States has changed significantly—from classical liberalism to government-regulated welfare statism. Earlier immigrants were basically free to succeed or fail. And many failed: as we have seen, as many as 40 percent of the 1880–1920 immigrants went back home. But now, public policy interposes itself, with the usual debatable results.

* * *

And it's not just the American economic culture that has changed. So has the political culture. Almost a century ago, the last Great Wave of immigrants were met with the unflinching demand that they "Americanize." Now they are told that they should retain and reinforce their diversity.

Ethnically fueled “multiculturalism” taught in the public schools * * * inevitably raises the question: Is there still an “American Idea”—and if so, what is it?

[Here, Brimelow criticizes affirmative action and, in particular, its applicability to “Hispanics”—a group he argues is not defined by a common race, culture, or even language.—Eds.]

* * *

[This is] The National Question:

- Is America still that interlacing of ethnicity and culture that we call a nation? Can the United States survive as a nation-state, the political expression of that nation?

To begin at the most sensitive point:

The American nation of 1965, nearly 90 percent white, was explicitly promised that the new immigration policy would not shift the country’s racial balance. But it did.

Race is destiny in American politics. Its importance has only been intensified by the supposedly color-blind civil rights legislation of the 1960s—which paradoxically has turned out to mean elaborate race-conscious affirmative action programs. Any change in the racial balance must obviously be fraught with consequences for the survival and success of the American nation.

It is simply common sense that Americans have a legitimate interest in their country’s racial balance. It is common sense that they have a right to insist that their government stop shifting it. Indeed, it seems to me that they have a right to insist that it be shifted back.

This does not necessarily mean an absolute ban on any group. “Numbers are of the essence,” in the words of Enoch Powell, the prophetic critic of Britain’s disastrous postimperial immigration policy. In small numbers, all kinds of immigrants can arrive in America and be assimilated. Culture is a substitute for ethnicity. But numbers so high that they shift the American demographic balance make this impossible.

One right that Americans certainly have is the right to insist that immigrants, whatever their race, become Americans. The full force of public policy should be placed behind another “Americanization” campaign, modeled on that during the last Great Wave of Immigration. All diversion of public funds to promote “diversity,” “multiculturalism” and foreign-language retention must be struck down as subversive of this American ideal. Hyphenated identities must remain a private matter, as throughout most of American history. An English-language requirement for potential immigrants would make Americanization easier. The English-language requirement for citizenship should be enforced and the various recent exceptions, such as for spouses and the elderly, abolished—they were symbolic gestures anyway, and now the symbols are needed elsewhere. There must be a concerted legislative attack on bilingual manifestations, beginning with the U.S. Department of Education’s promotion of “bilingual" education. (The Quebec government's defense of French through restrictions on English should be studied with care.) A Constitutional amendment making English the official language of the United States could be a decisive step.

* * *

Kevin R. Johnson, Fear of an "Alien Nation": Race, Immigration and Immigrants

7 Stanford Law & Policy Rev. 111, 111-17 (1996).

* * * Peter Brimelow's provocative book, Alien Nation: Common Sense About America's Immigration Disaster, has sparked considerable discussion and controversy. In synch with the move toward restrictionism, Brimelow attributes a wide array of political, economic, and social problems to immigration, immigrants, and "immigration enthusiasts." Proclaiming that his call for drastic overhaul of U.S. immigration laws is justified by the fact that "race and ethnicity are destiny in American politics," Brimelow strikingly illustrates recurrent political and racial features of the immigration debate in this country. In attacking affirmative action, multiculturalism, and bilingual education, he in effect blames immigrants for the dismal state of race-relations in the United States.

Reading between the lines of Alien Nation, one discerns Brimelow's special concern with "Hispanic" immigration. This is consistent with the observation that some anti-immigrant sentiment in the United States, though clearly not all, is animated by anti-Latino sentiment. Brimelow believes that all Latinos, born-and-bred citizens as well as immigrants from Latin America, damage the American fabric and threaten the nation. The anti-Latino tinge to Brimelow's restrictionist arguments reveals the underside of the immigration debate in the 1990s.

Besides exemplifying political and racial scapegoating, Alien Nation illustrates the deeply personal and volatile nature of the immigration debate in the United States, particularly during times of social crisis. Similar to other incendiary public policy issues, such as crime, affirmative action, and taxes, immigration impacts our communities in readily discernible ways. Despite attacking others for allowing personal concerns to color their views, Brimelow reveals how the threats he personally feels from immigration influence his restrictionist views. He pleads for the United States to admit more immigrants like him—white, English-speaking, educated, and from a Western culture—and repeatedly invokes fears about the future for his young son, whom he describes with pride as being white with blue eyes and blond hair.

* * *

To place the modern immigration debate in context, we must consider a few demographic trends over the last thirty years. In 1965, Congress repealed the national origin quota system, which favored immigration from nations in northwestern Europe. Since that change in the law, a much greater proportion of immigrants have been people of color from developing nations. For example, between 1955 and 1964, 7.7% of all immigrants to the United States came from Asia, compared to 39.6% in fiscal year 1993. The family reunification provisions of the immigration laws, which favor persons seeking to join family members in this country, have contributed to the demographic shift. More people of color have immigrated to this country since 1965 than in preceding years, and in a sort of chain migration they have been able to bring family members as well.

Immigration from Mexico has attracted particular public and academic attention. Mexico contributed more legal immigrants to the United States than any other country in fiscal year 1993. Mexican citizens constituted the vast majority of persons "legalized" under the Immigration Reform and Control Act of 1986. A significant portion of the undocumented persons in this country, though not as many as popularly believed, also come from Mexico. It is interesting that any increase in Mexican migration cannot be attributed to the 1965 law that eliminated the national origin quotas. Indeed, that law for the first time limited immigration from the Western Hemisphere; Congress sought to avoid increased immigration from Latin America. Consequently, the demise of the quota system can hardly be blamed, as Brimelow seems to do, for the increased levels of legal immigration from Mexico or from Latin America in general.

In a society in which race is a prominent dividing line, one would be surprised if the fact that many newcomers are people of color did not have a social impact. Nevertheless, in light of modern sensibilities, most in the mainstream do not state publicly that an excessive number of people of color immigrate to the United States. Although this indicates progress in our nation's racial sensitivities, it does not mean that race does not influence the immigration debate. Reliance upon facially neutral proxies for race and ethnicity may disguise invidious motivations. Objections to the language and culture of immigrants and their so-called refusal to assimilate, for example, may conceal more deeply-seated racial concerns. As Professor Bill Ong Hing has observed:

While this culture-based argument studiously avoids race and ethnicity, the implications of the argument are distinctly race-based. Given the huge numbers of immigrants who enter this country from Asian and Latin American countries whose citizens are not white and who in most cases do not speak English, criticism of the inability to speak English coincides neatly with race.

* * *

In analyzing the negative reaction to today's immigrants, it is important to distinguish between two distinct forces at work: nativism and racism. Nativism, defined by John Higham as the "intense opposition to an internal minority on the grounds of its foreign (i.e., 'un-American') connections," has been historically directed at most waves of immigrants—white and non-white alike. Although many large immigrant groups have provoked nativist reactions, immigrants of color have been singled out for special disfavor. In general, the presence of non-white immigrants at any moment in this nation's history has heightened the intensity of anti-immigrant sentiment. For example, although German and Irish immigrants in the nineteenth century faced hostility, the anti-immigrant sentiment directed at them unquestionably did not compare to the racially-driven animus directed at Chinese immigrants during the same century.

* * *

Peter Brimelow and many who share his views object to current immigration laws on several counts. Brimelow opposes the current level of immigration, which as previously mentioned increased substantially in the early 1990s. He also voices concern about the alleged adverse economic impact of immigration, although ultimately conceding that immigrants neither help nor hurt the economy to any significant degree. These, however, are not Brimelow's primary concerns, nor the ones that make Alien Nation notable. Unlike many restrictionists, Brimelow does not shy away from the volatile issue of race. Indeed, the central thesis of Alien Nation is that the race and culture of many of today's immigrants pose a serious threat to the nation as we know it. Brimelow specifically expresses serious concern with the impact that the race of today's immigrants will have on the political process.

A dialogue on the racial demographics of immigration is well worth having. However, the seamier side of Brimelow's views on the subject make Alien Nation an unlikely starting point for constructive discussion. For example, he repeatedly comments on the physical differences of people of color. Brimelow laments that since 1965, "immigrants are overwhelmingly visible minorities from the Third World." One may question the special concern with "visible minorities." Brimelow's comparison of an Immigration and Naturalization Service office to a New York City subway is similarly thought-provoking: "You find yourself in an underworld that is not just teeming but is also almost entirely colored." Combining the "underworld," often used synonymously with crime, with the antiquated term "colored" is typical of the negative racial imagery used in Alien Nation when discussing immigrants of color.

Notwithstanding these statements, Brimelow denies that his objections to immigration from developing nations are purely based on skin color. Instead, he contends that immigrants of color are culturally deficient, placing great emphasis on the need to speak English (apparently as a native language). As discussed previously, such concerns may mask racial concerns and, at a minimum, coincide with race. * * *

Brimelow proclaims that "by introducing diverse populations, [immigration] strikes at the nation-state's Achilles' heel: the need for homogeneity." Appealing to tradition, he declares that "the American nation has always had a specific ethnic core. And that core has been white." To avert the impending disaster attributable to increased diversity, Brimelow apparently endorses revival of the much-maligned national origin quotas of the pre-1965 immigration laws.

There is a critical piece missing from Brimelow's argument for cultural homogeneity. Except for a few references to this nation's unique diversity, and a suggestion or two that such diversity may ultimately produce a Bosnia or Lebanon in the United States, Brimelow fails to provide support for the need for homogeneity. Because the premise is so central to his conclusions, this missing element is a damning flaw. Even some conservatives strongly disagree with the prescription of national homogeneity. * * *

In contrast to those attempting to constructively analyze the issues posed by an increasingly heterogeneous society, Brimelow simplistically advocates a return to an idyllic past when homogeneity supposedly reigned. In so doing, he virtually ignores this nation's long history of diversity. African Americans and Latinos have lived in the United States for centuries, and a great variety of white ethnic immigrants have come to this nation.

Moreover, the practicality of a return to a homogeneous United States is far from clear. In light of the diversity of this nation's current population, it is highly doubtful that any colorable proposal—especially one that focuses exclusively on immigration—would result in the creation of a homogeneous Anglo Saxon nation. In Linda Chavez's words, the mere idea "seem[s] ridiculous today in a country in which 150 million persons are descended from people who did not come here from the British Isles."

Brimelow above all else faults excessive immigration from Latin America for many of society's problems, a recurring feature of the immigration debate in the twentieth century. He observes that the Hispanic population grew from 2.6% of the population in 1950 to 9% in 1990. He stretches the facts by suggesting that illegal immigration since 1986 has been "overwhelmingly Hispanic." The Immigration and Naturalization Service, however, estimates that the undocumented population in this country is diverse, including significant numbers of people from many different nations, including non-Hispanic nations such as Canada, Poland, and Italy, as well as from Latin American nations like Mexico, El Salvador, and Guatemala. Deeper political fears are reflected in the suggestion that Mexican immigrants are either co-conspirators with or simply unwitting dupes of Mexican-American radicals and the Mexican government. Offering little elaboration and no proof, Brimelow speculates that heavy Mexican immigration to the United States might result in a movement to reunite part of the Southwest with Mexico.

A careful study of Alien Nation reveals that Brimelow's concerns with Latinos are not limited to immigrants. The book singles out "Hispanics," an all-encompassing referent that includes citizens as well as immigrants, as a minority group that deserves particular criticism. Rejecting the term "Hispanic," as do many who fall within the category, Brimelow gratuitously argues that the Bureau of the Census should abolish the term. He further proclaims that “Hispanics” are being treated by U.S. government agencies as an homogenous “protected class” essentially as a result of ethnic lobbying in Washington. They have been supplied with “leaders” financed in large part by the Ford Foundation. They are now much less encouraged to “Americanize” than anything seen in the previous Great Wave. Instead, they are being issued with a new, artificial “Hispanic” identity.

How this relates to immigration reform, the ostensible topic of the book, is uncertain. However, it reveals the scapegoating phenomenon so prevalent in U.S. immigration history: Latin American immigrants are blamed for such perceived problems as affirmative action, which has much more to do with U.S. citizens than immigrants.

As this attack illustrates, Brimelow lumps all Latinos in the United States together with Latin-American immigrants. This is understandable because, in Brimelow’s view, all Latinos are foreign to this nation’s “white” core. But not all Latinos in the United States are immigrants. Mexicans, for example, lived in the Southwest long before the region became part of this country. Moreover, the Latino community is far from monolithic and is especially heterogeneous with respect to citizenship and immigration status. This community includes citizens and noncitizens, both lawful permanent residents and undocumented immigrants. Though acknowledging diversity in the Latino community, Brimelow fails to make a fundamental distinction between Latino immigrants and Latino citizens.

* * *

Brimelow also rails against “all forms of government-imposed ‘bilingualism,’” a movement often associated with the Latino community. Bilingual education, however, is neither supported exclusively, nor perhaps even primarily, by immigrants; U.S. citizens who fear a loss of cultural identity also support protection of their languages. Indeed, Latinos born and raised in this country initially pressed for bilingual education and have the political power—power denied to noncitizens—to succeed in securing the creation of such programs. The demand for bilingual education cannot simply be marginalized as an “immigrant movement.” Moreover, evidence shows that access to bilingual education does not prevent Latino immigrants and their children from learning English.

* * *

When confining his complaints to Latino immigrants, as opposed to all Latinos, Brimelow seems concerned with their alleged refusal to assimilate, a proposition with which some conservatives disagree. However, Alien Nation fails to advocate measures that would encourage assimilation, such as additional funding for English-as-a-Second-Language programs and streamlining the naturalization process to allow immigrants to become citizens more quickly. Brimelow instead offers a deceptively simple answer: bar the immigration of people of color so that we no longer have to worry about assimilation.

In stark contrast to Brimelow's approach, some commentators have tried to offer constructive proposals to foster immigrant assimilation. Though the concept of "assimilation" is open to many interpretations, it is difficult to argue that efforts should not be made to integrate immigrants into the political community. The same Latino activist groups that Brimelow derides, for example, have tried to integrate immigrants into the political community by encouraging naturalization.

* * *

Besides its anti-Latino tilt, Alien Nation implicitly suggests why the immigration debate is so volatile. Immigration raises deeply personal and often emotional questions. Who will be permitted to join the American community? How do "they" fit in with "us"? How will "they" affect "my" life? Consequently, the immigration debate brings to the fore public concern with self-preservation and fear of change.

Despite Brimelow's principal focus on the race and culture of today's immigrants, immigration represents for Brimelow nothing more than a convenient soapbox from which to voice many political, social, and personal frustrations. In addition to concerns about affirmative action and bilingualism, Brimelow expresses dissatisfaction with developments as far-ranging as multiculturalism and sensitivity training in the workplace. * * *

* * *

Brimelow's personal motivations are strikingly illustrated on a much smaller scale by the book's discussion of the relative benefits of British and Zulu immigration. During his 1992 run for the presidency, Patrick Buchanan provoked controversy by contending that British immigration would cause fewer problems for the people of Virginia than Zulu immigration. A Wall Street Journal editorial disagreed on the ground that Zulu immigrants probably would work harder than English ones. Lashing back with great ferocity, Brimelow asserts that such a view "reveals an utter innocence about the reality of ethnic and cultural differences, let alone about little things like tradition and history." He gratuitously mentions that the founder of the Zulu Empire "among other exploits killed all his concubines' children, sometimes with his own hands, massacred some seven thousand of his own subjects to mark his mother's death, sliced open a hundred pregnant women to satisfy a fleeting interest in embryology, and ordered executions at whim daily until his assassination in 1828. . . ." Although this inflammatory outburst allows Brimelow to vent steam about the apparent insult to his countrymen, it is woefully out of place in a serious discussion of modern immigration.

D. NATIVISM PURE AND SIMPLE

In the end, one would be hard-pressed not to classify Brimelow, who readily offers to defend nativists, as a nativist who relies on race and culture to define what is "un-American" and "foreign." Indeed, Brimelow's racially-tinged arguments and alarmist tone are disturbingly reminiscent of past nativist appeals. Consistent with the self-perception of previous nativist groups, most notably the Know Nothings of the nineteenth century, Brimelow describes critics of current U.S. immigration policies as "Patriots."

Juan F. Perea, "Am I an American or Not?" Reflections on Citizenship, Americanization, and Race, in Noah M.J. Pickus (Ed.), Immigration and Citizenship in the Twenty-First Century

Pages 49, 60, 62-66, 68 (1998).

* * * During the 1990s we are witnessing a resurgence of nativism, anti-immigrant sentiment in many respects like the nativism of the 1920s. Interestingly, far from celebrating the relative race neutrality in our laws after 1965, some current advocates of immigration restriction blame these same laws for what they perceive as a threatening and disunifying degree of racial and ethnic diversity in the country. Immigration restrictionists complain bitterly that the national origins quotas were abandoned in a deceptive way that deliberately understated the amount of immigrants from Latin America and Asia over the past thirty years. As Peter Brimelow has written in Alien Nation, "The current wave of immigration—and therefore America's shifting ethnic balance—is wholly and entirely the result of government policy. Specifically, it is the result of the Immigration Act of 1965, and the further legislation of 1986 and 1990." Brimelow laments the increasing number of people of color in the United States and argues for a return to its white racial roots: "The American nation has always had a specific ethnic core. And that core has been white." Brimelow's argument for a return to race-conscious immigration policies designed to restore white supremacy confirms the importance of race as a current variable in immigration debates and in the conception of American nationality. While there are many less objectionable, valid arguments for immigration restriction, and while Brimelow's may represent an extreme position, the popularity of his book suggests that he represents a significant current of thought among those opposed to immigration.

[Here, Perea criticizes a proposed constitutional amendment that would withhold United States citizenship from persons born in the United States to undocumented immigrant parents, and he marshals substantial evidence of a racial impetus for the proposal. He also argues that, at any rate, citizenship has often proven less valuable for citizens of color than for white citizens. He cites the treatment of Cherokee Indians, the abuse of Mexican-American citizens in the 1930s, and the internment of citizens of Japanese descent during World War II—Eds.]

If I am right that the value of citizenship varies by race, then I necessarily raise a question about the relation of race to Americanization, the process through which the country attempts to assimilate immigrants and make them citizens. I have argued earlier that assimilation, in the cases of the Cherokee and Japanese Americans, was of little avail when their civil rights interfered with the will of a majority of Americans. So I would argue that, like citizenship, Americanization has less value, in general, for people of color than for white immigrants. * * *

The Commission on Immigration Reform has reiterated "its call for the Americanization of new immigrants, that is, the cultivation of a shared commitment to the American values of liberty, democracy and equal opportunity." The commission envisions the core of American nationality as adherence to these principles: "Lawfully admitted newcomers of any ancestral nationality—without regard to race, ethnicity, or religion—truly become Americans when they give allegiance to these principles and values." The commission's 1997 report states several recommendations: for orienting and educating immigrants about our civic culture; for the acquisition of English; for testing the English-language competence of aspiring immigrants; and for federal and state support for these aspects of Americanization. The commission recognizes that immigration represents a mutual and reciprocal process and that "Americanization cannot be forced." The commission report states:

Immigration presents mutual obligations. Immigrants must accept the obligations we impose—to obey our laws, to pay taxes, to respect other cultures and ethnic groups. At the same time, citizens incur obligations to provide an environment in which newcomers can become fully participating members of our society.

The commission also recommends education in our history and civic culture for all students, "immigrants and natives alike." The commission advocates a strong role for federal, state, and local governments and private institutions in the education of immigrants and aspiring citizens, regarding our civic culture, our democratic institutions, and English-language instruction.

The commission has altered its view of Americanization from the traditional view of one-way adaptation by immigrants to majoritarian norms to a reciprocal and more mutually respectful process. I believe this change is crucial, for Americans must learn to appreciate their new citizens and aspiring citizens and to treat them with less resentment, racism, and distrust. A reconceived Americanization, based on widespread education in the content and ideals of our civic culture, begins to counteract the massive anti-immigrant rhetoric that has swept the country in recent years, fomenting distrust and animosity towards legal and illegal immigrants alike.

The commission has written that Americanization involves "a shared commitment to the American values of liberty, democracy, and equal opportunity." These are core American values, and I believe this is the most important meaning of Americanization and U.S. nationality: Joining the nation must mean agreeing to abide by its enduring values and constitutional, democratic structures for political expression. In my view, the phrase "commitment to the American values of liberty, democracy, and equal opportunity” expresses well the essence of the civic culture that we ask aspiring immigrants to join.

* * *

* * * [T]he commission’s current sense of equality as an essential component of our civic culture and ideology seems more well founded than ascribing that principle to the nation’s Founders. Prior to the Fourteenth Amendment, “equality” was tautological and race-based: Only propertied white men considered themselves and each other equal. There was no notion of equality in the Constitution until 1868, with the adoption of the Equal Protection Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. Even that equality-granting language was understood by its drafters to apply only to a formal legal equality—that is, equality in access to civil rights—and not to “social equality”—that is, full equality of stature and respect and full access to our public and private institutions. It was this very limited understanding of equality that made the separate-but-equal doctrine consistent with the equal protection clause.

It is not until much later, the period between the 1940s and the 1960s, that a commitment to equality in its present-day sense of full equal treatment can be considered part of American ideology and constitutive of American nationality. As a result of antidiscrimination efforts during and after World War II and the civil rights movement of the 1950s and 1960s, some national commitment to equality in all the spheres of life seems unquestionably to be part of our civic culture. However much we may debate the proper means of accomplishing equality, and the degree of its present accomplishment, equality as a constitutional and social goal seems firmly established today.

I think Americanization must be reframed, as the commission has, as a reciprocal and mutual process of accommodation, rather than a one-way process of assimilation by immigrants. Immigrants, aspiring Americans, have a relationship with current American citizens and with the country they wish to join. This relationship implies a mutuality of responsibility and obligation. As long as existing Americans do not fulfill the obligations of their civic culture, as long as we fail to honor the principles of liberty, democracy, and perhaps most importantly, equality, then we make Americanization an impossible dream. I suggest that, historically, problems of failed Americanization or assimilation are problems caused by the fear and racism of American citizens who feel little if any duty or obligation to ensure the success of aspiring immigrants, especially if those immigrants look different from them.

Existing Americans, therefore, are truly in need of Americanization. Americans must be educated about their civic culture, which includes those crucial ideals of equality, liberty, and democracy. Americans must accept the responsibility of making full membership possible to people of all races. Americans must accept that the American identity of the future, as well as the American identity of our past, has been multiracial, not solely a white, identity. They must bury, not resurrect, the Framers' conception of America as an all-white nation.

* * *

* * * Immigrants should and will learn English. The economic and social incentives to do so are overwhelming. Indeed, recent evidence suggests that recent immigrants, especially Latinos, are acquiring English at least as fast, if not faster than past generations of immigrants. But Americans should learn to respect the languages of immigrants. Americans should recognize that the United States has been a multilingual country from its beginning, when German, Dutch, French, and Indian languages could be heard in addition to English, until the present. The Articles of Confederation were ordered published by the Continental Congress in French and German, in addition to English. Indeed, several states were officially bilingual in different languages during the nineteenth century and, in the case of New Mexico, until 1952.

Our history cautions against restriction of the use of other languages as a way of supporting the use of English. Nativism has often sought expression through the restriction of foreign languages. The nativism of the World War I-era led to numerous state laws prohibiting the teaching and use of German. Today the Official English movement seeks legislation that would prohibit the federal government from acting in any language other than English, except in exceptional circumstances. * * *

* * *

The commission's renewed emphasis on Americanization, its attempt to "take the word back" and reclaim it with a different meaning than it came to have in the 1920s, raises the crucial issue of whether Americanization can be divorced from its history such that the term can have a different meaning today than it had during the time of its greatest excesses. I do not believe it is possible to uncouple this term from the history of its implementation. So the risk posed by renewed Americanization is that there will be nothing new about it. Despite the commission's apparently more balanced approach, the risk is that "Americanization" will mean the same coerced, one-way Anglocentric assimilation that it meant in the past. For these reasons, I believe it is a mistake to resurrect "Americanization." There is much less harm in simply offering to immigrants, without fanfare or "Americanization," instruction in the English language and in American ways of government and then letting them contribute to America as they will.

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. The last paragraph of the excerpt from Peter Schuck's "Diversity in America" reflects a central theme of his book—that the U.S. has managed diversity through a combination of affirmative governmental intervention and unregulated private action. As discussed in chapter 3, section D below (on the "diversity immigrant" program), Schuck praises diversity and acknowledges the legitimacy of government programs to protect diversity. Ultimately, however, he opposes government efforts to “create or promote any particular kind of diversity” (emphasis in original). Schuck at 123–31, 324. Is it possible for the government, particularly in the formulation of immigration policy, to be agnostic as to the type of diversity that should be promoted?

2. Schuck also observes that diversity takes many forms. To what kinds of diversity do you think immigration contributes? What kinds of diversity are particularly valuable?

3. The U.S. Census Bureau reports that, as of March 2004, approximately 12% of the U.S. population was foreign-born. Of the foreign-born, 53% were born in Latin America (mainly Mexico and Central America), 25% in Asia, and 14% in Europe. U.S. Census Bureau, The Foreign-Born Population of the United States (Feb. 2005). One of the effects of this immigration has been the dramatic growth of the Latino population. A recent study by the Pew Hispanic Center reveals that Latinos account for 15.1% of the United States’s population today. Whereas the non-Latino population in the United States has grown by 4% in this decade, the Latino population has grown by 29%. If current immigration and birthrate trends continue, the study predicts that the United States population will be 30% Latino in 2050. See Jeffrey Passel & D’Vera Cohn, United States Population Projections 2005–2050, Pew Hispanic Center Paper (2008), available at <http://www.pewhispanic.org/files/reports/96.pdf>.

What sort of society has this combination of native-born Americans and immigrants actually built? Two competing metaphors are in common use. Under one vision, America is a melting pot; every ethnic group eventually “melts” into a unified community defined more by similarity than by difference. Under another vision, America is a patchwork quilt (or a mosaic); every piece maintains its own enclave and its distinctive culture, with the various communities coexisting side by side. One writing offers (as an ideal) an intermediate metaphor—a large bowl of granola. Under this vision, all the diverse ingredients retain their own distinctive flavors, no ingredient feels overwhelmed by the others, each ingredient brings out the best flavors of the others, the total useable protein is much greater than if all the ingredients were separated and eaten one at a time, and the resulting mix is zestier and more vibrant. See Stephen H. Legomsky, Immigrants, Minorities, and Pluralism: What Kind of Society Do We Really Want?, 6 Willamette J. Internat’l L. & Dispute Resolution 153, 160–61 (1998). Which of these visions do you think best describes present-day America?

4. What should the United States strive to be? Brimelow argues that, to succeed, the United States must be a “nation.” He then defines “nation” as requiring a common ethnic core. Others (whom he cites) disagree; they maintain that common ethnicity is unnecessary if there is a common “idea” to which the nation’s inhabitants subscribe. See Brimelow, above, at 203–11. Cf. David Abraham, Constitutional Patriotism, Citizenship and Belonging in America and Germany, 7 Temple Political & Civil Rights L.

Rev. 457 (2007) (analyzing analogous distinctions concerning the bases for citizenship and solidarity). Let us put aside the definitional question.

Whatever the word “nation” signifies to different people, do you agree with Brimelow that ultimately the success of a sovereign state requires a homogeneous ethnic core? What, exactly, is wrong with a sovereign state—in this case the United States—deriving its sense of national identity from a common ideology rather than from a common ethnicity? Do you agree with Brimelow that such a strategy is doomed to fail?¹⁴ In thinking through this question, consider the results of empirical research by Robert Putnam. He has found that increased ethnic diversity can diminish trust among members of a community. He observes that increased immigration and diversity, though inevitable and desirable in the long run, “challenge social solidarity and inhibit social capital” in the short term. Robert D. Putnam, E Pluribus Unum: Diversity and Community in the Twenty-first Century, 30 Scandinavian Political Studies 137, 138 (2007). What might be the reason for this phenomenon?

5. Even if a nation state is viable without such a strong ethnic core, is a common language required? How should that common language be forged—through what sorts of integration policies? Professor Rodríguez emphasizes that:

The fixation on language as the marker of assimilation and the source of unity is misplaced. The fact that immigrants speak their mother tongues does not mean that they are not integrating in profound ways—that immigrants aren’t contributing to the economy, investing in their neighborhoods, or becoming involved in politics. On the flip side, complete linguistic assimilation does not necessarily indicate that immigrants have become meaningfully integrated: Consider the linguistically assimilated but otherwise disaffected second generation of * * * immigrants in Europe.

Cristina M. Rodríguez, E Pluribus Unum: How Bilingualism Strengthens American Democracy, Democracy: A Journal of Ideas 34, 37 (March 2007). Assuming that a common language is necessary, is there participatory value to promoting bilingualism? Should the state participate in the promotion of bilingualism?

6. Also at the heart of the debate are the 1965 reforms, summarized at the beginning of this subsection. Brimelow urges their repeal; if there must be immigration at all, he contends, the national origins quotas should be restored. Johnson and Perea both disagree. What is your view?

7. Frequently, the way a question is framed predetermines the answer. Brimelow complains that supporters of current United States immi-

14. See generally Jennifer Gordon & R.A. Lenhardt, Citizenship Talk: Bridging the Gap Between Immigration and Race Perspectives, 75 Fordham L. Rev. 2493 (2007) (exploring the political, economic, and social relationships between immigrants and African Americans and the insights critical race theory and immigration-related scholarship might have for one another). For a comparative European–U.S. analysis, see Michele R. Pistone & John J. Hoeffner, The Acceptance of Immigrants: Lessons from the Past and Questions for the Future, 10 Mediterranean J. Human Rights 7 (2006).

gration policy often respond to his observations about the emerging ethnic trends by asking “So what?”. He objects to this response. He believes that critics of current policy should not be expected to “explain their motives.” Rather, he argues, “supporters of current immigration policy must explain why they wish to transform the American nation as it had evolved by 1965.” This is a crucial point for Brimelow. He argues that the case for the current policy hinges on an affirmative showing that the country would be better off with a higher nonwhite population percentage, and he challenges supporters of the current policy to make that showing. Has he framed the question properly?

8. Kevin Johnson responds to Brimelow at several levels. One recurring theme in Johnson’s work is the relation between nativism and racism. He argues that Americans who feel animosity toward people of color often transfer that animosity, consciously or unconsciously, to immigrants, a more socially acceptable target. See especially Kevin R. Johnson, Race, The Immigration Laws, and Domestic Race Relations: A “Magic Mirror” into the Heart of Darkness, 73 Indiana L.J. 1111, 1154–58 (1998). In the piece you just read, Johnson quotes Professor Bill Ong Hing, who makes an analogous point about the commentary and legislation on official English. In the present piece, Johnson also sees in the writings of Brimelow and in several recent political developments a systematic bias against immigrants of color, and especially against Latinos (whether native-born or immigrants). See also Guadalupe T. Luna, Immigrants, Cops and Slumlords in the Midwest, 29 Southern Illinois Univ. L.J. 61 (2004) (describing housing discrimination against Latino immigrants in the Midwest). Do you agree?

9. Perea’s essay expresses concerns about recent proposals for the “Americanization” of immigrants. First, be sure you can distinguish the Americanization proposal of the Commission on Immigration Reform from the version advocated by Brimelow. Second, do you agree with Perea that, for people of color, even the Commission’s brand of Americanization would bring only minor benefits and pose special risks?

10. Do you agree with both Perea and the Commission on Immigration Reform that Americanization should be a two-way street? Or is it appropriate to view immigration as a sovereign prerogative and to place the exclusive onus on immigrants to adapt to the language and culture of their new country? For additional discussion of integration as a two-way process through which immigrants and the receiving society adapt and change in response to one another, see Cristina M. Rodríguez, Guest Workers and Integration: Toward a Theory of What Immigrants and Americans Owe One Another, 2007 Univ. Chicago Legal Forum 219, 231–49 (“Immigration ensures that a society’s mainstream evolves, taking on characteristics that originally would have been ascribed to the immigrant. * * * In devising policies that promote assimilation, then, the real concern for policymakers should not be whether immigration policy is sustaining the status quo or producing a preferred cultural outcome. Instead, the focus should be on whether a given policy will help the bidirectional process of assimilation unfold successfully.”).

11. Do you see any ironies in Brimelow's belief that naturalization should be made harder to obtain?

12. The laws and policies a society adopts in relation to new immigrants are likely to influence how quickly and deeply immigrants integrate over the long term. Through a comparative empirical study of Portuguese and Vietnamese immigrants in Toronto and Boston, Professor Irene Bloemraad comes to the following conclusions regarding the political incorporation of immigrants:

The United States and Canada are both nations of civic citizenship: they allow foreigners membership. All civic nationalisms contain cultural elements of who can be civic and what counts as civic behavior, but citizenship status is predicated on political belonging rather than blood or background. There are, however, nuanced differences between immigrants' perceptions of American and Canadian citizenship, and these are consequential. In the United States, migrants understand citizenship as offering rights and legal protections, such as protection from deportation, as well as economic opportunity, notably the freedom to achieve economic success. Such rights and freedoms do not lead to a strong conception of political belonging but rather to legal or economic citizenship. In Canada, migrants link citizenship to economic opportunities and rights * * *. But immigrants in Canada also link citizenship to government protection and support. The result is a greater sense of political citizenship. In addition, the greater ethnic focus of Canadian multiculturalism generates a sense of recognition as an immigrant, with a unique cultural, linguistic, and historical background. American multiculturalism, couched largely in categories of race, requires immigrants to move away from specific cultural and identity backgrounds. In doing so, American citizenship appears to imply membership as part of a pan-racial group, creating ambiguities about one's place in the nation.

Irene Bloemraad, Becoming a Citizen: Incorporating Immigrants and Refugees in the United States and Canada 9–10 (2006). What do you make of these conclusions? What might explain what she describes as the American context of reception? See also Lauren Gilbert, National Identity and Immigration Policy in the U.S. and the European Union, 14 Columbia J. European L. 99 (2007) (contrasting the European integration strategy of emphasizing legal rights with the U.S. integration strategy of liberal naturalization rules).

13. There is some other fine commentary on the benefits and dangers of assimilation and on the relationship among assimilation, race, and identity.¹⁵

15. See, e.g., Anupam Chander, Flying the Mexican Flag in Los Angeles, 75 Fordham L. Rev. 2455 (2007); Kevin R. Johnson, "Melting Pot" or "Ring of Fire"? Assimilation and the Mexican-American Experience, 85 California L. Rev. 1259 (1997); George A.

14. The Brimelow book quickly generated strong responses.¹⁶

15. The treatment of immigrants in times of disaster, and the lessons from that treatment, are expertly analyzed in a recent symposium published by the Houston Law Review.¹⁷

16. As you will see in some detail in Chapter 12, the challenge of educating immigrant children, or “English language learners,” has prompted considerable debate on the subject of bilingual education. The term “bilingual education” encompasses many different types of programs. Voters in Arizona, California, and Massachusetts have all passed referenda rejecting most, if not all, of those programs, by prohibiting the use of native language in English-language instruction. The primary rationale for these measures is the belief that immigrant children must be taught English as quickly as possible, because mastering English is the key to success in American society. For a discussion of this debate, see Cristina M. Rodríguez, Language and Participation, 94 California L. Rev. 687, 758–66 (2006).

Few, if any, commentators doubt that learning English is central to integration and prosperity for immigrant children, but does that basic premise demand repudiation of native language instruction? What might be the costs of rejecting bilingual education? What might be the risks of bilingual education programs? For leading research on the education of immigrant children that emphasizes the importance of well designed pro-

Martínez, Immigration: Deportation and the Pseudo-Science of Unassimilable Peoples, 61 SMU L. Rev. 7 (2008); George A. Martínez, Latinos, Assimilation and the Law: A Philosophical Perspective, 20 Chicano-Latin L. Rev. 1 (1999); Ediberto Román, The Alien Invasion?, 45 Houston L. Rev. 841 (2008) (arguing that the venom directed toward immigrants generally and Latinos in particular plays to racist fears and is at odds with the empirically demonstrated effects of immigration); Ediberto Roman, Who Exactly is Living La Vida Loca?: The Legal and Political Consequences of Latino-Latina Ethnic and Racial Stereotypes in Film and Other Media, 4 Iowa J. Race, Gender & Justice 37 (2000) (criticizing media portrayals of Latino community); Enid Trucios-Haynes, The Legacy of Racially Restrictive Immigration Laws and Policies and the Construction of the American National Identity, 76 Oregon L. Rev. 369 (1997). A useful demographic description of the new national diversity and of some positive initiatives to integrate immigrants appears in Bill Ong Hing, Answering Challenges of the New Immigrant-Driven Diversity: Considering Integration Strategies, 40 Univ. Louisville Brandeis L.J. 861 (2002).

16. For a sampling, see Daniel Kanstroom, Dangerous Undertones of the New Na- tivism: Peter Brimelow and the Decline of the West, in Juan F. Perea, Immigrants Out! The New Nativism and the Anti-Immigrant Impulse in the United States, at 300 et seq. (1997); Hiroshi Motomura, Book Review, Whose Alien Nation?: Two Models of Constitutional Immigration Law, 94 Michigan L. Rev. 1927 (1996); Peter H. Schuck, Alien Rumination, 105 Yale L.J. 1963 (1996); Aristide Zolberg, Book Review, 21 Population & Development Rev. 659 (1995).

17. See especially Kevin R. Johnson, Hurricane Katrina: Lessons About Immigrants in the Administrative State, 45 Houston L. Rev. 11 (2008) (urging a more aggressive judicial response); Raquel E. Aldana, Silent Victims No More?: Moral Indignation and the Potential for Latino Political Mobilization in Defense of Immigrants, 45 Houston L. Rev. 73 (2008) (analogizing Hurricane Katrina to the California fires and examining the electoral implications of the cruelties directed at Latino/a immigrants in particular); and Anna Williams Shavers, The Invisible Others and Immigrant Rights: A Commentary, 45 Houston L. Rev. 99 (2008) (comparing public attitudes toward African Americans and immigrants).

grams that use the native language but do not segregate immigrant children from the general student body, see Carola Suárez-Orozco, Marcelo Suárez-Orozco, & Irina Todorova, Learning a New Land: Immigrant Students in American Society 161 (2008) (“While high quality bilingual instruction yields excellent outcomes, low-quality, erratic instruction leads to far from optimal results.”). For an extensive study of the ways in which the public school system is failing Latino students, particularly those who are immigrants or have parents who speak minimal English, see Patricia Gandada & Frances Contreras, The Latino Educational Crisis: The Consequences of Failed Social Policies 13–14 (2009) (“Education is the single most effective way to integrate the burgeoning population of Latinos into the U.S. economy and society. Thus, if the high drop out rate and low educational achievement of Latino youth are not turned around, we will have created a permanent underclass without hope of integrating into the mainstream or realizing their potential to contribute to American society.”).

NOTE ON THE ENGLISH-ONLY MOVEMENT

Language, as the excerpts above underscore, is a touchy subject. Because it is a means of communication, language plays a vital functional role in the everyday life of every society. And because it is also a component of both personal and ethnic identity, language has emotional significance with both positive and negative overtones. Hence, the challenges presented by language diversity are relevant to the present discussion of immigration, race, and culture.

You already have considered the extent to which language represents a component of national identity, as well as its relationship to immigrant integration. But can a common language be imposed by force of law? If so, will such a law unify people or divide them?

The question of whether the United States ought to adopt English as the official language arises from time to time, typically during periods of large-scale immigration, ethnic strife, economic dislocation, or other transformative events. Many other pluralistic nations recognize one or several languages as official: in Canada, English and French have official co-equal status; South Africa has declared eleven official languages; the Spanish Constitution declares Castilian the official language but delegates responsibility to the country’s autonomous regions to protect minority languages such as Catalan and Basque. See Rodríguez, Language and Participation, item 16 above, at 697–705 (discussing different official language regimes).

While the English-Only debate is not formally a part of immigration law, it affects immigrants in special ways, largely because some official English laws would prohibit government officials from providing services in languages other than English. Many observers would argue, moreover, that the movement is both motivated and sustained by anti-immigrant (and anti-Latino) sentiment. For both reasons, it is worth pausing briefly to think about what this movement involves and about the direction in which it would take America.

The English-Only debate has taken on different forms throughout American history. Rooted in nineteenth century nativism and fortified by the anti-German hysteria that followed World War I, the ancestors of today's English-Only movements focused on the subject of foreign language instruction. See generally Leila Sadat, Official English, Nationalism and Linguistic Terror: A French Lesson, 71 Washington L.Rev. 285, 339-41 (1996). According to one study, shortly after World War I, some 23 states restricted foreign language instruction; some of them singled out German. Id. at 340-41. In Meyer v. Nebraska, 262 U.S. 390, 43 S.Ct. 625, 67 L.Ed. 1042 (1923), the Supreme Court struck down on substantive due process grounds a Nebraska statute that (a) banned the teaching of any subject in a language other than English, in either public or private schools; and (b) banned the teaching of foreign language itself before ninth grade. Whether the Court's decision reflected tolerance for foreign languages or merely a hostility to government interference with parental rights is not clear.¹⁸

In the 1980s, a robust "Official English" Movement, which sought the declaration of English as the "official" language of government, emerged in American public discourse, and forceful efforts to declare English official have been made at the national, state, and local levels in subsequent decades. Proponents of Official English seek to make English the sole language for conducting the business of government. At both the federal and the state levels, the main vehicles have been proposed legislation and proposed constitutional amendments. Some proposals are worded in general, symbolic terms, while others mandate the use of English in specific contexts. Those efforts have not (yet) prevailed at the federal level, but, as of 2005, at least twenty-two states and many municipalities have enacted official English laws. See Rodriguez, Language and Participation, item 16 above, at 751-52. In 2006 and 2007, during the debate over comprehensive immigration reform, the Senate extensively debated whether to declare English the "national" or "common" language.

In 1988 the voters of Arizona narrowly passed a referendum amending the state constitution to declare English the official language of the state and require the state and its political subdivisions to "act in English and no other language" (with a few narrow exceptions). In Yñiguez v. Arizonans for Official English, 69 F.3d 920 (9th Cir. en banc 1995), the court, by a vote of 6-5, struck down the Arizona provision on the ground that it violated the first amendment rights of both state employees and private individuals who sought information from state employees. The court rejected the state's arguments that the choice of language is conduct rather than speech and that employees' speech in the course of their employment is not

18. Barbara Bennett Woodhouse, "Who Owns the Child?": Meyer and Pierce and the Child as Property, 33 William & Mary L.Rev. 995, 1036-37 (1992). The contemporary debate over bilingual education raises some analogous issues, as illustrated in Irene Scharf, Tired of Your Masses: A History of and Judicial Responses to Early 20th Century Anti-Immigrant Legislation, 21 Univ. Hawaii L. Rev. 131 (1999).

entitled to first amendment protection. The United States Supreme Court vacated the decision on mootness grounds and thus did not reach the merits, sub nom., Arizonans for Official English v. Arizona, 520 U.S. 43, 117 S.Ct. 1055, 137 L.Ed.2d 170 (1997), but the Arizona Supreme Court ultimately invalidated the provision on both first amendment and equal protection grounds. Ruiz v. Hull, 191 Ariz. 441, 957 P.2d 984 (1998).

Consider Professor Rodríguez's perspective on Official English laws:

[English-only] laws have been assessed traditionally in anti-subordination or status-based terms. The scholarly concern has been that English-only laws push the limits of the Equal Protection Clause by establishing an ethnicity-based classification without a legitimate state purpose. But although such statutes have symbolically exclusionary implications, it is notoriously difficult to demonstrate that they reflect animus against minorities, rather than a more benign intent to affirm the obvious dominance of English. Indeed, whether such laws have subordinating effects is unclear.

* * * I would evaluate [an English-only law] based on how it affects the relationship between the people and the state. Under this framework, courts would scrutinize the limitations such laws place on the ability of the individual to both comprehend and structure her relationship with the state.

Rodríguez, Language and Participation, item 16 above, at 751–52.

Analogous issues have arisen with respect to drivers' license exams. In Alexander v. Sandoval, 532 U.S. 275, 121 S.Ct. 1511, 149 L.Ed.2d 517 (2001), private plaintiffs challenged an Alabama Department of Public Safety policy that required driver's license examinations to be administered entirely in English. The Court of Appeals for the 11th Circuit struck down the policy as violative of Title 6 of the federal Civil Rights Act of 1964. That title prohibits discrimination—both intentional and unintentional—based on national origin in programs that receive federal funds. In a 5–4 decision, the Supreme Court reversed. It held that Title 6 does not authorize private causes of action based solely on disparate impact.

In the private sphere, English-only policies have taken a variety of forms. Professor Rodríguez describes a few of them:

When speakers of different languages inhabit the same space, friction often results. In January 2005, for example, a child-court judge in Tennessee made headlines for ordering a number of non-English speaking women involved in custody or neglect disputes to take English language classes for “the good of their children.” In at least one case, the court apparently threatened that failure to comply within six months would result in the termination of parental rights. In July, upon hearing a coach instruct a fourteen-year-old pitcher, in Spanish, to pick off a runner at second base, a Little League umpire in Massachusetts ruled that only English could be spoken for the remainder of the game. Though Little League officials responded to the subsequent protest by suggesting that the umpire had no malicious intent, the League nonetheless suspended the official for the remainder of the tournament. In October, a co-op on the Lower East Side of Manhattan erupted in debate over the building's policy requiring all porters to speak only English while on the job. Upon learning of the policy, the tenants lit up the neighborhood's online message board with condemnations, but the management corporation defended its policy on the grounds that it furthered public safety and communication. [Professor Rodríguez adds one public sector example:] [T]he principal of a Kansas City public high school sent a sixteen year-old student home for asking a classmate, in Spanish, to borrow a dollar . . .

Rodríguez, Language and Participation, item 16 above, at 688–89. As discussed above, she goes on to argue that, contrary to conventional wisdom, conscious embrace of multilingualism would invigorate democratic participation.

In EEOC v. Premier Operator Services, Inc., 113 F. Supp.2d 1066 (N.D. Tex. 2000), an employer had hired thirteen Latino workers precisely for their abilities to speak Spanish with Spanish-speaking callers but then had prohibited them from speaking Spanish at any other time, even during lunch and breaks. The policy was held to violate Title 7.¹⁹

In 1999, the border town of El Cenizo, Texas, situated about ten miles from Laredo, struck back. It passed an ordinance requiring all city meetings and functions to be conducted in Spanish. English translations are available if requested 48 hours in advance. (Ordinances are still drafted in English.) An estimated 90% of the city's residents speak Spanish, though many of them speak English too. For an excellent essay on the legal, social, and cultural implications of the El Cenizo ordinance, see María Pabón López, The Phoenix Rises from El Cenizo: A Community Creates and Affirms Its Latino/a Border Cultural Citizenship through its Language and Safe Haven Ordinances, 78 Denver Univ. L. Rev. 1017 (2001).

A third area of controversy has concerned restrictions on commercial speech. The town of Norcross, Georgia initially prohibited the posting of any commercial sign on which more than 25% of the words are in a language other than English:

Consider Maria Cobarrubias, who has built her general store into a profitable fixture in the Atlanta suburb of Norcross by catering to

19. For criticisms of employers' English-only policies, see Christopher David Ruiz Cameron, How the Garcia Cousins Lost their Accents: Understanding the Language of Title 7 Decisions Approving English-Only Rules as the Product of Racial Dualism, Latino Invisibility, and Legal Indeterminacy, 85 California L. Rev. 261 (1997); Cristina M. Rodríguez, Language Diversity in the Work- place, 100 Northwestern Univ. L. Rev. 1689 (2006) (arguing that Title VII does not provide a good lens through which to understand or challenge English-only workplace policies, because their harmful consequences are more to disrupt social dynamics and long-term integration objectives than to impose dignitary harms on bilingual individuals).

a growing Hispanic community that is transforming many parts of the South.

Cobarrubias was stunned to receive a visit recently from the local marshal, who fined her for having a sign with the store's name—Supermercado Jalisco—in Spanish. Supermercado is the Spanish word for supermarket, and Jalisco is the Mexican state where Cobarrubias was born. * * *

She said she paid a $115 fine but is thinking about fighting back in court. Enforcement of the ordinance has outraged Mexican diplomats, and the American Civil Liberties Union said it may challenge the law as unconstitutional.

* * *

* * * Officially, the reason is to help police, fire and rescue personnel identify and locate businesses in emergencies. * * *

At a nearby competing grocery called La Mexicana, manager Jaime Elizondo, 42, said he also paid a fine and had to change several words on the store's sign before it opened last spring.

* * *

Sgt. H. Smith, the Norcross marshal, said he has also issued citations to several Korean churches and an "Oriental beauty shop." Some Spanish words are "acceptable," he said, while others, such as "supermercado," must be changed.

"The 'super' is English. But I don't know what 'mercado' means," he said. "If an American was out there driving by, he wouldn't know what that was."

* * *

Neighboring Doraville, also home to large numbers of Hispanic and Asian immigrants, has an ordinance like the one in Norcross but has chosen not to enforce it.

William Branigin, Spread of Spanish Greeted by Some Unwelcome Signs: Businesses Facing Language Restrictions, Washington Post, Feb. 6, 1999, at A4. See also Asian American Business Group v. City of Pomona, 716 F.Supp. 1328 (C.D. Cal. 1989) (holding similar Pomona, California ordinance violates free speech).

Query: In Norcross and Doraville, do you think a person would be criminally prosecuted for posting a restaurant sign with the name "Chez Louis"?

In response to a lawsuit brought by Cobarrubias, the city repealed its ordinance in May 1999. The next month, however, it substituted an ordinance that imposed other requirements on any on-premises commercial signs that display any non-English words. The business must file with the city a sworn affidavit that translates those words into English. The translation must be provided by a competent translator who is not the owner of the business.²⁰

As others have shown, the fear that English is losing its dominance seems misplaced. Linguistic assimilation among immigrants and their children is the norm, not the exception. One recent study, surveying 2843 children of immigrants in South Florida, found that “1) knowledge of English is near universal; 2) preference for English is almost as high, even among children educated in bilingual schools; 3) preservation of parental languages varies inversely with length of U.S. residence and residential locations away from areas of ethnic concentration.”²¹

The United States, of course, is not alone in having large segments of its population speak differing first languages. Some nations, such as Canada, Switzerland, and South Africa, officially recognize more than one language. At the other end of the spectrum, a Berlin public school at which 90% of the children were of non-German origin has prohibited students from speaking any language but German while on school grounds. Berlin School Bans Languages Other than German, Expatica News, Jan. 20, 2006. And in France, French is not only the official language of government, but also the only language permitted in certain private transactions. Leila Sadat, Official English, Nationalism and Linguistic Terror: A French Lesson, 71 Washington L.Rev. 285, 339–41 (1996).

Should English be made the official language of the United States? What would such a change accomplish? What would be the costs? Ultimately, would an English Language Amendment be a legitimate way to foster communication, express an “English” cultural heritage, and unify the American populace? Or would it be more likely to convey belligerence, rationalize intolerance, and reinforce ethnic division?²² Would an official English law actually promote the integration of immigrants?²³

20. See Eric Gold, Leyes del “Inglés Solamente” (“English-Only Laws”), at 3–9 (unpublished seminar paper, 2003); see also Editorial, Norcross, Businesses Can Show Signs of Cooperation, Atlanta Journal & Constitution, May 10, 1999, at 10A (applauding repeal but putting charitable and diplomatic spin on City Council’s motives); Editorial, A Farce in Any Language, Chicago Tribune, May 10, 1999, at 12 (adopting less charitable interpretation).

21. Alejandro Portes & Richard Schaufler, Language and the Second Generation: Bilingualism Yesterday and Today, 28 International Migration Rev. 640 (1994). For some useful statistics, see Peter H. Schuck, Diversity in America 106–23 (2003); T. Alexander Aleinikoff & Ruben Rumbaut, Terms of Belonging: Are Models of Membership Self-Ful- filling Prophecies?, 13 Georgetown Immigration L.J. 1 (1998).

22. In addition to the two pieces by Cristina Rodríguez cited above, see generally Bill Piatt, Only English? Law and Language Policy in the United States (1990); Juan F. Perea, Demography and Distrust: An Essay on American Languages, Cultural Pluralism, and Official English, 77 Minnesota L. Rev. 269 (1992); cf. Mari J. Matsuda, Voices of America: Accent, Antidiscrimination Law, and a Jurisprudence for the Last Reconstruction, 100 Yale L.J. 1329 (1991) (examining the legal treatment of accent discrimination and the role of accent in a plural society).

23. See Cristina M. Rodríguez, E Pluribus Unum: How Bilingualism Strengthens American Democracy, Democracy: A Journal of Ideas 34, 37 (March 2007).

D. THE ECONOMIC IMPACT OF IMMIGRATION

In the United States the economic consequences of immigration have been fiercely debated since the nineteenth century. See, e.g., Act of Feb. 26, 1885, ch. 164, 23 Stat. 332 (excluding certain contract laborers). Some of the debate has centered on fiscal questions, such as the amounts immigrants contribute in taxes and the amounts they receive in public welfare benefits. See chapter 12 below. But the most animated debate has concerned the impact of immigrants on the labor market. Do they siphon jobs from Americans? Do they, by consuming goods and services and by sustaining otherwise marginal companies or industries, create jobs for Americans? Do they provide a source of cheap labor that on the one hand adversely affects the wages or working conditions of American workers but on the other hand benefits employers and consumers?

In Section A of this chapter you saw an argument from Professor Stephen Macedo that the negative distributional consequences of immigration on the least-well-off Americans should occasion reform of our immigrant admissions policies. But do the empirical data support his premise that the distributional consequences are negative? Most economists today recognize all of the positive and negative effects to some extent but hold different views about the magnitudes of those effects. In addition, of course, different people assign different values to the importance of worker protection, consumer benefits, employers' economic strength, etc. The labels and political coalitions familiar in most other immigration debates break down here. It is not unusual for "liberal" Democrats with ties to organized labor to urge restrictions on the admission of foreign workers, or for politically "conservative" free-market Republicans to urge higher ceilings on employment-based immigration.

For all those reasons, there is no bottom-line consensus either on the economically optimum level of immigration or on precisely which classes of immigrants would bring the greatest economic benefits. This subsection highlights most of the major competing arguments. For those interested in more sophisticated analyses of the economics of immigration, endless sources—including the books and articles from which the excerpts below have been drawn—are available. A somewhat dated but still useful bibliography is Bill Ong Hing, The Economic Impact of Immigration: A Brief Survey of the Literature 2-42 (1989). Other important contributions to the economics literature are discussed in chapter 12.

George J. Borjas, Heaven's Door—Immigration Policy and the American Economy

Pages 62–67 (1999).

* * *

Do immigrants harm the employment opportunities of native workers? If so, how large is the loss in the economic well-being of natives? And are all native groups equally affected by immigration?

These questions have always been at the core of the immigration debate. In 1852, soon after the potato famine unleashed a new wave of Irish and British immigration, an observer described the connection between immigration and wages in a way that, with minor casting changes in the ethnic origin of the characters, could easily have been written a century and a half later:

Great Britain is now pouring upon us in a full tide the surplus . . . of her population. The ocean, which once separated us, steam has contracted to a span . . . we are now virtually two contiguous countries . . . To expect that, in two countries thus situated, without any special direction of public policy towards maintaining some barrier between them, the pressure of population, the profits of capital, and the wages of labor can long remain very unequal, would be as idle as to believe that, without the erection of a dam, water could be maintained at two different levels in the same pond. Throw down the little that remains of our protective system, and let the emigration from Great Britain and Ireland to our shores increase . . . and within the lifetime of the present generation, the laborer's hire in our Atlantic states will be as low as it is in England. Our manufactures would flourish then, as those of Great Britain flourish now; cheap labor is the only requisite for placing them upon the same level.

Throughout the history of the immigration debate, therefore, immigration restrictions have been justified, at least publicly, by arguing that those restrictions improve the economic well-being of native workers. In fact, public opinion polls indicate that native workers disapprove of immigration (typically by very large margins) mainly because they perceive or fear that immigrants reduce wages or take away jobs.

It turns out, however, that this is one of those contentious issues where there is a wide gulf—actually more of a deep chasm—dividing public opinion and the findings from academic studies. Although many researchers have tried, it has proved surprisingly difficult to document that immigration has a sizable adverse effect on native workers. In a 1990 review of these studies, I concluded that “the methodological arsenal of modern econometrics cannot find a single shred of evidence that immigrants have a sizable adverse impact on the earnings and employment opportunities of natives in the United States.” An academic survey published in 1995 states that “the effect of immigration on the labor market outcomes of natives is small.” And the 1997 National Academy of Sciences report argued that “the weight of the empirical evidence suggests that the impact of immigration on the wages of competing native workers is small.” This kind of consensus is rare indeed in social science, particularly when many workers keep insisting that immigrants harm their economic opportunities and when the commonsense intuition behind the economic laws of supply and demand suggests that an increase in the number of workers should reduce the wage.

This chapter presents a revisionist interpretation of the available evidence. I conclude that the native workers' apprehensions are not completely misguided, since many of them—particularly those at the bottom of the skill distribution—have much to fear from the entry of large numbers of less-skilled immigrants.

Put differently, I question the validity of much of the evidence that is typically marshaled by those who claim that immigrants do not affect native economic opportunities. Much of this evidence is based on comparisons of the labor market outcomes of native workers who reside in cities with large numbers of immigrants (such as Los Angeles and San Diego) with the outcomes of natives who reside in cities where few immigrants live (such as Atlanta and Pittsburgh). These “spatial correlations” often suggest that the average native wage is somewhat lower in labor markets where immigrants tend to cluster—but the wage differential between the markets may be so small that it is not worth worrying about.

But a weak spatial correlation does not necessarily prove that immigrants have a benign impact on the employment opportunities of native workers. Suppose, for example, that immigration into San Diego reduces the earnings of native workers there substantially. Native workers will probably react. Many will move out of the San Diego area to other cities, and workers who were considering moving to San Diego will move somewhere else instead. As natives respond to immigration by voting with their feet (creating what has been called “the new white flight”), the adverse impact of immigration on the San Diego labor market will be transmitted to the entire economy. In the end, all native workers will be worse off because of immigration, not just those who reside in the “immigrant cities.”

In this chapter, I argue that the economic impact of immigration at the national level may be quite important. The 1980s witnessed a substantial increase in the wage gap between high school dropouts and workers with more education. The decade also witnessed the entry of large numbers of less-skilled immigrants. It turns out that almost half of the decline in the relative wage of high school dropouts may be attributed to immigration.

The dramatic increase in wage inequality that occurred in the 1980s and 1990s raises serious social, economic, and political concerns for the United States. And the fact that part of this increase can be linked to immigration raises equally serious concerns about immigration policy.

In an important sense, the United States pursues social policies that have conflicting goals. Presumably, the objective of many of the redistribution policies enshrined in liberal political ideology and implemented through the welfare state—from public assistance programs to the earned income tax credit—is to redistribute income to less-skilled workers and to improve their economic status.

At the same time, immigration policy has tacitly encouraged the admission of very large numbers of less-skilled workers—either by insisting that only family connections matter when awarding entry visas, or by looking the other way as millions of “unscreened” illegal aliens cross the border. This type of immigration policy probably aggravates the social and economic problems faced by workers at the bottom of the income distribution, and helps undo—and perhaps even unravel—many of the benefits that would have accrued from the redistributive policies aimed at improving their economic status.

IMMIGRATION AND LOCAL LABOR MARKETS

Immigrants in the United States tend to settle in a limited number of states and cities. And this clustering seems to have increased over time. In 1960, 60 percent of the immigrants lived in one of the six main immigrant-receiving states: California, New York, Texas, Florida, New Jersey, and Illinois. By 1998, about 72 percent of immigrants lived in those states, with 32 percent living in California alone. This extreme geographic concentration reflects both the immigrants’ propensity to enter the United States through a limited number of gateway cities (such as Los Angeles and New York) and the fact that immigrants—unlike natives—do not seem to move much around the country. Once immigrants enter one of the gateway cities, they tend to stay there.

Much can be learned about the economic impact of immigration by paying particularly close attention to California, the state heaviest hit by the Second Great Migration. * * *

The geographic clustering of immigrants is even more remarkable when one looks at specific cities. In 1990, 42 percent of immigrants lived in just five metropolitan areas (Los Angeles, New York, Miami, Chicago, and Anaheim), but only 13 percent of natives lived in those localities. And, not surprisingly, California’s cities were hit particularly hard by the influx. Between 1980 and 1990, the foreign-born share rose from 25 to 40 percent in Los Angeles, 15 to 28 percent in Anaheim, and 14 to 22 percent in San Diego.

* * *

What happens when immigration increases the supply of workers in a particular labor market? The traditional approach to this question—the one that has greatly influenced the direction of the immigration debate—takes a myopic, short-run perspective. The entry of immigrants into the local labor market should lower the wage of competing workers (workers who have the same types of skills as immigrants) and perhaps increase the wage of complementary workers (workers whose skills become more valuable because of immigration). For example, an influx of foreign-born laborers reduces the economic opportunities for laborers who already live in the locality—all laborers now face stiffer competition in the labor market. At the same time, highly skilled natives may gain substantially. They pay less for the services that laborers provide, such as painting the house and mowing the lawn, and natives who hire these laborers can now specialize in producing the goods and services that better suit their skills.

This short-run perspective, however, can be very misleading. Over time, natives—both those who live in the city targeted by immigrants as well as those living in other cities—will likely respond to the entry of immigrants. It is not in the best interest of native-owned firms or native workers to sit still and watch immigrants change economic opportunities. All natives now have incentives to change their behavior in ways that take advantage of the altered economic landscape.

For example, native-owned firms see that cities flooded by less-skilled immigrants tend to pay lower wages to laborers. Employers who hire laborers will want to relocate to those cities, and entrepreneurs thinking about starting up new firms will find it more profitable to open them in immigrant areas. In other words, immigration increases the returns to capitalists in the affected cities, and capital will naturally flow to those areas where the returns are highest. The flow of jobs to the immigrant receiving hit areas helps cushion the adverse effect of immigration on the wage of competing workers in these localities.

* * *

The forces that tend to equalize employment opportunities across labor markets are reinforced by the fact that native workers will also respond. Laborers living in Michigan or Mississippi were perhaps thinking about moving to California before the immigrants entered that state. These laborers quickly learn that immigration has reduced their potential wages in California. As a result, many will decide to remain where they are or move elsewhere—and some Californians might actually find it worthwhile to incur the cost of leaving the state to search for better opportunities. The migration of native workers within the United States, in effect, accomplishes what the immigrant flow, with its tendency to cluster in a small number of gateway cities, could not—a “spreading out” of the additional workers over the entire nation, rather than in just a limited number of localities. * * *

Howard F. Chang, Migration as International Trade: The Economic Gains From the Liberalized Movement of Labor

3 UCLA Journal of Internat'l Law & Foreign Affairs 371, 371–73, 376–78 (1998).

Since multilateral trade negotiations produced the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade (GATT) in Geneva in 1947, the world has made dramatic progress toward free trade in goods. Several subsequent rounds of negotiations under the GATT have steadily liberalized international trade, and numerous regional initiatives seek to deepen economic integration among countries prepared to go further. Standard economic theory prescribes free trade as the regime that maximizes global economic welfare.

Economists also recommend trade liberalization as a policy that is likely to produce gains for each country.

The gains from trade arise from the fact that different countries will produce various goods at different costs. When countries restrict trade, the price of a good will be low in countries that can produce the good at low cost, but its price will be high in countries that can produce the good only at higher cost. Liberalized trade allows both countries to gain: the high-price country can import the good at a price less than what it would cost to produce the good at home; the low-price country can export the good and receive a higher price than it would otherwise fetch.

Precisely the same theory applied to trade in goods also applies to trade in services. The Uruguay Round of trade negotiations recognized this fact in 1994, extending the international regulation of trade to service markets through the General Agreement on Trade in Services (GATS). Free trade in all services, including labor services, would imply free movement of people across borders. To provide many services, workers must cross borders to where the work must be performed, either on a temporary basis or to accept permanent employment. Thus, the free movement of workers across borders promotes economic welfare by promoting free trade in the labor market. The European Union recognizes the importance of free mobility of labor as an element of a comprehensive free trade regime, enshrining this freedom in its constitution as one of the "four freedoms" that are the basic pillars of the European common market, "an area without internal frontiers in which the free movement of goods, persons, services, and capital is ensured." This "freedom of movement for workers" in turn entails "the abolition of any discrimination based on nationality between workers with respect to employment."

Immigration barriers interfere with the free flow of labor internationally and thereby cause wage rates for the same class of labor to diverge widely among different countries. For any given class of labor, residents of high-wage countries could gain by employing more immigrant labor, and residents of low-wage countries could gain by selling more of their labor to employers in high-wage countries. Economic efficiency in the global labor market would call for unrestricted migration, which would allow labor to move freely to the country where it earns the highest return. Market forces would thus direct labor to the market where its marginal product is highest. Given the large international differences in wages, it should be apparent that the potential gains from international trade in labor (and the costs we bear as a result of immigration barriers) are large.

Indeed, studies suggest that the gains to the world economy from removing immigration barriers could well be enormous and greatly exceed the gains from removing trade barriers. For example, Bob Hamilton and John Whalley provide estimates that suggest that the gains from free migration of labor would more than double worldwide real income, indicating that immigration controls "are one of the (and perhaps the) most important policy issues facing the global economy." Even their most conservative estimate suggests that the gains would be a significant fraction (over thirteen percent) of worldwide real income. Furthermore, their analysis indicates that the free migration of labor would also greatly improve the global distribution of income by raising real wages dramatically for the world's poorest workers.

* * *

* * * In evaluating the effects of immigration policies upon economic welfare, however, we must first address the question of whose welfare we are considering. Should we seek to maximize the welfare of natives (those born in the country of immigration) alone? Should we seek to maximize national economic welfare or global economic welfare? Once we decide whose welfare counts, we must also address whether our objective is merely to maximize their wealth (that is, to pursue economic efficiency with respect to their welfare) or our objectives also include an equitable distribution of wealth among them. If our objectives include distributive concerns, then our measure of social welfare must specify how much weight to give these concerns. Thus, the optimal policy will depend upon what measure of social welfare we choose to maximize.

I will not in this article set forth a philosophical defense of any particular welfare objective. Instead, my strategy will be to examine what policies the United States would pursue if its goal were simply to maximize the economic welfare of U.S. natives, not because I believe that immigration policy should be guided solely by considerations of economic self-interest, but because such concerns have in fact played a dominant role in the public debate over immigration policy. National governments, including the U.S. government, will probably continue to deem the promotion of the interests of natives as the paramount objective of immigration policies.

* * *

This thought experiment reveals, however, that even from this narrow perspective, which "stacks the deck" against the immigrant, optimal policies would probably allow higher levels of employment-based and family-based immigration than current U.S. immigration laws permit. Even if we give zero weight to the welfare of aliens in our measure of social welfare, the optimal immigration policy would be more liberal than our current laws in most important respects. In particular, although the economic welfare of natives and distributive justice among natives are often advanced as reasons to reduce immigration, I will demonstrate that neither objective provides a sound justification for more restrictive laws regarding employment-based and family-based immigration.

* * *

Optimal immigration policy would instead take the form of a "tariff," that is, a tax imposed on immigrants. This tariff could take the form of an income tax that discriminates between citizens and aliens. Although some economists have previously suggested a tax on foreign workers, my comprehensive analysis builds on that suggestion by exploring the features of the optimal immigration tariff in detail. I find that the optimal tariff is positive for immigrants with low incomes but is likely to be negative for immigrants with sufficiently high incomes. These results suggest that skilled immigration should be permitted (indeed encouraged) without quantitative or other protectionist restrictions and that unskilled immigration should be permitted without quantitative restrictions but subject to less generous fiscal policies than those applied to natives.

In Part III, I introduce distributive justice among natives as an objective. Concern for the distribution of income among natives, however, does not imply that more restrictive immigration laws are in order. Instead, the appropriate response to distributive concerns is redistribution through progressive reforms of tax and transfer policies, not immigration restrictions. * * *

James P. Smith & Barry Edmonston (Eds.), National Research Council of the National Academy of Sciences, The New Americans—Economic, Demographic, and Fiscal Effects of Immigration

Pages 4–8, 220 (1997).

* * * Economic theory points to possible effects [of immigration] on the employment and wages of domestic workers, U.S. trade with other countries, the growth rate of the economy, and the prices people pay for goods and services. To address these issues, the panel relied both on theoretical insights on what the likely effects would be, and on empirical estimates of the magnitude of the actual effects.

Using a basic economic model, with plausible assumptions, we show that immigration produces net economic gains for domestic residents, for several reasons. At the most basic level, immigrants increase the supply of labor and help produce new goods and services. But since they are paid less than the total value of these new goods and services, domestic workers as a group must gain.

The gains to the domestic economy come from a number of sources. On the production side, immigration allows domestic workers to be used more productively, specializing in producing goods at which they are relatively more efficient. Specialization in consumption also yields a gain.

* * *

In our baseline analysis, we assume that the U.S. economy is characterized by constant returns to scale—that is, growth in the size and scale of the economy neither reduces nor increases the productivity of labor and capital. Existing research has not convincingly demonstrated that, in the aggregate, either decreasing returns due to fixed factors or congestion effects, or increasing returns, are more compelling alternatives. We caution, however, that we would not extrapolate far beyond current levels and say that immigration flows much larger than those considered in our demographic projections would always produce economic gains. With far larger flows, and over long periods of time, the uncertainty about increasing or decreasing returns to scale would have to be resolved with sound empirical evidence.

Even when the economy as a whole gains, however, there may be losers as well as gainers among different groups of U.S. residents. Along with immigrants themselves, the gainers are the owners of productive factors that are complementary with the labor of immigrants—that is, domestic, higher-skilled workers, and perhaps owners of capital—whose incomes will rise. Those who buy goods and services produced by immigrant labor also benefit. The losers may be the less-skilled domestic workers who compete with immigrants and whose wages will fall. To the extent that immigrants specialize in activities that otherwise would not have existed domestically, immigration can be beneficial for all domestic residents. In this case, there is little substitution of new immigrant workers for domestic workers, and domestic consumers gain from the lower prices of these services.

In the long run, assuming constant returns to scale, immigrants can affect rates of economic growth only to the extent that they differ from the native-born—if, for example, they arrive with a different mix of skills from those of native-born workers. To have an effect on growth rates, this difference between immigrants and natives must persist over each new generation. If the children of immigrants—or, if not the children, the grandchildren and great-grandchildren—come to be just like the native-born, then all that immigration does is augment the population and the scale of the economy; it does not change the rate of growth of income per capita.

Overall, in the massive and complex U.S. economy, immigration is unlikely to have a very large effect on relative earnings or on gross domestic product per capita. Among the legions of factors that affect the economy, many are far more critical than immigration, including savings and investment and the human capital of U.S. workers. Immigration over the 1980s increased the labor supply of all workers by about 4 percent. On the basis of evidence from the literature on labor demand, this increase could have reduced the wages of all competing native-born workers by about 1 or 2 percent. Meanwhile, noncompeting native-born workers would have seen their wages increase, and both competing and noncompeting workers may have benefitted as consumers.

Overall, barring sizable immigration-induced economies or diseconomies of scale, the most plausible magnitudes of the impacts of immigration on the economy are modest for those who benefit from immigration, for those who lose from immigration, and for total gross domestic product. The domestic gain may run on the order of $1 billion to $10 billion a year. Although this gain may be modest relative to the size of the U.S. economy, it remains a significant positive gain in absolute terms.

Potentially, immigration may have much larger effects on certain parts of the labor market—workers in geographic areas that receive large numbers of immigrants or those with low levels of education. However, comparisons of geographic areas with different levels of immigration show only a weak relationship between native wages and the number of immigrants in a city or state. Furthermore, in these studies the numerically weak relationship between native wages and immigration is observed across all types of native workers, skilled and unskilled, male and female, minority and nonminority. The one group that appears to suffer substantially from new waves of immigrants are immigrants from earlier waves, for whom the recent immigrants are close substitutes in the labor market.

While some have suspected that blacks suffer disproportionately from the inflow of low-skilled immigrants, none of the available evidence suggests that they have been particularly hard-hit on a national level. Some have lost their jobs, especially in places where immigrants are concentrated. But the majority of blacks live elsewhere, and their economic fortunes are tied largely to other factors.

There are a number of problems with studies based on local labor market analyses. If native workers and firms adapt to the entry of immigrants by moving to areas offering them better opportunities, then there is no reason to expect local-level correlation between the wages of natives and the presence of immigrants. The wages of all competing native workers would fall, not just the wages of natives working in the cities where immigrants cluster.

* * *

The evidence points to the conclusion that immigration has had a relatively small adverse impact on the wage and employment opportunities of competing native groups. This effect does not appear to be concentrated in the local areas where immigrants live, but instead is dispersed across the United States. This dispersal comes about in part because competing native workers migrate out of the areas to which immigrants move. Over the last two decades, immigration thus played some role in explaining the declining wages of high school dropouts, but little part in the expanding wage inequality for any other group of native workers.

* * *

Once in the United States, the foreign-born on average earn less than native workers. This gap between foreign-born and native workers has widened recently. Among both men and women, those who have arrived most recently and those who come from Latin America earn the lowest wages. Even though recent new arrivals are better educated than their earlier counterparts, the education of the native-born has improved even more, so that the gap in skills, and thus in wages, has widened. This relative decline in immigrant skills and wages can be attributed essentially to a single factor—the fact that those who have come most recently have come from poorer countries, where the average education and wage and skill levels are far below those in the United States.

Part of this growing wage gap may stem from the influx of illegal immigrants, who are generally more poorly educated, but it is not due exclusively to them. There is also evidence of widening in the gap among legal immigrants, brought about not only through shifts in their countries of origin, but also through changes in the composition of refugees and more severe limits on the entry of certain highly skilled immigrants (specifically, physicians). Over time, the wage gap closes for some—significantly for immigrants from Europe and Asia, and at least modestly for some others—but not at all for those from Mexico.

Employment rates of recent immigrants have also fallen relative to those of natives. However, immigrants catch up to natives relatively quickly, so that after some years in the United States their employment rates are quite similar to those of natives.

What jobs do immigrants do? A higher proportion of immigrants than of the native-born work in many jobs that call for high levels of education: they are college teachers of foreign languages, medical scientists, economists. But they are even more disproportionately represented in many of the lowest-paying jobs: as waiters and waitresses, agricultural graders and sorters, private household workers. Immigrants also account for a disproportionate number of workers in many occupations that require little education but much skill, such as tailors, dressmakers, and jewelers.

* * *

The weight of the empirical evidence suggests that the impact of immigration on the wages of competing native-born workers is small—possibly reducing them by only 1 or 2 percent. Why does this effect seem so small? One reason is that it is easy to exaggerate the importance of immigration. Although immigration touches some hot button issues, the American economy is extremely large and complex, running at $7.6 trillion a year. This economy is the end result of tens of thousands of factors, many of which are far more critical than the country's immigration policy. Such factors include the rate at which the country saves and invests and the human capital of its own workers. It is simply not plausible that immigration, even across a decade, by increasing the supply of workers by 4 percent could seriously impact such an economy. However, although it is easy to exaggerate the aggregate effects of immigration, they should not be minimized. As measured by changes in wages, the economic benefits of immigration run as much as $10 billion a year. In addition, the economic benefits of immigration that operate only through lower prices, without displacing or disadvantaging competitive domestic labor, add to the positive effects of immigration.

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. It is often said that immigrants do not displace American workers because the jobs immigrants take tend to be those which native workers spurn. Borjas disagrees. He argues in effect that there is no such thing as a true labor shortage. In his view, when there is an apparent labor shortage, the true explanation is that the wages are simply too low to attract the necessary workers. Absent immigration, he contends, employers would be forced to bid up the prevailing wages to whatever levels would entice adequate numbers of native workers. Do you agree?

2. Among the economists who take a dim view of immigration, Borjas is probably the leading figure today. Notice his language: California is the state “heaviest hit” by recent immigration. California’s cities “were hit particularly hard by the influx.” Wages drop in cities that are “flooded” by less-skilled immigrants. These are not neutral, scholarly terms. Yet, elsewhere in the same book, Borjas acknowledges that “On net, therefore, the country benefits [and he means economically] from immigration.” George J. Borjas, Heaven’s Door 87 (1999). He goes on to articulate several reasons. Are the negative references quoted above consistent with that acknowledgment? Argue both ways.

3. While Borjas argues that immigration reduces the wages of native low-wage workers and thus increases the differential between high-wage and low-wage earners, Chang argues that immigration actually diminishes wage differentials. Can these seemingly opposite views be reconciled?

4. It is not yet clear whether Borjas is right when he says that immigration tends to hurt low-wage native workers, especially high school dropouts. But suppose he is. What policy should follow?

5. What do you think of Chang’s proposed tariff system?

6. Both Borjas and the National Academy of Sciences speak of the dispersal effect of immigration policy. They maintain that relatively unskilled workers migrate from high-immigration to low-immigration cities and regions to lessen the competition they face in applying for jobs. Conversely, they conclude, firms often relocate from low-immigration to high-immigration cities and regions to have access to a larger and cheaper labor supply. Suppose they are right. Are these conclusions a convincing argument for reducing immigration?

7. A subject of growing importance has been the impact of immigration on social security. The late Julian Simon, a pro-immigration economist, had this to say:

The ongoing debate over Social Security is agonizing. Every proposed policy inflicts pain because it boils down either to a decrease in benefits to the elderly or an increase in taxes upon working persons. And so it must be, as long as the numbers of elderly and of workers remain unchanged.

* * * There remains, then, only one condition that can lessen the tax burden upon working persons without reducing benefits—a larger number of young working persons. Having more children will help, but not until a couple of decades hence. Only immigration provides immediate help.

As soon as the average immigrant begins working—which generally is quite soon after arriving in this country—the immigrant begins to contribute to the Social Security coffers. The immigrant’s own eventual receipt of Social Security benefits, decades in the future, does not offset these immediate benefits to natives * * *.

The benefit to natives stems from the difference in age composition between the population of present residents of the US, and that of each cohort of immigrants. * * * Moreover, even that small fraction of the immigrants who are elderly are not eligible to receive Social Security. Therefore each cohort of new immigrants contributes substantially to reduce the Social Security burden of natives, in proportion to its numbers.

* * *

As to whether US natives must pay the piper for this benefit from immigrants when the young immigrants get older and themselves receive Social Security—the answer is “no” * * *. First, the impact of this year’s immigrants on Social Security say 30 years from now properly has little weight in the overall assessment, because a dollar to be received or paid out 30 years from now is worth much less now when discounted at even a modest rate. Second and more important * * * [b]y the time the immigrant workers retire and collect Social Security, they typically have raised children who are then contributing taxes to Social Security and thereby balancing out the parents’ receipts, just as is the case with native families. In this way there is a one-time benefit to natives because the immigrants arrive without a generation of elderly parents who might receive Social Security.

Julian L. Simon, The Economic Consequences of Immigration 132–34 (2d ed. 1999).

What is your reaction?

8. The same Professor Simon was also a proponent of the United States selling its immigrant visas at a worldwide auction. He wrote:

* * * Individuals with the most to gain economically would offer the highest prices. Inevitably, these people have the most to contribute economically to us all.

* * * How would an auction system work? It would begin with a worldwide quota for the number of people to be admitted in a given year. For political convenience, the total might at first be the same size as it is today. (The United States would benefit from admitting many more immigrants than it does now—and far more than are conceivable under existing political arrangements.) Here is the most straightforward method: First, ask for written bids from all comers, anywhere in the world, perhaps twice a year; second, rank the bids from high to low; third, accept enough high bidders to fill the quota, plus enough to make up any shortfall arising from some high bidders changing their minds. (Under one variant, each person would pay the amount he or she bid; under another, each would pay the amount bid by the lowest winning bidder.) The chief virtue of an auction is that it would identify people who have an especially large capacity to produce goods of high economic value in this country. Charging an admission fee would also accentuate the tendency of immigrants to move when they are young and strong, because admission has higher (discounted) future lifetime value for younger than for older people.

Would an auction mean only the wealthiest could get in? One way to prevent this is to allow "buyers" to enter now and pay later together with income tax. Failure to pay might result in deportation. There is little reason to believe the very wealthy would want to move here. Tax havens such as Caribbean countries and Monaco are financially more attractive. Besides, the wealthy can come as tourists if they like life here.

The ambitious, for whom America is a large, rich market in which to make a lot of money, would have a special desire to immigrate. An immigrant who makes a lot of money would benefit the United States by providing jobs and paying taxes.

* * *

Present policy is discriminatory: It does not offer all potential immigrants the same opportunity to be admitted. * * * What is unfairest of all is that relatives of people in this country have a better chance of immigration than people who have no such connections.

An auction discriminates according to the standard of a market-oriented society: ability and willingness to pay. An auction would be fair in that it would allow anybody in any part of the world the same opportunity to buy a visa.

Julian L. Simon, Auction the Right to Be an Immigrant, New York Times, January 28, 1986, at A25.

On what philosophical premises was Simon's proposal based? Do you agree with him either that those "with the most to gain economically would offer the highest prices" or that an auction "would allow anybody in any part of the world the same opportunity to buy a visa"?

University of Chicago economist Gary Becker has also advocated the sale of immigrant visas. Unlike Simon, Becker proposes retaining the present admission system and simply adding a separate new track for immigrants who are willing to pay the fee. Also unlike Simon, Becker favors a flat fee rather than an auction. He suggests, apparently only for illustrative purposes, an amount of $50,000. He explains that this system would not exclude poor people because they could save or borrow the necessary funds, perhaps from prospective U.S. employers or commercial lenders (evidently without collateral) or possibly from the federal government. Gary Becker, Why Not Let Immigrants Pay for Speedy Entry?, Business Week, March 2, 1987, at 20.

9. Do immigrants pay their way? How do the amounts they pay in taxes compare to what they receive in government services? Do the answers vary by category of immigrant (LPRs, undocumented), by level of government (federal, state, and local), and by geographic region? Views on these questions differ. A recent government study found that on balance immigrants “help fuel the nation’s economic growth” and increase—not lower—the income of native-born workers. See Council of Economic Advisers, Immigration’s Economic Impact (June 20, 2007); see also pages 1195–96 (undocumented migrants) and 1353–58 (LPRs) below.

10. One study of the children of immigrants reveals some striking patterns:

While the United States benefits from the entry of skilled foreign-born professionals and international students, research shows that the country gains even more from their children. An astounding 60 percent of the top science students in the United States and 65 percent of the top math students are the children of immigrants.

Stuart Anderson, The Multiplier Effect, Internat’l Educator 13, 15 (Summer 2004), citing findings of the National Foundation for American Policy, a nonpartisan research organization.

E. IMMIGRATION, POPULATION, AND THE ENVIRONMENT

United States environmentalists are deeply divided over immigration. Some fear that high levels of immigration, by increasing the population size and dispersal patterns, will exacerbate congestion, sprawl, pollution, and consumption of scarce resources. Other ecologists, for reasons discussed below, find the projections of environmental harm exaggerated, argue that any additional environmental negatives need to be weighed against both economic gains and social policies, and contend that at any rate the focus should be on the world environment rather than on the United States environment alone.

This subsection is a brief introduction to the environmental implications of United States immigration policy. It considers two subjects: (1) how immigration alters the size and characteristics of the United States population; and (2) in turn, how those population changes affect the environment.

James P. Smith & Barry Edmonston (Eds.), National Research Council of the National Academy of Sciences, The New Americans—Economic, Demographic, and Fiscal Effects of Immigration

Pages 1, 76–79, 94–96, 99 (1997).

* * * Congress in 1990 appointed a bipartisan Commission on Immigration Reform to review the nation’s policies and laws and to recommend changes. In turn, the Commission in 1995 asked the National Research Council [of the National Academy of Sciences—Eds.] to convene a panel of experts to assess the demographic, economic, and fiscal consequences of immigration.

* * *

How will the population of the United States change on the way to the middle of the 21st century? How will immigration—current and future—contribute to that change? This chapter seeks to answer the second question, which in turn will help answer the first. It focuses on the characteristics of immigrants and their descendants and explores how they will change the demography of the United States over the next six decades.

Immigration is not the only force at work shaping the size and the structure of the United States in the coming years. It will interact with other demographic forces, already in place, that also play a large role in what the country will look like by the middle of the next century.

First, in the two decades following World War II, the baby boom greatly increased the annual rate of U.S. population growth and provided birth cohorts from 1946 to about 1963 that were much larger than those of either the decade before or after. The baby boom and the subsequent baby bust will have major ramifications over the next half century: the population will age as the baby-boom generations become older; when they eventually retire, the number of retirees will be much larger than this country has ever seen.

Second, the future level of mortality among the elderly will have fundamental implications for their numbers. These changes, in turn, will affect their demand for private and public pensions and for health services. Because the small baby-bust generations will be the workers at that time, a relatively few income-producing residents will be providing for the older generations.

* * *

* * * [N]ot every group of immigrants into the United States bears children at the same rate. Immigrant groups with persistently high fertility rates will grow over time, absolutely and in relation to other immigrant groups. Second, not every group of immigrants has the same life span—that is, their mortality rates differ; these, too, may change over time and thus shift in their relation to one another.

If immigrants have a higher fertility rate than does the resident population, the nation will grow younger on average. And if immigrants have a higher mortality rate—that is, if they die at an earlier age—that trend will be reinforced. Again, the differences among groups of immigrants also matter, and so do the shifts within groups and between groups as the generations unfold.

Previewing the U.S. population in 2050, then, calls for making assumptions about the numbers of people entering and leaving the country, about the numbers from various racial and ethnic groups within the totals, and about the fertility and mortality rates of individual groups. Moreover, it calls for assumptions about exogamy and ethnic affiliation—the degree to which groups intermarry and the way the descendants of intergroup marriages identify themselves.

* * *

The number and age structure of the population are determined by fertility, mortality, and migration. The last factor has attracted considerably less attention in formal models than the first two, which have been extensively examined by means of stable population models and their various extensions.

At the simplest level, that of total population numbers, only net migration appears in the demographic balancing equation: population change = births - deaths + net migration. * * *

The world population has been growing at a historically unprecedented rate for the past century and numbered an estimated 5.8 billion in 1996. In 1990, the U.S. population accounted for 4 percent of the world's population. Since 1950, the U.S. population has been declining as a proportion of the world's population, decreasing from 6 percent in 1950. * * *

Because we project that the United States will experience moderate population growth for the next six decades, its proportion of the world's population will remain constant at 4 percent. Some other regions, such as Europe, will account for a diminishing proportion of the world's population over the next six decades, and regions such as Africa are likely to increase their relative proportion.

* * *

Immigration can play a critical role in determining the future size of the U.S. population. Within the population balancing equation, population growth could rise substantially if fertility or net immigration rises or if mortality declines. The rate of fertility, which has been below the replacement level for almost 20 years, shows little evidence of reviving sufficiently to alter the course of population growth. Our mortality assumptions incorporate mortality declines over the projection period, which will lead to higher levels of natural increase and population growth. Population growth will be even higher if there is an even greater improvement in life expectancy.

That leaves immigration as the most likely factor acting to spur population growth in the coming decades. Apart from the additions its net numbers make to the population, immigration, because it alters the age and racial/ethnic composition of the population, influences the rates of fertility and mortality that are the basic components of population change.

* * *

Table 3.3 [omitted here—Eds.] lists our projections of the future size of the American population under five alternative immigration assumptions. It is important to remember that this country's population will continue to grow well into the next century, even if net immigration was immediately eliminated forever. Under the assumption of zero immigration, the population of the United States will grow slowly, reaching a peak of 311 million in about 2035. Thereafter, it will very slowly decline [to 307 million in 2050—Eds.], because, as the baby-boom cohorts age, deaths will outweigh births.

[The table] also demonstrates that population growth will be significantly higher under any of our scenarios of positive levels of immigration. According to our medium immigration assumption (under which current levels persist indefinitely into the future), the size of the population will be [387 million] * * * by the year 2050. * * * Allowing immigration to continue at its current levels for the next 55 years will produce a population that is 80 million people larger than it would have been if all net immigration ceased instantly. These additional people are the direct effect of the 45 million more immigrants over this period. Then come the dual indirect effects of the descendants of these immigrants (compounded by higher fertility rates among immigrants) and of their lower overall mortality rate due to the relative youth of immigrants.

Immigration, then, will obviously play the dominant role in our future population growth. Of the 124 million additional people living in 2050 under the medium immigration assumption, 80 million will be the direct or indirect consequence of immigration.

[The table] also displays what population growth would be under realistic ranges of alterations in immigration policy. For example, if, on one hand, net immigration were halved, to 410,000 per year, growth would be slower, but the population would still rise to 349 million by the middle of the next century. If, on the other hand, net immigration were to increase by half, to 1,230,000 a year, the population would rise to 426 million by 2050. In either policy scenario, the population will be different from that under the medium immigration assumption—and by more than the simple addition or subtraction of immigrants, since the descendants of these immigrants will also be part of the future nation.

* * *

However, it should be noted that immigration involves primarily a redistribution of the world's population, not an absolute increase. Indeed, since the fertility of immigrants tends to decline after they come to the United States, total world population will be slightly lower. The potential for negative environmental effects (congestion and the like) must then be primarily local. From a world perspective, (negative) environmental effects in the United States may be counterbalanced by possible (positive) effects in the sending countries that are losing population. Total consumption by immigrants will typically be higher in the United States than in the places they left (which, after all, is one reason they immigrated). But efforts to abate environmental effects at any given level of consumption may also be higher in the United States. A weighting of the factors should enter into an evaluation of the environmental effects of immigration.

Ellen Percy Kraly, Research Paper for the U.S. Commission on Immigration Reform, U.S. Immigration and the Environment: Scientific Research and Analytic Issues

Pages i-iv (1995).

* * * [R]emarkably little hard evidence exists about the environmental effects of alien migration on the United States. A great deal of speculation exists about the nature of the relationship and there is increasing popular commentary about the degree to which immigration is associated with environmental problems in local areas as well as in the nation as a whole. The direct or causal effects of U.S. immigration on the environment have not been established, however, through scientific study. Moreover, there are significant limitations in U.S. statistics on immigration and population for the study of environmental impacts.

* * *

The general model of environmental impact identifies three broad sets of factors influencing environmental change: Environmental impact [I] is conceptualized as a function of population characteristics [P], patterns of consumption [A, for affluence] and technology [T], the use and manipulation of energy and other natural resources. While this model has provided an organizing framework for much of the debate concerning population and the environment, it has also been criticized for incomplete conceptualization of the components and lack of grounding in social scientific theory. The degree to which the population concept is well specified or connected to theory is also contested: uses of the model focus primarily on the increase in population size without specification of the different sources of population growth, for example natural increase (births minus deaths) relative to net migration.

Theories on population and environment vary in assumptions about the relative importance and direction of the effect of each of the factors (P, A, T) as well as the significance of interrelationships among the factors. Neo-Malthusian perspectives emphasize the significant influence of population growth for environmental impact and conceptualize a negative relationship between population growth and the availability and, increasingly, the quality of environmental resources. In contrast, more "optimistic" perspectives emphasize the enhanced potential inherent in positive population growth for social, economic, and technological progress, and hence, the means to solve environmental problems. Primary importance is given to changes in technology and social and economic organization in mitigating the effects of the other two factors. A third approach conceptualizes population pressure and short-run negative effects as a stimulus to technological innovation and more effective use of resources.

Perspectives thus vary in the degree to which population is proportional to environmental change. According to the demographer Keyfitz:

If all else is equal, action damaging the environment is directly proportional to the number of people. That at least seems the most appropriate initial hypothesis . . . The burden of proof is on anyone who argues against the proportionality hypothesis in either way.

In thinking about the impact of alien immigration on the U.S. environment, relevant questions center on the degree to which the impact of alien migration is proportionally less than, greater than, or equal to the number of immigrants.

* * *

In addition to the need to specify more clearly the role of migration in theories of population and environment, several additional issues emerge from the review of theory. Both geographic level and temporal frame of analysis must be specified in theoretical models and ultimately in empirical research. The effects of immigration on environmental processes may be expected to be significantly different for metropolitan areas, rural communities, states, and in the short-term versus the long-term. A third issue is the importance of understanding linkages or connections among geographic areas, economic sectors, and through time. For example, the concentration of immigration in certain metropolitan areas in the United States may have environmental consequences for areas and natural resources geographically removed from the cities.

The most fundamental recommendation for theory development is to revise models of population and environment to break population growth into its component parts in order to consider more clearly the effects of migration. Of particular relevance for the United States, moreover, is the specification of effects for different types of international population movements, including permanent resettlement, refugee migration, temporary labor migration, and tourism, within theories of environmental impact.

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. In recent years, the national membership of the Sierra Club has been deeply divided over the environmental impact of immigration (as well as over how to balance the environmental impact against other social policies). In this connection, read carefully the last paragraph of the excerpt from the National Academy of Sciences study. It highlights the extremely important point that "immigration involves primarily a redistribution of the world's population, not an absolute increase." What follows from this observation? At first glance, one might assume that any negative environmental impact on the receiving country (here, the United States) is exactly offset by a positive impact on the sending countries. For the reasons given in the same paragraph, however, that assumption is not necessarily true. The very act of migrating affects the migrating group's fertility rates and consumption habits. Migration might also affect the pace of environmental technology. See also Lee Hall, Aliens on Spaceship Earth: The Controversial

Sierra Club Elections, 10 BIB 1091 (July 1, 2005) (demonstrating the symbiotic relationship among immigration, the environment, and animal welfare).

Suppose, hypothetically, that the impact of migration on the United States environment is negative but that its net impact on the world environment is neutral or even positive. With which set of effects should a true environmentalist be more concerned?

2. Professor Kraly argues that we still lack adequate data to reach any meaningful conclusions about the impact of immigration on the United States environment. First, identify precisely what data Kraly believes are still missing. Second, which of those data do you think are realistically attainable? Would the combination of existing information and that which could readily be compiled permit a reasonably accurate picture of the impact of immigration on the environment of the United States?

3. The present subsection has considered the impact of immigration on the environment. The converse question is the impact of the environment on immigration. Increasingly, environmental catastrophe spurs flight from less developed countries to more developed ones. See Suzette Brooks Masters, Environmentally Induced Migration: Beyond a Culture of Reaction, 14 Georgetown Immigration L.J. 855 (2000).

F. THE POLITICS OF IMMIGRATION

As you have seen, immigration policy is truly a constellation of sub-policies. The subjects include the ones featured in these readings—family, jobs, race, culture, language, security, economics, population, and the environment. They also include policy questions on refugee protection, a subject you will explore in chapter 11.

Like any other volatile public issue, immigration policy additionally reflects partisan and interest group politics. This short section attempts only to summarize some of the more salient forces.

Race, of course, has figured prominently in discussions of immigration history.²⁴ The anti-Asian sentiments of the late 19th and early 20th centuries, as well as later laws targeted at Japanese immigrants, were among the earlier and most fully explicated American examples of the direct impact of race on immigration policy. See chapter 2, section 1 below. Professor Gilbert Carrasco, in examining the connection between immigration history and race, cites several episodes of abusive treatment of Mexican workers—ranging from the Bracero guestworker program initiated in World War II to “Operation Wetback” and other programs designed to

24. See, e.g., Richard A. Boswell, Racism and U.S. Immigration Law: Prospects for Reform after “9/11”?, 7 J. Gender, Race & Justice 315 (2003); Charles J. Ogletree, Jr., America’s Schizophrenic Immigration Policy: Race, Class, and Reason, 41 Boston College

L. Rev. 755 (2000) (both arguing that racial animus has historically driven immigration politics); Patrick Weil, Races at the Gate: A Century of Racial Distinctions in American Immigration Policy, 15 Georgetown Immigration L.J. 625 (2001).

repatriate Mexicans when their labor was no longer needed.²⁵ Many believe that a combination of racial attitudes and anti-immigrant feelings have historically influenced not only Congress and the executive, but also the courts.²⁶

Is this just history, or does race continue to influence the making of immigration policy? Certainly animus toward immigrants generally, and toward immigrants of color in particular, remains a serious problem in 21st-century America. See section H below. Many writers contend that race remains a major driving force behind a number of recent anti-immigration policy decisions. Some examples appear elsewhere in this book.²⁷

Sometimes these forces are generic reactions to immigrants; at other times, they are reactions to ethnic subgroups. You have seen examples of specifically anti-Asian movements. Several writers have also commented on the particular political obstacles faced by Latino immigrants. See the literature cited in sections C above and H below.

Other scholars argue that recent immigration policy has reflected bias toward Arabs and Arab-Americans. Professor Susan Akram, for example, suggests that western stereotyping of Arabs and Muslims has driven both asylum policy and procedures for secret evidence hearings in cases of alleged terrorism.²⁸ Other writers find analogous anti-Arab stereotyping in a leading Supreme Court decision, Reno v. American-Arab Anti-Discrimination Committee, 525 U.S. 471, 119 S.Ct. 936, 142 L.Ed.2d 940 (1999).²⁹

25. Gilbert Paul Carrasco, Latinos in the United States—Invitation and Exile, in Juan F. Perea (ed.), Immigrants Out! The New Nativism and the Anti-Immigrant Impulse in the United States, at 190 et seq. (1997); see also Gerald P. Lopez, Undocumented Mexican Migration: In Search of a Just Immigration Law and Policy, 28 UCLA L.Rev. 615 (1981); Andrew Silverman, An Historical and Legal Perspective of Mexican Migration, 1988 Arizona J. Internat'l & Comp. L. 138.

26. See generally Stephen H. Legomsky, Immigration Law and the Principle of Plenary Congressional Power, 1984 Supreme Ct. Rev. 255, 286-95; Irene Scharf, Tired of Your Masses: A History of and Judicial Responses to Early Twentieth Century Anti-Immigrant Legislation, 21 Univ. of Hawaii L. Rev. 131 (1999) (speaking specifically to court decisions that upheld various anti-Asian or anti-immigrant land laws, English language laws, and other laws with disproportionate adverse effects on immigrants or on particular ethnic groups).

27. See especially the discussions of the "diversity immigrant" program, in chapter 3, section D below; the Haitian interdiction program, in chapter 11; and California Proposition 187, in chapter 12. For some thoughtful explorations, see, e.g., Howard F. Chang, Immigration Policy, Liberal Principles, and the Republican Tradition, 85 Georgetown L. Rev. 2101, 2115-19 (1997); Bill Ong Hing, No Place for Angels: In Reaction to Kevin Johnson, 2000 Univ. Illinois L. Rev. 559, 583-601; John Scanlan, Book Review, Something Happened: Descent into the Immigration Maelstrom, 4 Indiana J. Global Legal Studies 239 (1996). The initiative process poses special concerns. See Kevin R. Johnson, A Handicapped, Not "Sleeping," Giant: The Devastating Impact of the Initiative Process on Latino and Immigrant Communities, 96 California L. Rev. 1259 (2008).

28. See, respectively, Susan Musarrat Akram, Orientalism Revisited in Asylum and Refugee Claims, 12 Internat'l J. of Refugee L. 7 (2000); Susan M. Akram, Scheherezade Meets Kafka: Two Dozen Sordid Tales of Ideological Exclusion, 14 Georgetown Immigration L.J. 51 (1999).

29. See Berta Esperanza Hernández-Truyol, Nativism, Terrorism, and Human Rights: The Global Wrongs of Reno v. American-Arab Anti-Discrimination Committee, 31

As the introduction to this section signaled, however, race is hardly the only factor that shapes United States immigration policy. Perhaps as a result, today's immigration debates defy traditional liberal/conservative lines.³⁰

Professor Kevin Johnson, while acknowledging many proud moments in U.S. immigration history, Kevin R. Johnson, The "Huddled Masses" Myth—Immigration and Civil Rights at 1–2 (2004), sees a common and disturbing thread in the overall civil rights record of U.S. immigration policy. Citing the treatment of racial minorities, political pariahs, the poor, criminals, women, and gays and lesbians, he paints a picture of pervasive (and recurrent) civil rights abuses.

Yet, one of the more striking features of immigration politics is their volatility. This is not merely a modern trend. Public sentiments toward immigrants have always fluctuated. In recent years, the fluctuations have been especially rapid.

In the mid-1990s, anti-immigrant sentiment peaked. While some of the feeling bubbled below the surface, other signs were quite visible—the recommendations of Congress's Commission on Immigration Reform for radically lowering the ceilings on family-sponsored immigration; (unsuccessful) bills in Congress to implement those recommendations; the overwhelming passage in 1994 of California Proposition 187, which would have prohibited local school districts from enrolling undocumented noncitizen children (but which was permanently enjoined by a court order); the massive changes introduced by IIRIRA; a 1996 anti-terrorism law that contains numerous anti-immigrant provisions unrelated to terrorism; a 1996 welfare reform law that bars even legal immigrants from the main safety net programs; a serious movement to amend the Constitution to deny citizenship to children born in the United States to undocumented parents; a fast-moving official English movement; and strident 1996 presidential election-year rhetoric, particularly in California. These and other recent events are taken up in various chapters of this book. One might hold favorable or unfavorable views of any of these events, but together they paint an unmistakable picture of a political climate that did not bode well for immigrants.

Columbia Human Rights L. Rev. 521 (2000); Adrien Katherine Wing, Reno v. American-Arab Anti-Discrimination Committee: A Critical Race Perspective, 31 Columbia Human Rights L. Rev. 561, especially at 571–87 (2000).

30. See generally Gary P. Freeman & Bob Birrell, Divergent Paths of Immigration Politics in the United States and Australia, 27 Population & Development Rev. 525 (2001) (arguing that restrictionist immigration policies have taken hold more easily in U.S. than in Australia and considering why); Kevin R. Johnson, Los Olvidados: Images of the Immigrant, Political Power of Nonciti- zens, and Immigration Law and Enforcement, 1993 Brigham Young Univ. L. Rev. 1139; Peter H. Schuck, The Politics of Rapid Legal Change: Immigration Policy in the 1980's, 6 Studies in Amer. Political Development 37 (1992); Peter H. Schuck, The Emerging Political Consensus on Immigration Law, 5 Georgetown Immigration L.J. 1 (1991); see also Jeanette Money, Fences and Neighbors: The Political Geography of Immigration Control (1999) (demonstrating that sometimes the geographic distribution of immigrants within a destination country can affect political calculations).

Why did this happen? Almost certainly there were multiple causes, and consensus is lacking as to which factors were the most influential. With the caveat that different concerns drive different people, one might suggest that major contributing forces probably included pessimism and insecurity about America's economic future, perceptions that immigration causes unemployment or low wages, racial and ethnic animosity or at least discomfort, a fear of national balkanization, a fear of crime, the tendency for anger about illegal immigration to spill over unconsciously into a general antipathy toward immigrants, and the public's lack of knowledge about what the legal requirements for the admission of immigrants actually are. Stephen H. Legomsky, E Pluribus Unum: Immigration, Race, and Other Deep Divides, 21 Southern Illinois Univ. L.Rev. 101 (1996).³¹

In a few short years, the playing field shifted dramatically. In 1993, some 65% of all Americans favored reducing or halting immigration. By the fall of 1997—only one year after the spate of 1996 federal anti-immigration legislation—that percentage had fallen to 46%, largely, one presumes, because of the booming economy. USA Today, Oct. 13, 1997, at 1, 11. By September 2000, the same percentage had fallen again, to 38%. Jeffrey M. Jones, Gallup Press Release, Sept. 22, 2000. Interestingly, the responses of Democrats and Republicans were almost identical. The one significant positive correlation was between level of education and favorable views of immigration. 46% of those respondents who had only a high school education or less wanted immigration reduced. Among those with advanced degrees, only 24% wanted immigration reduced.

A June 2001 survey showed that 41% of Americans wanted immigration reduced. The ethnicity of the respondents mattered. Only 25% of Latino respondents wanted to reduce immigration; the corresponding figures for blacks and for non-Latino whites were 31% and 45%, respectively. Jeffrey M. Jones, Gallup News Service, Americans Have Mixed Opinions about Immigration (July 18, 2001).

The post-1996 changes were felt in more concrete ways as well. In a period of just a few years, Congress grandparented certain classes of immigrants who were present at the time of the 1996 welfare reforms, passed special legislation to benefit certain Central American and Soviet bloc nationals, enacted additional special legislation on behalf of certain Haitian nationals, and eased some of the naturalization requirements and some of the requirements for citizenship by descent. The former INS—under pressure from Congress and with supplemental appropriations—allocated additional resources to sharply reduce the long processing backlogs for naturalization applications, LPR visa petitions, and other filings. The Supreme Court handed down several immigration-related decisions;

31. See also Bill Ong Hing, Immigration Policies: Messages of Exclusion to African Americans, 37 Howard L.J. 237 (1994) (noting many African Americans' perceptions that they are losing jobs to immigrants); Romano L. Mazzoli & Enid Trucios-Haynes, Public Sentiment and Congressional Response: 15 Years of Immigration Policymaking, 73 IR 469 (Apr. 12, 1996) (stressing the dangers of linking legal and illegal immigration reform).

while not all were favorable to immigrants, several were notable for their favorable rulings on the issues of indefinite detention, judicial review of expulsion decisions, and the non-retroactivity of restrictions on certain forms of discretionary relief. The various developments are covered in more detail throughout this book.

Then came the September 11, 2001 terrorist attacks on the United States. In a combined New York Times/CBS News poll taken in the immediate aftermath of the attacks (2–3 days later), the percentage of respondents who felt that the levels of immigration were too high jumped to 53%. Richard L. Berke & Janet Elder, Poll Finds Majority Back Use of Military, New York Times (Sept. 16, 2001). One year later, that figure was largely unchanged, with 54% in favor of decreasing immigration. USA Today (Sept. 6, 2002). By 2004, however, opinion had begun to soften; only 41% favored immigration reductions, NPR/Kaiser/Kennedy School Poll, Immigration—Summary of Findings at 1 (May 27–Aug. 2, 2004), and by February 2005, the figure had dropped to 39% (versus 37% in favor of maintaining current levels and 14% favoring immigration increases). West-hill Partners/Hotline Poll, The Hotline (Feb. 2005).

At this writing, the U.S. and global economies are in dire straits and national security and terrorism remain serious concerns for Americans. Public opinion will surely continue to evolve, but these factors will shape the politics of immigration.

Public opinion aside, at least two factors account for the occasional surges in the political power of immigrants. One factor is the immigrants themselves. Although LPRs and other noncitizens may not vote, see David Weissbrodt & Laura Danielson, Immigration Law and Procedure in a Nutshell 520–21 (5th ed. 2005), those who eventually naturalize do become eligible to vote. And they do have memories. (Whether the voting patterns of naturalized citizens differ appreciably from those of native-born citizens is not yet clear.)

A second source of immigrants' political power is coalitions with other groups. Ethnic constituencies are among the relevant alliances. Professor Gerald Lopez has emphasized the growing numbers of Latinos in the United States and the growing clout that those numbers would be expected to bring. Gerald P. Lopez, Learning about Latinos, 19 Chicano–Latino L. Rev. 363 (1998). This clout has likely increased substantially since the date of Lopez's article, given the growth in the Latino population cited in Section C. Both of the major political parties aggressively pursue Latino votes. The intensity of those efforts, as well as the intensity of efforts to woo other ethnic constituencies, vary by region and district. What effect do you think the growing Latino population will have on the immigration debate in both parties? A recent survey by the Pew Hispanic Center documents that only three in ten Latinos consider immigration "extremely important," ranking it sixth in a list of seven priorities for the Obama Administration. See Mark Hugo Lopez & Gretchen Livingston, Hispanics and the New Administration: Immigration Slips as Priority (January 15, 2009), available at <http://www.pewhispanic.org/titles/reports/101.pdf>.

What political role should Latinos play in advancing the interests of immigrants? Professor Cristina Rodríguez argues that, despite some cultural and political dangers, U.S. citizens of Latin American ancestry should positively embrace their links to immigrants, primarily by advocating immigrant integration and greater acceptance of Latino culture as part of American culture. Strategies for achieving these goals would include facilitating naturalization, non-citizen voting, language and civics training, legalization of undocumented immigrants, and expanding the channels for legal immigration. See Cristina M. Rodríguez, Latinos and Immigrants, 11 Harvard Latino L. Rev. 247 (2008).

Politics make strange bedfellows, and immigration politics seem to make unusually strange bedfellows. As noted earlier, it is not uncommon for free-market Republicans to team up with civil rights-oriented Democrats on behalf of immigration, or (at least in the past) for socially conservative Republicans to team up with labor union Democrats and (some) environmental advocates in opposition to immigration. But today, even those formerly predictable patterns often fail to hold. The AFL-CIO, anxious to boost its declining membership, was one of the early interest groups to call for legalizing part of the undocumented population. Manufacturing, agricultural, and other business interests frequently favor increasing or otherwise facilitating immigration, as readers of the Wall Street Journal will readily attest. And many African-Americans, concerned about job competition with immigrants, have had mixed feelings about liberalizing the immigration laws. See Bill Ong Hing, Immigration Policies: Messages of Exclusion to African-Americans, 37 Howard L.J. 237 (1994). Generalizations have become hazardous, and even those that seem momentarily safe are subject to new surprises. See also Michael J. Churgin, Lobbying by Jewish Organizations Concerning Immigration: A Historical Study, 83 Univ. Detroit Mercy L. Rev. 947 (2006) (describing historical Jewish support for immigration).

Because coalitions hold so much potential for achieving reform, several scholars have begun to prioritize conscious bridge-building. Professor Berta Hernández-Truyol has written a series of three articles advocating Latino alliances with various others.³²

32. See, e.g., Berta Esperanza Hernández-Truyol, Building Bridges—Latinas and Latinos at the Crossroads: Realities, Rhetoric and Replacement, 25 Columbia Human Rights L. Rev. 369 (1994) (urging an alliance among all Latino/a subgroups); Berta Esperanza Hernández-Truyol, Building Bridges: Bringing International Human Rights Home, 9 La Raza L.J. 69 (1996) (urging a global-local alliance that would promote both civil/political rights and social/economic rights); Berta Esperanza Hernández-Truyol, Building Bridges III: Personal Narratives, Incoherent Paradigms, and Plural Citizens, 19 Chicano-Latino L. Rev. 303 (1998) (urging alliances among communities of color); Jennifer Gordon & R.A. Lenhardt, Rethinking Work and Citizenship, 55 UCLA L. Rev. 1161 (2008) (identifying relationships between work and citizenship that might help bridge the divide between African-American and Latino immigrant low-wage workers). Kevin R. Johnson, The Case for African American and Latino Cooperation in Challenging Racial Profiling in Law Enforcement, 55 Florida L. Rev. 341 (2003); George A. Martínez, African-Americans, Latinos, and the Construction of Race: Toward an Epistemic Coalition, 19 Chicano-Latino L. Rev. 213 (1998) (calling for a coalition between Latinos and Throughout United States history, congressional and presidential commissions have also played influential roles in the design of the nation's immigration laws. During the mid-to-late 1990s, the Commission on Immigration Reform made a number of important recommendations.³³

Finally, so much of the political theory that underlies the appropriate content of a nation's immigration policy, the process by which that policy should be formulated, and the determinations of who should participate in that process rests on fundamental notions of the meaning of citizenship. That subject is taken up in chapter 13, section C.

G. IMMIGRATION AND NATIONAL SECURITY: AN INTRODUCTION

Within seconds of the September 11, 2001 terrorist attacks the media, government officials, and the public all zeroed in on the foreign nationalities of the perpetrators. It is no longer possible to talk about U.S. immigration policy without serious discussion of the national security implications, both real and perceived. The questions are fundamental: How does a nation dedicated to the principles of liberal democracy preserve basic individual freedoms and still protect its inhabitants from violent attack? And how does a nation of immigrants reconcile the civil and human rights of noncitizens with its legitimate national security needs?

These questions will be deferred until chapter 10, which considers in detail the panoply of national security measures taken by Congress and the executive branch in the wake of September 11. Generally, the initiatives have fallen into several rough categories—detention, intelligence-gathering, expanding the grounds on which noncitizens may be removed from the United States, contracting noncitizens' procedural rights, stricter visa and other overseas policies, and enhanced border enforcement. Among the other controversies that these policies have generated, they have disproportionately affected noncitizens who are either Muslim or of Arab descent (or African-Americans); Ediberto Roman, Coalitions and Collective Memories: A Search for Common Ground, 58 Mercer L. Rev. 637 (2007); Victor C. Romero, "Aren't You Latino?" Building Bridges upon Common Misperceptions, 33 U.C. Davis L. Rev. 837 (2000) (urging oppressed minorities to join forces rather than compete against one another); Victor C. Romero, On Elián and Aliens: A Political Solution to the Plenary Power Problem, 4 NYU J. of Legislation & Public Policy 343, 362–63 (2000–01) (urging new citizens of Latino and Asian ethnicities to join forces in lobbying for immigration reform).

33. For a good before-and-after discussion of its work, see Carlos Ortiz Miranda, United States Commission on Immigration Reform: The Interim and Final Reports, 38 Santa Clara L. Rev. 645 (1998); Carlos O. Miranda, An Agenda for the Commission on Immigration Reform, 29 San Diego L. Rev. 701 (1992). For a comparative view of the political processes by which immigration policies are constructed, see the highly interesting article by a principal architect of several other countries' immigration laws, James A.R. Nafziger, A Comparison of Processes for Reforming Migration Laws in Transitional States: China, Kazakhstan, and Albania, 70 Washington L. Rev. 757 (1995).

both). Consequently, chapter 10 also takes up the hotly debated issue of ethnic and religious profiling.

H. IMMIGRANTS, SELF-IDENTITY, AND HOME

In the following essay one immigrant relates his personal feelings about what it means to be an immigrant. Experiences differ widely, of course, and the achievements of this particular individual (who died in 2005) were unusual. Nonetheless, his thoughtful comments have struck responsive chords with many other immigrants who have sought to discover their own inner feelings about who they were and who they have become.

Henry Grunwald, Home Is Where You Are Happy

Time, July 8, 1985, pp. 100-01.

The author, Time Inc.'s editor in chief, came to America from Austria at the age of 17 with his family. His father was a noted Viennese librettist.

Every immigrant leads a double life. Every immigrant has a double identity and a double vision, being suspended between an old and a new home, an old and a new self.

The very notion of a new home, of course, is in a sense as impossible as the notion of new parents. Parents are who they are; home is what it is. Home is the wallpaper above the bed, the family dinner table, the church bells in the morning, the bruised shins of the playground, the small fears that come with dusk, the streets and squares and monuments and shops that constitute one's first universe. Home is one's birthplace, ratified by memory.

Yet home, like parentage, must be legitimized through love; otherwise, it is only a fact of geography or biology. Most immigrants to America found their love of their old homes betrayed. Whether Ireland starved them, or Nazi Germany persecuted them, or Viet Nam drove them into the sea, they did not really abandon their countries; their countries abandoned them. In America, they found the possibility of a new love, the chance to nurture new selves.

Not uniformly, not without exceptions. Every generation has its Know-Nothing movement, its fear—often understandable—and hatred of alien invasion. That is as true today as it always was. In spite of all this, the American attitude remains unique. Throughout history, exile has been a calamity; America turned it into a triumph and placed its immigrants in the center of a national epic. It is still symbolized by that old copper-plated cliché, the Statue of Liberty, notwithstanding the condescension and the awful poetry of the famous Emma Lazarus lines (“the wretched refuse of your teeming shore”).

The epic is possible because America is an idea as much as it is a country. America has nothing to do with allegiance to a dynasty and very little to do with allegiance to a particular place, but everything to do with allegiance to a set of principles. To immigrants, those principles are especially real because so often they were absent or violated in their native lands. It was no accident in the '60s and '70s, when alienation was in flower, that it often seemed to be "native" Americans who felt alienated, while aliens or the children of aliens upheld the native values. The immigrant's double vision results in a special, somewhat skewed perspective on America that can mislead but that can also find revelation in the things that to native Americans are obvious. Psychiatrist Robert Coles speaks of those "who straddle worlds and make of that very experience a new world."

It is not easy. Successive waves of immigration differ, of course, and a refugee from wartime Europe does not have the same experiences as a refugee from postwar Viet Nam 40 years later. But all immigrants have certain things in common, and all know the classic, opposite impulses: to draw together in protective enclaves where through churches, clubs, cafés, newspapers, the old culture is fiercely maintained; and on the other hand to rush headlong into the American mainstream, seeking to adopt indiscriminately new manners, clothes, technology and sometimes names.

Inevitably, the immigrant is a student, and his more or less permanent occupation is learning. That is a nervous business ("Have I got it right?"); depending on one's temperament, it is also a series of joyful discoveries. For younger immigrants, those discoveries begin in school, and the initial, most amazing one is the openness, the absence of the compulsion and petty tyranny that characterize the classroom almost everywhere else in the world. But if that openness is indeed joyful and liberating to young minds, the accompanying lack of discipline is also frightening and destructive: the heart of the perennial American conflict between freedom and order.

The immigrant's education continues everywhere. He must master not only a new history but a whole new imagination. The process goes on at various speeds, and odd gaps can appear. The immigrant carries different nursery rhymes in his head, different fairy tales. He may have just graduated from college Phi Beta Kappa but not know who Mary Poppins is. He may be taking the bar examination and be rather dim about Popeye. Prince Eugene of Savoy lodges stubbornly in the mind (song learned at the age of seven: "Prince Eugene, the noble knight . . ."), while Patrick Henry appears as a stranger, an image full of gaps, like an unfinished sketch.

A continuing part of the immigrant's education is the comparison between the anticipated or imagined America and the real country. The anticipation depends on time and place, but the reality is always startling. If the vision of America was formed by Ginger Rogers and Fred Astaire dancing atop glittering skyscrapers, how to accept the slums? If the vision was noise and materialist chaos, how to account for a Quaker meeting house or the daily, relentless idealism of legions of American do-gooders? If the vision was a childhood fantasy of the Wild West, how can one grasp the fact that Sitting Bull was a real man fighting a real Government and dying a real death?

A new language: nagging impediment to some, liberation to others. There is the constant struggle to achieve the proper accent, like trying to sing one's way into some strange and maddeningly elusive music. There is the pain and bother of trying as an adult or near adult to learn new words and meanings. But these words and meanings have a certain innocence, a certain freshness, free of the constraint, the boredom, the touches of shame that are imposed on one's native language in the classroom or the nursery.

English is illogical and headily free compared, for example, with the grammatical rigidities of French or German. Some newcomers are lost in this malleable structure; others fall upon English with an instinctive sense of recognition, as one might discover a hitherto unknown brother. Shakespeare and Melville gradually replace Goethe and Racine, though drilled-in passages never quite fade; the experience can begin as vague disloyalty and end in passion. Immigrants who know English as one of the great unifiers of America will never be reconciled to those others * * * who refuse to accept English fully, thus creating an ominous dual culture in many parts of the U.S. Language is life. For many immigrants, the true act of naturalization occurs when they start having dreams in English.

More puzzling and complicated than language is the American social syntax. The first impression is one of dazzling and rather unsettling informality, an indiscriminate camaraderie. But one learns that going to the opera in shirt-sleeves (an outrage, surely!) does not mean contempt for culture or even necessarily a lack of rules. Calling the boss by his first name, which takes some effort, does not mean that he and the office boy are equals. Indeed, equality is both the great illusion and the great reality of America. The immigrant is slow to understand that below the egalitarian surface there are hierarchies and tribes, proper and improper addresses, great names and lowly names, old money looking down on new money, older immigrants looking down on newer—a topography to which there are very few maps.

But after this discovery there gradually comes yet another insight that whipsaws the immigrant back toward the original perception: there really is no fixed social structure after all. There is above everything else that much vaunted mobility—from place to place, career to career, status to status—which turns so many native-born Americans into immigrants in their own country.

In philosophical terms, Europe (or Asia or Africa) is the world of being; America is the world of becoming. In Europe, one is what one is; in America, one is what one does. To the immigrant this is a discovery of high excitement and also of some anxiety. Opportunity is not just opportunity but an imperative and a reproach. If anyone can make it in America, why haven't you? If anyone can be what he wants to be, why aren't you more?

There follows the suspicion that making it is the only American morality. But no—it can't be that simple. The first tangible hint of American moral attitudes comes on the immigration form: the solemn requirement to swear that you are not a Communist, or not a prostitute, or whatever. To those coming from older and more cynical societies, this is the utmost sort of naiveté. For the immigrant, it foreshadows the American conviction that one can mandate, even legislate morality. That conviction represents an amalgam of Puritanism, with its belief in a permanently flawed human nature, and the Enlightenment tradition, with its belief in the perfectibility of man. Cotton Mather, meet Thomas Jefferson. This contradictory combination bespeaks the sheer and sometimes hopelessly unrealistic determination to overcome any evil that cannot be ignored, the refusal to accept the status quo in the universe.

The moral landscape the immigrant left behind was usually dominated by the spires of one church or perhaps of two churches living in uneasy peace after centuries of bloody contest. He is therefore overwhelmed by the dizzying variety of religion in America, by the churches, sects, subsects and cults that proliferate in a sort of spiritual shopping mall. But he learns to appreciate the fact that a country that can create God in so many images, no matter how eccentric, has never used fire and sword to impose a faith on its citizens.

The most awesome thing to learn about America is the land itself. No newcomer is ever prepared for its size: the vastness of a country that is a continent. The quintessential American landscape is not found in the mountains or on the shore but in the Great Plains. Space (terrestrial space, not space out there) is the true metaphor for the American condition. Speed can conquer it, but nothing built by man can dominate it. That is perhaps one reason why even the most imposing American skylines can look strangely impermanent and fragile. America does not build for the ages. There are no American palaces and no (convincing) American cathedrals.

But the beauty of America is not in its buildings, not in its artifacts or its arts. Its greatest beauty is in its ideas. Freedom is the ultimate value, whether aesthetic or political. * * *

* * *

The hardest situation for the immigrant comes when the future seems in doubt and when America seems about to default on its promise. It happened during the Great Depression, and it happened again during Viet Nam. It happens today whenever one contemplates the dark and yet quite visible underside of American life: the New York City subway or the filth of a roadside service station, the American infernos of drugs and crime and sexual decadence, the dregs of the cities—"wretched refuse" indeed. At such moments it sometimes seems that many of the lands the immigrants left behind are actually doing better than America, that they have in a sense "won." Of course, it is not so. It would be dishonest and thus disloyal to ignore the dreadful scars and blemishes of America, but they are themselves to a large extent the result of freedom—sometimes an excess of freedom. For freedom can be dangerous. Yet freedom also holds within it the means to correct its defects, for it allows, indeed encourages, people to criticize their society, to tinker with it, to improve it.

Ultimately, the education of every immigrant is personal, individual. No immigrant can speak for all others. But a Viennese librettist, Alfred Grunwald, who came to America in 1940 and sought to continue practicing his art, wrote some lyrics that sum up much of the immigrant experience in America: "Deine Heimat ist wo das Glück dich grüsst . . ." Roughly translated, "Home is where you are happy." Sentimental, perhaps, and certainly not conventionally patriotic, but appropriate for a country that wrote the pursuit of happiness into its founding document.

That pursuit continues for the immigrant in America, and it never stops. But it comes to rest at a certain moment. The moment is hard to pin down, but it occurs perhaps when the immigrant's double life and double vision converge toward a single state of mind. When the old life, the old home fade into a certain unreality: places one merely visits, in fact or in the mind, practicing the tourism of memory. It occurs when the immigrant learns his ultimate lesson: above all countries, America, if loved, returns love.

Grunwald's success story is exceptional; most people, whether native-born or immigrants, do not become editors-in-chief of Time Magazine. (Grunwald later became the U.S. Ambassador to Austria.) Immigrants of color are especially likely to report markedly different sorts of daily life experiences. As the following passages illustrate, many United States citizens of color also are sometimes consciously or unconsciously assumed to be "foreign," either literally or figuratively.

Berta Esperanza Hernández-Truyol, Natives, Newcomers and Nativism: A Human Rights Model for the Twenty-First Century

23 Fordham Urban L.J. 1075, 1075-76 (1996).

Saturday, October 7, 1995. 7:00 p.m. Friends and I meet at an art gallery and, after looking at some of the new work, amble down the street to a local restaurant. The place is small and, as usual, crowded. We wait outside, chatting, for fifteen minutes before being seated. The owner leads us to our table, a crowded four-top arranged at a diagonal against the wall and flanked by two-tops on either side. With my computer in tow over my right shoulder and a jean jacket over my left arm, I stand at the top of the diagonal trying to figure out how I can get in to take my seat. All of a sudden, and out of the blue, I hear "Excuse me, you're in America now, you say 'excuse me,' SAVAGE, ANIMAL." It appears that a sleeve of my jacket has brushed against the Angry Diner. I have no opportunity to apologize or even to realize what has happened. Angry Diner continues to mutter, unintelligibly, under his breath. One of my friends, Rosa, who has been walking right behind me, upon seeing my stunned expression simply says, "Forget it, let's just sit down." By the time Meika and Mercedes, our two other friends, join us, they are rather curious—wondering what mischief I have caused. After relaying the incident to my now equally stunned friends, we move on to have our nice dinner, or try, anyway. Angry Diner, Rosa tells me later, never stopped muttering things under his breath. Finally, I think peace is at hand when Angry Diner and his companion get up to leave. He moves their table toward ours so that she can negotiate a tight corner (on the other side of our table). As he passes our table, he turns around, stares at me, utters an obscenity, and shoves Meika's chair before rushing to make his final exit—this time with wait persons chasing after him. Again, we are stunned. The restaurant owner joins our table to find out what had taken place, and after hearing the whole sordid story she says, "This is America, eh? Sure it is, and he is not welcome here anymore." Her English, unlike mine, is foreign accented; her look, unlike mine, is not brown.

Imagine. It is 1996 and we are about to move into the twenty-first century. We live in a city that is known globally as The City. The City where, since the turn of the nineteenth century, Lady Liberty, the quintessential representation of freedom, has greeted foreign subjects. The poem gracing her impressive figure is a symbol of welcomeness, diversity, shelter:

Give me your tired, your poor,
Your huddled masses yearning to breathe free,
The wretched refuse of your teeming shore.
Send these, the homeless, the tempest-tost to me,
I lift my lamp beside the golden door.

Unfortunately, this feeling of fellowship is anything but evident in our glorious city, across our nation, or even world-wide these days. This was made patently clear to me while trying to enjoy a quiet dinner with friends. [The author here cites several anti-immigrant measures that were then recently enacted or pending.] * * * Such developments make one wonder what has occurred to the apparent (but largely mythical) esprit de corps that welcomed foreigners in earlier days of our republic.

Michael A. Olivas, The Chronicles, My Grandfather's Stories, and Immigration Law: The Slave Traders Chronicle as Racial History

34 St. Louis Univ. L.J. 425, 425–27 (1990).

The funny thing about stories is that everyone has one. My grandfather had them, with plenty to spare. When I was very young, he would regale me with stories, usually about politics, baseball, and honor. These were his themes, the subject matter he carved out for himself and his grandchildren. As the oldest grandson and his first godchild, I held a special place of responsibility and affection. In Mexican families, this patrimony handed to young boys is one remnant of older times that is fading, like the use of Spanish in the home, posadas at Christmas, or the deference accorded all elders.

In Sabino Olivas' world, there were three verities, ones that he adhered to his entire life: political and personal loyalties are paramount; children should work hard and respect their elders; and people should conduct their lives with honor. Of course, each of these themes had a canon of stories designed, like parables, to illustrate the larger theme, and, like the Bible, to be interlocking, cross referenced, and synoptic. That is, they could be embellished in the retelling, but they had to conform to the general themes of loyalty, hard work, and honor.

* * *

His other favorite story, which included a strong admonition to me, was a story about how he and other Hispanics had been treated in Texas on their way to World War I. A trainload of soldiers from Arizona and northern New Mexico, predominantly of Mexican origin (both New Mexico and Arizona had only recently become states), were going by train to training camp in Ft. Hays, Kansas. Their train stopped in a town near Amarillo, Texas, and all the men poured out of the train to eat at a restaurant, one that catered to train travelers. But only to some. There was a sign prominently displayed, "No coloreds or Mexicans allowed," and word spread among them that this admissions policy was taken seriously.

My grandfather, who until this time had never been outside the Territory or the State of New Mexico (after 1912), was not used to this kind of indignity. After all, he was from a state where Hispanics and Indians constituted a majority of the population, especially in the North, and it was his first face-to-face encounter with racism, Texas style. Shamefacedly, the New Mexicans ate the food that Anglo soldiers bought and brought to the train, but he never forgot the humiliation and anger he felt that day. Sixty-five years later, when he told me this story, he remembered clearly how most of the men died in France or elsewhere in Europe, defending a country that never fully accorded them their rights.

Natsu Taylor Saito, Alien and Non-Alien Alike: Citizenship, "Foreignness," and Racial Hierarchy in American Law

76 Oregon L. Rev. 261, 262-64, 295-97, 301-02, 310-11 (1997).

[W]ithin the United States, if a person is racially identified as African American or white, that person is presumed to be legally a U.S. citizen and socially an American . . . [but] these presumptions are not present for Asian Americans, Latinos, Arab Americans, and other non-Black racial minorities. Rather, there is the opposite presumption that these people are foreigners; or, if they are U.S. citizens, then their racial identity includes a foreign component.

[Neil Gotanda, Asian American Rights and the "Miss Saigon Syndrome," in Hyung-Chan Kim (ed.), Asian Americans and the Supreme Court 1087, 1096 (1992).]

Why is it that, even after living in the United States for four or five generations, Asian Americans are still identified as foreign? * * * My thesis is that the "racing" of Asian Americans as foreign reinforces the American racial hierarchy in two ways. First, it creates a buffer zone between those identified as "black" and "white." Second, it constructs Asian Americans as instant outsiders, or "faux" citizens, against whom "real Americans" can unite in times of crisis.

* * *

From the ugly "Go back to where you came from" to the purportedly neutral "Where are you from?" or the intended-to-be-complimentary "You speak such good English," Asian Americans are confronted daily with the presumption that they are not really Americans. Where does this presumption come from? Why is it so pervasive and so apparently acceptable?

* * *

The attribution of foreignness takes on both ostensibly positive and negative forms. Positive portrayals generally include images of Asians as hardworking, industrious, thrifty, family-oriented and, for women, seductively mysterious and exotic. The negative images are almost invariably the same traits, simply portrayed with different connotations. * * * Hardworking and industrious becomes unfairly competitive; family-oriented becomes clannish; mysterious becomes dangerously inscrutable. Nonetheless, both the positive and negative forms of foreignness are portrayals of outsiders, of the "other."

Part of what allows for this fluidity, this right-before-your-eyes magical transformation from model minority to yellow peril and back to model minority again is the construct of foreignness. Each of the images has been painted with the brush of foreignness, and it is this tinting that provides the continuity behind the changing value-attribution. * * *

[Here, Saito suggests that attributing foreignness to Asians served the historical function of creating a pool of cheap labor.]

* * *

A second significant function served by the attribution of foreignness to Asian Americans is the ability to turn them into enemies on a moment's notice. This has been true both metaphorically, as enemies in trade wars, and in a literal sense. Asians have been identified as the enemy in the most significant armed conflicts involving the United States within the memory of most Americans—World War II, the Korean War, and the war in Vietnam, as well as the Cold War. Racial stereotypes of Asians have been used to make them appear evil and inhuman and perhaps, thus, easier to kill. * * *

* * * Those same stereotypes, because they are race-based, can then be turned against any of the other subgroups. This is illustrated by how easily the portrayal of Chinese as good and Japanese as evil during World War II was reversed during the Cold War.

* * *

Numerous incidents of reported violence against Asian Americans involve “foreigner” or “enemy” imagery. For example, in 1989 a Chinese American man was beaten to death in Raleigh, North Carolina by white men who attacked him “because they didn’t like Vietnamese” and because “their brothers went over to Vietnam in the war and they never came back.” In 1992, a Vietnamese student at the University of Miami was beaten to death by several white youths who called him “Chink” and “Viet Cong.”

The 458 incidents reported to the national Asian Pacific American Legal Consortium in 1995 included a twenty-three-year-old Vietnamese American who died after an assault by three young men who taunted him with statements such as “[w]hat the f—k are you looking at, gook?” A twenty-three-year-old Chinese American was stabbed to death in the parking lot of a grocery store by an unemployed musician who stated that he had decided to “kill me a Chinaman” because Asians “got all the good jobs.” A Pakistani taxi driver was beaten by a New York City police officer who said, “[y]ou immigrants think we’re stupid. . . . This is my country, I’ll teach you a lesson.” A middle-aged Chinese American woman was beaten by people who yelled, “[f]—k you chink, go back to your country,” and an East Indian woman’s home was vandalized by neighbors who said, “[y]ou Hindu bitches, why did you have to move here?”

Victor C. Romero, Broadening Our World: Citizens and Immigrants of Color in America

27 Capital Univ. L. Rev. 13, 29–33 (1998).

* * *

* * * [P]rivately motivated violence against Asian-Americans has escalated dramatically in recent years. Indeed, the stereotype of the “Asian-American as foreigner” still remains today, as the following example from my own experience in rustic Carlisle, Pennsylvania demonstrates. * * *

Academic year 1995–96, my first year in law teaching, was an exceptionally good year. The fall of 1995 saw my wife’s and my return to Pennsylvania after many years, where I was fortunate to be offered a job teaching at the Dickinson School of Law in Carlisle, just twenty minutes outside of Harrisburg, the state capital. Needless to say, we were both thrilled—Corie, because she would be closer to her family after having spent a good bit of time in California, and me, because I was thrilled to be offered the opportunity to teach law. Having had our fill of Los Angeles, we were both excited to be moving to peaceful, rural south central Pennsylvannia; we gladly gave up our hour-long commutes in exchange for smog-free walks to the law school. And we settled into Carlisle nicely: on a handshake (our wonderful landlady did not believe in leases), we rented the ground floor of a lovely Victorian home in the historic district and looked forward to quickly assimilating into the culture of small-town life. * * * In a year's time, we have become small-town folk and have enjoyed the transformation along the way.

However, unlike probably ninety percent of Carlisle's married couples, we have an interracial marriage—Corie traces her Caucasian roots to Europe, specifically, Wales, the Netherlands, Germany, and Norway, while I came to the U.S. from the Philippines in 1984. And while ninety-nine percent of the time Corie and I are never reminded of this difference by others, when we are, it can sometimes be a painful and frightening experience. On a balmy May evening a couple of weeks before the Class of 96's graduation, Corie and I decided to take a walk around the neighborhood, something which we have enjoyed on many an afternoon. As we crossed Willow heading south on West Street, we noticed a pick-up truck whose occupants began to whistle wolf-calls and shout lewd remarks. * * * It soon became clear that we were the targets of these obscenities:

"Hey, you Japanese sonofabitch! Why don't you fuck her? I have!"

That said, the truck slowly turned the corner, more obscenities coming from within. * * * After several tense moments, we were relieved to see the truck pull away as it rounded the corner. As a last show of power, one of the occupants extended his white arm and thrust his fist into the night air while simultaneously letting out a taunting laugh.

As the truck left our view, Corie and I abandoned our walk and hurried home. Surprisingly, the primary emotion we felt was not anger, but hurt and sadness. Hurt, because we felt that it was unfair that we could no longer enjoy walking around our neighborhood at night; sadness, because here we were in 1996, in what was otherwise an idyllic community, and we had to endure the kind of racist remarks many people only read about in books. Indeed, Corie told me later that evening, "For the first time, I experienced what it is like to be a minority."

Almost two years since the incident, I realize how lucky Corie and I are that we were not hurt that evening. Vincent Chin was not so lucky. In 1982, Chin, a young Chinese-American engineer, was beaten to death with a baseball bat by two white auto workers who, thinking he was Japanese, blamed him for the recession of the American auto industry. Worse, the killer served no jail time. Sadly, the stereotype of the "Asian-American as foreigner" remains, and the consequences can sometimes be fatal.

Asian-Americans are not the only people of color who live within the border of perpetual foreignness. Latino-Americans, especially Mexican-Americans, also suffer this stigma. * * *

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. Professor Kevin Johnson has touched thoughtfully on several subissues related to Latino identity. The son of an Anglo father and a Latino mother, Johnson has written a book sensitively describing the process of identity formation for children whose parents are of different ethnicities. See Kevin R. Johnson, How Did You Get to Be Mexican? (1999). He has also drawn a useful distinction between the formation of one's personal identity and the formation of one's group identity. Kevin R. Johnson, Immigration and Latino Identity, 19 Chicano-Latino L. Rev. 197, 197 (1998). With respect to the latter, Johnson distinguishes two kinds of potential conflicts—those between Latinos and non-Latinos, and intra-Latino conflicts between Mexican immigrants and United States citizens of Mexican descent. Id. at 199–206.

2. The interaction of race and gender can complicate the identity question. See Berta Esperanza Hernandez-Truyol, Borders (En)gendered: Normativities, Latinas, and the LatCrit Paradigm, 72 NYU L. Rev. 882 (1997) (Latinas live a multidimensional existence that requires constant travel between worlds).

3. Most of the news stories about racial profiling have concerned African-Americans, but profiling has been a part of the daily lives of people of color generally and has posed particular problems for Mexican-Americans.³⁴

4. In chapter 2, you will read about the historical attitudes toward Asians and the relationship of those attitudes to the immigration laws of the late 19th and early 20th centuries. The materials you have just read suggest that many of the same attitudes stubbornly persist. Professor Leti Volpp, after examining differing models of citizenship and considering them in the specific context of Asians and Asian Americans, reaches the following conclusion:

That the political engagement of Asian Americans in the American republic will inevitably be accompanied by concerns about their loyalty, their trustworthiness, and their ability to prioritize national as opposed to foreign interests is a form of cultural racism. To be seen as primarily governed by group loyalty to one's country of origin suggests a limited capacity for agency, will, or rational thought. This is obviously dehumanizing, since our beliefs as to what is "human" rest on such capacities. The differentiation of who is allowed to be "human," through discourses about racial inferiority, has been fundamental to the creation of many modern democracies. The American rights-bearing subject was allowed to consolidate through the very exclusion of certain racialized subjects.

Leti Volpp, 'Obnoxious to their Very Nature': Asian Americans and Constitutional Citizenship, 5 Citizenship Studies 57, 68 (2001).

³⁴. See generally Kevin R. Johnson, The Case Against Race Profiling in Immigration Enforcement, 78 Washington Univ. L.Q. 675 (2000); Victor C. Romero, Racial Profiling: "Driving While Mexican" and Affirmative Action, 6 Michigan J. Race & Law 195 (2000); cf. Victor C. Romero, Restricting Hate Speech Against "Private Figures": Lessons in Power-Based Censorship from Defamation Law, 33 Columbia Human Rights L. Rev. 1 (2001) (arguing for censorship of hate speech directed at nonwhites by whites).

There is now an abundance of literature on the treatment and identities of Asians and Asian-Americans. Some common themes emerge—that the historical suspicions towards Asian immigrants have profoundly influenced the development of United States immigration law, that vestiges of immigration law's anti-Asian genesis can still be found in today's law and practice, and that these suspicions extend beyond Asian immigrants to encompass even United States citizens of Asian descent.³⁵

5. Anti-Asian rhetoric was quite noticeable in 1996, amidst reports of contributions by noncitizen Asians to the Democratic National Committee. See Frank H. Wu & Francey Lim Youngberg, People from China Crossing the River: Asian American Political Empowerment and Foreign Influence, in Gordon H. Chang (ed.), Asian Americans and Politics, ch. 12 (2001).

6. Many anti-Asian land laws remain on the books today, but a law student project has succeeded in persuading several states to repeal them. The project was carried out by law students at the University of Cincinnati, led by Professor Gabriel J. Chin, with follow-up by law students at the University of New Mexico. See Elizabeth Mulcahy & Mary Schmidt-Nowara, Law Students Work to Repeal Jim Crow-Era Anti-Asian Alien Land Laws, 6 BIB 611 (June 15, 2001).

7. Is it better to be criticized or to be ignored? Several commentators believe that, in discussions of racial issues in the United States, Asians and Asian Americans tend to get forgotten.³⁶

8. Some of the writing has dealt specifically with the treatment or identity formations of immigrants from specific Asian countries (or citizens whose ethnicity traces to particular Asian countries).³⁷

35. For a sampling of the more thoughtful writings, see Robert S. Chang, Toward an Asian American Legal Scholarship: Critical Race Theory, Post-Structuralism, and Narrative Space, 81 California L. Rev. 1241 (1993); Neil Gotanda, "Other Non-Whites" in American Legal History: A Review of Justice at War, 85 Columbia L. Rev. 1186 (1985); Kevin R. Johnson, Racial Hierarchy, Asian Americans and Latinos as "Foreigners" and Social Change: Is Law the Way to Go?, 76 Oregon L. Rev. 347 (1997); Estelle T. Lau, Excavating the "Chinese Wall": Towards a Socio-Historical Perspective on the Development of United States Immigration Administration and Chinese Exclusion, 92 Northwestern Univ. L. Rev. 1068 (1998) (book review of Salyer); Frank H. Wu, Neither Black Nor White: Asian Americans and Affirmative Action, 15 Boston College Third World L.J. 225 (1995). See also the books and articles by Gyory, Hing, Salyer, Takaki, Ting, and Cole & Chin cited in the discussion following the Chinese Exclusion Case in chapter 2, as well as those excerpted above. For a poignant and vivid account, written as fictional narrative but relating the agonizing by interned U.S. citizens of Japanese descent over whether to refuse induction into the U.S. armed forces, see Frank H. Wu, Difficult Decisions During Wartime: A Letter from a Non-Alien in an Internment Camp to a Friend Back Home, 54 Case Western Reserve L. Rev. 1301 (2004); see generally Eric K. Yamamoto et al., Race, Rights and Reparation: Law and the Japanese American Internment (2001).

36. See Robert S. Chang, Disoriented: Asian Americans, Law, and the Nation-State (1999); Eric K. Yamamoto, Interracial Justice: Conflict and Reconciliation in Post-/Civil Rights America (1999); Harvey Gee, Asian Americans, the Law, and Illegal Immigration in Post-Civil Rights America: A Review of Three Books, 77 Univ. Detroit Mercy L. Rev. 71 (1999).

37. On Chinese immigrants, see Peter Kwong, Forbidden Workers: Illegal Chinese Immigrants and American Labor (1999); Bill

9. Since Latinos and Asians have constituted the largest numbers of immigrants in recent years, it is hardly surprising that they have featured the most frequently in the literature on immigration and race. Less often discussed, at least until very recently, has been the reception of Arab-Americans. The classic work is Edward W. Said, Orientalism (1978). More recent commentary has also offered well documented arguments that Arab immigrants and Arab-Americans have too often been the victims of racial and religious stereotyping under the immigration laws.³⁸

The public mood turned particularly ugly in the wake of the September 11, 2001 terrorist attacks. Numerous assaults against Arab-Americans, Muslims (whether or not of Arabic origin), and Muslim mosques were reported.³⁹ In response, the Justice Department condemned hate crimes, the FBI conducted 360 investigations with state and local law enforcement authorities, and by August 2002 prosecutors had brought criminal charges against approximately 100 individuals. See Final Rule (concerning NSEERS), 67 Fed. Reg. 52584, 52585 (Aug. 12, 2002). Sadly, similar racial episodes immediately spread throughout the world. See, e.g., Kelly Burke, Muslim Women, Children Targeted, Sydney Morning Herald, Sept. 14, 2001.

Professor Ahmad, above, adds this:

[A]lthough Americans have condemned the killings of Arabs, Muslims, and South Asians after September 11, these killings have been understood as the result of a displaced anger, one with which many Americans have sympathized and agreed. By this account, the perpetrators of hate crimes against Arabs, Muslims, and South Asians were not guilty of malicious intent or depraved indifference, but of expressing a socially appropriate emotion—overwhelming anger in the aftermath of the terrorist attacks—in Ong Hing, No Place for Angels: In Reaction to Kevin Johnson, 2000 Univ. of Illinois L. Rev. 559; Jan Ting, "Other than a Chinaman": How U.S. Immigration Law Resulted from and Still Reflects a Policy of Excluding and Restricting Asian Immigration, 4 Temple Political & Civil Rights L. Rev. 301 (1995). For a poignant, partly fictionalized, autobiographical novel by one Vietnamese boat person, see Lan Cao, Monkey Bridge (1997). The special cultural problems faced by two Southeast Asian refugee groups are described in Bill Ong Hing, Refugee Policy and Cultural Identity: In the Voice of Hmong and Lu Mein Young Adults, 1 Race & Poverty L.J. 111 (2003). For a description of the unusual public perceptions of Filipino immigrants, who often have Spanish surnames but Asian appearances, see Victor C. Romero, "Aren't You Latino?": Building Bridges upon Common Misperceptions, 33 U.C. Davis L. Rev. 837 (2000).

38. See, e.g., Susan Mussarat Akram, Orientalism Revisited in Asylum and Refugee Claims, 12 Internat'l J. Refugee Law 7 (2000); Susan M. Akram, Scheherezade Meets Kafka: Two Dozen Sordid Tales of Ideological Exclusion, 14 Georgetown Immigration L.J. 51 (1999).

39. See, e.g., Bill Ong Hing, Vigilante Racism: The De-Americanization of Immigrant America, 7 Michigan J. Race & Law 441 (2002); Leti Volpp, The Citizen and the Terrorist, 49 UCLA L. Rev. 1575 (2002) (discussing hate crimes against new, post 9/11, consolidated group of people who appear Middle Eastern, Arab, or Muslim); cf. Muneer I. Ahmad, A Rage Shared by Law: Post-September 11 Racial Violence as Crimes of Passion, 92 California L. Rev. 1259, 1264 (2004) (discussing public tendency to aggregate "Muslim-looking people" such as Arabs, Muslims, and South Asians).

socially inappropriate ways. Borrowing from criminal law, the hate crime killings before September 11 were understood as crimes of moral depravity, while the hate killings since September 11 have been understood as crimes of passion. Whereas crimes of moral depravity are devoid of any justification whatsoever, crimes of passion are treated as morally understandable though still illegal transgressions.

Ahmad, above, at 1264.

Along related lines, a recent national poll commissioned by Cornell University's Department of Communication revealed strong public sentiment for restricting the civil liberties of Muslim Americans. 27% of the respondents favored requiring all Muslim Americans to register their addresses with the federal government. 29% approved of undercover law enforcement agents infiltrating Muslim civic organizations. 22% said Muslim and Middle Eastern citizens should be profiled. In total, 44% felt it necessary to curtail the civil liberties of Muslim Americans. Cornell University, Press Release (Dec. 17, 2004).

10. For a thoughtful depiction of African-Americans as perpetual immigrants, see Lolita K. Buckner Innis, Tricky Magic: Blacks as Immigrants and the Paradox of Foreignness, 49 DePaul L. Rev. 85 (1999). On the related subject of the perception and treatment of immigrants of African descent, see the material on the Haitian interdiction program, pages 1112-35 below.

11. Professor Kevin Johnson has criticized what he felt to be white legal academics' scant attention to the scholarship of minority authors in the field of immigration.⁴⁰

12. In a 2004 opinion poll, 61% of U.S. immigrants believed that "recent immigrants have been unfairly discriminated against." Thirty percent said they themselves have experienced discrimination in housing, employment, and public services. And 39% of the immigrants surveyed believed the levels of discrimination have increased since September 11, 2001. NPR/Kaiser/Kennedy School Poll, Immigration: Summary of Findings at 5-6 (May 27-Aug. 2, 2004).

40. See Kevin R. Johnson, Race Matters: Immigration Law and Policy Scholarship, Law in the Ivory Tower, and the Legal Indifference of the Race Critique, 2000 Univ. Illinois L. Rev. 525. For the responses to Johnson's article, see Hing, note 39 above (supplying additional examples of the centrality of race in U.S. immigration policy); George A. Martínez, Race and Immigration Law: A Paradigm Shift, 2000 Univ. Illinois L. Rev. 517 (arguing that the paradigm shift advocated by Johnson is in fact beginning to take shape); Michael A. Olivas, Immigration Law Teaching and Scholarship in the Ivory Tower: A Response to Race Matters, 2000 Univ. Illinois 613 (agreeing with Johnson and adding analogous comments concerning teaching); John A. Scanlan, Call and Response: The Particular and the General, 2000 Univ. Illinois 639 (qualifying Johnson's thesis); see also Guadalupe T. Luna, "Zoo Island:" Latcrit Theory, "Don Pepe" and Señora Peralta, 19 Chicano-Latino L. Rev. 339 (1998) (arguing that the academy short-changes both Latino scholars and relevant law).

13. Compare the Grunwald essay with the writings that follow it. Which of the impressions that Grunwald relates concerning the immigrant experience do you think are universal? Which do you think are more personal?

14. Recall the debate, in section C above, on the merits of a multiethnic society. How might the accounts that you have just read affect the views of Brimelow? How might they affect the views of Johnson and Perea?

15. The attribution of “foreignness” to members of some ethnic groups but not others is one of the most powerful themes in much of the writing on this subject. See, e.g., Mae M. Ngai, Birthright Citizenship and the Alien Citizen, 75 Fordham L. Rev. 2521 (2007) (calling nonwhite citizens “alien citizens”). Test the thesis on yourself: When you encounter a person whom you do not know (and whom you have not heard speak), and the person has a Latino, Asian, or Arabic physical appearance, do you think you instinctively presume that he or she is “from somewhere else?” Suppose instead that the person is black. Or white. Would your instinctive presumption be the same? Does your answer depend on the geographic location, or on the person’s clothing, demeanor, facial expression, or other cultural signal, or would your answer be the same even in the absence of additional evidence? Your own reaction aside, what do you think accounts for the widespread presumption of foreignness for Latinos, Asians, and Arabs, but not for African-Americans or whites?

16. Most of the essays you just read rely at least partly on stories. Are these stories useful, either to members of the public or to policymakers?

17. In 1993, one author offered this prediction: “In the United States, immigration policy will become the civil rights issue of the 21st century.” Stephen H. Legomsky, Immigration, Equality and Diversity, 31 Columbia J. Transnat’l Law 319, 320 (1993) (emphasis in original); see also Stephen H. Legomsky, Immigrants, Minorities, and Pluralism: What Kind of Society Do We Really Want?, 6 Willamette J. Internat’l Law & Dispute Resolution 153, 157–60 (1998) (renewing prediction and elaborating on why). Do you think we are there yet?

IMMIGRATION AND THE CONSTITUTION

This chapter examines the constitutional foundations of U.S. immigration law. As you will quickly discover, the normal rules of constitutional law simply do not apply.

Stephen H. Legomsky, Immigration and the Judiciary: Law and Politics in Britain and America

Pages 177-79 (1987).

When the United States Supreme Court decided Marbury v. Madison, it announced a principle that would define the shape of American constitutional law for centuries to come. Congress was not to have the last word on matters of constitutional interpretation. The Court possessed the power to review Congressional action for compliance with constitutional constraints.

* * *

Since Marbury, generations of American lawyers have come to regard constitutional review as a given. Most are unaware that there is a vast but discrete body of law that the Court has explicitly treated as an exception to the principle of constitutional review. The Congressional powers to exclude and to deport aliens have been held to be "plenary." When Congress exercises those powers, its decisions are final. "Over no conceivable subject," the Supreme Court has repeatedly said, "is the legislative power of Congress more complete." When regulating immigration, Congress may discriminate on the basis of race. It may discriminate on the bases of gender and legitimacy. It may restrict aliens' political speech without having to establish a clear and present danger. With some qualifications, Congress may disregard procedural due process when excluding aliens.

In each of these cases, the Court has held itself powerless to judge the constitutionality of Congressional acts. Its philosophy has been enshrined in an unbroken line of decisions that began in the late nineteenth century and that continue to the present day. Those decisions spawn a natural question: Why have federal immigration statutes been singled out for special judicial restraint?

To answer that question, it is necessary to examine the historical development of the doctrine that Congress's power over immigration is plenary. In the process, I * * * offer an argument that the plenary power doctrine evolved partly through misplaced reliance on decisions supporting propositions of much greater modesty. More specifically, it will be argued that there has been a logical leap from cases concerned only with federalism to those that implicate individual rights.

To make this argument, I shall divide the historical evolution of the plenary power doctrine into five stages. In stage I the Supreme Court struck down attempts by individual states to exclude aliens. It did so on the ground that the Constitution entrusted the subject matter exclusively to the federal government. In stage II the Court relied on the stage I cases to uphold the federal exclusion statute as a valid exercise of the constitutionally enumerated Congressional power to regulate international commerce. The federal power to exclude aliens took on a new dimension in stage III. Relying on the principles formed in the first two stages, the Court again upheld the exclusion power, but this time on the basis that it was inherent in the sovereignty of every nation, and therefore not dependent on any explicit constitutional grant. All three stages involved the allocation of power between the federal government and the states.

In stage IV, the Supreme Court adopted the plenary power doctrine. Relying on the stage III principle, it held that, when Congress exercises its exclusion power, the Judiciary is barred from reviewing the statute for compliance with the constitutional provisions that protect individual rights. Stage V, building on the previous stages, is the snowballing phase that has continued through today. During this period the Supreme Court has extended the plenary power doctrine in several respects and has hardened it with protective layers of additional precedent. At the same time, the Court has qualified the doctrine in various ways. * * *

[At this point the author explores the development of the plenary power doctrine in detail through its five stages.]

The above writing laid out the historical evolution of the plenary power doctrine and argued that it sprang from a flawed reading of the Supreme Court's own precedents. A companion article, Stephen H. Legomsky, Immigration Law and the Principle of Plenary Congressional Power, 1984 Supreme Court Rev. 255, had introduced the term "plenary power doctrine," id. at 255, and had identified and critiqued seven policy rationales that the Court had offered for the doctrine over time. Those rationales included the notions that the constitutionality of an immigration statute is a political question because foreign affairs are implicated; that the noncitizen is a mere "guest" rather than a full member of society, and thus his or her presence is merely a privilege rather than a right; that constitutional protection would give noncitizens an unfair advantage, since they already enjoy certain protections in international law; that noncitizens lack the allegiance essential to constitutional protection; that the inherent sovereign source of Congress's power to regulate immigration insulates the exercise of that power from constitutional review; that the Constitution is inapplicable in exclusion cases because a noncitizen seeking admission is legally outside the United States; and that the deportation of certain noncitizens is a kind of “poetic justice” for U.S. citizens who had been sent abroad to fight Communism. Id. at 260–78.¹ Watch for most of these proffered justifications as you read the materials throughout this chapter.

Section I explores the constitutional sources of the federal power to regulate immigration. Section II then takes up the constitutional limitations on that power.

A. SOURCES OF THE FEDERAL IMMIGRATION POWER

The federal government has actively regulated immigration for more than a century. The current Immigration and Nationality Act, amended frequently since its enactment in 1952, is now hundreds of pages long. In minute detail, it specifies which noncitizens may enter the United States and which of those already here may stay. Its many provisions, together with hundreds of pages of administrative regulations, spell out the procedures by which those and other determinations are to be made.

1. That article was updated in Stephen H. Legomsky, Ten More Years of Plenary Power: Immigration, Congress, and the Courts, 22 Hastings Const. L.Q. 925 (1995). See also the groundbreaking article by Peter H. Schuck, The Transformation of Immigration Law, 84 Columbia L. Rev. 1 (1984), which situated the entire body of immigration law in the shifting political movements, legal theories, and social mores of the preceding century. In addition to these foundational writings, a number of later writings elaborate on specific aspects of the congressional immigration power and the role of judicial review. See, e.g., T. Alexander Aleinikoff, Semblances of Sovereignty—The Constitution, the State, and American Citizenship (2002); Adam B. Cox, Immigration Law’s Organizing Principles, 157 Univ. Penn. L. Rev. 1101 (2008); Gerald L. Neuman, Strangers to the Constitution—Immigrants, Borders, and Fundamental Law (1996); Victor C. Romero, Alienated—Immigrant Rights, the Constitution, and Equality in America (2005); Linda Kelly, Preserving the Fundamental Right to Family Unity: Championing Notions of Social Contract and Community Ties in the Battle of Plenary Power versus Aliens’ Rights, 41 Villanova L. Rev. 725 (1996); Robert Pauw, Plenary Power: An Outmoded Doctrine that Should Not Limit IIRIRA Reform, 51 Emory L.J. 1095 (2002); Frank H. Wu, The Future of the American Mosaic: Issues in American Immigration Reform, 7 Stan.L. & Policy Rev. 35

(1996). Some fine articles by other authors—Professors Aleinikoff, Hart, Henkin, Hesse, Johnson, Motomura, Nafziger, Neuman, Scanlan, and Scaperlanda—are cited in 22 Hastings Const.L.Q. at 927 n.9, 929–30 nn.26–31.

Several other commentators have examined the relationship between judicial review of what could be termed “pure immigration” laws (those that govern the admission and expulsion of noncitizens) and judicial review of other laws that treat citizens differently from noncitizens (for example, laws that regulate professional licenses, welfare, or medical coverage). Three excellent articles along those lines include Linda S. Bosniak, Membership, Equality, and the Difference that Alienage Makes, 69 NYU L.Rev. 1047 (1994); Michael Scaperlanda, Partial Membership: Aliens and the Constitutional Community, 81 Iowa L.Rev. 707 (1996); and Margaret H. Taylor, Detained Aliens Challenging Conditions of Confinement and the Porous Borders of the Plenary Power Doctrine, 22 Hastings Const. L.Q. 1087 (1995). Cf. Raquel Aldana, On Rights, Federal Citizenship, and the “Alien,” 46 Washburn L.J. 263 (2007) (criticizing the use of plenary power principles within the U.S. borders, particularly with respect to state and local actions that target undocumented immigrants).

But before we can examine the specific workings of the present statutory scheme, we need to solve a larger mystery. The problem is easy enough to state: The federal government of the United States generally possesses only those powers that are either enumerated in the Constitution or “necessary and proper” for executing the enumerated powers. And nowhere does the Constitution expressly authorize the federal government to regulate immigration. Does this mean our whole elaborate system of immigration control is unconstitutional? Is it possible that Congress has no power to exclude or to deport noncitizens?

Most people today would instinctively resist such conclusions. To accept them would require one to believe that the framers intended either (a) to mandate open borders or (b) to vest in the individual states the exclusive power to regulate immigration.²

If you are uneasy about concluding that all our immigration laws are unconstitutional, then the question becomes: Where, exactly, does the federal government get the power to regulate immigration? The Supreme Court has struggled with this problem since the mid-nineteenth century, and no single dispositive answer has ever emerged. There are, however, several arguable answers.

1. THE ENUMERATED POWERS

a. THE COMMERCE CLAUSE

Congress may “regulate commerce with foreign nations.” U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 3. But is immigration really a regulation of commerce? Two distinct theories might be offered:

The traditional theory emerged in a series of nineteenth century Supreme Court decisions invalidating state attempts to regulate immigration. When New York and Massachusetts imposed head taxes on certain categories of arriving noncitizen passengers, the Court had to decide whether these state actions infringed any exclusively federal power. In the Passenger Cases, 48 U.S. (7 How.) 283, 12 L.Ed. 702 (1849), the Court voted 5–4 to strike down both statutes. No single rationale commanded a majority, but four Justices regarded these actions as usurpations of the federal power to regulate commerce with foreign nations.

Can people be objects of commerce? The four dissenters believed they could not. One of them was Justice Woodbury:

[I]f to “regulate commerce” extends also to the regulation of mere navigation, and hence to the business of carrying passengers, in which it may be employed, it is confined to a forfeiture of the vessel, and does not legitimately involve a prohibition of persons, except when articles of commerce, like slaves.

2. As for option (b), see the informative article by Gerald L. Neuman, The Lost Century of American Immigration Law (1776–1875), 93 Columbia L.Rev. 1833 (1993).

48 U.S. (7 How.) at 541, 12 L.Ed. at 810. Similar reservations were expressed by Chief Justice Taney, id. at 481, 12 L.Ed. at 785, and by Justices Daniel, id. at 501-06, 12 L.Ed. at 793-95, and Nelson, id. at 518, 12 L.Ed. at 801 (agreeing with Taney, C.J.).

In Henderson v. Mayor of New York, 92 U.S. (2 Otto) 259, 23 L.Ed. 543 (1876), the Supreme Court struck down a state statute requiring the master of a vessel to choose between paying taxes on arriving noncitizen passengers or posting bonds. This time the Court was unanimous:

* * * As was said in United States v. Holliday, "Commerce with foreign nations means commerce between citizens of the United States and citizens or subjects of foreign governments." It means trade, and it means intercourse. It means commercial intercourse between nations, and parts of nations, in all its branches. It includes navigation, as the principal means by which foreign intercourse is effected. To regulate this trade and intercourse is to prescribe the rules by which it shall be conducted.

* * *

* * * [T]he transportation of passengers from European ports to those of the United States has attained a magnitude and importance far beyond its proportion at that time to other branches of commerce. It has become a part of our commerce with foreign nations, of vast interest to this country, as well as to the immigrants who come among us to find a welcome and a home within our borders. In addition to the wealth which some of them bring, they bring still more largely the labor which we need to till our soil, build our railroads, and develop the latent resources of the country in its minerals, its manufacturers, and its agriculture. Is the regulation of this great system a regulation of commerce? Can it be doubted that a law which prescribes the terms on which vessels shall engage in it is a law regulating this branch of commerce?

Id. at 270-71, 23 L.Ed. at 548-49.

In the Head Money Cases, 112 U.S. 580, 5 S.Ct. 247, 28 L.Ed. 798 (1884), the Court for the first time considered the constitutionality of a federal statute that regulated immigration.³ The Court unanimously upheld the statute as a valid exercise of the congressional power to regulate commerce with other nations. Cf. Edwards v. California, 314 U.S. 160, 172, 62 S.Ct. 164, 166, 86 L.Ed. 119, 124 (1941) (transportation of persons is commerce for purposes of interstate commerce clause).

Are you now persuaded that the movement of human beings across national boundaries is itself commerce? If not, here is a second theory for connecting immigration to the commerce clause: The Supreme Court has

3. That the Supreme Court had never before decided whether Congress could constitutionally regulate immigration might seem surprising at first. Except for the short-lived Alien Act of 1798, however, Congress left the borders open until 1875. See pp. 120-21 below.

held that the interstate commerce clause permits Congress to regulate activities “substantially affecting” interstate commerce—even when the effects are “indirect.” See, e.g., Wickard v. Filburn, 317 U.S. 111, 63 S.Ct. 82, 87 L.Ed. 122 (1942). Moreover, it is enough that the effects are substantial when combined with those of many other similar activities. Id. The economic effects of large-scale immigration on both interstate and international commerce are complex and controversial, but few today would deny they are substantial.

From these observations, either of two sub-arguments for an “affecting commerce” theory could be advanced: Immigration affects interstate commerce; or the “affecting commerce” principle extends to the international branch of the commerce clause, and immigration affects international commerce.

b. THE MIGRATION OR IMPORTATION CLAUSE

Under Article I, § 9, cl. 1 of the Constitution,

The Migration or Importation of such Persons as any of the States now existing shall think proper to permit, shall not be prohibited by the Congress prior to the year one thousand eight hundred and eight. * * *

The implication appears to be that Congress may prohibit (and, a fortiori, restrict) migration and importation after 1808. But the Justices in the Passenger Cases differed over whether this power is even relevant to immigration. Historical sources make clear that the central concern was with the slave trade. Does that mean the provision is inapplicable to the migration of free persons? For sharply contrasting views of the historical data, compare the opinion of Justice McKinley, 48 U.S. (7 How.) at 452–54, 12 L.Ed. at 773–74, with those of Chief Justice Taney, id. at 474–78, 12 L.Ed. at 782–83, and Justices Daniel, id. at 511–14, 12 L.Ed. at 798–99, and Woodbury, id. at 540–41, 12 L.Ed. at 810–12. See also Walter Berns, The Constitution and the Migration of Slaves, 78 Yale L.J. 198 (1968).

c. THE NATURALIZATION CLAUSE

Article I, § 8, cl. 4 authorizes Congress “[t]o establish an uniform Rule of Naturalization.” To be sure, admission and expulsion, which concern the physical movement of noncitizens into and out of the United States, differ from naturalization, which concerns membership in the nation’s political community. Chapter 13 will examine the legal and political significance of citizenship; for now, it is enough to note that immigration and naturalization are not synonymous. They describe different processes and promote different policies. Still, could immigration control be brought within the naturalization clause, with a little help from the “necessary and proper” clause? Chief Justice Taney, dissenting in the Passenger Cases, raised and rejected this possibility:

* * * [C]itizens of each State are entitled to the privileges and immunities of citizens in the several States * * * [A]s every citizen of a State is also a citizen of the United States, a single State, without [the naturalization clause], might have given to any number of foreigners it pleased the right to all the privileges of citizenship in commerce, trade, and navigation, although they did not even reside amongst us.

The nature of our institutions under the Federal government made it a matter of absolute necessity that this power should be confided to the government of the Union, where all the States were represented, and where all had a voice. * * * The article has nothing to do with the admission or rejection of aliens, nor with immigration, but with the rights of citizenship. * * *

48 U.S. (7 How.) at 482–83, 12 L.Ed. at 786.

In exercising its power to prescribe “an uniform rule of naturalization,” Congress made lawful admission as a permanent resident a prerequisite to naturalization. INA § 316. Having made that decision, may Congress go on to specify the conditions for admission of permanent residents as necessary and proper for prescribing naturalization requirements? How would Chief Justice Taney have answered that question?

d. THE WAR CLAUSE

Congress has the power “[t]o declare war.” U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 11. Justice Daniel, dissenting in the Passenger Cases, conceded that this provision authorizes Congress to regulate “alien enemies”—i.e., nationals of countries with which the United States is at war. But he doubted that the war clause could be stretched far enough to cover regulation of other noncitizens (known as “alien friends”). 48 U.S. (7 How.) at 509–10, 12 L.Ed. at 797. Do you agree? Is there any way in which regulating the immigration of “alien friends” could be justified as necessary and proper for deciding whether to declare war? Could the war power, for example, be interpreted as encompassing a power to prevent war? If it can, is regulation of immigration sufficiently connected to the prevention of war?

2. IMPLIED CONSTITUTIONAL POWERS

The previous subsection considered only those powers expressly enumerated in the Constitution (or necessary and proper for executing the enumerated powers). Might the Constitution be read, however, as creating a federal immigration power by general implication? To answer that question, we begin with the granddaddy of all immigration cases—an early decision that continues to influence the law today. To place that opinion in context, however, one must appreciate that it and several other important subsequent opinions were written during a period of intense racial turmoil on the West Coast:

The conflict had been in the making since 1848 when the gold rush had begun. That rush was on in 1850 when California was admitted to the Union as a free state. That same year the Taiping Rebellion broke out in China—it raged for fourteen years. During this period California continued to grow in population and develop as an American community. Orchards needed to be pruned and the fruit picked. Farms needed to be worked. Mines had to be operated. Highways and railroads needed to be built. Clothes had to be washed. Furniture and shoes had to be made. A source of “inexpensive” labor was of the essence. The answer? The Chinese from a war-torn China.

In 1869, * * * the great transcontinental railroad linking the eastern United States with the West Coast was finished. Now the whole of California began to be heavily populated with people from all over the United States—and a post-Civil War depression was beginning to creep with cat-feet upon the entire nation. Chinese labor became a glut on the California market. At least so said organized labor, which was by then beginning to flex its political muscle throughout the nation. By 1869 it was a foregone conclusion that the Chinese had to go. * * *

Thirteen years later, in 1882, the conflict over Chinese immigration that had been building up on the West Coast since the end of the Civil War exploded into congressional action. The Chinese were abruptly excluded from immigrating into the United States.
* * *

Frank F. Chuman, The Bamboo People 3–4 (1976). See also the literature on analogous modern attitudes toward both Asian immigrants and Asian-Americans, discussed on pages 94–100 above.

Chae Chan Ping v. United States (The Chinese Exclusion Case)

Supreme Court of the United States, 1889.
130 U.S. 581, 9 S.Ct. 623, 32 L.Ed. 1068.

■ MR. JUSTICE FIELD delivered the opinion of the court.

[Chae Chan Ping, a Chinese laborer, immigrated to the United States in 1875. As noted above, Congress in 1882 suspended all future immigration of Chinese laborers. The statute provided, however, that those who had been living in the United States since 1880 were free to leave and return. To implement the proviso, the statute authorized the issuance of certificates to departing Chinese laborers, evidencing their rights to return. Chae Chan Ping obtained such a certificate and then left in 1887 for a visit to China. While he was on his return voyage in 1888, Congress passed a law that discontinued the certificate program and prohibited the return of even those Chinese laborers who had already received certificates. Chae Chan Ping arrived in the United States one week after passage of the statute and was excluded.

He attacked the validity of the 1888 Act on two grounds—that it violated an 1880 treaty between the United States and China, and that it violated the Constitution. The Court acknowledged that the statute conflicted with the treaty but held that statutes and treaties were on equal footing and that the statute, being later in time, would prevail. The Court then turned to the constitutional question:]

There being nothing in the treaties between China and the United States to impair the validity of the act of Congress of October 1, 1888, was it on any other ground beyond the competency of Congress to pass it? If so, it must be because it was not within the power of Congress to prohibit Chinese laborers who had at the time departed from the United States, or should subsequently depart, from returning to the United States. Those laborers are not citizens of the United States; they are aliens. That the government of the United States, through the action of the legislative department, can exclude aliens from its territory is a proposition which we do not think open to controversy. Jurisdiction over its own territory to that extent is an incident of every independent nation. It is a part of its independence. If it could not exclude aliens it would be to that extent subject to the control of another power. As said by this court in the case of The Exchange, 7 Cranch, 116, 136, speaking by Chief Justice Marshall: "The jurisdiction of the nation within its own territory is necessarily exclusive and absolute. It is susceptible of no limitation not imposed by itself. Any restriction upon it, deriving validity from an external source, would imply a diminution of its sovereignty to the extent of the restriction, and an investment of that sovereignty to the same extent in that power which could impose such restriction. All exceptions, therefore, to the full and complete power of a nation within its own territories, must be traced up to the consent of the nation itself. They can flow from no other legitimate source."

While under our Constitution and form of government the great mass of local matters is controlled by local authorities, the United States, in their relation to foreign countries and their subjects or citizens are one nation, invested with powers which belong to independent nations, the exercise of which can be invoked for the maintenance of its absolute independence and security throughout its entire territory. The powers to declare war, make treaties, suppress insurrection, repel invasion, regulate foreign commerce, secure republican governments to the States, and admit subjects of other nations to citizenship, are all sovereign powers, restricted in their exercise only by the Constitution itself and considerations of public policy and justice which control, more or less, the conduct of all civilized nations. As said by this court in the case of Cohens v. Virginia, speaking by the same great Chief Justice: "That the United States form, for many, and for most important purposes, a single nation, has not yet been denied. In war, we are one people. In making peace we are one people. In all commercial regulations, we are one and the same people. In many other respects, the American people are one; and the government which is alone capable of controlling and managing their interests in all these respects, is the government of the Union." * * *

* * *

To preserve its independence, and give security against foreign aggression and encroachment, is the highest duty of every nation, and to attain these ends nearly all other considerations are to be subordinated. It matters not in what form such aggression and encroachment come, whether from the foreign nation acting in its national character or from vast hordes of its people crowding in upon us. The government, possessing the powers which are to be exercised for protection and security, is clothed with authority to determine the occasion on which the powers shall be called forth; and its determination, so far as the subjects affected are concerned, are necessarily conclusive upon all its departments and officers. If, therefore, the government of the United States, through its legislative department, considers the presence of foreigners of a different race in this country, who will not assimilate with us, to be dangerous to its peace and security, their exclusion is not to be stayed because at the time there are no actual hostilities with the nation of which the foreigners are subjects. The existence of war would render the necessity of the proceeding only more obvious and pressing. The same necessity, in a less pressing degree, may arise when war does not exist, and the same authority which adjudges the necessity in one case must also determine it in the other. In both cases its determination is conclusive upon the judiciary. If the government of the country of which the foreigners excluded are subjects is dissatisfied with this action it can make complaint to the executive head of our government, or resort to any other measure which, in its judgment, its interests or dignity may demand; and there lies its only remedy.

The power of the government to exclude foreigners from the country whenever, in its judgment, the public interests require such exclusion, has been asserted in repeated instances, and never denied by the executive or legislative departments.

[The Court here cites letters from various United States Secretaries of State asserting the power of every sovereign nation to exclude noncitizens.]

* * *

The power of exclusion of foreigners being an incident of sovereignty belonging to the government of the United States, as a part of those sovereign powers delegated by the Constitution, the right to its exercise at any time when, in the judgment of the government, the interests of the country require it, cannot be granted away or restrained on behalf of any one. The powers of government are delegated in trust to the United States, and are incapable of transfer to any other parties. They cannot be abandoned or surrendered. Nor can their exercise be hampered, when needed for the public good, by any considerations of private interest. The exercise of these public trusts is not the subject of barter or contract. Whatever license, therefore, Chinese laborers may have obtained, previous to the act of October 1, 1888, to return to the United States after their departure, is held at the will of the government, revocable at any time, at its pleasure. Whether a proper consideration by our government of its previous laws, or a proper respect for the nation whose subjects are affected by its action, ought to have qualified its inhibition and made it applicable only to persons departing from the country after the passage of the act, are not questions for judicial determination. If there be any just ground of complaint on the part of China, it must be made to the political department of our government, which is alone competent to act upon the subject.

* * *

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. Precisely what constitutional provision(s) does Chae Chan Ping say Congress has violated?

2. The Court in the Chinese Exclusion Case sees the federal power to exclude noncitizens as inherent in the very notion of a sovereign State. "If it could not exclude aliens," the Court says in the first paragraph of the edited opinion, "it would be to that extent subject to the control of another power." Read that and the surrounding sentences carefully. What is the antecedent of the word "it"—the nation or the Congress? With that distinction in mind, how might Chae Chan Ping have responded?

3. In any event, the inherent sovereign power that the Court discovers was assumed to be "delegated by the Constitution." (See the last reproduced paragraph of the Court's opinion.) Where does the Constitution delegate "sovereign" powers? Moreover, what makes the regulation of immigration "sovereign?"

4. At several points in its opinion, the Court assumes that the Constitution delegates to the federal government a general power to regulate foreign affairs. Federal control of foreign relations seems sensible as a matter of policy, but the constitutional basis for a general federal foreign affairs power has proved illusory. It is of course possible to maintain that the Constitution as a whole reflects an intent to endow the federal government with those powers the exercise of which affects the nation as a whole, and then to argue that foreign policy decisions fit that description. It is more difficult to locate specific constitutional language that creates a general federal power over foreign relations. One commentator describes the dilemma:

* * * [W]here foreign relations are concerned the Constitution seems a strange, laconic document: although it explicitly lodges important foreign affairs powers in one branch or another of the federal government, and denies important powers to the States, many others are not mentioned.

* * *

Congress is given power to regulate commerce with foreign nations, to define offenses against the law of nations, to declare war, and the President the power to make treaties and send and receive ambassadors, but these hardly add up to the power to conduct foreign relations. Where is the power to recognize other states or governments, to maintain or break diplomatic relations, to open consulates elsewhere and permit them here, to acquire or cede territory, to give or withhold foreign aid, to proclaim a Monroe Doctrine or an Open-Door Policy, indeed to determine all the attitudes and carry out all the details in the myriads of relationships with other nations that are “the foreign policy” and “the foreign relations” of the United States? The power to make treaties is granted, but where is the power to break, denounce, or terminate them? The power to declare war is there, but where is the power to make peace, to proclaim neutrality in the wars of others, to recognize or deny rights to belligerents or insurgents? Congress can punish violations of international law but where is the power to assert rights or to carry out obligations under international law, to make new international law or to disregard or violate law? Congress can regulate foreign commerce but where is the power to make other laws relating to our foreign relations—to regulate immigration, or the status and rights of aliens, or activities of citizens at home or abroad affecting our foreign relations? These “missing” powers, and a host of others, were clearly intended for and have always been exercised by the federal government, but where does the Constitution say that it shall be so?

* * *

The attempt to build all the foreign affairs powers of the federal government with the few bricks provided by the Constitution has not been accepted as successful. It requires considerable stretching of language, much reading between lines, and bold extrapolation from “the Constitution as a whole,” and that still does not plausibly add up to all the power which the federal government in fact exercises.

Louis Henkin, Foreign Affairs and the Constitution 16-18 (1972).

Do you agree with Professor Henkin’s conclusion that the specific constitutional “bricks” do not add up to a general foreign affairs power? Could all peaceful overtures to foreign countries (recognizing them, maintaining diplomatic relations, opening and permitting consulates, etc.) be viewed as necessary and proper for conducting commerce? And could all belligerent actions (breaking diplomatic relations, proclaiming a Monroe Doctrine, etc.) be considered necessary and proper for deciding whether to declare war? Or does that constitute “stretching of language, much reading between lines, and bold extrapolation from ‘the Constitution as a whole’ ”?

5. If the federal government does possess a general power to conduct foreign policy, is it axiomatic that immigration decisions are inherently foreign policy? See Stephen H. Legomsky, Immigration Law and the Principle of Plenary Congressional Power, 1984 Supreme Court Rev. 255, 261-69 (arguing no). Notice how the Court in the Chinese Exclusion Case connects immigration to foreign affairs: “It matters not in what form [foreign] aggression and encroachment come, whether from the foreign nation acting in its national character or from vast hordes of its people crowding in upon us.”⁴ What, exactly, are the links between immigration and foreign relations?

6. Structural theories. A related set of theories can be used to extract a federal immigration power from the overall structure of the Constitution. In a sense, the foreign affairs theory already discussed could be described as structural: The structure of the Constitution arguably suggests a general power to conduct foreign affairs, and immigration is just one specific aspect of that power. But is it possible to infer a federal immigration power from the constitutional structure without having to rely on both the existence of a general federal power to make foreign policy and the characterization of immigration as a component of foreign policy?

Professors T. Alexander Aleinikoff and David Martin have offered two such theories: (a) The overall constitutional structure reveals an intent to place the federal government of the United States on an equal footing with the central governments of other nations, and the latter have the power to exclude noncitizens; and (b) The framers must have intended to authorize the federal government to define who we are as a people. See T. Alexander Aleinikoff & David A. Martin, Immigration: Process and Policy 16–18 (1st ed. 1985).

All of these arguments elicit structure from the fundamental purposes of the Constitution. Structure can also be distilled from the interaction of specific provisions. Justice Douglas, writing the opinion of the Court in Griswold v. Connecticut, 381 U.S. 479, 85 S.Ct. 1678, 14 L.Ed.2d 510 (1965), found in various constitutional clauses a purpose to protect individual privacy. This recurring pattern suggested to him a “penumbral” privacy right that went beyond the specific protections set forth in the constitutional text. Can an analogous argument be constructed for a federal power over immigration? Justice Field in the Chinese Exclusion Case listed “[t]he [federal] powers to declare war, make treaties, suppress insurrection, repel invasion, regulate foreign commerce, secure republican governments to the States, and admit subjects of other nations to citizenship” as examples of “sovereign” powers. Does the pattern he has identified suggest a general federal power to perform “sovereign” functions? If so, how does one tell whether a given function or power is “sovereign?” Does regulating immigration qualify?

7. Obviousness theory. One last constitutional theory is that the framers declined to specify a federal power to exclude aliens because they believed such a power was too obvious to require mention. In evaluating this and the previous theories, consider the following discussion:

4. The links between immigration and foreign affairs are also relevant to the scope of judicial review in cases in which federal immigration statutes are challenged on individual rights grounds. We shall return briefly to that subject in Section B below.

Stephen H. Legomsky, Immigration and the Judiciary: Law and Politics in Britain and America

Pages 187–90 (1987).

Both in colonial times and in the early years of the new republic, the general practice was to encourage immigration. There were wide open spaces that required development; labour was in short supply; and settlers were needed to defend the frontiers against hostile forces. The demand for immigrants was evidenced by numerous practices. In many cases, colonists would pay transportation costs in order to obtain indentured servants. Colonial legislatures offered a variety of inducements, including land grants, cash bounties to defray shipping fares, tax exemptions, immunity from actions for debt, and liberal naturalization rules. Demand was so great that it became common to kidnap English children and sell them into slavery in the colonies. The colonists' desire for new settlers was evidenced by the Declaration of Independence, which complained that the King had hampered immigration to the Colonies.

All this is not to imply that immigrants were unreservedly welcomed. Many of the early Americans had serious misgivings about immigration. Several colonial leaders, including Franklin and Jefferson, urged restrictions. A number of colonial legislatures passed laws to discourage specified classes of immigrants—commonly paupers, criminals, and members of unpopular religious sects.

It seems likely, therefore, that the framers did not intend to foreclose the possibility of restricting immigration. There remains, however, the question of whether they meant to vest such a power in the federal government or the states. On the one hand, as observed in the Supreme Court decisions discussed thus far, the need for uniformity is a strong policy reason for federal control. But contrary policy arguments have also been advanced. One nineteenth-century state immigration official conceded that the federal government is properly empowered to enter treaties governing passage of immigrants on the high seas, but argued that, once the immigrant lands, the matter is solely one of state concern. His position was that the disproportionate effects of immigration on certain states should entitle those states to make policy unilaterally.

A look at the actual positions taken by early legislatures and colonial leaders is equally inconclusive. The Alien Act of 1798, which permitted the President to deport dangerous aliens, might be thought to evidence a contemporary view that the framers intended to create a federal power over immigration. For several reasons, however, that evidence is weak. The statute was an unusual act, passed because peace with England had not yet been fully achieved in all respects. The statute was highly unpopular, and thus was not renewed when it expired two years later. Several colonial leaders in fact believed the Act was unconstitutional as being outside the enumerated powers, but the courts were unable to address the question because no person was ever deported under this Act. Not until the Chinese Exclusion Act did Congress ever again even claim the power of deportation.

For all those reasons the Alien Act of 1798 should be viewed as an aberration, providing little insight into the framers' views on federal immigration control.

There were, in fact, several indicators that immigration control was thought to be a matter for state legislatures. In 1787, Franklin urged the states to pass laws stemming the influx of European criminals. A year later, on the eve of Constitutional ratification, the Continental Congress passed a resolution urging the states to pass legislation excluding aliens convicted of crimes. This pre-Constitution evidence is reinforced by the positive responses of several states, in some cases after ratification of the Constitution. State laws containing these and other restrictions became especially common through the first half of the nineteenth century. * * *

Thus, early attitudes and actions concerning immigration reveal ambivalence. General immigration was encouraged, but certain specific classes of immigrants were discouraged. As to whether exclusion of the latter was intended to be a matter for the federal government or the states, the evidence is mixed. It seems unlikely, therefore, that the framers omitted an express federal power to exclude aliens out of a belief that the existence of such a power was too obvious to require mention. That four of the nine Supreme Court Justices in the Passenger Cases were unwilling to recognise a federal power to exclude aliens accentuates the difficulty of ascribing the omission to obviousness.

* * *

NOTE ON THE PUBLIC REACTION TO ASIAN IMMIGRATION

You might have found it striking that, in its opinion in the Chinese Exclusion Case, the Supreme Court so easily credited supposed justifications for Congress seeing danger in "the presence of foreigners of a different race." Before reading the opinion, you saw a capsule summary of the events that preceded the 1882 Act. The abuse of the Chinese took other forms as well. Chinese immigrants increasingly became the subjects of verbal and physical attacks. The hostility was not confined to the private sector. One leading author describes some of the discriminatory actions taken by the state government of California and the federal government of the United States:

* * * It is clear enough now that California did not permit the Chinese immigrant to become assimilated: he was denied citizenship through naturalization; he was held ineligible to testify in any case in a court of law for or against a white person; he was subject to special heavy taxes; he could not vote; he was excluded from schools. He was made the scapegoat for mining and real estate booms and slumps; for crime waves requiring vigilance committees; for corruption, extravagance, and profligacy in state and city government; and for land and railway monopoly.

In view of the facts as we know them today, how did it happen that Congress passed acts discriminating against the Chinese? The following reasons may be suggested:

(1) There were very few Chinese persons outside the West Coast; the country as a whole was ignorant of the ways in which Chinese immigrants behaved; and congressmen and citizens generally thought that the California propagandists told the truth.

(2) China was not a great power; she did not threaten or shake a big stick. Her deferential inquiries and mildly-worded protests were considered signs of weakness.

(3) In national elections California was frequently, if not always, an uncertain state, so that each political party made an effort to win its support. "All but one of some eight anti-Chinese measures passed by Congress were passed on the eve of national elections and for avowed political purposes."

(4) * * * After 1876 the Negro problem and the Chinese question were linked when it came to voting in Congress on anti-Chinese measures: "Without exception, these measures were passed by the vote of representatives from the Pacific Coast and the Deep South." The South, it has been said, "was quite willing to join with the Pacific Coast in fitting the Chinese into a caste system which, in many respects, closely resembled that which prevailed throughout the former slave belt."

Milton R. Konvitz, The Alien and the Asiatic in American Law 10-12 (1946).

What influence, if any, do you think these contemporary social and political forces had on the disposition of the Chinese Exclusion Case? Justice Stephen Field wrote the opinion of the Court. Professor Konvitz, discussing Justice Field, noted: "It has been said that [before becoming a Supreme Court Justice] he had more to do with the passage of restrictive legislation than any other man. He is said to have written the plank of the Democratic national convention urging upon Congress the suppression of Chinese labor immigration. Much of this activity was engaged in by Field with an eye on the presidency." Konvitz, above, at 10 n. 29. Excerpts from Justice Field's dissenting opinion in Chew Heong v. United States, 112 U.S. 536, 560-78, 5 S.Ct. 255, 267-77, 28 L.Ed. 770, 779-85 (1884), written only five years before the Chinese Exclusion Case, leave little doubt where he stood:

But, notwithstanding * * * [our] opening the whole of our country to them * * *, they have remained among us a separate people, retaining their original peculiarities of dress, manners, habits, and modes of living, which are as marked as their complexion and language. They live by themselves; they constitute a distinct organization with the laws and customs which they brought from China. Our institutions have made no impression on them during the more than thirty years they have been in the country. * * * They do not and will not assimilate with our people; and their dying wish is that their bodies may be taken to China for burial.

Id. at 566–67, 5 S.Ct. at 270–71, 28 L.Ed. at 781. Justice Field concludes, in light of those and other factors, that * * * it is not surprising that there went up from the whole of the Pacific Coast an earnest appeal to Congress to restrain the further immigration of Chinese. * * * Thoughtful persons who were exempt from race prejudice saw * * * that * * * vast hordes would pour in upon us, overrunning our coast and controlling its institutions. A restriction was felt to be necessary to prevent the degradation of white labor, and to preserve to ourselves the inestimable benefits of our Christian civilization.

Id. at 568–69, 5 S.Ct. at 272, 28 L.Ed. at 781. See also the views of Justice Bradley, id. at 579, 5 S.Ct. at 277, 28 L.Ed. at 785 (“Chinese of the lower class have little respect for the solemnity of an oath.”), and even those of Justice Brewer, whose later dissent in Fong Yue Ting (which you will see presently) conceded that the statutes had been “directed only at the obnoxious Chinese,” whom he described as a “distasteful class.”

Was Justice Field in Chew Heong purporting to express his own views about Chinese immigration or merely his perception of popular sentiments (or both)? Either way, consider whether the opinion in the Chinese Exclusion Case was the product not only of pure “legal” analysis but also of external influences. Immigration cases are not, of course, the only ones capable of raising politically volatile issues. But they do seem to do so with unusual frequency. Is it legitimate for Supreme Court Justices to permit either their own values or their readings of popular preferences to affect their analyses of constitutional questions? Can they entirely avoid it?⁵

5. There is now a wealth of scholarly literature on the anti-Asian aspects of United States immigration history. In addition to the writings already cited, see, e.g., Andrew Gyory, Closing the Gate—Race, Politics, and the Chinese Exclusion Act (1998) (a political history of the Act); Bill Ong Hing, Making and Remaking Asian America through Immigration Policy, 1850–1990 (1993); Lucy Salyer, Laws Harsh as Tigers: Chinese Immigrants and the Shaping of Modern Immigration Law (1995); Ronald T. Takaki, Strangers from a Different Shore—A History of Asian Americans (1989), especially ch. 3; Jan C. Ting, “Other than a Chinaman”: How U.S. Immigration Law Resulted from and Still Reflects a Policy of Excluding and Restricting Asian Immigration, 4 Temple Pol. & Civil Rights L. Rev. 301, 301–10 (1995); cf. Richard P. Cole & Gabriel J. Chin, Emerging from the Margins of Historical Consciousness: Chinese Immigrants and the History of American Law, 17 Law & History Rev. 325 (1999) (highlighting the impact of Chinese immigrants on the early development of United States public law). A thoughtful article on the tendency of immigration inspectors to exclude unmarried Chinese immigrant women as prostitutes during this same period is Kerry Abrams, Polygamy, Prostitution, and the Federalization of Immigration Law, 105 Columbia L. Rev. 641 (2005). For writings that focus more on the present-day effects of anti-Asian sentiment, see pages 104–12 above.

3. BEYOND THE CONSTITUTION

Thus far, attention has focused on the Constitution as a potential source of federal power over immigration. Might there be sources beyond the Constitution? Justice Sutherland, writing the opinion of the Court in United States v. Curtiss-Wright Export Corp., 299 U.S. 304, 315–18, 57 S.Ct. 216, 219–20, 81 L.Ed. 255, 260–62 (1936), located an extra-constitutional federal power to manage external affairs. His reasoning can be summarized by the following syllogism:

a. During the colonial period, sovereignty rested with the British Crown.

b. Upon the Declaration of Independence, sovereignty passed from the Crown to the states in their collective capacity—not to the states in their individual capacities.

c. The only powers that the Constitution intended to reallocate were those that the states possessed in their individual capacities.

d. Therefore, even after ratification of the Constitution, all sovereign powers remained with the states in their collective capacity—that is, with the federal government.

e. Consequently, no federal sovereign power is dependent on an affirmative constitutional grant.

The Curtiss-Wright theory is controversial. Some have questioned the historical accuracy of assumptions b and c above.⁶ Professor Henkin has asked why, if the framers did not intend to reallocate “sovereign” powers, they expressly enumerated several powers clearly qualifying as “sovereign” (e.g., the powers to declare war and to make treaties) while declining to list others. Louis Henkin, Foreign Affairs and the Constitution 22–24 (1972).

Does Curtiss-Wright provide an extra-constitutional federal power to regulate immigration? How does one determine whether a given power is “sovereign?” Again, does immigration qualify?

4. RESIDUAL STATE POWER

Once it is found that the federal government may regulate immigration, and once that power is actually exercised, the resulting legislation can preempt concurrent regulation by the states. Whether preemption will be found will depend on the scope of both the federal action and the state action. See De Canas v. Bica, 424 U.S. 351, 96 S.Ct. 933, 47 L.Ed.2d 43 (1976) (upholding California statute prohibiting the employment of certain undocumented aliens).

But at the time of the Passenger Cases and Henderson, the federal government, whatever the breadth of its power, had not yet acted to regulate immigration. Why, then, could not the states do so? Two distinct tan, The Foreign Relations Power: An Analysis of Mr. Justice Sutherland's Theory, 55 Yale L.J. 467, 479–90 (1946).

6. See, e.g., Raoul Berger, The Presidential Monopoly of Foreign Relations, 71 Mich.L.Rev. 1, 26–33 (1972); David M. Levi-

reasons have been advanced. In Henderson, discussed earlier, the Court emphasized the need for uniform admission practices within the United States. It said: "The laws which govern the right to land passengers in the United States from other countries ought to be the same in New York, Boston, New Orleans, and San Francisco." 92 U.S. (2 Otto) at 273, 23 L.Ed. at 549. (Why?)

A second reason was supplied in Chy Lung v. Freeman, 92 U.S. (2 Otto) 275, 23 L.Ed. 550 (1876). If individual states could require masters of vessels to post bonds, then:

a silly, an obstinate, or a wicked [state] commissioner may bring disgrace upon the whole country, the enmity of a powerful nation, or the loss of an equally powerful friend. * * *

* * * The passage of laws which concern the admission of citizens and subjects of foreign nations to our shores belongs to Congress, and not to the States. * * * If it be otherwise, a single State can, at her pleasure, embroil us in disastrous quarrels with other nations.

92 U.S. (2 Otto) at 279–80, 23 L.Ed. at 552. In contrast, Canadian provinces have the power to regulate immigration within their territories as long as the restrictions are not "repugnant" to national law. See François Crépeau, When Recourses Fail to Protect: Canadian Human Rights Obligations and the Remedies Offered to Foreigners against Immigration Decisions, 7 European J. Migration & Law 275 (2005).

Can you articulate differences between the uniformity argument and the embroilment argument? Do you agree with either?

Despite the sentiments reflected in the above quotations, the scope of the state power is extremely unclear. In each of the three cited cases the state action had been the imposition of either a bond or a tax on all arriving immigrants. In each case the state action had been struck down. Does this mean a state may not directly exclude those immigrants who possess characteristics they consider undesirable? The above rhetoric would seem to imply that a state may not do so, but the dicta in these same opinions were surprisingly cautious on this point. In the Passenger Cases, at least two of the Justices who voted to invalidate the state statutes taxing arriving passengers suggested that a state could constitutionally exclude noncitizens who were found to be "lunatics, idiots, [etc.]" and who did not post security against becoming public charges. 48 U.S. (7 How.) at 410, 12 L.Ed. at 755 (McLean, J.), id. at 457, 12 L.Ed. at 775 (Grier, J). This state power was said to be a matter of "self-defense." Id. And the unanimous opinions in Henderson, 92 U.S. (2 Otto) at 275, 23 L.Ed. at 550, and Chy Lung, 92 U.S. (2 Otto) at 280, 23 L.Ed. at 552, expressly left open whether, in the absence of federal legislation, a state could constitutionally exclude classes of noncitizens. What is your reaction to these dicta?

Professor Huyen Pham has argued that constitutional federal exclusivity in the immigration sphere (not just statutory preemption) prohibits not only state and local lawmaking in immigration matters, but enforcement as well. See Huyen Pham, The Inherent Flaws in the Inherent Authority Position: Why Inviting Local Enforcement of Immigration Laws Violates the Constitution, 31 Florida State Univ. L. Rev. 965 (2004). This argument has important contemporary potential as the federal government enlists the cooperation of state officials in resisting both illegal immigration and terrorism, as discussed in chapter 12. Several other scholars disagree.⁷

If the power to regulate “immigration” is exclusively federal, then it becomes critical to ascertain what constitutes immigration regulation, as distinguished from other regulation of noncitizens. One author argues effectively for a broad definition that would deny states the power to decide which noncitizens may receive state welfare assistance. See Michael J. Wishnie, Laboratories of Bigotry? Devolution of the Immigration Power, Equal Protection, and Federalism, 76 NYU L. Rev. 493 (2001).

We shall return to the subject of state and local regulation of noncitizens later. In recent years, states and municipalities have asserted dramatically broader authority to address illegal immigration. Those efforts and their constitutionality are taken up in chapter 12 below. Chapter 13 will consider both state and federal actions that treat LPRs differently from United States citizens.

B. LIMITS TO THE FEDERAL IMMIGRATION POWER

Despite continuing uncertainty about the precise source of the federal immigration power, it is settled law today that the power exists. But what are the constitutional limits to that congressional power? And how much power do courts have to pronounce those limits? Could Congress constitutionally exclude all noncitizens of Mexican ancestry? Could it exclude all noncitizens who are atheists? What about procedure? Could Congress authorize immigration officers to deny excluded noncitizens the opportunity to be heard? Do the answers to any of those questions change if, instead of exclusion, the context is deportation? And if any of these congressional actions would be unconstitutional, is it free from doubt that a court would have the power to say so? Think about these questions as you analyze the cases that follow.

Before you read the cases, though, an explanation of the terminology is necessary. From here on, you will sometimes encounter cases that draw sharp distinctions between “exclusion” and “deportation.” Until 1996, the various immigration statutes recognized a similar distinction; the government might “exclude” a noncitizen who sought to enter, and might

7. E.g., Clare Huntington, The Constitutional Dimension of Immigration Federalism, 61 Vanderbilt L. Rev. 787 (2008); Cristina M. Rodríguez, The Significance of the Local in Immigration Regulation, 106 Michigan L. Rev. 567 (2008); Peter H. Schuck, Taking Immigration Federalism Seriously, 2007 Univ. of Chicago Legal Forum 57; Peter J. Spiro, The States and Immigration in an Era of Demi-Sovereignities, 35 Virginia J. Internat'l L. 121 (1994); Peter J. Spiro, Learning to Live with Immigration Federalism, 29 Connecticut L. Rev. 1627 (1997).

“deport” a noncitizen who had already entered and wished to remain. IIRIRA abolished that terminology. Since 1996, the name of the proceeding in which both kinds of determinations are made is a “removal” proceeding. There are still separate grounds of “inadmissibility” and “deportability” for those who seek admission and those who have already been admitted, respectively. The significance of these statutory distinctions will be explored in several future chapters.

At this writing, however, there is no reason to believe that the 1996 changes to the statutory terminology will alter the lines that the courts have drawn for constitutional purposes. If the Constitution allows Congress to do some things and not others, Congress’s decision to change the terminology should not alter the constitutional parameters that the courts have established. For constitutional purposes, therefore, it will often be convenient in this book to use the words “exclusion” and “deportation” as the courts have used them—to distinguish the act of denying admission at a port of entry from the act of expelling individuals from the interior.

1. THE FOUNDATION CASES

The Chinese Exclusion Case appeared to address only the question whether Congress had the power to exclude noncitizens (or, possibly, the narrower question whether Congress had the power to exclude a particular class of noncitizens). The opinion did not consider the individual rights limitations that might attend the exercise of that power—due process, the First Amendment, etc. Yet the Court’s language was quite sweeping. You should re-read now the last three printed paragraphs of the opinion. When you do, you will see statements that Congress’s decisions are “conclusive upon the judiciary,” or “not questions for judicial determination.”

Read in context, what do these phrases mean? Was the Court saying only that this particular congressional decision was conclusive because it was constitutional? Or was the Court disclaiming the power to decide the constitutionality of the statute? As you will see in the readings that follow, the case has generally been cited for the latter proposition. If so interpreted, is the Chinese Exclusion Case consistent with Marbury v. Madison, 5 U.S. (1 Cranch) 137, 2 L.Ed. 60 (1803), where the Supreme Court asserted the power to review congressional Acts for constitutionality?

In answering these questions, you should read with particular care the last printed paragraph of the opinion in the Chinese Exclusion Case. It contains no fewer than three distinct theories for holding the congressional decision conclusive upon the judiciary. Can you find them? If you are having trouble, notice three key words or phrases: (1) “sovereign powers,” (2) “license,” and (3) “political department.” Try to articulate the full theories, and then evaluate each. These and other arguments for judicial deference to Congress in immigration matters are precursors of themes that will recur throughout this section.

Ekiu v. United States

Supreme Court of the United States, 1892.
142 U.S. 651, 12 S.Ct. 336, 35 L.Ed. 1146.

■ MR. JUSTICE GRAY * * * delivered the opinion of the Court.

[Nishimura Ekiu, a citizen of Japan, arrived in the United States by steamship. She told the immigration inspector that her husband had been living in the United States for one year and that he would call for her at a prearranged hotel. She did not know his current address. She possessed $22 in cash. The immigration inspector, not believing her statements, excluded her on the statutory ground that she was likely to become a public charge.

Nishimura Ekiu applied for habeas corpus and offered evidence to meet the charge. The circuit court excluded her evidence and denied relief. In its view, the statute made the administrative findings of fact conclusive upon the judiciary. She had argued that, if so construed, the statute violated due process.]

It is an accepted maxim of international law, that every sovereign nation has the power, as inherent in sovereignty, and essential to self-preservation, to forbid the entrance of foreigners within its dominions, or to admit them only in such cases and upon such conditions as it may see fit to prescribe. In the United States this power is vested in the national government, to which the Constitution has committed the entire control of international relations, in peace as well as in war. It belongs to the political department of the government, and may be exercised either through treaties made by the President and Senate, or through statutes enacted by Congress, upon whom the Constitution has conferred power to regulate commerce with foreign nations, including the entrance of ships, the importation of goods and the bringing of persons into the ports of the United States; to establish a uniform rule of naturalization; to declare war, and to provide and maintain armies and navies; and to make all laws which may be necessary and proper for carrying into effect these powers and all other powers vested by the Constitution in the government of the United States or in any department or officer thereof. Constitution, art. 1, sec. 8; Head Money Cases; Chae Chan Ping v. United States.

The supervision of the admission of aliens into the United States may be entrusted by Congress either to the Department of State, having the general management of foreign relations, or to the Department of the Treasury, charged with the enforcement of the laws regulating foreign commerce; and Congress has often passed acts forbidding the immigration of particular classes of foreigners, and has committed the execution of these acts to the Secretary of the Treasury, to collectors of customs and to inspectors acting under their authority.

An alien immigrant, prevented from landing by any such officer claiming authority to do so under an act of Congress, and thereby restrained of his liberty, is doubtless entitled to a writ of habeas corpus to ascertain whether the restraint is lawful. And Congress may, if it sees fit, * * * authorize the courts to investigate and ascertain the facts on which the right to land depends. But, on the other hand, the final determination of those facts may be entrusted by Congress to executive officers; and in such a case, as in all others, in which a statute gives a discretionary power to an officer, to be exercised by him upon his own opinion of certain facts, he is made the sole and exclusive judge of the existence of those facts, and no other tribunal, unless expressly authorized by law to do so, is at liberty to reexamine or controvert the sufficiency of the evidence on which he acted. It is not within the province of the judiciary to order that foreigners who have never been naturalized, nor acquired any domicile or residence within the United States, nor even been admitted into the country pursuant to law, shall be permitted to enter, in opposition to the constitutional and lawful measures of the legislative and executive branches of the national government. As to such persons, the decisions of executive or administrative officers, acting within powers expressly conferred by Congress, are due process of law.

[The Court then interpreted the statute as entrusting the final fact-finding to the administrative officials.]

* * *

Order of the Circuit Court is affirmed.

■ MR. JUSTICE BREWER dissented.

QUESTIONS

1. In the first paragraph after the statement of facts, the Court sets out several propositions concerning governmental power to exclude noncitizens. Can you distinguish what the court says about (a) the power of a nation as a matter of international law, (b) the power of the United States federal government as a matter of domestic constitutional law, and (c) the distribution of power between the federal courts and the two “political” branches of the federal government, also as a matter of constitutional law?

2. For purposes of this section, the most important aspect of Ekiu is (c) above. According to the opinion, what is the job of the reviewing court when an excluded noncitizen attacks the statutory procedure on due process grounds? Suppose the statute had explicitly permitted the administrative officials to use whatever procedure they saw fit, and those officials, short on resources, had turned away all noncitizens who “looked destitute” without affording them any opportunity to be heard? Would the Court still have upheld the exclusion? To answer that question, you need to figure out how broad the Court intends its holding to be. Does the Court hold merely that Congress does not violate due process by entrusting the factfinding exclusively to administrative officials rather than judges? Or does the Court hold, more broadly, that Congress alone decides what process is constitutionally due in exclusion cases? As with any case in which the breadth of a court’s holding is in doubt, examine both the literal language of the opinion and the court’s reasoning. In this case, do they point in the same direction or in opposite directions? What was Ekiu’s procedural grievance? Is there any point in the opinion at which the Court actually assesses the fairness of the prescribed procedure?

3. The Court says the power to exclude noncitizens “or to admit them only in such cases and upon such conditions as it may see fit to prescribe” belongs to “the political department” of the federal government. For that proposition the Court cites the Head Money Cases (described on page 105 above) and the Chinese Exclusion Case. Based on what you have now read, do you think those cases support that proposition, or does Ekiu go a step further? Consider the difference between the existence of a power and the limits to that power, and think especially about the specific constitutional objections that the immigrants in the Chinese Exclusion Case and Ekiu were raising.

Fong Yue Ting v. United States

Supreme Court of the United States, 1893.
149 U.S. 698, 13 S.Ct. 1016, 37 L.Ed. 905.

[The Act of May 5, 1892, ch. 60, § 6, provided:

SEC. 6. And it shall be the duty of all Chinese laborers, within the limits of the United States at the time of the passage of this act, and who are entitled to remain in the United States, to apply to the collector of internal revenue of their respective districts, within one year after the passage of this act, for a certificate of residence; and any Chinese laborer, within the limits of the United States, who shall neglect, fail or refuse to comply with the provisions of this act, or who, after one year from the passage hereof, shall be found within the jurisdiction of the United States without such certificate of residence, shall be deemed and adjudged to be unlawfully within the United States, and may be arrested by any United States customs official, collector of internal revenue or his deputies, United States marshal or his deputies, and taken before a United States judge, whose duty it shall be to order that he be deported from the United States as hereinbefore provided, unless he shall establish clearly, to the satisfaction of said judge, that by reason of accident, sickness, or other unavoidable cause, he has been unable to procure his certificate, and to the satisfaction of the court, and by at least one credible white witness, that he was a resident of the United States at the time of the passage of this act; and if upon the hearing it shall appear that he is so entitled to a certificate, it shall be granted, upon his paying the cost (emphasis added).

Three Chinese laborers were arrested for failure to possess the required certificates. All claimed to have been living in the United States at the time the statute had been enacted, but none was able to produce a white witness who could attest to his residence. They challenge the constitutionality of the white witness requirement.]

■ MR. JUSTICE GRAY, after stating the facts, delivered the opinion of the court.

In the recent case of Nishimura Ekiu v. United States, the court, in sustaining the action of the executive department, putting in force an act of Congress for the exclusion of aliens, said: "It is an accepted maxim of international law, that every sovereign nation has the power, as inherent in sovereignty, and essential to self-preservation, to forbid the entrance of foreigners within its dominions, or to admit them only in such cases and upon such conditions as it may see fit to prescribe. In the United States, this power is vested in the national government, to which the Constitution has committed the entire control of international relations, in peace as well as in war. It belongs to the political department of the government, and may be exercised either through treaties made by the President and Senate, or through statutes enacted by Congress."

* * *

The right of a nation to expel or deport foreigners, who have not been naturalized or taken any steps towards becoming citizens of the country, rests upon the same grounds, and is as absolute and unqualified as the right to prohibit and prevent their entrance into the country.

* * *

Vattel says: "Every nation has the right to refuse to admit a foreigner into the country, when he cannot enter without putting the nation in evident danger, or doing it a manifest injury. What it owes to itself, the care of its own safety, gives it this right; and in virtue of its natural liberty, it belongs to the nation to judge whether its circumstances will or will not justify the admission of the foreigner. Thus, also, it has a right to send them elsewhere, if it has just cause to fear that they will corrupt the manners of the citizens; that they will create religious disturbances, or occasion any other disorder, contrary to the public safety. * * *"

Ortolan says: "The government of each state has always the right to compel foreigners who are found within its territory to go away, by having them taken to the frontier. This right is based on the fact that, the foreigner not making part of the nation, his individual reception into the territory is matter of pure permission, of simple tolerance, and creates no obligation. * * *"

* * *

The right to exclude or to expel all aliens, or any class of aliens, absolutely or upon certain conditions, in war or in peace, being an inherent and inalienable right of every sovereign and independent nation, essential to its safety, its independence and its welfare, the question now before the court is whether the manner in which Congress has exercised this right in section [6] of the act of 1892 is consistent with the Constitution.

The United States are a sovereign and independent nation, and are vested by the Constitution with the entire control of international relations, and with all the powers of government necessary to maintain that control and to make it effective. The only government of this country, which other nations recognize or treat with, is the government of the Union; and the only American flag known throughout the world is the flag of the United States.

* * *

In exercising the great power which the people of the United States, by establishing a written Constitution as the supreme and paramount law, have vested in this court, of determining, whenever the question is properly brought before it, whether the acts of the legislature or of the executive are consistent with the Constitution, it behooves the court to be careful that it does not undertake to pass upon political questions, the final decision of which has been committed by the Constitution to the other departments of the government.

* * *

The power to exclude or to expel aliens, being a power affecting international relations, is vested in the political departments of the government, and is to be regulated by treaty or by act of Congress, and to be executed by the executive authority according to the regulations so established, except so far as the judicial department has been authorized by treaty or by statute, or is required by the paramount law of the Constitution, to intervene.

In Nishimura Ekiu's case, it was adjudged that, although Congress might, if it saw fit, authorize the courts to investigate and ascertain the facts upon which the alien's right to land was made by the statutes to depend, yet Congress might intrust the final determination of those facts to an executive officer, and that, if it did so, his order was due process of law, and no other tribunal, unless expressly authorized by law to do so, was at liberty to reexamine the evidence on which he acted, or to controvert its sufficiency.

The power to exclude aliens and the power to expel them rest upon one foundation, are derived from one source, are supported by the same reasons, and are in truth but parts of one and the same power.

The power of Congress, therefore, to expel, like the power to exclude aliens, or any specified class of aliens, from the country, may be exercised entirely through executive officers; or Congress may call in the aid of the judiciary to ascertain any contested facts on which an alien's right to be in the country has been made by Congress to depend.

Congress, having the right, as it may see fit, to expel aliens of a particular class, or to permit them to remain, has undoubtedly the right to provide a system of registration and identification of the members of that class within the country, and to take all proper means to carry out the system which it provides.

* * *

Chinese laborers, therefore, like all other aliens residing in the United States for a shorter or longer time, are entitled, so long as they are permitted by the government of the United States to remain in the country, to the safeguards of the Constitution, and to the protection of the laws, in regard to their rights of person and of property, and to their civil and criminal responsibility. But they continue to be aliens, having taken no steps towards becoming citizens, and incapable of becoming such under the naturalization laws; and therefore remain subject to the power of Congress to expel them, or to order them to be removed and deported from the country, whenever in its judgment their removal is necessary or expedient for the public interest.

* * *

For the reasons stated in the earlier part of this opinion, Congress, under the power to exclude or expel aliens, might have directed any Chinese laborer, found in the United States without a certificate of residence, to be removed out of the country by executive officers, without judicial trial or examination, just as it might have authorized such officers absolutely to prevent his entrance into the country. But Congress has not undertaken to do this.

The effect of the provisions of section 6 of the act of 1892 is that, if a Chinese laborer, after the opportunity afforded him to obtain a certificate of residence within a year, at a convenient place, and without cost, is found without such a certificate, he shall be so far presumed to be not entitled to remain within the United States, that an officer of the customs, or a collector of internal revenue, or a marshal, or a deputy of either, may arrest him, not with a view to imprisonment or punishment, or to his immediate deportation without further inquiry, but in order to take him before a judge, for the purpose of a judicial hearing and determination of the only facts which, under the act of Congress, can have a material bearing upon the question whether he shall be sent out of the country, or be permitted to remain.

* * *

The provision which puts the burden of proof upon him of rebutting the presumption arising from his having no certificate, as well as the requirement of proof, "by at least one credible white witness, that he was a resident of the United States at the time of the passage of this act," is within the acknowledged power of every legislature to prescribe the evidence which shall be received, and the effect of that evidence, in the courts of its own government. * * * The competency of all witnesses, without regard to their color, to testify in the courts of the United States, rests on acts of Congress, which Congress may at its discretion modify or repeal. The reason for requiring a Chinese alien, claiming the privilege of remaining in the United States, to prove the fact of his residence here, at the time of the passage of the act, "by at least one credible white witness," may have been the experience of Congress, as mentioned by Mr. Justice Field in Chae Chan Ping's case, that the enforcement of former acts, under which the testimony of Chinese persons was admitted to prove similar facts, "was attended with great embarrassment, from the suspicious nature, in many instances, of the testimony offered to establish the residence of the parties, arising from the loose notions entertained by the witnesses of the obligation of an oath." And this requirement, not allowing such a fact to be proved solely by the testimony of aliens in a like situation, or of the same race, is quite analogous to the provision, which has existed for seventy-seven years in the naturalization laws, by which aliens applying for naturalization must prove their residence within the limits and under the jurisdiction of the United States, for five years next preceding, "by the oath or affirmation of citizens of the United States."

The proceeding before a United States judge, as provided for in section 6 of the act of 1892, is in no proper sense a trial and sentence for a crime or offence. It is simply the ascertainment, by appropriate and lawful means, of the fact whether the conditions exist upon which Congress has enacted that an alien of this class may remain within the country. The order of deportation is not a punishment for crime. It is not a banishment, in the sense in which that word is often applied to the expulsion of a citizen from his country by way of punishment. It is but a method of enforcing the return to his own country of an alien who has not complied with the conditions upon the performance of which the government of the nation, acting within its constitutional authority and through the proper departments, has determined that his continuing to reside here shall depend. He has not, therefore, been deprived of life, liberty or property, without due process of law; and the provisions of the Constitution, securing the right of trial by jury, and prohibiting unreasonable searches and seizures, and cruel and unusual punishments, have no application.

The question whether, and upon what conditions, these aliens shall be permitted to remain within the United States being one to be determined by the political departments of the government, the judicial department cannot properly express an opinion upon the wisdom, the policy or the justice of the measures enacted by Congress in the exercise of the powers confided to it by the Constitution over this subject.

The three cases now before us do not differ from one another in any material particular.

[The lower court judgment ordering the immigrants deported is affirmed.]

* * *

■ MR. JUSTICE BREWER dissenting.

* * *

I rest my dissent on three propositions: First, that the persons against whom the penalties of section 6 of the act of 1892 are directed are persons lawfully residing within the United States; secondly, that as such they are within the protection of the Constitution, and secured by its guarantees against oppression and wrong; and, third, that section 6 deprives them of liberty and imposes punishment without due process of law, and in disregard of constitutional guarantees, especially those found in the Fourth, Fifth, Sixth, and Eighth Articles of the Amendments.

* * *

* * * We must take judicial notice of that which is disclosed by the census, and which is also a matter of common knowledge. There are 100,000 and more of these persons living in this country, making their homes here, and striving by their labor to earn a livelihood. They are not travellers, but resident aliens.

* * *

* * * They have lived in this country, respectively, since 1879, 1877, and 1874—almost as long a time as some of those who were members of the Congress that passed this act of punishment and expulsion.

That those who have become domiciled in a country are entitled to a more distinct and larger measure of protection than those who are simply passing through, or temporarily in it, has long been recognized by the law of nations. * * *

[It was once] said by Secretary Marcy: "This right to protect persons having a domicile, though not native-born or naturalized citizens, rests on the firm foundation of justice, and the claim to be protected is earned by considerations which the protecting power is not at liberty to disregard. Such domiciled citizen pays the same price for his protection as native-born or naturalized citizens pay for theirs. He is under the bonds of allegiance to the country of his residence, and if he breaks them incurs the same penalties; he owes the same obedience to the civil laws . . . ; his property is in the same way and to the same extent as theirs liable to contribute to the support of the government. . . . In nearly all respects his and their condition as to the duties and burdens of government are undistinguishable."

* * *

It is said that the power here asserted is inherent in sovereignty. This doctrine of powers inherent in sovereignty is one both indefinite and dangerous. Where are the limits to such powers to be found, and by whom are they to be pronounced? Is it within legislative capacity to declare the limits? If so, then the mere assertion of an inherent power creates it, and despotism exists. May the courts establish the boundaries? Whence do they obtain the authority for this? Shall they look to the practices of other nations to ascertain the limits? The governments of other nations have elastic powers—ours is fixed and bounded by a written constitution. The expulsion of a race may be within the inherent powers of a despotism. History, before the adoption of this Constitution, was not destitute of examples of the exercise of such a power; and its framers were familiar with history, and wisely, as it seems to me, they gave to this government no general power to banish. Banishment may be resorted to as punishment for crime; but among the powers reserved to the people and not delegated to the government is that of determining whether whole classes in our midst shall, for no crime but that of their race and birthplace, be driven from our territory.

Whatever may be true as to exclusion, and as to that see Chinese Exclusion Case and Nishimura Ekiu v. United States, I deny that there is any arbitrary and unrestrained power to banish residents, even resident aliens. What, it may be asked, is the reason for any difference? The answer is obvious. The Constitution has no extraterritorial effect, and those who have not come lawfully within our territory cannot claim any protection from its provisions. And it may be that the national government, having full control of all matters relating to other nations, has the power to build, as it were, a Chinese wall around our borders and absolutely forbid aliens to enter. But the Constitution has potency everywhere within the limits of our territory, and the powers which the national government may exercise within such limits are those, and only those, given to it by that instrument. Now, the power to remove resident aliens is, confessedly, not expressed. Even if it be among the powers implied, yet still it can be exercised only in subordination to the limitations and restrictions imposed by the Constitution. In the case of Monongahela Navigation Company v. United States, it was said: "But like the other powers granted to Congress by the Constitution, the power to regulate commerce is subject to all the limitations imposed by such instrument, and among them is that of the Fifth Amendment we have heretofore quoted. Congress has supreme control over the regulation of commerce; but if, in exercising that supreme control, it deems it necessary to take private property, then it must proceed subject to the limitations imposed by this Fifth Amendment, and can take only on payment of just compensation." And if that be true of the powers expressly granted, it must as certainly be true of those that are only granted by implication.

* * *

In the case of Yick Wo v. Hopkins, it was said: "The Fourteenth Amendment to the Constitution is not confined to the protection of citizens. It says: 'Nor shall any State deprive any person of life, liberty, or property without due process of law; nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws.' These provisions are universal in their application to all persons within the territorial jurisdiction, without regard to any differences of race, of color, or of nationality; and the equal protection of the laws is a pledge of the protection of equal laws." * * *

If the use of the word "person" in the Fourteenth Amendment protects all individuals lawfully within the State, the use of the same word "person" in the Fifth must be equally comprehensive, and secures to all persons lawfully within the territory of the United States the protection named therein; and a like conclusion must follow as to the Sixth.

I pass, therefore, to the consideration of my third proposition: Section 6 deprives of "life, liberty, and property without due process of law." It imposes punishment without a trial, and punishment cruel and severe. It places the liberty of one individual subject to the unrestrained control of another. Notice its provisions: It first commands all to register. He who does not register violates that law, and may be punished; and so the section goes on to say that one who has not complied with its requirements, and has no certificate of residence, "shall be deemed and adjudged to be unlawfully within the United States," and then it imposes as a penalty his deportation from the country. Deportation is punishment. It involves first an arrest, a deprivation of liberty; and, second, a removal from home, from family, from business, from property. * * *

[It] needs no citation of authorities to support the proposition that deportation is punishment. Every one knows that to be forcibly taken away from home, and family, and friends, and business, and property, and sent across the ocean to a distant land, is punishment; and that often times most severe and cruel. Apt and just are the words of one of the framers of this Constitution, President Madison, when he says "If the banishment of an alien from a country into which he has been invited as the asylum most auspicious to his happiness—a country where he may have formed the most tender connections; where he may have invested his entire property, and acquired property of the real and permanent, as well as the movable and temporary kind; where he enjoys, under the laws, a greater share of the blessings of personal security and personal liberty than he can elsewhere hope for; . . . if, moreover, in the execution of the sentence against him he is to be exposed, not only to the ordinary dangers of the sea, but to the peculiar casualties incident to a crisis of war and of unusual licentiousness on that element, and possibly to vindictive purposes, which his immigration itself may have provoked—if a banishment of this sort be not a punishment, and among the severest of punishments, it will be difficult to imagine a doom to which the name can be applied."

But punishment implies a trial: "No person shall be deprived of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law." Due process requires that a man be heard before he is condemned, and both heard and condemned in the due and orderly procedure of a trial as recognized by the common law from time immemorial. * * *

Again, it is absolutely within the discretion of the collector to give or refuse a certificate to one who applies therefor. Nowhere is it provided what evidence shall be furnished to the collector, and nowhere is it made mandatory upon him to grant a certificate on the production of such evidence. It cannot be due process of law to impose punishment on any person for failing to have that in his possession, the possession of which he can obtain only at the arbitrary and unregulated discretion of any official. It will not do to say that the presumption is that the official will act reasonably and not arbitrarily. When the right to liberty and residence is involved, some other protection than the mere discretion of any official is required. * * *

* * *

It is true this statute is directed only against the obnoxious Chinese; but if the power exists, who shall say it will not be exercised to-morrow against other classes and other people? If the guarantees of these amendments can be thus ignored in order to get rid of this distasteful class, what security have others that a like disregard of its provisions may not be resorted to? * * *

* * *

In view of this enactment of the highest legislative body of the foremost Christian nation, may not the thoughtful Chinese disciple of Confucius fairly ask, Why do they send missionaries here?

■ MR. JUSTICE FIELD dissenting.

* * *

I had the honor to be the organ of the court in announcing [its opinion in the Chinese Exclusion Case.] I still adhere to the views there expressed in all particulars; but between legislation for the exclusion of Chinese persons—that is, to prevent them from entering the country—and legislation for the deportation of those who have acquired a residence in the country under a treaty with China, there is a wide and essential difference. The power of the government to exclude foreigners from this country, that is, to prevent them from entering it, whenever the public interests in its judgment require such exclusion, has been repeatedly asserted by the legislative and executive departments of our government and never denied; but its power to deport from the country persons lawfully domiciled therein by its consent, and engaged in the ordinary pursuits of life, has never been asserted by the legislative or executive departments except for crime, or as an act of war in view of existing or anticipated hostilities, unless the alien act of June 25, 1798, can be considered as recognizing that doctrine. That act vested in the President power to order all such aliens as he should adjudge dangerous to the peace and safety of the United States, or should have reasonable grounds to suspect were concerned in any treasonable or secret machinations against the government, to depart out of the territory of the United States within such time as should be expressed in his order.

* * *

* * *

[Justice Field here describes the unpopular reception of the 1798 Act, contemporary doubts about its constitutionality, and Congress's refusal to renew the Act when it expired after two years.]

* * *

* * * Is it possible that Congress can, at its pleasure, in disregard of the guarantees of the Constitution, expel at any time the Irish, German, French, and English who may have taken up their residence here on the invitation of the government, while we are at peace with the countries from which they came, simply on the ground that they have not been naturalized?

* * *

[T]he only question for our consideration is the lawfulness of the procedure provided for its accomplishment, and this must be tested by the provisions of the Constitution and laws intended for the protection of all persons against encroachment upon their rights. Aliens from countries at peace with us, domiciled within our country by its consent, are entitled to all the guaranties for the protection of their persons and property which are secured to native-born citizens. The moment any human being from a country at peace with us comes within the jurisdiction of the United States, with their consent—and such consent will always be implied when not expressly withheld, and in the case of the Chinese laborers before us was in terms given by the treaty referred to—he becomes subject to all their laws, is amenable to their punishment and entitled to their protection. Arbitrary and despotic power can no more be exercised over them with reference to their persons and property, than over the persons and property of native-born citizens. They differ only from citizens in that they cannot vote or hold any public office. * * * If a foreigner who resides in the country by its consent commits a public offence, is he subject to be cut down, maltreated, imprisoned, or put to death by violence, without accusation made, trial had, and judgment of an established tribunal following the regular forms of judicial procedure? If any rule in the administration of justice is to be omitted or discarded in his case, what rule is it to be? If one rule may lawfully be laid aside in his case, another rule may also be laid aside, and all rules may be discarded. In such instances a rule of evidence may be set aside in one case, a rule of pleading in another; the testimony of eye-witnesses may be rejected and hearsay adopted, or no evidence at all may be received, but simply an inspection of the accused, as is often the case in tribunals of Asiatic countries where personal caprice and not settled rules prevail. That would be to establish a pure, simple, undisguised despotism and tyranny with respect to foreigners resident in the country by its consent, and such an exercise of power is not permissible under our Constitution. * * *

I utterly dissent from and reject the doctrine expressed in the opinion of the majority, that “Congress, under the power to exclude or expel aliens, might have directed any Chinese laborer found in the United States without a certificate of residence to be removed out of the country by executive officers, without judicial trial or examination, just as it might have authorized such officers absolutely to prevent his entrance into the country.” An arrest in that way for that purpose would not be a reasonable seizure of the person within the meaning of the Fourth Article of the amendments to the Constitution. It would be brutal and oppressive. The existence of the power thus stated is only consistent with the admission that the government is one of unlimited and despotic power so far as aliens domiciled in the country are concerned. According to its theory, Congress might have ordered executive officers to take the Chinese laborers to the ocean and put them into a boat and set them adrift; or to take them to the borders of Mexico and turn them loose there; and in both cases without any means of support; indeed, it might have sanctioned towards these laborers the most shocking brutality conceivable. I utterly repudiate all such notions, and reply that brutality, inhumanity, and cruelty cannot be made elements in any procedure for the enforcement of the laws of the United States.

The majority of the court have, in their opinion, made numerous citations from the courts and the utterances of individuals upon the power of the government of an independent nation to exclude foreigners from entering its limits, but none, beyond a few loose observations, as to its power to expel and deport from the country those who are domiciled therein by its consent. * * * Deportation from the realm has not been exercised in England since Magna Charta, except in punishment for crime, or as a measure in view of existing or anticipated hostilities. But even if that power were exercised by every government of Europe, it would have no bearing in these cases. It may be admitted that the power has been exercised by the various governments of Europe. Spain expelled the Moors; England, in the reign of Edward I, banished fifteen thousand Jews; and Louis XIV, in 1685, by revoking the Edict of Nantes, which gave religious liberty to Protestants in France, drove out the Huguenots. Nor does such severity of European governments belong only to the distant past. Within three years Russia has banished many thousands of Jews, and apparently intends the expulsion of the whole race—an act of barbarity which has aroused the indignation of all Christendom. * * * Indeed, all the instances mentioned have been condemned for their barbarity and cruelty, and no power to perpetrate such barbarity is to be implied from the nature of our government, and certainly is not found in any delegated powers under the Constitution.

The government of the United States is one of limited and delegated powers. It takes nothing from the usages or the former action of European governments, nor does it take any power by any supposed inherent sovereignty. There is a great deal of confusion in the use of the word “sovereignty” by law writers. Sovereignty or supreme power is in this country vested in the people, and only in the people. By them certain sovereign powers have been delegated to the government of the United States and other sovereign powers reserved to the States or to themselves. This is not a matter of inference and argument, but is the express declaration of the Tenth Amendment to the Constitution, passed to avoid any misinterpretation of the powers of the general government. That amendment declares that “The powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States, respectively, or to the people.” When, therefore, power is exercised by Congress, authority for it must be found in express terms in the Constitution, or in the means necessary or proper for the execution of the power expressed. If it cannot be thus found, it does not exist.

* * *

The punishment is beyond all reason in its severity. It is out of all proportion to the alleged offence. It is cruel and unusual. As to its cruelty, nothing can exceed a forcible deportation from a country of one’s residence, and the breaking up of all the relations of friendship, family, and business there contracted. The laborer may be seized at a distance from his home, his family and his business, and taken before the judge for his condemnation, without permission to visit his home, see his family, or complete any unfinished business. * * *

* * *

There are numerous other objections to the provisions of the act under consideration. Every step in the procedure provided, as truly said by Counsel, tramples upon some constitutional right. Grossly it violates the Fourth Amendment, which declares that: "The right of the people to be secure in their persons, . . . against unreasonable searches and seizures, shall not be violated, and no warrant shall issue but upon probable cause, supported by oath or affirmation, and particularly describing the . . . persons . . . to be seized."

* * *

I will not pursue the subject further. The decision of the court and the sanction it would give to legislation depriving resident aliens of the guaranties of the Constitution fills me with apprehensions. Those guaranties are of priceless value to every one resident in the country, whether citizen or alien. I cannot but regard the decision as a blow against constitutional liberty, when it declares that Congress has the right to disregard the guaranties of the Constitution intended for the protection of all men, domiciled in the country with the consent of the government, in their rights of person and property. How far will its legislation go? The unnaturalized resident feels it today, but if Congress can disregard the guaranties with respect to any one domiciled in this country with its consent, it may disregard the guaranties with respect to naturalized citizens. What assurance have we that it may not declare that naturalized citizens of a particular country cannot remain in the United States after a certain day, unless they have in their possession a certificate that they are of good moral character and attached to the principles of our Constitution, which certificate they must obtain from a collector of internal revenue upon the testimony of at least one competent witness of a class or nationality to be designated by the government?

What answer could the naturalized citizen in that case make to his arrest for deportation, which cannot be urged in behalf of the Chinese laborers of to-day?

I am of the opinion that the orders of the court below should be reversed, and the petitioners should be discharged.

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

In Fong Yue Ting the Court must decide whether the broad federal powers recognized in the Chinese Exclusion Case and in Ekiu are limited to the context of exclusion. The majority rejects that limitation, extrapolating to deportation the basic principles previously applied to exclusion: that the nation has the power in international law to exclude noncitizens, that in the United States this power is held by the federal government (not the states), and that within the federal government the power lies with the political branches (not the courts). The first three notes below consider how the Court extends these principles from exclusion to deportation.

1. For its conclusion on international law, the Court quotes passages from several treaties. Two of the quoted passages—those by Vattel and Ortolan—are reproduced in the above excerpt. How does the reasoning of those two writers differ?

Today it is accepted that international law permits nations both to exclude and to deport aliens. At the same time, international law limits the exercise of those powers in various ways.⁸ The international constraints are clearest in the context of refugees, as you will see in detail in chapter 11, especially section C.

2. To find a federal power to deport noncitizens, the Court observes that the federal government is “vested by the Constitution with the entire control of international relations, and with all the powers of government necessary to maintain that control and to make it effective.” What, exactly, is the connection between deportation and foreign affairs? Recall the discussion in the Chinese Exclusion Case linking admission decisions to foreign policy. Does the same rationale apply to deportation? Can you articulate other ways in which decisions whom to deport could be a foreign policy tool? What is your reaction to the use of the deportation power as a weapon of foreign policy? Should it matter whether the deportees are “alien friends” or “alien enemies”? Should it matter whether they entered legally or illegally? If they entered legally, should it matter whether they are permanent residents or temporary visitors?

The Court gets from a federal exclusion power to a federal deportation power by identifying the rationales for the former and concluding that the same rationales apply to the latter. Could the Court have fortified its result by arguing that, regardless whether it was right or wrong to recognize the federal exclusion power, the very fact that it has done so makes it sensible to recognize a federal deportation power? Consider two possible arguments along those lines:

a. If the federal government could exclude noncitizens but could not deport them, inadmissible noncitizens would simply enter surreptitiously. Once in, they would be safe forever. (Are there either enforcement techniques or legal consequences other than deportation that would deter such illegal entries? We shall examine this question in chapter 12.)

8. See, e.g., T. Alexander Aleinikoff & Vincent Chetail (eds.), Migration and International Legal Norms (2003); Guy S. Goodwin-Gill, International Law and the Movement of Persons Between States (1978);

Richard Plender, International Migration Law (rev. 2d ed. 1988); James A.R. Nafziger, A Commentary on American Legal Scholarship Concerning the Admission of Migrants, 17 U.Mich.J.L.Reform 165 (1984).

By the same token, could not the technique employed in Chadha—examining the Baker factors and concluding that they do not dictate nonjusticiability—be invoked in most future cases in which noncitizens challenge the constitutionality of Congress’s deportation decisions? Could the same reasoning be invoked even in exclusion cases? In short, where are we now?

5. For an interesting personal account of Jagdish Chadha and the political and legal battles that his case spawned (complete with photographs), see Barbara H. Craig, Chadha—The Story of an Epic Constitutional Struggle (1988). In 1984 Chadha became a naturalized citizen of the United States. Id. at 3–4.

Zadvydas v. Davis

Supreme Court of the United States, 2001.
533 U.S. 678, 121 S.Ct. 2491, 150 L.Ed.2d 653.

■ JUSTICE BREYER delivered the opinion of the Court.

When an alien has been found to be unlawfully present in the United States and a final order of removal has been entered, the Government ordinarily secures the alien’s removal during a subsequent 90-day statutory “removal period,” during which time the alien normally is held in custody.

A special statute authorizes further detention if the Government fails to remove the alien during those 90 days. It says:

“An alien ordered removed [1] who is inadmissible . . . , [2] [who is deportable on certain crime-related and certain other grounds,] or [3] who has been determined by the Attorney General to be a risk to the community or unlikely to comply with the order of removal, may be detained beyond the removal period and, if released, shall be subject to [certain] terms of supervision. . . .” INA § 241(a)(6).

In these cases, we must decide whether this post-removal-period statute authorizes the Attorney General to detain a removable alien indefinitely beyond the removal period or only for a period reasonably necessary to secure the alien’s removal. We deal here with aliens who were admitted to the United States but subsequently ordered removed. Aliens who have not yet gained initial admission to this country would present a very different question. Based on our conclusion that indefinite detention of aliens in the former category would raise serious constitutional concerns, we construe the statute to contain an implicit “reasonable time” limitation, the application of which is subject to federal court review.

I

A

* * *

Related Immigration and Naturalization Service (INS) regulations add that the INS District Director will initially review the alien’s records to leave to courses in constitutional law and administrative law the difficult questions raised on the merits.

2. More relevant here is that this case remains the only occasion to date on which the Supreme Court has struck down a federal statutory provision concerned with the admission or the expulsion of noncitizens. How could the Court even get to the merits of the constitutional issue? As you have seen, the Supreme Court, in case after case, for almost one hundred years, has been emphasizing Congress's "plenary" power to decide which classes of noncitizens to deport. The Court has reminded us repeatedly that this Congressional determination is "conclusive upon the Judiciary," to quote the early cases, or at least "largely immune from judicial scrutiny," to quote the more modern decisions. Yet in Chadha the Court makes clear that Congress's decision is not immune from judicial scrutiny. Congress attempted to deport certain noncitizens, subject to an exception that it defined to include the absence of a one-House veto. The Court scrutinizes the statute and finds it unconstitutional.

In explaining how it could review the exercise of a "plenary" congressional power, the Court says: "The plenary authority of Congress over aliens under Art. I, § 8, cl. 4 [the naturalization clause] is not open to question, but what is challenged here is whether Congress has chosen a constitutionally permissible means of implementing that power." In what sense, then, is the congressional power "plenary"? Does "plenary" simply mean full—i.e., extending to a broad range of related subjects? Very possibly it should, but is that really the sense in which previous cases used the term when they rejected arguments that particular exercises of the power had violated the Bill of Rights?

3. The Court's application of the political question criteria assembled in Baker v. Carr (decided in 1962) leads it to hold the constitutional issue justiciable. Its analysis of those factors seems straightforward. But what happened to the intimate connection between immigration and foreign policy that had so profoundly influenced the previous decisions? Was the statutory provision in Chadha any less reflective of foreign policy judgments than were the provisions that had received such great judicial deference in the previous cases?

4. The Second Supplemental Brief of the House of Representatives, at 10-22, cited all the familiar plenary power doctrine cases that you read earlier. Yet the opinion in Chadha does not acknowledge them. Have they been implicitly overruled? Or can they be distinguished? Does it matter that in the previous cases the constitutional issues on the merits involved individual rights while in Chadha the constitutional issue concerns separation of powers? Exactly why should that distinction be legally relevant to the issue of justiciability? Are we simply back to the procedural/substantive distinction and the implicit labelling of separation of powers as "procedural"? See Stephen H. Legomsky, Immigration Law and the Principle of Plenary Congressional Power, 1984 Supreme Ct.Rev. 255, 303.

Congress apparently directs its assertion of nonjusticiability to the first of the Baker factors by asserting that Chadha's claim is "an assault on the legislative authority to enact Section 244(c)(2)." But if this turns the question into a political question virtually every challenge to the constitutionality of a statute would be a political question. Chadha indeed argues that one House of Congress cannot constitutionally veto the Attorney General's decision to allow him to remain in this country. No policy underlying the political question doctrine suggests that Congress or the Executive, or both acting in concert and in compliance with Art. I, can decide the constitutionality of a statute; that is a decision for the courts.

Other Baker factors are likewise inapplicable to this case. As we discuss more fully below, Art. I provides the "judicially discoverable and manageable standards" of Baker for resolving the question presented by this case. Those standards forestall reliance by this Court on nonjudicial "policy determinations" or any showing of disrespect for a coordinate branch. Similarly, if Chadha's arguments are accepted, § 244(c)(2) cannot stand, and, since the constitutionality of that statute is for this Court to resolve, there is no possibility of "multifarious pronouncements" on this question.

It is correct that this controversy may, in a sense, be termed "political." But the presence of constitutional issues with significant political overtones does not automatically invoke the political question doctrine. Resolution of litigation challenging the constitutional authority of one of the three branches cannot be evaded by courts because the issues have political implications in the sense urged by Congress. Marbury v. Madison was also a "political" case, involving as it did claims under a judicial commission alleged to have been duly signed by the President but not delivered. But "courts cannot reject as 'no law suit' a bona fide controversy as to whether some action denominated 'political' exceeds constitutional authority." Baker v. Carr.

[The Court proceeded to hold that § 244(c)(2) was unconstitutional because it permitted either House of Congress to "legislate" without following the requirements that the Constitution lays out for legislation: passage by both Houses of Congress, and either Presidential assent or a Congressional override of a Presidential veto.]

* * *

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. The issue on the merits—whether legislative vetoes comport with separation of powers principles—is both intriguing and immensely important in public law generally. One Senator counted some 295 legislative veto provisions enacted in the fifty-year period that preceded Chadha.²⁶ We shall

26. James Abourezk, The Congressional Veto: A Contemporary Response to Executive Encroachment on Legislative Prerogatives, 52 Indiana L.Rev. 323, 324 (1977); see also Peter L. Strauss, Was there a Baby in the Bathwater? A Comment on the Supreme Court's Legislative Veto Decision, 1983 Duke L.J. 789.

After full briefing and oral argument, the Court of Appeals held that the House was without constitutional authority to order Chadha's deportation; accordingly it directed the Attorney General "to cease and desist from taking any steps to deport this alien based upon the resolution enacted by the House of Representatives." The essence of its holding was that § 244(c)(2) violates the constitutional doctrine of separation of powers.

* * *

* * * [W]e now affirm.

II

Before we address the important question of the constitutionality of the one-House veto provision of § 244(c)(2), we first consider several challenges to the authority of this Court to resolve the issue raised.

* * *

G

Political Question

It is also argued that these cases present a nonjusticiable political question because Chadha is merely challenging Congress' authority under the Naturalization Clause, U.S. Const., Art. I, § 8, cl. 4, and the Necessary and Proper Clause, U.S. Const., Art. I, § 8, cl. 18. It is argued that Congress' Art. I power "To establish an uniform Rule of Naturalization," combined with the Necessary and Proper Clause, grants it unreviewable authority over the regulation of aliens. The plenary authority of Congress over aliens under Art. I, § 8, cl. 4, is not open to question, but what is challenged here is whether Congress has chosen a constitutionally permissible means of implementing that power. As we made clear in Buckley v. Valeo, "Congress has plenary authority in all cases in which it has substantive legislative jurisdiction, McCulloch v. Maryland, so long as the exercise of that authority does not offend some other constitutional restriction."

A brief review of those factors which may indicate the presence of a nonjusticiable political question satisfies us that our assertion of jurisdiction over these cases does no violence to the political question doctrine. As identified in Baker v. Carr, a political question may arise when any one of the following circumstances is present:

"a textually demonstrable constitutional commitment of the issue to a coordinate political department; or a lack of judicially discoverable and manageable standards for resolving it; or the impossibility of deciding without an initial policy determination of a kind clearly for nonjudicial discretion; or the impossibility of a court's undertaking independent resolution without expressing lack of the respect due coordinate branches of government; or an unusual need for unquestioning adherence to a political decision already made; or the potentiality of embarrassment from multifarious pronouncements by various departments on one question." over seven years, was of good moral character, and would suffer "extreme hardship" if deported.

* * *

* * * Section 244(c)(2) provides:

"(2) In the case of an alien specified in paragraph (1) of subsection (a) of this subsection—

"if during the session of the Congress at which a case is reported, or prior to the close of the session of the Congress next following the session at which a case is reported, either the Senate or the House of Representatives passes a resolution stating in substance that it does not favor the suspension of such deportation, the Attorney General shall thereupon deport such alien or authorize the alien's voluntary departure at his own expense under the order of deportation in the manner provided by law. If, within the time above specified, neither the Senate nor the House of Representatives shall pass such a resolution, the Attorney General shall cancel deportation proceedings."

* * *

On December 12, 1975, Representative Eilberg, Chairman of the Judiciary Subcommittee on Immigration, Citizenship, and International Law, introduced a resolution opposing "the granting of permanent residence in the United States to [six] aliens," including Chadha. * * * The resolution was passed without debate or recorded vote. Since the House action was pursuant to § 244(c)(2), the resolution was not treated as an Art. I legislative act; it was not submitted to the Senate or presented to the President for his action.

After the House veto of the Attorney General's decision to allow Chadha to remain in the United States, the Immigration Judge reopened the deportation proceedings to implement the House order deporting Chadha. Chadha moved to terminate the proceedings on the ground that § 244(c)(2) is unconstitutional. The Immigration Judge held that he had no authority to rule on the constitutional validity of § 244(c)(2). On November 8, 1976, Chadha was ordered deported pursuant to the House action.

Chadha appealed the deportation order to the Board of Immigration Appeals, again contending that § 244(c)(2) is unconstitutional. The Board held that it had "no power to declare unconstitutional an act of Congress" and Chadha's appeal was dismissed.

* * * Chadha filed a petition for review of the deportation order in the United States Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit. The Immigration and Supreme Court upheld the constitutionality of mandatory detention. The case and its implications are discussed on pages 226–42 below.

d. STILL MORE CRACKS

INS v. Chadha

Supreme Court of the United States, 1983.
462 U.S. 919, 103 S.Ct. 2764, 77 L.Ed.2d 317.

■ CHIEF JUSTICE BURGER delivered the opinion of the Court.

* * *

I

Chadha is an East Indian who was born in Kenya and holds a British passport. He was lawfully admitted to the United States in 1966 on a nonimmigrant student visa. His visa expired on June 30, 1972. On October 11, 1973, the District Director of the Immigration and Naturalization Service ordered Chadha to show cause why he should not be deported for having “remained in the United States for a longer time than permitted.” Pursuant to § 242(b) of the Immigration and Nationality Act (Act), a deportation hearing was held before an Immigration Judge on January 11, 1974. Chadha conceded that he was deportable for over-staying his visa and the hearing was adjourned to enable him to file an application for suspension of deportation under § 244(a)(1) of the Act [now replaced by INA § 240A(b)—Eds.]. Section 244(a)(1) at the time in question, provided:

“As hereinafter prescribed in this section, the Attorney General may, in his discretion, suspend deportation and adjust the status to that of an alien lawfully admitted for permanent residence, in the case of an alien who applies to the Attorney General for suspension of deportation and—

“(1) is deportable under any law of the United States except the provisions specified in paragraph (2) of this subsection; has been physically present in the United States for a continuous period of not less than seven years immediately preceding the date of such application, and proves that during all of such period he was and is a person of good moral character; and is a person whose deportation would, in the opinion of the Attorney General, result in extreme hardship to the alien or to his spouse, parent, or child, who is a citizen of the United States or an alien lawfully admitted for permanent residence.”

After Chadha submitted his application for suspension of deportation, the deportation hearing was resumed on February 7, 1974. On the basis of evidence adduced at the hearing, affidavits submitted with the application, and the results of a character investigation conducted by the INS, the Immigration Judge, on June 25, 1974, ordered that Chadha’s deportation be suspended. The Immigration Judge found that Chadha met the requirements of § 244(a)(1): he had resided continuously in the United States for

But at least one court held IMFA § 5 unconstitutional. The decision in Manwani v. United States Dept. of Justice, 736 F.Supp. 1367 (W.D.N.C. 1990), illustrates well the importance of deciding whether to call a statutory provision substantive or procedural. The plaintiffs—a United States citizen and her noncitizen husband—had married while deportation proceedings were pending against the husband. All indications were that the marriage was in fact genuine, but under IMFA § 5 his immigration was barred nonetheless. The plaintiffs argued that the statute created a conclusive presumption that marriages contracted during exclusion or deportation proceedings were fraudulent unless the noncitizen has resided outside the United States for two years after marrying. Characterizing marital unity as a fundamental right, the plaintiffs contended that the conclusive presumption violated procedural due process; they argued they were entitled to a reasonable opportunity to prove that their marriage was genuine.

The court read Fiallo as imposing only substantive limitations on noncitizens' constitutional rights and classified IMFA § 5 as procedural. For the latter conclusion, the court relied mainly on the two-year clause: All IMFA § 5 affected, the court reasoned, was the timing of the visa petition; adjudication of the petition would simply be deferred two years. Id. at 1377. Moreover, the court observed, the challenged provision was part of INA § 204, which is entitled "Procedure for Granting Immigrant Status" (emphasis added). Id. Thus finding the provision procedural, the court applied the Mathews v. Eldridge formula described earlier, see page 144 above, ultimately holding the statutory procedure violative of due process. Id. at 1383–86. It would have been possible, of course, for the court to call the two-year foreign residence requirement substantive and invoke the plenary power doctrine, as the Supreme Court had done in Fiallo.

Interestingly, the court in Manwani alternatively found IMFA § 5 substantively defective on equal protection grounds. In the court's view, the statute discriminated against those citizens who marry during their spouses' immigration proceedings. The fundamental right at stake, the court held, triggered strict scrutiny. By singling out such marriages as fraudulent rather than attempting to identify individual cases of actual fraud, Congress had used an approach too loosely tailored to its goal to withstand strict scrutiny. Id. at 1388–89. Even if the Constitution required only a rational basis, the court added, IMFA § 5 would fail the test.

5. Until 2003, there was one other line of lower court cases in which noncitizens frequently overcame the plenary power doctrine. Various provisions of the INA make detention mandatory, while removal proceedings are pending, in certain defined situations (for example where noncitizens are charged with being removable on certain crime-related or national security-related grounds). The lower courts divided on the constitutionality of mandatory detention. Most of them held that due process (sometimes substantive, sometimes procedural) prohibits detention pending removal proceedings, absent a determination that the particular individual is likely either to abscond or to endanger the public safety. In Demore v. Hyung Joon Kim, 538 U.S. 510, 123 S.Ct. 1708, 155 L.Ed.2d 724 (2003), the 289, 291 n. 2 (BIA 1977); Matter of Lennon, 15 I. & N. Dec. 9, 27 (BIA 1974). How, then, could it adopt Francis, in which the result had been based on constitutional grounds?

The opinion in Silva does not answer this question. Could the Board simply have been interpreting section 212(c) as extending to noncitizens in Francis's position? That course would seem precluded, at least in the Second and Ninth Circuits where the Board is bound by the contrary interpretation placed on the statute by both courts. Might the Board simply have considered itself bound by the constitutional determinations of the Second and Ninth Circuits within the territory covered by those two courts? Even that theory would not explain the Board's voluntary adherence to Francis nationwide.

3. Apart from the specific issue presented in Francis, several other lower courts have applied the rational basis test to provisions of the Immigration and Nationality Act, though ultimately finding the distinctions rational. See, e.g., De Leon-Reynoso v. Ashcroft, 293 F.3d 633, 638 (3d Cir. 2002) (explicitly adopting rational basis scrutiny for immigration statutes but applying test very deferentially); Newton v. INS, 736 F.2d 336, 339-43 (6th Cir.1984); Narenji v. Civiletti, 617 F.2d 745, 747 (D.C.Cir. 1979). The Supreme Court has done the same. Reno v. Flores, 507 U.S. 292, 113 S.Ct. 1439, 123 L.Ed.2d 1 (1993). Occasionally a lower court will actually strike down a challenged immigration provision as irrational. In addition to Francis and Tapia-Acuna, see, e.g., Dillingham v. INS, 267 F.3d 996 (9th Cir. 2001); Cordes v. Gonzales, 421 F.3d 889, 896-99 (9th Cir. 2005) (finding irrational, and therefore violative of equal protection, a statutory provision interpreted as affording discretionary relief to people whom Congress made retroactively deportable as "aggravated felons" at a time when they were already deportable because of their crimes, while withholding discretionary relief from people who had not been deportable at all until Congress retroactively made them aggravated felons); Garberding v. INS, 30 F.3d 1187 (9th Cir. 1994).

4. The limits of the plenary power doctrine were similarly tested in a line of cases challenging a provision of the Immigration Marriage Fraud Amendments of 1986 [IMFA]. As you will see in detail in chapter 3, marriage to a United States citizen or to an LPR is generally a basis for immigrating to the United States. Section 5 of IMFA, however, originally provided (it has since been softened) that a marriage entered into while exclusion or deportation proceedings were pending would not be a basis for immigration benefits unless and until the noncitizen beneficiary resided outside the United States for at least two years after the marriage. The theory behind IMFA § 5 was that marriages contracted during exclusion or deportation proceedings are especially likely to be fraudulent but that, if such a marriage could withstand two years of early separation, it was probably genuine. In a series of cases, noncitizens and their citizen sponsors attacked that limitation on a variety of constitutional grounds. As you will see on pages 288-90 below, most of those challenges failed.

seems fair to read the court's opinion as proceeding on the assumption that the statute draws the distinction imputed to it by the Board.

The court's method of distinguishing the Supreme Court decisions appears in the next-to-last paragraph, which you should now re-read. Are you persuaded? Is there really a difference between statutes that "create different standards * * * for different groups" and statutes that subject "individuals within a particular group * * * to disparate treatment"? The court seemingly accepts that the validity of the former distinctions "is not a proper subject for judicial concern", but it assumes it may review the latter to see whether they constitute "criteria wholly unrelated to any legitimate governmental interest." Isn't that simply review for (minimal) rationality? If so, then under the court's formulation judges must determine whether a given instance of differential treatment is a distinction between groups or a distinction between individuals within a group. As a practical matter, cannot almost any statutory distinction be classified either way? If, as counsel for the INS, you had wanted to characterize the classification in Francis as a distinction between groups, and therefore presumably not susceptible to rationality review in light of the court's concession, how would you define the two groups?

2. Francis was adopted by the Board of Immigration Appeals later that same year. Matter of Silva, 16 I. & N. Dec. 26 (BIA 1976). Several years later, Francis was also followed in Tapia-Acuna v. INS, 640 F.2d 223 (9th Cir.1981), but in Abebe v. Mukasey, 548 F.3d 787 (9th Cir. en banc 2008), a divided en banc court overruled Tapia-Acuna by a vote of 6-5. The majority acknowledged the need to test the classification for rationality and offered no evidence of an actual congressional rationale for the distinction, but held it would be sufficient if the court could "conceive of a rational reason Congress may have had in adopting it." 548 F.3d at 790 & n.4 (emphasis added). The majority then offered the following hypothesis: Perhaps Congress decided to condition 212(c) relief upon the person leaving and returning because it wanted to encourage potentially deportable non-citizens to "self-deport." Id. at 790. The concurring opinion responded "I doubt that anyone believes that the majority's tortured construct was in the mind of anybody on Capitol Hill." Id. at 793. Finding the majority's speculation wanting, the dissent pointed out that the relevant incentive would not be simply to depart; to obtain relief under the narrower construction, a person would have to depart and return. In that scenario, it reasoned, it is hard to see how the government would benefit from the person's excursion. Although section 212(c) has since been replaced by a remedy called cancellation of removal (which you will study in chapter 8 below), the issue remains important because 212(c) relief is still available to those whose convictions resulted from guilty pleas entered before the 1996 repeal. INS v. St. Cyr, 533 U.S. 289, 121 S.Ct. 2271, 150 L.Ed.2d 347 (2001).

At any rate, the Board's adoption of Francis in Silva raises interesting questions. The Board has always taken the view that it lacks the power to decide constitutional questions. See, e.g., Matter of Cortez, 16 I. & N. Dec.

Fundamental fairness dictates that permanent resident aliens who are in like circumstances, but for irrelevant and fortuitous factors, be treated in a like manner. We do not dispute the power of the Congress to create different standards of admission and deportation for different groups of aliens.²⁵ However, once those choices are made, individuals within a particular group may not be subjected to disparate treatment on criteria wholly unrelated to any legitimate governmental interest. We find that the Board's interpretation of Section 212(c) is unconstitutional as applied to this petitioner.

Accordingly, the petition is granted. The case is remanded to the Board so that the Attorney General's discretion under Section 212(c) may be exercised.

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. As interpreted by the Board, the statutory provision in question did indeed draw a distinction that defied explanation. A noncitizen who committed an act that was a ground for deportation, and who then left the country temporarily and returned, would be eligible for discretionary relief. Francis, similarly situated except that he stayed within the United States after commission of his act, was not. The distinction was surely irrational.

The question, however, is whether a court is permitted to strike down a federal deportation provision even if the provision is substantively irrational. Didn't you just read in Harisiades that federal immigration policy, being intimately connected with foreign affairs, is so exclusively entrusted to the political branches as to be "largely immune from judicial inquiry or interference"? And didn't the Supreme Court in Galvan v. Press then reject, as too wild a deviation from settled principles, the suggestion that in immigration cases the due process clause "qualifies the scope of political discretion heretofore recognized as belonging to Congress"? Perhaps some flexibility derives from the Fiallo footnote discussed above, but at the time of the Francis case Fiallo had not yet been decided.

The court appears to acknowledge the problem. In footnote 25 [footnote 8 in the original] it concedes that "the validity of distinctions drawn by Congress with respect to deportability is not a proper subject for judicial concern." Yet isn't the court invalidating precisely "a distinction drawn by Congress with respect to deportability"?

Perhaps the court would say that the distinction it is actually invalidating is merely one drawn by the BIA, not one drawn by Congress. But the court admits to sharing the Board's conclusion that the statute is inapplicable to noncitizens like Francis; nor does the court question the Board's previous conclusion that the statute applies to noncitizens who leave and return after committing the deportable act. In those circumstances, it

25. [Footnote 8 in original] To that extent we agree with our brethren that "the validity of distinctions drawn by Congress with respect to deportability is not a proper subject for judicial concern."

It is the petitioner's contention that if this statutory construction is applied to his case, then he is deprived of the equal protection of the laws as guaranteed by the fifth amendment.²⁴ He argues that the statute as so applied creates two classes of aliens identical in every respect except for the fact that members of one class have departed and returned to this country at some point after they became deportable. Thus the distinction is not rationally related to any legitimate purpose of the statute.

The authority of Congress and the executive branch to regulate the admission and retention of aliens is virtually unrestricted. Enforcement of the immigration laws is often related to considerations both of foreign policy and the domestic economy. Nevertheless "[i]n the enforcement of these policies, the Executive Branch of the Government must respect the procedural safeguards of due process. . . ."

It has long been held that the constitutional promise of equal protection of the laws applies to aliens as well as citizens. Recently, this court reaffirmed the applicability of the equal protection guarantee to deportation proceedings. [The court here cites cases applying the rational basis test and finding the challenged statutory distinctions rational.] * * *

Under the minimal scrutiny test, which we consider applicable in this case, distinctions between different classes of persons must be reasonable, not arbitrary, and must rest upon some ground of difference having a fair and substantial relation to the object of the legislation, so that all persons similarly circumstanced shall be treated alike.

In determining whether the Board's policy survives minimal scrutiny, the purpose of Section 212(c) must be examined. As the government notes in its brief, Congress was concerned that there be some degree of flexibility to permit worthy returning aliens to continue their relationships with family members in the United States despite a ground for exclusion. Realizing that these considerations apply with equal force to an alien who has already reentered, perhaps illegally, the Board chose to expand eligibility to that group. Thus an alien who had been convicted of two crimes involving moral turpitude and, therefore, was deportable, was eligible for Section 212(c) discretion because he was able to demonstrate that several months after his last conviction he left the country for a few hours to attend a funeral in Canada. The government has failed to suggest any reason why this petitioner's failure to travel abroad following his conviction should be a crucial factor in determining whether he may be permitted to remain in this country. Reason and fairness would suggest that an alien whose ties with this country are so strong that he has never departed after his initial entry should receive at least as much consideration as an individual who may leave and return from time to time.

* * *

24. [Footnote 5 in original] "[I]f a classification would be invalid under the Equal Protection Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment, it is also inconsistent with the due process requirement of the Fifth Amendment."

10. With all this emphasis on judicial interpretation of the Constitution, keep in mind that every member of Congress is also “bound by oath or affirmation, to support [the] Constitution.” U.S. Const. art. VI, § 3. For a cogent reminder of this obligation in the immigration context, see Michael Scaperlanda, Who is My Neighbor? An Essay on Immigrants, Welfare Reform, and the Constitution, 29 Conn. L. Rev. 1587 (1997).

SUBSTANTIVE CRACKS IN THE PLENARY CONGRESSIONAL POWER

As you have just read, the district court in the ADC case refused to apply the plenary power doctrine to a first amendment challenge to a deportation ground. Outside the first amendment context there have been other dents in a doctrine that once seemed impervious to attack. Recall Fiallo, where the Supreme Court in a footnote conceded that courts might strike down immigration provisions that lack at least a modicum of rationality. In the case below, a court seemed to anticipate that invitation:

Francis v. INS

United States Court of Appeals, Second Circuit, 1976.
532 F.2d 268.

[Ten years after his admission as an LPR, Francis was convicted of possession of marijuana. The INS instituted deportation proceedings on the basis of that conviction. He conceded he was deportable but applied for discretionary relief under former INA § 212(c) [later replaced by present INA § 240A(a)]. In relevant part, this provision then read:

Aliens lawfully admitted for permanent residence who temporarily proceeded abroad voluntarily and not under an order of deportation, and who are returning to a lawful unrelinquished domicile of seven consecutive years, may be admitted in the discretion of the Attorney General without regard to [most of the exclusion grounds]. * * *

Although this provision then spoke explicitly only to admission, it had long been held applicable to deportation for reasons that will be discussed in Chapter 8. In particular, the Board of Immigration Appeals had previously held that an LPR who commits a deportable act, then leaves the United States temporarily, and then returns to a lawful unrelinquished domicile of at least seven years in the United States is statutorily eligible for discretionary relief under this section. Francis's problem was that he had never departed. Consequently, the immigration judge denied his application and the Board of Immigration Appeals affirmed. Under the applicable statutory procedure, he petitioned the court of appeals for review. After examining the legislative history, the court concluded that the Board had correctly interpreted section 212(c) as inapplicable to a person who has never left the United States. It then continued:]

Cox, Citizenship, Standing, and Immigration Law, 92 California L. Rev. 373 (2004).

The commentary has been highly critical of the Mandel decision and of the ideological exclusion grounds themselves.²³ For a while, these and other criticisms bore fruit. Congress soon whittled away at the ideological bases for excluding and deporting noncitizens. Major reforms enacted in 1990 are examined on pages 427–35 below (exclusion) and 567–68 below (deportation). As discussed in chapters 5 and 10, however, the counterterrorism laws that followed the attacks of September 11, 2001 have added new removal grounds based on associations and other generally protected activities.

The United States, incidentally, is not alone in threatening deportation as a sanction against unwelcome advocacy. In 2001, Venezuelan President Hugo Chavez said in a public speech: “I have given instructions that from today onward, any foreigner who comes here and says anything offensive against the nation or the government or the president or the people will be expelled from Venezuela.” New York Times (June 12, 2001) at A14.

9. In section III of the Harisiades opinion, the Court rejects an argument based on the ex post facto clause. First, the Court concludes that the legislation in question was not truly retroactive. On that point, which of two arguments is the Court making? (a) Even though no law in force while those plaintiffs were members made past membership a deportation ground, present membership had been a deportation ground all along; or (b) Even past membership had been a deportation ground all along; it’s just that in Kessler the Court had not realized this, and it took the 1940 Act to set the record straight. If the Court meant (a), do you agree that the 1940 Act was not retroactive? If the Court meant (b), do you think the 1940 Act proves the Kessler Court was wrong to interpret the previous statute as it did? Was the 1940 Congress any better equipped than the 1939 Supreme Court to construe legislation enacted by a prior Congress?

The broader basis on which the Court rejected the plaintiffs’ ex post facto argument was that the ex post facto clause restricts only penal legislation and that deportation is not penal. Both elements of that rule remain good law. See, e.g., Perez v. Elwood, 294 F.3d 552, 557 (3d Cir. 2002). Whether deportation should be viewed as penal was explored earlier in connection with Fong Yue Ting.

Apart from the ex post facto clause, Professor Nancy Morawetz has argued convincingly that substantive due process might bar retroactive deportation charges. See Nancy Morawetz, Rethinking Retroactive Deportation Laws and the Due Process Clause, 73 NYU L. Rev. 97 (1998).

23. For some especially cogent attacks, see John A. Scanlan, Aliens in the Marketplace of Ideas: The Government, The Academy, and the McCarran-Walter Act, 66 Texas L.Rev. 1481 (1988); Steven R. Shapiro, Ideological Exclusions: Closing the Border to Political Dissidents, 100 Harv.L.Rev. 930 (1987); Comment, Ideological Exclusion, Plenary Power, and the PLO, 77 California L.Rev. 831 (1989).

Two leading exclusion cases are also significant. In United States ex rel. Turner v. Williams, 194 U.S. 279, 24 S.Ct. 719, 48 L.Ed. 979 (1904), the Supreme Court upheld a federal statutory provision excluding “anarchists.” The Court held that, even if construed to encompass anarchists who are merely “political philosophers, innocent of evil intent,” the statute would survive the First Amendment. Id. at 294, 24 S.Ct. at 724, 48 L.Ed. at 985.

In Kleindienst v. Mandel, 408 U.S. 753, 92 S.Ct. 2576, 33 L.Ed.2d 683 (1972), a noncitizen was excluded under a statutory provision that barred the entry of those who advocate, or who publish works advocating, the “doctrines of world communism.” INA § 212(a)(28)(D, G (v)), pre-1990 version. The Attorney General, who had the statutory discretion to waive the bar, id. § 212(d)(3), declined to do so. Several United States citizens brought suit, alleging a deprivation of their first amendment rights to receive the noncitizen’s ideas. Rather than apply the Brandenburg test (which by then had become the generally applicable standard for restrictions on political speech), the Court held the Attorney General could constitutionally deny a waiver whenever there was a “facially legitimate and bona fide reason” for doing so. There would be no need to balance that reason against the first amendment interests of the citizen plaintiffs. But see Peter H. Schuck, Kleindienst v. Mandel: Plenary Power v. the Professors, in David A. Martin & Peter H. Schuck (eds.), Immigration Stories (2005), chap. 7 (observing that, ironically, the combination of overuse of the ideological exclusion power, political events, and creative lawyering turned the concession requiring at least a “facially legitimate and bona fide reason” into a wedge for dramatically diminishing ideological exclusions).

At any rate, while the Court did not expressly address the constitutionality of the statutory exclusion ground, it did ultimately uphold an exclusion order that had been based on that ground. Arguably, therefore, the Court upheld that provision sub silentio. See also Justice Marshall’s dissent, 408 U.S. at 774–85, 92 S.Ct. at 2587–93, 33 L.Ed.2d at 698–705 (finding statutory exclusion ground unconstitutional at least when citizens’ rights to receive ideas are involved). Unlike the First Amendment analysis in Harisiades and possibly Turner, the analysis in Mandel rested squarely on the plenary nature of Congress’s power to regulate immigration. See Turner, 194 U.S. at 289–92, 24 S.Ct. at 722–23, 48 L.Ed. at 983–85 (discussion of plenary power doctrine seemingly limited to certain other constitutional objections); Mandel, 408 U.S. at 765–67, 769–70, 92 S.Ct. at 2583–85, 33 L.Ed.2d at 693–96.

Professor Adam Cox makes the innovative argument that the plenary power doctrine largely reflects the Court’s assumption that noncitizens lack standing to invoke full judicial scrutiny of immigration legislation (in addition to reflecting the Court’s views on judicial deference and its views on the narrowness of the limits to congressional power). He goes on to urge a broader conception of citizens’ standing to challenge immigration laws—a strategy employed by the plaintiffs in Kleindienst v. Mandel. See Adam B.

noncitizens have an inherent incentive to delay removal hearings and because delay permits “a continuing violation of United States law.” In addition, the Court said, disclosure of the government’s reasons for prosecuting could expose sensitive foreign policy strategies. Finally, it was suggested, deportation is not punishment, and therefore the individual interest is less compelling than in a criminal case. 525 U.S. at 489–91.

Possible limitations on the Court’s holding should be considered. The Court did not go so far as to bar all First Amendment claims in removal hearings. Most likely it did not mean to do so, since its rationales were specific to selective prosecution. Moreover, the Court expressly left open the possibility that a prosecution could reflect discrimination “so outrageous that the foregoing considerations can be overcome.” 525 U.S. at 491. It concluded by saying “When an alien’s continuing presence in this country is in violation of the immigration laws,” selective prosecution based on membership of an organization that supports terrorist activity is permissible. Id. at 491–92. The repeated references to continuing presence might well mean that the Court did not intend to bar LPRs from asserting selective prosecution claims; their continuing presence would not violate the immigration laws. Justice Souter, dissenting, characterized the Court’s conclusions about selective prosecution as dicta, since the Court ultimately found a lack of subject matter jurisdiction.

As to the merits, note the majority’s argument that the ability to effect change through voting eliminates any need to advocate violent overthrow. That rationale would seem inapplicable here, however, because noncitizens cannot (and even at the time of Harisiades could not) vote.

For a superb history and critique of the first amendment issues raised by the ADC litigation, see John A. Scanlan, American-Arab—Getting the Balance Wrong—Again!, 52 Administrative L. Rev. 347 (2000). Gerald Neuman argues that the Court’s language in ADC concerning selective prosecution should be narrowly construed. Gerald L. Neuman, Terrorism, Selective Deportation and the First Amendment after Reno v. AADC, 14 Georgetown Immigration L.J. 313 (2000). In contrast, David A. Martin argues that the Court rightly intended a broad interpretation of the bar on selective prosecution defenses. David A. Martin, On Counterintuitive Consequences and Choosing the Right Control Group: A Defense of Reno v. AADC, 14 Georgetown Immigration L.J. 363 (2000).

A postscript on the ADC case: After the Supreme Court decision, the case was remanded to immigration judge Bruce Einhorn in Los Angeles. In 2001, Judge Einhorn dismissed the main deportability charges against the lead respondents, holding that the charged grounds were not meant to apply retroactively to acts (in this instance participating in demonstrations, distributing newspapers, and organizing fundraisers for humanitarian projects sponsored by a group that the United States government determined to be terrorist) committed before the deportability grounds were enacted. Press Release, Marc van der Hout & David Cole, The LA8 Case (June 26, 2001).

sufficiently important evil. Dennis v. United States, 341 U.S. 494, 515, 71 S.Ct. 857, 870, 95 L.Ed. 1137, 1155 (1951). By the time of ADC, the Supreme Court had also decided Brandenburg v. Ohio, 395 U.S. 444, 89 S.Ct. 1827, 23 L.Ed.2d 430 (1969), in which it had held that advocacy of even lawless action cannot be proscribed unless the advocacy “is directed to inciting or producing imminent lawless action and is likely to incite or produce such action.” Id. at 447, 89 S.Ct. at 1829, 23 L.Ed.2d at 434. Applying the Brandenburg test, the district court in ADC struck down various INA provisions that rendered noncitizens deportable for advocating Communism or opposition to organized government, for joining organizations that advocate those ideas, or for engaging in other specified forms of expression or association. ADC, 714 F.Supp. at 1083–84; accord, 70 F.3d 1045, 1064 (9th Cir. 1995) (related case of same name, addressing selective prosecution argument); cf. Rafeedie v. INS, 795 F.Supp. 13 (D.D.C. 1992) (striking down analogous exclusion grounds as overbroad).

It is certainly possible to construe Harisiades as the district court did in ADC. Having read the facts of Harisiades, however, and having now seen the Dennis test, do you think one can seriously maintain that the Court in Harisiades applied the then prevailing First Amendment standards? More specifically, was there any point in the Harisiades opinion at which the court considered whether the plaintiffs’ advocacy or associations posed a “clear and present danger”?

Sensitive to that difficulty, the court in ADC acknowledged in a footnote that commentators had questioned whether the Court in Harisiades had correctly applied Dennis. 714 F.Supp. at 1077 n. 12. In the view of the ADC court, however, it did not matter whether the Court in Harisiades had applied the usual First Amendment principles correctly or incorrectly; the important point was that it had invoked those principles at all in the face of the government’s argument that it should not do so. Id. Do you agree with the interpretation placed on Harisiades by the district court in ADC?

The Supreme Court granted certiorari in ADC to decide whether recent legislation eliminated the lower courts’ power to hear the case before the issuance of final removal orders. In Reno v. American-Arab Anti-Discrimination Committee, 525 U.S. 471, 119 S.Ct. 936, 142 L.Ed.2d 940 (1999), the Court ultimately held jurisdiction was lacking. The jurisdictional issue is discussed in chapter 9. In the process of deciding the jurisdictional issue, however, the majority declared that “an alien unlawfully in this country has no constitutional right to assert selective enforcement as a defense against his deportation.” 525 U.S. at 488. In a nearby footnote, the Court, possibly unintentionally, used even broader language. It said “Our holding generally deprives deportable aliens of the defense of selective prosecution [emphasis added].” Id. at 488 n.10. The latter language, if interpreted literally, would deny this defense even to LPRs.

The Court offered several reasons for barring selective prosecution claims in removal proceedings. It suggested that the delay caused by such claims would cause special problems in the removal context, both because a general pattern of gender stereotyping in immigration law, with special attention to Fiallo. See Linda Kelly, Republican Mothers, Bastards' Fathers and Good Victims: Discarding Citizens and Equal Protection through the Failures of Legal Images, 51 Hastings L.J. 557 (2000).

7. Does the principle of special judicial deference in immigration extend to actions of the executive branch? The Eleventh Circuit thought so in Jean v. Nelson, 727 F.2d 957 (11th Cir.1984) (en banc); cf. Kleindienst v. Mandel, 408 U.S. 753, 92 S.Ct. 2576, 33 L.Ed.2d 683 (1972) (a First Amendment case discussed in item 8 below). In Jean, noted earlier, the plaintiffs were Haitians who had been detained several years pending adjudication of the asylum claims they had filed in exclusion proceedings. They alleged that the Attorney General, in deciding whom to detain pending exclusion decisions, had unconstitutionally discriminated against Haitians. The en banc court disposed of this argument by concluding that noncitizens in exclusion proceedings simply have no constitutional rights that pertain to immigration, even as against executive officials and even when they are challenging their detention rather than their exclusion. 727 F.2d at 967-75.

8. The plaintiffs in Harisiades also make a First Amendment argument. Section II has been reproduced in full; what you read represents the Court's entire discussion of that issue. That section is interesting for what it does not do. Nowhere does it refer to the plenary power of Congress or to the exceptional judicial deference required in immigration cases. Instead, the Court's stated reason for rejecting the First Amendment claim rests solely on the distinction between the advocacy of lawful change and the advocacy of violent change. The court cites a non-immigration case, Dennis v. United States, as embodying "the test applicable to the Communist Party."

On its face, then, nothing in Harisiades contracts the scope of the First Amendment in the deportation context. In American-Arab Anti-Discrimination Committee v. Meese, 714 F.Supp. 1060 (C.D.Cal.1989) (ADC), rev'd on other grounds, 940 F.2d 445 (9th Cir.1991), a district court hinged its decision on that fact. The INS had brought removal proceedings against eight noncitizens. Two of them, both LPRs, were charged with supporting the Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine, an organization alleged to advocate various terrorist acts. The other six were charged with overstaying their visas. All eight sought to enjoin the removal proceedings on the ground that the government had selectively targeted them because of their membership in the PFLP. They argued, among other things, that the selective prosecution violated their First Amendment rights to free speech and free association.

The district court in ADC held that, far from supporting the application of the plenary power doctrine to the First Amendment in deportation cases, Harisiades demonstrated that in such cases the usual First Amendment standards were to govern. In Dennis, which the Supreme Court had cited approvingly in Harisiades, the constitutional test was whether the restricted speech posed a "clear and present danger" of bringing about a cies regulating the admission of aliens [were] not an appropriate subject for judicial review." The Court responded:

* * * Our cases [none cited] reflect acceptance of a limited judicial responsibility under the Constitution even with respect to the power of Congress to regulate the admission and exclusion of aliens, and there is no occasion to consider in this case whether there may be actions of the Congress with respect to aliens that are so essentially political in character as to be nonjusticiable [emphasis added].

430 U.S. at 793 n. 5, 97 S.Ct. at 1478, 52 L.Ed.2d at 57. The clear implication is that substantive admission criteria will normally be subject to judicial review for constitutionality and that the only uncertainty is about whether there might be some exceptions that call for nonjusticiability. Still unclear, however, is what the "limited" judicial responsibility entails. In Fiallo, the Court observed that Congress might have singled out the relationship between fathers and their out-of-wedlock children because of the potential for fraudulent paternity claims. Id. at 799 n. 8, 97 S.Ct. at 1481, 52 L.Ed.2d at 60. The "limited judicial responsibility" to which the Court in Fiallo cryptically referred might thus amount to assuring rationality. As you will see later in this chapter, the lower courts now often make precisely that assumption when addressing substantive constitutional challenges to federal immigration statutes.

Do you think the assumptions that underlie the statutory distinctions in Fiallo reflect biological fact or gender stereotyping? This question loomed large in Nguyen v. INS, 533 U.S. 53, 121 S.Ct. 2053, 150 L.Ed.2d 115 (2001), where the Supreme Court upheld (by a vote of 5-4) the constitutionality of a statutory provision dealing with citizenship by descent. For children born out of wedlock, the statute made it harder to derive United States citizenship from their fathers than to derive it from their mothers. In Nguyen there was a question whether the plenary power doctrine carried over from admission and expulsion cases to citizenship cases. The majority avoided that difficult question by concluding that the statute survived even the intermediate level of enhanced scrutiny usually applicable in gender discrimination cases. To reach that conclusion, the majority offered two alternative rationales. The first one was the paternity fraud rationale that you encountered in Fiallo. Mindful that DNA and other technologies now diminish that concern, the Court in Nguyen reasoned alternatively that as a matter of "biological fact" only the mother could carry the unborn child and only the mother could be counted on to be present at the birth. Those biological facts, the Court said, increased the probability of a close bond between the mother and child and thus furnished a substantial link between the statutory gender distinction and an important governmental objective. Justice O'Connor, dissenting, doubted that the Court's scrutiny actually reached the level contemplated by intermediate gender scrutiny and suggested that in any event the second rationale amounted to gender stereotyping rather than biological fact. In a thoughtful pre-Nguyen article, Professor Linda Kelly prophetically distilled the question at hand? Should the principle of special judicial restraint in immigration cases be followed, abandoned, or modified?

5. In the early cases you read at the start of this chapter, the plaintiffs were almost always Chinese or Japanese. As discussed earlier, it seems natural to explain the extreme results as the combined products of legal doctrine and external social and political influences. Is the same true of cases like Knauff, Mezei, Harisiades, Galvan, and other immigration decisions rendered during the Cold War and the McCarthy era? To what extent did the national preoccupation with Communism affect either the reasoning or the results of those cases? Consider especially the portion of the Harisiades opinion in which the Court implies it would be incongruous to spare the deportation of noncitizen Communists at a time when citizens were being drafted specifically to fight Communism. What is your reaction to that portion of the opinion?

6. One of the more significant modern Supreme Court opinions on this subject is Fiallo v. Bell, 430 U.S. 787, 97 S.Ct. 1473, 52 L.Ed.2d 50 (1977). As you will see later, the Immigration and Nationality Act generally confers immigration benefits on both the parents and the children of United States citizens. At the time of Fiallo,²² however, the statute did not recognize for this purpose the relationship between a father and his child born out of wedlock. Several pairs of fathers and their out-of-wedlock children argued that the discrimination violated the “equal protection” component of due process (see item 1 above).

When either the federal or a state government treats two groups of people differently, equal protection principles generally require a rational relationship between the particular distinction and some legitimate governmental interest. See generally Jesse H. Choper et al., Constitutional Law 1178–94 (10th ed. 2006). Certain classifications, however, have been held to demand more—typically both a more substantial government interest (“ends” scrutiny) and a closer relationship between the challenged classification and that interest (“means” scrutiny). Race is the classic example of a “suspect” classification that triggers “strict scrutiny,” id. at 1194–1298, but certain other classifications—including gender and legitimacy—can generate an intermediate level of scrutiny, id. at 1298–1334. The two latter classifications were both present in Fiallo. Moreover, as the plaintiffs pointed out, the foreign policy factors on which the Court had purported to rely in the early cases were absent here. 430 U.S. at 796, 97 S.Ct. at 1480, 52 L.Ed.2d at 58. Yet once again, relying on the sovereign nature of the power to exclude aliens and the force of stare decisis, the Court held the congressional power to be “largely immune from judicial control.” Id. at 792, 97 S.Ct. at 1478, 52 L.Ed.2d at 56.

At the same time, the Court conceded in dictum what has proven to be a significant opening. The government had argued that “substantive poli-

22. INA § 101(b)(1)(D). In 1986 Congress amended this provision so as to recognize the relationship between a father and his out-of-wedlock child in cases where there is or has been “a bona fide parent-child relationship.” IRCA § 315(a).

There are other schools of thought as well. Some have attributed the unusual deference in immigration cases to a judicial assumption that noncitizens simply are not members of the political community; they are mere “guests” for whom admission and permission to remain are privileges rather than rights.²¹ The subject of membership will be explored in some depth in chapter 13, section C, below. This argument appears to be a restatement of the right-privilege distinction. The reason that it is merely a privilege and not a right is that the person is not a member of the community.

Professor Kevin R. Johnson, in Responding to the Litigation Explosion: The Plain Meaning of Executive Branch Primacy over Immigration, 71 North Carolina L. Rev. 413 (1993), ascribes some of the deference to a judicial interest in speeding the disposition of cases and discouraging litigation. Professor Michael Scaperlanda believes that the plenary power doctrine partly reflects the emphasis of classical international law on state sovereignty (versus individual rights). He argues that the emergence of modern human rights law, which explicitly recognizes individual rights rooted in international law, renders the doctrine obsolete. See Michael Scaperlanda, Polishing the Tarnished Golden Door, 1993 Wisconsin L. Rev. 965; see also Kif Augustine-Adams, The Plenary Power Doctrine After September 11, 38 U.C. Davis L. Rev. 701 (2005) (linking the content of constitutional protection of noncitizens to international human rights law).

4. Whatever the independent merits of the arguments you have seen thus far, there is no doubt that stare decisis has also played an important role in perpetuating the special judicial restraint in immigration cases:

* * * [M]uch could be said for the view, were we writing on a clean slate, that the Due Process Clause qualifies the scope of political discretion heretofore recognized as belonging to Congress in regulating the entry and deportation of aliens. * * *

But the slate is not clean. * * * [T]hat the formulation of these policies is entrusted exclusively to Congress has become about as firmly imbedded in the legislative and judicial tissues of our body politic as any aspect of our government.

Galvan v. Press, 347 U.S. 522, 530–31, 74 S.Ct. 737, 742–43, 98 L.Ed. 911, 921–22 (1954) (opinion of Court, per Justice Frankfurter).

The principal values traditionally associated with stare decisis include (a) predictability in the law; (b) equal treatment of similarly situated litigants; and (c) judicial efficiency. When deciding whether to overrule a precedent, a court must balance these values against the perceived superiority of the new rule. How weighty do you find these values as applied to

21. See, e.g., T. Alexander Aleinikoff, Citizens, Aliens, Membership and the Constitution, 7 Constitutional Commentary 9 (1990); Stephen H. Legomsky, Immigration Law and the Principle of Plenary Congress- sional Power, 1984 Supreme Court Rev. 255, 269–70; Peter H. Schuck, The Transformation of Immigration Law, 84 Columbia L.Rev. 1 (1984).

Further, does the Court's description of the plaintiffs' argument in Harisiades suggest that it does not believe it should be reviewing even for reasonableness? Or does its analysis of why Congress has enacted the provision in question indicate a willingness to review for at least minimal rationality?

Justice Frankfurter's concurring opinion is lavishly sprinkled with phrases like "exclusively," "wholly," and "solely" congressional powers. Is he advocating even less judicial involvement than the majority is?

3. Why is the Court being so deferential to Congress? As you study section I of the opinion, see how many different reasons you can locate. Be sure to distinguish reasons for rejecting the vested rights argument from those for rejecting the reasonableness argument.

Many of the old themes that you have seen before resurface in Harisiades: the connection between immigration and foreign affairs and the attendant applicability of the political question doctrine; the sovereign nature of the power to deport; the distinction between rights and privileges; and the interdependence of allegiance and protection. In the process, however, the Court sounds some new themes:

a. These noncitizens have been here long enough to naturalize, and they have declined the opportunity. They should not complain now about being denied the rights of citizenship.

b. International law gives noncitizens certain remedies not available to citizens. Invoking the Constitution to insulate LPRs from deportation would therefore be unfair because they, unlike citizens, would then "derive advantages from two sources of law—American and international."

What is your reaction to argument (a)? In evaluating it, consider that in 1940 Congress prohibited the naturalization of noncitizens like Harisiades who had joined organizations found to advocate the forceful overthrow of the United States government. Nationality Act of 1940, ch. 876, § 305, 54 Stat. 1137, 1141. In fact, Harisiades himself had applied for naturalization, and the government had responded by initiating the present deportation proceedings. Burt Neuborne, Harisiades v. Shaughnessy: A Case Study in the Vulnerability of Resident Aliens, in David A. Martin & Peter H. Schuck (eds.), Immigration Stories (2005), at 87, 89. Assuming, however, that the Court's premise had been correct—that the plaintiffs had turned down the chance to become naturalized—do you find the argument persuasive?

What about argument (b)? How valuable do the two international law advantages cited by the Court (the right to diplomatic intervention and the right to decline participation in a war against one's country of nationality) seem to you, in comparison with constitutional protection from deportation? Would immunity from deportation, combined with the advantages derived from international law, really give LPRs an unfair advantage over citizens? Which package of rights and obligations would you rather have? (Keep your answer tentative; in chapter 13 you will see in more detail some of the non-immigration disabilities that attend noncitizen status.) due process clause would be invoked to support an argument based on substantive “reasonableness.” There are two related constitutional developments that you should note.

One is known generally as “substantive due process.” Under this doctrine, the due process clause is seen as conferring not only a right to fair procedure, but also certain substantive protection, including freedom from substantively arbitrary governmental action. The degree of rationality that substantive due process requires has varied with the times and with the type of governmental regulation at issue. See generally Jesse H. Choper et al., Constitutional Law 292–323, 376–522 (10th ed. 2006).

The other aspect of due process pertinent here concerns the permissibility of governmental distinctions between two or more groups. Section 1 of the fourteenth amendment prohibits each state from “deny[ing] to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws.” Nothing in the Constitution expressly puts analogous restrictions on the federal government, but fifth amendment due process has been held to prohibit unjustifiable federal discrimination. See, e.g., Bolling v. Sharpe, 347 U.S. 497, 74 S.Ct. 693, 98 L.Ed. 884 (1954).

2. After Harisiades, may a court review the substantive rationality of a distinction drawn by a federal immigration statute? Examine the Court’s language: “[A]ny policy toward aliens is vitally and intricately interwoven with * * * foreign relations, the war power, and the maintenance of a republican form of government. Such matters are so exclusively entrusted to the political branches of government as to be largely immune from judicial inquiry or interference.” What does the Court mean by “largely immune”? Would it take an enactment that is utterly baffling before a reviewing court would be permitted to strike down the legislation as unreasonable? Less than that? More than that?

Observe how the Court actually applies the principle it has announced to the particular provision in question. It asks whether “congressional alarm” about a “Communist conspiracy within the United States is either a fantasy or a pretense” (emphasis added). It rejects the conclusion “that there were then or are now no possible grounds on which Congress might believe that Communists in our midst are inimical to our security” (emphasis added). To what extent is the Court evaluating the importance of the congressional objective? To what extent does the Court consider the fit between that objective and the means used to promote it?

The manner in which a rationality test is phrased can be revealing. As the author of the majority opinion in Harisiades, Justice Jackson disparages the plaintiffs’ fallback position as being “that if any power to deport domiciled aliens exists it is so dispersed that the judiciary must concur in the grounds for its exercise to the extent of finding them reasonable.” Only a year later, the same Justice Jackson would dissent in Mezei, arguing that due process requires “reasonable general legislation reasonably applied to the individual.” 345 U.S. at 222, 73 S.Ct. at 634, 97 L.Ed. at 968. Is his Mezei formulation any different, analytically, from the proposition he ridicules in Harisiades? Is it psychologically different?

(2) Punishment through banishment from the country may be placed upon an alien not for what he did, but for what his political views once were.

Each of these is foreign to our philosophy. We repudiate our traditions of tolerance and our articles of faith based upon the Bill of Rights when we bow to them by sustaining an Act of Congress which has them as a foundation.

The view that the power of Congress to deport aliens is absolute and may be exercised for any reason which Congress deems appropriate rests on Fong Yue Ting v. United States, decided in 1893 by a six-to-three vote. That decision seems to me to be inconsistent with the philosophy of constitutional law which we have developed for the protection of resident aliens. We have long held that a resident alien is a "person" within the meaning of the Fifth and the Fourteenth Amendments. He therefore may not be deprived either by the National Government or by any state of life, liberty, or property without due process of law. Nor may he be denied the equal protection of the laws. A state was not allowed to exclude an alien from the laundry business because he was a Chinese, nor discharge him from employment because he was not a citizen, nor deprive him of the right to fish because he was a Japanese ineligible to citizenship. An alien's property (provided he is not an enemy alien), may not be taken without just compensation. He is entitled to habeas corpus to test the legality of his restraint, to the protection of the Fifth and Sixth Amendments in criminal trials, and to the right of free speech as guaranteed by the First Amendment.

An alien, who is assimilated in our society, is treated as a citizen so far as his property and his liberty are concerned. He can live and work here and raise a family, secure in the personal guarantees every resident has and safe from discriminations that might be leveled against him because he was born abroad. Those guarantees of liberty and livelihood are the essence of the freedom which this country from the beginning has offered the people of all lands. If those rights, great as they are, have constitutional protection, I think the more important one—the right to remain here—has a like dignity.

* * *

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

The opinion in Harisiades is the Supreme Court's most comprehensive and most detailed exposition of the arguments for exceptional judicial deference to Congress in immigration cases. This set of Notes considers separately the several constitutional attacks the Court considers.

1. Section I of the Court's opinion addresses the two due process arguments. The plaintiffs first maintain that admission to LPR status creates a vested right to remain. As a fallback position they contend that, if deportation of an LPR is ever constitutionally permissible, the deportation ground must at least be reasonable. It might not be obvious to you why the economic need this country has traditionally welcomed aliens to come to its shores, it has done so exclusively as a matter of political outlook and national self-interest. This policy has been a political policy, belonging to the political branch of the Government wholly outside the concern and the competence of the Judiciary.

Accordingly, when this policy changed and the political and law-making branch of this Government, the Congress, decided to restrict the right of immigration about seventy years ago, this Court thereupon and ever since has recognized that the determination of a selective and exclusionary immigration policy was for the Congress and not for the Judiciary. The conditions for entry of every alien, the particular classes of aliens that shall be denied entry altogether, the basis for determining such classification, the right to terminate hospitality to aliens, the grounds on which such determination shall be based, have been recognized as matters solely for the responsibility of the Congress and wholly outside the power of this Court to control.

The Court's acknowledgment of the sole responsibility of Congress for these matters has been made possible by Justices whose cultural outlook, whose breadth of view and robust tolerance were not exceeded by those of Jefferson. In their personal views, libertarians like Mr. Justice Holmes and Mr. Justice Brandeis doubtless disapproved of some of these policies, departures as they were from the best traditions of this country and based as they have been in part on discredited racial theories or manipulation of figures in formulating what is known as the quota system. But whether immigration laws have been crude and cruel, whether they may have reflected xenophobia in general or anti-Semitism or anti-Catholicism, the responsibility belongs to Congress. Courts do enforce the requirements imposed by Congress upon officials in administering immigration laws, e.g., Kwock Jan Fat v. White, and the requirement of Due Process may entail certain procedural observances. E.g., Ng Fung Ho v. White. But the underlying policies of what classes of aliens shall be allowed to enter and what classes of aliens shall be allowed to stay, are for Congress exclusively to determine even though such determination may be deemed to offend American traditions and may, as has been the case, jeopardize peace.

In recognizing this power and this responsibility of Congress, one does not in the remotest degree align oneself with fears unworthy of the American spirit or with hostility to the bracing air of the free spirit. One merely recognizes that the place to resist unwise or cruel legislation touching aliens is the Congress, not this Court.

I, therefore, join in the Court's opinion in these cases.

■ MR. JUSTICE DOUGLAS, with whom MR. JUSTICE BLACK concurs, dissenting.

There are two possible bases for sustaining this Act:

(1) A person who was once a Communist is tainted for all time and forever dangerous to our society; or Party. These aliens violated that prohibition and incurred liability to deportation. They were not caught unawares by a change of law. There can be no contention that they were not adequately forewarned both that their conduct was prohibited and of its consequences.

In 1939, this Court decided Kessler v. Strecker, in which it was held that Congress, in the statute as it then stood, had not clearly expressed an intent that Communist Party membership remained cause for deportation after it ceased. The Court concluded that in the absence of such expression only contemporaneous membership would authorize deportation.

The reaction of the Communist Party was to drop aliens from membership, at least in form, in order to immunize them from the consequences of their party membership.

The reaction of Congress was that the Court had misunderstood its legislation. In the Act here before us it supplied unmistakable language that past violators of its prohibitions continued to be deportable in spite of resignation or expulsion from the party. It regarded the fact that an alien defied our laws to join the Communist Party as an indication that he had developed little comprehension of the principles or practice of representative government or else was unwilling to abide by them.

However, even if the Act were found to be retroactive, to strike it down would require us to overrule the construction of the ex post facto provision which has been followed by this Court from earliest times. It always has been considered that that which it forbids is penal legislation which imposes or increases criminal punishment for conduct lawful previous to its enactment. Deportation, however severe its consequences, has been consistently classified as a civil rather than a criminal procedure. Both of these doctrines as original proposals might be debatable, but both have been considered closed for many years and a body of statute and decisional law has been built upon them. In Bugajewitz v. Adams, Mr. Justice Holmes, for the Court, said: “ * * * [N]or is the deportation a punishment; it is simply a refusal by the Government to harbor persons whom it does not want.
* * * ”

* * *

Affirmed.

■ MR. JUSTICE CLARK took no part in the consideration or decision of these cases.

■ MR. JUSTICE FRANKFURTER, concurring.

It is not for this Court to reshape a world order based on politically sovereign States. In such an international ordering of the world a national State implies a special relationship of one body of people, i.e., citizens of that State, whereby the citizens of each State are aliens in relation to every other State. Ever since national States have come into being, the right of people to enjoy the hospitality of a State of which they are not citizens has been a matter of political determination by each State. (I put to one side the oddities of dual citizenship.) Though as a matter of political outlook and Government in control of our international relations and treaty-making powers.

We hold that the Act is not invalid under the Due Process Clause.

* * *

II.

The First Amendment is invoked as a barrier against this enactment. The claim is that in joining an organization advocating overthrow of government by force and violence the alien has merely exercised freedoms of speech, press and assembly which that Amendment guarantees to him.

The assumption is that the First Amendment allows Congress to make no distinction between advocating change in the existing order by lawful elective processes and advocating change by force and violence, that freedom for the one includes freedom for the other, and that when teaching of violence is denied so is freedom of speech.

Our Constitution sought to leave no excuse for violent attack on the status quo by providing a legal alternative—attack by ballot. To arm all men for orderly change, the Constitution put in their hands a right to influence the electorate by press, speech and assembly. This means freedom to advocate or promote Communism by means of the ballot box, but it does not include the practice or incitement of violence.

True, it often is difficult to determine whether ambiguous speech is advocacy of political methods or subtly shades into a methodical but prudent incitement to violence. Communist governments avoid the inquiry by suppressing everything distasteful. Some would have us avoid the difficulty by going to the opposite extreme of permitting incitement to violent overthrow at least unless it seems certain to succeed immediately. We apprehend that the Constitution enjoins upon us the duty, however difficult, of distinguishing between the two. Different formulae have been applied in different situations and the test applicable to the Communist Party has been stated too recently to make further discussion at this time profitable.²⁰ We think the First Amendment does not prevent the deportation of these aliens.

III.

The remaining claim is that this Act conflicts with Art. I, § 9, of the Constitution forbidding ex post facto enactments. An impression of retroactivity results from reading as a new and isolated enactment what is actually a continuation of prior legislation.

During all the years since 1920 Congress has maintained a standing admonition to aliens, on pain of deportation, not to become members of any organization that advocates overthrow of the United States Government by force and violence, a category repeatedly held to include the Communist to the political branches of government as to be largely immune from judicial inquiry or interference.

20. [Footnote 19 in original] [Dennis v. United States, 341 U.S. 494, 71 S.Ct. 857, 95 L.Ed. 1137 (1951)].

These restraints upon the judiciary, occasioned by different events, do not control today's decision but they are pertinent. It is not necessary and probably not possible to delineate a fixed and precise line of separation in these matters between political and judicial power under the Constitution. Certainly, however, nothing in the structure of our Government or the text of our Constitution would warrant judicial review by standards which would require us to equate our political judgment with that of Congress.

Under the conditions which produced this Act, can we declare that congressional alarm about a coalition of Communist power without and Communist conspiracy within the United States is either a fantasy or a pretense? This Act was approved by President Roosevelt June 28, 1940, when a world war was threatening to involve us, as soon it did. Communists in the United States were exerting every effort to defeat and delay our preparations. Certainly no responsible American would say that there were then or are now no possible grounds on which Congress might believe that Communists in our midst are inimical to our security.

Congress received evidence that the Communist movement here has been heavily laden with aliens and that Soviet control of the American Communist Party has been largely through alien Communists. It would be easy for those of us who do not have security responsibility to say that those who do are taking Communism too seriously and overestimating its danger. But we have an Act of one Congress which, for a decade, subsequent Congresses have never repealed but have strengthened and extended. We, in our private opinions, need not concur in Congress' policies to hold its enactments constitutional. Judicially we must tolerate what personally we may regard as a legislative mistake.

We are urged, because the policy inflicts severe and undoubted hardship on affected individuals, to find a restraint in the Due Process Clause. But the Due Process Clause does not shield the citizen from conscription and the consequent calamity of being separated from family, friends, home and business while he is transported to foreign lands to stem the tide of Communism. If Communist aggression creates such hardships for loyal citizens, it is hard to find justification for holding that the Constitution requires that its hardships must be spared the Communist alien. When citizens raised the Constitution as a shield against expulsion from their homes and places of business, the Court refused to find hardship a cause for judicial intervention.

We think that, in the present state of the world, it would be rash and irresponsible to reinterpret our fundamental law to deny or qualify the Government's power of deportation. However desirable world-wide amelioration of the lot of aliens, we think it is peculiarly a subject for international diplomacy. It should not be initiated by judicial decision which can only deprive our own Government of a power of defense and reprisal without obtaining for American citizens abroad any reciprocal privileges or immunities. Reform in this field must be entrusted to the branches of the

The alien retains immunities from burdens which the citizen must shoulder. By withholding his allegiance from the United States, he leaves outstanding a foreign call on his loyalties which international law not only permits our Government to recognize but commands it to respect. In deference to it certain dispensations from conscription for any military service have been granted foreign nationals. They cannot, consistently with our international commitments, be compelled "to take part in the operations of war directed against their own country." In addition to such general immunities they may enjoy particular treaty privileges.

Under our law, the alien in several respects stands on an equal footing with citizens, but in others has never been conceded legal parity with the citizen. Most importantly, to protract this ambiguous status within the country is not his right but is a matter of permission and tolerance. The Government's power to terminate its hospitality has been asserted and sustained by this Court since the question first arose.

War, of course, is the most usual occasion for extensive resort to the power. Though the resident alien may be personally loyal to the United States, if his nation becomes our enemy his allegiance prevails over his personal preference and makes him also our enemy, liable to expulsion or internment, and his property becomes subject to seizure and perhaps confiscation. But it does not require war to bring the power of deportation into existence or to authorize its exercise. Congressional apprehension of foreign or internal dangers short of war may lead to its use. So long as the alien elects to continue the ambiguity of his allegiance his domicile here is held by a precarious tenure.

That aliens remain vulnerable to expulsion after long residence is a practice that bristles with severities. But it is a weapon of defense and reprisal confirmed by international law as a power inherent in every sovereign state. Such is the traditional power of the Nation over the alien and we leave the law on the subject as we find it.

This brings us to the alternative defense under the Due Process Clause—that, granting the power, it is so unreasonably and harshly exercised by this enactment that it should be held unconstitutional.

In historical context the Act before us stands out as an extreme application of the expulsion power. There is no denying that as world convulsions have driven us toward a closed society the expulsion power has been exercised with increasing severity, manifest in multiplication of grounds for deportation, in expanding the subject classes from illegal entrants to legal residents, and in greatly lengthening the period of residence after which one may be expelled. This is said to have reached a point where it is the duty of this Court to call a halt upon the political branches of the Government.

It is pertinent to observe that any policy toward aliens is vitally and intricately interwoven with contemporaneous policies in regard to the conduct of foreign relations, the war power, and the maintenance of a republican form of government. Such matters are so exclusively entrusted

■ MR. JUSTICE JACKSON delivered the opinion of the Court.

* * *

* * * Admittedly, each of these deportations is authorized and required by the letter, spirit and intention of the statute. But the Act is assailed on three grounds: (1) that it deprives the aliens of liberty without due process of law in violation of the Fifth Amendment; (2) that it abridges their freedoms of speech and assembly in contravention of the First Amendment; and (3) that it is an ex post facto law which Congress is forbidden to pass by Art. I, § 9, cl. 3 of the Constitution.

* * *

I.

These aliens ask us to forbid their expulsion by a departure from the long-accepted application to such cases of the Fifth Amendment provision that no person shall be deprived of life, liberty or property without due process of law. Their basic contention is that admission for permanent residence confers a "vested right" on the alien, equal to that of the citizen, to remain within the country, and that the alien is entitled to constitutional protection in that matter to the same extent as the citizen. Their second line of defense is that if any power to deport domiciled aliens exists it is so dispersed that the judiciary must concur in the grounds for its exercise to the extent of finding them reasonable. The argument goes on to the contention that the grounds prescribed by the Act of 1940 bear no reasonable relation to protection of legitimate interests of the United States and concludes that the Act should be declared invalid. Admittedly these propositions are not founded in precedents of this Court.

For over thirty years each of these aliens has enjoyed such advantages as accrue from residence here without renouncing his foreign allegiance or formally acknowledging adherence to the Constitution he now invokes. Each was admitted to the United States, upon passing formidable exclusionary hurdles, in the hope that, after what may be called a probationary period, he would desire and be found desirable for citizenship. Each has been offered naturalization, with all of the rights and privileges of citizenship, conditioned only upon open and honest assumption of undivided allegiance to our Government. But acceptance was and is not compulsory. Each has been permitted to prolong his original nationality indefinitely.

So long as one thus perpetuates a dual status as an American inhabitant but foreign citizen, he may derive advantages from two sources of law—American and international. He may claim protection against our Government unavailable to the citizen. As an alien he retains a claim upon the state of his citizenship to diplomatic intervention on his behalf, a patronage often of considerable value. The state of origin of each of these aliens could presently enter diplomatic remonstrance against these deportations if they were inconsistent with international law, the prevailing custom among nations or their own practices.

42 below. A similar strategy has occasionally worked in challenges to a (now toned down) provision that once precluded the granting of permanent residence on the basis of any marriage entered into during exclusion or deportation proceedings unless the subject had left the United States for at least two years after the marriage. Because you will better understand the significance of the labelling strategy once you have studied the substantive contours of the plenary power doctrine, these cases will be deferred until then.

c. SUBSTANTIVE APPLICATIONS OF THE PLENARY POWER DOCTRINE

You have now considered the applicability of procedural due process to noncitizens in the contexts of both exclusion and deportation. The pattern of judicial deference that you have observed is one of staunch absolutism in the early decisions, followed by exceptions and qualifications in the later decisions. This section moves from procedure to substance. As you work through the cases, watch for some of the same themes that have prompted such exceptional restraint in the procedural due process cases.

Harisiades v. Shaughnessy

Supreme Court of the United States, 1952.
342 U.S. 580, 72 S.Ct. 512, 96 L.Ed. 586.

[All three plaintiffs had been LPRs for several decades, since their arrival in the United States as teenagers. Two were now married to United States citizens and one to another LPR. All had United States citizen children.]

The three plaintiffs joined the Communist Party at various times after entry. All three eventually left the Party; one quit voluntarily, and in the other two cases the Party discontinued membership for reasons that will appear in section III of the Court's opinion. After the party membership of all three plaintiffs had terminated, Congress enacted legislation that rendered deportable, among others, noncitizens who had ever been members of organizations that advocate the overthrow of the government by force and violence. In administrative proceedings, all three were found deportable on that ground. In each case there was an uncontested finding that the Communist Party advocates forceful overthrow of the Government.¹⁹ Through various procedures, all three plaintiffs brought actions to challenge the constitutionality of the new law. In each case the lower court upheld the statute and entered judgment for the government.]

¹⁹ Congress later amended the statute to make either present or past membership in the Communist Party a specific ground for deportation. See INA § 241(a)(6)(C), pre-1990 version. The amendment eliminated the need for findings, in individual cases, that the Communist Party advocates the forceful overthrow of the Government. In 1990 Congress largely eliminated this ground but replaced it with a provision that raises different issues. See pages 440-41, 588-89 below.—Eds.

the legal system frequently cast as victims, the lack of interpretation forces those clients into ever-smaller zones of autonomy. The client is effaced, reduced to a mute, dark figure, uncomprehending of all that transpires around her.

Muneer I. Ahmad, Interpreting Communities: Lawyering Across Language Difference, 54 UCLA L. Rev. 999 (2007).

Modern conceptions of the process due in deportation proceedings are far more expansive. See, e.g., Massieu v. Reno, 915 F.Supp. 681 (D.N.J. 1996) (striking down, as impermissibly vague and therefore violative of due process, a deportation provision requiring “potentially serious adverse foreign policy consequences”), rev’d on other grounds, 91 F.3d 416 (3d Cir. 1996). For more detail on the procedural due process exception to the plenary power doctrine, see Stephen H. Legomsky, Immigration Law and the Principle of Plenary Congressional Power, 1984 Supreme Ct. Rev. 255, 298–99; accord, Hiroshi Motomura, The Curious Evolution of Immigration Law: Procedural Surrogates for Substantive Constitutional Rights, 92 Columbia L.Rev. 1625 (1992).

6. Does due process or any other constitutional safeguard mandate some opportunity for judicial review of administratively final deportation orders? Does it matter whether the alleged error is one of fact or one of law? If law, does it matter whether the underlying claim is that Congress (or the executive branch) has violated the Constitution? Several provisions of IIRIRA could be read to bar judicial review of Congress’s own decisions and executive branch decisions in the field of immigration. This subject is discussed in chapter 9, section B.6(b).

7. Yamataya was decided before Mezei. Yet the Court in Mezei declined to extend due process guarantees to a returning LPR in exclusion proceedings. The Court’s refusal produced no technical inconsistency; it relied on the distinction between exclusion and deportation. From a policy standpoint, however, do you agree that that distinction should be conclusive? In answering, consider again the individual interests at stake in the two proceedings. Do they differ appreciably? Or is that beside the point? Consider again the theories, discussed in the Notes following Fong Yue Ting, for distinguishing exclusion from deportation. For purposes of the policies reflected in those theories, is the exclusion of a returning LPR more like exclusion of an initial entrant or more like deportation of one who has entered?

8. The openings that cases like Kwong Hai Chew, Plasencia, Yamataya, and others have left for procedural due process challenges have not gone unnoticed. One effect of those openings has been to encourage noncitizens to cast in procedural due process terms those constitutional attacks that could arguably be described as either substantive or procedural. That strategy succeeded several times in challenges to a statutory provision that prohibits the Attorney General from releasing certain categories of noncitizen criminal offenders on bail while their deportation proceedings are pending—until 2003, when the Supreme Court upheld mandatory detention in Demore v. Hyung Joon Kim, covered on pages 226– for a determination of whether the policy violates due process on the facts of the particular case).

Professor Muneer Ahmad puts the point well:

Both in and out of the courtroom, limited English proficiency and the exclusionary tendencies of legal discourse frequently conspire not only to frustrate lawyer-client communication, but to expel the client from her own case, or even her own life. Even as a client's life hangs in the balance, she is often cast out of it. This existential dispossession is on clear display in immigration court, where interpretation is typically provided only for the testimony of non-English-speaking witnesses. While at first glance this might seem a pragmatic rule in light of the limited resources of immigration courts and the time and expense necessary for meaningful interpretation, closer inspection reveals its dehumanizing dimensions.

For example, in one recent case, two of my students represented a Francophone immigrant woman seeking asylum in the United States based on extreme persecution she had suffered in her country of origin due to her political activities there. The students were aware that the immigration court's official interpreter would only provide interpretation of questions put to the client in English, and of the client's responses in French, and therefore arranged for their own interpreter to provide simultaneous interpretation of the rest of the proceedings. However, the immigration judge prohibited the student's interpreter from doing so, stating that the student's interpreter would be distracting to the court's. As a result, vast portions of the client's case—at base, a referendum on whether she was worthy of U.S. protection or should be returned to a country where she believed she would be killed—transpired in the client's physical presence but her mental absence.

It was not merely preliminary or administrative matters, such as a review of the exhibits, that went uninterpreted, but also the students' opening statement, and the lengthy direct examination of the client's psychologist regarding the client's mental health and her symptoms of post-traumatic stress disorder. The failure to provide, or even allow, interpretation of these elements of the client's trial may well compromise the client's ability to participate in her own case. But beyond this important practical concern, the lack of complete interpretation perpetuates law's exclusionary tendencies in exactly the moment when the client seeks the law's assistance to gain inclusion. The students' opening statement, as well as her psychologist's testimony, are fundamentally stories about the client, stories replete with intimate and violent details of her life. That such stories are told about her, in front of her, but without permitting (much less enabling) her comprehension, is jarring to say the least. Particularly for clients whom lawyers or the statute violated due process. The Court, however, reads the statute differently. To reach its statutory conclusion, the Court relies on its belief that due process does indeed attach in deportation proceedings. Be sure you understand how the Court's constitutional analysis shapes its interpretation of the statute. What maxim of statutory construction is the Court employing?

2. What if Congress, in prescribing the mechanics for deportation, had expressly eliminated the possibility of notice of charges and opportunity to be heard? Would the Court have struck down the statute, or was the holding in Yamataya meant only to limit executive action?

3. Is Yamataya consistent with Fong Yue Ting?

4. The Court leaves open whether a noncitizen who entered the country clandestinely and who has not been present long enough to be "in any real sense, a part of our population" may claim due process rights. The Court's statement also leaves unclear whether due process extends to the noncitizen who enters lawfully but has been in the country only a short time or, conversely, the noncitizen who entered clandestinely but has been here a long time.

Today the law is clear that all individuals who face expulsion are protected by due process, whether they entered the United States lawfully or clandestinely and whether they arrived long ago or recently. Recall the dictum in Mezei, page 158 above, that "aliens who have once passed through our gates, even illegally, may be expelled only after proceedings conforming to traditional standards of fairness encompassed in due process of law" [emphasis added]. As a result, most of the important due process battles in the deportation setting have concerned only the content of the process that is due.

5. As to content, consider how the Court in Yamataya applies the requirements of due process. The immigrant, who had not been represented by counsel, alleged that because of language difficulties she had been unable to understand the questions asked of her and had not understood even that deportation was at issue. Still, the Court held the due process requirements satisfied. What if the proceedings had been conducted in her absence?¹⁸ Would the Court still have found the procedure adequate? Is there a meaningful difference between a hearing at which the person is absent and one that is conducted in a language she cannot understand? See Tejeda-Mata v. INS, 626 F.2d 721, 726-27 (9th Cir.1980) (implicitly holding absence of interpreter violative of due process, but affirming deportation order because error harmless); El Rescate Legal Services v. EOIR, 959 F.2d 742 (9th Cir. 1992) (holding that the BIA policy of not automatically translating removal proceedings in their entirety reflects a permissible reading of both the statute and the Attorney General's regulations, and finding no facial constitutional defect, but remanding to the district court all opportunity to be heard upon the questions involving his right to be and remain in the United States. No such arbitrary power can exist where the principles involved in due process of law are recognized.

18. The Immigration Act of 1990 expressly authorizes in absentia deportation hearings under certain circumstances. The issues are considered on pages 811-12 below.

This is the reasonable construction of the acts of Congress here in question, and they need not be otherwise interpreted. In the case of all acts of Congress, such interpretation ought to be adopted as, without doing violence to the import of the words used, will bring them into harmony with the Constitution. An act of Congress must be taken to be constitutional unless the contrary plainly and palpably appears. The words here used do not require an interpretation that would invest executive or administrative officers with the absolute, arbitrary power implied in the contention of the appellant. Besides, the record now before us shows that the appellant had notice, although not a formal one, of the investigation instituted for the purpose of ascertaining whether she was illegally in this country. The traverse to the return made by the Immigration Inspector shows upon its face that she was before that officer pending the investigation of her right to be in the United States, and made answers to questions propounded to her. It is true that she pleads a want of knowledge of our language; that she did not understand the nature and import of the questions propounded to her; that the investigation made was a "pretended" one; and that she did not, at the time, know that the investigation had reference to her being deported from the country. These considerations cannot justify the intervention of the courts. They could have been presented to the officer having primary control of such a case, as well as upon an appeal to the Secretary of the Treasury, who had power to order another investigation if that course was demanded by law or by the ends of justice. It is not to be assumed that either would have refused a second or fuller investigation, if a proper application and showing for one had been made by or for the appellant. Whether further investigation should have been ordered was for the officers, charged with the execution of the statutes, to determine. Their action in that regard is not subject to judicial review. Suffice it to say, it does not appear that appellant was denied an opportunity to be heard. And as no appeal was taken to the Secretary from the decision of the Immigration Inspector, that decision was final and conclusive. If the appellant's want of knowledge of the English language put her at some disadvantage in the investigation conducted by that officer, that was her misfortune, and constitutes no reason, under the acts of Congress, or under any rule of law, for the intervention of the court by habeas corpus. We perceive no ground for such intervention—none for the contention that due process of law was denied to appellant.

The judgment is Affirmed.

■ MR. JUSTICE BREWER and MR. JUSTICE PECKHAM dissented.

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. Yamataya argued that the statute denied her notice of the charges and the opportunity to be heard. She maintained that, as thus construed, country; establish regulations for sending out of the country such aliens as come here in violation of law; and commit the enforcement of such provisions, conditions and regulations exclusively to executive officers, without judicial intervention, are principles firmly established by the decisions of this court. Nishimura Ekiu v. United States; Fong Yue Ting v. United States.

* * *

It is contended, however, that in respect of an alien who has already landed it is consistent with the acts of Congress that he may be deported without previous notice of any purpose to deport him, and without any opportunity on his part to show by competent evidence before the executive officers charged with the execution of the acts of Congress, that he is not here in violation of law; that the deportation of an alien without provision for such a notice and for an opportunity to be heard was inconsistent with the due process of law required by the Fifth Amendment of the Constitution.

Leaving on one side the question whether an alien can rightfully invoke the due process clause of the Constitution who has entered the country clandestinely, and who has been here for too brief a period to have become, in any real sense, a part of our population, before his right to remain is disputed, we have to say that the rigid construction of the acts of Congress suggested by the appellant are not justified. Those acts do not necessarily exclude opportunity to the immigrant to be heard, when such opportunity is of right. * * * Now, it has been settled that the power to exclude or expel aliens belonged to the political department of the Government, and that the order of an executive officer, invested with the power to determine finally the facts upon which an alien's right to enter this country, or remain in it, depended, was "due process of law, and no other tribunal, unless expressly authorized by law to do so, was at liberty to reexamine the evidence on which he acted, or to controvert its sufficiency." Fong Yue Ting v. United States; Ekiu v. United States. But this court has never held, nor must we now be understood as holding, that administrative officers, when executing the provisions of a statute involving the liberty of persons, may disregard the fundamental principles that inhere in "due process of law" as understood at the time of the adoption of the Constitution. One of these principles is that no person shall be deprived of his liberty without opportunity, at some time, to be heard, before such officers, in respect of the matters upon which that liberty depends—not necessarily an opportunity upon a regular, set occasion, and according to the forms of judicial procedure, but one that will secure the prompt, vigorous action contemplated by Congress, and at the same time be appropriate to the nature of the case upon which such officers are required to act. Therefore, it is not competent for the Secretary of the Treasury or any executive officer, at any time within the year limited by the statute, arbitrarily to cause an alien, who has entered the country, and has become subject in all respects to its jurisdiction, and a part of its population, although alleged to be illegally here, to be taken into custody and deported without giving him

Obama, 555 F.3d 1022 (D.C. Cir. 2009), a post-Boumediene decision. Chinese Uighurs who had been detained at Guantánamo, but were then found not to be enemy combatants, brought habeas actions to challenge their continued detention. The DC Circuit, citing Mezei, held that due process did not compel their release because, for them, release would have entailed admission to the United States, a remedy that the court concluded it could not grant against the wishes of the executive branch. (At this writing the U.S. is refusing to return the Uighurs to China for fear they will be tortured, and no other country has agreed to accept them.)

Still another plausible distinction is that the plaintiffs in Boumediene did not come voluntarily to Guantánamo; they had been captured by U.S. forces and brought there forcibly. Mezei came voluntarily to Ellis Island, albeit in reliance on a visa issued to him by U.S. authorities.

b. PROCEDURAL DUE PROCESS IN DEPORTATION CASES: MORE CRACKS IN THE PLENARY CONGRESSIONAL POWER

As the preceding materials demonstrate, the line of cases that began with Nishimura Ekiu and culminated in Knauff and Mezei took an extremely hard stand. Those cases seemed to hold that excluded noncitizens simply could not invoke the due process clause at all—even when they were returning residents and even when the practical consequence of exclusion was indefinite detention. As you also saw, however, this principle of absolute congressional power to decide the procedure for excluding noncitizens began to develop cracks. The Supreme Court decisions in Kwong Hai Chew and Plasencia (coming before and after Mezei, respectively) created exceptions for most returning residents.

But in the deportation context the principle of congressional omnipotence had already developed a much wider fissure. The leading case follows:

Yamataya v. Fisher (The Japanese Immigrant Case)

Supreme Court of the United States, 1903.
189 U.S. 86, 23 S.Ct. 611, 47 L.Ed. 721.

■ MR. JUSTICE HARLAN * * * delivered the opinion of the Court.

[Four days after entering the United States, a citizen of Japan was deported on the ground that she had been inadmissible at the time of entry. The basis for the alleged inadmissibility was that she was a pauper and likely to become a public charge. She challenged her deportation order on grounds described in the opinion.—Eds.]

* * *

The constitutionality of the legislation in question, in its general aspects, is no longer open to discussion in this court. That Congress may exclude aliens of a particular race from the United States; prescribe the terms and conditions upon which certain classes of aliens may come to this a reason to deny them such hearings. And in both cases, plaintiffs sought habeas corpus to challenge those denials. If anything, Mezei's case was stronger in at least one respect; the United States had not only "jurisdiction and control" over the place where he was detained, but actual sovereignty. Yet in Boumediene the Court held that the Constitution entitled the detainees to a "meaningful opportunity" to challenge the lawfulness of their detention. In Mezei the Court had rejected such a right. Does this mean that Mezei has been implicitly overruled to that extent?

Some might argue that there is not really any inconsistency. The Court in Mezei acknowledged (in the 6th paragraph of the case) that Mezei "may by habeas corpus test the validity of his exclusion." (The Court does not expressly say that habeas will also lie to challenge the detention, but presumably his detention would have ended had he been ordered admitted.) The suggestion is that he has chosen the right form of action to get his case before a federal court, but that he loses on the merits because his status as an excluded noncitizen leaves him with no due process right to a hearing. Thus, one might argue, there is no conflict; both cases recognize the right to habeas corpus by noncitizens who have not been admitted into the United States. The Court in Boumediene made clear, however, that in their habeas actions the plaintiffs must have a "meaningful opportunity" to establish that they were being unlawfully detained; surely the government could not prevail merely by alleging that the plaintiffs are enemy combatants. Arguably, the same reasoning would entitle Mezei to a hearing at which he could challenge the lawfulness of his detention.

One possible distinction is that Mezei is an immigration case (even the detention was viewed as a component of his exclusion), and in this area the plenary power doctrine operates to minimize judicial review. But that answer seems unsatisfying. The reasons that are usually trotted out to justify special judicial deference to Congress in immigration matters include the link with foreign affairs, the notion that noncitizens are merely "guests" (as opposed to full members of the political community), the idea that the particular federal power is inherent in sovereignty, and the claim that the Constitution does not apply outside U.S. territory. See Stephen H. Legomsky, Immigration Law and the Principle of Plenary Congressional Power, 1984 Supreme Ct. Rev. 255, 260–78. Those reasons would seem to apply at least as strongly to cases like Boumediene, where the relevant congressional resolutions involve war and national security.

Perhaps the most convincing distinction is that the only way to release Mezei from detention would have been to admit him to the United States. (No other country would take him.) Since the Court in Mezei believed that a noncitizen has no "right" to enter the United States, it assumed a noncitizen must also have no right to a hearing on whether he or she fits Congress's criteria for admission—a nonsequitur to be sure, but the point here is that the Court in Boumediene did not face that problem. The petitioners were asking only to be released from detention so that they could return home; they were not seeking admission into the United States. That distinction appears to have been adopted sub silentio in Kiyemba v.

cases—have one element in common. The noncitizens who raised them were arriving passengers who faced exclusion, rather than individuals who had already entered the United States and faced deportation. The decisions in Mezei and most of the other cases, moreover, considered only the question of procedural due process. Thus, two detention-related questions remained: Does the procedural due process holding in Mezei extend to deportable detainees? And, due process aside, for either a deportable or an inadmissible noncitizen whom there is no realistic likelihood of expelling, does indefinite detention violate the INA? To what extent is the statutory interpretation affected by the constitutional questions that a permissive reading would generate? These questions are taken up in the discussion of the Zadvydas and Martinez decisions on pages 206–26 below.

3. Analogous issues have arisen in connection with the noncitizens captured by U.S. forces during the war in Afghanistan and detained at the U.S. naval station at Guantánamo Bay, Cuba. In Rasul v. Bush, 542 U.S. 466, 124 S.Ct. 2686, 159 L.Ed.2d 548 (2004), the Supreme Court held that the federal habeas corpus statute extended to Guantánamo. Thus, the prisoners (at least the plaintiffs before the Court, all of whom were third country nationals rather than “enemy aliens”) could use habeas corpus to test the legality of their detentions. The Court reached that result on statutory interpretation grounds, but only because it believed that a contrary reading of the statute would have raised serious constitutional questions. The so-called “suspension clause,” U.S. Const. art. I, § 9, cl. 2, bars suspension of the writ of habeas corpus (except in cases of rebellion or invasion, which the government was not arguing). After Congress in 2006 amended the relevant statutes to bar the use of habeas by the Guantánamo detainees, the Court in Boumediene v. Bush, 128 S.Ct. 2229, 171 L.Ed.2d 41 (2008), had to confront the constitutional question directly. The government argued that the suspension clause did not apply on Guantánamo or to people whom the President had designated “enemy combatants” (even those who denied being enemy combatants). By a vote of 5–4 the Court rejected the government’s arguments, holding that the Guantánamo detainees had a constitutional right to test the legality of their detentions by filing habeas actions in U.S. district court. The Court further held that, at a minimum, habeas entitled the detainees to a “meaningful opportunity” to demonstrate that their confinements were unlawful. The Court declined to speculate further as to the content of the habeas remedy.

The Court in Boumediene did not discuss either Knauff or Mezei despite striking similarities. The Guantánamo detainees in Boumediene, like Mezei, were noncitizens outside the United States. In Rasul, U.S. “jurisdiction and control” over Guantánamo were the key rationales for finding habeas applicable there; and the U.S. certainly had no more “jurisdiction and control” over Guantánamo than it had over Ellis Island. Like Mezei, they were detained indefinitely by U.S. authorities. In neither case was anyone charged with a crime. In both cases the detainees claimed that due process entitled them to hearings to test the legality of their detentions. In both cases the U.S. government invoked national security as

In 1987 the Justice Department (a) instituted a program for reviewing which of the remaining detainees on the list of 2746 should be repatriated to Cuba; and (b) started reviewing the cases of all non-repatriated detainees to determine whether release on parole was warranted. See 8 C.F.R.

§ 212.12 (2004). Somewhere between 94,000 and 100,000 of the original 125,000 Marielitos eventually received lawful permanent residence under special legislation discussed on pages 1178–79 below.

During roughly the same time period, significant numbers of Haitians began fleeing to the United States by boat with the hope of receiving asylum. The position of the Reagan Administration was that these asylum claims were generally without merit. It believed that a policy of detaining the Haitians while their exclusion proceedings were pending would deter people from coming. The high volume of applications had, however, produced a heavy backlog of undecided cases. As a result, the Haitian asylum-seekers often had to wait several years for decisions, and in the meantime they languished in detention. The merits of their asylum claims and the procedures for adjudicating them are explored in chapter 11 below.

Haitian and Cuban detainees were differently situated. The Haitian government, unlike Cuba's, was prepared to take them back. The Haitian detainees, however, asserted fears of persecution if returned to Haiti. Although their detention at least would not be permanent, the slowness of the asylum process meant they could be detained for many years.

In August 1994 a new exodus from Cuba suddenly began. Thousands of rafters were allowed to leave for the United States. Until then, Cubans who had made their way to the United States had generally been either admitted or paroled, and eventually allowed to adjust to permanent residence under the Cuban Adjustment Act of 1966. In a dramatic policy shift, the United States started interdicting Cuban vessels and transporting the occupants to Guantánamo. See generally 71 IR 1091–93 (Aug. 22, 1994).

In September 1994, the United States and Cuba entered into an agreement. Cuba agreed to “take effective measures in every way it can to prevent unsafe departures, using mainly persuasive methods.” The United States agreed to continue to issue visas to qualifying immigrants at the United States Interests section in Havana, and to guarantee that at least 20,000 Cubans per year (plus the immediate relatives of US citizens) would be allowed to migrate to the United States. For the full text of the agreement, see 71 IR 1236–37 (Sept. 12, 1994). A good comprehensive discussion of the Cuban exodus is Joyce A. Hughes, Flight from Cuba, 36 California Western L. Rev. 39 (1999). At this writing a number of the original Cuban Marielitos remain indefinitely detained.

In recent years Haitian boat people have again resumed perilous passages to the United States by boat, despite U.S. policies of interdicting vessels and automatically detaining those Haitians who make it to U.S. shores. See generally pages 1062–85 below.

The detention issues that have arisen in all the cases discussed above—Mezei, Plasencia, Kwong Hai Chew, the Cuban cases, and the Haitian of government interference—e.g. not being detained—than there is when one is seeking the government’s affirmative help, such as requesting admission to the U.S.). Why, then, was due process inapplicable to Mezei? What was the Court’s point when it stated that the “harborage [the Court’s term], an act of legislative grace, bestows no additional rights”?

2. The indefinite detention of excluded noncitizens is not just a relic of the Cold War era. It has remained a vital issue in recent years. In 1980, the Cuban government sent approximately 125,000 of its nationals to the United States by boat. Most of these “Marielitos” (so-called because they had departed from the port of Mariel, Cuba) had relatives in the United States. Among the new arrivals, however, were 2746 whom the former INS identified as either having committed serious crimes or having mental illnesses that made them dangerous to society. The United States sought to return the 2746 to Cuba, but Cuba would not take them back. The United States government, citing public safety, was unwilling to release them from confinement. Yet the alternative—indefinite detention—seemed at least equally unacceptable.¹⁷

As a partial response, the Justice Department began releasing on administrative “parole,” an uncertain status that you will see in various contexts throughout this book, those Cuban detainees who were felt not to be dangerous. See INA § 212(d)(5); Note, Legal Fictions Mask Human Suffering: The Detention of the Mariel Cubans—Constitutional, Statutory, International Law, and Human Considerations, 62 Southern California L.Rev. 1733, 1736 (1989) [hereafter cited as Southern California Note]. In December 1984, after years of negotiation, the United States and Cuba reached an agreement. Cuba would take back, at the rate of 100 per month, the 2746 named individuals whom the former INS had originally separated out. See Press Statement, White House Office of the Press Secretary (Dec. 14, 1984), reproduced in 61 IR at 1080–85 (1984). The agreement was short-lived. Soon after the initial installments of prisoners had been delivered, President Reagan intensified the anti-Castro broadcasts of Radio Marti to the Caribbean. President Castro retaliated by suspending the agreement.

To complicate matters, several thousand of those who had been released on parole either committed crimes or otherwise violated the terms of their parole. The INS revoked parole in those cases and took the offenders back into custody. Southern California Note, above, at 1736–37. Many were housed at the Atlanta Penitentiary under grossly crowded conditions that a congressional subcommittee would later describe as “brutal and inhumane,” and “intolerable.” Id. at 1741. Others were detained at the Oakdale Federal Detention Center in Louisiana. Id. at 1739–40.

17. See generally Richard A. Boswell, Rethinking Exclusion—the Rights of Cuban Refugees Facing Indefinite Detention in the United States, 17 Vanderbilt J. Transnat’l L. 925 (1984); Paul W. Schmidt, Detention of Aliens, 24 San Diego L.Rev. 305, 324–29 (1987); see also Maryellen Fullerton, Cuban Exceptionalism: Migration and Asylum in Spain and the United States, 35 Inter-American L. Rev. 527 (2004).

be irrelevant. Rafeedie v. I.N.S., 880 F.2d 506, 519–24 (D.C.Cir.1989). Even the presence of national security factors, while relevant to what process is due, would not render the due process clause inoperative. Id. at 523.

5. Suppose the applicability of due process to returning residents in exclusion proceedings were a question of first impression. What principle would you lay down? Should every returning resident be accorded due process rights? Only certain ones? None?

For that matter, why stop with returning residents? Why not hold that every noncitizen applying for admission at the United States border is protected by the due process clause? Your immediate instinct might be that the U.S. lacks the resources to conduct full-scale evidentiary hearings for all of the literally millions of noncitizens who want to enter the country. Remember, however, that holding due process applicable does not mean requiring elaborate formal adjudication. As the Court observed in Eldridge, the process that is due reflects the financial and administrative costs to the government. Second and more important, recognizing procedural due process in no way relaxes the substantive criteria for admission. Perhaps even those who fail the substantive requirements will travel to the United States in the hope of being admitted by immigration officials despite their inadmissibility, but (apart from asylum cases, which generate special issues discussed in chapter 11, section B below) are they really going to do so solely because their inadmissibility will be ascertained only after a fair hearing? And even if people were willing to take that gamble, would commercial carriers, who are generally liable for the expenses resulting from the exclusion of undocumented passengers, see INA § 257, be willing to transport them?

If practicality does not explain the Court's refusal to hold due process generally applicable to arriving noncitizens, what does? Are we again back to the distinction between rights and privileges? Is it a belief that no liberty or property interests are at stake? Is it the notion, suggested by Justice Brewer in his Fong Yue Ting dissent, that the Constitution is simply inapplicable to those noncitizens who are deemed to be outside United States territory? Is it, as Justice Brewer also suggested, the interdependence of allegiance and protection? Is it the perceived sovereign source of the power to exclude? Is it the perceived connection between exclusion and foreign affairs?

NOTES AND QUESTIONS ON THE DETENTION OF EXCLUDED NONCITIZENS

1. Mezei faced more than exclusion; he faced the prospect of indefinite, possibly life-long, detention. Even one who believes that the noncitizen's interest in admission is not a liberty interest would surely concede that detention is a deprivation of liberty. See, e.g., Tung Yin, Procedural Due Process to Determine "Enemy Combatant" Status in the War on Terrorism, 73 Tennessee L. Rev. 351 (2006) (arguing that, for due process purposes, there is more reason to recognize a liberty interest in being free present resident alien is entitled to a fair hearing when threatened with deportation * * * [More, shortly, on the applicability of due process to deportation proceedings—Eds.]

* * *

If the permanent resident alien's absence is extended, of course, he may lose his entitlement to "assimilat[ion of his] status," Kwong Hai Chew v. Colding, to that of an alien continuously residing and physically present in the United States. In Shaughnessy v. United States ex rel. Mezei, this Court rejected the argument of an alien who had left the country for some 20 months that he was entitled to due process in assessing his right to admission on his return. We did not suggest that no returning resident alien has a right to due process, for we explicitly reaffirmed Chew. We need not now decide the scope of Mezei; it does not govern this case, for Plasencia was absent from the country only a few days, and the United States has conceded that she has a right to due process.

The constitutional sufficiency of procedures provided in any situation, of course, varies with the circumstances. In evaluating the procedures in any case, the courts must consider the interest at stake for the individual, the risk of an erroneous deprivation of the interest through the procedures used as well as the probable value of additional or different procedural safeguards, and the interest of the government in using the current procedures rather than additional or different procedures. Mathews v. Eldridge. Plasencia's interest here is, without question, a weighty one. She stands to lose the right "to stay and live and work in this land of freedom." Further, she may lose the right to rejoin her immediate family, a right that ranks high among the interests of the individual. The Government's interest in efficient administration of the immigration laws at the border also is weighty. Further, it must weigh heavily in the balance that control over matters of immigration is a sovereign prerogative, largely within the control of the Executive and the Legislature. The role of the judiciary is limited to determining whether the procedures meet the essential standard of fairness under the Due Process Clause and does not extend to imposing procedures that merely displace congressional choices of policy. * * *

459 U.S. at 32–35, 103 S.Ct. at 329–30, 74 L.Ed.2d at 32–34. See generally Kevin R. Johnson, Maria and Joseph Plasencia's Lost Weekend: The Case of Landon v. Plasencia, in David A. Martin & Peter H. Schuck (eds.), Immigration Stories, chap. 9 (2005).

The D.C. Circuit later reconciled Mezei with Kwong Hai Chew and Plasencia on the sole basis of duration of absence. Only when the trip was lengthy, the court held, would a returning resident be stripped of his or her due process rights; nefarious activities associated with the excursion would

NOTES AND QUESTIONS ON THE EXCLUSION OF RETURNING RESIDENTS: SOME CRACKS IN THE PLENARY CONGRESSIONAL POWER

1. In dismissing Mezei's due process argument, the Court explicitly refuses to distinguish initial entrants from returning residents. Should that distinction matter? If so, should it go to the applicability of due process or to the content of the process that is due?

2. Concerning the content of due process, would in camera disclosure of the confidential evidence be desirable? Justice Jackson finds that solution unacceptable. In original footnote 9 of his dissent, he suggests that in camera revelations would be self-defeating if the noncitizen is present and unproductive otherwise. Do you agree? How do you come out if you apply the Eldridge factors, discussed in the Notes following Fong Yue Ting? Would an in camera procedure be sufficient? Would it be too intrusive? Just right? In 1996, Congress authorized (but at this writing the executive branch has yet to use) a special in camera procedure for determining the admissibility or the deportability of noncitizens suspected to be terrorists. INA §§ 501-07, discussed on pages 765-68 below; see also David A. Martin, Graduated Application of Constitutional Protections for Aliens: The Real Meaning of Zadvydas v. Davis, 2001 Supreme Ct. Rev. 47. Chapter 10 of this book examines how national security has affected, and how it should affect, this and other areas of immigration law.

3. The Court distinguishes Kwong Hai Chew v. Colding on the facts. How persuasive do you find the distinctions? Can you articulate general principles that are compatible with the results of both cases?

4. The most significant post-Mezei development on the subject of due process for excluded noncitizens is Landon v. Plasencia, 459 U.S. 21, 103 S.Ct. 321, 74 L.Ed.2d 21 (1982). An LPR left the United States for a two-day visit to Tijuana, Mexico. Upon her attempted return she was ordered excluded. The charge was that she had assisted other noncitizens to enter the United States unlawfully. Plasencia argued that the statutory exclusion procedures violated due process. The Court said:

* * * We agree with Plasencia that under the circumstances of this case, she can invoke the Due Process Clause on returning to this country, although we do not decide the contours of the process that is due or whether the process accorded Plasencia was insufficient.

This Court has long held that an alien seeking initial admission to the United States requests a privilege and has no constitutional rights regarding his application, for the power to admit or exclude aliens is a sovereign prerogative. See, e.g., United States ex rel. Knauff v. Shaughnessy; Nishimura Ekiu v. United States. Our recent decisions confirm that view. [H]owever, once an alien gains admission to our country and begins to develop the ties that go with permanent residence, his constitutional status changes accordingly. Our cases have frequently suggested that a continuously

It is inconceivable to me that this measure of simple justice and fair dealing would menace the security of this country. No one can make me believe that we are that far gone.

GENERAL NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. Just as Knauff ultimately received relief from the BIA, so too Mezei, after exceptional publicity and four years of detention on Ellis Island, was paroled into the United States. See Charles D. Weisselberg, The Exclusion and Detention of Aliens: Lessons from the Lives of Ellen Knauff and Ignatz Mezei, 143 Univ. Pennsylvania L.Rev. 933, 964–84 (1995). The fate of lesser known individuals excluded on security grounds without hearings is more difficult to discover.

2. How far did the Court go in Mezei? Did it hold only that, in light of national security considerations peculiar to the case, the process afforded was all that was due? Or did it hold, more broadly, that a noncitizen facing exclusion may not invoke the due process clause at all? One modern decision so interpreted Knauff and Mezei, holding that a noncitizen who seeks initial entry has literally no due process rights concerning his or her admission or exclusion. Pazcoquin v. Radcliffe, 292 F.3d 1209, 1218 (9th Cir. 2002). Professor Henry Hart, in his classic dialogue, The Power of Congress to Limit the Jurisdiction of the Federal Courts: An Exercise in Dialectic, 66 Harvard L.Rev. 1362, 1391–96 (1953), similarly read Knauff and Mezei as denying the very applicability of due process to excluded noncitizens. So construing them, he criticized these cases sharply. Subsequent commentary has been similarly critical.¹⁶

3. Adjudication procedures for arriving noncitizens who are alleged to be threats to the national security pose difficult policy problems. Since 1996 the INA has prescribed a procedure similar to the one applied in Mezei. See INA § 235(c), discussed in chapter 6, section E.5.a below.

Apart from its teachings on the general applicability of procedural due process to excluded noncitizens, Mezei raises important issues concerning two more specific subjects: the exclusion of returning residents and the concomitant detention of inadmissible noncitizens.

camera enough to enable a judicial determination of the legality of the confinement. The Attorney General refused. I do not know just how an in camera proceeding would be handled in this kind of case. If respondent, with or without counsel, were present, disclosures to them might well result in disclosures by them. If they are not allowed to be present, it is hard to see how it would answer the purpose of testing the Government's case by cross-examination or counter-evidence, which is what a hearing is for. * * *

16. See, e.g., T. Alexander Aleinikoff, Aliens, Due Process, and "Community Ties": A Response to Martin, 44 Univ. Pittsburgh L.Rev. 237, 237–39, 258–60 (1983); Stephen H. Legomsky, Immigration and the Judiciary: Law and Politics in Britain and America 199–201 (1987); David A. Martin, Due Process and Membership in the National Community: Political Asylum and Beyond, 44 Univ. Pittsburgh L.Rev. 165, 173–80 (1983).

with the status of the accused. If the procedures used to judge this alien are fair and just, no good reason can be given why they should not be extended to simplify the condemnation of citizens. If they would be unfair to citizens, we cannot defend the fairness of them when applied to the more helpless and handicapped alien. This is at the root of our holdings that the resident alien must be given a fair hearing to test an official claim that he is one of a deportable class.

* * *

Because the respondent has no right of entry, does it follow that he has no rights at all? Does the power to exclude mean that exclusion may be continued or effectuated by any means which happen to seem appropriate to the authorities? It would effectuate his exclusion to eject him bodily into the sea or to set him adrift in a rowboat. Would not such measures be condemned judicially as a deprivation of life without due process of law? Suppose the authorities decide to disable an alien from entry by confiscating his valuables and money. Would we not hold this a taking of property without due process of law? Here we have a case that lies between the taking of life and the taking of property; it is the taking of liberty. It seems to me that this, occurring within the United States or its territorial waters, may be done only by proceedings which meet the test of due process of law.

Exclusion of an alien without judicial hearing, of course, does not deny due process when it can be accomplished merely by turning him back on land or returning him by sea. But when indefinite confinement becomes the means of enforcing exclusion, it seems to me that due process requires that the alien be informed of its grounds and have a fair chance to overcome them. This is the more due him when he is entrapped into leaving the other shore by reliance on a visa which the Attorney General refuses to honor.

It is evident that confinement of respondent no longer can be justified as a step in the process of turning him back to the country whence he came. Confinement is no longer ancillary to exclusion; it can now be justified only as the alternative to normal exclusion. It is an end in itself.

The Communist conspiratorial technique of infiltration poses a problem which sorely tempts the Government to resort to confinement of suspects on secret information secretly judged. I have not been one to discount the Communist evil. But my apprehensions about the security of our form of government are about equally aroused by those who refuse to recognize the dangers of Communism and those who will not see danger in anything else.

Congress has ample power to determine whom we will admit to our shores and by what means it will effectuate its exclusion policy. The only limitation is that it may not do so by authorizing United States officers to take without due process of law the life, the liberty or the property of an alien who has come within our jurisdiction; and that means he must meet a fair hearing with fair notice of the charges.¹⁵

15. [Footnote 9 in original] The trial individual with claims of security by suggesting that the Attorney General disclose in court sought to reconcile due process for the

to an artificial and unreal conclusion. We must regard this alien as deprived of liberty, and the question is whether the deprivation is a denial of due process of law.

The Government on this point argues that "no alien has any constitutional right to entry into the United States"; that "the alien has only such rights as Congress sees fit to grant in exclusion proceedings"; that "the so-called detention is still merely a continuation of the exclusion which is specifically authorized by Congress"; that since "the restraint is not incidental to an order [of exclusion] but is, itself, the effectuation of the exclusion order, there is no limit to its continuance" other than statutory, which means no limit at all. The Government all but adopts the words of one of the officials responsible for the administration of this Act who testified before a congressional committee as to an alien applicant, that "He has no rights."

The interpretations of the Fifth Amendment's command that no person shall be deprived of life, liberty or property without due process of law, come about to this: reasonable general legislation reasonably applied to the individual. The question is whether the Government's detention of respondent is compatible with these tests of substance and procedure.

* * *

III. PROCEDURAL DUE PROCESS.

Procedural fairness, if not all that originally was meant by due process of law, is at least what it most uncompromisingly requires. Procedural due process is more elemental and less flexible than substantive due process. It yields less to the times, varies less with conditions, and defers much less to legislative judgment. Insofar as it is technical law, it must be a specialized responsibility within the competence of the judiciary on which they do not bend before political branches of the Government, as they should on matters of policy which comprise substantive law.

If it be conceded that in some way this alien could be confined, does it matter what the procedure is? Only the untaught layman or the charlatan lawyer can answer that procedures matter not. Procedural fairness and regularity are of the indispensable essence of liberty. Severe substantive laws can be endured if they are fairly and impartially applied. Indeed, if put to the choice, one might well prefer to live under Soviet substantive law applied in good faith by our common-law procedures than under our substantive law enforced by Soviet procedural practices. Let it not be overlooked that due process of law is not for the sole benefit of an accused. It is the best insurance for the Government itself against those blunders which leave lasting stains on a system of justice but which are bound to occur on ex parte consideration. Cf. Knauff v. Shaughnessy, which was a near miss, saved by further administrative and congressional hearings from perpetrating an injustice.

Our law may, and rightly does, place more restrictions on the alien than on the citizen. But basic fairness in hearing procedures does not vary dispossessed, outlawed, or exiled save by the judgment of his peers or by the law of the land. The judges of England developed the writ of habeas corpus largely to preserve these immunities from executive restraint. Under the best tradition of Anglo-American law, courts will not deny hearing to an unconvicted prisoner just because he is an alien whose keep, in legal theory, is just outside our gates. Lord Mansfield, in the celebrated case holding that slavery was unknown to the common law of England, ran his writ of habeas corpus in favor of an alien, an African Negro slave, and against the master of a ship at anchor in the Thames.

I.

What is our case? In contemplation of law, I agree, it is that of an alien who asks admission to the country. Concretely, however, it is that of a lawful and law-abiding inhabitant of our country for a quarter of a century, long ago admitted for permanent residence, who seeks to return home. After a foreign visit to his aged and ailing mother that was prolonged by disturbed conditions of Eastern Europe, he obtained a visa for admission issued by our consul and returned to New York. There the Attorney General refused to honor his documents and turned him back as a menace to this Nation's security. This man, who seems to have led a life of unrelieved insignificance, must have been astonished to find himself suddenly putting the Government of the United States in such fear that it was afraid to tell him why it was afraid of him. He was shipped and reshipped to France, which twice refused him landing. Great Britain declined, and no other European country has been found willing to open its doors to him. Twelve countries of the American Hemisphere refused his applications. Since we proclaimed him a Samson who might pull down the pillars of our temple, we should not be surprised if people less prosperous, less strongly established and less stable feared to take him off our timorous hands. With something of a record as an unwanted man, neither his efforts nor those of the United States Government any longer promise to find him an abiding place. For nearly two years he was held in custody of the immigration authorities of the United States at Ellis Island, and if the Government has its way he seems likely to be detained indefinitely, perhaps for life, for a cause known only to the Attorney General.

Is respondent deprived of liberty? The Government answers that he was "transferred to Ellis Island on August 1, 1950, for safekeeping," and "is not being detained in the usual sense but is in custody solely to prevent him from gaining entry to the United States in violation of law. He is free to depart from the United States to any country of his own choice." Government counsel ingeniously argued that Ellis Island is his "refuge" whence he is free to take leave in any direction except west. That might mean freedom, if only he were an amphibian! Realistically, this man is incarcerated by a combination of forces which keep him as effectually as a prison, the dominant and proximate of these forces being the United States immigration authority. It overworks legal fiction to say that one is free in law when by the commonest of common sense he is bound. Despite the impeccable legal logic of the Government's argument on this point, it leads alien's continuous residence here. In such circumstances, we have no difficulty in holding respondent an entrant alien or "assimilated to [that] status" for constitutional purposes. That being so, the Attorney General may lawfully exclude respondent without a hearing as authorized by the emergency regulations promulgated pursuant to the Passport Act. Nor need he disclose the evidence upon which that determination rests.

There remains the issue of respondent's continued exclusion on Ellis Island. Aliens seeking entry from contiguous lands obviously can be turned back at the border without more. While the Government might keep entrants by sea aboard the vessel pending determination of their admissibility, resulting hardships to the alien and inconvenience to the carrier persuaded Congress to adopt a more generous course. By statute it authorized, in cases such as this, aliens' temporary removal from ship to shore. But such temporary harborage, an act of legislative grace, bestows no additional rights. Congress meticulously specified that such shelter ashore "shall not be considered a landing" nor relieve the vessel of the duty to transport back the alien if ultimately excluded. And this Court has long considered such temporary arrangements as not affecting an alien's status; he is treated as if stopped at the border.

Thus we do not think that respondent's continued exclusion deprives him of any statutory or constitutional right. It is true that resident aliens temporarily detained pending expeditious consummation of deportation proceedings may be released on bond by the Attorney General whose discretion is subject to judicial review. By that procedure aliens uprooted from our midst may rejoin the community until the Government effects their leave. An exclusion proceeding grounded on danger to the national security, however, presents different considerations; neither the rationale nor the statutory authority for such release exists. Ordinarily to admit an alien barred from entry on security grounds nullifies the very purpose of the exclusion proceeding; Congress in 1950 declined to include such authority in the statute. That exclusion by the United States plus other nations' inhospitality results in present hardship cannot be ignored. But, the times being what they are, Congress may well have felt that other countries ought not shift the onus to us; that an alien in respondent's position is no more ours than theirs. Whatever our individual estimate of that policy and the fears on which it rests, respondent's right to enter the United States depends on the congressional will, and courts cannot substitute their judgment for the legislative mandate.

Reversed.

[The dissenting opinion of Justice BLACK is omitted.]

* * *

■ MR. JUSTICE JACKSON, whom MR. JUSTICE FRANKFURTER joins, dissenting.

Fortunately it still is startling, in this country, to find a person held indefinitely in executive custody without accusation of crime or judicial trial. Executive imprisonment has been considered oppressive and lawless since John, at Runnymede, pledged that no free man should be imprisoned,

It is true that aliens who have once passed through our gates, even illegally, may be expelled only after proceedings conforming to traditional standards of fairness encompassed in due process of law. But an alien on the threshold of initial entry stands on a different footing: "Whatever the procedure authorized by Congress is, it is due process as far as an alien denied entry is concerned." Knauff v. Shaughnessy; Ekiu v. United States. And because the action of the executive officer under such authority is final and conclusive, the Attorney General cannot be compelled to disclose the evidence underlying his determinations in an exclusion case; "it is not within the province of any court, unless expressly authorized by law, to review the determination of the political branch of the Government." * * *

Neither respondent's harborage on Ellis Island nor his prior residence here transforms this into something other than an exclusion proceeding. Concededly, his movements are restrained by authority of the United States, and he may by habeas corpus test the validity of his exclusion. But that is true whether he enjoys temporary refuge on land, Ekiu v. United States, or remains continuously aboard ship. In sum, harborage at Ellis Island is not an entry into the United States. For purposes of the immigration laws, moreover, the legal incidents of an alien's entry remain unaltered whether he has been here once before or not. He is an entering alien just the same, and may be excluded if unqualified for admission under existing immigration laws.

To be sure, a lawful resident alien may not captiously be deprived of his constitutional rights to procedural due process. Only the other day we held that under some circumstances temporary absence from our shores cannot constitutionally deprive a returning lawfully resident alien of his right to be heard. Kwong Hai Chew v. Colding. Chew, an alien seaman admitted by an Act of Congress to permanent residence in the United States, signed articles of maritime employment as chief steward on a vessel of American registry with home port in New York City. Though cleared by the Coast Guard for his voyage, on his return from four months at sea he was "excluded" without a hearing on security grounds. On the facts of that case, including reference to § 307(d)(2) of the Nationality Act of 1940, we felt justified in "assimilating" his status for constitutional purposes to that of continuously present alien residents entitled to hearings at least before an executive or administrative tribunal. Accordingly, to escape constitutional conflict we held the administrative regulations authorizing exclusion without hearing in certain security cases inapplicable to aliens so protected by the Fifth Amendment.

But respondent's history here drastically differs from that disclosed in Chew's case. Unlike Chew who with full security clearance and documentation pursued his vocation for four months aboard an American ship, respondent, apparently without authorization or reentry papers, simply left the United States and remained behind the Iron Curtain for 19 months. Moreover, while § 307 of the 1940 Nationality Act regards maritime service such as Chew's to be continuous residence for naturalization purposes, that section deems protracted absence such as respondent's a clear break in an prejudicial to the public interest for security reasons. But thus far all attempts to effect respondent's departure have failed: Twice he shipped out to return whence he came; France and Great Britain refused him permission to land. The State Department has unsuccessfully negotiated with Hungary for his readmission. Respondent personally applied for entry to about a dozen Latin-American countries but all turned him down. So in June 1951 respondent advised the Immigration and Naturalization Service that he would exert no further efforts to depart. In short, respondent sat on Ellis Island because this country shut him out and others were unwilling to take him in.

Asserting unlawful confinement on Ellis Island, he sought relief through a series of habeas corpus proceedings. After four unsuccessful efforts on respondent's part, the United States District Court for the Southern District of New York on November 9, 1951, sustained the writ. The District Judge, vexed by the problem of "an alien who has no place to go," did not question the validity of the exclusion order but deemed further "detention" after 21 months excessive and justifiable only by affirmative proof of respondent's danger to the public safety. When the Government declined to divulge such evidence, even in camera, the District Court directed respondent's conditional parole on bond. By a divided vote, the Court of Appeals affirmed. Postulating that the power to hold could never be broader than the power to remove or shut out and that to "continue an alien's confinement beyond that moment when deportation becomes patently impossible is to deprive him of his liberty," the court found respondent's "confinement" no longer justifiable as a means of removal elsewhere, thus not authorized by statute, and in violation of due process. Judge Learned Hand, dissenting, took a different view: The Attorney General's order was one of "exclusion" and not "deportation"; respondent's transfer from ship to shore on Ellis Island conferred no additional rights; in fact, no alien so situated "can force us to admit him at all."

Courts have long recognized the power to expel or exclude aliens as a fundamental sovereign attribute exercised by the Government's political departments largely immune from judicial control. The Chinese Exclusion Case; Fong Yue Ting v. United States; Knauff v. Shaughnessy; Harisiades v. Shaughnessy. In the exercise of these powers, Congress expressly authorized the President to impose additional restrictions on aliens entering or leaving the United States during periods of international tension and strife. That authorization, originally enacted in the Passport Act of 1918, continues in effect during the present emergency. Under it, the Attorney General, acting for the President, may shut out aliens whose "entry would be prejudicial to the interests of the United States." And he may exclude without a hearing when the exclusion is based on confidential information the disclosure of which may be prejudicial to the public interest [citing the Attorney General's regulations]. The Attorney General in this case proceeded in accord with these provisions; he made the necessary determinations and barred the alien from entering the United States.

A reader of those chilling words might assume that Knauff represents the low water mark for noncitizens' rights. In fact, however, the Court was just getting warmed up. There were still two ingredients to add: What if the excluded person is a long-term LPR returning from a temporary visit abroad? And what if the practical consequence of exclusion is that the government will hold that LPR in captivity, possibly for life? Would the principle of plenary congressional power over immigration render due process constraints inapplicable even then? Or would these additional factors require at least some retreat from the rigidity of Knauff? Read on.

Shaughnessy v. United States ex rel. Mezei

Supreme Court of the United States, 1953.
345 U.S. 206, 73 S.Ct. 625, 97 L.Ed. 956.

■ MR. JUSTICE CLARK delivered the opinion of the Court.

This case concerns an alien immigrant permanently excluded from the United States on security grounds but stranded in his temporary haven on Ellis Island because other countries will not take him back. The issue is whether the Attorney General's continued exclusion of respondent without a hearing amounts to an unlawful detention, so that courts may admit him temporarily to the United States on bond until arrangements are made for his departure abroad. After a hearing on respondent's petition for a writ of habeas corpus, the District Court so held and authorized his temporary admission on $5,000 bond. The Court of Appeals affirmed that action, but directed reconsideration of the terms of the parole. Accordingly, the District Court entered a modified order reducing bond to $3,000 and permitting respondent to travel and reside in Buffalo, New York. Bond was posted and respondent released. Because of resultant serious problems in the enforcement of the immigration laws, we granted certiorari.

Respondent's present dilemma springs from these circumstances: Though, as the District Court observed, "[t]here is a certain vagueness about [his] history," respondent seemingly was born in Gibraltar of Hungarian or Rumanian parents and lived in the United States from 1923 to 1948. In May of that year he sailed for Europe, apparently to visit his dying mother in Rumania. Denied entry there, he remained in Hungary for some 19 months, due to "difficulty in securing an exit permit." Finally, armed with a quota immigration visa issued by the American Consul in Budapest, he proceeded to France and boarded the Ile de France in Le Havre bound for New York. Upon arrival on February 9, 1950, he was temporarily excluded from the United States by an immigration inspector acting pursuant to the Passport Act as amended and regulations thereunder. Pending disposition of his case he was received at Ellis Island. After reviewing the evidence, the Attorney General on May 10, 1950, ordered the temporary exclusion to be made permanent without a hearing before a board of special inquiry, on the "basis of information of a confidential nature, the disclosure of which would be prejudicial to the public interest." That determination rested on a finding that respondent's entry would be and finally, the Government's interest, including the function involved and the fiscal and administrative burdens that the additional or substitute procedural requirement would entail." Under the Eldridge test, is the white witness rule constitutional?

2. MODERN DEVELOPMENTS

The Chinese Exclusion Case, Ekiu, and Fong Yue Ting can be viewed as the three basic building blocks of the "plenary" congressional power over immigration. The Chinese Exclusion Case recognized an inherent federal power to exclude noncitizens; Ekiu appeared to reject due process limits on the exercise of that power; and Fong Yue Ting extended the principles of both cases from exclusion to deportation. This subsection examines modern applications of those fundamental principles.

a. PROCEDURAL DUE PROCESS IN EXCLUSION CASES

After Ekiu, the Court handed down a series of decisions rejecting the due process arguments of excluded immigrants. In those opinions, however, the Court's language tended to be more guarded. The opinions did not repeat the sweeping words of Ekiu: "As to [noncitizens seeking admission], the decisions of executive or administrative officers, acting within powers expressly conferred by Congress, are due process of law." 142 U.S. at 660 (emphasis added). Instead, the post-Ekiu decisions generally held only that due process does not require judicial factfinding. See, e.g., Lee Lung v. Patterson, 186 U.S. 168, 22 S.Ct. 795, 46 L.Ed. 1108 (1902); Lem Moon Sing v. United States, 158 U.S. 538, 15 S.Ct. 967, 39 L.Ed. 1082 (1895).

That more moderate pattern changed abruptly in United States ex rel. Knauff v. Shaughnessy, 338 U.S. 537, 70 S.Ct. 309, 94 L.Ed. 317 (1950). Ellen Knauff was the noncitizen wife of a United States citizen. She was excluded without a hearing under an administrative regulation that permitted the Attorney General to bypass a hearing upon finding from confidential information that the person was inadmissible. Rejecting Knauff's due process challenge, the Court classified her admission as a privilege rather than a right and characterized the exclusion of a noncitizen as a fundamental sovereign act "inherent in the executive power to control the foreign affairs of the nation." Id. at 542, 70 S.Ct. at 312, 94 L.Ed. at 324. In words that every immigration scholar now knows by heart, the Court then announced: "Whatever the procedure authorized by Congress is, it is due process as far as an alien denied entry is concerned." Id. at 544, 70 S.Ct. at 312, 94 L.Ed. at 324.¹⁴

14. The Knauff story had a happy ending. The Justice Department eventually granted an evidentiary hearing. She did not prevail at that hearing, but on appeal to the Board of Immigration Appeals Knauff was found admissible. She later wrote a moving account of her ordeal. Ellen R. Knauff, The Ellen Knauff Story (1952); see also Charles D. Weisselberg, The Exclusion and Detention of Aliens: Lessons from the Lives of Ellen Knauff and Ignatz Mezei, 143 Univ. Penn. L. Rev. 933, 955-64 (1995).

We shall return to this theme in chapter 7, where the theories of deportation are considered more comprehensively.

8. The due process clause states: "No person shall * * * be deprived of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law." U.S. Const. amend. V. Importantly, protection extends to any "person;" unlike certain other constitutional provisions,¹² coverage is not limited to the "citizen." Under modern due process analysis, however, that observation leaves two other questions: When will the interest of which a person has been deprived be regarded as a "life, liberty, or property" interest? And, when a person has been deprived of such an interest, what process is due?

Precisely when a life, liberty, or property interest will be found is not easy to say. In Board of Regents v. Roth, 408 U.S. 564, 92 S.Ct. 2701, 33 L.Ed.2d 548 (1972), the Court flatly rejected "the wooden distinction between rights and privileges that once seemed to govern the applicability of due process rights." Id. at 571, 92 S.Ct. at 2706, 33 L.Ed.2d at 557. It defined "liberty" broadly to extend beyond bodily restraint and to encompass "those privileges long recognized . . . as essential to the orderly pursuit of happiness by free men." Id. at 572, 92 S.Ct. at 2707, 33 L.Ed.2d at 558 (quoting from prior decision). A "property" interest, in contrast, was more narrowly conceived. It was held to require "a legitimate claim of entitlement" (not just a "unilateral expectation"), and that entitlement has to have been created by some independent source of law (not by the Constitution itself.) Id. at 577, 92 S.Ct. at 2709, 33 L.Ed.2d at 561. The cases applying these requirements are complex, difficult to reconcile, and, fortunately, beyond the scope of a coursebook on immigration law. Whether a noncitizen's interest in admission rises to the level of a liberty or property interest is therefore not entirely clear. Do you think either liberty or property interests are implicated in deportation proceedings? Does it matter whether the person is in lawful immigration status? Whether the person is an immigrant or a nonimmigrant? These questions will recur throughout this chapter.¹³

Once a life, liberty, or property interest is held to be at stake, the next question is what process is due. The leading formula comes from Mathews v. Eldridge, 424 U.S. 319, 335, 96 S.Ct. 893, 903, 47 L.Ed.2d 18, 33 (1976). There the Court identified three factors to balance: "First, the private interest that will be affected by the official action; second, the risk of an erroneous deprivation of such interest through the procedures used, and the probable value, if any, of additional or substitute procedural safeguards;

12. E.g., only a citizen may be a member of the House of Representatives, U.S. Const. art. I, § 2, cl. 2, or a Senator, art. I, § 3, cl. 3, or the President, art. II, § 5. The voting rights of citizens may not be abridged on account of race, amend. XIV, § 1, or sex, amend. XIX, § 1, or age, if over 18, amend. XXVI, § 1, or by a poll tax, amend. XXIV, § 1. And states may not abridge the privileges and immunities of citizens. Id. amend. XIV, § 1.

13. See generally Rodney A. Smolla, The Reemergence of the Right-Privilege Distinction in Constitutional Law: The Price of Protesting Too Much, 35 Stanford L.Rev. 69 (1982); William W. Van Alstyne, The Demise of the Right-Privilege Distinction in Constitutional Law, 81 Harvard L.Rev. 1439 (1968).

tions on excessive bail and on cruel and unusual punishment, the ex post facto clause, and other provisions.

After concluding that deportation is not punishment, the Court in Fong Yue Ting says that the person “has not, therefore, been deprived of life, liberty or property, without due process of law.” 149 U.S. at 730, 13 S.Ct. at 1029, 37 L.Ed. at 919 (emphasis added). Is the Court suggesting that the due process clause is another one of those constitutional provisions that restrict only the imposition of punishment? If so, the Court was on shaky ground; even by that time either the due process clause itself or the procedural fairness principles underlying it had been applied outside the context of punishment. See, e.g., Windsor v. McVeigh, 93 U.S. (3 Otto) 274, 277–78, 23 L.Ed. 914 (1876) (fair notice required for in rem jurisdiction); Baldwin v. Hale, 68 U.S. (1 Wall.) 223, 233, 17 L.Ed. 531, 534 (1863). Today it is clearer still that the due process clause is not restricted to punishment. See, e.g., Mathews v. Eldridge, 424 U.S. 319, 96 S.Ct. 893, 47 L.Ed.2d 18 (1976) (termination of social security disability benefits).

At any rate, is the Court convincing when it concludes that deportation is not punishment? The Court reasons that deportation is merely “a method of enforcing the return to his own country of an alien who has not complied with the conditions upon the performance of which the government of the nation, acting within its constitutional authority and through the proper departments, has determined that his continuing to reside here shall depend.” 149 U.S. at 730, 13 S.Ct. at 1028, 37 L.Ed. at 919. Is it that simple? Could not an imprisonment pursuant to a federal criminal sentence (clearly punishment) be described as merely “a method of enforcing the transfer to a prison facility of a person who has not complied with the conditions upon the performance of which the government of the nation, acting within its constitutional authority and through the proper departments, has determined that his continuing to remain at large shall depend?”

Yet Justice Brewer’s analysis seems equally unsatisfying. He says: “Every one knows that to be forcibly taken away from home, and family, and friends, and business, and property, and sent across the ocean to a distant land, is punishment.” 149 U.S. at 740, 13 S.Ct. at 1032, 37 L.Ed. at 922. Notice that Justice Brewer focuses solely on the consequences of deportation.

It would be equally possible to consider the purposes of punishment and then to assess their applicability to deportation. Criminologists differ, but the more commonly held theories of punishment include retribution, deterrence (both general deterrence, which aims to discourage others from committing specified acts, and specific deterrence, which seeks to dissuade a particular offender from repeating deviant behavior), incapacitation (isolating the offender from society), and rehabilitation of the offender. See Wayne R. LaFare, Criminal Law, § 1.5 (4th ed. 2003). Do any of these goals of punishment coincide with the purposes of deportation? Think especially about whether the incapacitation goal has an analog in deportation policy.

Assuming, however, that the distinction between noncitizens outside the United States and those within it is constitutionally significant, in what sense is a noncitizen who faces exclusion outside the United States? Not in the physical sense. For a variety of practical reasons, the inspection and removal of arriving noncitizens almost invariably take place on the United States side of the border. Noncitizens who seek admission are outside the United States only because the law deems them to be. Should Congress, through the simple expedient of declaring that a noncitizen who is physically here is legally not, be able to render the Constitution inapplicable? Conversely, however, should any noncitizen, by taking a few steps into United States territory, be able to assert constitutional rights that he or she otherwise would not have possessed? From either perspective, should physical location determine whether a noncitizen may assert constitutional rights?

b. An additional difference between exclusion and deportation concerns the potential magnitudes of the individual interests at stake. Even when the initial entry was illegal, various ties to the community can form with the passage of time. Would those differences justify either (a) holding the due process clause applicable to deportation but not exclusion, or (b) applying the due process clause to both but holding that greater process is due in deportation proceedings than in exclusion proceedings?

In examining that question, ask yourself how accurate the exclusion/deportation distinction is as a barometer of the individual interest. Chae Chan Ping and Ekiu were challenging only exclusion orders, but Chae Chan Ping was a returning resident and Ekiu, though seeking only initial entry, claimed to be rejoining her United States citizen husband. Were their individual interests trivial?

If you agree that even excluded noncitizens can have important interests at stake, what should the law be? Should the inaccuracy of the exclusion/deportation distinction be tolerated on the theory that, although imperfect, it is at least a rough indicator of individual interest in most cases? Should exceptions be made for returning residents? For alleged family members of United States citizens?

c. Justice Brewer's argument that deportation is punishment forms a third possible basis for distinguishing deportation from exclusion. Whether deportation is punishment is important because, if it is, then deportation proceedings arguably are subject to at least some of the many constitutional safeguards applicable in criminal proceedings. Those include the Fifth Amendment bar on double jeopardy, the Sixth Amendment rights to a speedy, public, jury trial and to counsel, the Eighth Amendment prohibition of the notion that noncitizens outside U.S. territory lack constitutional rights. Brian G. Slocum, The War on Terrorism and the Extraterritorial Application of the Constitution in Immigration Law, 84 Denver L. Rev. 1017 (2007). For a sophisticated general dis-ussion of the extraterritorial reach of the United States Constitution (including analysis of whether it should matter that the aggrieved individual is not a citizen), see Gerald L. Neuman, Whose Constitution?, 100 Yale L.J. 909 (1991).

recognize a federal power to deport those noncitizens who had evaded inspection or entered in some other unlawful way? Would he allow the deportation of a noncitizen who had been admitted lawfully as a temporary visitor but overstayed? Are there circumstances in which he would permit the deportation of even an LPR?

7. Fong Yue Ting is still good law insofar as it holds that international law permits the deportation of even lawfully admitted immigrants and that United States constitutional law lodges that power in the federal government. The Court's great reluctance to review that congressional decision for compliance with the Bill of Rights is similarly consistent with current law. But in one important respect the modern law has left Fong Yue Ting behind. As you will see shortly, it is now clear that one particular constitutional right—procedural due process—applies in deportation cases (not as clear in exclusion cases).

Why should either the applicability or the content of due process hinge on the distinction between exclusion and deportation? The various opinions in Fong Yue Ting suggest several possible reasons:

a. Justice Brewer emphasizes that deportation operates on those who are within the United States while exclusion operates only on persons who, in the eyes of the law, are outside the country. He attaches significance to that distinction because, in his view, the Constitution does not apply outside United States territory. If that is his belief, though, how could he have dissented in Ekiu, where the majority rejected the immigrant's constitutional challenge to her exclusion? (Justice Brewer himself provided no explanation for his dissent.)

Today, the statement that the Constitution is inapplicable outside the United States is not categorically true. To be sure, the Supreme Court has interpreted certain constitutional provisions as being inapplicable in certain extraterritorial contexts. See, e.g., United States v. Verdugo-Urquidez, 494 U.S. 259, 110 S.Ct. 1056, 108 L.Ed.2d 222 (1990); Balzac v. People of Porto Rico, 258 U.S. 298, 42 S.Ct. 343, 66 L.Ed. 627 (1922); Downes v. Bidwell, 182 U.S. 244, 21 S.Ct. 770, 45 L.Ed. 1088 (1901). But several cases have extended particular constitutional guarantees to United States citizens living abroad. See, e.g., Reid v. Covert, 354 U.S. 1, 77 S.Ct. 1222, 1 L.Ed.2d 1148 (1957), and its progeny. Occasionally a court will go a step further and apply constitutional restrictions to the actions of the United States government even when the aggrieved individuals are noncitizens living overseas. See, e.g., Russian Volunteer Fleet v. United States, 282 U.S. 481, 51 S.Ct. 229, 75 L.Ed. 473 (1931) (Fifth Amendment requires government to provide just compensation when seizing contractual rights of nonresident corporation); United States v. Tiede, 86 F.R.D. 227 (U.S.Ct. for Berlin, 1979) (Sixth Amendment requires government to offer jury trial to nonresident noncitizen criminally prosecuted by U.S. authorities in Berlin). Cf. Rasul v. Bush, 542 U.S. 466, 124 S.Ct. 2686, 159 L.Ed.2d 548 (2004) (construing habeas corpus statute as extending to Guantánamo).¹¹

11. Professor Brian Slocum suggests that the Supreme Court's recognition of some constitutional rights for the Guantánamo detainees in Rasul could speed the de-

Remembering that only four years earlier the same Justice Field had written the opinion of the Court in the Chinese Exclusion Case, and that that opinion had relied explicitly on a “sovereign” federal power to exclude noncitizens, how do you account for this paragraph? His two opinions can certainly be reconciled on the facts of the cases; Justice Field might have accepted a sovereign power to exclude noncitizens while rejecting a sovereign power to deport them. But that explanation alone would hardly explain the breadth and forcefulness of his language, which expressly repudiates sovereignty as the source of any federal power. Given his admitted adherence to the views expressed in the Chinese Exclusion Case “in all particulars,” 149 U.S. at 746, 13 S.Ct. at 1035, 37 L.Ed. at 924, the question is whether his two opinions can be fully reconciled. More specifically, did Justice Field believe there was such a thing as a federal power inherent in sovereignty, or didn’t he? In answering this question, recall also the distinction between a sovereign power implied by the Constitution and a sovereign power that rests on extraconstitutional sources. Might that distinction help to explain Justice Field’s position?⁹

5. The plaintiffs in Fong Yue Ting challenged the procedural fairness of the white-witness requirement. Note, however, that the requirement itself was imposed only on Chinese laborers. Suppose the plaintiffs had argued that the statute was substantively unconstitutional because it was racially¹⁰ discriminatory. Would the Court’s reasoning similarly have dictated rejection of the substantive constitutional argument? Did the Supreme Court decide that issue sub silentio in the Chinese Exclusion Case and Ekiu? Or does the distinction between exclusion and deportation prevent extrapolation even if these previous cases are read as upholding racially discriminatory exclusion provisions? If Congress had decreed that any noncitizen who criticizes the government of the United States shall be deported, would a First Amendment argument have met a similar fate? We shall return to the problem of substantive constitutional limitations in section B.2.c below.

6. How far does Justice Brewer go in his dissent? Does he claim that Congress has no power to deport noncitizens? Would he, for example,

9. For intriguing discussions of the contrasting ways in which the Supreme Court has treated sovereignty claims in the Indian and immigration contexts, see T. Alexander Aleinikoff, Semblances of Sovereignty: The Constitution, the State, and American Citizenship (2002); Sarah H. Cleveland, Powers Inherent in Sovereignty: Indians, Aliens, Territories, and the Nineteenth-Century Origins of Plenary Power over Foreign Affairs, 81 Texas L. Rev. 1 (2002); Sarah H. Cleveland, The Plenary Power Background of Curtiss-Wright, 70 Univ. Colorado L. Rev. 1127 (1999); Philip P. Frickey, Domesticating Federal Indian Law, 81 Minnesota L.Rev. 31 (1996); Natsu Taylor Saito, Asserting Plenary Power over the “Other”: Indians, Immi- grants, Colonial Subjects, and Why U.S. Jurisprudence Needs to Incorporate International Law, 20 Yale L. & Policy Rev. 427 (2002).

10. The discrimination cannot be dismissed as based only on country of citizenship rather than on race. Other sections made clear that the statute extended to “Chinese persons and persons of Chinese descent.” See Act of May 5, 1892, ch. 60, §§ 1, 2, 3, 4, 27 Stat. 25; see especially § 2 (removal of “Chinese person or person of Chinese descent” shall be to country of citizenship unless that country would impose a tax as a condition of accepting the person, in which case removal would be to China.)

b. Exclusion and deportation are logically inseparable. Deportation is just a way of correcting errors or lapses in the admissions process and enforcing the conditions attached to proper admissions.

(What is the function of deportation? Is it really just a check on the admissions process? You will see in chapter 7 that, although some deportation grounds can be related back to entry, others cover post-entry conduct.)

3. Given a federal power to deport, how, if at all, does the Constitution limit the exercise of that power? And, again, what is the judicial role in pronouncing those limits? Those questions are at least partly addressed by the majority opinion. For what principle does the case actually stand?

Suppose Congress had authorized each immigration officer to deport any Chinese laborer whenever the officer suspected either that the person had no certificate of residence or that the certificate had been forged. If such a statute had provided no opportunity for the individual to be heard, would it have been upheld? To answer this question, try to determine whether the Court held (a) that due process simply does not apply in deportation cases, (b) that due process applies but that Congress, not the Court, decides what process is due, or (c) that due process applies and the Court decides what process is due, but that the white witness rule was a reasonable evidentiary decision meeting the requirements of due process. How would each of those readings affect the answer to the hypothetical?

4. Whatever the precise scope of the Court's conclusions concerning the procedural limits to the deportation power, there is no doubt that the opinion reveals great deference to Congress. Why is the Court so deferential? At one point the Court suggests that the constitutionality of a congressional decision concerning deportation is a political question, presumably because it affects foreign affairs. Was the white witness requirement an attempt to promote good foreign relations? Or was Congress pursuing purely domestic aims, even at the expense of antagonizing another nation? Is this a question a court should decide, or should the Court treat every deportation provision as reflecting a foreign policy objective even when common sense makes a contrary conclusion obvious? Can a court make an informed judgment as to when judicial intervention would disrupt foreign policy? Can it afford not to? See Stephen H. Legomsky, Immigration Law and the Principle of Plenary Congressional Power, 1984 Supreme Ct.Rev. 255, 262–69.

Related to the theory that the foreign policy ramifications of deportation dictate judicial deference is another theme that recurs throughout the majority opinion—that the deportation power is sovereign in nature and that sovereign powers are subject to few, if any, constitutional constraints. Justice Field, dissenting, replies by rejecting the notion that the federal government “take[s] any power by any supposed inherent sovereignty.” 149 U.S. at 757, 13 S.Ct. at 1039, 37 L.Ed. at 928. Re-read carefully, on page 146 above, the paragraph of Justice Field's dissent that begins with the phrase “The government of the United States.”

decide whether further detention or release under supervision is warranted after the 90-day removal period expires. If the decision is to detain, then an INS panel will review the matter further, at the expiration of a 3-month period or soon thereafter. And the panel will decide, on the basis of records and a possible personal interview, between still further detention or release under supervision. * * * To authorize release, the panel must find that the alien is not likely to be violent, to pose a threat to the community, to flee if released, or to violate the conditions of release. * * * If the panel decides against release, it must review the matter again within a year, and can review it earlier if conditions change.

B

1

We consider two separate instances of detention. The first concerns Kestutis Zadvydas, a resident alien who was born, apparently of Lithuanian parents, in a displaced persons camp in Germany in 1948. When he was eight years old, Zadvydas immigrated to the United States with his parents and other family members, and he has lived here ever since.

Zadvydas has a long criminal record, involving drug crimes, attempted robbery, attempted burglary, and theft. He has a history of flight, from both criminal and deportation proceedings. Most recently, he was convicted of possessing, with intent to distribute, cocaine; sentenced to 16 years' imprisonment; released on parole after two years; taken into INS custody; and, in 1994, ordered deported to Germany.

In 1994, Germany told the INS that it would not accept Zadvydas because he was not a German citizen. Shortly thereafter, Lithuania refused to accept Zadvydas because he was neither a Lithuanian citizen nor a permanent resident. In 1996, the INS asked the Dominican Republic (Zadvydas' wife's country) to accept him, but this effort proved unsuccessful. In 1998, Lithuania rejected, as inadequately documented, Zadvydas' effort to obtain Lithuanian citizenship based on his parents' citizenship; Zadvydas' reapplication is apparently still pending.

The INS kept Zadvydas in custody after expiration of the removal period. In September 1995, Zadvydas filed a petition for a writ of habeas corpus under 28 USC § 2241 challenging his continued detention. In October 1997, a Federal District Court granted that writ and ordered him released under supervision. In its view, the Government would never succeed in its efforts to remove Zadvydas from the United States, leading to his permanent confinement, contrary to the Constitution.

The Fifth Circuit reversed this decision. It concluded that Zadvydas' detention did not violate the Constitution because eventual deportation was not "impossible," good faith efforts to remove him from the United States continued, and his detention was subject to periodic administrative review.

* * *

2

The second case is that of Kim Ho Ma. Ma was born in Cambodia in 1977. When he was two, his family fled, taking him to refugee camps in Thailand and the Philippines and eventually to the United States, where he has lived as a resident alien since the age of seven. In 1995, at age 17, Ma was involved in a gang-related shooting, convicted of manslaughter, and sentenced to 38 months' imprisonment. He served two years, after which he was released into INS custody.

In light of his conviction of an "aggravated felony," Ma was ordered removed. The 90-day removal period expired in early 1999, but the INS continued to keep Ma in custody, because, in light of his former gang membership, the nature of his crime, and his planned participation in a prison hunger strike, it was "unable to conclude that Mr. Ma would remain nonviolent and not violate the conditions of release."

In 1999 Ma filed a petition for a writ of habeas corpus under 28 USC § 2241. A panel of five judges in the Federal District Court for the Western District of Washington, considering Ma's and about 100 similar cases together, issued a joint order holding that the Constitution forbids post-removal-period detention unless there is "a realistic chance that [the] alien will be deported" (thereby permitting classification of the detention as "in aid of deportation"). The District Court then held an evidentiary hearing, decided that there was no "realistic chance" that Cambodia (which has no repatriation treaty with the United States) would accept Ma, and ordered Ma released.

The Ninth Circuit affirmed Ma's release. It concluded, based in part on constitutional concerns, that the statute did not authorize detention for more than a "reasonable time" beyond the 90-day period authorized for removal. And, given the lack of a repatriation agreement with Cambodia, that time had expired upon passage of the 90 days.

* * *

II

We note at the outset that the primary federal habeas corpus statute, 28 USC § 2241, confers jurisdiction upon the federal courts to hear these cases. * * *

* * *

III

* * *

The Government argues that the statute means what it literally says. It sets no "limit on the length of time beyond the removal period that an alien who falls within one of the Section 241(a)(6) categories may be detained." Hence, "whether to continue to detain such an alien and, if so, in what circumstances and for how long" is up to the Attorney General, not up to the courts.

“It is a cardinal principle” of statutory interpretation, however, that when an Act of Congress raises “a serious doubt” as to its constitutionality, “this Court will first ascertain whether a construction of the statute is fairly possible by which the question may be avoided.” * * * In our view, the statute, read in light of the Constitution’s demands, limits an alien’s post-removal-period detention to a period reasonably necessary to bring about that alien’s removal from the United States. It does not permit indefinite detention.

A

A statute permitting indefinite detention of an alien would raise a serious constitutional problem. The Fifth Amendment’s Due Process Clause forbids the Government to “deprive” any “person . . . of . . . liberty . . . without due process of law.” Freedom from imprisonment—from government custody, detention, or other forms of physical restraint—lies at the heart of the liberty that Clause protects. And this Court has said that government detention violates that Clause unless the detention is ordered in a criminal proceeding with adequate procedural protections or, in certain special and “narrow” non-punitive “circumstances,” where a special justification, such as harm-threatening mental illness, outweighs the “individual’s constitutionally protected interest in avoiding physical restraint.” The proceedings at issue here are civil, not criminal, and we assume that they are nonpunitive in purpose and effect. There is no sufficiently strong special justification here for indefinite civil detention—at least as administered under this statute. The statute, says the Government, has two regulatory goals: “ensuring the appearance of aliens at future immigration proceedings” and “preventing danger to the community.” But by definition the first justification—preventing flight—is weak or nonexistent where removal seems a remote possibility at best. As this Court said in Jackson v. Indiana, where detention’s goal is no longer practically attainable, detention no longer “bears [a] reasonable relation to the purpose for which the individual [was] committed.”

The second justification—protecting the community—does not necessarily diminish in force over time. But we have upheld preventive detention based on dangerousness only when limited to specially dangerous individuals and subject to strong procedural protections. * * *

The civil confinement here at issue is not limited, but potentially permanent. * * * The provision authorizing detention does not apply narrowly to “a small segment of particularly dangerous individuals,” say suspected terrorists, but broadly to aliens ordered removed for many and various reasons, including tourist visa violations. * * *

Moreover, the sole procedural protections available to the alien are found in administrative proceedings, where the alien bears the burden of proving he is not dangerous, without (in the Government’s view) significant later judicial review. This Court has suggested, however, that the Constitution may well preclude granting “an administrative body the unreviewable authority to make determinations implicating fundamental rights.” * * *

The Government argues that, from a constitutional perspective, alien status itself can justify indefinite detention, and points to Shaughnessy v. United States ex rel. Mezei as support. That case involved a once lawfully admitted alien who left the United States, returned after a trip abroad, was refused admission, and was left on Ellis Island, indefinitely detained there because the Government could not find another country to accept him. The Court held that Mezei's detention did not violate the Constitution.

Although Mezei, like the present cases, involves indefinite detention, it differs from the present cases in a critical respect. As the Court emphasized, the alien's extended departure from the United States required him to seek entry into this country once again. His presence on Ellis Island did not count as entry into the United States. Hence, he was "treated," for constitutional purposes, "as if stopped at the border." And that made all the difference.

The distinction between an alien who has effected an entry into the United States and one who has never entered runs throughout immigration law. * * * It is well established that certain constitutional protections available to persons inside the United States are unavailable to aliens outside of our geographic borders. But once an alien enters the country, the legal circumstance changes, for the Due Process Clause applies to all "persons" within the United States, including aliens, whether their presence here is lawful, unlawful, temporary, or permanent. * * *

* * *

In light of this critical distinction between Mezei and the present cases, Mezei does not offer the Government significant support, and we need not consider the aliens' claim that subsequent developments have undermined Mezei's legal authority. Nor are we aware of any other authority that would support JUSTICE KENNEDY's limitation of due process protection for removable aliens to freedom from detention that is arbitrary or capricious.

The Government also looks for support to cases holding that Congress has "plenary power" to create immigration law, and that the judicial branch must defer to executive and legislative branch decisionmaking in that area. But that power is subject to important constitutional limitations. See INS v. Chadha (Congress must choose "a constitutionally permissible means of implementing" that power); The Chinese Exclusion Case (congressional authority limited "by the Constitution itself and considerations of public policy and justice which control, more or less, the conduct of all civilized nations"). In these cases, we focus upon those limitations. In doing so, we nowhere deny the right of Congress to remove aliens, to subject them to supervision with conditions when released from detention, or to incarcerate them where appropriate for violations of those conditions. * * *

Nor do the cases before us require us to consider the political branches' authority to control entry into the United States. Hence we leave no "unprotected spot in the Nation's armor." Neither do we consider terrorism or other special circumstances where special arguments might be made for forms of preventive detention and for heightened deference to the judgments of the political branches with respect to matters of national security. The sole foreign policy consideration the Government mentions here is the concern lest courts interfere with "sensitive" repatriation negotiations. But neither the Government nor the dissents explain how a habeas court's efforts to determine the likelihood of repatriation, if handled with appropriate sensitivity, could make a significant difference in this respect.

Finally, the Government argues that, whatever liberty interest the aliens possess, it is "greatly diminished" by their lack of a legal right to "live at large in this country." The choice, however, is not between imprisonment and the alien "living at large." It is between imprisonment and supervision under release conditions that may not be violated. And, for the reasons we have set forth, we believe that an alien's liberty interest is, at the least, strong enough to raise a serious question as to whether, irrespective of the procedures used, the Constitution permits detention that is indefinite and potentially permanent.

B

Despite this constitutional problem, if "Congress has made its intent" in the statute "clear, 'we must give effect to that intent.'" We cannot find here, however, any clear indication of congressional intent to grant the Attorney General the power to hold indefinitely in confinement an alien ordered removed. And that is so whether protecting the community from dangerous aliens is a primary or (as we believe) secondary statutory purpose. After all, the provision is part of a statute that has as its basic purpose effectuating an alien's removal. Why should we assume that Congress saw the alien's dangerousness as unrelated to this purpose?

The Government points to the statute's word "may." But while "may" suggests discretion, it does not necessarily suggest unlimited discretion.

* * *

* * *

We have found nothing in the history of these statutes that clearly demonstrates a congressional intent to authorize indefinite, perhaps permanent, detention. Consequently, interpreting the statute to avoid a serious constitutional threat, we conclude that, once removal is no longer reasonably foreseeable, continued detention is no longer authorized by statute. * * *

IV

The Government seems to argue that, even under our interpretation of the statute, a federal habeas court would have to accept the Government's view about whether the implicit statutory limitation is satisfied in a particular case, conducting little or no independent review of the matter. In our view, that is not so. Whether a set of particular circumstances amounts to detention within, or beyond, a period reasonably necessary to secure removal is determinative of whether the detention is, or is not, pursuant to statutory authority. The basic federal habeas corpus statute grants the federal courts authority to answer that question. See 28 USC § 2241(c)(3) (granting courts authority to determine whether detention is “in violation of the . . . laws . . . of the United States”). * * *

In answering that basic question, the habeas court must ask whether the detention in question exceeds a period reasonably necessary to secure removal. It should measure reasonableness primarily in terms of the statute’s basic purpose, namely assuring the alien’s presence at the moment of removal. Thus, if removal is not reasonably foreseeable, the court should hold continued detention unreasonable and no longer authorized by statute. In that case, of course, the alien’s release may and should be conditioned on any of the various forms of supervised release that are appropriate in the circumstances, and the alien may no doubt be returned to custody upon a violation of those conditions. And if removal is reasonably foreseeable, the habeas court should consider the risk of the alien’s committing further crimes as a factor potentially justifying confinement within that reasonable removal period.

We recognize, as the Government points out, that review must take appropriate account of the greater immigration-related expertise of the Executive Branch, of the serious administrative needs and concerns inherent in the necessarily extensive INS efforts to enforce this complex statute, and the Nation’s need to “speak with one voice” in immigration matters. But we believe that courts can take appropriate account of such matters without abdicating their legal responsibility to review the lawfulness of an alien’s continued detention.

Ordinary principles of judicial review in this area recognize primary Executive Branch responsibility. They counsel judges to give expert agencies decisionmaking leeway in matters that invoke their expertise. They recognize Executive Branch primacy in foreign policy matters. And they consequently require courts to listen with care when the Government’s foreign policy judgments, including, for example, the status of repatriation negotiations, are at issue, and to grant the Government appropriate leeway when its judgments rest upon foreign policy expertise.

We realize that recognizing this necessary Executive leeway will often call for difficult judgments. In order to limit the occasions when courts will need to make them, we think it practically necessary to recognize some presumptively reasonable period of detention. * * *

While an argument can be made for confining any presumption to 90 days, we doubt that when Congress shortened the removal period to 90 days in 1996 it believed that all reasonably foreseeable removals could be accomplished in that time. We do have reason to believe, however, that Congress previously doubted the constitutionality of detention for more than six months. Consequently, for the sake of uniform administration in the federal courts, we recognize that period. After this 6-month period, once the alien provides good reason to believe that there is no significant likelihood of removal in the reasonably foreseeable future, the Government must respond with evidence sufficient to rebut that showing. And for detention to remain reasonable, as the period of prior post-removal confinement grows, what counts as the “reasonably foreseeable future” conversely would have to shrink. This 6-month presumption, of course, does not mean that every alien not removed must be released after six months. To the contrary, an alien may be held in confinement until it has been determined that there is no significant likelihood of removal in the reasonably foreseeable future.

* * *

■ JUSTICE SCALIA, with whom JUSTICE THOMAS joins, dissenting.

I join Part I of JUSTICE KENNEDY’s dissent, which establishes the Attorney General’s clear statutory authority to detain criminal aliens with no specified time limit. I write separately because I do not believe that, as JUSTICE KENNEDY suggests in Part II of his opinion, there may be some situations in which the courts can order release. * * * This claim can be repackaged as freedom from “physical restraint” or freedom from “indefinite detention,” but it is at bottom a claimed right of release into this country by an individual who concededly has no legal right to be here. There is no such constitutional right.

Like a criminal alien under final order of removal, an inadmissible alien at the border has no right to be in the United States. The Chinese Exclusion Case. In Mezei, we upheld potentially indefinite detention of such an inadmissible alien whom the Government was unable to return anywhere else. * * * While four members of the Court thought that Mezei deserved greater procedural protections (the Attorney General had refused to divulge any information as to why Mezei was being detained), no Justice asserted that Mezei had a substantive constitutional right to release into this country. And Justice Jackson’s dissent, joined by Justice Frankfurter, affirmatively asserted the opposite, with no contradiction from the Court: “Due process does not invest any alien with a right to enter the United States, nor confer on those admitted the right to remain against the national will. Nothing in the Constitution requires admission or sufferance of aliens hostile to our scheme of government.” Insofar as a claimed legal right to release into this country is concerned, an alien under final order of removal stands on an equal footing with an inadmissible alien at the threshold of entry: He has no such right.

The Court expressly declines to apply or overrule Mezei but attempts to distinguish it—or, I should rather say, to obscure it in a legal fog. First, the Court claims that “the distinction between an alien who has effected an entry into the United States and one who has never entered runs throughout immigration law.” True enough, but only where that distinction makes perfect sense: with regard to the question of what procedures are necessary to prevent entry, as opposed to what procedures are necessary to eject a person already in the United States. * * * The Court’s citation of Wong Wing for the proposition that we have “held that the Due Process Clause protects an alien subject to a final order of deportation” is arguably relevant. That case at least involved aliens under final order of deportation. But all it held is that they could not be subjected to the punishment of hard labor without a judicial trial. I am sure they cannot be tortured, as well—but neither prohibition has anything to do with their right to be released into the United States. Nor does Wong Wing show that the rights of detained aliens subject to final order of deportation are different from the rights of aliens arrested and detained at the border—unless the Court believes that the detained alien in Mezei could have been set to hard labor.

Mezei thus stands unexplained and undistinguished by the Court's opinion. We are offered no justification why an alien under a valid and final order of removal—which has totally extinguished whatever right to presence in this country he possessed—has any greater due process right to be released into the country than an alien at the border seeking entry. Congress undoubtedly thought that both groups of aliens—inadmissible aliens at the threshold and criminal aliens under final order of removal—could be constitutionally detained on the same terms, since it provided the authority to detain both groups in the very same statutory provision. * * *

■ JUSTICE KENNEDY, with whom THE CHIEF JUSTICE joins, and with whom JUSTICE SCALIA and JUSTICE THOMAS join as to Part I, dissenting.

The Court says its duty is to avoid a constitutional question. It deems the duty performed by interpreting a statute in obvious disregard of congressional intent; curing the resulting gap by writing a statutory amendment of its own; committing its own grave constitutional error by arrogating to the Judicial Branch the power to summon high officers of the Executive to assess their progress in conducting some of the Nation's most sensitive negotiations with foreign powers; and then likely releasing into our general population at least hundreds of removable or inadmissible aliens who have been found by fair procedures to be flight risks, dangers to the community, or both. Far from avoiding a constitutional question, the Court's ruling causes systemic dislocation in the balance of powers, thus raising serious constitutional concerns not just for the cases at hand but for the Court's own view of its proper authority. Any supposed respect the Court seeks in not reaching the constitutional question is outweighed by the intrusive and erroneous exercise of its own powers. In the guise of judicial restraint the Court ought not to intrude upon the other branches. The constitutional question the statute presents, it must be acknowledged, may be a significant one in some later case; but it ought not to drive us to an incorrect interpretation of the statute. The Court having reached the wrong result for the wrong reason, this respectful dissent is required.

I

* * *

By this statute, Congress confers upon the Attorney General discretion to detain an alien ordered removed. It gives express authorization to detain "beyond the removal period." * * * The issue to be determined is whether the authorization to detain beyond the removal period is subject to the implied, nontextual limitation that the detention be no longer than reasonably necessary to effect removal to another country. The majority invokes the canon of constitutional doubt to read that implied term into the statute. One can accept the premise that a substantial constitutional question is presented by the prospect of lengthy, even unending, detention in some instances; but the statutory construction the Court adopts should be rejected in any event. The interpretation has no basis in the language or structure of the INA and in fact contradicts and defeats the purpose set forth in the express terms of the statutory text.

* * * [The Court's] analysis is not consistent with our precedents explaining the limits of the constitutional doubt rule. The rule allows courts to choose among constructions which are "fairly possible," not to "press statutory construction to the point of disingenuous evasion even to avoid a constitutional question". Were a court to find two interpretations of equal plausibility, it should choose the construction that avoids confronting a constitutional question. The majority's reading of the statutory authorization to "detain beyond the removal period," however, is not plausible. * * *

Other provisions in § 241 itself do link the requirement of a reasonable time period to the removal process. * * * That Congress chose to impose the limitation in these sections and not in § 241(a)(6) is evidence of its intent to measure the detention period by other standards. * * *

The 6-month period invented by the Court, even when modified by its sliding standard of reasonableness for certain repatriation negotiations, makes the statutory purpose to protect the community ineffective. The risk to the community exists whether or not the repatriation negotiations have some end in sight; in fact, when the negotiations end, the risk may be greater. * * *

* * *

The majority's unanchored interpretation ignores another indication that the Attorney General's detention discretion was not limited to this truncated period. Section 241(a)(6) permits continued detention not only of removable aliens [sic—Justice Kennedy means "deportable"—Eds.] but also of inadmissible aliens, for instance those stopped at the border before entry. Congress provides for detention of both categories within the same statutory grant of authority. Accepting the majority's interpretation, then, there are two possibilities, neither of which is sustainable. On the one hand, it may be that the majority's rule applies to both categories of aliens, in which case we are asked to assume that Congress intended to restrict the discretion it could confer upon the Attorney General so that all inadmissible aliens must be allowed into our community within six months. On the other hand, the majority's logic might be that inadmissible and removable aliens can be treated differently. Yet it is not a plausible construction of § 241(a)(6) to imply a time limit as to one class but not to another. The text does not admit of this possibility. As a result, it is difficult to see why “aliens who have not yet gained initial admission to this country would present a very different question.”

* * *

The majority’s interpretation, moreover, defeats the very repatriation goal in which it professes such interest. The Court rushes to substitute a judicial judgment for the Executive’s discretion and authority. As the Government represents to us, judicial orders requiring release of removable aliens, even on a temporary basis, have the potential to undermine the obvious necessity that the Nation speak with one voice on immigration and foreign affairs matters. The result of the Court’s rule is that, by refusing to accept repatriation of their own nationals, other countries can effect the release of these individuals back into the American community. If their own nationals are now at large in the United States, the nation of origin may ignore or disclaim responsibility to accept their return. The interference with sensitive foreign relations becomes even more acute where hostility or tension characterizes the relationship, for other countries can use the fact of judicially mandated release to their strategic advantage, refusing the return of their nationals to force dangerous aliens upon us. One of the more alarming aspects of the Court’s new venture into foreign affairs management is the suggestion that the district court can expand or contract the reasonable period of detention based on its own assessment of the course of negotiations with foreign powers. The Court says it will allow the Executive to perform its duties on its own for six months; after that, foreign relations go into judicially supervised receivership.

* * *

In addition to weakening the hand of our Government, court ordered release cannot help but encourage dilatory and obstructive tactics by aliens who, emboldened by the Court’s new rule, have good reason not to cooperate by making their own repatriation or transfer seem foreseeable. An alien ordered deported also has less incentive to cooperate or to facilitate expeditious removal when he has been released, even on a supervised basis, than does an alien held at an Immigration and Naturalization Service (INS) detention facility. Neither the alien nor his family would find any urgency in assisting with a petition to other countries to accept the alien back if the alien could simply remain in the United States indefinitely.

* * *

The majority’s rule is not limited to aliens once lawfully admitted. Today’s result may well mandate the release of those aliens who first gained entry illegally or by fraud, and, indeed, is broad enough to require even that inadmissible and excludable aliens detained at the border be set free in our community. * * *

* * *

It is curious that the majority would approve of continued detention beyond the 90-day period, or, for that matter, during the 90-day period, where deportation is not reasonably foreseeable. If the INS cannot detain an alien because he is dangerous, it would seem irrelevant to the Constitution or to the majority's presumption that the INS has detained the alien for only a little while. The reason detention is permitted at all is that a removable alien does not have the same liberty interest as a citizen does. The Court cannot bring itself to acknowledge this established proposition. Likewise, it is far from evident under the majority's theory why the INS can condition and supervise the release of aliens who are not removable in the reasonably foreseeable future, or why "the alien may no doubt be returned to custody upon a violation of those conditions." It is true that threat of revocation of supervised release is necessary to make the supervised release itself effective, a fact even counsel for Zadvydas acknowledged. If that is so, however, the whole foundation for the Court's position collapses.

* * *

II

The aliens' claims are substantial; their plight is real. They face continued detention, perhaps for life, unless it is shown they no longer present a flight risk or a danger to the community. In a later case the specific circumstances of a detention may present a substantial constitutional question. That is not a reason, however, for framing a rule which ignores the law governing alien status.

As persons within our jurisdiction, the aliens are entitled to the protection of the Due Process Clause. * * *. No party to this proceeding contests the initial premise that the aliens have been determined to be removable after a fair hearing under lawful and proper procedures. * * *

* * *

* * * [I]t must be made clear these aliens are in a position far different from aliens with a lawful right to remain here. They are removable, and their rights must be defined in accordance with that status. * * *

* * *

* * * Neither Zadvydas nor Ma argues that the Attorney General has applied the procedures in an improper manner; they challenge only the Attorney General's authority to detain at all where removal is no longer foreseeable. The Government has conceded that habeas jurisdiction is available under 28 USC § 2241 to review an alien's challenge to detention following entry of a final order of deportation, although it does not detail what the nature of the habeas review would be. As a result, we need not decide today whether, and to what extent, a habeas court could review the Attorney General's determination that a detained alien continues to be dangerous or a flight risk. Given the undeniable deprivation of liberty caused by the detention, there might be substantial questions concerning the severity necessary for there to be a community risk; the adequacy of judicial review in specific cases where it is alleged there is no justification for concluding an alien is dangerous or a flight risk; and other issues. These matters are not presented to us here.

* * *

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. Until just before the decision in Zadvydas, the former INS was holding approximately 3000 persons in indefinite detention. 78 IR 397 (Feb. 26, 2001).

2. As you will see repeatedly throughout this book, liberal statutory interpretation has been a time-honored judicial device for escaping some of the harsher applications of the plenary power doctrine. For a fuller treatment of the sharp contrast between the courts' restrictive readings of the Constitution and their liberal (and nonliteral) statutory interpretations in immigration cases, see Stephen H. Legomsky, Immigration and the Judiciary—Law and Politics in Britain and America at 155–70, 177–222 (1987).

3. On the statutory interpretation question here, Justice Kennedy's dissent argues that the majority's reading is not even "plausible." Do you agree? Is it clear that "beyond the removal period" means "forever?"

4. One of the Court's concerns is that the statute empowers administrative officials to make unreviewable determinations concerning fundamental rights. Suppose Congress were to amend the statute to transfer the detention decision from administrative officials to article III judges. Alternatively, suppose Congress were to leave such determinations in the hands of administrative officials but authorize judicial review of the reasonableness of those decisions. Would either amendment satisfy the Court's constitutional concerns?

5. In form, the decision in Zadvydas is one of statutory interpretation. But the rationale is that a contrary interpretation of the statute would raise "a serious constitutional problem." Still, positing a serious "problem" is not quite the same as concluding that indefinite detention would in fact be unconstitutional. Suppose, therefore, Congress were now to amend the statute to say: "The Attorney General shall detain all noncitizens who have been ordered removed, until removal can be accomplished or until he concludes that the noncitizen is not likely to abscond or to threaten the public safety, whichever is earlier. This provision is specifically intended to authorize even indefinite and lifelong detention, regardless of the likelihood of eventual removal." Would the Court declare such a statute unconstitutional?

6. Citing Chadha, the Court says that even the plenary power doctrine is "subject to important constitutional limitations." If that is so, then what does "plenary" mean and what is left of the doctrine? As was true after Chadha, it is not clear where this language leaves us. One possibility is that the plenary power doctrine no longer requires any special judicial deference to Congress in immigration matters—only a recognition that, for purposes of the exclusive federal power to regulate immigration, the term “immigration” is broadly defined. A second, more likely possibility is that plenary power still signifies special judicial deference but that that deference is only a matter of degree; the greater the deprivation of individual liberty, the more insistent the Court will be on a substantial explanation for the policy. A third possibility is that the Court in Zadvydas has in mind the line of authority recognizing procedural due process as an exception to the congressional plenary power in expulsion cases. See pages 158–63 above. That interpretation taken alone would not account for the specific result in Zadvydas, though, because the individual interest at stake was the substantive interest in being free of indefinite detention, not just the interest in a fair procedure. A fourth possibility is that the Court’s incursion into plenary congressional power is detention-specific and that the doctrine remains intact with respect to decisions concerning whom to admit or expel. Section III.A of the Court’s opinion does, after all, rest heavily on the exceptional liberty interests implicated by imprisonment. As to that, however, see Demore v. Hyung Joon Kim, excerpted below.²⁷

7. Justice Scalia, dissenting, says the plaintiffs claim a “constitutional right of supervised release into the United States.” He then concludes that the plaintiffs have no more right to such release than do noncitizens who are on the threshold of initial entry. Do you agree with either his characterization of their claim or his conclusion?

8. During oral argument, Justice Scalia posed an interesting question: If Congress can constitutionally prescribe life sentences for noncitizens who are convicted of designated crimes, why is indefinite detention (a lesser sanction, in his view) unconstitutional? First, had you been counsel for Mr. Zadvydas, how would you have responded? Second, now that this case has been decided, suppose Congress were to pass a law that makes indefinite detention a formal part of the criminal sentence for any noncitizen convicted of certain designated federal crimes? (Assume the new law defines indefinite detention as lasting until the earlier of the person’s removal from the United States or the court’s determination that the person is unlikely to abscond or threaten the public safety.) Would such a statute be constitutional?

9. Justice Kennedy believes that the majority opinion impermissibly obstructs the executive branch in its dealings with foreign governments, particularly with respect to sensitive negotiations over the return of foreign nationals. Is he convincing?

27. Professor Peter Spiro (writing before the decision in Demore, below), predicted that Zadvydas (and one other case, Nguyen v. INS, 533 U.S. 53, 121 S.Ct. 2053, 150 L.Ed.2d 115 (2001), discussed on pages 175–76 above), together augured the demise of the plenary power doctrine. Peter J. Spiro, Explaining the End of Plenary Power, 16 Georgetown Immigration L.J. 339 (2002).

Others disagree. See, e.g., T. Alexander Aleinikoff, *Detaining Plenary Power: The Meaning and Impact of *Zadvydas v. Davis, 16 Georgetown Immigration L.J. 365 (2002); Michele R. Pistone, A Times Sensitive Response to Professor Aleinikoff’s Detaining Plenary Power, 16 Georgetown Immigration L.J. 391 (2002).

10. Justice Kennedy makes another interesting point. If the only acceptable reason for detaining noncitizens pending removal is to secure their eventual removal, then why, he asks, does the majority allow automatic detention even during the first 90 days (or, for that matter, the first six months)?

11. On remand in Ma, the Ninth Circuit found there was “no reasonable likelihood that the INS will be able to accomplish Ma’s removal in the reasonably foreseeable future.” The court relied both on the absence of a repatriation agreement with Cambodia and on the slim chances of such an agreement being concluded. Kim Ho Ma v. Ashcroft, 257 F.3d 1095, 1099 (9th Cir. 2001).

12. The terrorist attacks of September 11, 2001 occurred just two months after Zadvydas, while the Justice Department was drafting its formal plan for implementing the decision. The resulting regulations established procedures for determining whether a detainee’s removal is likely in the reasonably foreseeable future. If removal is found likely, detention may continue, subject to review every six months. If removal is found not likely, the regulations generally require release but authorize appropriate conditions of supervision. Upon violation of those conditions, the person may be returned to custody until the next six-month review. 8 C.F.R. § 241.13(i) (2008).

Citing the Supreme Court’s caveat that the Zadvydas case did not involve “particularly dangerous individuals, say suspected terrorists,” see page 195 above, the regulation authorizes indefinite detention of certain noncitizens even when removal is found not to be likely in the reasonably foreseeable future. It lays out four such categories—highly contagious diseases, adverse foreign policy consequences, significant national security or terrorism risks, and other individuals found “specially dangerous” because of convictions of crimes of violence or mental conditions. 8 C.F.R. § 241.14(b, c, d, f) (2008). The procedures vary by category. Two courts of appeals have cast doubt on the validity of at least some of those exceptions. In Tuan Thai v. Ashcroft, 366 F.3d 790 (9th Cir. 2004), the court held that the Supreme Court did not intend to permit an exception for the dangers posed by a mentally ill detainee—any more, the court said, than for the dangers of convicted criminals. The public is already safeguarded, the court observed, by state laws that authorize the involuntary civil commitment of dangerous mental patients. Accord, Tran v. Mukasey, 515 F.3d 478 (5th Cir. 2008).

Other Justice Department devices for circumventing Zadvydas have included imposing conditions of release that it knows the person cannot meet (e.g. setting a high bond) and taking released prisoners back into custody after alleging violations of the conditions of release. See Thomas Hutchins, Detention of Aliens: An Overview of Current Law, April 2003 Immigration Briefings, at 10.

In the meantime, Congress had already enacted the USA PATRIOT Act of 2001. Section 412 of that Act authorized the Attorney General to “certify” any noncitizen, including an LPR, whom the Attorney General “has reasonable grounds to believe” is either inadmissible or deportable on certain terrorism or other national security grounds or “is engaged in any other activity that endangers the national security of the United States.” INA § 236A(a)(3). Upon certification, the Act explicitly mandates detention until the person is either removed or found not to be removable, id. § 236A(a)(1, 2, 6), and explicitly authorizes indefinite detention in renewable six-month increments. Id. § 236A(a)(6). At this writing, the Attorney General has yet to invoke the certification authority, opting instead to use a number of other detention powers. See generally chapter 10, section A, below.

13. The Australian High Court, contrary to Zadvydas, has upheld the indefinite detention of a stateless person whom no other country would take. See Al-Kateb v. Godwin [2004] HCA 37 (6 Aug. 2004). Since Australia does not have an entrenched bill of rights (its Constitution, while entrenched, deals almost exclusively with federalism and separation of powers), parliamentary enactments are legally unrestrained to that extent.

14. One author reads both the U.S. Supreme Court in Zadvydas and the Mexican government in lobbying for U.S. immigration reform as edging away from traditional, absolute notions of state sovereignty. Ernesto Hernández López, Sovereignty Migrates in U.S. and Mexican Law: Transnational Influences in Plenary Power and Non-Intervention, 40 Vanderbilt J. Transnat'l L. 1345 (2007).

In the light of Zadvydas, may the government detain inadmissible noncitizens indefinitely when removal cannot be effected? Then Attorney General John Ashcroft thought so. In his post-decision memorandum to the former INS, Ashcroft argued that nothing in the Zadvydas decision affects noncitizens who are “legally still at our borders.” See Memorandum from John Ashcroft, Attorney General, to Acting Commissioner of the INS (July 19, 2001), reproduced in 6 BIB 798 et seq. (Aug. 1, 2001), at 799. The issue affects not only those who are physically at ports of entry, but also those who have been paroled into the United States under INA § 212(d)(5)—particularly the Cuban Marielitos (see pages 167–68 above). See generally David A. Martin, Graduated Application of Constitutional Protections for Aliens: The Real Meaning of Zadvydas v. Davis, 2001 Supreme Ct. Rev. 47 (arguing that content of due process should reflect hierarchy of differing noncitizen categories).

The lower courts quickly divided. Compare, e.g., Rosales-Garcia v. Holland, 322 F.3d 386 (6th Cir. 2003); Lin Guo Xi v. INS, 298 F.3d 832 (9th Cir. 2002) (both extending Zadvydas to inadmissible noncitizens) with Sierra v. Romaine, 347 F.3d 559 (3d Cir. 2003); Borrero v. Aljets, 325 F.3d 1003 (8th Cir. 2003) (both holding Zadvydas inapplicable to inadmissible noncitizens).

The decisions in Rosales-Garcia and Lin Guo Xi illustrate the risks that dissenting judges take when they make reductio ad absurdum arguments. Both of the dissenting opinions in Zadvydas (those of Justices Scalia and Kennedy) argue that Congress used the same language to govern the permissible duration of detention for deportable noncitizens who have been ordered removed and inadmissible noncitizens who have been ordered removed. (The premise that the dissenters had hoped the majority would adopt was that Congress would not have wanted to preclude indefinite detention in inadmissibility cases). Since the dissenters' position on deportable noncitizens did not prevail in Zadvydas, they ended up providing ammunition to inadmissible noncitizens who challenged their indefinite detentions in future cases—presumably the last thing the dissenters wanted to do. In both Rosales-Garcia and Lin Guo Xi, the courts ran with that ball. Noting the result in Zadvydas for deportable noncitizens who had been ordered removed, and observing (as Justices Scalia and Kennedy had done) that on this issue the statutory language treats inadmissible and deportable noncitizens alike, both courts, in 2–1 decisions, extended Zadvydas to the inadmissibility context. See Rosales-Garcia, 322 F.3d at 404–05; Lin Guo Xi, 298 F.3d at 835. Judge Heaney, dissenting in Borrero, made a similar argument, quoting the Zadvydas dissents of Justices Scalia and Kennedy. Borrero, 325 F.3d at 1009. One suspects this is not how Justices Scalia and Kennedy wanted to be remembered.

The strategic point is a more general one. Dissenting judges often face a tactical dilemma. On the one hand, they want their opinions to be as convincing as possible. To that end, they might be tempted to offer reductio ad absurdum arguments, demonstrating that the situation before the court is logically indistinguishable from a hypothetical case in which the same reasoning would later produce radical and undesirable results. On the other hand, once the decision in the present case is handed down, and the very hypothetical case the dissent had imagined now comes before the same court (or a lower court in the same jurisdiction), advocates of the more radical result are now armed with the words of the prior dissenters. The lesson? Reductio ad absurdum arguments are a gamble.

Just how great a gamble that was would soon become evident to Justices Scalia and Kennedy. The first time the Supreme Court had an opportunity to resolve the circuit split, it denied certiorari. See Snyder v. Rosales-Garcia, 539 U.S. 941, 123 S.Ct. 2607, 156 L.Ed.2d 627 (2003). But with so many Cuban Marielitos still in detention, the issue would not go away. In the case that follows, the Court extended Zadvydas to inadmissible noncitizens by a 7–2 vote.

The Justices who had dissented in Zadvydas found themselves caught between a rock and a hard place. Having approved indefinite detention for deportable noncitizens, they presumably would have felt even fewer compunctions about approving it for inadmissible noncitizens. But the question was whether there was a respectable escape from the argument they had pressed so forcefully in their Zadvydas dissents—that the statute must have the same meaning in both contexts. One of the Zadvydas dissenters, Justice Scalia, thought there was not. Swallowing hard, he ended up writing the majority opinion below, construing the statute to bar the indefinite detention of inadmissible noncitizens. Another of the Zadvydas dissenters, Justice Thomas, felt otherwise. He dissented again in the following case.

To give you a better sense of the dialogue between Justices Scalia and Thomas, the excerpts from their dueling opinions have been rearranged in point-counterpoint form:

Clark v. Martinez

Supreme Court of the United States, 2005.
543 U.S. 371, 125 S.Ct. 716, 160 L.Ed.2d 734.

Justice Scalia: The operative language of § 241(a)(6), “may be detained beyond the removal period,” applies without differentiation to all three categories of aliens [those who are inadmissible, those who are deportable on certain specified grounds, and those considered a safety risk or flight risk—Eds.] that are its subject. To give these same words a different meaning for each category would be to invent a statute rather than interpret one. As the Court in Zadvydas recognized, the statute can be construed “literally” to authorize indefinite detention or (as the Court ultimately held) it can be read to “suggest [less than] unlimited discretion” to detain. It cannot, however, be interpreted to do both at the same time.

Justice Thomas: The majority concedes that Zadvydas explicitly reserved the question whether its statutory holding as to admitted aliens applied equally to inadmissible aliens. This reservation was front and center in Zadvydas. * * * The Court reserved this question because the constitutional questions raised by detaining inadmissible aliens are different from those raised by detaining admitted aliens. It stated that the detention period in § 241(a)(6) was limited because it “read [the statute] in light of the Constitution’s demands.”

Justice Scalia: The Government, joined by the dissent, argues that the statutory purpose and the constitutional concerns that influenced our statutory construction in Zadvydas are not present for aliens, such as Martinez and Benitez, who have not been admitted to the United States. Be that as it may, it cannot justify giving the same detention provision a different meaning when such aliens are involved. It is not at all unusual to give a statute’s ambiguous language a limiting construction called for by one of the statute’s applications, even though other of the statute’s applications, standing alone, would not support the same limitation. The lowest common denominator, as it were, must govern.

Justice Thomas: [T]he Court’s lowest common denominator principle allows a limiting construction of an ambiguous statute prompted by constitutional doubts to infect other applications of the statute—even if the statute raises no constitutional doubt as applied to the specific litigant in a given case and even if the constitutionally unproblematic application of the statute to the litigant is severable from the constitutionally dubious applications. The lowest common denominator principle thus allows an end run around black-letter constitutional doctrine governing facial and as-applied constitutional challenges to statutes: A litigant ordinarily cannot attack statutes as constitutionally invalid based on constitutional doubts concerning other litigants or factual circumstances.

Justice Scalia: This accusation misconceives—and fundamentally so—the role played by the canon of constitutional avoidance in statutory interpretation. The canon is not a method of adjudicating constitutional questions by other means. Indeed, one of the canon’s chief justifications is that it allows courts to avoid the decision of constitutional questions. It is a tool for choosing between competing plausible interpretations of a statutory text, resting on the reasonable presumption that Congress did not intend the alternative which raises serious constitutional doubts. * * * [T]he novel interpretive approach advocated by the dissent * * * would render every statute a chameleon, its meaning subject to change depending on the presence or absence of constitutional concerns in each individual case.

Justice Thomas: The Court misses the point by answering that the canon of constitutional avoidance “is not a method of adjudicating constitutional questions by other means,” and that the canon rests on a presumption that “Congress did not intend the alternative which raises serious constitutional doubts.” That is true, but in deciding whether a plausible interpretation “raises serious constitutional doubts,” a court must employ the usual rules of constitutional adjudication.

Justice Scalia: The dissent’s contention that our reading of Zadvydas is “implausible” is hard to reconcile with the fact that it is the identical reading espoused by the Zadvydas dissenters, who included the author of today’s dissent. Worse still, what the Zadvydas dissent did find “not . . . plausible” was precisely the reading adopted by today’s dissent:

The majority’s logic might be that inadmissible and removable aliens can be treated differently. Yet it is not a plausible construction of § 241(a)(6) to imply a time limit as to one class but not to another. The text does not admit of this possibility. As a result, it is difficult to see why “aliens who have not yet gained initial admission to this country would present a very different question.” Zadvydas (KENNEDY, J., dissenting).

The Zadvydas dissent later concluded that the release of “Mariel Cubans and other illegal, inadmissible aliens . . . would seem a necessary consequence of the majority’s construction of the statute.”

Justice Thomas: But the Zadvydas majority disagreed with that assumption and adopted a contrary interpretation of § 241(a)(6). For as the dissent recognized, Zadvydas’ “logic might be that inadmissible and removable aliens might be treated differently.” That was Zadvydas’ logic precisely, as its repeated statements limiting its decision to inadmissible aliens show. To interpret Zadvydas properly, we must take its logic as given, not the logic of the reductio ad absurdum of Zadvydas that I joined in dissent.

Justice Scalia: This mistakes the reservation of a question with its answer. Neither the opinion of the Court nor the dissent in Zadvydas so much as hints that the Court adopted the novel interpretation of § 241(a)(6) proposed by today's dissent. * * * Despite the dissent's repeated claims that § 241(a)(6) could not be given a different reading for inadmissible aliens, the Court refused to decide that question—the question we answer today.

Justice Thomas: The Court is also mistaken in affording Zadvydas stare decisis effect. Zadvydas was wrong in both its statutory and its constitutional analysis for the reasons expressed well by the dissents in that case [and therefore should be overruled—Eds.].

In both Zadvydas and Martinez the Supreme Court grappled with the question of indefinite detention. The courts have also struggled with the constitutionality of mandatory detention for particular categories of noncitizens in removal proceedings. Until 1988, the INA gave the Attorney General the discretion either to detain a noncitizen pending removal proceedings or to release the person (on bond or on his or her own recognizance). The person would normally be released pending the hearing unless, after an individualized inquiry, it was determined that the person was likely either to abscond or to endanger the public. The Anti-Drug Abuse Act of 1988, Pub. L. 100-690, § 7343(a), 102 Stat. 4181, 4470, carved out an exception to the Attorney General's discretion. It expressly required detention, pending what were then called deportation proceedings, of any noncitizen who had been convicted of an "aggravated felony" (a term broadly defined in INA § 101(a)(43)). Subsequent amendments extended the reach of mandatory detention to a wide range of other categories. These include persons who are either inadmissible or deportable on almost any of the crime-related grounds (not just aggravated felonies), INA § 236(c)(1)(A, B, C); those who are inadmissible or deportable on terrorism-related grounds, INA § 236(c)(1)(D); persons who are subjected to a special accelerated procedure called "expedited removal," INA § 235(b)(1)(B)(iii)(IV); and persons who have been ordered removed, INA § 241(a)(2). A few additional categories of mandatory detention, assertedly related to national security, are discussed in chapter 10, section A.1.

Many noncitizens (including LPRs) who had finished serving their criminal sentences but who were detained pending their deportation or removal proceedings went to court to challenge some of these provisions on constitutional grounds. The most common argument was that, before a person may be detained for the often lengthy period that removal proceedings take, due process requires an individualized evaluation of whether the person is likely to abscond or to endanger the public; categorical assumptions are not sufficient. For many years the lower courts divided. The majority of them agreed that mandatory, categorical detention under such circumstances violates due process.

Zadvydas was decided just before the terrorist attacks of September 11, 2001. The mandatory detention issue reached the Supreme Court just nineteen months later but in a changed world:

Demore v. Hyung Joon Kim

Supreme Court of the United States, 2003.
538 U.S. 510, 123 S.Ct. 1708, 155 L.Ed.2d 724.

■ CHIEF JUSTICE REHNQUIST delivered the opinion of the Court.

Section 236(c) of the Immigration and Nationality Act provides that “the Attorney General shall take into custody any alien who” is removable from this country because he has been convicted of one of a specified set of crimes. Respondent is a citizen of the Republic of South Korea. He entered the United States in 1984, at the age of six, and became a lawful permanent resident of the United States two years later. In July 1996, he was convicted of first-degree burglary in state court in California and, in April 1997, he was convicted of a second crime, “petty theft with priors.” The Immigration and Naturalization Service (INS) charged respondent with being deportable from the United States in light of these convictions, and detained him pending his removal hearing. We hold that Congress, justifiably concerned that deportable criminal aliens who are not detained continue to engage in crime and fail to appear for their removal hearings in large numbers, may require that persons such as respondent be detained for the brief period necessary for their removal proceedings.

Respondent does not dispute the validity of his prior convictions, which were obtained following the full procedural protections our criminal justice system offers. Respondent also did not dispute the INS’ conclusion that he is subject to mandatory detention under § 236(c). In conceding that he was deportable, respondent forwent a hearing at which he would have been entitled to raise any nonfrivolous argument available to demonstrate that he was not properly included in a mandatory detention category. See 8 CFR § 3.19(h)(2)(ii) (2002); In re Joseph, 22 I. & N. Dec. 799 (1999).²⁸ Respondent instead filed a habeas corpus action pursuant to 28 USC § 2241 in the United States District Court for the Northern District of California challenging the constitutionality of § 236(c) itself. He argued that his detention under § 236(c) violated due process because the INS had made no determination that he posed either a danger to society or a flight risk.

28. [Footnote 3 in original] This “Joseph hearing” is immediately provided to a detainee who claims that he is not covered by § 236(c). At the hearing, the detainee may avoid mandatory detention by demonstrating that he is not an alien, was not convicted of the predicate crime, or that the INS is otherwise substantially unlikely to establish that he is in fact subject to mandatory detention. Because respondent conceded that he was deportable because of a conviction that triggers § 236(c) and thus sought no Joseph hearing, we have no occasion to review the adequacy of Joseph hearings generally in screening out those who are improperly detained pursuant to § 236(c). Such individualized review is available, however, and the dissent is mistaken if it means to suggest otherwise.

The District Court agreed with respondent that § 236(c)'s requirement of mandatory detention for certain criminal aliens was unconstitutional. The District Court therefore granted respondent's petition subject to the INS' prompt undertaking of an individualized bond hearing to determine whether respondent posed either a flight risk or a danger to the community. Following that decision, the District Director of the INS released respondent on $5,000 bond.

The Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit affirmed. That court held that § 236(c) violates substantive due process as applied to respondent because he is a permanent resident alien. It noted that permanent resident aliens constitute the most favored category of aliens and that they have the right to reside permanently in the United States, to work here, and to apply for citizenship. The court recognized and rejected the Government's two principal justifications for mandatory detention under § 236(c): (1) ensuring the presence of criminal aliens at their removal proceedings; and (2) protecting the public from dangerous criminal aliens. The Court of Appeals discounted the first justification because it found that not all aliens detained pursuant to § 236(c) would ultimately be deported. And it discounted the second justification on the grounds that the aggravated felony classification triggering respondent's detention included crimes that the court did not consider "egregious" or otherwise sufficiently dangerous to the public to necessitate mandatory detention. Respondent's crimes of first-degree burglary (burglary of an inhabited dwelling) and petty theft, for instance, the Ninth Circuit dismissed as "rather ordinary crimes." Relying upon our recent decision in Zadvydas v. Davis, the Court of Appeals concluded that the INS had not provided a justification "for no-bail civil detention sufficient to overcome a lawful permanent resident alien's liberty interest."

Three other Courts of Appeals have reached the same conclusion. The Seventh Circuit, however, rejected a constitutional challenge to § 236(c) by a permanent resident alien. We granted certiorari to resolve this conflict and now reverse.

I

[In this section of the opinion the Court rejects a jurisdictional challenge. See chapter 9, § B.6.b below.]

* * *

II

Having determined that the federal courts have jurisdiction to review a constitutional challenge to § 236(c), we proceed to review respondent's claim. Section 236(c) mandates detention during removal proceedings for a limited class of deportable aliens—including those convicted of an aggravated felony. Congress adopted this provision against a backdrop of wholesale failure by the INS to deal with increasing rates of criminal activity by aliens. Criminal aliens were the fastest growing segment of the federal prison population, already constituting roughly 25% of all federal prisoners, and they formed a rapidly rising share of state prison populations as well. Congress' investigations showed, however, that the INS could not even identify most deportable aliens, much less locate them and remove them from the country. One study showed that, at the then-current rate of deportation, it would take 23 years to remove every criminal alien already subject to deportation. Making matters worse, criminal aliens who were deported swiftly reentered the country illegally in great numbers.

The agency's near-total inability to remove deportable criminal aliens imposed more than a monetary cost on the Nation. First, as Congress explained, "aliens who enter or remain in the United States in violation of our law are effectively taking immigration opportunities that might otherwise be extended to others." Second, deportable criminal aliens who remained in the United States often committed more crimes before being removed. One 1986 study showed that, after criminal aliens were identified as deportable, 77% were arrested at least once more and 45%—nearly half—were arrested multiple times before their deportation proceedings even began.

Congress also had before it evidence that one of the major causes of the INS' failure to remove deportable criminal aliens was the agency's failure to detain those aliens during their deportation proceedings. The Attorney General at the time had broad discretion to conduct individualized bond hearings and to release criminal aliens from custody during their removal proceedings when those aliens were determined not to present an excessive flight risk or threat to society. Despite this discretion to conduct bond hearings, however, in practice the INS faced severe limitations on funding and detention space, which considerations affected its release determinations. "Release determinations are made by the INS in large part, according to the number of beds available in a particular region."

Once released, more than 20% of deportable criminal aliens failed to appear for their removal hearings. The dissent disputes that statistic but goes on to praise a subsequent study conducted by the Vera Institute of Justice that more than confirms it. As the dissent explains, the Vera study found that "77% of those [deportable criminal aliens] released on bond" showed up for their removal proceedings. * * * The Vera Institute study strongly supports Congress' concern that, even with individualized screening, releasing deportable criminal aliens on bond would lead to an unacceptable rate of flight.

* * *

* * * This Court has firmly and repeatedly endorsed the proposition that Congress may make rules as to aliens that would be unacceptable if applied to citizens. * * *

* * *

"It is well established that the Fifth Amendment entitles aliens to due process of law in deportation proceedings." At the same time, however, this Court has recognized detention during deportation proceedings as a constitutionally valid aspect of the deportation process. As we said more than a century ago, deportation proceedings “would be vain if those accused could not be held in custody pending the inquiry into their true character.” * * *

* * *

Despite this Court’s longstanding view that the Government may constitutionally detain deportable aliens during the limited period necessary for their removal proceedings, respondent argues that the narrow detention policy reflected in INA § 236(c) violates due process. Respondent, like the four Courts of Appeals that have held § 236(c) to be unconstitutional, relies heavily upon our recent opinion in Zadvydas v. Davis.

In Zadvydas, the Court considered a due process challenge to detention of aliens under INA § 241, which governs detention following a final order of removal. Section 241(a)(6) provides, among other things, that when an alien who has been ordered removed is not in fact removed during the 90-day statutory “removal period,” that alien “may be detained beyond the removal period” in the discretion of the Attorney General. The Court in Zadvydas read § 241 to authorize continued detention of an alien following the 90-day removal period for only such time as is reasonably necessary to secure the alien’s removal.

But Zadvydas is materially different from the present case in two respects.

First, in Zadvydas, the aliens challenging their detention following final orders of deportation were ones for whom removal was “no longer practically attainable.” The Court thus held that the detention there did not serve its purported immigration purpose. In so holding, the Court rejected the Government’s claim that, by detaining the aliens involved, it could prevent them from fleeing prior to their removal. The Court observed that where, as there, “detention’s goal is no longer practically attainable, detention no longer bears a reasonable relation to the purpose for which the individual was committed.”

In the present case, the statutory provision at issue governs detention of deportable criminal aliens pending their removal proceedings. Such detention necessarily serves the purpose of preventing deportable criminal aliens from fleeing prior to or during their removal proceedings, thus increasing the chance that, if ordered removed, the aliens will be successfully removed. Respondent disagrees, arguing that there is no evidence that mandatory detention is necessary because the Government has never shown that individualized bond hearings would be ineffective. But as discussed above, in adopting § 236(c), Congress had before it evidence suggesting that permitting discretionary release of aliens pending their removal hearings would lead to large numbers of deportable criminal aliens skipping their hearings and remaining at large in the United States unlawfully.

Respondent argues that these statistics are irrelevant and do not demonstrate that individualized bond hearings “are ineffective or burdensome.” It is of course true that when Congress enacted § 236, individualized bail determinations had not been tested under optimal conditions, or tested in all their possible permutations. But when the Government deals with deportable aliens, the Due Process Clause does not require it to employ the least burdensome means to accomplish its goal. The evidence Congress had before it certainly supports the approach it selected even if other, hypothetical studies might have suggested different courses of action.

Zadvydas is materially different from the present case in a second respect as well. While the period of detention at issue in Zadvydas was “indefinite” and “potentially permanent,” the detention here is of a much shorter duration.

Zadvydas distinguished the statutory provision it was there considering from § 236 on these very grounds, noting that “post-removal-period detention, unlike detention pending a determination of removability . . ., has no obvious termination point.” Under 236(c), not only does detention have a definite termination point, in the majority of cases it lasts for less than the 90 days we considered presumptively valid in Zadvydas. The Executive Office for Immigration Review has calculated that, in 85% of the cases in which aliens are detained pursuant to § 236(c), removal proceedings are completed in an average time of 47 days and a median of 30 days. In the remaining 15% of cases, in which the alien appeals the decision of the Immigration Judge to the Board of Immigration Appeals, appeal takes an average of four months, with a median time that is slightly shorter.

These statistics do not include the many cases in which removal proceedings are completed while the alien is still serving time for the underlying conviction. In those cases, the aliens involved are never subjected to mandatory detention at all. * * *

* * * The judgment of the Court of Appeals is reversed.

■ JUSTICE KENNEDY, concurring.

While the justification for INA § 236(c) is based upon the Government’s concerns over the risks of flight and danger to the community, the ultimate purpose behind the detention is premised upon the alien’s deportability. As a consequence, due process requires individualized procedures to ensure there is at least some merit to the Immigration and Naturalization Service’s (INS) charge and, therefore, sufficient justification to detain a lawful permanent resident alien pending a more formal hearing. * * * If the Government cannot satisfy this minimal, threshold burden, then the permissibility of continued detention pending deportation proceedings turns solely upon the alien’s ability to satisfy the ordinary bond procedures—namely, whether if released the alien would pose a risk of flight or a danger to the community.

As the Court notes, these procedures were apparently available to respondent in this case. Respondent was entitled to a hearing in which he could have “raised any nonfrivolous argument available to demonstrate that he was not properly included in a mandatory detention category.” Had he prevailed in such a proceeding, the Immigration Judge then would have had to determine if respondent “could be considered . . . for release under the general bond provisions” of § 236(a). Respondent, however, did not seek relief under these procedures, and the Court had no occasion here to determine their adequacy.

For similar reasons, since the Due Process Clause prohibits arbitrary deprivations of liberty, a lawful permanent resident alien such as respondent could be entitled to an individualized determination as to his risk of flight and dangerousness if the continued detention became unreasonable or unjustified. Were there to be an unreasonable delay by the INS in pursuing and completing deportation proceedings, it could become necessary then to inquire whether the detention is not to facilitate deportation, or to protect against risk of flight or dangerousness, but to incarcerate for other reasons. That is not a proper inference, however, either from the statutory scheme itself or from the circumstances of this case. The Court’s careful opinion is consistent with these premises, and I join it in full.

■ JUSTICE O’CONNOR, with whom JUSTICE SCALIA and JUSTICE THOMAS join, concurring in part and concurring in the judgment.

I join all but Part I of the Court’s opinion because, a majority having determined there is jurisdiction, I agree with the Court’s resolution of respondent’s challenge on the merits. I cannot join Part I because I believe that INA § 236(e) unequivocally deprives federal courts of jurisdiction to set aside “any action or decision” by the Attorney General in detaining criminal aliens under § 236(c) while removal proceedings are ongoing. That is precisely the nature of the action before us.

* * *

■ JUSTICE SOUTER, with whom JUSTICE STEVENS and JUSTICE GINSBURG join, concurring in part and dissenting in part.

* * *

I join Part I of the Court’s opinion, which upholds federal jurisdiction in this case, but I dissent from the Court’s disposition on the merits. The Court’s holding that the Constitution permits the Government to lock up a lawful permanent resident of this country when there is concededly no reason to do so forgets over a century of precedent acknowledging the rights of permanent residents, including the basic liberty from physical confinement lying at the heart of due process. The INS has never argued that detaining Kim is necessary to guarantee his appearance for removal proceedings or to protect anyone from danger in the meantime. Instead, shortly after the District Court issued its order in this case, the INS, sua sponte and without even holding a custody hearing, concluded that Kim “would not be considered a threat” and that any risk of flight could be met by a bond of $5,000. He was released soon thereafter, and there is no indication that he is not complying with the terms of his release.

The Court’s approval of lengthy mandatory detention can therefore claim no justification in national emergency or any risk posed by Kim particularly. The Court's judgment is unjustified by past cases or current facts, and I respectfully dissent.

I

At the outset, there is the Court's mistaken suggestion that Kim "conceded" his removability. The Court cites no statement before any court conceding removability, and I can find none. At the first opportunity, Kim applied to the Immigration Court for withholding of removal [a remedy related to asylum and considered in chapter 11—Eds.], and he represents that he intends to assert that his criminal convictions are not for removable offenses and that he is independently eligible for statutory relief from removal. In his brief before the Ninth Circuit, Kim stated that his removability was "an open question," that he was "still fighting [his] removal administratively," and that the Immigration Court had yet to hold a merits hearing. At oral argument here, his counsel stated that Kim was challenging his removability.

The suggestion that Kim should have contested his removability in this habeas corpus petition misses the point that all he claims, or could now claim, is that his detention pending removal proceedings violates the Constitution. Challenges to removability itself, and applications for relief from removal, are usually submitted in the first instance to an immigration judge. The Immigration Judge had not yet held an initial hearing on the substantive issue of removability when Kim filed his habeas petition in the District Court, even though Kim had been detained for over three months under § 236(c). If Kim's habeas corpus petition had claimed "that he himself was not 'deportable,'" as the Court suggests it should have, the District Court would probably have dismissed the claim as unexhausted. Kim did not, therefore, "concede that he is deportable" by challenging removability before the Immigration Judge and challenging detention in a federal court.

* * *

II

A

It has been settled for over a century that all aliens within our territory are "persons" entitled to the protection of the Due Process Clause. * * *

The constitutional protection of an alien's person and property is particularly strong in the case of aliens lawfully admitted to permanent residence (LPRs). The immigration laws give LPRs the opportunity to establish a life permanently in this country by developing economic, familial, and social ties indistinguishable from those of a citizen. In fact, the law of the United States goes out of its way to encourage just such attachments by creating immigration preferences for those with a citizen as a close relation, and those with valuable professional skills or other assets promising benefits to the United States.

Once they are admitted to permanent residence, LPRs share in the economic freedom enjoyed by citizens: they may compete for most jobs in the private and public sectors without obtaining job-specific authorization, and apart from the franchise, jury duty, and certain forms of public assistance, their lives are generally indistinguishable from those of United States citizens. That goes for obligations as well as opportunities. Unlike temporary, nonimmigrant aliens, who are generally taxed only on income from domestic sources or connected with a domestic business, LPRs, like citizens, are taxed on their worldwide income. Male LPRs between the ages of 18 and 26 must register under the Selective Service Act of 1948. "Resident aliens, like citizens, pay taxes, support the economy, serve in the Armed Forces, and contribute in myriad other ways to our society." And if they choose, they may apply for full membership in the national polity through naturalization.

The attachments fostered through these legal mechanisms are all the more intense for LPRs brought to the United States as children. They grow up here as members of the society around them, probably without much touch with their country of citizenship, probably considering the United States as home just as much as a native-born, younger brother or sister entitled to United States citizenship. * * * Kim is an example. He moved to the United States at the age of six and was lawfully admitted to permanent residence when he was eight. His mother is a citizen, and his father and brother are LPRs. LPRs in Kim's situation have little or no reason to feel or to establish firm ties with any place besides the United States.

* * *

B

Kim's claim is a limited one: not that the Government may not detain LPRs to ensure their appearance at removal hearings, but that due process under the Fifth Amendment conditions a potentially lengthy detention on a hearing and an impartial decisionmaker's finding that detention is necessary to a governmental purpose. He thus invokes our repeated decisions that the claim of liberty protected by the Fifth Amendment is at its strongest when government seeks to detain an individual. THE CHIEF JUSTICE wrote in 1987 that "in our society liberty is the norm, and detention prior to trial or without trial is the carefully limited exception." * * *

Accordingly, the Fifth Amendment permits detention only where "heightened, substantive due process scrutiny" finds a "sufficiently compelling" governmental need. In deciding in [United States v. Salerno, 481 U.S. 739 (1987)] that this principle did not categorically bar pretrial detention of criminal defendants without bail under the Bail Reform Act of 1984, it was crucial that the statute provided that, "in a full-blown adversary hearing, the Government must convince a neutral decisionmaker by clear and convincing evidence that no conditions of release can reasonably assure the safety of the community or any person." * * *

We have reviewed involuntary civil commitment statutes the same way. In Addington v. Texas, 441 U.S. 418, 60 L. Ed. 2d 323, 99 S. Ct. 1804 (1979), we held that a State could not civilly commit the mentally ill without showing by “clear and convincing evidence” that the person was dangerous to others. * * *

* * *

The substantive demands of due process necessarily go hand in hand with the procedural, and the cases insist at the least on an opportunity for a detainee to challenge the reason claimed for committing him. * * *

These cases yield a simple distillate that should govern the result here. Due process calls for an individual determination before someone is locked away. In none of the cases cited did we ever suggest that the government could avoid the Due Process Clause by doing what § 236(c) does, by selecting a class of people for confinement on a categorical basis and denying members of that class any chance to dispute the necessity of putting them away. The cases, of course, would mean nothing if citizens and comparable residents could be shorn of due process by this sort of categorical sleight of hand. Without any “full-blown adversary hearing” before detention, or heightened burden of proof, or other procedures to show the government’s interest in committing an individual, procedural rights would amount to nothing but mechanisms for testing group membership. * * *

C

We held as much just two Terms ago in Zadvydas v. Davis, which stands for the proposition that detaining an alien requires more than the rationality of a general detention statute; any justification must go to the alien himself. Zadvydas considered detention of two aliens, Zadvydas and Ma, who had already been ordered removed and therefore enjoyed no lawful immigration status. Their cases arose because actual removal appeared unlikely owing to the refusal of their native countries to accept them, with the result that they had been detained not only for the standard 90-day removal period, during which time most removal orders are executed, but beyond that period because the INS considered them to be a “risk to the community” and “unlikely to comply with the order of removal.” * * *

The Zadvydas opinion opened by noting the clear applicability of general due process standards: physical detention requires both a “special justification” that “outweighs the ‘individual’s constitutionally protected interest in avoiding physical restraint’” and “adequate procedural protections.” Nowhere did we suggest that the “constitutionally protected liberty interest” in avoiding physical confinement, even for aliens already ordered removed, was conceptually different from the liberty interest of citizens. * * *

Thus, we began by positing commonly accepted substantive standards and proceeded to enquire into any “special justification” that might outweigh the aliens’ powerful interest in avoiding physical confinement “under [individually ordered] release conditions that may not be violated." We found nothing to justify the Government's position. * * * [W]e remanded the cases to the Courts of Appeals for a determination of the sufficiency of the Government's interests in Zadvydas's and Ma's individual detention.

Our individualized analysis and disposition in Zadvydas support Kim's claim for an individualized review of his challenge to the reasons that are supposed to justify confining him prior to any determination of removability. In fact, aliens in removal proceedings have an additional interest in avoiding confinement, beyond anything considered in Zadvydas: detention prior to entry of a removal order may well impede the alien's ability to develop and present his case on the very issue of removability. After all, our recognition that the serious penalty of removal must be justified on a heightened standard of proof will not mean all that much when the INS can detain, transfer, and isolate aliens away from their lawyers, witnesses, and evidence. Kim's right to defend against removal gives him an even stronger claim than the aliens in Zadvydas could raise.

* * *

Hence the Zadvydas dissent's focus on "whether there are adequate procedures" allowing "persons once subject to detention to show that through rehabilitation, new appreciation of their responsibilities, or under other standards, they no longer present special risks or danger if put at large." Indeed, there is further support for Kim's claim in the dissent's view that the process afforded to removable aliens like Zadvydas and Ma "[went] far toward the objective" of satisfying procedural due process; that process stands in stark contrast to the total absence of custody review available in response to Kim's claim that he is neither dangerous nor a flight risk.²⁹ * * * Every Court of Appeals to consider the detention of an LPR under § 236(c) after Zadvydas reached the same conclusion.

D

By these standards, Kim's case is an easy one. "Heightened, substantive due process scrutiny" uncovers serious infirmities in § 236(c). Deten-

29. [Footnote 12 in original] The hearing recognized in Matter of Joseph, 22 I. & N. Dec. 799 (BIA 1999), is no response to this deficiency. As the Court notes, the "'Joseph hearing'" only permits an alien to show that he does not meet the statutory criteria for mandatory detention under § 236(c). Kim argues that, even assuming that he fits under the statute, the statute's application to LPRs like him does not fit under the Due Process Clause.

JUSTICE KENNEDY recognizes that the Due Process Clause requires "an individualized determination as to [an LPR's] risk of flight and dangerousness if the continued detention [becomes] unreasonable or unjustified." It is difficult to see how Kim's detention in this case is anything but unreasonable and unjustified, since the Government concedes that detention is not necessary to completion of his removal proceedings or to the community's protection. Certainly the fact that "there is at least some merit to the [INS's] charge" that Kim should be held to be removable does not establish a compelling reason for detention. The INS releases many noncriminal aliens on bond or on conditional parole under § 236(a)(2) pending removal proceedings, and the fact that Kim has been convicted of criminal offenses does not on its own justify his detention.

tion is not limited to dangerous criminal aliens or those found likely to flee, but applies to all aliens claimed to be deportable for criminal convictions, even where the underlying offenses are minor. E.g., Michel v. INS, 206 F.3d 253, 256 (CA2 2000) (possession of stolen bus transfers); Matter of Bart, 20 I. & N. Dec. 436 (BIA 1992) (issuance of a bad check). Detention under § 236(c) is not limited by the kind of time limit imposed by the Speedy Trial Act, and while it lasts only as long as the removal proceedings, those proceedings have no deadline and may last over a year. Section 236(c) neither requires nor permits an official to determine whether Kim's detention was necessary to prevent flight or danger.

Kim's detention without particular justification in these respects, or the opportunity to enquire into it, violates both components of due process, and I would accordingly affirm the judgment of the Court of Appeals requiring the INS to hold a bail hearing to see whether detention is needed to avoid a risk of flight or a danger to the community. This is surely little enough, given the fact that 8 USC § 1536 gives an LPR charged with being a foreign terrorist the right to a release hearing pending a determination that he be removed.

III

* * *

A

* * *

First, the Court says that § 236(c) "serves the purpose of preventing deportable criminal aliens from fleeing prior to or during their removal proceedings." Yes it does, and the statute in Zadvydas, viewed outside the context of any individual alien's detention, served the purpose of preventing aliens ordered to be deported from fleeing prior to actual deportation. In each case, the fact that a statute serves its purpose in general fails to justify the detention of an individual in particular. Some individual aliens covered by § 236(c) have meritorious challenges to removability or claims for relief from removal. * * *

The Court appears to respond that Congress may require detention of removable aliens based on a general conclusion that detention is needed for effective removal of criminal aliens on a class-wide basis. But on that logic Zadvydas should have come out the other way, for detention of the entire class of aliens who have actually been ordered removed will in general "serve the purpose" of their effective removal. Yet neither the Court nor JUSTICE KENNEDY in dissent suggested that scrutiny under the Due Process Clause could be satisfied at such a general level. Rather, we remanded the individual cases of Zadvydas and Ma for determinations of the strength of the Government's reasons for detaining them in particular. We can insist on nothing less here, since the Government's justification for detaining individuals like Zadvydas and Ma, who had no right to remain in this country and were proven flight risks and dangers to society, is certainly stronger (and at least no weaker) than its interest in detaining a lawful permanent resident who has not been shown (or even claimed) to be either a flight risk or a threat to the community.

The Court's closest approach to a reason justifying class-wide detention without exception here is a Senate Report stating that over 20% of nondetained criminal aliens failed to appear for removal hearings. To begin with, the Senate Report's statistic treats all criminal aliens alike and does not distinguish between LPRs like Kim, who are likely to have developed strong ties within the United States, and temporary visitors or illegal entrants. Even more importantly, the statistic tells us nothing about flight risk at all because, as both the Court and the Senate Report recognize, the INS was making its custody determinations not on the ground of likelihood of flight or dangerousness, but "in large part, according to the number of beds available in a particular region." * * *

* * *

The Court nowhere addresses the Vera Institute's conclusion that criminal aliens released under supervisory conditions are overwhelmingly likely to attend their hearings. * * *

* * *

The Court's second effort [to distinguish Zadvydas] is its claim that mandatory detention under § 236(c) is generally of a "much shorter duration" than the incarceration at issue in Zadvydas. While it is true that removal proceedings are unlikely to prove "indefinite and potentially permanent," they are not formally limited to any period, and often extend beyond the time suggested by the Court, that is, "an average time of 47 days" or, for aliens who exercise their right of appeal, "an average of four months." * * *

In the first place, the average time from receipt of charging documents to decision obscures the fact that the alien may receive charging documents only after being detained for a substantial period. Kim, for example, was not charged until five weeks after the INS detained him.

Even more revealing is an explanation of the raw numbers that are averaged out. As the Solicitor General conceded, the length of the average detention period in great part reflects the fact that the vast majority of cases involve aliens who raise no challenge to removability at all. LPRs like Kim, however, will hardly fit that pattern. Unlike many illegal entrants and temporary nonimmigrants, LPRs are the aliens most likely to press substantial challenges to removability requiring lengthy proceedings. * * *

* * *

permanent resident alien when there is no reason for it and no way to challenge it. The Court's holding that the Due Process Clause allows this under a blanket rule is devoid of even ostensible justification in fact and at odds with the settled standard of liberty. I respectfully dissent.

■ JUSTICE BREYER, concurring in part and dissenting in part.

I agree with the majority that the courts have jurisdiction, and I join Part I of its opinion. If I believed (as the majority apparently believes) that Kim had conceded that he is deportable, then I would conclude that the Government could detain him without bail for the few weeks ordinarily necessary for formal entry of a removal order. Time limits of the kind set forth in Zadvydas v. Davis should govern these and longer periods of detention, for an alien's concession that he is deportable. * * *

This case, however, is not one in which an alien concedes deportability. As JUSTICE SOUTER points out, Kim argues to the contrary. Kim claims that his earlier convictions were neither for an " 'aggravated felony,' " nor for two crimes of " 'moral turpitude.' " And given shifting lower court views on such matters, I cannot say that his arguments are insubstantial or interposed solely for purposes of delay. * * *

That being so—as long as Kim's legal arguments are neither insubstantial nor interposed solely for purposes of delay—then the immigration statutes, interpreted in light of the Constitution, permit Kim (if neither dangerous nor a flight risk) to obtain bail. For one thing, Kim's constitutional claims to bail in these circumstances are strong. * * *

* * *

Finally, bail standards drawn from the criminal justice system are available to fill this statutory gap. Federal law makes bail available to a criminal defendant after conviction and pending appeal provided (1) the appeal is "not for the purpose of delay," (2) the appeal "raises a substantial question of law or fact," and (3) the defendant shows by "clear and convincing evidence" that, if released, he "is not likely to flee or pose a danger to the safety" of the community. 18 USC § 3143(b). These standards give considerable weight to any special governmental interest in detention (e.g., process-related concerns or class-related flight risks). The standards are more protective of a detained alien's liberty interest than those currently administered in the INS' Joseph hearings. And they have proved workable in practice in the criminal justice system. Nothing in the statute forbids their use when § 236(c) deportability is in doubt.

I would interpret the (silent) statute as imposing these bail standards. So interpreted, the statute would require the Government to permit a detained alien to seek an individualized assessment of flight risk and dangerousness as long as the alien's claim that he is not deportable is (1) not interposed solely for purposes of delay and (2) raises a question of "law or fact" that is not insubstantial. And that interpretation, in my view, is consistent with what the Constitution demands. I would remand this case to the Ninth Circuit to determine whether Kim has raised such a claim.

With respect, I dissent from the Court's contrary disposition.

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. In the case you just read, the various Justices' opinions frequently refer to "mandatory" detention, sometimes called "categorical" detention, as distinguished from "discretionary" or "individualized" or "case-by-case" detention determinations. Before proceeding further, consider carefully what those terms really mean.

In truth, those terms are flexible enough to describe almost any of the competing models that the various Justices discussed. Justice Kennedy's concurring opinion, for example, suggested that the rule being challenged here—that detention is mandatory if a noncitizen has been convicted of an aggravated felony—in fact provides for individualized inquiry. As he observed, the person has a right to a hearing (called a Joseph hearing after the BIA decision that authorized it) at which the detainee may argue that the criteria Congress has established for mandatory detention have not been met—for example, the respondent is a citizen, or he or she has not been convicted, or the crime does not constitute an aggravated felony. The majority opinion makes the same point in different language. The dissent, in contrast, argues that the individualized inquiry required by due process entails determinations of whether the person is likely to abscond or to endanger the public. But those are also categories; i.e., if the statute had said that all noncitizens who are likely to abscond or to endanger the public must be detained and that all others must be released on bond, the formulation could literally be described as just another kind of mandatory categorical approach. Under each model, there are general categories that determine whether the person must be detained, and the individual has an opportunity for a hearing to contest that he or she fits any of those categories.

Thus, the difference between mandatory categorical detention and individualized, case-by-case detention determinations is essentially one of degree. The more closely the legal criteria for detention resemble the policy justifications for it, the more intuitive it is to label the process as "individualized" and the less intuitive it becomes to describe the detention as "mandatory." Under the dissent's model, the criteria and the justifications are congruent. The very reasons for detaining the person are to prevent him or her from absconding or endangering the public, and it is only when those reasons apply to the particular individual that detention is permitted. In contrast, the majority opinion approves the use of proxies, or correlations. It does not dispute that assuring the person's appearance at the hearing and protecting the public safety are the justifications for detention, but it allows Congress to gauge those risks by use of a proxy—whether the person has been convicted of an "aggravated felony." The majority does

2. First, try to articulate the various benefits and the various costs of detaining noncitizens while their removal proceedings are pending. Second, articulate the pros and cons of mandatory, categorical detention criteria versus discretionary, case-by-case determinations. For a comprehensive discussion of the theories, benefits, and costs of both detention versus release and mandatory versus discretionary detention determinations, see Stephen H. Legomsky, The Detention of Aliens: Theories, Rules, and Discretion, 30 Univ. Miami Inter-American L. Rev. 531 (1999).

3. Justice Souter, at the beginning of his dissent, described the majority opinion as “holding that the Constitution permits the government to lock up a lawful permanent resident of this country when there is concededly no reason to do so.” Was his characterization accurate?

4. Is the issue one of substantive due process or procedural due process? Justice Souter in dissent says the demands of the two doctrines “go hand in hand” and, later, that mandatory detention violates both. As applied to the issue of mandatory detention, what, exactly, is the relationship between the substantive due process and procedural due process arguments? Do you think it matters which of the two characterizations of the issue the Court adopts? Think about (a) precisely what factual issues the opposing sides say the person has a right to a hearing on; and (b) how the choice of characterization might affect the standard of review.

5. Whichever strand of due process the Court thinks it is considering, what standard of review does it apply? How great must the government’s interests be to justify detention during removal proceedings? How narrowly tailored must the criteria be to the achievement of those interests?

6. Both the majority opinion and Justice Souter’s dissent address the question whether Zadvydas compels the Court to hold mandatory detention unconstitutional. How is it possible for the two sides to answer that question differently? Which reading of Zadvydas do you find more convincing?³⁰

7. Kim was an LPR, not a nonimmigrant or an undocumented migrant, for example. And he was facing expulsion from the United States, not, for example, removal at a port of entry. Therefore one would expect his interests to be at the top of the noncitizen hierarchy, and we can safely assume the majority would have reached the same result, a fortiori, had his situation been otherwise. But what about the dissent? Would it make sense

30. For general commentary on mandatory detention, see Legomsky, item 2 above; Peter H. Schuck, INS Detention and Removal: A “White Paper,” 11 Georgetown Immigration L.J. 667 (1997); Margaret H. Taylor, The 1996 Immigration Act: Detention and Related Issues, 74 IR 209 (Feb. 3, 1997); Margaret H. Taylor, Symbolic Detention, 20 In Defense of the Alien 153 (1998); Vera Institute of Justice, The Appearance Assistance Program (1998). For some compelling accounts of life inside U.S. immigration detention facilities, see, e.g., Mark Dow, American Gulag—Inside U.S. Immigration Prisons (2004); Margaret H. Taylor, Detained Aliens Challenging Conditions of Confinement and the Porous Border of the Plenary Power Doctrine, 22 Hastings Constitutional L.Q. 1087 (1995); see also M. Isabel Medina, Demore v. Kim—A Dance of Power and Human Rights, 18 Georgetown Immigration L.J. 697 (2004).

for Justice Souter to prescribe the same results in the case of either (a) a noncitizen with a lesser immigration status; or (b) a noncitizen arriving at a port of entry?

8. Both the majority opinion and the Souter dissent devote considerable space to the fact question whether Kim has conceded deportability. For Justice Breyer, in fact, the issue is outcome-determinative. As you will see in chapters 7 and 8, a typical removal proceeding (for a person who has been admitted to the United States and wants to remain) normally proceeds in two phases. In the first phase the government must prove the person is “deportable”—i.e., that he or she fits within one of the many grounds for expulsion. In most cases deportability is conceded and the hearing proceeds to the second phase. There the noncitizen applies for discretionary relief under one or more of the many affirmative relief provisions scattered throughout the INA. Mr. Kim apparently intended at his removal hearing to do both. He planned to argue that he was not deportable because the crimes of which he had been convicted did not meet the legal definition of “aggravated felony,” a term you will study later. Alternatively, he planned to request a form of affirmative relief called “withholding of removal,” a remedy related to asylum. Fact questions aside, should the permissibility of mandatory detention hinge on whether deportability has been conceded?

9. Justice Souter in dissent analogizes to the rules for pre-trial detention in criminal cases and the rules for involuntary civil commitment of dangerous individuals. Are his analogies apt?

10. Justice Breyer offers an interesting analogy of his own and reads the immigration statute as implicitly embodying it. He too draws from the bail standards in criminal cases, but, for reasons he does not explain, the criminal law standards he chooses to import are the ones that govern detention pending appeals from criminal convictions—not pretrial detention. A person who requests bail pending appeal, he says, must show not only that he or she is unlikely to flee or endanger public safety (and must show this by “clear and convincing evidence”), but also that the appeal is not for delay purposes and, importantly, that the appeal “raises a substantial question of law or fact.” What do you think of this analogy?

11. What does this case augur for the future of the plenary power doctrine? In particular, is the procedural due process exception to the doctrine still intact?

12. As noted earlier, Zadvydas was decided shortly before September 11, 2001. The present case was decided about nineteen months after September 11. The composition of the Court did not change in the interim. Do you think September 11 influenced the Court’s decision in Kim? Are there future national security-related scenarios that the Court might have been anticipating? Don’t spend too much time on this question now. In chapter 10 you will encounter the host of post-September 11 developments that relate to the interaction of national security and immigration (or at least to the interaction of national security and noncitizens). Section A of that chapter deals specifically with the numerous detention strategies implemented for reasons of national security.

13. As of 2007, ICE was detaining an average of 28,000 people at any given time, at an average cost of $90 per day, per person. See Shoba Sivaprasad Wadhia, The Policy and Politics of Immigrant Rights, 16 Temple Political & Civil Rights L. Rev. 387, 404, 408 (2007).

e. WHERE ARE WE NOW?

Is there really such a thing as the “plenary power doctrine,” or do the so-called plenary power cases merely reflect the more generally applicable contemporary norms of the eras in which they were decided? Professor Gabriel J. Chin argues that many of the most extreme plenary power decisions, despite the rhetoric of special deference to Congress on immigration matters, in fact reached results that would have been reached in analogous non-immigration cases under the accepted constitutional norms then prevailing.³¹

Whether the doctrine is all rhetoric, all substance, or parts of each, there is still uncertainty about both its actual impact and its current status. As to its impact, several scholars have suggested some problematic side effects.³²

At any rate, it is clear that the Supreme Court and the lower courts have moved beyond the absolutist conception of plenary power embraced by at least the language of some of the older Supreme Court opinions. Modern courts have fashioned a number of escape routes, exceptions, and limitations. You have now seen most of them. Here is a summary:

1. As discussed in connection with Zadvydas and Martinez, courts will often interpret immigration statutes favorably to noncitizens in order to avoid not only the need to decide constitutional questions, but also the harsh results of the plenary power doctrine. See generally Stephen H. Legomsky, Immigration and the Judiciary—Law and Politics in Britain and America at 155–70, 177–222 (1987).³³

2. As you will see in more detail in chapter 9, the Supreme Court’s decisions in Demore v. Hyung Joon Kim, 538 U.S. 510, 123 S.Ct. 1708, 155 L.Ed.2d 724 (2003) and INS v. St. Cyr, 533 U.S. 289, 121 S.Ct. 2271, 150

31. See Gabriel J. Chin, Is There a Plenary Power Doctrine? A Tentative Apology and Prediction for Our Strange but Unexceptional Constitutional Immigration Law, 14 Georgetown Immigration L.J. 257 (2000). Some other commentators disagree. See Kevin R. Johnson, Race and Immigration Law and Enforcement: A Response to Is There a Plenary Power Doctrine?, 14 Georgetown Immigration L.J. 289 (2000); Stephen H. Legomsky, Immigration Exceptionalism: Commentary on Is There a Plenary Power Doctrine?, 14 Georgetown Immigration L.J. 307 (2000).

32. See, e.g., Margaret H. Taylor, Behind the Scenes of St. Cyr and Zadvydas: Making Policy in the Midst of Litigation, 16

Georgetown Immigration L.J. 271 (2002) (causing policy development and litigation strategy to converge in unhealthy ways); Kevin R. Johnson, The Antiterrorism Act, the Immigration Reform Act, and Ideological Regulation in the Immigration Laws: Important Lessons for Citizens and Noncitizens, 28 St. Mary’s L.J. 833 (1997) (arguing that the doctrine has seeped into political soil, thus contributing to a public backlash against immigrants).

33. For additional examples of the same phenomenon, see Hiroshi Motomura, Immigration Law After a Century of Plenary Power: Phantom Constitutional Norms and Statutory Interpretation, 100 Yale L.J. 545 (1990). A solid defense of the constitutional

L.Ed.2d 347 (2001), recognized noncitizens' rights to judicial review of removal orders by way of habeas corpus. Like Zadvydas, these decisions were nominally statutory interpretations but were influenced by the Court's desire to avoid assumed constitutional constraints. Outside the immigration setting the Supreme Court has similarly recognized habeas corpus as a vehicle for testing the legality of the Guantánamo noncitizen detentions. Rasul v. Bush, 542 U.S. 466, 124 S.Ct. 2686, 159 L.Ed.2d 548 (2004).

3. Procedural due process is clearly required in expulsion cases and in most cases involving the exclusion of returning LPRs. See the earlier materials on Yamataya and Plasencia, respectively. As discussed in the Notes and Questions following Francis, some constitutional arguments are capable of being framed as either procedural due process or substantive due process. Many lower courts have found ways to characterize challenges as procedural in order to avoid the problem of plenary congressional power. Contra, Demore v. Hyung Joon Kim, 538 U.S. 510, 123 S.Ct. 1708, 155 L.Ed.2d 724 (2003).

4. Even with respect to substantive due process or federal "equal protection," lower courts often translate the plenary power doctrine into a "rational basis" test. See generally Stephen H. Legomsky, Immigration Law and the Principle of Plenary Congressional Power, 1984 Supreme Ct. Rev. 255, 304. The Francis case is a leading example. In Fiallo (see pages 188–90 above), the Supreme Court seemed to follow suit.

5. There is at least some authority for the proposition that immigration statutes are subject to the same first amendment standards as other statutes. For the reasons considered earlier (see pages 190–94 above), the validity of that proposition is unclear.

6. The Supreme Court decision in Chadha suggests that separation of powers challenges (as distinguished from individual rights challenges) might be at least somewhat less vulnerable to the plenary power doctrine.

7. The Supreme Court decisions in Zadvydas and Martinez might signal a general weakening of the plenary power doctrine. At the very least, these cases evidence a willingness to consider constitutional limitations when prolonged detention is challenged, a lesson that can perhaps be distilled also from Rasul v. Bush, 542 U.S. 466, 124 S.Ct. 2686, 159 L.Ed.2d 548 (2004) (recognizing habeas rights of noncitizens detained at Guantánamo). But cf. Demore v. Hyung Joon Kim, 538 U.S. 510, 123 S.Ct. 1708, 155 L.Ed.2d 724 (2003), discussed on pages 211–29 above (upholding mandatory categorical detention for entire duration of removal proceedings, at least in certain circumstances).

One of the co-authors of this book once predicted that the plenary power doctrine was unlikely to be formally and suddenly overruled, but that the Supreme Court would gradually whittle it down through a process of cumulative limitations and exceptions. Eventually, it was thought, the Court would confirm that even immigration statutes are subject to constitutional restraints, simply deny that a doctrine of special immigration deference ever really existed, and characterize the "doctrine" as merely a prudent reminder that immigration statutes often reflect sensitive policy judgments by the political branches. Under this scenario, like old soldiers, the plenary power doctrine never dies; it just fades away. The result, it was predicted, would be "PPD-lite." See Stephen H. Legomsky, Ten More Years of Plenary Power: Immigration, Congress, and the Courts, 22 Hastings Constitutional L.Q. 925, 934-37 (1995). Do you think that what we now have is PPD-lite, something more, or something less?

The following passages were excerpted from an article that won the 1998 Association of American Law Schools Scholarly Paper Competition. In it, Professor Gabriel Chin carefully investigates the explicit racial impetus for the Chinese Exclusion Act, for related legislation, and for the Supreme Court cases that invented the plenary power doctrine. Section I examines the history. In section II, Professor Chin draws on that history and subsequent developments to argue that the Supreme Court would not countenance similar racially discriminatory immigration legislation today. Most of section II focuses on domestic law developments within the United States; one specific argument made by Professor Chin is that, even if the Court today were to apply only a rational basis test to racial classifications in immigration law, those classifications would fail that test.

The portion reproduced below, however, draws reinforcement from modern conceptions of international law. In this enterprise, Professor Chin credits and builds on the contributions of other scholars who have urged United States legislators, executive officials, and judges to heed international law when dealing with immigration.³⁴

Gabriel J. Chin, Segregation's Last Stronghold: Race Discrimination and the Constitutional Law of Immigration

46 UCLA L. Rev. 1, 58-62 (1998).

* * *

B. The International Law Foundation of the Plenary Power Doctrine

The Court derived the plenary power doctrine from its understanding of international law rather than any specific provision of the Constitution.

34. See, e.g., Joan Fitzpatrick & William McKay Bennett, A Lion in the Path? The Influence of International Law on the Immigration Policy of the United States, 70 Washington L. Rev. 589 (1995); Berta Esperanza Hernández-Truyol & Kimberly A. Johns, Global Rights, Local Wrongs and Legal Fixes: An International Human Rights

Critique of Immigration and Welfare "Reform," 71 Southern California L. Rev. 547 (1998); James A.R. Nafziger, The General Admission of Aliens Under International Law, 77 Amer. J. Internat'l L. 804 (1983); Michael Scaperlanda, Polishing the Tarnished Golden Door, 1993 Wisconsin L. Rev. 965.

In United States v. Curtiss-Wright Export Corp., the Court explained, “the power to expel undesirable aliens, which is [not] expressly affirmed by the Constitution, nevertheless exists as inherently inseparable from the conception of nationality. This the court recognized, and found the warrant for its conclusions not in the provisions of the Constitution, but in the law of nations.” Similarly, in Nishimura Ekiu v. United States, the Court stated that “it is an accepted maxim of international law, that every sovereign nation has the power, as inherent in sovereignty, and essential to self-preservation, to forbid the entrance of foreigners within its dominions, or to admit them only in such cases as it may see fit to prescribe.” Modern cases continue to locate the font of plenary power in international law.

In the last century, the law of nations may have imposed few limits on the acts of nations in this context. However, as Michael Scaperlanda has pointed out, “sovereignty is not a static concept.” Of course, the Supreme Court has not been eager to rely on international law to limit the authority of Congress, but the argument is different in the plenary power context. By defining congressional power over immigration by reference to an external standard, the Court itself has provided for the possibility that domestic law will change as international law changes. As Professor Scaperlanda explains: “Where the international law of sovereignty provides the background norm for constitutional decisionmaking, as it does in [immigration] cases, the Court ought to look at the current norm with its recent limitations.”

C. The Nondiscrimination Principle in International Law

If the Court meant to grant Congress an unlimited power over immigration by linking the immigration power to international law, it failed. As Professors Hernandez and Scaperlanda have written, international legal doctrine has changed dramatically since the Court created the plenary power doctrine. If international law ever permitted, or was neutral, on the issue of governmental racial discrimination, it is no longer; modern international law generally prohibits racial discrimination. Accordingly, the notion that an inherent part of national sovereignty is the power to discriminate against aliens on the basis of race is no longer a part of international law. [The author then identifies the various international instruments that prohibit race discrimination.—Eds.]

SIMULATION EXERCISE

Before doing this exercise, consider the above excerpts from Professor Chin’s article and review the other materials you have read in this chapter.

In the year 2017, race riots erupted in the Latino barrios of Los Angeles, Miami, and several other major United States cities. Congress responded by enacting the Immigration and Race Relations Improvement Act of 2017. The Conference Committee report preceding its passage stated that the Act “was generally aimed at easing racial tensions in the long run by reducing the Latino immigrant population.” To that end, the Act included the following provisions:

Section 201. Notwithstanding any other provision of law, no more than 10,000 aliens of Latino descent shall be admitted into the United States for permanent residence in any fiscal year.

Section 202. Notwithstanding any other provision of federal law, no more than 10,000 aliens who are nationals of countries in which the principal spoken language is Spanish shall be admitted into the United States for permanent residence in any fiscal year.

Section 301. Every immigration inspector at a border inspection station is hereby authorized to exclude from the United States any Latino alien who does not possess an entry document that appears to the inspector to be valid and authentic. This procedure shall not be construed to require that the alien be informed of the basis for the inspector’s suspicion or given an opportunity to provide evidence. For purposes of this section, a Latino alien is an alien who is of Latino descent or who is a national of a country in which the principal spoken language is Spanish.

Section 401. Any alien who at any time has participated in a demonstration organized principally to protest the condition of Latinos in the United States, and who is not the spouse, parent, or child of a United States citizen or of an alien lawfully admitted for permanent residence, shall be removed.

Many noncitizens who were removed from the United States because of the various provisions of the 2017 Act challenged its constitutionality in court. Four such cases eventually worked their way up to the Supreme Court, which consolidated them and granted certiorari to decide all the federal issues those cases raised.

Noncitizen #1 is Maria Boisin. Her mother’s family history is entirely Argentine, and her father’s family history is entirely French. Boisin is a national of France. Upon her arrival at a United States port of entry, she was excluded under section 201 because the quota of 10,000 was already fully subscribed.

Noncitizen #2 is Hans Melzer, whose German ancestry goes back several generations. Melzer was born in, and has always been a national of, Mexico. Upon his arrival at a United States port of entry, he was excluded from the United States pursuant to section 202 because the quota of 10,000 was already fully subscribed.

Noncitizen #3 is Alicia Avalos, a Guatemalan national of Guatemalan descent. Avalos was admitted to the United States as an LPR in 2014. In 2018, she visited her grandparents in Guatemala for eight months. Upon returning, Avalos presented to the immigration inspector the “green card” that DHS had given her as evidence of her lawful admission for permanent residence. The immigration inspector did not think the picture on the green card was a sufficient likeness. He questioned her further and concluded the document was not hers. The inspector rejected her offer to summon witnesses who she said would be able to verify her identity. She was excluded, without further investigation, pursuant to section 301.

Noncitizen #4 is Mahmud Ali, a national of Bangla Desh. Ali was admitted to the United States as an LPR in 2005. Active in the American Civil Liberties Union and other civil rights organizations, Ali in 2007 joined a peaceful demonstration at which he heard speakers denounce the poor economic status of American Latinos. He has no relatives in the United States. In 2018, Ali was found deportable and ordered removed under section 401.

(a) The Court has ordered the four cases consolidated for purposes of oral argument. Unless your instructor specifies otherwise, assume you could be called upon to represent either the noncitizen or ICE in any of the four cases. Prepare for oral argument by drafting an outline of the points you would make in each of those situations. In doing so, you should anticipate the arguments of your opponent and be ready to meet them. You may raise any plausible arguments for either distinguishing or overruling prior cases. Assume opposing counsel will do the same.

(b) Now you are one of the Supreme Court Justices hearing the cases. Jot down any questions or hypotheticals you might pose to either attorney at oral argument, and try to form tentative views on how you will vote.

CONCLUDING NOTE ON THE PLENARY POWER OVER IMMIGRATION: HISTORICAL PARALLELS FROM ACROSS THE ATLANTIC

At about the same time that the United States Supreme Court was discovering Congress's inherent and plenary power over immigration, remarkably similar theories were germinating in Great Britain. To understand them, one must be aware of some fundamental differences between the constitutional frameworks of the two countries.

The United Kingdom is often said to have an "unwritten" constitution. That term can be misleading, for British constitutional principles are certainly embodied in writing. It is just that the writing is not a single, comprehensive document as is the case in the United States and most other countries. Instead, British constitutional law is laid out in the Magna Carta, the Bill of Rights of 1689, certain other fundamental statutes, a rich body of case law, and customs and conventions described in a variety of documents. Today, too, the European Convention on Human Rights (discussed in chapter 13, section C below) and the law of the European Union sometimes function as constitutional checks on domestic legislation.

Far more significant than form, therefore, is a substantive difference that concerns supremacy: In the United States the supreme law is the Constitution. Further (as in Australia, India, and a few other democracies), the courts may review Acts of the national legislature for constitutionality. In contrast, the ultimate authority in the United Kingdom is Parliament, which may alter the Constitution at any time. There is no judicial review of the constitutionality of British statutes because, by definition, what Parliament does is constitutional. Moreover, just as the powers of the United States Congress are generally confined to those affirmatively granted by the Constitution, so too the powers of the British Crown (the executive branch) are generally limited to those affirmatively bestowed by the supreme British authority—the Parliament.³⁵

How does all this affect immigration? At the beginning of this chapter you saw a trilogy of United States Supreme Court cases decided between 1889 and 1893—the Chinese Exclusion Case, Ekiu, and Fong Yue Ting. In that sequence of cases, the Court began by invoking the international law maxim that nations may exclude and deport noncitizens. It relied on that principle in locating an inherent sovereign power of Congress as a matter of domestic constitutional law—notwithstanding the doctrine of enumerated powers. Finally, relying heavily on the inherent nature of the immigration power and its international law roots, the Court held the exercise of this congressional power to be virtually immune from judicial review for constitutionality.

From 1891 to 1906, the Privy Council and the highest Scottish court rendered their own trilogy of foundation cases. See Attorney General for Canada v. Cain [1906] A.C. 542 (Privy Council); Poll v. Lord Advocate [1899] 1 F. 823 (Ct. of Sessions, Scotland); Musgrove v. Chun Teeong Toy [1891] A.C. 272 (Privy Council). Those cases similarly began with the observation that international law empowers nations to exclude and to deport noncitizens. The cases appeared to suggest that that principle led to a “prerogative” (inherent) power of the Crown to perform those functions—notwithstanding the doctrine that the Crown’s powers are normally derived from Parliamentary grant.³⁶ Finally, because the source of the power was the royal prerogative (rather than a Parliamentary grant), at least the first two of these cases assumed no court could review the legality of the exercise of the power in an individual case. Thus, in each country the progression was from the nation’s power in international law, to an inherent power possessed by an organ of government normally dependent on affirmative grants from the supreme authority, to immunization from judicial review.

The parallels have continued through the twentieth century. While later United States cases like Knauff, Mezei, Harisiades, and Galvan applied the harsh doctrine of the foundation cases, British courts were displaying analogous deference when asked to review the Crown’s exercise

35. Of course the origins of these principles are very different. The enumerated powers doctrine in the United States reflects federalism principles that have no counterparts in the unitary system of the United Kingdom.

36. One distinguished British writer found this jump to be a nonsequitur. See Cedric H.R. Thornberry, Dr. Soblen and the Alien Law of the United Kingdom, 12 Inter-nat’l & Comparative L.Q. 414, 424–28 (1963). Whether the Crown then had a prerogative immigration power is the subject of historical debate. Compare Thornberry, supra at 422–24 (prerogative power had atrophied from non-use) with Thomas W. Haycraft, Alien Legislation and the Prerogative of the Crown, 13 L.Q. Rev. 165, 175–84 (1897) (power alive and well).

of broadly worded statutory powers over immigration. See, e.g., Schmidt v. Sec. of State for Home Affairs [1969] 2 Ch. 149 (Ct. of App.); R. v. Governor of Brixton Prison, ex parte Soblen, [1963] 2 Q.B. 243 (Ct. of App.); R. v. Secretary of State for Home Affairs, ex parte Duke of Chateau Thierry [1917] 1 K.B. 922 (C.A.). And, just as cracks are finally beginning to appear in the absolutism of the American immigration cases, British absolutism has suffered similar erosion. See, e.g., R. v. Immigration App. Trib., ex parte Khan [1983] 2 All E.R. 420 (C.A.); cf. Council of Civil Service Unions v. Minister for the Civil Service [1984] 3 All E.R. 934, 948, 950-51, 956 (not an immigration case; majority holds prerogative acts reviewable).

In vivid contrast to the special judicial deference exhibited by American and British judges is the willingness of the German Federal Constitutional Court to review the constitutionality of federal immigration statutes. See Gerald L. Neuman, Immigration and Judicial Review in the Federal Republic of Germany, 23 NYU J. Internat'l L. & Politics 35 (1990).

IMMIGRANT PRIORITIES

United States law classifies all noncitizens as immigrants or nonimmigrants. As you will see in the next chapter, a nonimmigrant who wants to enter the United States must prove that he or she fits one of the many statutory pigeonholes: students, tourists, business visitors, intra-company transferees, and so on. All the possible categories are laid out neatly in a single provision, INA § 101(a)(15). Most of the nonimmigrant categories require a temporary stay of fixed duration.

The same provision defines “immigrant” by process of elimination—any noncitizen who cannot establish that he or she meets the requirements for one of the enumerated nonimmigrant classes. Like a nonimmigrant, an intending immigrant must fit one of several qualifying categories laid out in the statute. The system of immigrant classifications, however, is less tidy; the INA establishes a complex set of preferred immigrant categories and numerical quotas that it takes several long sections of the statute to lay out.

Lawfully admitted immigrants are known by several names. The technical term is “aliens lawfully admitted for permanent residence.” Sometimes you will see the phrases “permanent resident aliens” or “lawful permanent residents” (“LPR’s,” the abbreviation used in this book). Upon admission as an LPR, one receives documentary proof of status, 63 Fed. Reg. 70313 (Dec. 21, 1998), known familiarly as a “green card.” Despite its name, this card actually has changed colors several times over the years. It is plastic and about the size of a credit card.

Green cards have several functions. In addition to being evidence of LPR status, they are identification documents, evidence of eligibility to work, and entry documents for returning from temporary trips abroad. Although LPR status is permanent, the green cards that evidence LPR status have expiration dates and therefore require periodic renewal. DHS wants to be able to update the person’s address and request new biometric information. See 84 IR 1953 (Aug. 27, 2007).

Upon admission, immigrants enjoy far greater benefits than nonimmigrants. Immigrants may remain in the United States permanently so long as they refrain from deportable misconduct. Unlike most categories of nonimmigrants, immigrants may work. Immigrants also qualify for some government-provided benefits not available to nonimmigrants, although welfare reform legislation enacted in 1996 has greatly limited even immigrants’ eligibility for welfare. After an initial qualifying period, if certain conditions discussed in chapter 13 are met, immigrants may (but need not) become United States citizens. For all these reasons, the admission standards for immigrants are more rigorous than those prescribed for nonimmigrants. This and other chapters will examine those differences in some detail.

Although this chapter considers the criteria for acquiring LPR status, you should keep in mind that one can lose this status by leaving the United States too often, for too long, or with the wrong intentions. The criteria and procedures for abandoning one's LPR status are considered on pages 539–40 below.

A. THE FUNDAMENTALS: QUOTAS AND PREFERENCES

The starting point in understanding United States immigration law is this: To qualify for admission, an immigrant must affirmatively fit within one of the various admission categories established by Congress. It is not enough, in other words, that the person has no criminal convictions, contagious diseases, or other blemishes. Only those with certain positive credentials are eligible.¹

Most of the qualifying categories are subject to annual numerical limits. These limits are often called “quotas” even though they are ceilings rather than floors. Certain classes of immigrants, however, are exempt from the numerical restrictions:

1. IMMIGRANTS EXEMPT FROM THE GENERAL QUOTAS

By far the most important exempt group consists of “immediate relatives.” These are the spouses, parents, and children of United States citizens, except that in the case of a parent the citizen son or daughter must be at least 21 years of age. INA § 201(b)(2)(A)(i). To be a “child” for immigration purposes, one must be unmarried and under age 21. INA § 101(b)(1). There are additional requirements for stepchildren, adopted children, and children born out of wedlock; those will be taken up later. In fiscal year 2007, almost 500,000 immediate relatives acquired LPR status. 2007 Yearbook of Immigration Statistics, Table 6.

Certain other groups are also numerically unrestricted. LPRs who are returning from temporary visits abroad are not counted against the quota; either they were exempt at the time of their original admission or they were already counted once before. See INA §§ 101(a)(27)(A), 201(b)(1)(A). Similarly exempt are certain former United States citizens, INA §§ 101(a)(27)(B), 201(b)(1)(A), children born to LPRs temporarily abroad,

1. Before the Immigration Act of 1990, if any quota visas were left over after demand from the preferred groups of applicants had been satisfied, other “nonpreference” immigrants would become eligible. INA § 203(a)(7), pre-1990 version. In practice, however, the demand for preference visas was so great that nonpreference visas were never available after 1978. Solis-Ramirez v. U.S.D.O.J., 758 F.2d 1426, 1429 (11th Cir. 1985).

INA § 201(b)(2)(B), and persons who receive certain permanent forms of discretionary relief from removal that you will study in chapter 8, INA § 201(b)(1)(C, D, E). Refugees are also exempt from the general quota, INA § 201(b)(1)(B), but they are subject to special numerical restrictions of their own. Their situations are considered in depth in chapter 11.

“Parolees” are another group permitted into the United States without numerical restriction. Under INA § 212(d)(5), the Secretary of Homeland Security has the discretion to “parole” a noncitizen into the United States temporarily. Until 1980 the parole provision was often used to allow groups of refugees into the United States for indefinite periods, as you will see in some detail in chapter 11. The current provision generally prohibits that practice, see INA § 212(d)(5)(B), and today the provision is typically used either to enable noncitizens to come to the United States temporarily for urgent personal reasons or to allow some applicants for admission to remain at large pending determinations of admissibility. Whatever the reason for allowing the particular person to come in, a grant of parole is not considered an admission. INA § 212(d)(5)(A). In the eyes of the law, the parolee is still outside the United States. Consequently, there is no need for a statutory provision expressly exempting parolees from the general quotas applicable to those who seek visas or “admission.”

Apart from all these permanent statutory provisions that create classes of immigrants exempt from the general quota, Congress from time to time admits special groups ad hoc on a nonquota basis. Various legalization programs enacted in 1986 (which actually are now listed as specific exemptions in INA § 201(b)(1)(C)) are examples.² Congress at least three times has also authorized the issuance of a limited number of additional immigrant visas, each time on a one-shot basis, to nationals of countries that are regarded as underrepresented in terms of immigration to the United States.³ Congress has also occasionally awarded lawful permanent residence on a nonquota basis to groups of people who arrive from selected countries as part of an unusual migration. In recent years, Cubans and Haitians have benefitted from such one-time-only statutes. See IRCA § 202. Finally, to relieve a serious and chronic shortage of nurses, Congress enacted temporary legislation to allow certain nurses already working in the United States on nonimmigrant visas to adjust to permanent residence without regard to the usual numerical constraints. Immigration Nursing Relief Act of 1989, Pub.L. 101-238, 103 Stat. 2099 (Dec. 18, 1989).

But most immigrant visa applicants are subject to annual numerical ceilings. In modern times the demand for those visas has vastly exceeded the statutory supply. What are the overall limits, and how do our immigration laws allocate the available slots?

2. See INA §§ 210, 245A and pages 1178-79 below.

3. See, e.g., Immigration Act of 1990, §§ 132, 133; Pub.L. 100-658, §§ 2, 3, 102

Stat. 3908, 3908-09 (Nov. 15, 1988); Pub.L. 99-603 (IRCA), § 314, 100 Stat. 3359, 3439 (Nov. 6, 1986).

2. IMMIGRANTS SUBJECT TO THE GENERAL QUOTAS

The admission of “quota” immigrants to the United States is governed by a mathematically intricate system of ceilings and sub-ceilings. The INA lays out categories of immigrants who may be admitted. For each such category, the INA limits the number who may come in during any one fiscal year. In addition to these “worldwide” caps, some of the categories are subject to “per-country” limits that are discussed below.

Immigration law is about choices, and the quota system is especially about choices. When Congress divides applicants into groups, and assigns different numerical caps to the various groups, it is making the most fundamental policy decisions known to immigration law: Who should get preference over whom? In some instances, Congress has expressed those decisions in mathematical language. You will probably be pleased to know that most of the technical mathematical issues are beyond the scope of this book. But certain precepts are too central to be ignored. In the readings that follow, the goals are simply to acquaint you with the basic structure of the quota system and to get you thinking about the fundamental policy choices that the various rules and formulas reflect.

a. PROGRAMS AND CEILINGS

At the most general level, there are three main programs for immigrants who are subject to the general quotas. These programs encompass “family-sponsored immigrants,” “employment-based immigrants,” and “diversity immigrants.” (Overseas refugees could logically be viewed as a fourth category, but they are treated separately in chapter 11, section A below.)

Each of these three broad programs has its own worldwide ceiling. Two of the three ceilings change from year to year in accordance with statutory formulas.

Family-sponsored immigrants generally comprise immigrants who have certain family members in the United States. The specified relationships are not quite close enough to qualify the immigrants as immediate relatives (who, you will recall, are entirely exempt from the quota limitations) but are still close enough to warrant immigration preference. The qualifying categories are listed in INA § 203(a), which you will examine later in more detail. The total annual worldwide limit for family-sponsored immigrants is determined by the following formula: 480,000, minus the number of immediate relatives (and children born to LPRs temporarily abroad) who were admitted in the preceding fiscal year, plus any employment-based visas that were available in the preceding fiscal year but were not used. Certain grants of parole also slightly reduce the annual ceiling. INA § 201(c)(1)(A)(ii). There is one proviso: In any year in which that formula produces a number less than 226,000, the ceiling will be bumped up to 226,000. See INA § 201(c).

That formula was a product of the Immigration Act of 1990, and it reflects an important and controversial change. Immediate relatives are still exempt from the quota, but the number of visas they take are now deducted from the supply available during the next fiscal year to other family members of United States citizens and of LPRs. To address the fear that high immediate relative numbers could wipe out all or most of the visas allotted to other family members, Congress provided for the 226,000 minimum.

Employment-based immigrants include those with certain occupational skills, certain investors, and miscellaneous others. The specific criteria appear in INA § 203(b), which you will see later in more detail. For now, it is enough to know that the annual worldwide limit on employment-based immigrants is 140,000 plus any family-sponsored visas that were available in the preceding year but were not used.

Notice that the ceiling for family-sponsored visas includes any unused employment-based visas from the preceding year, and vice-versa. Why do you suppose Congress used this criss-cross approach (rather than give unused family-sponsored visas to the next year's family-sponsored immigrants and unused employment-based visas to the next year's employment-based immigrants)?

Diversity immigrants are those who are admitted because they were born in countries or regions from which the United States has received relatively little immigration in recent years. The program is described in INA § 203(c) and discussed in section D below. The basic annual ceiling is 55,000, see INA § 201(e), but that figure is now reduced to 50,000 to offset some of the Guatemalan and Salvadoran admissions authorized by special 1997 legislation (NACARA, discussed in chapter 8).

Those are the formulas for the annual worldwide ceilings for each of the main immigrant programs. These programs are also subject to per-country limits. For purposes of those limits, an immigrant is "charged" to the country or colony in which he or she was born, with some exceptions. INA § 202(b). Generally, in each fiscal year, the combined numbers of family-sponsored and employment-based immigrants from a single country may not exceed 7% of the combined worldwide limits for family-sponsored and employment-based immigrants. For the colony of a foreign country, the corresponding figure is 2%. INA § 202(a)(2). Immediate relatives and others who are exempt from the worldwide limitations are similarly exempt from the per-country limitations. As discussed below, one subgroup of family-sponsored immigrants (some of the so-called "2A's," described below) are also exempt from per-country limitations. Under the diversity immigrant program, similarly, no more than 7% of the visas may go to natives of a single country in the same fiscal year.

Under section 104 of the American Competitiveness in the Twenty-First Century Act, Pub. L. 106-313, 114 Stat. 1251 (Oct. 17, 2000), employment-based immigrants are exempt from per-country limits during any calendar quarter in which the total worldwide ceiling for employment-based immigrants exceeds the worldwide number of qualified applicants. INA § 202(a)(5)(A).

PROBLEM 1

In fiscal year 1, the ceilings on family-sponsored and employment-based immigrants were 260,000 and 140,000, respectively. In the chart that follows, "qualified applicants" are those who meet the requirements of the designated category and do not fall within any of the exclusion grounds (such as criminality, disease, etc.). The figures given for qualified applicants include not only those who applied during the particular fiscal year, but also any who applied in past years and are still waiting. In this Problem, ignore the deductions for children born to LPRs temporarily abroad and for parolees.

Applying the statutory formulas laid out in the text above, fill in the blank columns:

	Fiscal Year 1	Fiscal Year 2		Fiscal Year 3
	Visas Issued	Qualified Visa Applicants	Visas Issued	Qualified Visa Applicants	Visas Issued
Immediate relatives	230,000	275,000	_____	290,000	_____
Family-sponsored immigrants	260,000	330,000	_____	340,000	_____
Employment-based immigrants	135,000	130,000	_____	150,000	_____

b. PREFERENCE CATEGORIES AND SUB-CEILINGS

The family-sponsored program is subdivided into four "preference categories" laid out in INA § 203(a). These preference provisions serve two functions: They describe the different groups of people who qualify as family-sponsored immigrants, and they set annual numerical sub-ceilings for each of these four groups. The four family-sponsored preferences are

First preference: the unmarried sons and daughters of United States citizens.

Second preference: the spouses and the unmarried sons and daughters of LPRs.

Third preference: the married sons and daughters of United States citizens.

Fourth preference: the brothers and sisters of over-age-21 United States citizens.

Here are the numerical subceilings for each of the four family-sponsored preferences:

First preference: 23,400 plus any visas that the fourth preference applicants don't need.

Second preference: 114,200 plus any visas that the first preference applicants don't need, plus the amount, if any, by which the total worldwide family-sponsored ceiling exceeds 226,000.

Third preference: 23,400 plus any visas that the first and second preference applicants don't need.

Fourth preference: 65,000 plus any visas that the first, second, and third preference applicants don't need.

The second preference (spouses and unmarried sons and daughters of LPRs) requires additional comment. Before the Immigration Act of 1990, the second preference had become hopelessly backed up—several years generally and more than 10 years for Mexicans. See United States Dept. of State, Visa Bulletin at 2 (Nov. 1990). Congress recognized the hardship in separating nuclear families for that length of time and set out to reduce the waiting period. One action it took was to increase the annual base number from 70,200 to 114,200. In addition, Congress provided that, whenever the total ceiling for family-sponsored immigrants exceeded 226,000, the entire excess would go to the second preference. (See above.)

Congress also decided to split the second preference into two subgroups. The first one (usually called the "2A's") consists of spouses and "children" of LPRs. (Remember that "children" have to be under 21, see INA § 101(b)). The 2B's were all other second preference immigrants (i.e. the over-age-21 unmarried sons and daughters of LPRs). Believing that the admission of the 2A's should be a higher priority than the admission of the 2B's, Congress did two things. First, it required that at least 77% of the worldwide second preference visas be set aside for the 2A's. The resulting figure—i.e., 77% of the worldwide second preference ceiling—is called the "2A floor." INA § 203(a)(2). Second, Congress exempted 75% of the 2A floor from the per-country limits. INA § 202(a)(4). That combination of measures helped to shorten many of the waiting periods for the 2A's, but the waits are still several years long, as the Visa Bulletin chart on page 266 below illustrates.

For employment-based immigrants, the math is simpler but the descriptions of the various preference categories are much longer and more detailed. There are five employment-based preferences, several of them subdivided. They are laid out in INA § 203(b). You will encounter these preferences in more detail in section C. For now, the five categories and their ceilings can be summarized briefly:

The first preference is for "priority workers." This term includes three subgroups—persons with "extraordinary ability in the sciences, arts, education, business, or athletics;" "outstanding professors and researchers;" and certain "multinational executives and managers." These immigrants annually receive 28.6% of all the employment-based visas, plus any visas that the fourth and fifth preference applicants don't need.

The second preference is for "members of the professions holding advanced degrees" (usually meaning graduate degrees) and "aliens of exceptional ability." ("Exceptional" ability is not as exceptional as "extraordinary" ability). Second preference immigrants similarly get 28.6% of the employment-based visas, plus any visas that the first preference applicants don't need.

The third employment-based preference is for “skilled workers, professionals” [without advanced degrees], and other workers who can show their labor is needed in the United States. This category is also allocated 28.6% of the employment-based visas, plus any visas that the first and second preference applicants don’t need. Of these, no more than 10,000 (minus an offset for some of the Guatemalans and Salvadorans benefitted by NA-CARA, see chapter 8) may go to the “other workers.”

The fourth preference is for certain “special immigrants.” This category includes, among others, certain religious workers and certain long-term foreign employees of the United States government. The allotment is 7.1% of the employment-based visas. There is no provision for adding the visas that other preference categories don’t need.

The fifth employment-based preference is entitled “Employment creation.” It covers entrepreneurs who invest at least $1,000,000 each (less in specified instances) in enterprises that employ at least ten Americans. These immigrants are admitted subject to certain future conditions considered in section C below. They may receive up to 7.1% of the employment-based visas. Again, there is no provision for adding visas that the other preference applicants don’t need.

The program for “diversity immigrants” is not broken down into preference categories. It does, however, contain a series of fiendishly complicated formulas that you can look forward to seeing (or skipping) in section D.

Finally, under INA § 203(d), a “spouse or child” who is “accompanying, or following to join” an immigrant who is within any of the three broad preference categories—family, employment, or diversity—is entitled to the same preference status and to the same place in the queue as the principal immigrant. See also 22 CFR § 42.53(c) (2008). Curiously, there has never been any comparable provision for the spouse or child accompanying or following to join an immediate relative. Importantly also, for section 203(d) to apply, the spouse or child must be acquired before the principal immigrant’s admission as an LPR. 22 CFR § 42.53(c) (2008). (Try to figure out why a contrary interpretation would render INA § 203(a)(2)(A) superfluous.) Interestingly, however, the regulations treat a child as having satisfied this condition if the child is the product of a marriage that took place before the principal immigrant’s admission as an LPR. A spouse or child will be regarded as “accompanying” the principal immigrant until six months after the issuance of the principal immigrant’s visa (or adjustment of status, a process considered in chapter 6). 22 CFR § 40.1(a) (2008). There is no analogous time limit on a spouse or child who is “following to join.” 9 F.A.M. § 40.1 n.7.1.⁴

4. What, you might be wondering, is the point of setting a six-month time limit for “accompanying” status when an otherwise qualified spouse or child can simply claim “following to join” status even after six months? The answer is that, while the distinction is usually of no importance for the immigrant preference categories (or for the corresponding nonimmigrant categories that you will study in chapter 4), there are a few

PROBLEM 2

In fiscal year x , 220,000 immediate relatives were admitted to the United States. 245,000 family-sponsored immigrant visas were available that year and 235,000 of them were used. Exactly 140,000 employment-based visas were available, and all were taken. First, calculate the total worldwide ceiling for the following fiscal year ($x + 1$), both (a) for family-sponsored immigrants and (b) for employment-based immigrants. For purposes of this Problem, assume there are no deductions for children born to LPRs temporarily abroad or for parolees.

Next, look at the chart below. The column headed "Statutory Ceiling" summarizes the formulas for computing the statutory ceilings for each of the four family-sponsored, and each of the five employment-based, preference categories. Refer to INA §§ 201(c, d) and 203(a, b) for more details if needed. The next column gives you the hypothetical number of qualified visa applicants in each preference category, for year $x + 1$. Complete the column headed "Visas Issued."

FISCAL YEAR X + 1
Preference	Statutory Ceiling	Qualified Visa Applicants	Visas Issued
Family 1st	23,400 plus unused 4th's	29,400	_____
Family 2nd	114,200 plus unused 1st's, plus any excess of total family-sponsored ceiling over 226,000	200,000	_____
Family 3rd	23,400 plus unused 1st's and 2d's	18,400	_____
Family 4th	65,000 plus unused 1st's, 2d's, and 3rd's	67,000	_____
Total Family-Sponsored		314,800	_____
Employment 1st	28.6% of E-B ceiling + unused 4th's and 5th's	12,900	_____
Employment 2nd	28.6% of E-B ceiling + unused 1st's	22,900	_____
Employment 3rd	28.6% of E-B ceiling + unused 1st's and 2nd's	105,900	_____
Employment 4th	7.1% of E-B ceiling	5,650	_____
Employment 5th	7.1% of E-B ceiling	5,650	_____
Total Employment-Based		153,000	_____

subcategories of employment-based fourth preference "special immigrants" for which the statute authorizes the admission of "accompanying" spouses and children but not those merely "following to join." See INA § 101(a)(27)(D, E, F, G, H, M).

c. SELECTING INDIVIDUAL APPLICANTS

All this leaves one last question: When the demand for visas for a particular preference category exceeds the statutory sub-ceiling, which applicants get the available visas? The general answer is easy: whoever applies first. For purposes of establishing one's place in line, the clock starts when the applicant files the first relevant document. Which document that is varies from one preference category to another; you will study the procedural requirements in chapter 6.

The date on which the applicant files the relevant document is called his or her "priority date." It resembles the number you take when you enter a crowded delicatessen, except that the wait for visas, unlike that for rye bread or bagels, can last years rather than minutes. Immigrants at the front of the line are processed in monthly gulps; they advance in steps until their priority dates become "current."

The one major complication is the per-country limit. Suppose within a particular country 50,000 family-sponsored and employment-based applicants have priority dates that would be current if there were no per-country limits, but the per-country limit for that year is only 27,000. Which 27,000 applicants get in, and which ones have to wait until next year (or longer)?

The simplest method would be to award visas, within that group, in the order in which people applied. But that is not the method used. Before 1990 (when there was just one combined set of numbered preferences that covered both family relationships and occupational skills), visas would go to all of an oversubscribed country's qualified first preference applicants whose priority dates were within the worldwide limits, then to all the qualified second preference applicants within the worldwide limits, and so on, until the per-country limit (then 20,000) was reached. Without some adjustment, this system would have made life impossible for the bottom preferences. If year after year the demand from the top preferences was alone greater than 20,000—and in some countries it often was—the people in the bottom preferences would have waited in line literally forever.

To avoid that problem, the law contained a safety valve: Whenever a country used up its full allowance of 20,000 quota visas in a given fiscal year, the quota visas available for that country in the following year were "prorated" among the various preference categories in the same proportions as those applicable worldwide.⁵

The current law takes a slightly modified approach. Rather than delay the solution until the following fiscal year, the present version of section 202(e) requires proration in the very year in which the per-country limit is reached. Suppose, for example, that in a particular year the worldwide family-sponsored ceiling turns out to be twice as great as the worldwide employment-based ceiling. In that example, within a particular oversubscribed country family-sponsored applicants will receive twice as many visas as employment-based applicants do. INA § 202(e)(1). Similarly, within the family-sponsored program, the visas for an oversubscribed country are allocated among the four preference categories in the same proportions that apply worldwide for that year. INA § 202(e)(2). Thus, if the ceiling for family-sponsored third-preference immigrants worldwide turns out to be 10% of the total worldwide family-sponsored ceiling, then within a given oversubscribed country 10% of the family-sponsored visas would go to third-preference applicants. The same proration technique is used for the five employment-based preferences within a given oversubscribed country. INA § 202(e)(3). When prorating is used, adjustments are made to account for the fact that most of the 2A's are exempt from the per-country limitations. INA § 202(a)(4)(B, C).

5. See INA § 202(e), pre-1990 version; 1982); Angco v. Haig, 514 F.Supp. 1328 (E.D.Pa.1981); Olivares v. INS, 685 F.2d 1174 (9th Cir. 1982).

All this means that the delicatessen analogy is incomplete. A typical deli doesn't have one queue for buying bagels, another for cream cheese, and so on. Usually there is one combined queue for all customers, and people are waited on in the order in which they establish their place in that queue.

In contrast is a type of queuing system in which different customers wait in different lines. Picture a typical supermarket. There is a separate queue for each cashier. Someone who gets in line after you do might be served before you if he or she was lucky enough to have picked a faster-moving line. Still, you had a free choice; you too could have chosen that person's line. Suppose, however, that rules beyond your control determine which queue you must wait in. Hospitals do not make patients who need emergency medical care wait in the same queue as those who are awaiting elective surgery. The hospital's rules reflect the differing personal needs of their patients.

The immigration laws follow the hospital model—different queues, and therefore different waiting times, for different categories of customers. One's preference category and one's country generally determine in which queue one must wait.

Before adopting that system, Congress had to make many policy decisions, some consciously and some unconsciously. Try to identify and evaluate those policy choices as you work through the following questions:

QUESTIONS

1. Should there even be a preference system at all, or would it be better simply to admit qualified immigrants on a uniform first-come, first-served basis?
2. Should there be per-country limits? Some commentators have advocated repealing them.⁶ (Keep your opinion tentative. The material on diversity immigrants in section D might affect your thinking.) If per-country limits are retained, should every country have the same limit?

6. See, e.g., T. Alexander Aleinikoff, Legal Immigration Reform: Toward Rationality and Equity, in Richard D. Lamm & Alan Simpson (eds.), Center for Immigration Stud-

3. Given the per-country limits, which immigrants within an oversubscribed country should receive visas? Options include (a) Within the family-sponsored program, admit all the qualified first preference applicants who are within the worldwide cutoff, then all the seconds, etc., until the per-country limit is reached; do the same for the employment-based program;

(b) Pro-rate the visas among the various preference categories in proportion to the worldwide preference allocations; or (c) Admit qualified applicants who are within the worldwide cutoff, strictly in order by priority date, until the per-country limit is reached.

4. Given all you have now read, and thinking especially about the issues raised in question 3 above, are the preference categories in hierarchical order? E.g., are family-sponsored first preference immigrants necessarily better off than seconds, seconds better off than thirds, and so on?

5. In recent years, an increasingly serious practical problem has contaminated this elaborate statutory scheme. Quite apart from the backlogs that result from statutory quotas, administrative processing can add years to the waiting times. The sizes of the backlogs vary widely both from one category of case to another and from one geographic district or region to another. As you will see in chapter 6, the procedure for prospective immigrants usually involves some combination of visa processing by consular offices overseas, Labor Department (and state employment agency) processing, and USCIS processing, depending on the category of case. The current waiting times for consular visa applications are posted at http://travel.state.gov/visa/tempvisitors_wait.php; for the status of pending labor certification applications, see <http://pds.pbls.doleta.gov/>.

As a result of a “Backlog Elimination Plan” initiated by USCIS in 2004, the agency has put a significant dent in its multi-million-case backlog. Similarly, the Labor Department announced in October 2007 that it had eliminated the entire backlog for permanent labor certification applications, though there are some questions as to what it considers backlog. See 84 IR 2333 (Oct. 8, 2007).

Now that you have examined the general structure of the immigrant selection system, it is time to focus more specifically on each of its three principal branches: family, employment, and diversity.

B. FAMILY IMMIGRATION⁷

1. THE BASICS

As you might recall from chapter 1 (but probably don't), numerical immigration quotas debuted in 1921. The Immigration Act of 1924 exempted the wives, and the unmarried, under-age-18 children, of United States citizens from the quota. See ch. 190, § 4(a), 43 Stat. 153, 155 (May 26, 1924). The 1952 Act established the first comprehensive set of family-based preferences. Since then, one central value that United States immigration laws have long promoted, albeit to varying degrees, is family unity.⁸ Consequently, much of immigration law has become federal family law.⁹

Several permanent provisions of the present INA aid the reunification of the temporarily divided family. They include section 201(b)(2), which exempts from the quotas "immediate relatives" and children born to LPRs temporarily abroad; section 203(a), which bestows special preferences on certain immigrants with slightly less compelling family relationships to United States citizens or to LPRs; and section 203(d), which gives preference to spouses and children accompanying or following to join most (but not all) classes of immigrants. Together, these family provisions have been estimated to account for roughly 80% of all immigrant admissions to the United States. Michael F. Fix, Wendy Zimmerman & Jeffrey S. Passel, The Urban Institute, The Integration of Immigrant Families in the United States 7–8 (July 2001), http://www.urban.org/UploadedPDF/immig_integration.pdf. You should now review the cited provisions and the de-

7. See generally Sarah B. Ignatius & Elisabeth S. Stickney, Immigration Law and the Family (1995, continually updated); Hiroshi Motomura, We Asked for Workers but Families Came: Time, Law, and the Family in Immigration and Citizenship, 14 Virginia J. Social Policy & Law 103 (2006); Hiroshi Motomura, The Family and Immigration: A Roadmap for the Ruritanian Lawmaker, 43 American J. Comp.L. 511 (1995).

8. Several scholars, however, have called attention to ways in which U.S. immigration law has come up short on family reunification. See, e.g., Kerry Abrams, Immigration Status and the Best Interest of the Child Standard, 14 Virginia J. Social Policy & Law 87 (2006); Jennifer M. Chacón, Citizenship and Family: Revisiting Dred Scott, 27 Washington Univ. J. L. & Policy 45 (2008); Jennifer M. Chacón, Loving Across Borders: Immigration Law and the Limits of Loving, 2007 Wisconsin L. Rev. 345; Fernando Colón-Navarro, Familia e Inmigración: What Hap- pened to Family Unity?, 19 Florida J. Internat'l L. 491 (2007); María Pabón López, A Tale of Two Systems: Analyzing the Treatment of Noncitizen Families in State Family Law Systems and under the Immigration Law System, 11 Harvard Latino L. Rev. 229 (2008); Lori A. Nessel, Families at Risk: How Errant Enforcement and Restrictionist Integration Policies Threaten the Immigrant Family in the European Union and the United States, 36 Hofstra L. Rev. 1271 (2008); David B. Thronson, You Can't Get Here from Here: Toward a More Child-Centered Immigration Law, 14 Virginia J. Social Policy & Law 58 (2006).

9. See, e.g., Kerry Abrams, Immigration Law and the Regulation of Marriage, 91 Minnesota L. Rev. 1625 (2007); David B. Thronson, Custody and Contradictions: Exploring Immigration Law as Federal Family Law in the Context of Child Custody, 59 Hastings L.J. 453 (2008).

scription, on page 257 above, of “accompanying or following to join.” You will need to be familiar with these concepts to do the Problems below.

One who consults an immigration lawyer to acquire permanent residence for himself or herself or for another person wants to know more than simply whether immigration will be possible. The client also wants to know how long it will take. If the prospective immigrant is exempt from the quota, then the only delays are those needed for the applicant to gather up the necessary documents and for the relevant government agencies to process them. The waiting times vary, as just noted. If the immigrant is subject to the quota, however, the wait can be anywhere from very short to very long, depending on two basic variables. First, both the supply of visas and the demand for visas—and hence the length of the wait—vary from one preference category to another. Second, because there are per-country limits, and because the demand for a given preference can vary greatly from one country to another, the wait is affected by the country to which the visa will be “charged.”

Immigration lawyers, prospective immigrants, their families and employers, the general public, and government officials all need some way to predict the likely waiting time. To assist them, the State Department’s Visa Office, in Washington, D.C., publishes a monthly “Visa Bulletin.” Included in the Visa Bulletin is a chart that indicates, for every combination of country and preference category, how long ago the people who are now about to receive visas first applied. The chart does this by displaying the “priority date” (recall this is the date the first relevant document is filed) of the person who will be first in line for the next month. If there is no backlog at all for the particular preference/country combination, the class is said to be “current,” and the letter C appears. If no visas will be available that month (because the annual numerical limits for the year have already been reached), the letter “U,” for “Unavailable,” appears. A copy of the chart for April 2009 appears on page 266 below. Current editions of the Visa Bulletin appear on the State Department website, http://travel.state.gov/visa/frvi/bulletin/bulletin_1770.html.

The Visa Office Bulletin tells us only how long those who are now receiving visas had to wait. For example, the chart below shows that family-sponsored third-preference Mexicans who began the process on October 22, 1992 received visas in April 2009. They waited more than 16 years. That doesn’t necessarily tell us how long those who are initiating the process today will have to wait. On the demand side, perhaps an unusually high (or low) number of applications for a particular country/preference combination have been filed since the priority date displayed in the chart. And on the supply side, the various statutory formulas that you have already seen cause the numerical ceilings to change from year to year. Still, absent great fluctuations in the supply and demand variables, and absent cataclysmic statutory changes of the kind enacted in 1990, the data contained in successive monthly issues of the Visa Bulletins provide at least crude estimates of the likely future waiting times.

When you read the Visa Bulletin, you might be struck by the length of some of the waiting periods—many of them several years. The long delays have caused major problems. The most obvious problem is the hardship of lengthy separation, especially in the spousal and parent-child contexts. Another problem is “aging-out.” It is not unusual for the applicant’s immigration status to change for the worse while the application is pending, typically because the person attains age 21 or marries.

The National Visa Center reported that, as of March 2009, more than 2.7 million immigrants (including their spouses and children accompanying or following to join) were on waiting lists for the various family-sponsored preference categories. These are individuals whose visa petitions had already been approved by USCIS and forwarded to the State Department, and who were waiting for visas because of the statutory ceilings. Note that this figure does not include applicants for adjustment of status (an alternative to the visa process for certain individuals who have already been admitted to the U.S. as nonimmigrants, a procedure that now accounts for roughly half of all immigrant admissions and is covered in chapter 6, section F below.) Of the 2.7 million applicants in the queue, almost half are family-sponsored fourth-preference immigrants. See U.S. Dept. of State, Visa Bulletin (Mar. 2009), reproduced in 86 IR at 505 (Feb. 13, 2009).

Congress’s liberalization of the “2A” category for the unmarried sons and daughters of LPRs, discussed earlier, was one important response to the long waits. In 2000, as part of the Legal Immigration Family Equity Act [LIFE], Congress took another (very limited) step by creating “V-visas.” Beneficiaries of 2A visa petitions that were filed on or before December 21, 2000 (the enactment date of LIFE) may enter the United States as nonimmigrants once their waiting times exceed three years, INA § 101(a)(15)(V), and may work, INA § 214(o)(1)(A). If the permanent application is ultimately denied, V-status terminates 30 days later. INA § 214(o)(1)(B). Since the statute specifies no other ending date, V-status otherwise continues until LPR status is attained.

The “aging out” problem is more complicated. As you will see in chapter 6, the process for obtaining an immigrant visa on family grounds typically begins with the United States citizen or LPR family member filing a “visa petition” with USCIS to establish the claimed relationship. Once USCIS approves the visa petition, it forwards the approval to the State Department, which sends it on to the relevant consulate overseas. (There is an alternative process called “adjustment of status” for certain intending immigrants who are already in the United States, but to keep this discussion manageable let us assume use of the visa process.) At some point the noncitizen “beneficiary” (i.e., the person attempting to immigrate) then files a “visa application” with the consulate. Eventually the beneficiary appears at a consulate for an interview and a decision on the visa is made.

All this takes time—not just time waiting for the person’s priority date to come up (in the case of quota visas that are not current), but also administrative processing time by both USCIS and the consulate. What if the particular immigrant category requires that the beneficiary be a “child” and therefore under age 21, and the beneficiary is indeed under age 21 when the visa petition is filed, but he or she turns 21 before the process is completed?

Congress did not think it fair to count the administrative processing time against the applicants. To remedy that problem, Congress in 2002 passed the Child Status Protection Act, Pub. L. 107-208, 116 Stat. 927 (Aug. 6, 2002). Delays attributable to the numerical ceilings are a different story. Subject to one quirk noted below, the statute does not attempt to freeze the beneficiary’s age while that person is waiting for his or her priority date to become current.

The most relevant provisions of the Child Status Protection Act are sections 2 and 3. They address the aging-out problems for the sons and daughters of United States citizens (section 2, which added section 201(f) to the INA) and the sons and daughters of LPRs (section 3, which added INA § 203(h)).

The upshot of section 2 is that for immediate relative purposes the beneficiary’s age is frozen as of the date the visa petition was filed. The beneficiary will be treated as the “child” of a United States citizen, in other words, as long as he or she was under age 21 at the time the parent filed the petition with USCIS (and all other requirements are met). The same section makes appropriate adjustments for cases in which the beneficiary becomes an immediate relative while some other visa petition is otherwise pending—for example, where the parent is an LPR who has filed a family-sponsored 2A petition for the child, but the parent naturalizes while that petition is pending. See INA § 201(f) for details.

Section 3 does somewhat analogous things for the “children” of LPRs. The main preferences for children of LPRs are the 2A preference and section 203(d), for children “following or accompanying to join” their preference immigrant parents. Again, both categories refer specifically to the “child,” which in turn means the person must be under age 21. For purposes of that requirement, section 3 lays out a formula for determining the age the child should be treated as having attained. Generally, the consulate is to go by the beneficiary’s age at the time the visa becomes available (which happens when the priority date for the particular category becomes current and the visa petition has been approved), but reduced by the amount of time the visa petition was pending. INA § 203(h)(1). For this section to apply, there is a further requirement that the beneficiary file the necessary forms with the consulate within one year of the visa becoming available. Id. § 203(h)(1)(A).

The provision for reducing the beneficiary’s age by the amount of time the visa petition was pending is, however, a bit odd. The obvious goal was to make sure processing time did not adversely affect the applicant’s immigrant status, but this provision appears to do more. Suppose an LPR files a family-sponsored 2A petition for his or her 17-year-old unmarried daughter. Assume that, solely because of quota backlogs, it takes five years for the 2A petition to become current. The daughter is now 22, seemingly ineligible for 2A status. But if it turns out that during that five-year waiting period USCIS took two years to approve the visa petition—a delay that would not have seemed to matter because she was going to have to wait five years anyway—then the daughter will be treated as if she were age 20. Thus, she will qualify for 2A status. In contrast, if USCIS had processed her visa petition in six months, then, when her priority date became current five years after the process was started, she would be treated as if she were 21 ½—too old to qualify for 2A status. It is one thing to avoid disadvantaging her because of USCIS processing time. But in the former case, isn't she positively advantaged by a seemingly irrelevant delay? USCIS seems to have endorsed the interpretation that generates that anomaly. See Memorandum from Donald Neufeld, USCIS, to Field Leadership, Revised guidance for the Child Status Protection Act (CSPA), HQ DOMO 70/6.1, AFM Update AD07-04, at 3-4 (undated).

United States Department of State Bureau of Consular Affairs

VISA BULLETIN
April 2009

Priority Dates for Family-Sponsored Immigrant Visas
	All Chargeability Areas Except Those Listed	CHINA	INDIA	MEXICO	PHILIPPINES
Family
1st	15AUG02	15AUG02	15AUG02	08OCT92	01AUG93
2A	15AUG04	15AUG04	15AUG04	01JAN02	15AUG04
2B	01SEP00	01SEP00	01SEP00	01MAY92	15JAN98
3rd	22AUG00	22AUG00	22AUG00	22OCT92	15JUN91
4th	15APR98	08JAN98	15APR98	22APR95	22JUN86

Priority Dates for Employment-Based Immigrant Visas
	All Chargeability Areas Except Those Listed	CHINA	INDIA	MEXICO	PHILIPPINES
Employment
1st	C	C	C	C	C
2nd	C	15FEB05	15FEB04	C	C
3rd	01MAR03	01MAR03	01NOV01	01MAR03	01MAR03
Other Workers	01MAR01	01MAR01	01MAR01	01MAR01	01MAR01
4th	C	C	C	C	C
5th	C	C	C	C	C

PROBLEMS 3-4

In doing the Problems in this set, assume it is now April 2009 and consider the immigrants' possible routes to permanent residence in the United States. To map out your strategy, you will need to consult the preceding Visa Bulletin chart. Keep in mind also that, after five years of LPR status (or three years "living in marital union" with a United States citizen after attainment of LPR status), one may apply for naturalization to United States citizenship. INA §§ 316(a), 319(a).

Problem 3. X, who was admitted as an LPR four years ago, has just married Y, a native and citizen of Costa Rica. Y wants to become an LPR as well. Y is very close to her sister Z, who is married and has two sons, ages 2 and 7. Z and her husband and sons are all Costa Rican citizens. X is in your office. He wants your help in securing LPR status for Y and, if possible, Z and her husband and sons. What advice would you give X? Would your advice change if all the intending immigrants were natives of the Philippines rather than Costa Rica?

Problem 4. A, who is a native and citizen of Denmark, telephones you from Europe. She is contemplating marriage to B, who is also a native and citizen of Denmark. A is six months shy of her twenty-first birthday. Her father is a citizen and resident of the United States. A wants to know whether she and her future husband will be eligible to immigrate to the United States and whether there is any reason for them to delay their marriage.

2. SPOUSES

a. SAME-SEX MARRIAGES

Adams v. Howerton

United States Court of Appeals, Ninth Circuit, 1982.
673 F.2d 1036.

■ WALLACE, CIRCUIT JUDGE:

Adams, a male American citizen, and Sullivan, a male alien, appeal from the district court's entry of summary judgment for Howerton, Acting District Director of the Immigration and Naturalization Service (INS). The district court held that their homosexual marriage did not qualify Sullivan as Adams's spouse pursuant to section 201(b) of the Immigration and Nationality Act of 1952. We affirm.

I

Following the expiration of Sullivan's visitor's visa, Adams and Sullivan obtained a marriage license from the county clerk in Boulder, Colorado, and were "married" by a minister. Adams then petitioned the INS for classification of Sullivan as an immediate relative of an American citizen, based upon Sullivan's alleged status as Adams's spouse. The petition was denied, and the denial was affirmed on appeal by the Board of Immigration Appeals. Adams and Sullivan then filed an action in district court challenging this final administrative decision on both statutory and constitutional grounds. * * * On cross-motions for summary judgment, the district court entered judgment for the INS. * * *

II

Two questions are presented in this appeal: first, whether a citizen's spouse within the meaning of section 201(b) of the Act must be an individual of the opposite sex; and second, whether the statute, if so interpreted, is constitutional.

* * * Section 201(b) defines "immediate relatives" to include the spouses of United States citizens. * * * Neither that section nor any subsequent amendments further define the term "spouse" directly.

Cases interpreting the Act indicate that a two-step analysis is necessary to determine whether a marriage will be recognized for immigration purposes. The first is whether the marriage is valid under state law. The second is whether that state-approved marriage qualifies under the Act. Both steps are required. * * *

* * *

It is not clear * * * whether Colorado would recognize a homosexual marriage. * * *

While we might well make an educated guess as to how the Colorado courts would decide this issue, it is unnecessary for us to do so. We decide this case solely upon construction of section 201(b), the second step in our two-step analysis.

III

Even if the Adams-Sullivan marriage were valid under Colorado law, the marriage might still be insufficient to confer spouse status for purposes of federal immigration law. So long as Congress acts within constitutional constraints, it may determine the conditions under which immigration visas are issued. Therefore, the intent of Congress governs the conferral of spouse status under section 201(b), and a valid marriage is determinative only if Congress so intends.

It is clear to us that Congress did not intend the mere validity of a marriage under state law to be controlling. Although the 1965 amendments do not define the term "spouse," the Act itself limits the persons who may be deemed spouses. Section 101(a)(35) of the Act specifically provides that the term "spouse" does not include a spouse, wife, or husband by reason of any marriage ceremony where the contracting parties thereto are not physically present in the presence of each other, unless the marriage shall have been consummated.

Furthermore, valid marriages entered into by parties not intending to live together as husband and wife are not recognized for immigration purposes. Therefore, even though two persons contract a marriage valid under state law and are recognized as spouses by that state, they are not necessarily spouses for purposes of section 201(b).

We thus turn to the question of whether Congress intended that homosexual marriages confer spouse status under section 201(b). Where a statute has been interpreted by the agency charged with its enforcement, we are ordinarily required to accord substantial deference to that construction, and should follow it "unless there are compelling indications that it is wrong.” Thus, we must be mindful that the INS, in carrying out its broad responsibilities, has interpreted the term “spouse” to exclude a person entering a homosexual marriage.

While we do accord this construction proper weight, we base our decision primarily on the Act itself. Nothing in the Act, the 1965 amendments or the legislative history suggests that the reference to “spouse” in section 201(b) was intended to include a person of the same sex as the citizen in question. It is “a fundamental canon of statutory construction” that, “unless otherwise defined, words will be interpreted as taking their ordinary, contemporary, common meaning.” The term “marriage” ordinarily contemplates a relationship between a man and a woman. See Webster’s Third New International Dictionary 1384 (1971); Black’s Law Dictionary 876 (5th ed. 1979). The term “spouse” commonly refers to one of the parties in a marital relationship so defined. Congress has not indicated an intent to enlarge the ordinary meaning of those words. In the absence of such a congressional directive, it would be inappropriate for us to expand the meaning of the term “spouse” for immigration purposes.

* * *

Our conclusion is supported by a further review of the 1965 amendments to the Act. These amendments not only added section 201(b) in its present form, but also amended the mandatory exclusion provisions of section 212(a) of the Act. Yet, both * * * the amendments and the accompanying Senate Report clearly express an intent to exclude homosexuals. As our duty is to ascertain and apply the intent of Congress, we strive to interpret language in one section of a statute consistently with the language of other sections and with the purposes of the entire statute considered as a whole. We think it unlikely that Congress intended to give homosexual spouses preferential admission treatment under section 201(b) of the Act when, in the very same amendments adding that section, it mandated their exclusion. Reading these provisions together, we can only conclude that Congress intended that only partners in heterosexual marriages be considered spouses under section 201(b).

IV

We next consider the constitutionality of the section 201(b) so interpreted. Adams and Sullivan contend that the law violates the equal protection clause because it discriminates against them on the bases of sex and homosexuality. They also argue that review of this claimed violation must be pursuant to a strict standard because the federal law abridges their fundamental right to marry. We need not and do not reach the question of the nature of the claimed right or whether such a right is implicated in this case. Even if it were, we would not apply a strict scrutiny standard of review to the statute. Congress has almost plenary power to admit or exclude aliens, and the decisions of Congress are subject only to limited judicial review.

* * *

We do know that where there is a rational basis for Congress's exercise of its power, whether articulated or not, the Court will uphold the immigration laws that Congress enacts. * * * [I]t is not clear what treatment a seemingly irrational statute should receive. * * *

We need not, however, delineate the exact outer boundaries of this limited judicial review. We hold that Congress's decision to confer spouse status under section 201(b) only upon the parties to heterosexual marriages has a rational basis and therefore comports with the due process clause and its equal protection requirements. There is no occasion to consider in this case whether some lesser standard of review should apply.

Congress manifested its concern for family integrity when it passed laws facilitating the immigration of the spouses of some valid heterosexual marriages. This distinction is one of many drawn by Congress pursuant to its determination to provide some—but not all—close relationships with relief from immigration restrictions that might otherwise hinder reunification in this country. In effect, Congress has determined that preferential status is not warranted for the spouses of homosexual marriages. Perhaps this is because homosexual marriages never produce offspring, because they are not recognized in most, if in any, of the states, or because they violate traditional and often prevailing societal mores. In any event, having found that Congress rationally intended to deny preferential status to the spouses of such marriages, we need not further “probe and test the justifications for the legislative decision.”

We hold that section 201(b) of the Act is not unconstitutional because it denies spouses of homosexual marriages the preferences accorded to spouses of heterosexual marriages.

AFFIRMED.

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. Decided in 1982, the Adams decision drew little public attention. Same-sex marriages simply were not a front page issue at the time. They certainly are today, as the developments traced in the discussion below illustrate.

First, as a general matter, should the federal immigration laws simply recognize every marriage that is legally valid in the jurisdiction in which it was celebrated? Argue both ways.

2. The court refrains from deciding whether same-sex marriages are valid under Colorado law. It holds that, even if they are, Congress intended not to recognize them for immigration purposes. How many different statutory interpretation techniques does the court use in arriving at that conclusion?

3. In seeking to ascertain the intent of Congress, the court does not attempt to identify the purpose of the provision favoring spouses of United States citizens or the extent to which recognition of state-approved same-sex marriages would further that purpose. (The court considers possible purposes later when it addresses the constitutional issue, but only after it has decided the statutory interpretation issue). Why, exactly, did Congress give preference to spouses of United States citizens? Does the rationale you have just identified apply any less forcefully to same-sex marriages (assuming arguendo, as the court did, that they are valid under state law) than to heterosexual ones?

In general, if the language of a statute is not dispositive, and if a given interpretation advances the overall purpose of that statute, must a court choose that interpretation? Or might there be circumstances in which the court should reject that interpretation even then? Consider one of the classic statutory interpretation cases, United States v. Kirby, 74 U.S. (7 Wall.) 482, 19 L.Ed. 278 (1869). A local sheriff arrested a mail carrier for murder. The sheriff was convicted of violating a federal statute that prohibited “knowingly and willfully obstruct[ing] or retard[ing] the passage of the mail, or of any driver * * * carrying the same.” Under a literal interpretation, the sheriff was clearly guilty; he had knowingly and willfully obstructed the passage of the mail carrier. Moreover, one could say that the purpose of the statute was to assure the flow of the mail. Prohibiting law enforcement officers from arresting mail carriers presumably would further that purpose. Yet the Supreme Court, concluding such a result would be absurd, reversed the conviction. Although a conviction would have contributed to the congressional purpose broadly defined, countervailing considerations—the importance of enforcing other criminal laws—prevailed. Could similar reasoning explain the statutory interpretation conclusion in Adams? Was this a case in which the court believed that a literal interpretation—even if it advances the general congressional purpose—was offset by countervailing considerations?

4. The court observes that in 1952 Congress made homosexuality a ground for exclusion. The pre-Adams history of that provision is instructive. The original enactment, Act of June 27, 1952, § 212(a)(4), 66 Stat. 163, 182, barred noncitizens who were “afflicted with psychopathic personality, epilepsy, or a mental defect.” Archaic as it sounds today, the legislative history reveals a strong likelihood that the 1952 Congress meant the term “psychopathic personality” to include homosexuality.¹⁰ To remove some lingering doubt, however, Congress in 1965 amended section 212(a)(4) by adding the phrase “or sexual deviation” (and simultaneously deleting “epilepsy”). Pub.L. 89-236, § 15(b), 79 Stat. 911, 919 (Oct. 3, 1965). The Supreme Court in Boutilier v. INS, 387 U.S. 118, 120, 87 S.Ct. 1563, 1565, 18 L.Ed.2d 661, 664 (1967), later held that the phrase “psychopathic personality”, and thus even the pre-1965 version of section 212(a)(4), was intended to encompass homosexuality. The Court then rejected Boutilier's argument that, as so construed, the statutory phrase was unconstitutionally vague.

10. See Jorge L. Carro, From Constitutional Psychopathic Inferiority to AIDS: What Is in the Future for Homosexual Aliens?, 7 Yale L. & Policy Rev. 201, 208-17 (1989); Note, The Propriety of Denying Entry to Homosexual Aliens: Examining the Public Health Service's Authority over Medical Exclusions, 17 Univ. Michigan J.L. Reform 331, 332-38 (1984).

But a difficult issue remained. The procedure for excluding noncitizens on any of the medical or psychological grounds required a certification by the Public Health Service (PHS) that the individual fit the definition of the particular exclusion ground. In 1979 the Surgeon General announced that, in light of modern medical knowledge, the PHS would no longer certify homosexuality as a "psychopathic personality" or a "sexual deviation." See Matter of Longstaff, 716 F.2d 1439, 1444 (5th Cir.1983). The question soon arose whether, in the absence of such a certification, the INS could exclude a self-declared homosexual.

At the time of the Adams case, that issue had not been adjudicated. (The post-Adams history will be noted presently). Should the Surgeon General's 1979 announcement have affected the court's analysis of whether a party to a state-approved same-sex marriage can be a "spouse"? Should either changes in medical norms as reflected by the PHS announcement, or changes in societal norms, influence that determination?

5. Apart from the merits of the case, why wouldn't the court's observation that homosexuality was then an exclusion ground moot the issue of what "spouse" means? Even if the court had held Adams was a spouse, wouldn't he have been excluded?

6. Shortly after Adams, two courts considered whether the INS could exclude a self-declared homosexual without a PHS certification. On that issue the courts split. Compare Hill v. INS, 714 F.2d 1470 (9th Cir.1983) (no) with Matter of Longstaff, 716 F.2d 1439 (5th Cir.1983) (yes). The INS announced it would not follow Hill except in cases that arise within the Ninth Circuit. See 62 IR 166-67 (1985). (If you were then a gay or lesbian noncitizen who wished to move from your country of origin to a city located within the Fifth Circuit, might the decisions in Hill and Longstaff have affected your travel itinerary?)

Congress finally repealed the bar on gays and lesbians in 1990. See Immigration Act of 1990, § 601, amending INA § 212(a). That repeal made the issue in Adams more important because, if a court were to recognize same-sex marriages for immediate relative purposes, the beneficiary would no longer face exclusion on homosexuality grounds. Do you think the court in Adams would have reached a different result had it been deciding the case shortly after 1990?

7. The INS later brought deportation proceedings against Sullivan, the intending immigrant in the present case, on the ground he had overstayed his nonimmigrant visa. Sullivan sought discretionary relief under former INA § 244(a) [now replaced by INA § 240A(b), which you will study later]. That provision then required, among other elements, a showing that deportation would cause "extreme hardship" to the noncitizen or to any of certain specified relatives, including his or her "spouse." See chapter 8, § A.1.b below. The BIA found the hardship to Sullivan insufficient and dismissed as irrelevant the hardship to Adams, whom the BIA did not regard as a "spouse." The court of appeals affirmed. Sullivan v. INS, 772 F.2d 609 (9th Cir.1985).

8. The personal history of the gay couple who litigated Adams v. Howerton is recounted in Lesbian and Gay Immigration Rights Task Force, Task Force Update, at 1, 11 (Summer 1996) and 7 (Fall 1996). Richard Adams, a United States citizen, had filed a visa petition on behalf of his Australian partner, Tony Sullivan. The INS denied the petition. Its letter read:

Upon consideration, it is ordered that your visa petition filed on April 28, 1975 for classification of Anthony Corbett Sullivan as the spouse of a United States citizen be denied for the following reasons:

You have failed to establish that a bona fide marital relationship can exist between two faggots.

November 24, 1975

Adams and Sullivan held a press conference to reveal the contents of the letter. After that, the INS withdrew the decision and issued another letter reaching the same conclusion but in less overtly bigoted language. Task Force Update, above, at 11. As to the constitutionality of deporting same-sex partners, see Victor C. Romero, The Selective Deportation of Same-Gender Partners: In Search of the "Rara Avis," 56 Univ. Miami L. Rev. 537 (2002).

9. At the time Adams v. Howerton was decided, no United States jurisdiction was clearly on record as recognizing same-sex marriages, although there were several states (apparently including Colorado) whose laws were silent on the issue. Since Adams, the subject of same-sex marriages has heated up considerably.

In Baehr v. Lewin, 852 P.2d 44 (Haw. 1993), the Hawaii Supreme Court held that a state statute which it interpreted as barring same-sex marriages violated the equal protection clause of the Hawaii State Constitution (which expressly prohibited sex discrimination), unless the marriage bar was necessary to a compelling state interest. On remand, a Hawaii trial court found that the state had no compelling interest in banning same-sex marriages, Baehr v. Miike, Civ. No. 91-1394, 1996 WL 694235 (Haw. Cir. Ct., Dec. 3, 1996), and the Hawaii Supreme Court affirmed without a published opinion, 87 Haw. 34, 950 P.2d 1234 (Dec. 19, 1997). But the victory was short-lived. In 1998, Hawaii voters passed a state constitutional amendment that prohibited same-sex marriages. Sam Howe Verhovek, The 1998 Elections: The States—Initiatives, New York Times, Nov. 5, 1998, at B1. On the same day, Alaska voters took similar action. Id. By March 11, 1999, some 29 states had expressly banned same-sex marriages.¹¹

11. Al Knight, Same-Sex Marriage: Losing War, Denver Post, Mar. 11, 1999, at B-7; see generally D.L. Hawley, Gays, Lesbians and Immigration, August 1999 Immigration Briefings.

The Hawaii Court had drawn an important distinction. The issue, it said, was not whether the legislature could prohibit homosexual marriages. It had purported to prohibit same-sex marriages. The distinction was crucial. The Hawaii constitution does not explicitly bar discrimination on the basis of sexual orientation, but it does expressly bar sex discrimination.

The prospect of Hawaii formally recognizing same-sex marriages triggered nationwide hysteria. Article IV, section 1 of the United States Constitution provides that “[f]ull faith and credit shall be given in each State to the public Acts, Records, and judicial Proceedings of every other State.” Does the full faith and credit clause mean that all the states would be required to recognize same-sex marriages that were performed in, and recognized by, Hawaii? The answer is not yet clear.

Particularly relevant now, recognition of same-sex marriages by any state makes the issue in Adams v. Howerton even more pressing. The court in that case assumed only arguendo that state law permitted same-sex marriages. The court held that, even under such an assumption, the INA did not recognize same-sex marriages and the Constitution did not require Congress to do so. Actual state recognition makes the issue far more immediate.

10. Hawaii’s then impending recognition of same-sex marriages led Congress to enact the Defense of Marriage Act, Pub.L. 104-199, 110 Stat. 2419 (Sept. 21, 1996) [DOMA]. The Act has two major provisions. Section 2 of DOMA provides that states need not give effect to acts, records, or judicial proceedings of other states allowing same-sex marriages. Whether section 2 is compatible with the full faith and credit clause will surely be tested.

Section 3 is of more immediate relevance here. It reads:

In determining the meaning of any Act of Congress, or of any ruling, regulation, or interpretation of the various administrative bureaus and agencies of the United States, the word “marriage” means only a legal union between one man and one woman as husband and wife, and the word “spouse” refers only to a person of the opposite sex who is a husband or a wife.

Does section 3 of DOMA settle the issue in Adams v. Howerton? Statutory interpretation problems are not apparent. The INA makes “spouses” immediate relatives. INA § 201(b)(2)(A)(i). Is section 3 vulnerable to constitutional attack? The provision does regulate an area (marriage) traditionally regulated by the states, but as earlier discussion notes, Congress has often attached conditions to marriage for immigration purposes (such as not recognizing marriages that meet all the requirements of the states in which they were contracted but where the parties did not intend to establish a life together, see the next subsection). Is an equal protection challenge plausible? You have seen that Congress has plenary power to decide which noncitizens to admit, but you have also seen lower court decisions strike down federal immigration provisions found to lack a rational basis. Moreover, since same-sex marriages classify on the basis of gender (not just sexual orientation), is some form of heightened judicial scrutiny applicable?

Even without heightened scrutiny, is it rational to withhold recognition of same-sex marriages for immigration purposes? The court in Adams thought it was. Why, exactly, does the law do so? Precisely what societal attitudes toward homosexuality does the policy reflect? What position should Congress take? Before answering these questions, consider the materials below.

11. DOMA, of course, has not ended the controversy. In 2003, the Massachusetts Supreme Judicial Court, relying on a combination of liberty and equality interests, held that the state constitution bars the Commonwealth of Massachusetts from rejecting same-sex marriages while recognizing opposite-sex marriages. Goodridge v. Department of Mental Health, 798 N.E.2d 941 (Mass. 2003). The court found no rational basis for the difference in treatment. The effect of Goodridge was to enable same-sex couples to marry in Massachusetts.

Another nationwide panic—even more frenetic than the one that followed the Hawaii court’s decision—immediately set in. Several states, including Massachusetts itself, began the process of amending their constitutions to bar same-sex marriages and constrain “activist judges.” Several such ballot initiatives have already succeeded. Efforts to amend the U.S. Constitution to define marriage as a union of one man and one woman are similarly under way. The issue figured prominently in the 2004 Presidential campaigns and appears to have galvanized millions of voters.

Since then, the supreme courts of at least three other states—California, Connecticut and Vermont—have similarly declared bans on same-sex marriages violative of their state constitutions. See In re Marriage Cases, 43 Cal.4th 757, 183 P.3d 384, 76 Cal.Rptr.3d 683 (2008); Kerrigan v. Commissioner of Public Health, 957 A.2d 407 (Conn. 2008); Varnum v. Brien, 763 N.W.2d 862 (Iowa 2009). The voters of California, however, promptly passed a state constitutional amendment prohibiting same-sex marriages. Vermont then passed the first state statute to authorize same-sex marriages, and Maine quickly followed. See New York Times, May 7, 2009, at A-21.

12. In 2009 Sen. Leahy and Rep. Nadler introduced legislation in Congress to extend immigration benefits to same-sex couples. At least 16 countries already do so. They are listed in Agence France Presse, Feb. 12, 2009 (Australia, Belgium, Brazil, Britain, Canada, Denmark, Finland, France, Germany, Iceland, Israel, the Netherlands, New Zealand, Norway, South Africa, and Sweden).

More generally, several countries have recently recognized same-sex marriages. The Netherlands on September 12, 2000 became the first to do so. See Note, Queer Reasoning: Immigration Policy, Baker v. State of Vermont, and the (Non)Recognition of Same-Gender Relationships, 10 Law & Sexuality 211, 214 (2001). Belgium quickly followed, allowing same-sex marriages as long as one of the partners lives in Belgium or visits regularly. See Gay Expats Can Marry in Belgium, Expatica News (Jan. 26, 2004). In 2005 Spain became the third nation to do so, and Canada became the fourth in 2005. See AP, Spain Legalizes Same-Sex Marriages, New York Times (June 30, 2005); Reference re Same-Sex Marriage, 2004 SCC 79 (Canadian Supreme Court 2004) (rendering advisory opinion that national same-sex marriage law would violate neither federalism principles nor the constitutionally protected freedom of religion of those who object to the practice). If a United States citizen or LPR legally marries a noncitizen of the same sex in one of the foreign countries or U.S. states that permit same-sex marriage, a literal reading of DOMA (items 10 and 11 above) would nonetheless bar immigration preference based on that marriage.

13. Professor Isabel Medina, after examining the general role of constitutional amendments, the link between same-sex marriages and constitutionally protected rights, and the influence of animus, reaches the following conclusion:

* * * It is unlikely that allowing same-sex couples to marry will materially affect the vast number of heterosexual marriages that are celebrated in this country. Moreover, recognizing same-sex marriage furthers values of community, autonomy, equality, stability, and intimacy. There appears to be no reason to discriminate against same-sex couples other than because traditionally marriage has been a heterosexual institution. But the traditional view of homosexuals and lesbians reflects substantial tolerance for rabid animus, expressed through legal norms and sometimes, through violent acts, towards gay and lesbian individuals and the sexual conduct that is at the heart of their status. * * *

Nothing about the institution of marriage is peculiarly heterosexual—not caring for children, not privacy or intimacy, not support. Prohibiting persons who are homosexual or lesbian from enjoying the legal celebration of their marital union, and from enjoying the “[t]angible and intangible benefits” which flow from marriage, furthers no legitimate state goal and burdens one of the most basic of human rights—the right to establish and enjoy an intimate relationship—a family—with another adult.

M. Isabel Medina, Of Constitutional Amendments, Human Rights, and Same-Sex Marriages, 64 Louisiana L. Rev. 459, 474–75 (2004).

Do you agree with Professor Medina?

14. Should the immigration laws recognize foreign polygamous marriages that are valid in the countries where they were celebrated, assuming all the parties are consenting adults? How do the arguments pro and con match up with those for and against recognition of same-sex marriages? See generally Kerry Abrams, Polygamy, Prostitution, and the Federalization of Immigration Law, 105 Columbia L. Rev. 641 (2005).

Note, An Argument for the Application of Equal Protection Heightened Scrutiny to Classifications Based on Homosexuality

57 So. Cal. L. Rev. 797, 817–24 (1984).

[The footnotes in the original article cite empirical authority to support the various factual assertions. Those citations have been edited out here.—Eds.]

* * *

Researchers have extensively studied the origins of sexual orientation, but still have no generally accepted explanation of its development. Although no consensus exists as to how or why a person turns out to be gay or straight, agreement does exist on some basic facts.

1. The Acquisition of Homosexuality is not Subject to Control

Research indicates that neither individuals nor their parents can control whether the person turns out to be gay, bisexual, or heterosexual. Individuals do not choose their sexual orientation. Sexual orientation develops very early in life; most research indicates that it is determined by a person's fifth or sixth birthday. The most conservative estimate is that sexual orientation is firmly established by adolescence notwithstanding one's level of sexual activity.

* * *

2. Sexual Orientation is Immutable

Sexual orientation is generally impervious to change. * * *

B. GAYS ARE THE SUBJECT OF INCORRECT STEREOTYPES

The basis for most laws that disadvantage gays is usually one or more stereotypes with no or very little basis in fact. * * *

1. Homosexuals as "Pied Pipers"

One of the more common stereotypes of gays is that they proselytize children to homosexuality or present role models that make homosexuality appear so attractive that young people will embrace it as a lifestyle. This notion has no basis in fact. Gays do not try to convert children, nor will mere exposure to a gay person affect a child's sexual orientation. Sexual orientation is established very early in life and cannot be consciously acquired. A gay can no more "convert" heterosexual children than a heterosexual can "convert" homosexual children. Not even the seduction or molestation of a child by an older member of the same sex will affect the child's sexual orientation.

2. Homosexuals as Child Molesters

The most offensive stereotype is that homosexuals are somehow more likely or more willing to molest children than are heterosexuals. Officials use this misperception to justify sodomy statutes and employment discrimination. The average homosexual is neither likely to be a child molester, nor more likely than a heterosexual to be one. Indeed, with respect to physical sexual response alone, heterosexuals are more likely to be aroused by children than are homosexuals. Finally, the typical child molester is much more likely to be heterosexual than homosexual.

3. Homosexuals as Mentally Ill Persons

Another ground for some discriminatory governmental policies is the stereotype that gays are mentally ill. The premise of this stereotype is an idea that homosexuality is a mental disease and that therefore gays are inferior or unstable. The truth is that "homosexual adults who have come to terms with their homosexuality . . . are no more distressed psychologically than are heterosexual men and women." Homosexuality is not an indicator of psychopathology. As early as 1935 Freud wrote that "[h]omosexuality is assuredly no advantage, but it is nothing to be ashamed of . . . , it cannot be classified as an illness; we consider it to be a variation of the sexual function. . . ." Official acceptance came much later, but the National Association for Mental Health, the American Psychiatric Association, and the Surgeon General now agree that homosexuality, in and of itself, is not a mental illness. * * *

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. The empirical conclusions summarized in the preceding excerpts are fairly representative of those reached in the vast majority of scientific studies. There is as yet no clearly correct identification of the precise determinants of one's sexual orientation. But researchers almost universally agree that there is a multiplicity of factors, that a person does not and cannot "choose" his or her sexual orientation, that orientation is fixed by early childhood at the latest, and that homosexuality is as deeply ingrained in an individual as is heterosexuality. One leading author summarizes the evidence as follows:

Perhaps the most important source of homophobic reactions * * * is the widespread ignorance that exists in the general public about what makes people homosexual. Many people tend to think of homosexuality either as a pattern that is freely chosen by a conscious act of will, or as something that is "caught" from others, either as a result of seduction or by an "infectious" imitation or "modeling" of oneself after homosexuals to whom one has been exposed. * * *

Understandably, most parents in our culture have fears with regard to their children becoming homosexual. These fears are easily stimulated by ignorant or malicious assertions that children exposed to homosexual teachers (particularly if these teachers are popular and likeable) are in danger of modeling themselves after such teachers and thus becoming homosexual themselves. Yet there is not an iota of evidence for such assertions! As we have seen, the etiology of homosexuality is affected by many factors, some possibly genetic or constitutional, others dependent on early familial relationships, still others deriving from sociocultural elements. People do not "choose" to be homosexual any more than they "choose" to be heterosexual. In almost all instances, the basic factors that lead to a homosexual propensity are established before the age of six, well before the school years even begin. * * *¹²

12. Judd Marmor, Overview: The Multiple Roots of Homosexual Behavior, in Judd Marmor (ed.), Homosexual Behavior—A Modern Reappraisal 19–20 (1980). See also Alan

2. Homosexuality cuts across lines that separate widely varying cultures, time periods, and even species. See Marmor, note 12 above, at 6–7. Dr. Marmor, distilling results from various studies, finds it “fair to conclude, conservatively, that the incidence of more or less exclusively homosexual behavior in Western culture ranges from 5 to 10 percent for adult males and from 3 to 5 percent for adult females. If bisexual behavior is included, the incidence may well be twice these figures.” Id. at 7. Its range and its persistence through generations have raised for biologists the question whether homosexuality, contrary to popular assumption, might even serve a positive evolutionary function. See, e.g., Savin-Williams, note 12 above, at 95–96.

3. In the United States, the social norms concerning homosexuality have changed markedly in modern times. Sodomy laws, while often facially neutral with respect to sexual orientation, historically and currently have been directed and enforced primarily against homosexuals.¹³ The decline of these laws reflects the liberalized societal attitudes toward homosexuality. Until 1961, all fifty states punished consensual sodomy. Survey, note 13 above, at 526. In that year Illinois adopted the American Law Institute’s Model Penal Code provision decriminalizing private sexual conduct between consenting adults, and since then the vast majority of the states have repealed their prohibitions of sodomy between consenting adults in private, at least absent commercial gain.¹⁴ (Many other western nations had already done so. Carro, note 14 above, at 205–06; Survey, note 13 above, at 526). In Bowers v. Hardwick, 478 U.S. 186, 106 S.Ct. 2841, 92 L.Ed.2d 140 (1986), the Supreme Court upheld the constitutionality of a state statute that barred consensual sodomy. The Bowers decision was overruled, however, in Lawrence v. Texas, above. Observing that in both the United States and Europe prohibitions on homosexual sodomy were now the exception rather than the norm, the Court could not find a moral consensus strong enough to outweigh the relevant liberty interests.¹⁵

P. Bell et al., Sexual Preference—Its Development in Men and Women 183–92, 212–20 (1981); Richard Green, The “Sissy Boy Syndrome” and the Development of Homosexuality (1987); David F. Greenberg, The Construction of Homosexuality (1988). John Money & Anke A. Ehrhardt, Man and Woman, Boy and Girl (1972); Ritch C. Savin-Williams, Theoretical Perspectives Accounting for Adolescent Homosexuality, 9 J. Adolescent Health Care 95 (1988); Carol Warren, Homosexuality and Stigma, in Judd Marmor, Homosexual Behavior—A Modern Reappraisal, at 123, 125–26 (1980). For more specific studies of either genetic or hormonal influences, see, e.g., Michael Ruse, Homosexuality—A Philosophical Inquiry, ch. 5 (1988) (hormones); Garfield Tourney, Hormones and Homosexuality, in Marmor, above, at 41–58; John Money, Genetic and Chromosomal As- pects of Homosexual Etiology, in Marmor, above, at 59–72.

13. John D’Emilio, Sexual Politics, Sexual Communities—The Making of a Homosexual Minority in the United States 1940–1970, at 14 (1983); Survey on the Constitutional Right to Privacy in the Context of Homosexual Activity, 40 Univ. Miami L.Rev. 521, 525 (1986).

14. See Lawrence v. Texas, 539 U.S. 558, 123 S.Ct. 2472, 156 L.Ed.2d 508 (2003); see also Jorge L. Carro, From Constitutional Psychopathic Inferiority to AIDS: What is in the Future for Homosexual Aliens?, 7 Yale L. & Policy Rev. 201, 202–03 & n. 8 (1989); Survey, note 13 above, at 524–27.

15. For a detailed study that traces the history from ancient times, see Arno Karlen, Homosexuality in History, in Marmor, note

4. Although the 1990 repeal of the statutory provision excluding homosexual noncitizens was widely perceived as ending their discriminatory treatment under the immigration laws, the Adams case illustrates another component of the statutory discrimination: the granting of immigration preference based on opposite-sex marriages but not same-sex marriages (even if state-recognized). You now have enough information to think critically about why our immigration laws discriminate against gays and lesbians (and, in the present context, gender) and whether the possible justifications hold up. The original exclusion clearly was not enacted for health reasons; as noted earlier, it had found its way into our law decades before anyone had ever heard of AIDS or associated it with homosexuality. Possibly the prohibition mirrored widely held fears that gays would molest or “convert” children. As the preceding literature makes clear, researchers now know these fears to be misguided.

So is there today a legitimate reason to treat homosexual noncitizens less favorably than heterosexual noncitizens? Putting aside for a moment the association between gay males and AIDS (this will be discussed in chapter 5, but for now you might note this correlation at any rate would not explain the non-recognition of lesbian marriages), it seems clear that, if there is a justification, it has its roots in some shared notion of morality. In examining the basis for that moral judgment, keep in mind that the pre-1990 exclusion provision, INA § 212(a)(4), defined the excludable class by reference to mental state, not just actions. Does that distinction have either moral or pragmatic significance? Can orientation be safely used as a proxy for likelihood of engaging in prohibited acts? The present discrimination (definition of spouse) turns on gender; a male noncitizen who marries a male citizen will not be a spouse, while an otherwise similarly situated female noncitizen who marries a male citizen will be. Is that statutory distinction justifiable?

More fundamentally, what is it about homosexual attractions and acts that lead some to view them as immoral? Some people argue simply that homosexuality is “unnatural.” What does that mean? Surely, if a class of persons is to receive adverse treatment solely because a trait they have is “unnatural,” that word must be defined to mean more than that the trait is possessed only by a minority. (Left-handed people are also a minority. Is left-handedness “unnatural”?) Does “unnatural,” rather, mean counter-instinctive? Homosexuals themselves, by definition, do not regard same-sex attractions as counter-instinctive; again, we are back to a simple matter of majority versus minority preferences. Is homosexuality unnatural in the morphological sense that the body parts are not shaped to fit together in “that way”? (The shapes of the body parts do not seem to bother the participants. Why should heterosexuals care?) Or are homosexual acts unnatural because they do not serve a procreative function? If that is what is meant by “unnatural,” then that term should apply as well to masturba-

12 above, at 75–99. For lucid insights from both international law and comparative law on the subject, see Berta Hernández-Truyol, Querying Lawrence, 65 Ohio State L.J. 1151, 1173–1212 (2004).

tion, use of birth control, or any other sex act not intended or likely to result in conception. Should immigrants who have engaged in those acts also be treated less favorably than others?

Perhaps the real explanation is a religious one. In western societies the historical origins of public antipathy toward homosexuals are deeply rooted in Judeo-Christian teachings. See Karlen, above. Is that fact alone enough to justify discriminating against parties to homosexual marriages? Would it violate constitutional principles of separation of church and state to base such discrimination solely on religious doctrine? Or is the government free to act on the basis of commonly held moral beliefs even though religion was the historical stimulus for those beliefs? (Analogous issues surround the relationship between Roman Catholic theology and abortion laws.)

Is the adverse treatment of homosexual immigrants, like any other law directed against homosexuals, justifiable as a means to promote "family" values? Judge Wallace, in Adams, seemed to imply as much. He said that, in confining the immigration preferences to heterosexual partners, "Congress manifested its concern for family integrity." What assumption was Judge Wallace making about the meaning of "family?" A paper commissioned by the HHS Secretary's Task Force on Youth Suicide found homosexual children two to three times as likely as heterosexual children to attempt suicide. The paper cited social stigma and discrimination as likely explanations. See Paul Gibson, Gay Male and Lesbian Youth Suicide, in 3 Report of the Secretary's Task Force on Youth Suicide 110 (Jan. 1989). Dr. Louis Sullivan, then-President Bush's Secretary of Health and Human Services, took public exception to those views on the ground they "run contrary * * * to advancing traditional family values." Letter from Hon. Louis W. Sullivan, M.D. to Hon. William Dannemeyer (Oct. 13, 1989). But in what sense are the partners to a homosexual marriage not "family"? If the notion is that they are unable to conceive children, as the court suggested in Adams, are gay couples distinguishable from those heterosexual couples who are physically unable to conceive? The former do indeed have additional difficulty in adopting children, but those roadblocks are themselves the products of either law or adoption agency policy.

Do not these and other laws directed against homosexuals really boil down to the notion that the heterosexual majority simply finds homosexual acts offputting? If that assumption about the majority reaction is factually correct, is it sound policy to codify that widely held instinct as law? Or, rather, should the law reflect the fact that, however repugnant many heterosexuals might find the concept of even consensual homosexual acts, the significant minority whose sexual orientation is different find the same concept perfectly natural and pleasurable? In short, how should a society draw the line between codifying broadly held moral beliefs and tolerating the moral beliefs of a minority? And if a majority—rationally or irrationally—regards a given practice as immoral, is that alone a good enough reason to bar noncitizens who engage in that practice? In the United States, where so many people believe in God and belong to one of the major established religions, should the immigration laws decline to recognize marriages between atheists?

Finally, would federal recognition of same-sex marriages be tantamount to affirmatively endorsing homosexuality? Or is there a real difference between endorsement and tolerance?

5. Same-sex and other nonmarital relationships are recognized for immigration purposes in several other countries, where the criteria for family-related preferences emphasize either financial dependence or the seriousness of the relationship, rather than formal marriage vows.¹⁶

6. For fuller accounts of the opposing views on whether the immigration laws should recognize same-sex marriages for purposes of family reunification programs, compare Note, Coming to America, note 16 above (arguing yes) with Michael A. Scaperlanda, Kulturkampf in the Backwaters: Homosexuality and Immigration Law, 11 Widener J. Pub. L. 475, 487–500 (2002) (arguing no). See also Victor C. Romero, Crossing Borders: Loving v. Virginia as a Story of Migration, 51 Howard L.J. 53 (2007) (comparing the ways in which non-recognition of same-sex marriages and bans on interracial marriage impede migration).

b. FRAUDULENT MARRIAGES

You have seen several ways in which marriage to a United States citizen, or in some instances to an LPR, can improve one's chances of securing lawful permanent residence. Marriage can confer immediate relative or family-sponsored second preference status, or make the person a spouse "accompanying or following to join" a preference immigrant. As you will see later, one can also derive immigration benefits from accompanying or following to join a nonimmigrant or an asylee. Later chapters will illustrate still other immigration-related advantages of marriage in the contexts of admission, deportation, and naturalization. These benefits include both automatic exemption from, and discretionary waivers of, requirements or sanctions that would otherwise be imposed.

Given both the attraction permanent residence holds for so many people and the legal advantages of marriage in attaining residence, it can certainly be tempting for a noncitizen to marry for immigration benefits. As the court noted in Adams, however, to suffice for immigration purposes a marriage must be not only legally valid in the jurisdiction in which it was celebrated (parties of marriageable age, parties not already married to others, ceremony performed by authorized official, etc.), but also factually

16. See generally Denise C. Hammond, Immigration and Sexual Orientation: Developing Standards, Options and Obstacles, 77 IR 113, 118–20 (Jan. 24, 2000) (list includes Australia, Belgium, Canada, Denmark, Finland, France, Iceland, Namibia, the Netherlands, New Zealand, Norway, South Africa, Sweden, and the United Kingdom); see also Internat'l Lesbian & Gay Association, World

Legal Survey, http://www.ilga.org/Information/legal_survey/summary_information_by_subject.htm (adding Iceland and several of the German länder); Note, Coming to America: The Immigration Obstacle Facing Binational Same-Sex Couples, 73 Southern Calif. L. Rev. 811, 813 nn. 6 & 8, and 827–35 (2000).

genuine. The standard test for the latter is whether, at the inception of the marriage, the parties intended to establish a life together.¹⁷ (Is an intent to establish a life together necessarily inconsistent with the marriage being motivated solely by the prospect of immigration benefits? If a couple plans to live together permanently, but they would not have formalized their relationship through marriage had there been no immigration benefits, should they receive preference?)

Sham marriages are of two types. The most common are bilateral arrangements in which both “spouses” marry solely to facilitate immigration. In a bilateral sham marriage, the intending immigrant spouse (the “beneficiary”) typically pays the citizen or LPR spouse (the “petitioner”) to enter into the marriage. Other sham marriages, in contrast, are based on unilateral fraud; the beneficiary spouse deceives the petitioner spouse as to the beneficiary’s feelings and intentions.¹⁸

Until 1986, the principal INS device for detecting a sham marriage was to interview the petitioner and, if present in the United States, the beneficiary, before approving the petition. One commentator describes some of the questions that the interviewers frequently asked:

During the marriage fraud interview—part of the statutory “investigation of facts”—the INS may interrogate both spouses about many aspects of the relationship. Officials typically interview the husband and wife separately in order to check for discrepancies between their answers. The INS may, for example, ask questions about the couple’s courtship, their wedding ceremony, the decor of their residence, the division of household chores, or what they had for breakfast on the morning of the interview. More important, although they are advised against doing so, INS officials often inquire into the most intimate aspects of the marital relationship. Probing questions about the method of birth control used, the consummation of the marriage, and the sexual conduct of the couple before and after marriage are not uncommon.

Note, The Constitutionality of the INS Sham Marriage Investigation Policy, 99 Harvard L.Rev. 1238, 1242–43 (1986).

Those pre-approval interviews and examination of pertinent documents together ferreted out a certain number of sham marriages. In addition, like other kinds of fraud, prior or current marriage fraud can be a ground for inadmissibility, discovered by consular officers abroad during the visa process or by immigration inspectors at the border, see INA § 212(a)(6)(C), or a ground for deportability, see INA § 237(a)(1)(A, G).

The former INS and others believed nonetheless that large-scale marriage fraud remained rampant. In 1985, then INS Commissioner Alan 17. Rodríguez v. INS, 204 F.3d 25, 27 (1st Cir. 2000); Bark v. INS, 511 F.2d 1200, 1201, 1202 (9th Cir.1975); Matter of Laureano, 19 I. & N. Dec. 1, 2–3 (BIA 1983).

18. See Joe A. Tucker, Assimilation to the United States: A Study of the Adjustment of Status and the Immigration Marriage Fraud Statutes, 7 Yale L. & Policy Rev. 20, 33–34 (1989).

Nelson testified before the Senate immigration subcommittee in support of strong legislation to combat marriage fraud. The Commissioner announced that the INS had conducted a preliminary survey on marriage fraud, and he informed the subcommittee that, in the light of the admittedly preliminary survey results, “we believe as much as 30%, which is an extremely high figure, of the spouse relationships may be fraudulent.” Fraudulent Marriage and Fiancé Arrangements to Obtain Permanent Resident Immigration Status, Hearing Before the Subcommittee on Immigration and Refugee Policy of the Senate Comm. on the Judiciary, S. Hrg. 99-325, 99th Cong., 1st Sess. 35 (July 26, 1985). Impressed by this testimony, see H.Rep. No. 99-906, 99th Cong., 2d Sess. 6 (Sept. 26, 1986), reproduced in 1986 U.S.Code Cong. & Admin.News 5978, the House Judiciary Committee recommended, and Congress passed, the Immigration Marriage Fraud Amendments of 1986, Act of Nov. 10, 1986, Pub.L. 99-639, 100 Stat. 3537 [IMFA]. This Act, aimed at reducing marriage fraud and achieving some other related goals, contained a number of controversial provisions—some since amended—that you will see shortly.

Soon, however, some disturbing revelations emerged. More than a year after the enactment of IMFA, the INS disclosed the basis for its “30%” conclusion. The survey the Commissioner had cited was a 1983-84 INS study in which INS investigators had reviewed selected spousal petitions. Certain categories of marriage petitions thought to contain a low incidence of fraud had been automatically excluded from the sample. The remaining (high-risk) cases were reviewed “in as much depth as possible given the [one to two months] for completion of the survey;” sometimes the parties were interviewed and other times they were not. In each case the investigator was asked whether, based on this preliminary review, he or she suspected fraud—not whether actual fraud had been found. In 30% of what was already, therefore, a high-risk sample, the investigators reported their “suspicions” of fraud. 65 IR 25-26 (1988).

More information came to light in 1989 when ACLU attorney Lucas Guttentag, representing a noncitizen in a case challenging the constitutionality of one particular IMFA provision, deposed David Nachtsheim, the INS official who had written up the results of the survey. Mr. Nachtsheim, testifying under oath, revealed that he and others had known that, for all the reasons noted above, the survey “was statistically invalid and lacked any probative value regarding the actual incidence of marriage fraud.” 66 IR 1011 (1989). Rather, Mr. Nachtsheim explained, the sole purpose of the study was to project future INS workloads (hence, the emphasis on incidence of suspected fraud rather than actual fraud). Lucas Guttentag & Judith Rabinovitz, Plaintiffs’ trial brief (Sept. 1, 1989), at 9-10 n. 7, in Manwani v. INS, later reported at 736 F.Supp. 1367 (W.D.N.C.1990). Mr. Nachtsheim also testified that top INS officials had been aware of the flaws in the study, had ordered another one conducted, and, well before Commissioner Nelson’s congressional testimony, had recommended that the study not be cited as probative of the incidence of fraud. 66 IR 1012 (1989). As discussed earlier, Commissioner Nelson cited the 30% figure anyway, and IMFA was enacted into law. See generally Manwani, 736 F.Supp. at 1372-73.

Skepticism about the actual levels of marriage fraud, combined with questions about the severity and the rationality of various IMFA provisions, led to many criticisms. Those criticisms surfaced in constitutional challenges to selected provisions and in legislative reform efforts. Both will be considered below. First, however, it is necessary to describe generally those marriage-related provisions of IMFA that affect the immigration preferences. Passed at the eleventh hour, the statute was replete with ambiguities.

The central core of IMFA was section 2(a), which added a new section 216 to the INA. That provision introduced the concept of "conditional" permanent residence.¹⁹ Whenever a noncitizen receives LPR status as an immediate relative or as a family-sponsored second preference immigrant or as a fiancé of a United States citizen (see chapter 4, § D below), by virtue of a marriage that is less than two years old, the resulting permanent residence will be subject to certain conditions subsequent. INA §§ 216(a)(1), 216(g)(1). Importantly, the provision does not apply to accompanying or following spouses under INA § 203(d). See INA § 216(g)(1).

The conditions subsequent are these: If, at any time during the individual's first two years of permanent residence, the "Attorney General" [now the Secretary of Homeland Security] finds that the marriage was entered into for the purpose of procuring immigrant status, or that the marriage has been judicially annulled or terminated (other than by the spouse's death), or that a fee (other than an attorney fee) was given for the filing of the petition, then permanent resident status is terminated. INA § 216(b)(1). The noncitizen may contest the finding at a removal hearing at which the government will have the burden of proof. INA § 216(b)(2).

Second, the conditional resident and his or her spouse have an affirmative duty to jointly petition for removal of the condition and to appear at an interview in connection with that petition. INA § 216(c). The petition must be filed during the ninety-day period immediately preceding the second anniversary of the person's admission for permanent residence. INA § 216(d)(2)(A). If the joint petition is not filed on time, or if without good cause either spouse fails to appear at the interview, then permanent residence is terminated. INA § 216(c)(2)(A). Through the petition and the interview the noncitizen must establish that the marriage was legally valid, that it has not been judicially annulled or terminated (other than through the death of the noncitizen's spouse), that it was not entered into for immigration purposes, and that no fee (other than an attorney fee) was paid for the filing of the petition. INA §§ 216(c)(3)(A), 216(d)(1). If the decision is favorable, the condition is "removed." INA § 216(c)(3)(B). If the decision is unfavorable, permanent resident status is terminated. INA 19. An analogous concept had appeared in 1965. See Pub.L. 89-236, § 3, 79 Stat. 911, 913 (Oct. 3, 1965) (certain refugees conditionally admitted). See also INA § 216A (conditional residence subsequently established for immigrant entrepreneurs).

§ 216(c)(3)(C). In the latter case, the noncitizen may contest the finding at a removal hearing, where, again, the government has the burden of proof. INA § 216(c)(3)(D).

One who fails to meet these various conditions subsequent may apply for any of several discretionary waivers that were included in IMFA and expanded in the Immigration Act of 1980, § 701. The waiver provisions now appear in INA § 216(c)(4).

One basis for a statutory waiver is a finding that removal would entail “extreme hardship.” INA § 216(c)(4)(A). The statute does not say who must suffer the extreme hardship, but the former INS suggested that the person could be the conditional resident or his or her spouse or dependent child. See 67 IR at 341, Question 57 (1990). “Extreme hardship” is a term of art in immigration law; it is a difficult standard to meet, as you will discover in some detail in another context, former INA § 244(a) (suspension of deportation). See chapter 8, § A.1.b.ii below.

A second discretionary waiver covers certain cases in which the marriage was terminated but the conditional resident was not “at fault” in failing to satisfy the conditions subsequent. INA § 216(c)(4)(B). And a third discretionary waiver covers certain situations involving spouses or children who have been either battered or otherwise subjected to “extreme cruelty.” INA § 216(c)(4)(C). Read section 216(c)(4) now and try to figure out whether paragraph (C) covers any situations not already covered by the amended version of (B).²⁰

Up to now, this discussion of the conditional residence concept has focused exclusively on spouses. IMFA goes a step further. The statute extends also to anyone who acquires permanent resident status “by virtue of being the son or daughter of an individual through a qualifying marriage.” INA §§ 216(a)(1), 216(g)(2).

A related provision, also introduced by IMFA, is INA § 204(a)(2). This provision, which you should read now, places certain restrictions on the person who obtains LPR status by marrying a United States citizen or another LPR and then, after termination of that marriage, marries another noncitizen and seeks family-sponsored second preference status for the latter. What would you assume is the purpose of section 204(a)(2)? See also INA § 204(c) (prior marriage fraud precludes granting of present visa petition).

PROBLEMS 5-11

To do these Problems, you will have to consult the text of INA § 216. For Problems 10 and 11, you will also have to review INA § 204(a)(2).

20. See generally Janet M. Calvo, Spouse-Based Immigration Laws: The Legacies of Coverture, 28 San Diego L.Rev. 593 (1991) (applauding the 1990 amendments but questioning whether they go far enough);

Janet M. Calvo, A Decade of Spouse-Based Immigration Laws: Covertures's Diminishment, But Not Its Demise, 24 Northern Illinois Univ. L. Rev. 153 (2004) (arguing that the same gaps persist).

Problem 5. A, a United States citizen living in Amsterdam, marries B, a noncitizen. Eighteen months later, having decided they would like to live in the United States, they begin the process by filing a “visa petition” with USCIS. Three months after that (i.e., 21 months after the wedding), B receives an immigrant visa. Under INA § 221(c), B has up to six months in which to use that visa to enter the United States. Do A and B need any advice at this point?

Problem 6. C and D, having been married exactly one year, are simultaneously admitted to the United States as LPRs. C is admitted under one of the employment-based preferences and D is admitted as the accompanying husband. One year later, they divorce. D has heard of IMFA and wants to know whether the divorce will affect his immigration status. What would you tell him?

Problem 7. E entered the United States on an immediate relative visa as the wife of F, a naturalized U.S. citizen whom she had married a year and a half earlier. E and F are still happily married, but it is now 23 months since E’s admission and F adamantly refuses to appear for their scheduled interview. E pleads with him to come, but F has traumatic memories of his own contacts with the former INS and simply will not set foot in a government immigration office. What should E do?

Problem 8. G, a citizen of Mexico, would like to immigrate to the United States to live with his father, an LPR who is now elderly and in need of both financial support and daily help. G knows that he could eventually come in under the family-sponsored 2B preference as the unmarried son of an LPR, but in Mexico that queue is many years long and G feels his father needs him now. G therefore arranges a sham marriage to H, a United States citizen, enters the United States on an immediate relative visa a few months later, moves in with his father, and immediately divorces H. Twenty-one months after G’s admission, his father is still alive and in much the same condition. G seeks advice as to what he should do now.

Problem 9. J is admitted to the United States as an LPR on the basis of her one-year-old marriage to K, a United States citizen. A year after her admission, the marriage breaks down irretrievably. J is a devout Roman Catholic whose personal religious convictions preclude her petitioning for divorce, and her vindictive husband will neither initiate divorce proceedings himself nor join in her future petition to remove the conditions on her resident status. What advice do you give J?²¹

Problem 10. L marries M, a United States citizen, and six months later attains conditional LPR status as an immediate relative based on that marriage. Two years after her admission, the conditions on L’s status are removed. Six months after that, L and M divorce. A month later, L marries N, a noncitizen whom she had dated before meeting M. She then immediately files a petition to classify N as a family-sponsored 2A immigrant. Should the petition be granted?

21. Thanks are owed to immigration attorney James Acoba for the idea for this Problem.

Problem 11. P marries Q, a United States citizen, and six months later attains conditional LPR status on the basis of that marriage. Two years after her admission, the conditions on P's status are removed. A year and a day later, P applies for naturalization, which an LPR who has lived in marital union with a citizen for three years (and satisfies other requirements) may receive. She receives naturalization one year after that. The very next day she leaves her husband and files for divorce. The divorce becomes final six months later. One day after the divorce becomes final, she marries R, a noncitizen whom she had dated before meeting Q, and files a petition to classify R as an immediate relative. Should the petition be granted?

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. What is your reaction to the IMFA conditions? When a person attains LPR status by virtue of marriage, should that status terminate if the marriage breaks down within two years?

2. If there is to be a condition subsequent, should the two-year probation period begin when the parties marry or when the noncitizen beneficiary receives LPR status?

3. The former INS took the position that, if the spouses were separated and the marriage was "in the process of being dissolved," the petition to remove the conditions should not be approved—even if the marriage was valid at its inception. 67 IR at 338, Question 32 (1990). That the marriage is "no longer viable," in other words, was thought to be a ground for denying the petition. Id. Eventually the INS retreated, acknowledging that "non-viability" is not a basis for refusing to remove the conditions on one's conditional status. See Opinion of the INS General Counsel, reproduced in 69 IR at 80-82 (Jan. 13, 1992). Which position is more compatible with the statutory text?

The former INS also argued that, even if there were no plans to divorce, a separation with no foreseeable reconciliation would make it "difficult to prove that the marriage was not entered into for immigration purposes," although still "possible * * * under the right set of circumstances." Id., Question 38. Do you agree?

4. INA § 216(g)(1)(B) expressly exempts from the conditional residence requirements spouses accompanying or following to join preference immigrants under section 203(d). Why?

Although the conditional residence program has always been the centerpiece of IMFA, another of its provisions once generated the most controversy. IMFA § 5, among other things, added section 204(h) [now 204(g)] to the INA. In its original 1986 form, this provision read:

(h) * * * [A visa] petition may not be approved to grant an alien immediate relative status or preference status by reason of a marriage which was entered into during [removal proceedings], until the alien has resided outside the United States for a 2-year period beginning after the date of the marriage.

The premise of IMFA § 5 was that noncitizens who marry either United States citizens or LPRs during removal proceedings are especially likely to have married for immigration purposes. Congress's hope was that, by preventing the noncitizen from using the marriage even to initiate the immigration process until he or she has left the country for two years after the marriage, Congress would discourage fraudulent "eleventh hour" marriages. The United States citizen or LPR spouse might need to stay in the United States during that period for employment or other reasons, but if the marriage was strong enough to withstand two years of early separation, the thinking went, then it probably was not sham.

Many practitioners and commentators attacked IMFA § 5 as unnecessarily harsh, unduly rigid, and even irrational. See, e.g., Charles Gordon, The Marriage Fraud Act of 1986, 4 Georgetown Immigration L.J. 183 (1990); Tucker, note 18 above. Several lawsuits challenged its constitutionality. The arguments included equal protection (distinctions irrational), deprivation of a fundamental right to marry, procedural due process (no opportunity to demonstrate genuineness of marriage), and irrebuttable presumption (conclusively presumes marriage formed while deportation proceedings pending is sham). The leading litigator in these cases was Lucas Guttentag, on behalf of the ACLU. His and Judy Rabinovitz's successful trial brief in Manwani v. INS, 736 F.Supp. 1367 (W.D.N.C.1990), stressed the absence of evidence that the targeted marriages were particularly likely to be fraudulent and the ways (discussed below) in which IMFA § 5 rewarded the clever while punishing those who were innocent but less savvy.

The court in Manwani agreed. Despite the broad deference courts usually accord Congress in immigration cases, see chapter 2, the court found IMFA § 5 irrational in its actual operation and struck it down on both due process and equal protection grounds. Most of the other courts that have addressed the constitutionality of IMFA § 5 have upheld it because of Congress's plenary power over immigration.²² As discussed on pp. 94-95 above, these disparate results frequently reflected differing views about the characterization of IMFA § 5 as substantive or procedural.

Constitutional concerns aside, the forceful criticisms of IMFA § 5 eventually bore legislative fruit. Senator Paul Simon, the principal sponsor of IMFA, had conceded even before those court decisions that, in section 5, 22. See, e.g., Azizi v. Thornburgh, 908 Attorney General, 872 F.2d 147 (6th Cir. F.2d 1130 (2d Cir.1990); Anetekhai v. INS, 1989). 876 F.2d 1218 (5th Cir.1989); Almario v.

* * * we may have gone too far and are now infringing on the rights of those U.S. citizens and alien spouses who marry out of true love and respect for each other. * * *

* * * [T]he American citizen should not be placed in the situation of having to choose between his or her country, career, and other family on the one hand and moving away to a foreign land where he or she may not know the language and customs or be able to work for a 2-year period on the other in order to live with the new spouse.

134 Cong.Rec. S1625 (daily ed. Feb. 29, 1988). He therefore urged the outright repeal of IMFA § 5. Id.

Congress was not willing to go that far, but in section 702 of the Immigration Act of 1990 Congress accepted a compromise that had been suggested in the Guttentag and Rabinovitz brief, at 72. Congress permitted the affected noncitizens to avoid the two-year foreign residence requirement by proving the genuineness of their marriages (and certain other facts) by “clear and convincing evidence.” The portion of INA § 204(g) that incorporates section 245(e)(3) reflects that change.

NOTES AND QUESTIONS ON MARRIAGES DURING REMOVAL PROCEEDINGS

1. For those who can supply “clear and convincing evidence” that their marriages are genuine, the 1990 amendment solves the problem. But what about those who cannot, or those who are not confident that the government will find their evidence “clear and convincing?” In their brief, Guttentag and Rabinovitz describe one vehicle for avoiding IMFA § 5: marrying outside the United States after removal proceedings are completed and then applying for LPR status on the basis of the marriage.²³ But what if the noncitizen marries during the pendency of removal proceedings and then learns of IMFA § 5? One of the ironic consequences of this provision has been that it has prompted happily married couples to divorce, remarry each other outside the United States after removal proceedings have been completed, and then seek LPR status on the basis of those latter marriages. Does that strategy work? The former INS said no, if the divorce was a “sham”—i.e., obtained solely for the purpose of evading IMFA § 5. If, in contrast, the divorce resulted from “genuine marital discord,” then a bona fide remarriage will qualify. See 66 IR at 637, 638–40 (1989). Ironically, the parties to a roller-coaster marriage might thus have an easier path to family unification than do the parties to a more stable marriage.²⁴

23. As you will see later, removal orders themselves bar readmission for varying numbers of years, although the bar is waivable. INA § 212(a)(6)(B). The noncitizen who contemplates future return therefore typically requests “voluntary departure,” which the various immigration authorities have the discretion to grant in many cases in lieu of removal. INA § 240B.

24. See also Legal Opinion of (then) Acting General Counsel Paul W. Virtue, Nov. 10, 1990, reproduced in 66 IR at 1422–27 (1989) (same position concerning annulment); cf. Matter of Aldecoaotalora, 18 I. & N.

Immigration attorney Harvey Kaplan, who chaired the AILA Task Force on Marriage Fraud Amendments, argued (before the 1990 amendments were enacted) that in these cases the divorce or annulment might reflect the reality that “the marriage could not endure under the present circumstances” and thus should be seen as having been undertaken for reasons broader than simply obtaining immigration benefits. Harvey Kaplan, Immigration Marriage Fraud Practice Advisory, Feb. 1990 AILA Monthly Mailing 77, 78. Divorce, in other words, might have been the only way to save the marriage! First, do you agree with Kaplan? Second, even if a divorce or annulment is found to have been obtained solely for immigration purposes, does it follow that it should not be recognized for those purposes?

2. You will soon discover some of the ethical issues that arise when a client wants an attorney’s help in attaining or extending nonimmigrant status and the attorney suspects, but is not sure, that the client fully intends to remain permanently. See chapter 4, § F.1 below. Many analogous issues surface when the attorney suspects marriage fraud. To what extent is the attorney expected to investigate the truth of the client’s representations? What information should the attorney disclose to the government? How strong must the lawyer’s suspicions be before it would be unethical to assist the client? When, in marriage fraud cases, does the immigration lawyer need to worry about either professional disciplinary sanctions or criminal liability for fraud? The answers unfortunately are not clear. You might wish to revisit these questions after you have examined the applicable ethics principles in chapter 4, § F.1 below. See generally Comment, Ethical Problems in Representing Aliens Applying for Visas Based on Marriages to United States Citizens, 28 Santa Clara L.Rev. 709 (1988).

3. Given all the legal and ethical issues concerning the technical validity and factual genuineness of marriages, and given the stability of many unions not formalized by marriage, should the immigration laws simply repeal all references to “spouses” and replace them with references to intimate unions that are intended to be permanent?

4. IMFA also made a fraudulent immigration marriage a criminal offense. For a strong argument against criminalizing selected marriages, see Maria Isabel Medina, The Criminalization of Immigration Law: Employer Sanctions and Marriage Fraud, 5 George Mason L. Rev. 669, 696–717 (1997).

3. OTHER FAMILY MEMBERS

United States immigration law extends preferential treatment to several family members other than spouses. “Parents” and “children” of United States citizens are included in the “immediate relative” definition, INA § 201(b)(2)(A)(i), and a “child” who is accompanying or following to join a preference immigrant also receives preference, INA § 203(d). The various family-sponsored preference categories refer to “sons and daughters” and to “brothers and sisters.” INA § 203(a). In later chapters you will also see ways in which certain family members of citizens or of LPRs are made eligible for special treatment in the contexts of removal and naturalization.

Dec. 430 (BIA 1983) (divorce solely for purpose of making noncitizen “unmarried” son or daughter of LPR under second preference will not be recognized).

United States law accords no preference to relatives other than the family members just mentioned. Many other countries do. Canada, for example, provides preferences for grandparents, grandchildren, nieces, and nephews, and even allows the Canadian citizen who has no foreign relatives in that list to sponsor one more distant “relative.” François Crépeau & Kinga Janik, Comparative Study on Immigration and Social Transformation—Canada 25–35 (2004); J. Donald Galloway, Immigration Law 142–52 (1997). British law allows the immigration of certain dependent grandparents, uncles, and aunts. Statement of Changes in Immigration Rules, 14 June 1989, paras. 56, 57.

The word “child,” defined in INA § 101(b)(1), has presented particular difficulties for immigration practitioners. A “child” must be unmarried and under age 21. Id. Beyond those requirements, however, are a number of commonly applicable restrictions involving children born out of wedlock, stepchildren, and adopted children. As you will also see, the definition of “child” affects the classification of a person as a “son or daughter,” a “parent,” and, as the following case illustrates, a “brother or sister.” Before reading Mourillon, study carefully INA § 101(b)(1).

Matter of Mourillon

Board of Immigration Appeals, 1981.
18 I. & N. Dec. 122.

This matter is before the Board on appeal from the District Director’s decision of April 9, 1980, denying the petition to classify the beneficiary as the sister of a United States citizen under section 203(a)(5) [now 203(a)(4)—Eds.] of the Immigration and Nationality Act. The appeal will be sustained.

The petitioner is a 52-year-old citizen of the United States who was born out of wedlock in the British West Indies on December 16, 1928. His parents never married, and only a few months after his birth his mother left the household, never to return. The petitioner and his father subsequently immigrated to Curacao, Netherlands Antilles (Dutch West Indies). There, on July 22, 1942, his father married, and they all lived together as a family unit until the petitioner came to the United States in late 1954. In September 1953, the beneficiary was born in Curacao to the petitioner’s father and stepmother. The petitioner and beneficiary have apparently continued to maintain their family ties, with the record reflecting that the beneficiary came to the United States in 1971 as a nonimmigrant student and was residing with the petitioner at the time the instant petition was filed on October 30, 1974.

The District Director correctly noted that in order to establish the existence of a sibling relationship the petitioner must show that he and the beneficiary are, or once were, "children" of a common "parent" within the meaning of section 101(b)(1) and (2) of the Act. The District Director then examined the relationship of the petitioner and beneficiary through their father, and concluded that they did not qualify as siblings under the Act because the petitioner was illegitimate and had not been legitimated by his father. Therefore, he denied the petition.

On appeal, the petitioner asserts that he was legitimated by his father according to the law of Curacao, Netherlands Antilles. He also argues that he and the beneficiary are qualified siblings by virtue of their relationship through their other common parent, their stepmother/mother.

The petitioner has now submitted for the record certain provisions of Title XII, Book I of the Civil Code of Curacao ("the Code") which pertain to paternity and filiation in Curacao, Netherlands Antilles. The petitioner contends that under either the legitimation provisions of Title XII, section 2, or the acknowledgment provisions of section 3 of that title, he qualifies as a legitimated child under section 101(b)(1)(C) of the Act. A careful examination of these provisions reveals that this argument is without merit.

Under section 2 of the Code, legitimation of a child born out of wedlock occurs only by the subsequent marriage of the natural parents together with a prior or contemporaneous acknowledgment of the child. Upon legitimation, the child acquires the same rights as if he were legitimate at birth. Thus, it is clear that because the petitioner's natural parents never married he has not been legitimated under the law of Curacao, Netherlands Antilles.

As for the petitioner's acknowledgment claim, we note preliminarily that the general rule outside of communist-bloc countries is that acknowledgment alone does not constitute legitimation; there must also be a subsequent marriage of the natural parents. A "legitimated" child is one placed "in all respects upon the same footing as if begotten and born in wedlock." Only where acknowledgment places the child in the same status as a legitimated child will acknowledgment be deemed the equivalent of legitimation. Such is not the case here. Acknowledgment under section 3 of the Code merely creates "civil rights" between the acknowledged child and his parents. While this term is apparently not defined, the acknowledgment provision, unlike the preceding legitimation provision, does not declare that an acknowledged child enjoys the same rights as if he were born legitimate. Therefore, it must be said that because the law of the Netherlands Antilles does not place an acknowledged child in the same status as a legitimated child, it does not make acknowledgment the equivalent of legitimation. This conclusion also finds support in the fact that because the law of the Netherlands Antilles specifically differentiates between acknowledgment and legitimation in the two statutory provisions it is reasonable to presume, absent an affirmative showing to the contrary, that the law does not create a distinction without a difference. ("[A] statute should not be construed in such a way as to render certain provisions superfluous or insignificant.”)

In view of the foregoing, we find that the petitioner does not qualify as a legitimated child under section 101(b)(1)(C) of the Act. Therefore, he and the beneficiary do not qualify through their father as “brother” and “sister” * * *.

Turning next to the issue of the petitioner’s relationship to the beneficiary through their stepmother/mother, it is clear that the beneficiary once qualified as the legitimate “child” of her mother under section 101(b)(1)(A) of the Act. As for the petitioner, section 101(b)(1)(B) defines the term “child” as an unmarried person under the age of 21 years who is a “stepchild, whether or not born out of wedlock, provided the child had not reached the age of eighteen years at the time the marriage creating the status of stepchild occurred.” Here, the petitioner’s natural father married when the petitioner was 13 years of age, thus giving rise to a valid stepmother/stepchild relationship under the Act. Therefore, * * * at the time of the beneficiary’s birth she and the petitioner were qualified siblings as the “children” of a common “parent.”

One further issue remains. Unlike consanguineous relationships, step-relationships can be terminated by the death or divorce of the parties whose marriage created the step-relationship. Thus, in the case of stepsiblings it is appropriate to determine not only whether the petitioner and beneficiary were once the “children” of a common “parent,” but also whether the marriage which created the step-relationships still exists at the time the visa petition to accord the stepsibling classification is being considered. Where that marriage does still exist, the stepsibling relationship likewise continues to exist. Difficulties arise, however, where this is not the case.

In the context of stepparent and stepchild, we recently held that where the parties to the marriage which created that step-relationship have legally separated or where the marriage has been terminated by divorce or death, the appropriate inquiry is whether a family relationship has continued to exist as a matter of fact between the stepparent and stepchild. A similar inquiry is no less appropriate in the case of stepsiblings. Accordingly, we hold that in order to qualify as stepsiblings either (1) the marriage which created the step-relationships must continue to exist, or (2) where the parties to that marriage have legally separated or the marriage has been terminated by death or divorce, a family relationship must continue to exist as a matter of fact between the “stepsiblings.” Whether the stepsiblings continue to maintain a family relationship is a question of fact which must be determined under the particular circumstances of each case.

Here, the record does not clearly show whether the petitioner’s father and the beneficiary’s mother are still alive and remain married. Nevertheless, as noted earlier, the record reflects that the petitioner and the beneficiary do continue to maintain their family relationship, including the fact that the beneficiary has lived with the petitioner during her stay in the United States as a nonimmigrant student. Therefore, it has been established that they were “children” of a common “parent” and that their relationship as stepbrother and stepsister continues to exist. Accordingly, the beneficiary qualifies as the petitioner’s sister under section 203(a)(5) of the Act.

ORDER: The appeal is sustained and the petition is approved.

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. You might have been struck by the fact that the petitioner in Mourillon could not qualify as the child of his biological father, who raised him, even though, as soon as the father married another woman, the petitioner instantly became her child! That peculiar result flowed from a statutory provision, in effect until 1986, that disallowed petitions based on a father/child relationship when the child was born out of wedlock. As you saw in chapter 2, the Supreme Court rejected an equal protection challenge to that provision in Fiallo v. Bell, 430 U.S. 787, 97 S.Ct. 1473, 52 L.Ed.2d 50 (1977). In 1986, however, Congress amended the provision, INA § 101(b)(1)(D), to allow such a petition “if the father has or had a bona fide parent-child relationship with the person.” Act of Nov. 6, 1986, Pub.L. 99-603, § 315(a), 100 Stat. 3359, 3439.²⁵ The Supreme Court has recently upheld analogous gender-based distinctions in the criteria for citizenship by descent. Nguyen v. INS, 533 U.S. 53, 121 S.Ct. 2053, 150 L.Ed.2d 115 (2001).

Why do you suppose the immigration laws attach restrictions to the father/out-of-wedlock child relationship but not to the mother/out-of-wedlock child relationship? Do you think that newer technologies such as (a) DNA testing and (b) gestational surrogacy affect the justifications for that distinction?²⁶

2. How would Mourillon have come out if the present version of section 101(b)(1)(D) had then been in force? Also, suppose Mourillon’s father had deserted him at birth and Mourillon had never met or communicated with his father or his father’s wife. What result under the present law?

3. Even a person who was born out of wedlock will be recognized as a “child” for immigration purposes if he or she has been “legitimated” under the law of either the child’s or the father’s residence or domicile. The legitimation must take place before the child turns 18 and while the legitimating parent or parents have legal custody.²⁷

25. For a discussion of the factors and the evidence relevant to whether a bona fide parent-child relationship exists, see Matter of Pineda, 20 I. & N.Dec. 70 (BIA 1989); Matter of Vizcaino, 19 I. & N.Dec. 644 (BIA 1988); 8 CFR § 204.2(d)(2)(iii) (2008).

26. As to the latter, see Bernard Friedland & Valerie Epps, The Changing Family and the U.S. Immigration Laws: The Impact of Medical Reproductive Technology on the Immigration and Nationality Act’s Definition of the Family, 11 Georgetown Immigration L.J. 429 (1997).

27. INA § 101(b)(1)(C). See generally Paul W. Schmidt, Immigration Benefits for Children Born Out of Wedlock and for their Natural Fathers: A Survey of the Law, 16 San Diego L.Rev. 11, 20-28 (1978).

As noted in Mourillon, legitimation requires that the child be placed “in all respects upon the same footing as if begotten and born in wedlock.” In De Los Santos v. INS, 690 F.2d 56 (2d Cir.1982), the law of the Dominican Republic allowed “natural filiation” by the father’s acknowledgment of paternity or by court decision. Natural filiation created in the child the same rights as a legitimate child except that, if the parent died intestate, the “filiated” child would receive a lesser share of the estate than would a legitimate child. Because of that exception, the court held that a child “filiated” under Dominican law has not been legitimated for purposes of the United States immigration laws.

Why would the courts interpret “legitimation” to require legal parity with children born in wedlock? Think particularly about why Congress would restrict the recognition of children born out of wedlock at all and why it would exempt “legitimated” children from those restrictions.

4. The legacies of United States involvement in the Korean War and later in Vietnam included the “Amerasian” children fathered by American soldiers. In many cases the non-Asian lineage of the children was obvious from their facial features but the American fathers either could not be identified or were unwilling to accept custody. Even if the father was willing to bring the child to the United States and the mother was willing to accept that arrangement, the legitimacy restrictions on the definition of “child” often proved insurmountable. Feeling a special responsibility toward these children, Congress in 1982 enacted legislation to permit their immigration and their placement in the homes of American sponsors. Act of Oct. 22, 1982, Pub.L. 97-359, 96 Stat. 1716. The precise requirements appear in INA § 204(f).

5. Having dismissed the legitimation claim, the Board in Mourillon turns to the alternative claim based on the step-relationship. Here the Board is willing to recognize a step-relationship even if the marriage that created it has since terminated, but only if the step-relationship continues “as a matter of fact.” Conversely, in Palmer v. Reddy, 622 F.2d 463 (9th Cir.1980), the court held that, as long as the marriage had taken place before the child turned 18, and the marriage was still intact, a step-relationship would be found even if there was no parent-child relationship in fact. The BIA now accepts the holding in Palmer. See Matter of McMillan, 17 I. & N. Dec. 605 (BIA 1981).

6. In Mourillon the legitimation and stepchild issues were relevant because for immigration purposes two people will be considered siblings only if they were once “children” of a common parent. That rule is well settled. See, e.g., Matter of May, 18 I. & N. Dec. 381 (BIA 1983). Thus, if one of the alleged siblings was never a child of the claimed common parent because, for example, the claimed step-relationship rested on a marriage that took place after the “child” had turned 18, a sibling relationship does not exist. Matter of Garner, 15 I. & N. Dec. 215 (BIA 1975). If each of the two purported siblings can identify a time when he or she was the “child” of the common parent, however, the two will be siblings even though there was no point in time at which both siblings met the child definition simultaneously. Matter of Gur, 16 I. & N. Dec. 123 (BIA 1977). The BIA in Mourillon seems to have accepted this interpretation sub silentio; the petitioner turned 21 before the beneficiary was born, yet the Board ultimately found them to be siblings. You will see illustrations of those interpretations in the Problems below.

7. The “child” definition becomes relevant not only when a petition is filed on behalf of the child or the child’s sibling, but in other cases as well. To be someone’s “son or daughter,” a noncitizen must at one time have been that person’s “child.” Matter of Martinez, 18 I. & N. Dec. 399, 400 (BIA 1983). Similarly, a noncitizen can qualify as a person’s “parent” only if that person was at one time the noncitizen’s “child.” See INA § 101(b)(2); Chiamonte v. INS, 626 F.2d 1093, 1100 (2d Cir.1980).

8. INA 101(a)(27)(J) confers “special immigrant” status on a noncitizen juvenile who has been “declared dependent on a juvenile court located in the United States” and has been committed to long-term foster care because of “abuse, neglect, or abandonment.” The statute further requires a showing that “it would not be in the alien’s best interest” to be returned to the home country, the consent of the Attorney General, and certain other conditions. Professor David Thronson observes that this provision is the only place where the INA currently adopts a “best interest of the child” standard. He makes a strong argument for extending that standard throughout immigration law and entrusting its implementation to persons with child welfare expertise rather than immigration law enforcement officials. See David B. Thronson, Kids Will Be Kids? Reconsidering Conceptions of Children’s Rights Underlying Immigration Law, 63 Ohio State L.J. 979 (2002). Moreover, Professor Thronson argues in a later piece, family courts will generally provide a better forum than immigration courts for making those determinations. David B. Thronson, Choiceless Choices: Deportation and the Parent–Child Relationship, 6 Nevada L.J. 1165 (2006). See also Angela Lloyd, Regulating Consent: Protecting Undocumented Immigrant Children from their (Evil) Step–Uncle Sam, or How to Ameliorate the Impact of the 1997 Amendments to the SIJ Law, 15 Boston Univ. Public Interest L.J. 237 (2006).

PROBLEMS 12–15

For some of these Problems, you will again need to refer to the Visa Office chart on page 254 above.

Problem 12. A and her eighteen-year-old daughter B (from a prior marriage) are citizens of Turkey. A marries C, an LPR living in the United States. Can A and B immigrate?

Problem 13. D and her daughter E (who was born out of wedlock) are also citizens of Turkey. E’s biological father, F, is a United States citizen. He deserted D before E’s birth and has never communicated with D or E, although they know his whereabouts. When E was seventeen, D married G, who had just been admitted to the United States a few days earlier as an LPR. D and E delayed initiating the immigration process because D needed to stay in Turkey to care for her ailing father. D's father died one year later (at E's age 18), and D and E would now like to immigrate to the United States. What is their best strategy?

Problem 14. While H and J were married, H fathered a child by K, a single woman. All three adults were citizens and residents of Iceland. H and J remained married, and H avoided all contact with his and K's child, whom they named "L." Eventually L grew up, at age 25 married a United States citizen, and entered the United States as an immediate relative. At age 31 she became a naturalized citizen. H learned of this and now wonders whether L (if she is willing to help) might be his and his wife's ticket to LPR status in the United States. Is she? See Matter of Fong, 17 I. & N. Dec. 212 (BIA 1980).

Problem 15. N is the legitimate son of M. N's mother (M's wife) died during childbirth. P is the mother of Q, who was born out of wedlock. At a time when N was 22 and Q was 8, M and P married. N was later admitted to the United States as an LPR and eventually attained naturalization. Q is now 18 and would like to immigrate to the United States. M and P are still married. Q's only American "relative" is N. May Q immigrate? See Matter of Gur, 16 I. & N. Dec. 123 (BIA 1977).

NOTE ON FOREIGN ADOPTIONS

Americans who want to adopt U.S.-born children often experience the anguish and frustration of long waits and near misses. The difficulties are rooted in the laws of supply and demand: The number of American couples (and singles) who would like to adopt healthy children far exceeds the number of children available.²⁸

For many, the solution has been foreign adoptions, particularly from third world countries in which families are often unable to support unwanted children, orphanages are poorly funded, and either economic realities or cultural taboos hinder domestic adoptions. In those cases, foreign adoptions serve the needs of both the children and the adoptive parents.

But the availability of foreign children is highly sensitive to international developments, a fact highlighted not too long ago by events in South Korea. For years, South Korea was regarded as the foreign adoption capital of the world. From 1960 to 1990, approximately 160,000 Korean children were adopted by foreigners, roughly half of them Americans. Washington Times, March 13, 1990 at A10. In early 1990, however, South Korea announced its intention to phase out its foreign adoption program. Washington Times, March 13, 1990, at A10.

The 1988 Seoul Olympics, which focused world attention on South Korea, partly precipitated this change. Many Koreans were embarrassed by the image that it could not take adequate care of its own children. At the same time, declining birth rates, enhanced prosperity, and greater cultural acceptance of domestic adoptions reduced the need to place Korean children with foreigners. New York Times, Feb. 12, 1990, at B10; Christian Science Monitor, Feb. 28, 1990, at 13. Fears were also fanned by (unfounded) rumors that Americans were importing Korean children to obtain body organs for transplants. Washington Times, March 13, 1990, at A10.

²⁸. Renee Schoof, More U.S. Couples Adopting Abroad (A.P. release, Jan. 9, 1999); Associated Press, Barriers cause drop in foreign adoptions by Americans (Jan. 7, 2007).

When Korean adoptions dried up, Americans turned increasingly to India, Thailand, the Philippines, Brazil and Colombia. But changes in national outlooks made those and other sources volatile. A new wave of religious fundamentalism in India, for example, discouraged some social workers there from placing Indian children in American homes. New York Times, Feb. 12, 1990, at B10. For various reasons, Brazil reduced foreign adoptions of its children. Christian Science Monitor, May 22, 1990, at 11. Romanian orphanages overflowed with abandoned children because of Ceausescu's ban on contraception; the inadequate health care and nutrition left huge numbers of those orphaned babies diseased and close to death. In the post-Ceausescu era, the authorities nonetheless turned the spigot on and off at will. See Washington Post, July 15, 1990, at D1, D9.

In the early 1990's, China became the largest source country for international adoptions by American parents. Then China too tightened its rules, scrutinizing prospective parents more intensively and awarding healthy Chinese babies only to childless couples over age 35. Kristina Sauerwein, Stricter Adoption Laws Benefit Children, Experts Say, St. Louis Post-Dispatch, Dec. 8, 1996, at 7A. See also Pam Belluck & Jim Yardley, China Tightens Adoption Rules for Foreigners, New York Times, Dec. 20, 2006, at A1, A24 (China remains largest source country of U.S. adoptions but is cutting back).

Starting in the mid-1990s, however, international adoptions in the United States began to soar. In 1998 China loosened many of its restrictions. Renee Schoof, More U.S. Couples Adopting Abroad (AP, Jan. 9, 1999). In fiscal year 2003 China once again became the largest source country for the U.S. adoption of orphaned children, with 6638 adoptions (despite a temporary suspension of foreign adoptions that year because of SARS, see 80 IR 755 (May 23, 2003)). Of those, more than 95% were girls. See 2003 Yearbook of Immigration Statistics, Table 10 at 37-38. The gender imbalance surely reflects the interaction of China's one-child policies with the Chinese public's cultural and economic preferences for sons.

The reasons for those recent increases in U.S. international adoptions were varied, and they appeared to augur continued growth. One expert pointed to the increasing scarcity of healthy white infants in the United States. (In the mid-1990s, "fewer than 2% of unwed white mothers gave their children up for adoption," compared to almost 20% in 1973. See Cheryl Wetzstein, Foreign Adoptions Grow to Record Level, Wash. Times (Dec. 6, 2002)). Secondly, U.S. adults became increasingly willing to adopt children of different races. Id. In addition, children available for international adoption tend to be younger than those available in the United States through the foster care system. Id. Still, the conditions that turn foreign children into orphans remain distressing. AIDS alone has produced almost 8 million African orphans, many of whom are themselves HIV-positive. See Schoof, above.

In the early 2000s, however, the numbers began to slow. In fiscal year 2007 China remained the largest foreign source country for U.S. adoption of orphaned children with 5,397 (out of a worldwide total of 19,471). After China came Guatemala (4,721), Russia (2,301), and Ethiopia (1,203). See 2007 Yearbook of Immigration Statistics, Table 12. More than 80% of the adopted children were ages 4 or under. Id.

A number of factors have played a role in the slowdown. Some trace the changes to a combination of international safeguards established by the Hague Convention (discussed below), financial strains on adoption agencies, and new bureaucratic obstacles erected by some of the more important source countries. See Dan Frosch, New Rules and Economy Strain Adoption Agencies, New York Times (May 11, 2008), at A16, A21. Still, the situation is dynamic and unpredictable.

Apart from foreign restrictions, prospective adoptive parents in the United States must consider the requirements of the American immigration laws. Until 1957 this country's laws did not bestow immigration benefits on adopted children at all. See 3 Gordon, Mailman, & Yale-Loehr § 36.04[6][a]. The fear was that "sham" adoptions could be arranged to evade the immigrant quotas.

In 1957, Congress amended the "child" definition to include certain adopted children. Act of Sept. 11, 1957, Pub.L. 85-316, § 2, 71 Stat. 639. In 1961, Congress added a separate permanent provision for the admission of "orphan" children. Act of Sept. 26, 1961, Pub.L. 87-301, 75 Stat. 650.

Express restrictions aimed at preventing fraud remain. Under the adopted child provision (subsection E), the child has to have been adopted while under age 16, and has to have been in the legal custody of, and have resided with, the adopting parent for at least two years. Further, the biological parents may not thereafter receive any immigration benefits by virtue of such parentage. Id. Adoptive parents may be anyone eligible to petition generally for the immigration of their children—i.e., either United States citizens or LPRs.

In addition to the express statutory requirements, the BIA has read in a general requirement analogous to that used in marriage cases: The adoption must not have been entered into solely for immigration purposes. Matter of Marquez, 20 I. & N.Dec. 160 (BIA 1990). The BIA scrutinizes especially closely when the adopting parent is a close relative, particularly if a biological parent continues to live in the same household as the child and the adopting parent. See, e.g., id.; Matter of Cuello, 20 I. & N.Dec. 94 (BIA 1989).

Under the "orphan" provision (subsection F), certain United States citizens (not LPRs) may petition for the admission of children under age 16 who have experienced the death, disappearance, or abandonment of both parents or sometimes just one parent.

At least up to now, these provisions (as amended from time to time) have been the two primary vehicles for adopting foreign children and bringing them to the United States. The provisions are codified as INA §§ 101(b)(1)(E and F), respectively.

There is now a third, international method for overseas adoptions in the United States. In recent years, the international community has become increasingly concerned with child abduction, trafficking of kidnapped children, and other forms of abuse. After extensive negotiation, many of the world's leading source countries and destination countries for adopted children signed the Hague Convention on Protection of Children and Co-Operation in Respect of Intercountry Adoption, 32 I.L.M. 1134 (1993). The Convention requires certain minimum procedures designed to protect children, biological parents, and adoptive parents. Following ratification of the treaty by the United States Senate, Congress in 2000 enacted the necessary implementing legislation. Intercountry Adoption Act of 2000, Pub. L. 106-279, 114 Stat. 825 (Oct. 6, 2000). The new law assigns primary regulatory responsibility for foreign adoptions to the State Department and expands slightly the range of children whom United States citizen parents may bring to the United States from other states parties. For the details, see INA § 101(b)(1)(G). In the meantime, the treaty itself went into force for the U.S. on April 1, 2008; it will now govern all intercountry adoptions (both incoming and outgoing) between the United States and other nations. See 85 IR 1085 (Apr. 7, 2008).

A final, practical consideration: Foreign adoptions are not cheap. The adopting parents must be willing to pay the legal fees of foreign and American lawyers, adoption agency fees, and travel expenses. Typical costs range from $7,000 to $25,000 (in contrast to domestic adoptions through the foster care system, where the costs range from nominal to $2,500, and also in contrast to private domestic adoptions, with costs of $4,000 to $30,000). Wetzstein, above.

One difficult issue has been when to permit the biological mother of a child born out of wedlock to release her child for foreign adoption without the consent of the biological father, if the mother is unable to provide proper care. On the one hand, the father might well have disappeared or otherwise become either unable or unwilling to consent; allowing unilateral release can therefore be essential. On the other hand, there will always be cases in which the father should be permitted to assert parental rights. For a helpful discussion of Congress's 1995 resolution of this problem, see Kathleen M. Sullivan, Congress Streamlines Procedures for Certain Intercountry "Orphan" Adoptions, 1 BIB #3 (1996).²⁹

29. For more detail on the immigration of adopted or orphaned children, see generally 2 Gordon, Mailman & Yale-Loehr § 36.04[6,7]; Kathleen M. Sullivan, Intercountry Adoption Act Becomes Law, 5 BIB 977 (Dec. 1, 2000); Aarti Kohli & Kathleen M. Sullivan, Intercountry Adoption: A Practitioner's Update, July 2001 Immigration Briefings.

4. FAMILY UNIFICATION POLICY IN PERSPECTIVE

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. Is family-based immigration “nepotism,” a word some immigration restriction organizations like to use? Or is it a legitimate basis for immigration preference?

2. There has been much debate over the continuation and level of the sibling (family-sponsored fourth) preference. Some have criticized the sibling preference on the ground, among others, that it precipitates “chain” migration: An LPR naturalizes and brings in his or her sibling, who brings in his or her spouse and children, who in turn naturalize and bring in the spouse’s parents and siblings, etc. See, e.g., Panel I, Family-Sponsored Immigration, 4 Georgetown Immigration L.J. 201, 206 (1990) (comments of Dan Stein).³⁰

Apart from the specific issue of chain migration, there has been a sometimes rancorous debate over the division of limited family visas between nuclear family members (principally immediate relatives and the first three family-sponsored preferences) and siblings. Along similar lines, some have argued that even the sons and daughters of United States citizens and of LPRs should be eliminated from the preference categories once those sons and daughters turn 21.

In 1995, the United States Commission on Immigration Reform (often called the Jordan Commission, after its late Chair, Hon. Barbara Jordan) recommended cutting immigration generally and family immigration in particular. As for the latter, the Commission recommended (with Commissioner Warren Leiden dissenting) the repeal of the family-sponsored 1st, 2B, 3rd, and 4th preferences. The only family members who would receive preference under the Commission proposal were those who correspond to immediate relatives and 2A’s. See U.S. Comm’n on Immigration Reform, Legal Immigration: Setting Priorities 45–80 (June 1995).³¹

Would you eliminate the preferences for siblings or for adult sons and daughters?

30. Others acknowledge that such chain migration is theoretically possible but cite studies that question its magnitude. See id. at 211–12 (comments of Cecilia Munoz); Robert Bach & Doris Meissner, America’s Labor Market in the 1990’s: What Role Should Immigration Play? 13–14 (1990). See generally Fred Arnold, Unanswered Questions About the Immigration Multiplier, 23 Internat’l Migration Rev. 889 (1989); Michael S. Teitelbaum, Skeptical Noises about the Immigration Multiplier, 23 Internat’l Migration Rev. 893 (1989).

31. For criticisms, see Linda Kelly, Family Planning: American Style, 52 Alabama L. Rev. 943 (2001) (arguing that the immigration laws should reflect a broader social construction of family, more in keeping with the demise of the nuclear family and the modern realities of nontraditional arrangements); Enid Trucios-Haynes, “Family Values” 1990s Style: U.S. Immigration Reform Proposals and the Abandonment of the Family, 36 Brandeis J. Family L. 241 (1997–98).

3. A source of longstanding frustration for many LPRs has been the lengthy waiting periods that their spouses and minor children must often endure before the family can be reunited. As of April 2009, the family-sponsored worldwide 2A backlog was more than 4 ½ years. See the Visa Office Bulletin on page 254 above. Some have argued that, like the nuclear family members of United States citizens, this group should be classified as immediate relatives and admitted without numerical limit. Then-Professor (later BIA member) John Guendelsberger, in Implementing Family Unification Rights in American Immigration Law: Proposed Amendments, 25 San Diego L.Rev. 253 (1988), argued that the courts should recognize a constitutional right of LPRs to family unity, absent compelling governmental interests to the contrary. He also urged Congress, whether constitutionally compelled or not, to make the spouses and minor children of LPRs immediate relatives. What arguments might you make for or against Professor Guendelsberger's latter proposal if you were testifying before a congressional subcommittee? See Stephen H. Legomsky, Testimony before the Subcommittee on Immigration, Citizenship, Refugees, Border Security, and International Law of the Committee on the Judiciary of the U.S. House of Representatives (Apr. 19, 2007).

4. There have been a number of interesting comparative studies of family unification policies.³²

5. Article 8 of the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms, 213 U.N.T.S. 222 (Nov. 4, 1950), reads as follows:

1. Everyone has the right to respect for his private and family life, his home and his correspondence.

2. There shall be no interference by a public authority with the exercise of this right except such as is in accordance with the law and is necessary in a democratic society in the interests of national security, public safety or the economic well-being of the country, for the prevention of disorder or crime, for the protection of health or morals, or for the protection of the rights and freedoms of others.

The case law of the European Court of Human Rights, binding on all member states of the Council of Europe, has relied on article 8 to limit both the exclusion and the expulsion of noncitizens with family members. For a good summary, see H el ene Lambert, The European Court of Human Rights

32. For comparisons between the United States and France, Germany, and the Caribbean countries, respectively, see John Guendelsberger, The Right to Family Reunification in French and United States Immigration Law, 21 Cornell Internat'l L.J. 1 (1988); Hiroshi Motomura, The Family and Immigration: A Roadmap for the Ruritanian (1995); Leonard Storchevoy, The Right to Family Reunification in the Immigration Law of the Commonwealth Caribbean and the United States: A Comparative Study, 7 Touro Internat'l L. Rev. 177, 203-06 (1997). See generally Nora V. Demleitner, How Much Do Western Democracies Value Family and Marriage?: Immigration Law's Conflicted Answer, 28 UofT L.J. Rev. 273 (2002).

and the Right of Refugees and Other Persons in Need of Protection to Family Reunion, 11 Internat'l J. Refugee L. 427 (1999).

Other sources of international law also constrain family separation in the exclusion and deportation contexts.³³

6. At the beginning of the twenty-first century, it is worth looking back to a time when the United States rules on family immigration were simpler:

[A]ny admissible alien, or any alien heretofore or hereafter legally admitted, or any citizen of the United States, may bring in or send for his father or grandfather over fifty-five years of age, his wife, his mother, his grandmother, or his unmarried or widowed daughter, if otherwise admissible, whether such relative can read or not; and such relative shall be permitted to enter.

Immigration Act of 1917, ch. 29, § 3, para. 3, 39 Stat. 874, 877 (Feb. 5, 1917). Keep in mind that this provision pre-dated numerical quotas; its main significance was that it exempted the named family members from the literacy requirement. The absence of numerical quotas also probably explains why relatives of citizens and relatives of LPRs enjoyed equal priority.

Note also the underlying assumptions about gender. Unmarried female relatives were assumed to be dependent upon their parents, children, or grandchildren; male relatives were not, unless they were elderly. Men could bring in their wives, but women could not bring in their husbands. Children of citizens (and of immigrants) were similarly classified by gender. Nor, in referring to “unmarried or widowed daughters,” did Congress include divorced daughters. Perhaps divorce was still unusual enough that Congress did not spot the issue, or perhaps Congress assumed that divorced daughters would receive alimony from their ex-husbands and thus would have no financial need to immigrate.

C. EMPLOYMENT-BASED IMMIGRATION

In this technological age, Congress has steadily expanded the programs for admitting immigrants on the basis of occupational credentials. The most fundamental of these changes were part of the Immigration Act of 1990. Generally, Congress more than doubled the overall ceiling on employment-based immigrants, expanded the number of qualifying categories, and assigned a higher priority to professional and other highly skilled workers. The same statute sharply reduced the admission of unskilled workers (more 33. See, e.g., Baker v. Minister of Citizenship and Immigration, [1999] 2 S.C.R. 817 (Supreme Court of Canada) (interpreting Convention on the Rights of the Child); Winata & Li v. Australia, UN Doc. CCPR/C/72/D/930/2000 (Human Rights Committee, 2001) (interpreting International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights). For an excellent summary of the international law constraints, with emphasis on refugees' families, see Kate Jastram & Kathleen Newland, Family Unity and Refugee Protection, in Erika Feller et al. (eds.), Refugee Protection in International Law at 555–603 (2003).

on that in a moment). Then, in 2000, Congress exempted most employment-based immigrants from the per-country limits. See page 243 above.

The five employment-based preference categories were summarized earlier on pages 256–57 above. As you have seen, the first three represent skills that Congress believes are needed in the United States. Each of those three preference categories is allocated approximately 40,000 visas—i.e., 120,000 in total—plus any visas not used by the fourth and fifth preference applicants.

The fourth preference is “employment-based” only in the sense that most of its many prongs relate somehow to the individual’s past or present work. Those prongs are generally there to reward special equities, such as religious work or loyal long-term U.S. government employees and Hong Kong embassy employees, rather than to recognize particular skills as needed in the United States. The approximately 10,000 visas allotted to this category are for certain sub-groups of the “special immigrants” defined in INA § 101(a)(27).

The fifth preference is for up to approximately 10,000 entrepreneurs. This group is considered “employment-based” not because of its members’ occupational skills, but because they are expected to create jobs for United States workers.

You should now skim subsections 1–3 of INA § 203(b).

1. THE FIRST THREE PREFERENCES: SUPERSTARS, STARS AND OTHERS

a. GENERAL ELIGIBILITY REQUIREMENTS

Unlike the four family-sponsored preferences, the first three employment-based preferences form a clear pecking order. The first preference is generally reserved for superstars. It includes immigrants with “extraordinary ability in the sciences, arts, education, business or athletics which has been demonstrated by sustained national or international acclaim;” and professors and researchers who are “outstanding.” (Apparently Congress thought “extraordinary” was an unrealistic standard for professors; they need only be “outstanding.”) The one exception to the superstar characterization is a third prong for certain multinational executives and managers; they need not demonstrate any particular level of fame or success. See INA § 203(b)(1).

The regulations define “extraordinary ability” as “a level of expertise indicating that the individual is one of that small percentage who have risen to the very top of the field of endeavor.” 8 CFR § 204.5(h)(2) (2008). The regulations then list numerous types of supporting evidence that the applicant may submit. Id. § 204.5(h)(3, 4).

Major league athletes sometimes apply for first preference status by asserting “extraordinary ability in . . . athletics.” Courts have held on the one hand that major league status does not per se establish extraordinary ability but that, on the other hand, an athlete doesn’t have to be among the best in the league to qualify either. The location of the line is still not clear. If you were the USCIS General Counsel, how would you apply the above regulation? Suppose the applicant is an American League outfielder who typically hits .290 to .300 with 10–12 home runs and is at about the league average in terms of defensive skills. Should he receive first preference status?

The second preference has two prongs: “members of the professions holding advanced degrees or their equivalent” and immigrants with “exceptional ability in the sciences, arts, or business.” INA § 203(b)(2). Where the first preference uses the word “extraordinary,” the latter prong of the second preference uses the word “exceptional.” Moreover, the second prong does not expressly include ability in the fields of education or athletics, although the government generally interprets the “arts” to include athletics.

The second preference differs from the first preference in one other important respect; it generally requires the applicant to demonstrate a job offer from an American employer, INA § 203(b)(2)(A), and to obtain a document called “labor certification” from the Department of Labor, INA § 212(a)(5)(A, C). The latter, discussed in detail in the next subsection, generally requires showings that able, willing, and qualified American workers are not available and that the applicant’s employment will not adversely affect the wages and working conditions of similarly employed United States workers. Id.

For second preference applicants, however, the government has the discretion to waive the job offer requirement in the national interest. INA § 203(b)(2)(B). The regulations assume that a waiver of the job offer requirement also waives the requirement of labor certification. See 8 CFR § 204.5(k)(4)(ii) (2004).

Through most of the 1990s, the former INS granted national interest waivers fairly liberally. See generally Enid Trucios-Haynes, National Interest Waivers, July 1995 Immigration Briefings; Wall Street Journal, Aug. 20, 1998, at 1. In 1998, however, the world of national interest waivers shrank dramatically with the decision of the INS Acting Associate Commissioner in Matter of New York State Dept. of Transportation [NYS DOT], 22 I. & N. Dec. 215 (Aug. 7, 1998). The decision in NYS DOT restricted national interest waivers in several ways. The former INS held it is not enough that the applicant has a particular level of training or education. General arguments about the importance of a given field or the urgency of a given issue similarly do not suffice. Nor is it enough to show a shortage of qualified workers in a given field.

Instead, the INS held, an applicant for a national interest waiver must show (1) that the area of employment is one of “substantial intrinsic merit;” (2) that the person’s employment will benefit the nation, not just the local area; and (3) that the particular applicant “will serve the national interest to a substantially greater degree than would an available U.S. worker having the same minimum qualifications [emphasis added].” 22 I. & N. Dec. at 217–18. To illustrate the second requirement, the INS said

“(W)hile education is in the national interest, the impact of a single schoolteacher in one elementary school would not be in the national interest [for waiver purposes].” Id. at 217 n.3.³⁴

The third preference contains three subprongs: immigrants capable of performing certain “skilled labor” for which qualified U.S. workers are not available; immigrants who have baccalaureate degrees and are members of the professions; and “other workers” who are capable of performing unskilled labor for which qualified U.S. workers are not available. INA § 203(b)(3). As with the second preference, labor certification is required, see INA §§ 203(b)(3)(C), 212(a)(5)(C); unlike the second preference, however, there is no provision for national interest waivers. Importantly also, the statute provides that no more than 10,000 of the third preference visas may be awarded to the “other workers” prong in a single fiscal year. INA § 203(b)(3)(B). Professors Enid Trucios-Haynes and Katherine Vaughns have both thoughtfully discussed the consequences of making inadequate provision for the immigration of low-skilled workers.³⁵

In the past few years, the first two preferences have been perennially underutilized. At this writing, the first employment-based preference is current (i.e. no waiting period), and the second is current except for China and India. See the April 2009 Visa Bulletin on page 254 above.

b. LABOR CERTIFICATION

Long considered a staple of the immigration lawyer’s work, labor certification attained even greater importance with the enactment of the 1990 Act and the attendant expansion of employment-based immigration. The INA requires labor certification for those who apply under the second and third employment-based preferences, INA § 212(a)(5)(D), except, as mentioned earlier, that national interest waivers are sometimes possible for second preference applicants, INA § 203(b)(2)(B). The precise statutory criteria for a grant of labor certification, designed to assure that the immigrant’s employment will neither displace nor otherwise disadvantage American workers, appear in INA § 212(a)(5)(A). That provision requires a certification by the Secretary of Labor that (i)(I) there are not sufficient workers who are able, willing, qualified (or equally qualified in the case of an alien described in clause

34. For effective critiques of this position, see Stanley Mailman & Stephen Yale-Loehr, The “National Interest” Waiver, 4 BIB 271 (Apr. 1, 1999); Nathan A. Waxman, New York State Department of Transportation: National Interest Waivers One Year Down the Road, 76 IR 1641 (Nov. 15, 1999). For an illuminating summary of how the government has applied the third element to researchers, see Sean Koehler & Stephen Yale-Loehr, National Interest Waiver Petitions for Researchers: Demonstrating a Measurable Impact on the Larger Field, 9 BIB 1341 (Nov. 15, 2004).

35. See Enid Trucios-Haynes, Civil Rights, Latinos, and Immigration: Cybercascades and Other Distortions in the Immigration Reform Debate, 44 Univ. Louisville Brandeis L.J. 637, 643-48 (2006); Katherine L. Vaughns, Restoring the Rule of Law: Reflections on Fixing the Immigration System and Exploring Failed Policy Choices, 5 Univ. Maryland J. of Race, Religion, Gender and Class 151, 184-85 (2005).

(ii) and available at the time of application for a visa and admission to the United States and at the place where the alien is to perform such skilled or unskilled labor, and

(II) the employment of such alien will not adversely affect the wages and working conditions of workers in the United States similarly employed.

(ii) Certain aliens subject to special rule

For purposes of clause (i)(I), an alien described in this clause is an alien who—

(I) is a member of the teaching profession, or

(II) has exceptional ability in the sciences or the arts.

Although this chapter is generally confined to the substantive criteria for admission (procedure will be the subject of chapter 6), a brief digression on labor certification procedure should help you follow the cases in this subsection. For many years, the labor certification process has been plagued by complexity, great expense (for both the employer and the government), huge backlogs, and long delays. Apart from the impossible position for the employer who needs to fill the job, the long administrative delays have created hardship for the prospective immigrants. In recent years the Department of Labor has searched for ways to speed the administrative process. For an excellent description of the innovation known as “Reduction in Recruitment” [R.I.R.], see Linda Rose, De-Mystifying Reduction in Recruitment, 19 Immigration Law Today 205 (April 2000). Still, administrative backlogs grew so large that the combined waiting times for processing the labor certification application and the visa petition frequently totaled several years. The process involves both “state workforce agencies” (SWAs) and the U.S. Labor Department’s Employment and Training Administration (ETA). Most of the delay occurred at the SWAs, where the waiting times varied considerably from state to state.

Amidst a general consensus that improved efficiency had become essential, the ETA in 2005 finalized a comprehensive overhaul known as “PERM” (Program Electronic Review Management). The details are laid out in 69 Fed. Reg. 77325–77421 (Dec. 27, 2004), amending 8 CFR § 656. Here is a summary:

You need to know initially that, when labor certification is required, it is merely the first step in the process. Once labor certification issues, a “visa petition” (standardized form I-140) is ordinarily filed with USCIS to classify the immigrant as one who fits within the claimed preference category. INA § 204(a)(1)(C, D). You will see more on visa petitions later, but you should note now that any labor certification granted on or after July 16, 2007 expires if the visa petition is not filed within 180 days. 20 CFR § 656.30(b) (2008).

How does the immigrant (or, more commonly, the immigrant’s employer) obtain labor certification? One of the first steps is to check “Schedule A,” published by the Labor Department in 20 CFR § 656.5 (2008). Schedule A lists those occupations that the Labor Department has “pre-certified” as meeting the statutory requirements for labor certification. At this writing, the only listed occupations are physical therapists, nurses, and immigrants of “exceptional ability in the sciences or arts.” If the employee fits one of those headings, labor certification is deemed to have been automatically granted. The immigrant or employer therefore bypasses the Labor Department entirely and files a petition with USCIS, which then decides whether the immigrant’s job really does fall within one of the Schedule A occupations. Id. § 656.15. Until 2005, the Department also maintained a Schedule B, which listed occupations for which labor certification ordinarily would not be granted; for those occupations, the applicants had to apply for waivers and make special showings. See 20 CFR §§ 656.11, 656.23 (2004). Since processing the waiver applications required the same resources as simply processing the labor certification applications directly, PERM omits any provision for Schedule B.

In the usual case, the occupation is not listed on Schedule A and therefore an individual application for labor certification must be filed. Under the old system, the application was submitted to the relevant “state employment security agency,” or SESA, now known as a “state workforce agency,” or SWA. The local SWA would then assist the employer in recruiting domestic workers and, eventually, forward the file to the ETA for decision. Under the new system, the application is filed directly with ETA, but before filing it the employer (a) must request the SWA to determine the prevailing wage for the particular job; and (b) must take certain specified recruiting steps to determine whether qualified U.S. workers are available. The application may be filed either electronically or by mail, and it need not include any documentation. It contains only attestations by the employer as to the essential facts. ETA screens the applications and selects a fraction of them for audits. Only if audited must an employer document the statements made in the application. See 20 CFR § 656.17(a)(3) (2008).

The application is decided by an ETA official known as a “certifying officer” (CO). 20 CFR § 656.24(b). By way of exception, the Director of the ETA processing center may refer the case to the “Office of Foreign Labor Certification Administrator” if the application “presents a special or unique problem” or falls within a category of cases predesignated by that Office for referral. See generally 20 CFR § 656.24(a)(2) (2008).

If the CO decides that the applicant meets all the requirements, labor certification is granted. 20 CFR § 656.24(d) (2008). Otherwise the CO denies the application, stating the reasons for the denial (in writing) and advising the employer that review may be requested within 30 days. Id. § 656.24(e). Upon a timely request for review, the file is forwarded to the Labor Department’s Board of Alien Labor Certification Appeals (BALCA). Id. § 656.26. BALCA sits in Washington, D.C. It may act in three-member panels, id. § 656.27(a), and customarily does. Occasionally, BALCA goes en banc. The regulations do not explicitly authorize BALCA to designate its decisions as precedents but improved consistency was the reason for its creation, so in practice BALCA frequently cites its own prior decisions for support. 4 Gordon, Mailman & Yale-Loehr § 44.05[4]. BALCA's decisions in turn are subject to judicial review in federal district court. Id. § 44.09. BALCA's published decisions are available on the web at www.oalj.dol.gov/libina.htm.

An employer may also request review of the SWA prevailing wage determination. Review is performed by the CO, with the right of further review by BALCA. 20 CFR § 656.41 (2008).

As you will see in chapter 6, many applicants for LPR status use a procedure known as adjustment of status, which permits certain otherwise qualified individuals who are already in the United States—typically as lawful temporary workers—to complete the LPR process without having to return home first. In 2000, Congress supplied a partial corrective to the labor certification delay problem, available only to adjustment of status applicants. Once such applicants have been waiting more than 180 days, they are now free to change to another employer or to another job “in the same or a similar occupational classification,” without the need for USCIS or DOL approval. This development has major substantive implications for labor certification.³⁶

i. Displacing American Workers

Matter of Marion Graham

Board of Alien Labor Certification Appeals, Feb. 2, 1990.
No. 88-INA-102 (en banc).

This appeal arises from an application for labor certification pursuant to Section 212(a)(14) [now 212(a)(5)(A)—Eds.] of the Immigration and Nationality Act. The Certifying Officer (CO) of the United States Department of Labor denied the application, and Employer requested * * * review. * * *

* * * [A]n alien seeking to enter the United States for the purpose of performing skilled or unskilled labor is ineligible to receive a visa unless the Secretary of Labor (Secretary) has determined and certified to the Secretary of State and to the [Secretary of Homeland Security] that: (1) there are not sufficient workers in the United States who are able, willing, qualified, and available at the time of application for a visa and admission into the United States and at the place where the alien is to perform such labor; and (2) the employment of the alien will not adversely affect the wages and working conditions of United States workers similarly employed.

Employers desiring to employ aliens on a permanent basis must apply for labor certification pursuant to 20 CFR Part 656. These regulations require an employer to document that the job opportunity has been and is being described without unduly restrictive requirements. If the job requirements which an employer is requiring of U.S. workers are: (1) other than those normally required for the job in the United States; (2) exceed the requirements listed in the Dictionary of Occupational Titles (D.O.T.); (3) include a foreign language; (4) involve a combination of duties or (5) require the worker to live on employer's premises, they are presumptively unduly restrictive, and the employer must demonstrate by documentation that its requirements arise from a business necessity.

36. See the American Competitiveness in the Twenty-First Century Act, Pub. L. 106-313, 114 Stat. 1251, 1254, § 106(c) (Oct. 17, 2000), adding INA §§ 204(j) and 212(a)(5)(A)(iv).

* * *

On December 26, 1986, an application for labor certification * * * was submitted by Marion Graham (Employer) on behalf of Gladys Yolanda Ulloa (Alien) for the position of "HOUSEWORKER GENERAL/CHILD MONITOR (Live-In)." The duties of the position were listed on ETA Form 750-A as follows:

Responsible for cleaning 2 story house of 3,000 square feet.

Cleans 3 bedrooms, 4 bathrooms, 2 living rooms, 1 dining room, 1 bar area, 1 kitchen area, also cleans garage area. Irons clothes. Polishes furniture and silverware and glassware. Waters plants. Changes linens. Answers phone and bell door. Feed 2 dogs. Cleans 8 glass windows, 9 glass doors and 3 big mirrors.

Full supervision and responsibility on absence of parent of 1 infant girl of 1 (one) years of age. Cooks meals and prepare formulas for her. Bathe, dress her. Supervise and participate in her play activities.

* * * As a condition of employment, Employer required that the person hired live in her home, have 3-months experience and be willing to work Monday through Friday, Saturdays and Sundays when requested, and 3 to 4 hours overtime daily. Employer also required that the employee not smoke or drink [alcoholic beverages] at the work site and that he or she have a legal right to work in the United States. No U.S. workers responded to Employer's advertisement.

On April 30, 1987, the CO issued a Notice of Findings (NOF) which proposed to deny certification on the basis of § 656.21(b)(2), which requires that the job opportunity be described without unduly restrictive requirements. In the NOF the CO challenged the requirement that the employee hired live in the employer's home as being unduly restrictive. The CO stated, however, that Employer could delete the live-in requirement and readvertise the position, or she could provide documentation that the live-in requirement arises from a business necessity.

In its letter of rebuttal, dated May 23, 1987, Employer attempted to demonstrate that the live-in requirement arises from a business necessity. Employer asserted that the work shift is divided so that 50-percent of the working hours pertain to the household cleaning and 50-percent child monitoring; the household is very busy; because Employer's husband is a Hospital President, on call 24 hours a day a live-in employee is needed to screen calls at night; Employer personally accompanies her husband at times on his business trips, and therefore a live-in is required to take full responsibility for the child and household; the cost of paying a housekeeper and a night care child monitor is very expensive; Employer has to run different types of personal errands every day, including helping to care for her sick mother. Employer also asserted that because the Alien has cared for the child since birth, she has confidence in her.

On July 15, 1987, the CO issued a Final Determination (FD) denying certification finding that Employer had failed to document the live-in requirement as arising from a business necessity. * * *

II. Applicability of [business necessity requirement]

* * * [A]n employer must document that the job opportunity has been described without unduly restrictive job requirements. In instances where the worker is required to live on the employer's premises, the requirement will be deemed unduly restrictive unless the employer adequately documents that the requirement arises from a business necessity.

* * *

III. "Business" to which [the business necessity requirement] applies

* * *

Considering the absence of guidance from the Act or the regulations as to the meaning of the term "business necessity", the fact that the federal district and circuit courts which have touched on the subject imply that many factors are relevant when determining business necessity in a live-in domestic situation, the fact that dictionary definitions of "business" do not exclude use of the term in non-commercial contexts, and the context of labor certification which does not direct the Secretary to make any sort of judgment on the value of the employment opportunity offered but only on availability of and impact on U.S. workers, we conclude that the relevant "business" is the "business" of running a household or managing one's personal affairs. To construe "business necessity" so as to require consideration to be limited to the employer's outside business interests in the context of labor certification of a domestic worker would infuse the Secretary with the discretion to decide what business needs and personal social and economic preferences are best for the country—a discretion that goes well beyond the responsibility imposed on the Secretary under the Act.

IV. Application of business necessity test in live-in domestic context

To establish the business necessity for a live-on-the-premises requirement for a domestic worker, the employer must demonstrate that the requirement is essential to perform, in a reasonable manner, the job duties as described by the employer. In the context of a domestic live-in worker, pertinent factors in determining whether the live-on-the-premises requirement is essential for the performance of the job duties include the Employer's occupation or commercial activities outside the home, the circumstances of the household itself, and any other extenuating circumstances.

Those factors must be weighed on a case-by-case basis. The presence or absence of any one concern in a particular case may not be determinative.³⁷

Although a judgment on the merits of the job opportunity as it relates to a private employer's lifestyle choice is not a relevant consideration,³⁸ a mere personal preference to have an employee live on the premises does not establish business necessity.

V. Application of the test to Marion Graham, Employer

To meet the business necessity test, * * * Ms. Graham's evidence must establish that the live-on-the-premises requirement is essential for the Alien to perform, in a reasonable manner, the job duties of general household worker/child monitor.

Written assertions which are reasonably specific and indicate their sources or bases are to be considered documentation which must be given the weight it rationally deserves. When applying the business necessity test in a live-in domestic situation, a requisite degree of specificity for a written assertion generally should, at the very least, enable the Certifying Officer to determine whether there are cost-effective alternatives to a live-in requirement and whether the needs of the household for a live-in worker are genuine. For example, if one of the reasons proffered for the live-in requirement is absence of Employer from the home, the assertions should specify the length (e.g. overnight, days at a time, 18-hours per day, etc.) and frequency (e.g., three or four days a week, weekends, etc.) of the absences. The Board also notes that, as a general matter, documentation to bolster assertions of a need for a live-in requirement will go a long way in establishing the credibility of those assertions (e.g., travel vouchers; written estimates of the costs of alternatives such as a phone answering service or babysitters).

The relevant evidence in this case consists entirely of written assertions made by Employer in her December 13, 1986 letter to the California Employment Development Office and her May 23, 1987 letter of rebuttal. The assertions show four factors purportedly making the live-on-the-premises requirement essential for the Alien to perform, in a reasonable manner, the job duties of general household worker/child monitor: (1) the need for a person to screen telephone calls since Employer's husband is a

37. [Footnote 5 in original] The fact that a particular Employer does not have an occupation outside the home, for example, would not preclude that Employer from obtaining labor certification for a domestic live-in worker if some other factor showing business necessity is documented for the live-in requirement, such as the Employer being an invalid. On the other hand, the mere fact that an Employer is an invalid may not itself establish the business necessity for a live on the premises requirement. Hence, if several United States workers could perform the work required, the fact that the Employer is an invalid who needs constant care may not justify the live-in requirement. It is noted, however, that employment of an around-the-clock service may prove to be exorbitantly expensive and therefore inappropriate.

38. [Footnote 6 in original] For example, a Certifying Officer may not conclude that business necessity has not been shown simply because that Officer believes that live-in domestic service is a luxury reserved for the rich.

hospital president who is on call 24-hours per day; (2) the need for someone to attend the house and to monitor Employer's child while employer is away on business trips with her husband, running errands, or attending her sick mother; (3) the need for someone to be present when the Grahams return home in the evening; and (4) the lessened expense of hiring a live-in domestic as opposed to hiring both a housekeeper and a night child care monitor.

We conclude that Employer's statements herein do not constitute documentation: they are neither reasonably specific nor do they adequately indicate their sources or bases. The record fails to show the frequency of late-night telephone calls, or why a professional answering service could not perform the screening function Employer asserts is necessary. Neither does the record show the number of days per month Ms. Graham has been away from home overnight, or the likelihood of her future absences from home on business with her husband, performing errands, or caring for her sick mother. Further, the record does not show how much extra cost, if any, would be involved in hiring a child monitor and housekeeper for the particular nights that the Grahams anticipate being away from home. In short, the record established by Employer in this case consists solely of unsupported allegations which are insufficient to document business necessity for the live-on-the-premises requirement. Hence, the Certifying Officer's denial of labor certification must be affirmed.

* * *

[Three ALJ's, while accepting the majority's business necessity test and its application to domestic workers, dissented on the ground that the CO had never asked the employer for the detailed documentation the majority now requires.—Eds.].

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. In Marion Graham the Board summarized the Labor Department regulations that listed the various situations in which an employer will be required to demonstrate "business necessity." The same basic categories exist today, but with the advent of PERM the language and organization of the regulations have changed slightly. A showing of "business necessity" is still required for the first three categories listed—job requirements "not normally required for the job," job requirements that exceed those listed in the Dictionary of Occupational Titles (now replaced by an electronic source known as O*NET and discussed below), and foreign language requirements. For purposes of those three categories, the regulations now codify the Information Industries test, changed slightly to read as follows:

To establish a business necessity, an employer must demonstrate the job duties and requirements bear a reasonable relationship to the occupation in the context of the employer's business and are essential to perform the job in a reasonable manner.

8 CFR § 656.17(h)(1) (2008). For the 4th and 5th categories—combination of duties (now combination of “occupations”) and live-on-the-premises requirements—the new regulations do not expressly require “business necessity” but prescribe its functional equivalent. Id. §§ 656.17(h)(3), 656.17(j)(2).

Where does the Labor Department get the power to require business necessity or its equivalent in the first place? To what statutory requirement is business necessity relevant?

2. The meaning of “business necessity” has been perhaps the most contentious of all labor certification issues. Long before PERM, the Board decided the leading case of Matter of Information Industries, No. 88-INA-82 (BALCA, Feb. 9, 1989) (en banc). There the Board provided a two-part test:

We hold that, to establish business necessity . . . an employer must demonstrate that the job requirements bear a reasonable relationship to the occupation in the context of the employer’s business and are essential to perform, in a reasonable manner, the job duties as required by the employer.

Id. at 7.

First, study that definition carefully. Notice that each part limits only the job “requirements” (i.e., the credentials on which the employer is insisting); neither part purports to limit the job “duties” (i.e., the functions the employee will have to perform). The Board stressed that distinction in Information Industries. Yet the first part of the test uses the phrase “bears a reasonable relationship to,” while the second part uses the seemingly more demanding phrase “are essential to.” If both parts are restricting the job requirements, and if “essential” requires more than “reasonable,” is the first part redundant? Or is it possible for a given set of job requirements to satisfy the second part of the test but fail the first?

More common is the reverse scenario, in which the Board finds that a requirement bears a reasonable relationship to the occupation but is not essential to the performance of the employee’s duties.³⁹

Second, in the commentary accompanying the final PERM rule, ETA claimed to be “incorporating the standard for business necessity adopted by BALCA in Information Industries,” quoting the actual language of the Information Industries test above, and to be marking “a return to the status quo.” 69 Fed. Reg. at 77351. But the language that it actually added to the regulations (reproduced in item 1 above) differs from that of the Information Industries test in subtle ways. Identify the differences and determine whether they substantially alter the meaning.

³⁹ See, e.g., Matter of Southeastern Capital Corp., No. 88-INA-198 (BALCA, Aug. 2, 1989) (80-word-per-minute typing requirement for secretary); Matter of Golden

Jade Restaurant, No. 88-INA-342 (BALCA, July 28, 1989) (knowledge of ethnic Chinese dishes for waiter in Chinese restaurant) (2-1 decision), aff’d en banc (Feb. 7, 1990).

3. As a normative matter, should the Labor Department insist that the job duties—not just the job requirements—be reasonable?

4. In formulating the standard it did, the Board in Information Industries rejected two other proffered tests for business necessity—one more favorable to the employer and the immigrant, the other less favorable. In Ratnayake v. Mack, 499 F.2d 1207 (8th Cir.1974), the court held the employer's job requirements need only "be reasonable and tend to contribute to or enhance the efficiency and quality of the business." Id. at 1212. At the other end of the spectrum was a decision rendered in another context, Diaz v. Pan American World Airways, Inc., 442 F.2d 385 (5th Cir.1971). There the question was how to interpret the business necessity exception to Title 7 of the Civil Rights Act of 1964, 42 USC § 2000e-2(e)(1). The court held that business necessity, a defense to certain forms of employment discrimination, applies only when the employer's actions were needed to avoid undermining "the essence of the business operation." Id. at 388. (The Pan Am policy of hiring only female flight attendants was held not to satisfy that standard). At one time, the Labor Department regulations applied the Diaz test to business necessity issues in the labor certification context. In Information Industries, however, both sides conceded that neither extreme was appropriate and the Board ended up enunciating the test that you read in item 2 above.

First, identify the competing economic interests that would explain a preference for either Ratnayake or Diaz in the labor certification context. Second, should the tests for business necessity be the same for labor certification cases as for Title 7 cases?

5. For some time, a large number of labor certification applications have been for live-in housekeepers. See Lenni Benson and Roxana C. Bacon, A Practitioner's Guide to Successful Alien Labor Certifications, May 1988 Immigration Briefings at 7. In general, housekeepers are considered plentiful, but those who are willing to live on the premises are scarce. The Board in Marion Graham has the difficult task of applying the concept of "business necessity" to the operation of a person's home. Are you satisfied with the Board's resolution of that question? What practical alternatives did it have? See also Pesikoff v. Secretary of Labor, 501 F.2d 757 (D.C.Cir. 1974) (employer failed to prove his domestic needs required live-in maid).

The PERM rules for live-in housekeepers change somewhat the test announced in Information Industries. They do not refer to "business necessity" at all. Instead, they require the employer to demonstrate that "the [live-in] requirement is essential to perform, in a reasonable manner, the job duties as described by the employer and there are not cost-effective alternatives to a live-in household requirement." 20 CFR § 656.17(j)(2) (2008). Would that formulation have changed the outcome in Marion Graham? (PERM also elaborates on the required documentation for live-in housekeeper applications. See 20 CFR § 656.19 (2008)).

Professor Nora Demleitner, in a February 8, 1999 letter to the author, added another, highly important dimension. She wrote:

It seemed to me that many of the issues surrounding labor certification for live-in housekeepers have to do with our perception of women and childcare, women's roles in the household, social class, and society's continued uneasiness about those issues.

In addition, the decision [in Marion Graham] is also interesting insofar as it is focused on the issue of U.S. worker replacement without considering, for example, the child's interest. Might it not make more sense (emotionally, if not economically) to leave the child with the caretaker who has been in charge of her since birth?

There has been some poignant commentary about the "maid trade" and its conflicting social implications for women. On the one hand, the childcare services that foreign migrants provide have enabled young mothers in the destination states to enter the workforce. Consequently, the 1990 United States legislation that capped the third preference "other workers" at 10,000 per year has been criticized for its impact on women. Joan Fitzpatrick, The Gender Dimension of U.S. Immigration Policy, 9 Yale J. Law & Feminism 23, 34-37 (1997). On the other hand, the maids themselves—mainly women who have migrated from Asian countries to more developed Asian countries and to the Middle East—frequently endure exploitation and abuse. Joan Fitzpatrick & Katrina Kelly, Gendered Aspects of Migration: Law and the Female Migrant, 22 Hastings Internat'l & Comparative L. Rev. 47, 58-92 (1998).

6. In another large chunk of the business necessity cases, the job requirements include proficiency in a particular foreign language. See, e.g., Matter of Tel-Ko Electronics, No. 88-INA-416 (BALCA, July 30, 1990) (en banc). Can you speculate as to why foreign language requirement cases are so frequent and why one might expect BALCA to be skeptical? In Matter of Shamp Plumbing and Building, No. 94-INA-530 (BALCA, Feb. 23, 1996), a plumbing company in western Montana asserted a need for a business manager who was fluent in both French and German because the region was becoming more international. The Board was not persuaded.

BALCA's panels have differed over whether business necessity will be found when the clients with whom the employee will be interacting speak a foreign language only out of preference. See Tel-Ko Electronics, above, at n.3. Under PERM, "business necessity for a foreign language requirement may be based upon the following: * * * The need to communicate with a large majority of the employer's customers, contractors, or employees who can not communicate effectively in English * * *" (emphasis added). Should business necessity be found in such a case? Should the owner of a Mexican restaurant that is located in a Mexican barrio of Los Angeles and patronized primarily by native Spanish-speakers be permitted to require that his or her servers speak Spanish?

A separate issue is whether a non-English-speaking workforce, as distinguished from a non-English-speaking clientele, can justify a foreign language requirement. In Matter of Lucky Horse Fashion, No. 97-INA-182 (BALCA, Aug. 22, 2000), the Board en banc held that the answer is usually no. The employer wanted to hire a sewing machine operator who could speak Chinese, because its entire workforce was Chinese and only 10% spoke English well enough to communicate machine problems. The employer also documented various inefficiencies that would result if translators were continually required. The Board denied labor certification for failure to satisfy the first element of the Information Industries test. Foreign language proficiency, the Board reasoned, is not reasonably related to the occupation of sewing machine repair, even in the context of this employer's business. It expressed additional concern that, if foreign language requirements were too easily justified on the basis of non-English-speaking workforces, employers would have little incentive to hire Americans. The dissent argued that non-English-speaking workforces are a sociological reality, especially in some geographic areas, and that employers in such areas might have genuine need to hire bilingual supervisors or other staff. The PERM rule just noted applies to communications with fellow employees as well as communications with customers.

7. What if the employer proposes to combine two functions in a single job? In Matter of Robert L. Lippert Theatres, No. 88-INA-433 (BALCA, May 30, 1990) (en banc), a theater owner wanted to hire a noncitizen to be both an accountant and a film projectionist. There were efficiency-related reasons for doing so. The Board first held that an employer who wished to combine duties must establish business necessity unless the employer normally combines the two functions in a single position or it is customary to do so. There being no such custom and no such practice by this employer, the Board insisted on a showing of business necessity. For that, the Board held the Information Industries test inapplicable (except that the Information Industries test would continue to govern whether the requirements for each individual function were unduly restrictive). Instead, the Board ruled, the employer must demonstrate that hiring two separate employees would be not just inefficient or costly, but so impractical as to be "infeasible." In a later decision, Matter of Chinese Community Center, 91-INA-99 (BALCA, June 4, 1991), the Board stated expressly that merely saving money or making the operation more efficient would not satisfy this standard. PERM codifies the Lippert Theatres test except that instead of saying the employer must demonstrate that it normally combines the functions, or that it is customary to do so, or that there is a business necessity, it replaces each "or" with a cryptic "and/or." 8 CFR § 656.17(h)(3) (2008).

At any rate, what do you think it would take to meet an "infeasibility" test?

8. Another recurring problem is the intending immigrant who owns or controls the company and wants to hire himself or herself or a close family member. BALCA has held that in such a case the employer must demonstrate that he or she would not be "unlikely to replace the alien" and that "there is a bona fide job opportunity clearly open to any qualified U.S. worker." Matter of Lignomat USA, No. 88-INA-276 (BALCA, Oct. 24, 1989) (en banc), reconsideration denied, Jan. 24, 1990; see also Hall v. McLaughlin, 864 F.2d 868, 873-80 (D.C.Cir.1989) (employer must show company not sham and corporation not so heavily dependent on immigrant beneficiary that real choice is unlikely). These tests are hard to meet, but they are not impossible. In Matter of Paris Bakery Corp., No. 88-INA-337 (BALCA, Jan. 4, 1990) (en banc), for example, the President and sole stockholder of a bakery was granted labor certification to employ his brother as a French baker. Experienced U.S. workers were unavailable. In contrast, in Matter of Cleanex House Cleaning Service, Inc., No. 2003-INA-208 (BALCA, Sept. 7, 2004), the Board denied labor certification to the brother of the company President, finding more experienced U.S. applicants available for the position of janitorial supervisor. And in Bulk Farms, Inc. v. Martin, 963 F.2d 1286 (9th Cir. 1992), the court upheld a Labor Department regulation that required the work be “by an employee for an employee other than himself.” Finding the regulation reasonably related to the congressional goal of assuring good faith efforts to locate United States workers, the court affirmed the Department’s denial of labor certification for the company’s sole shareholder, President, and “chief cheesemaker.” See also 8 CFR § 656.17(l) (2005).

9. INA § 212(a)(5)(A) requires the applicant for labor certification to demonstrate that no “able, willing, qualified” workers are available. With only two exceptions (teachers and those with exceptional ability in the sciences or the arts), it is not enough for the employer to show that no equally qualified workers are available. Thus, the employer ordinarily must hire a minimally qualified U.S. worker over a more qualified noncitizen (or hire no one at all). Is that good or bad?

10. Fraudulent labor certification applications have long been of concern to the Labor Department. Some people have been known to set up bogus corporations solely for labor certification purposes. For a good description of one such scheme and the ensuing criminal conviction of an immigration lawyer, see 64 IR 1291 (1987).

But most will agree that such blatant frauds taint only a small proportion of the applications, and that, despite isolated anecdotes involving questionable practices, the ethics of today’s immigration lawyers are high. See, e.g., Bruce Hake, “Attorney Misconduct”—A Rebuttal, 4 Georgetown Immigration L.J. 727, 728–35 (1990). Probably more common, and in most instances too dependent on subjective judgment to be labeled fraud, are those cases in which the job requirements are tailored so closely to the beneficiary’s qualifications that, realistically, no one else will qualify. Writer Calvin Trillin says:

* * * The process of getting labor certification amounts to staging a sort of sham employment offer. The lawyer writes a job description that complies with the Department of Labor’s standards, and the potential employer of the alien actually advertises such a job through the state employment commission. If someone shows up who is a citizen [or LPR—Eds.] and has the qualifications outlined in the ad and is willing to work for the stated wage, the labor certification is not granted—although the employer has no obligation to give the citizen a job. If the lawyer who wrote the job description has been skillful, there is a good chance that no qualified citizen will show up. Writing job descriptions that pass the Department of Labor but attract no other potential employees is what [immigration lawyer] Ed Prud'homme calls "one of the few art forms in the business," and Beaumont Martin [also an immigration lawyer—Eds.] is considered one of the artists. One of the Chinese students had managed to get a job in the accounting department of a small oil company, and, since the job required some computer expertise, Martin decided to write a job description that nudged her over a bit from accounting to computer analysis. ("There are a lot of people running around with accounting degrees.") When he had typed it up, he handed it to her:

SYSTEMS ANALYST 020.067-018

Conduct analyses of accounting, management, and operational problems and formulate mathematical models for solution by IBM computer system, using FORTRAN, COBOL, and PASCAL. Analyze problems in terms of management information. Write computer programs and devise and install accounting system and related procedures. Masters or equal in management information systems. $1667/month.

She read it over. "It's beautiful," she said.

* * *

When I was discussing labor certification with [immigration lawyer] Pete Williamson one afternoon, he mentioned a young woman he had seen that day who wanted to stay in the country but did not fall into any of the categories of family reunification. * * * Her only occupation was looking after the children of a neighbor.

I said that it didn't sound promising. A few days with immigration lawyers had greatly broadened my view of how the employment sections of the immigration law were actually used. I was no longer under the delusion that the law worked to bring to this country people who had rare skills or worked in fields where there were serious shortages of American workers. * * * Still, it seemed unlikely that being a mother's helper in Texas was a job "for which a shortage of employable and willing persons exists."

There were two other important elements in the case, Williamson said. The young woman in question was a college graduate. Also, both she and the children she looked after were Muslims—all from Pakistan. Williamson intended to nudge her over from a nanny to a tutor—a tutor qualified to instruct children in their own culture and religion. He thought it unlikely that any citizen with similar qualifications would respond to the ad. * * *

Calvin Trillin, Making Adjustments, The New Yorker, May 28, 1984, at 50, 63-66.

It is not easy to draw a bright line that separates commendable zealous representation of the client's interests from fraud. The immigration lawyer who wants to observe competing sets of sometimes hard-to-reconcile obligations can be caught in a judgment bind. Do you agree with Trillin that the labor certification process "amounts to staging a sort of sham employment offer?" On which side of the line would you place his examples?

11. The ethical temptations of labor certification work are the subject of an excellent article by Daniel F. Boyle, Labor Certification Pitfalls, 9 BIB 1354 (Nov. 15, 2004). He identifies the many "opportunities for misrepresentation, fraud and deceit" that the process presents. The most sobering part of his article is the finish:

My license to practice law was suspended by the State of Colorado for two years based primarily on labor certification activities that were violations of Colorado Rule of Professional Conduct 8.4(c), that is, conduct involving fraud, deceit, dishonesty, and misrepresentation. * * * The examples that I have outlined in this paper demonstrate the need for attorneys to stay aboveboard at every step in the immigration process.

Many of the shenanigans that I engaged in during the labor certification process were fraudulent, not merely exaggeration and puffery. They caused me extreme internal conflict and stress. Notwithstanding these feelings, I rationalized and minimized, and to some degree trivialized, the activities. This trivialization actually caused me additional internal turmoil and conflict. Therefore, when I finally stipulated to violations of [the Code], it afforded me a certain sense of relief. I had confessed to my wrongdoing, the first step in the path toward redemption.

On another level, for many years after my suspension I continued to minimize or justify my activities. After all, the clients were nice people deserving of residency. Moreover, the labor certification and immigration system itself was full of odd and illogical bureaucratic red tape. Thus, to some extent, I had the unrepentant attitude that I had simply pushed the line in certain cases because of the nature of the system.

During the past several years, however, I have come to realize that my activities were dishonest and wrong. It is not my place to circumvent congressional or agency directives, even if I disagree with them. Rather, it is my job to zealously represent my clients within the bounds of the law. I now realize that I must take my clients with the cards that they are dealt and I cannot cheat by giving them a new hand. I must do everything within my power for my client, but only within the confines of honesty.

At the time I perpetrated the violations in the labor certification context, I had an otherwise good relationship with the local immigration judges and most of the government attorneys. I was known as a candid and honest lawyer. On the inside, however, I knew differently. I have often been asked how an attorney with an otherwise good reputation could participate in the activities as set forth in this paper. The primary reasons are:

1. The lucrative nature of the cases and my enjoyment of the income they afforded. In other words, I valued money more than my integrity.

2. The fact that the clients were usually nice people, well deserving of residency, who often had no other way of gaining it and/or the business really needed the employee. In other words, I put the cart of serving my clients in front of the horse of serving the law. The ends do not justify the means.

3. The strange nature of the system itself. In other words, I justified and rationalized to the point that I suppressed my cognitive understanding that my actions were wrong.

4. My own shortcomings and lack of integrity. In other words, I failed to live up to the standards for lawyers and [to] the standards I now have for myself as a husband, father, and member of society.⁴⁰

One other common ethical dilemma specific to labor certification is whom to consider the client—the employer, the employee, or both? The decision has practical implications for how to resolve conflicts, whether to give advice, and when to treat communications as confidential.⁴¹

12. In 2007 the Labor Department issued a final rule that amends the labor certification procedures in ways intended to reduce the incidence of fraud. 72 Fed. Reg. 27904 (May 17, 2007), amending 20 CFR § 656. The new wrinkles are digested in 84 IR at 1119 et seq. (May 21, 2007).

13. A perennial controversy surrounds the fact that a very high proportion of all labor certification applications are filed on behalf of existing employees. A leading treatise once estimated the figure at 80%. See 1 Austin T. Fragomen et al., Immigration Law and Business at 4–5 (June 1994). This is not surprising. Even with reduced quota-related waits, the labor certification process can be quite lengthy. Few employers can afford to hold the positions open for the lengthy period that the procedure will take.

There are, however, two different subcategories of such cases. In some cases, the worker is employed illegally. This type of case is now rarer because the prospect of employer sanctions makes illegal employment less inviting to employers. As you will see in more detail in chapter 5 below, the 40. Id. at 1363. See generally John L. Pinnix (ed.), Ethics in a Brave New World (2004); David Weissbrodt & Laura Danielson, Immigration Law and Procedure in A Nutshell, chap. 15 (5th ed. 2005); William J. Flynn III & Dilip Patel, Employers, Employees and Ethics, in Alfonso Caprara et al. (eds.), AILA, Ethics and Your Immigration

Practice: Have you Considered . . .?, at 31–50 (1998).

41. See Bruce A. Hake, Dual Representation in Immigration Practice: The Simple Solution is the Wrong Solution, 5 Georgetown Immigration L.J. 581 (1991); Weissbrodt & Danielson, note 40 above, at 597–601.

employee's unlawful presence for more than 180 days creates additional difficulties. Moreover, when an application for labor certification reveals illegal employment, the Labor Department makes the information available for use in employer sanctions prosecutions. See Fragomen et al., above, at 4–5. This policy has clearly dissuaded many employers from seeking labor certification on behalf of those whom they employ illegally. 70 IR at 291–92 (Mar. 8, 1993).

The more important subgroup are noncitizens who are working lawfully, on temporary work visas, for the employers who are applying for labor certification on their behalf. The Labor Department has criticized this practice, arguing that it amounts to employers hiring foreign workers on a tryout basis. See Stuart Anderson, Widespread Abuse of H-1Bs and Employment-Based Immigration? The Evidence Says Otherwise, 73 IR 637, 638 (May 13, 1996). As Anderson points out, however, Congress made a conscious decision to allow precisely such a practice, probably because Congress recognized the practical difficulties that employers would otherwise face in filling essential positions in reasonable amounts of time. See id. at 638. You will see more about the various types of temporary worker categories in chapter 4.

One specific issue that can arise in this context is what should happen when an employer requires a certain amount of experience and the noncitizen beneficiary attained that experience (either legally or illegally) on the very job for which labor certification is now being sought. Why might such an application be denied? What responses might the employer give?⁴²

14. There is no law that requires an immigrant who has been admitted on the basis of a labor certification to remain in the certified job for any specified length of time. Should there be? What are the competing policies?

In Yui Sing Tse v. INS, 596 F.2d 831 (9th Cir.1979), the immigrant received labor certification for a position as a Chinese cook. He entered the United States with the intention of working full-time in the certified job for the approximately four years that it would take him to finish dental school, after which he would work only as a dentist. In a 2–1 decision, the court held his admission proper. It ruled that an immigrant need only intend to perform the certified job for a time period that is reasonable when measured in the light of the competing policies. Which way would you have come out on those facts?

15. To avoid having to demonstrate business necessity, an employer must show, among other things, that the job requirements do “not exceed the Specific Vocational Preparation level assigned to the occupation as shown in the O*NET Job Zones.” 20 CFR § 656.17(h)(1) (2008) (added by PERM). This raises an obvious question: “WHAT?”

Here is the explanation: The “O*NET” (the “Occupational Information Network Online”) is an electronic database posted and from time to time revised by ETA. It lists every known type of job in the United States and the duties typically associated with each job. Its URL is <http://online.onetcenter.org>. For every job listed, O*NET also includes something called a "Specific Vocational Preparation," or SVP. This is an index of the amount of education and experience customarily required for the job. By prohibiting employers from setting job requirements above the SVP level for the particular occupation, the Labor Department hopes to prevent employers from eliminating qualified U.S. applicants from contention.

⁴² See 20 CFR § 656.17(i)(3) (2008); Benson & Bacon, question 5 above, at 20–21.

The predecessor of O*NET was a hard copy publication called the Dictionary of Occupational Titles (D.O.T.) The Fourth Revised Edition of the D.O.T. (1991) was apparently the last. The Labor Department has announced it will no longer update or maintain the D.O.T., preferring to rely instead on O*NET. See 80 IR 1526 (Nov. 3, 2003). Recognition of O*NET by PERM, above, and by BALCA, see Matter of David Razo Gardening Service, 2002-INA-129 (Apr. 23, 2003), has now relegated D.O.T. to the archives.

Nonetheless, its rich flavor (most of which survives on the pages of O*NET) should come through in the following excerpts from this book review:

David Isaacson, We're All Entitled: The Literary and Cultural Significance of the Dictionary of Occupational Titles

27 Reference Quarterly 226 (1987).

* * *

The title of this volume probably doesn't whet most people's intellectual appetites: Dictionary of Occupational Titles. This work, now in its fourth edition (1977), is published by the Employment and Training Administration, a division of the U.S. Department of Labor. At first glance, this imposing 1,371-page volume, which lists, classifies, and defines over 20,000 jobs, is best described as a tool; one doesn't read such a book, one simply uses it to look up things. But besides being an eminently useful source, the DOT can offer hours of pleasurable, even enlightening reading; it can be admired as a model of precise expository prose; it can be studied profitably as a document in our cultural history; and, without intending to, this book is a fascinating tribute to our very American dream of an egalitarian society. * * *

The DOT was first published in 1939 to provide an organized job-classification system, making it easier to re-employ people during the Depression. That edition contained nearly 17,500 occupational definitions divided into 550 skilled, semi-skilled, or unskilled jobs. The second and third editions, published in 1949 and 1965, added new jobs and simplified the classification system. * * *

As a dictionary, the DOT rigorously and meticulously defines each of these jobs so it is difficult to mistake one job for another. But the DOT not only defines; it classifies these jobs by broad and then progressively narrower classes that are a delight to contemplate. The DOT does for jobs what Linnaeus did for plants, but what Melvil Dewey and the Library of Congress have not done for books: it has constructed a rational classification scheme that is flexible without being Procrustean. Part of the literary pleasure of the DOT comes from an appreciation of the way all the parts cohere into an intricately structured whole. Here, for example, is a typical definition:

686.686-010 Felt-Tipping Machine Tender (pen and pencil) tipping machine operator

Feeds machine that shapes felt tips for stencil marking pens: Fills hopper of machine with felt tips and presses switch to start machine that automatically shapes sides and bevels or rounds end of tips for making pens.

The first part of each occupational definition is the nine-digit code; each set of three digits has a specific meaning that uniquely identifies that occupation. * * *

* * *

Of course, the DOT includes jobs that are more intellectually demanding than felt-tipping machine tender. But the same objective standards of definition and classification apply. The DOT usually does as good a job in defining mental as physical tasks. Take, for example, the definition of the poet:

131.067-042 Poet

Writes narrative, dramatic or lyric poetry for magazines, books, and other publications: Chooses subject matter and suitable form to express personal feeling and individual experience or to narrate story or event. May write doggerel or other type verse.

This is certainly a concise, straightforward definition. It is deliberately prosaic. There is no unnecessary description, no embellishment of the social standing of this job, no "nonsense" like Shelley's notion that the poet is the unacknowledged legislator of mankind, or some kind of prophet. "You want to be a poet?" the DOT seems to say, "Well, go ahead, be one: here's what you'll be doing. It's one way of making a living, but no more elevated than thousands of others." * * *

* * *

The utilitarian purpose of the DOT is to facilitate the work of employment counselors, job analysts, and anyone seeking a job. The classification scheme (especially in its current computerized form) quickly allows the Employment Service of the Labor Department to categorize precisely job applicants and to match them with job openings. Any other government or private agency using this system, or some modification of it, can reap its benefits. Furthermore, because the numerical codes make statistical records relatively easy to compile and analyze, all sorts of employment patterns can be studied for trends, projections, and patterns. Analysts probably can tell us how many job openings there are for felt-tipping-machine tenders and perhaps even the likelihood of formal employment as a poet.

* * *

The DOT is also a cultural document because it is an illuminating compilation of colorful names. It is difficult, even in the somewhat jaded times we live in now, not to be moved, as you browse through this book, by a Whitmanesque celebration of the wondrously varied things people do for a living in this country. * * * [Consider] this selection of a few of the jobs listed in the DOT: acrobat, bead builder, contortionist, door patcher, expeditor, fatback trimmer, glass grinder, hot-car operator, impresario, jersey-knitter, knife changer, log marker, mail sorter, nodulizer, oak tanner, peanut blancher, quill changer, rounder, scrap wheeler, table tender, upper doubler, veneer clipper, warp coiler, x-ray technician, yarn examiner, zipper setter.

* * *

The DOT is a serious, sometimes even a solemn book, but it can also be a source of humor and whimsy, all the funnier because it does not intend to be. * * *

Some job titles resemble the German language in its penchant for numerous nouns strung together in a long phrase, the result of which can be quite a mouthful, as in: suction-dredge pipe-line placing supervisor, or line-fabric impregnating-range back tender, or manhole-and-underground-steam-line inspector.

Sometimes the position of adjectives and nouns in a job title creates rather unusual combinations. A continuous pillowcase cutter, for instance, does not continually cut pillowcases, but rather tends "a machine that cuts rolls of tubular cloth into pillowcase lengths." Nor is a self-propelled dredge operator a person whose propulsive abilities emanate from within himself, but he does operate, by himself, a hydraulic dredge to cultivate, transplant, and harvest marine life.

* * *

Some job titles strike an outsider like me as being unnecessarily specialized: bonbon creamer warmer, panama-hat smearer, armhole-and-shoulder off-presser, felt-hat-mellowing machine operator, remelt sugar cutter, and a matzo-forming machine operator. But these specialists may very well wonder, in turn, why there are so many different librarians listed in the DOT.

Besides the obvious titles of humorist and comedian, other jobs seem to require a sense of humor to perform: beeswax bleacher (tends vats and filter presses to bleach wax used in candlemaking); defective-cigarette slitter; pantyhose-crotch-closing machine operator; pickle pumper (tends machine that automatically injects meat with curing solution); egg smeller (smells broken eggs to detect spoiled ones and dumps them into waste container); Easter Bunny (one example, besides Santa Claus and The Three Little Pigs, of an impersonator); and a white-kid buffer (in leather manufacturing, a particular kind of buffing-machine operator).

There are also a number of occupations whose titles, if taken literally, suggest hitherto unrecognized ways of improving society: defect cutters are unfortunately only formally defined as operating saw machines to cut out defects in furnished woodstock. Diversion clerks are not employed to amuse their colleagues, but to reroute freight shipments. Lingo cleaners do not include language authorities like William Safire and Edwin Newman, but they do clean lingos, or metal weights attached to looms. A maturity checker, a position one might like to see widely distributed in our youth-worshipping culture, is restricted to tending a machine that crushes peas to ascertain their hardness (or maturity). A mother repairer is not a new kind of counselor, but someone who repairs the matrix of a metal phonograph record. A finger waver is not a scold, but one of many specialties available to cosmetologists. A gutter-mouth cutter is not interested in cleaner speech, but is a type of stonemason who works with ornamental and structural stone. A save-all operator is not a clergy member, but one who runs a machine salvaging suspended wood pulp. And a revival clerk does not assist an evangelist, but rather compiles data on lapsed insurance policies to determine eligibility for their automatic reinstatement.

* * *

Most job titles in the DOT, however, don't have ambiguous titles. Some, indeed, are exceedingly graphic: * * * Carcass splitter, aitchbone breaker, side splitter, head trimmer, snout puller, tongue cutter, offal separator, bung grader, casing puller, viscera washer, hog sticker, skin-peeling-machine operator, hide spreader, neck skewer, toe puller, and animal stunner are just a few of the titles that might cause a revival in vegetarianism.

What finally emerges after some period of time reading in the DOT is a broad appreciation of the variety of things people do for a living in this country. Far from being just another reference book, DOT is, in a special sense, a literary document. If one of the ends of literature is to help us understand and accept the variety of life, then it is not hyperbole to say the DOT serves this purpose. This book does not intend to be anything more than a utilitarian classification of jobs, but it also suggests, since every job has a formal title, that all jobs have at least verbal dignity. While each job is assigned an impersonal number, each job also has a distinct, precise name. In the strange ambience of this book, every job from the first named—abalone diver—to the last—zyglo inspector—seems to be equal, as a title, at least, to every other job. * * *

ii. Adversely Affecting the Wages and Working Conditions of American Workers

Industrial Holographics, Inc. v. Donovan

United States Court of Appeals, Seventh Circuit, 1983.
722 F.2d 1362.

■ CUDAHY, CIRCUIT JUDGE.

* * *

I

Under section 212(a)(14) [now 212(a)(5)(A)—Eds.] of the Immigration and Nationality Act, the State Department may not issue an alien a visa for admission to the United States for purposes of employment unless the Secretary of Labor certifies that American workers are not “able, willing, qualified . . . , and available” for the work, and that the employment of the alien “will not adversely affect the wages and working conditions” of similarly employed Americans. The Secretary of Labor has promulgated regulations which establish standards and procedures for the certification of alien workers under section 212(a)(14). If an employer wishes to hire an alien for work in the United States, these regulations require the employer first to recruit among American workers offering the “prevailing wage” and “prevailing working conditions” to determine whether any American workers are “able, willing, qualified, and available” for the job. If an employer submits documentation showing it has been unable to recruit American workers on these terms, then the Secretary of Labor may certify the alien to enter the country and perform the work.

* * *

Plaintiff Industrial Holographics, Inc. (the “employer”) manufactures and tests machinery used to make rubber tires. Plaintiff Roger K. Yu is an alien whom Industrial Holographics has sought to employ in Michigan as an export manager. The record indicates that Yu has never been in the United States. In June 1979, Industrial Holographics applied for labor certification on behalf of Yu. Industrial Holographics followed the various provisions in 20 CFR § 656.21 (1980), requiring it to post the job for internal recruitment, to advertise the job in newspapers and to post the job with the state employment service. On August 24, 1979, the employer submitted to the certifying officer documentation showing that it had complied with the requirements of section 656.21.

The employer, however, had advertised that the salary for the job of export manager was $1,000 per month. Section 656.21 requires the employer to advertise and post the job at the “prevailing wage” and “prevailing working conditions” in order to obtain certification. The Michigan Employment Security Commission (the “MESC”) was responsible for determining the prevailing wage in this case, and it determined that the prevailing wage for export managers in the area was $1,666 per month. Therefore, the certifying officer issued to the employer a Notice of Findings proposing to deny labor certification for Yu because the employer had failed to advertise the job at the prevailing wage.

After receiving the Notice of Findings, the employer agreed to repeat the advertising and recruiting process at the higher salary of $1,666 per month. The employer advertised the job at the higher salary, but it failed to comply with all of the requirements of section 656.21. Specifically, the employer did not show it had posted the job for internal recruitment at the higher salary * * *. Because the employer had failed to comply with the strict advertising requirements within the relevant time limits, the certifying officer denied the certification for Yu. On review within the Department of Labor, the administrative law judge⁴³ concluded that the employer had failed to comply with the regulations and that certification was properly denied.

Plaintiffs then sought review in the district court. Judge Moran granted summary judgment for the Department of Labor in an unpublished memorandum opinion. He held (1) that the Secretary of Labor had the statutory authority to issue the advertising regulations contained in section 656.21; * * * and (4) that the Department of Labor's use of the prevailing wage standard in the regulations was not arbitrary and capricious.

* * *

II

Appellants contend first that the Secretary of Labor exceeded his statutory authority by requiring the employer to advertise the position at the "prevailing wage." The applicable statutory language says that the Secretary shall certify the alien only if his or her employment "will not adversely affect the wages and working conditions" of similarly employed workers in the United States. INA § 212(a)(14)(B).

* * * [Appellants argue] that the regulations improperly equate the statute's standard of adverse effects with the payment of wages below "prevailing wages."

* * *

The regulations here assume, as a general proposition, that the employment of an alien at wages below the prevailing wage will tend to affect adversely the wages and working conditions of American workers. Appellants have provided no evidence to persuade us that this general assumption is arbitrary or capricious. While it may be possible to conceive of cases in which the prevailing wage standard would be inconsistent with the statute's purpose, that is not the case here.

Appellants argue that two federal decisions support their contention that the prevailing wage standard is contrary to the statute. See Naporano Metal & Iron Co. v. Secretary of Labor, 529 F.2d 537 (3d Cir.1976); Ozbirman v. Regional Manpower Adm'r, 335 F.Supp. 467 (S.D.N.Y.1971). Neither opinion persuades us that the Secretary's use of the prevailing wage standard was improper in this case.

* * *

[In Ozbirman] an alien was denied labor certification as an auto mechanic. The wage he was offered matched the union negotiated wage in the area, but the Secretary found the wage to be below the "prevailing wage" as required by the predecessor regulation of section 656.21. The district court remanded the matter to the Secretary. * * * The court discussed at length the complexity of a thorough determination of whether a particular package of wages and other benefits and working conditions would adversely affect American wages and working conditions. It concluded that the “prevailing wage” standard did not adequately take into account the other relevant variables. We agree with the Ozbirman court that a truly thorough analysis of adverse effects involves factors other than wages. However, we do not agree that the Secretary of Labor is without authority to issue regulations simplifying the inquiry so that decisions will be less arbitrary and more consistent.

43. At the time of this case, BALCA did not exist. Appeals from the decisions of certifying officers went to individual administrative law judges.—Eds.

We conclude that the Secretary acted reasonably in giving operational content to the language of section 212(a)(14) by applying the prevailing wage standard in this case. * * *

III

* * *

In this case the MESC contacted five Michigan employers to determine the salary each paid its export manager. From answers received from these inquiries, the MESC calculated that the average wage of export managers in Michigan was $1,666 per month.

Appellants argue that this calculation was improper because the MESC surveyed employers in industries other than the rubber tire machinery business. They contend that the export managers for the other employers are not “similarly employed” as the regulations require. However, we do not believe that the agency acted arbitrarily and capriciously in surveying the other five employers. The agency concluded that jobs with similar functions in other industries were sufficiently comparable for purposes of determining a prevailing wage. Appellants have provided no evidence showing that the other jobs are not comparable.

* * *

Affirmed.

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. The court in Industrial Holographics first has to assess the validity of a Labor Department regulation that equates a job offer below the prevailing wage with an adverse effect on the wages of American workers. In Ozbirman, on which the plaintiffs relied, the court said:

{T}he Secretary of Labor has effectively failed to recognize or consider that all forms of compensation do not take the form of money. * * * {T}he interrelationship between one’s pay rate and other fringe benefits indicates that such an adverse effect would not necessarily occur. * * * Shorter hours, unique vacation periods or working conditions, proximity to home and family, and exceptional fringe benefits are all factors which influence the labor market and have an effect on wages in this country.

335 F.Supp. at 472. The court in Ozbirman concluded that “the Secretary of Labor should determine which factors play a major role in affecting wage rates and consider such items as a package.” Id. at 472 n. 5. Interpreting the same regulation, the Board in Matter of Kids “R” Us, No. 89-INA-311 et al. (BALCA, Jan. 28, 1991), later held that, apart from wages controlled either by statute or by union contract, fringe benefits could be taken into account in ascertaining adverse effect.

Which approach do you find more convincing—Industrial Holographics or Ozbirman?

2. Even if both the wages and the fringe benefits are below the prevailing norms, does it necessarily follow that hiring the person would adversely affect the wages and working conditions of American workers? What economic assumptions underlie the assumed causal connection?

3. Conversely, is it enough to insist that the employer offer the prevailing wage (and that no able, willing, and qualified United States workers are available)? Why might organized labor feel that the employment of noncitizens even at the prevailing wage could adversely affect the United States work force?

4. Once the prevailing wage standard is accepted, the question is how to determine it. Generally the “prevailing wage” is the average wage of workers “similarly employed in the area of intended employment.” 20 CFR § 656.40(b)(2) (2008). It is clear that “area” refers to geography, not to occupational field, since the regulations define “area of intended employment” as “the area within normal commuting distance of the place (address) of intended employment.” 20 CFR § 656.3 (2008). Is that good policy? If the local prevailing wage is lower than the national prevailing wage, which rate should the employer be required to match? What if the local prevailing wage is higher than the national prevailing wage?

5. More difficult, perhaps, is the application of the term “similarly employed.” The regulations define that phrase to mean “having substantially comparable jobs in the occupational category in the area of intended employment.” If there are no such jobs in the local area, then “similarly employed” means “having jobs requiring a substantially similar level of skills” within the local area, or, if no substantially comparable jobs exist locally, then outside that local area. 20 CFR § 656.40(d) (2008).

In Industrial Holographics the employer argued that the Labor Department had erred in going outside the industry for data. Given the above regulation, was the court right or wrong to reject that argument?

6. What if the particular employer can cite special circumstances? In Matter of Tuskegee University, No. 87-INA-561 (BALCA, Feb. 23, 1988), a small, private, predominantly African-American university in Alabama wanted to hire a noncitizen as an associate professor of physics. The Alabama Employment Service found a prevailing wage of $30,670, based on the average salaries of associate professors at three private colleges in the local area. The employer applying for labor certification was offering only $27,340. Its argument was that the CO, rather than look to associate professor salaries generally, should have looked to associate professor salaries at private African-American colleges, where fewer resources were available for faculty salaries. The employer submitted evidence showing that, within the groups of United Negro College Fund (UNCF) colleges, its offer was competitive. In a 4–3 decision, BALCA held that “similarly employed” refers not only to the job titles and duties, but also to “the nature of the business or institution where the jobs are located—for example, public or private, secular or religious, profit or nonprofit . . .” It then ordered the CO to explain why he had rejected that argument. (Another issue the majority ordered the CO to reconsider on remand was whether he had been right to consider associate professor salaries in fields other than physics.)

The decision in Tuskegee University was short-lived. In Matter of Hathaway Children’s Services, 91–INA–388 (BALCA, Feb. 4, 1994, en banc), a nonprofit treatment center for handicapped and emotionally disturbed children sought to pay a wage lower than that paid for otherwise similar services at for-profit institutions. The Board denied labor certification and expressly overruled Tuskegee University. The Board in Hathaway held “similarly employed” refers only to the skill and knowledge levels required for the job, not to the nature of the employing institution or the employer’s ability to pay, and, in particular, not to whether the institution is for-profit or nonprofit. Accord, Matter of Columbus Hospital, 95–INA–282 (BALCA, Apr. 16, 1996) (small hospital with limited revenues must offer foreign workers same wages as larger hospitals with greater revenues).

The higher education community and numerous federal agencies that make use of foreign researchers reacted with alarm to the decision in Hathaway. They believed that requiring colleges and universities to pay researchers the same wages that prevail in industry would make it financially impossible for them to hire foreign researchers at all. Moreover, they argued, since they could not afford to pay their American researchers the wages offered by industry, the Hathaway rule would mean that colleges and universities would have to pay their foreign researchers more than they pay their American researchers—a consequence that would breed both unfairness and bad will.

Accepting these and other arguments, the Labor Department in 1998 amended its regulations to allow colleges, universities, and federal research centers to pay researchers the wages prevailing at similar institutions in the area of intended employment. See 63 Fed. Reg. 13756–67 (Mar. 20, 1998). Congress has since codified that rule as INA § 212(p)(1).

First, as a general matter, should “similarly employed” reflect the financial resources of the employer or just the job titles and job duties? Second, what do you think about the special rule for colleges, universities, and federal research centers? Third, and more specifically, what policy should be adopted for UNCF colleges like Tuskegee?

c. PERSPECTIVE ON EMPLOYMENT–BASED IMMIGRATION

Here are some excerpts from one of the more impressive, and more innovative, of the recent reform proposals:

Demetrios G. Papademetriou & Stephen Yale-Loehr, Balancing Interests: Rethinking U.S. Selection of Skilled Immigrants

Pages 15–34, 141–61 (1996).

When Congress developed many of today's economic immigration provisions in 1952, most of the nation was successfully completing the conversion to a peacetime economy by redirecting manufacturing industries toward the production of consumer goods and employing large numbers of discharged military personnel in its factories. Accordingly, manufacturing and agriculture dominated a domestically focused economy. As tensions between East and West intensified, a growing military-industrial complex created hundreds of thousands of additional jobs. Finally, the country was beginning to invest large amounts of public capital in physical infrastructure, supplying still more employment and the means to move the goods that U.S. workers were producing.

* * *

At the center of this postwar economic explosion, managing its growth and guaranteeing its stability, was the large U.S. corporation, which soon became the core of the nation's economic life. * * *

Corporations could play this central role largely because they were able to craft and maintain a "bargain" between the labor and management that guaranteed continued growth * * *. In this bargain, U.S. workers essentially "relinquished" the option of seeking to exert influence over broad institutional policy issues in exchange for job security (virtually de facto lifetime employment), seniority-based advancement, adequate compensation to support a family, and access to generous benefits—i.e., the key ingredients for a middle-class existence. In return, the corporation expected production workers and middle managers to learn how to work within large and vertically integrated bureaucratic organizations, be reliable, work hard, and follow orders—and rarely sought their input on product development or process innovation.

* * *

New technologies and products—the key to an industry's success—were developed over long periods of time almost exclusively by research and development shops within the corporation itself or with allies in academia, not by eliciting worker input. * * *

* * *

Immigration played a relatively modest but nonetheless significant role in the spectacular postwar rise of the United States. * * *

As a result, the admission of economic-stream immigrants was pegged primarily to filling jobs for which no U.S. workers were available, while

The INA thus formalized the notion that immigration should essentially respond to surges in the demand for labor and its inevitable supply shortfalls.

The 1965 amendments to the INA reinforced that notion. With the emerging appreciation that technological advancement would assume a more important role in maintaining the rate of economic growth, the 1965 amendments sought to facilitate the admission of skilled and educated foreigners by acknowledging the emergence of a global economy.

Soon after the passage of the 1965 amendments to the Immigration and Nationality Act, the edifice of the postwar economic order—and the U.S. economy's dominant place in it—began to crumble. * * *

* * *

Globalization and the reality of full economic interdependence are, of course, inescapable facts. The figures are nothing less than astounding. During the period under discussion, U.S. exports grew from about $20 billion in 1959 (and just $27.5 billion in 1965) to more than $700 billion in 1994. Imports during the same period registered similar growth—from about $22 billion to more than $800 billion. The total value of international economic transactions (imports plus exports) grew from a little more than 8 percent of the GDP to more than 22 percent of GDP. By 1991, total international sales by U.S. multinationals (from exports, direct investments, or joint ventures) generated an estimated $1.2 trillion—accounting for nearly 30 percent of corporate revenue.

Even more telling, U.S.-owned firms are now competing with foreign-owned firms not only abroad but also in the United States. It has thus become as difficult—and in many respects much less useful—to distinguish “American” from “foreign” firms as it is to separate “domestic” from “foreign” markets for one's products.

* * *

More important for this study, globalization has placed a premium on a better educated and trained workforce. A firm's productivity and competitiveness depend increasingly on its products' knowledge content (as distinct from its content of capital and other physical resources), on the innovativeness of its processes, on “first-to-market” corporate strategies, and on the ability to develop and exploit global connections by what Moss Kanter calls “managing the intersections” at the “crossroads of cultures.” The constantly shifting need for specific (rather than generic) expertise means that firms can obtain the needed talent more easily, if not cheaply, from outside—in effect adopting a “just-in-time” approach to the composition of the workforce. Flexible staffing, as this is called, has lessened interest in investing in the training of one's workers.

* * *

Without a flexible and well-managed economic immigration selection mechanism, many of our most competitive firms with vast global operations may reconsider their investments in additional capacity. Firms whose products are primarily knowledge-based, such as software developers, can choose to expand wherever the main intangible asset they need—"knowledge workers"—is in ample supply. "Real-time" satellite communications that bridge distances instantly and lower labor costs, together with incentive packages from other countries, make the temptation to locate abroad ever more enticing.

* * *

In this chapter, we propose fundamental changes in the way we select most economic-stream immigrants and non-immigrants. The forty-year-old, shortage-anchored, case-by-case determination that underpins the current labor certification system may have been an appropriate job and wage protection mechanism for the unskilled and semi-skilled workers who dominated employment-based admissions in the 1950s and 1960s. However, as the analysis of the last two decades' economic and labor market changes in Chapter 1 makes clear, the system no longer adequately meets U.S. needs or interests. Our proposed reforms would generally shift the selection system's focus to one that chooses immigrants on the basis of their promise for long-term contributions to our economy. Employers would continue to make all selection decisions, but they would select from pools of individuals who can pass a threshold of requirements that include a points test. Employers would also be required to attest to certain recruitment, wage, and employment conditions. Numerical limitations would continue to be imposed, but a year's ceilings would be based on the previous year's usage.

* * *

In the non-permanent system, most of the changes we propose focus on the H-1B category. * * *

* * *

The Goals of Economic-Stream Immigration

Within some numerical parameters (see below), the U.S. economy should be able to access key talent wherever it is available, with procedures that are fully transparent and have predictable outcomes. Moss Kanter's "thinkers," "traders," and in certain narrow instances, "makers" best represent the types of talented foreign-born workers that enhance the competitive positions of the firms that employ them and are most beneficial in the long run both to the broader economy and to their fellow employees.
* * *

Conversely, in all but the most exceptional circumstances, there is no reason to admit unskilled or semi-skilled workers under our permanent economic-stream immigration system. * * *

* * *

We believe that the following general propositions should guide the reform effort:

General Proposition 1: Most economic-stream immigrants should continue to be selected by employers on the basis of their expected contributions to that employer. However, they should be selected from a pool of individuals who possess characteristics that enhance the prospects that they will also make substantial long-term contributions to the economic strength of the United States.

General Proposition 2: Most economic non-immigrants should be admitted: (a) to fill a specific labor need for a temporary period * * *

* * *

We propose dividing economic-stream immigration into three tiers. The top tier would be similar to the current EB-1 immigrant visa category. The second tier, where the bulk of our proposed changes apply, would include an employer sponsorship requirement, a work experience requirement, wage and other attestations, and several selection criteria against which candidates would be “tested.” The third tier would be for investors.

* * *

The system we propose would replace the labor certification function currently used for admitting most immigrants in the employment-based second and third preference categories. We recommend abolishing this function because its emphasis on “shortages” is no longer an appropriate framework for the affirmative immigration policies that undergird successful global economies. Despite endless attempts at “correction,” it continues to be unable to work as intended, is riddled with delays that make a mockery of its stated intentions and, as discussed at length [earlier], provides virtually no protection for U.S. workers.

In addition, the labor certification system focuses on only a short-term goal: the immediate needs of the labor market. Immigrants are permanent additions to the labor force. It makes little sense to admit them (using labor certification or any similar system) solely on the basis of a specific job opening that may quickly become redundant or for a function that may offer few long-term benefits for either the employer or the country. Instead, a key goal of the economic immigrant selection system should be to satisfy ourselves that those who are admitted into the United States as presumptive members of our society have a proper mix of skills and other attributes, such as experience, education, and language, that maximizes the probability of long-term success in the labor force. Even if it worked perfectly, the existing labor certification process would have no more than a haphazard relationship to that goal.

* * *

The top tier of the new economic immigrant visa system would be similar to the current EB-1 immigrant visa category for “priority workers.” Foreign nationals with extraordinary ability presumptively enhance the economic strength of the United States. So do outstanding professors and researchers. And foreign executives and managers who currently meet the EB-1-3 subcategory's requirements clearly facilitate international trade with the United States.

The shortcomings of the current immigration system are clearest with regard to the second-tier economic-stream, and this is where we propose to make the most changes.

To qualify for our proposed second-tier economic-stream immigrant visa category, foreign nationals would have to satisfy three prerequisites. First, they must have a job offer from a U.S. employer. Second, they must have at least three years' work experience in the specific occupation for which they are being sponsored. Third, the sponsoring employer must make certain attestations, including a commitment to pay them the higher of (a) the actual wage the employer pays to other similarly qualified and employed individuals, or (b) the prevailing wage rate for the occupation in the area of employment. Individuals who satisfy these prerequisites would also need to qualify under a selection formula that awards value points for certain human capital attributes.

Employer Sponsorship Requirement. Requiring immigrants in the second tier to have a job offer before coming to the United States will ensure that a U.S. employer will be at the controls of both timetable and process, and that the selected immigrant will be working as soon as he or she enters the United States. This will give immigrants immediate access to economic opportunity, allowing them to make a more complete transition into U.S. society. A job offer is the best single assurance that an economic need is being met (an imperfect yet credible substitute for a demand-and-supply test) and that economic-stream immigration occurs in an orderly fashion. Together with the selection criteria suggested below, employer sponsorship helps assure the immigrant's immediate contribution to the United States.

More important, requiring employer sponsorship adds another level of screening to a selection process that costs the government nothing. Before an immigrant qualifies under the second tier of our proposed system, an employer will have had to review and approve his or her credentials, interpersonal and communications skills, and likelihood of career success. Furthermore, by the time the employer begins the actual visa petitioning process, the firm will already have decided that the prospective immigrant is essential to its business and will have made a preliminary judgment that he or she will be able to meet the screening criteria for admission. The fact that the foreign worker meets the program's other selection criteria means that he or she will also have the tools to make a long-term contribution to the broader economy.

Experience Requirement. As a rule, experienced workers make a more immediate contribution to their employer and to the broader economy than do inexperienced workers. Furthermore, admitting inexperienced economic-stream immigrants to the United States could create unnecessary competition for U.S. workers vying for entry-level positions. Therefore, we propose that an individual must have at least three years of prior work experience in the specific field and subfield for which an employer is recruiting to be eligible for second-tier immigrant status.

Attestation Requirements. We propose that sponsoring employers fulfill a three-part attestation requirement for second-tier economic-stream immigrants: (a) a wage attestation; (b) a no strike or lockout attestation; and (c) a notice requirement.

Wage attestation. Employers sponsoring a second-tier immigrant would be required to attest that they will pay the foreign worker the higher of (a) the actual wage the employer pays other individuals who are similarly employed with similar qualifications or (b) the prevailing wage rate for the occupation in the area of employment. Our emphasis on an objective and reliable wage attestation requirement stems from our conviction that nothing in the permanent or non-permanent U.S. economic-stream selection system should encourage employers to “prefer” hiring foreign workers simply because they are cheaper. Doing so amounts to a governmental subsidy that hurts U.S. workers. * * *

* * *

As long as prevailing wage surveys follow generally accepted survey methodology standards, employers can rely on them to make sure they are paying the prevailing wage. In the event of a dispute, a rule of reason should apply—i.e., whether the source data are reasonable and consistent with industry standards.

No strike or lockout attestation: We also believe that employers should attest that there is no strike or lockout at the place of employment. * * *

* * *

Notice-of-filing attestation. Finally, we propose that employers should also attest that they have given their employees notice of the filing of the attestation, both by posting the attestation at the worksite and by giving notice to the union or professional association representative, if there is one. Such a notice requirement gives U.S. workers an opportunity to participate in the process, and to file a complaint if they believe the employer is violating the law.

Satisfying the attestation requirements. Employers would have two ways to satisfy our proposed attestation requirements: (a) prequalification or (b) case-by-case. To prequalify, employers would have to document that their recruitment, compensation, and employment policies are within a band of “acceptable” business norms, for example, in the way they advertise for, recruit, interview, and select employees. A company requesting attestation prequalification would have to show that it has a formal company-wide compensation and employment policy that is communicated to all employees and that covers such standard issues as salary increases, bonuses, benefits, and job classifications. The company’s compensation system would have to rely on market data to set wage and benefit levels. Other factors that might be considered for the prequalification component include whether the company has a human resources or personnel department to administer its compensation system, has established documentation for job categories, and routinely relies on up-to-date national or area salary surveys to establish wage levels.

Companies that meet these eligibility requirements would be prequalified as meeting the attestation requirements for second-tier purposes for two years, renewable in two-year increments upon resubmitting relevant information. During this period, the employer would simply file second-tier immigrant visa petitions, with copies of the posted attestation and the blanket approval, with the INS. The employer would also send the DOL a copy of the attestation for audit and investigation purposes. We intend for prequalification to raise a rebuttable presumption that the employer is complying with the attestation requirements. The DOL should be able to investigate alleged violations by such employers only if it receives credible allegations of fraud or other serious violations.

* * *

Companies that do not meet the prequalification requirements for second-tier attestation purposes, or that do not want to use the prequalification alternative for any reason, would continue to file individual attestations. Such individual attestations would be filed with the INS rather than with the DOL, although a copy would be sent to the DOL for audit and investigation purposes. Evidence to show compliance with the prevailing wage attestation condition could consist of a copy of the survey or other reliable data on which the prevailing wage is based. Evidence of the actual wage could be documented by a copy of the job posting showing the salary offered and a summary of what other workers in the same position earn. Employers would not be required, however, to document their entire wage system.

Enforcing Compliance. We recognize that shifting to an attestation process to ensure compliance with our proposed system raises basic questions of enforceability. As a result, we recommend enhancing enforceability by requiring employers to maintain an adequate "paper trail" for audit and enforcement purposes should they later come under scrutiny or investigation. For instance, employers should be required to keep a record of their sources for prevailing wage information, adequate payroll records to determine the actual wage paid, records of what steps they took to recruit U.S. workers, copies of W-2s or other payroll information, etc. Considering that most of the firms that are likely to use our proposed second-tier immigrant system will be well-organized firms with clearly articulated personnel policies and well-staffed human resources departments, the requirements we recommend are far less intrusive and unusual—or costly—than one might think. The increasing reliance on electronic systems means that personnel files can easily be programmed to include the information required under our proposals.

Moreover, the attestations themselves should be kept by the INS and the DOL in a computer database, so that any interested person or entity could readily access non-proprietary data, properly protected for privacy, in a usable format. Complaints about any aspect of the attestation process should be received and acted upon on an anonymous basis. Our concept is to repose a greater degree of trust in the employer at the inception of the process, but not to let the employer off the hook. Those who betray that trust should pay a heavy price in terms of fines, debarment from immigration programs for specified periods, and even criminal prosecutions in appropriate cases.

Employer sponsorship, previous work experience, and attestations are the prerequisites that employers and prospective immigrants must meet if they are to be eligible to file an immigrant visa petition under our proposed second tier. To actually obtain a second-tier immigrant visa, however, the pre-selected immigrant must also have personal characteristics that are essential to making a sustained and substantial contribution to the United States. These characteristics are as follows:

- The language ability and communications skills necessary to interact effectively with colleagues and customers;
- An educational background that has instilled both specific knowledge or technical skills and a facility for abstract thinking;
- A demonstrated commitment to improving one's own human capital endowments;
- A familiarity with U.S. culture and economic institutions adequate to allow one to adapt to dramatic labor market changes over his or her career; and
- An age that permits one to make a long-term substantial contribution to one's adopted country before retirement.

Table 4-2 outlines our proposal for selection criteria, with suggested numerical weights. However, considering the rate at which economic conditions change, we believe that it makes little sense to legislate these factors. Congress moves too slowly for it to enact detailed changes on immigration, particularly on the controversial and highly complex topic of economic-stream immigration. Just as we want the economic immigrants we choose to be able to adapt, so too we need flexibility in our selection system. Hence, immigration officials should be given authority to change both the criteria for selecting economic immigrants and the number of points needed to qualify periodically, as economic conditions change. Such flexibility is essential for our system's success. Moreover, Congress' need to stay engaged can be discharged relatively easily by requiring that proposed changes be vetted in advance with the two subcommittees charged with overseeing immigration.

4.2. Proposed Selection Criteria System (Second-Tier Immigrants and H-1 Non-immigrants Only)

Factor	Criteria	Points	Max
Education	High School	1	7
	Some College	2
	Bachelor's Degree	4
	Master's/MBA/JD	6
	PhD/MD	7
	Completion of Apprenticeship/Vocational Program, plus five years' post vocational program experience	5
	Master Craftsperson/Teacher of Trainers	1
Age	<25	1	3
	25-50	3
	>50	1
Language	Functional English	3	8
	Fluent English	5
	Fluency in a third language other than English or native language	3
Adaptability	Has previously worked or studied for a substantial period of time in the U.S. or another foreign country	2	5
	Has taken advantage of opportunities for personal or professional development, including language classes, or completed on-the-job or other training, as evidenced by a certificate of completion	1
	Has taken a leadership role in teamwork arrangements, as evidenced by an affidavit from employer or supervisor	1
	Has worked in a multi-country team setting before, as evidenced by an affidavit from employer or supervisor	1
		1
Total Maximum Points:		23
Proposed Pass Mark Number for Second-Tier Immigrants:		15
Proposed Pass Mark Number for H-1 Non-Immigrants		12

Our proposed selection criteria system is superior to the current system for a number of reasons. First, it better accords with the policy goal of maximizing the probability of long-term economic contributions and success in the labor force.

Second, it better satisfies the programmatic objective that the immigrant selection process should be efficient, timely, fair, and transparent for all parties. * * *

It is up to Congress to engage the appropriate actors in a dialogue about the precise number of points to be initially accorded to each factor, and the minimum number of points that should qualify an immigrant under the system. We believe, however, that the following factors are critical to making a sustained economic contribution to the United States, and therefore should be included in any selection criteria system. Our selection criteria scheme, based on the following factors, would have a maximum of 23 points and a pass mark of 15 points. As the INS accumulates experience with the system over time, it may want to consider a larger range to be able to make finer distinctions within factors or to change weights among factors.

Education. * * *

Education is the strongest predictor of economic success. * * * The DOL estimates that the number of jobs requiring at least a bachelor's degree will expand by about 40 percent by 2005, while jobs that do not require a college education will grow by only 17 percent during the same period.

Age. Other things being equal, younger workers will have more time to make a contribution to the U.S. economy than will older workers. However, young workers with little or no experience will make a smaller immediate contribution than more experienced workers, while also competing for entry-level positions with new or recent U.S. college graduates. * * *

* * *

Language. A person cannot succeed in today's labor market without being able to conceptualize and communicate in English effectively. Employers know this and would be unlikely to hire someone permanently who is unable to communicate effectively in English. * * *

* * *

We also propose awarding extra points to individuals who are fluent in a language other than their native language and English. Knowledge of three languages makes a person more likely to succeed in the labor force and to make a more significant contribution to the U.S. economy, especially in the growing international marketplace.

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. What do you think the economic goals of employment-based immigration should be? Compared to the present labor certification system, how well does the Papademetriou/Yale-Loehr proposal accommodate both the long-term and the short-term economic needs that you have just identified?
2. What process goals would you set for an employment-based immigration program? What qualities, in other words, do you think the ideal procedure should embody? Compared to the present labor certification system, how well does the Papademetriou/Yale-Loehr proposal serve those goals?
3. The authors' proposal contains several crucial ingredients. One of the most significant is the substitution of employer attestation for labor certification. (Note that PERM, by freeing employers from documentation obligations unless and until they are audited, brings the current process closer to what the authors have proposed.) As to that:
 - a. How might employers manipulate the proposed system? What safeguards do the authors recommend to thwart those efforts? Are the suggested safeguards sufficient? If an employer is intent on evading the requirement that foreign workers receive equal pay, are there ways to do so? (Consider especially the need to identify workers who are "similarly employed" and possess "similar qualifications." What is to prevent employers from defining comparability in such a way as to deflate the wage scales?)
 - b. What is your reaction to the two-year blanket attestation feature?

c. Under the proposed system, what should happen if the immigrant leaves his or her original job after a short time and takes a similar job with another employer? Should the new employer be required to pay him or her the greater of the prevailing wage and the new employer's actual wage for the same position? Or should the wage requirements lapse after the first job?

4. If the goal is to replace the current system's emphasis on short-term employer needs with criteria that augur the employee's long-term contributions, then why require a job offer?

5. The authors propose a requirement of three years work experience in the particular field (and subfield) for which the employer is recruiting. What are the pros and cons of a work experience requirement?

6. Interestingly, the proposed system does not require the employer even to attempt to recruit American workers before hiring a qualified noncitizen. Even if 50 qualified Americans apply for the job, the proposed policy would permit the employer to hire a qualified (even a less credentialed) noncitizen if all the other requirements are met. Argue for and against a recruitment requirement.

7. If all the other requirements are met, the applicant must tally a specified number of points. English language capability is one of the elements in the point total. Argue the pros and cons of assigning points for English language. (Consider especially the racial implications.)

8. The proposal for a points system raises some interesting "Who decides?" questions. Broad delegations of legislative authority to the executive branch are generally less common and more constrained in the United States than they are in the parliamentary democracies, a pattern that is evident in immigration as well as in other spheres of federal regulation. See generally Stephen H. Legomsky, The Making of United States Refugee Policy: Separation of Powers in the Post-Cold War Era, 70 Washington L. Rev. 675 (1995). Yet the proposed points system calls for the executive branch (with broad guidance from Congress) to decide (a) which attributes garner points; (b) how many points a given attribute receives; and (c) how many total points it takes to be admissible. In addition to formulating these general rules, the government would also determine how many points each applicant has earned. What are your reactions to the proposed decisionmaking apparatus?

9. Like the final report of the U.S. Commission on Immigration Reform, Legal Immigration: Setting Priorities 81-104 (1995), Papademetriou and Yale-Loehr advocate the elimination of employment-based visas for unskilled workers. Do you agree?⁴⁴

44. For another thoughtful analysis of United States employment-based immigration policy, see Susan Martin, B. Lindsay Lowell & Philip Martin, U.S. Immigration Policy: Admission of High Skilled Workers, 16 Georgetown Immigration L.J. 619 (2002).

For some good discussions of Australian and European programs for both temporary and permanent skills-based immigration, and some thoughtful comparative studies, see Mary Crock, Contract or Compact: Skilled Migration and the Dictates of Politics and

10. Professor Bill Ong Hing suggests an entirely different direction. He argues that perceptions within the African-American community that immigrants are taking jobs from African-Americans are enough reason to reduce or even repeal employment-based immigration entirely and to expand job training programs for African-Americans. See Bill Ong Hing, Immigration Policies: Messages of Exclusion to African Americans, 37 Howard L.J. 237, 239, 262-81 (1994).

11. Professor Howard Chang, analogizing to principles of international trade, finds immigration to be a net economic benefit under any of several hypotheses. In sharp contrast to Professor Hing, he argues that that benefit would increase if Congress were to eliminate the ceiling on employment-based immigration, repeal the labor certification requirement, and tax immigration.⁴⁵ Excerpts from this article appear on pages 75-78 above. Chang further argues that the labor certification program is essentially government-mandated job discrimination against noncitizens. Howard F. Chang, Immigration and the Workplace: Immigration Restrictions as Employment Discrimination, 78 Chicago-Kent L. Rev. 291 (2003). Professor Jagdeep Bhandari thoughtfully explores whether international trade complements international migration or merely substitutes for it. See Jagdeep S. Bhandari, Migration and Trade Policies: Symmetry or Paradox?, 6 Journal of Internat'l Business & Law 17 (2007).

2. THE FOURTH PREFERENCE: CERTAIN "SPECIAL IMMIGRANTS"

As noted earlier, the various prongs of the fourth employment-based preference, INA § 203(b)(4), are not generally aimed at redressing labor shortages. Rather, they serve a variety of other miscellaneous functions, mostly concerned with the special circumstances of the people they encompass. This preference covers every category of "special immigrant" described in INA § 101(a)(27), except those that are described in subsections (A) and (B) (which cover certain immigrants who are exempt from the quota). You might wish to skim section 101(a)(27) to get a sense of the types of categories included. For a good treatment of one of the main subgroups, see Enid Trucios-Haynes, Religion and the Immigration and Nationality Act: Using Old Saws on New Bones, 9 Georgetown Immigration L.J. 1 (1995).

Ideology, 16 Georgetown Immigration L.J. 133 (2001); Kay Hailbronner, Labor Transfer Schemes—In Whose National Interest? Globalization and the Transfer of Labor—The European Experience, 16 Georgetown Immigration L.J. 773 (2002); B. Lindsay Lowell & Susan Martin, Transatlantic Roundtable on High Skilled Migration: A Report on the Proceedings, 15 Georgetown Immigration L.J. 649 (2001); Ron McCallum, Australian Labor Law, Migration and the Performance of Work, 16 Georgetown Immigration L.J. 637 (2002); Stephen Yale-Loehr & Christoph Hoashi-Erhardt, A Comparative Look at Immigration and Human Capital Assessment, 16 Georgetown Immigration L.J. 99 (2001).

45. See Howard F. Chang, Liberalized Immigration as Free Trade: Economic Welfare and the Optimal Immigration Policy, 145 Univ. Pennsylvania L. Rev. 1147 (1997), expanded and updated in Howard F. Chang, Migration as International Trade: The Economic Gains from the Liberalized Movement of Labor, 3 UCLA J. Law & Foreign Affairs 371 (1998).

3. THE FIFTH PREFERENCE: IMMIGRANT INVESTORS

Until 1990, Congress had never made explicit provision for the admission of immigrants who wished to start commercial enterprises in the United States. Nonimmigrant investors could enter under INA § 101(a)(15)(E)(ii), as you will see in chapter 4. At one time an immigrant investor, if otherwise admissible, could enter on a nonpreference basis under the pre-1990 version of INA § 203(a)(7). INS regulations exempted from the labor certification requirement any immigrant who invested a specified minimum amount (which changed over the years) in a United States enterprise, would serve as the principal manager, and would employ at least one United States citizen or LPR other than the investor or his or her family. 8 CFR § 212.8(b)(4) (1990). Such an immigrant was deemed not to be entering the United States to perform labor. Upon the evaporation of nonpreference slots in 1978, however, see Solis-Ramirez v. U.S.D.O.J., 758 F.2d 1426, 1429 (11th Cir.1985), that regulation gathered dust. Some investors tried to start companies, obtain labor certification for themselves as “employees,” and enter under an employment-based preference, but there were substantial barriers. See pages 318–19 above.

Canada and Australia have long had formal programs for the permanent admission of immigrant investors. See generally Comment, Immigration for Investors: A Comparative Analysis of U.S., Canadian, and Australian Policies, 7 Boston College Internat'l & Comp. L. Rev. 113 (1984). Over the years many observers advocated a similar program for the United States, both to create jobs and to improve the country's balance of trade.⁴⁶

Others have objected to the whole concept, viewing it as a means for the rich to “buy” their way into the United States. See, e.g., Select Comm'n on Immigration and Refugee Policy, note 46 above, at 336 (statement of Theodore M. Hesburgh, Chair of Comm'n); 129 Cong. Rec. S6738 (May 16, 1983) (Sen. Bumpers). One might also ask whether, as a matter of policy, the United States ought to be encouraging the flow of capital from third world countries. Just as INA § 212(e) seeks to avoid a “brain drain” by restricting the ability of exchange visitors to attain permanent residence, should the law similarly discourage a “capital drain” from less developed countries?

The Immigration Act of 1990, § 121(a), created the immigrant investor program. The details are in INA § 203(b)(5). Under this program, approximately 10,000 visas per year are reserved for immigrants (and their spouses and children accompanying or following to join, see INA § 203(d)) who establish new commercial enterprises in the United States, invest at least $1,000,000 (subject to the discretion of the Secretary of Homeland Security to modify the minimum amount in specified ways), and employ at least ten Americans.

46. See, e.g., Select Comm'n on Immigration and Refugee Policy, U.S. Immigration Policy and the National Interest (Final Report) 131–32 (1981); Austin T. Fragomen &

Gwendolyn M. Robosson, The Foreign Investor: Current Approaches Toward United States Immigration Law, 18 Vanderbilt J. Transnat'l L. 335, 371–73 (1985).

In 2002, Congress amended INA § 203(b)(5) in several places to eliminate the requirement that the applicant “establish” a commercial enterprise. It is now enough that the applicant “invest in” it. See Twenty-First Century Department of Justice Appropriations Authorization Act, Pub. L. 107-273, 116 Stat. 1758, § 11036 (Nov. 2, 2002).

What would prevent someone from starting a new company, investing the requisite capital, hiring ten or more Americans, acquiring LPR status, and then immediately shutting down the company, laying off the employees, and withdrawing his or her funds? To avoid that scenario, Congress attached conditions subsequent, parallel to the kinds of conditions subsequent that you saw earlier in connection with marriage-based immigration. INA § 216A empowers the Secretary to terminate the immigrant investor’s status within two years upon finding that “the establishment of the commercial enterprise was intended solely as a means of evading the immigration laws” or that the various requirements for fifth preference status (commercial enterprise, minimum investment amount, etc.) are not being sustained. There is also an affirmative requirement, again analogous to that of the marriage fraud provision, that the immigrant investor, during the 90-day period immediately preceding the second anniversary of his or her admission as an LPR, petition for removal of the conditions.

Termination of the investor’s permanent residence on the ground that “the establishment of the commercial enterprise was intended solely as a means of evading the immigration laws” is of course analogous to the IMFA provision that authorizes termination when “the qualifying marriage * * * was entered into for the purpose of procuring an alien’s entry as an immigrant.” INA § 216(b)(1)(A)(i). The latter provision reflects the view that one should not marry for immigration benefits. In investor cases, however, does an analogous policy really make sense? In contrast to marriage-based immigration, isn’t the whole point of the investor preference to entice noncitizens to start up American enterprises? Is the person who accepts that invitation doing anything wrong? Or is there perhaps some difference between the person who establishes an enterprise “solely as a means of evading the immigration laws” (forbidden for investors) and the person who establishes it “for the purpose of procuring [his or her] entry as an immigrant” (the analogous test for marriage fraud under INA § 216(b)(1)(A)(i))? One possibility is that the evasion provision was meant merely to ensure that the investment involves actual risk, rather than a repurchase agreement more in the nature of a loan. On this issue there has been internal disagreement within the former INS. See Matter of Izummi, 22 I. & N. Dec. 169 (INS 1998). Alternatively, does the investor program have other purposes? Possibilities include (a) speeding the admission of those people who would have invested in the United States anyway, so that jobs for Americans can be created that much sooner; and (b) overcoming resistance to “foreigners buying up America” by making the foreigners Americans.

Investors need not pay the entire minimum amount up front; they need only be “actively in the process of investing” that amount. INA § 203(a)(5)(A)(ii). To meet that requirement, investors have used a variety of methods, including secured promissory notes, balloon payments, options to sell, and pooled investments. Many immigration investment consultants advertised that even a $125,000 investment under certain circumstances could meet the threshold requirement, and the INS in fact approved many such schemes. See Stanley Mailman & Stephen Yale-Loehr, Controversy over Investor Category, 3 BIB 491 (May 15, 1998). The program began to gather steam.

But the bubble burst in December 1997 when the INS General Counsel issued a 36-page legal opinion disapproving many of these arrangements. See Memorandum from the Office of General Counsel to Paul W. Virtue, HQCOU 70/6.1.8 & 70/9-P (Dec. 19, 1997), reproduced in 75 IR No. 9, App. I (Mar. 9, 1998). The opinion also made the change retroactive, resulting in the revocation of previously granted visa petitions. Mailman & Yale-Loehr, above, at 494-95. In the following summer, the INS Associate Commissioner for Examinations issued a series of four published opinions that together take a strict view of qualifying investments.⁴⁷

After much emotional torment and passionate debate, the investor preference has almost become a non-event. The annual ceiling is approximately 10,000, but from its inception through fiscal year 1998, annual admissions ranged from 59 to 1361. (And that counts accompanying spouses and children). See 1998 INS Statistical Yearbook, Table 4 at 28. From 1998 to 2003, annual admissions dropped every year, plummeting to 64 in 2003. After that they gradually increased, but only up to 806 in fiscal year 2007. See U.S. Dept. of Homeland Security, 2003 Yearbook of Immigration Statistics, Table 4 at 20 (Sept. 2004); U.S. Dept. of Homeland Security, 2007 Yearbook of Immigration Statistics, Table 6, <http://www.dhs.gov/ximgtn/statistics/publications/LPR07.shtm>. In contrast, by July 1999, Canada had attracted 16,417 immigrant investors (not counting family members). 76 IR 1027 (July 2, 1999). Canada's new Immigration and Refugee Protection Act, S.C. 2001, c.27, allows the admission of both "investors" and "entrepreneurs." See Benjamin A. Kranc, The New Canadian Immigration and Refugee Protection Act, 79 IR 1565, 1568 (Oct. 21, 2002).

Proponents of a U.S. investor program have attributed the lackluster response to several factors. One commentator emphasizes the former INS's long delay in issuing the necessary regulations; the $1,000,000 threshold investment amount, less favorable than the lower capital amounts required in Canada and Australia; certain other restrictions; the risks posed by the two-year conditional status; and the relative lack of efficiency and understanding exhibited by immigration officials when processing investor applications. David Hirson & Catherine I. Mayou, The Sinking of the Titanic or the Rising of the Phoenix?—An Update on Immigrant Investor Visas, September 1998 Immigration Briefings, at 8. Papademetriou and Yale-Loehr agree that the $1,000,000 threshold and the two-year requirement might be putting off potential investors, but they also identify such other factors as the statutory requirement that ten jobs be created and the agency requirement that the investor supply the last five years' personal income tax returns disclosing worldwide income. Demetrios G. Papademetriou & Stephen Yale-Loehr, Carnegie Endowment for International Peace, Rethinking U.S. Selection of Skilled Immigrants 164–66 (1996). The U.S. policy of taxing the worldwide income of LPRs (as well as that of U.S. citizens) might be a further deterrent. In an attempt to make the program more attractive, USCIS has established an “Investor and Regional Center Unit” at USCIS headquarters to speed the processing of applications.⁴⁸ For a good summary of the entire fifth preference program, see Stephen Yale-Loehr & Lindsay Schoonmaker, EB-5 Immigrant Investor Green Cards: An Update, 13 BIB 1373 (Nov. 1, 2008).

47. See Matter of Ho, 22 I. & N. Dec. 206 (INS 1998); Matter of Hsiung, 22 I. & N. Dec. 201 (INS 1998); Matter of Izummi, 22 I.

& N. Dec. 169 (INS 1998); Matter of Soffici, 22 I. & N. Dec. 158 (INS 1998).

D. DIVERSITY IMMIGRANTS

Almost from the inception of immigration controls, the United States laws have consciously influenced the distribution of immigrant admissions by national origin. As you saw in chapter 2, the early immigration laws imposed special restrictions on the Chinese and, shortly thereafter, on Asians generally. The national origins quota system, first inaugurated in 1921 and made permanent three years later, was a comprehensive effort to control the ethnicity of the immigrant stream. Under that system, the quota for immigrants from any given country was a fixed percentage of the number of Americans who could trace their ancestries to that country. See pages 15–16 above. In 1965 Congress finally repealed the national origins quota system but at the same time imposed per-country limitations (initially only on Eastern Hemisphere nations, extended to Western Hemisphere nations in 1976).⁴⁹

Despite those conscious efforts either to favor some ethnic groups over others or simply to make the ethnic composition of the immigrant stream generally diverse, today's immigrants do not hail in equal numbers from all parts of the world. As you saw earlier, the vast majority of the legal immigrants in the 1970's, 1980's, and 1990's have come from Asia, Mexico and Latin America, and the Caribbean. There are several reasons, including geographic proximity (in the case of the Americas) and economic disparities, for these modern immigration patterns. Many people ascribe the patterns to the priority American immigration law has given to family preferences since 1952. As the number of immigrants from a given country

48. See Stephen Yale-Loehr, USCIS Vows to Improve EB-5 Immigrant Investor Programs, 10 BIB 169 (Feb. 15, 2005); Stanley Mailman & Stephen Yale-Loehr, Immigrant Investor Green Cards: Rise of the Phoenix, 10 BIB 801 (May 15, 2005).

49. See pages 18–19 above. For the political history of the diversity program, see increases, the opportunities for the future immigration of family members (typically from the same country) also increase. In this way, a high priority on family unity tends to make immigration patterns self-reinforcing.

Peter H. Schuck, Diversity in America—Keeping Government at a Safe Distance, chap. 4 (2003); Anna O. Law, The Diversity Visa Lottery: A Cycle of Unintended Consequences in U.S. Immigration Policy, 21 J. Amer. Ethnic History, issue no. 4, at 3 (2002).

In the late 1980s, Congress passed several short-term, ad hoc programs designed to diversify immigrant admissions. These programs specifically authorized the admission of individuals from the relatively low-volume sending countries. See, e.g., Pub.L. 99-603 (IRCA), § 314, 100 Stat. 3359, 3439 (Nov. 6, 1986); Immigration Amendments of 1988, Pub.L. 100-658, § 2, 102 Stat. 3908 (Nov. 15, 1988); Immigration Act 1990, § 132.

In 1990, Congress enacted the first permanent immigrant preference based on diversity. It admits up to 50,000 “diversity immigrants” each year. Immigration Act 1990, § 131. (The original ceiling was 55,000, but the practical effect of section 203(d) of a statute known as NACARA, discussed on page 1179 below, was to reduce the figure to 50,000 per year, starting in fiscal year 1999.) The selection of the 50,000 winners is based on a series of elaborate formulas laid out in INA § 203(c). You will eventually consider the arguments for and against this and the other diversity-driven enactments, but first you need to understand how section 203(c) actually works. To do the latter, you will need to study the statutory language. The following summary might help you to follow the mathematics more easily.

Each year USCIS performs certain statutory calculations. For each foreign state, USCIS tabulates the number of people who became LPRs during the preceding five-year period as immediate relatives, family-sponsored preference immigrants, or employment-based preference immigrants (or certain miscellaneous categories, all low-volume). Any foreign state for which that five-year number exceeds 50,000 is classified as a “high-admission state;” every other state is “low-admission.” All of the 50,000 diversity visas are allocated to natives of low-admission states.

To determine which of those applicants receive the 50,000 visas, USCIS must do other calculations. For that purpose the statute divides the world into six “regions:” Africa; Asia; Europe; North America (other than Mexico); Oceania; and South America, Mexico, Central America, and the Caribbean (the last four constituting one region). Each year USCIS classifies each of the six regions as either high-admission or low admission. A region is high-admission if its natives accounted for more than one-sixth of the total LPR grants of the preceding five-year period. Every other region is “low-admission.”

Next, USCIS computes, for each region, the total population of the low-admission states of that region.

Having compiled those data, USCIS now essentially divides up the 50,000 visas between two groups: the group of high-admission regions and the group of low-admission regions. To do this, USCIS first figures out what percentage of the last five years’ immigrants were natives of high-admission regions. The low-admission regions together then receive that percentage of the 50,000 visas. The high-admission regions get the rest. For example, if 90% of the past five years' immigrants were from high-admission regions, then the low-admission regions would get 90% of the diversity visas as an offset.

Within the group of low-admission regions, the visas are allocated among the individual regions in proportion to the combined populations of the low-admission states in each of those regions. Similarly, within the group of high-admission regions, the visas are allocated among the regions in proportion to the combined populations of the low-admission states in those regions. If it appears that a region will not use its full allotment in a particular year, the unused visas are distributed among the other regions in proportion to the allotments they would otherwise have received.

Through this method, each region ends up with a prescribed share of the 50,000 diversity visas. Within each region, the individual winners are then selected "strictly in a random order established by the Secretary of State"—i.e., by lottery. INA § 203(e)(2). There are a few qualifications: The individual must meet specified requirements concerning education level or work experience. Not more than 7% of the 50,000 visas (i.e., 3500) may go to natives of any single state in a given fiscal year. In addition, the "winners" must complete certain paperwork by the end of the relevant fiscal year. In practice, processing delays and other problems frequently prevent this. As a result, not all of the 50,000 authorized diversity visas are actually awarded. In fiscal year 2007, for example, only 42,127 of the congressionally authorized 50,000 diversity immigrants were actually admitted. See U.S. Dept. of Homeland Security, 2007 Yearbook of Immigration Statistics, Table 10, <http://www.dhs.gov/ximgtn/statistics/publications/LPR07.shtm>.

In most years Europe has received the greatest number of diversity visas and Africa was second. In fiscal year 2007, however, the reverse was true, and the two continents together accounted for approximately three-fourths of the total worldwide diversity admissions. Id. In 2008, eighteen countries were classified as high-admission, and therefore ineligible for diversity visas: Brazil, Canada, China (mainland-born), Colombia, the Dominican Republic, El Salvador, Haiti, India, Jamaica, Mexico, Pakistan, Peru, the Philippines, Poland, Russia, South Korea, the United Kingdom (except for Northern Ireland, which is treated separately), and Vietnam. 84 IR 1963 (Aug. 27, 2007). For that year's lottery, 6.4 million entries were received. Id.

PROBLEM 16

Before attempting this Problem, you should study the above description. Consult INA § 203(c) if you want more detail. You won't need a calculator.

Note that the data provided in this Problem are hypothetical, not actual. In most instances they are not far off from reality, but some liberties have been taken (for example, inflating the population of Oceania) in order to simplify the arithmetic.

As a USCIS attorney, you have been handed a copy of INA § 203(c) and asked to allocate the 50,000 diversity visas among the six regions. You have gathered, for the preceding five-year period, the data that appear in the table below. How many diversity visas will each region receive?

	Immigration Past Five Years	Population of Low-admission States in Region	Number of Diversity Visas
Africa	60,000	300,000,000	_____
Asia	1,200,000	900,000,000	_____
Europe	450,000	650,000,000	_____
North America (excluding Mexico)	60,000	-0-	_____
Oceania	30,000	50,000,000	_____
South America, Mexico, Central America, and the Caribbean	1,200,000	100,000,000	_____
TOTAL	3,000,000	2,000,000,000	50,000

ESSAY ON DIVERSITY IMMIGRANTS⁵⁰

In the United States and elsewhere, immigration policy debates often reflect sharply differing conceptions of life in a multi-ethnic society. Conservative political columnist (and former White House Press Secretary) Pat Buchanan has denounced in strong language the multi-ethnic direction in which he sees the United States heading. Fearing United States counterparts to the French separatist movement in Quebec, Buchanan stresses examples of the havoc he thinks members of various ethnic groups can wreak: "Moscow's Jewish Mafia got itself transplanted to Brighton Beach;" some of the Cuban Marielitos in 1980 were "psychotics and criminals;" some Mexican immigrants seek "prey" rather than "work." He quotes with approval another writer who asks rhetorically "What will it be like in the next century, when, as Time so cheerfully predicts, white people will be in the minority?" and who maintains that "[h]igh rates of non-European immigration * * * will swamp us" (emphasis added). Buchanan asserts (and thinks it important) that "black on white is the most common form of interracial crime," asks "Who speaks for the Euro-Americans, who found-

50. This essay originally appeared in the first edition of this book (1992). For an updated and expanded version, see Stephen H. Legomsky, Immigration, Equality, and Diversity, 31 Columbia J. Transnat'l L. 319 (1993); see also Bill Ong Hing, Beyond the Rhetoric of Assimilation and Cultural Pluralism: Addressing the Tension of Separatism and Conflict in an Immigration-Driven Mul- tiracial Society, 81 California L. Rev. 863 (1993); cf. Daniel Kanstroom, Wer Sind Wir Wieder? Laws of Asylum, Immigration, and Citizenship in the Struggle for the Soul of the New Germany, 18 Yale J. Internat'l L. 155 (1993) (finding excessive Germany's emphasis on ethnic homogeneity in its citizenship and immigration laws).

ed the U.S.A.?" and pleads "Is it not time to take America back?" (From whom?) Patrick Buchanan, What Lesson for the U.S. in Canada?, Washington Times, June 27, 1990, at F-1. In chapter 1, you encountered the similar sentiments of Peter Brimelow.

Analogous rhetoric has flourished across the Atlantic. A 1988 debate in the British House of Commons included these comments from members of the then governing Conservative Party:

Ours is a society which * * * has had its identity threatened by a massive invasion of tribes and cultures. * * *

Hon. Tony Marlow

Many people * * * are exiles in their own country because of the way in which the character of our towns and cities has been altered.

Hon. Christopher Gill

The invaders * * * are indeed invaders * * *. Is [the Home Secretary] aware that one in three children born in Greater London is of ethnic extraction?

Hon. Jim Janman

Joint Council for the Welfare of Immigrants, 3 Bulletin No. 8 at 12 (Nov. 1988).

Buchanan and his British counterparts might be cruder than most other public figures in their objections to multi-ethnic societies, but there is no question that they speak for many others—both leaders and rank and file. It would be unrealistic to pretend that bigotry played no significant role in the political coalition that produced the "diversity" provisions, which were meant to bestow special preference predominantly on natives of European countries.

At the same time, it would be unfair to dismiss supporters of the "diversity" programs as racists. Many proponents of those programs believe that United States immigration laws have unwittingly discriminated against Europeans, and in favor of Asians, Latinos, and selected other groups. Their argument is that current law, which assigns the highest priority to family unity, benefits disproportionately those who hail from countries that have sent the greatest numbers of recent immigrants to the United States. Natives of those countries, the argument runs, are much more likely to have relatives in the United States to petition for them. See, e.g., Michael S. Teitelbaum, Skeptical Noises About the Immigration Multiplier, 23 Int'l Migration Rev. 893, 895-96 (1989). Europeans, in contrast, are said to have been "shut out" by laws that admit relatively few without family connections. See, e.g., Joan Biskupic, Diversity Is One Principal Goal in Deciding Whom to Let In, Cong. Q., Aug. 4, 1990, at 2519.

A related argument is that a diversity program "responds to the adverse impact of the 1965 law" [the law that abolished the national origins quota system]. Id., quoting Rep. Morrison (then Chair of House immigration subcommittee). Some of the ad hoc legislation that led up to the permanent diversity program used this terminology to describe its beneficiaries. See, e.g., IRCA § 314.

Those arguments are more respectable than the not-so-subtle appeals to racial prejudice by Buchanan and others. To be sure, our laws do allocate the greatest number of immigrant visas to family members—even with the addition of the diversity program. Still, the argument is worth examining. What, precisely, does it mean to say that the emphasis on family unity “discriminates” against, for example, Europeans? Presumably the reference is to de facto discrimination, an inevitable result of the demographic reality that Europeans are today less likely than Asians or Latinos to have close American relatives. If one were to dip one giant hand into Sweden and another giant hand into Mexico, and pluck out one randomly selected individual from each country, it is therefore true that the Mexican would have a higher probability of qualifying for immigration than would the Swede.

But is that type of de facto discrimination unjust? Would it not be more probative to ask whether a randomly selected Swede would have as high a probability of being eligible as would a similarly situated Mexican? The emphasis on family unity reflects the shared value that separation entails hardship and a premium on alleviating that hardship. The Swede who has a United States citizen spouse is treated exactly the same as the Mexican with a United States citizen spouse. The Swede with an LPR spouse is in fact treated far better than the Mexican with an LPR spouse; the effect of the per-country limitation is that, even without the diversity program, the Swede may jump ahead of the Mexican in the queue.

A related point: Would anyone seriously suggest that our refugee policy unfairly discriminates against Norwegians because Norwegians are statistically less likely than many others to face persecution at home? To such an argument, the response would be simple: The refugee admission program is there, at least in part, to alleviate one particular form of suffering. Surely no one today would maintain that, with all else equal, favoring genuine refugees is unfairly discriminatory. Doesn't the same answer apply to family unity preferences?

The suggestion that a diversity program is a necessary offset to the “adverse” effects of the 1965 law is really a different point. The argument seems to be that the diversity program is just affirmative action for Europeans, a remedy to compensate for the disproportionate adverse impact of the 1965 law. One must remember, however, that the 1965 law did not discriminate against Europeans; it merely repealed the national origins quotas that had previously discriminated in their favor. Do Europeans deserve favoritism now to offset that “adverse” effect? While we're at it, should our laws create special privileges for Southern whites whose ancestors were “adversely” affected by the abolition of slavery?

But even if the kind of “diversity” that the 1990 Act seeks to attain is accepted as a valid goal, the machinery of both the permanent new program and the various temporary programs is difficult to fathom. The Irish citizen who has been waiting for several years to join her LPR husband in the United States might be forgiven for wondering why another Irish citizen, without any specific equities, will be able to skip ahead of her and immigrate immediately on the basis of a lottery. The explanation that “we want an ethnically diverse immigrant stream” will not dispel her confusion.

It is difficult to be against “diversity.” The word conjures up positive images of a richness drawn from a wide range of interesting and valuable traditions. A diverse society can only be applauded. But the “diversity” to which section 203(c) refers is confined to the immigrant stream, not to the resulting society. Since many more Americans already trace their ancestry to Europe than to Asia or Latin America, the statutory “diversity” program is in truth an “anti-diversity” program; it causes the resulting population mix to be less ethnically diverse than it would otherwise be.

Perhaps this whole debate boils down to the way one conceptualizes immigrants. Should they be seen as individuals, to be treated equally when similarly situated, or should they be viewed as delegates of the countries in which they were born? This essay accepts the former characterization and believes that the so-called “diversity” program unjustly permits Europeans and selected others to bypass similarly situated Latinos and Asians. Those who have been waiting patiently in the queue should be treated with equal, individualized respect.

This essay is solely the viewpoint of the original author. What is your reaction?

Professor Peter Schuck, in addition to specifically criticizing the diversity visa program, takes a broader shot. While lauding the social benefits of diversity, and suggesting that the government should praise and protect diversity, he makes a sophisticated argument that nonetheless it should not be the role of government to “create or promote any particular kind of diversity” (emphasis in original). See Peter H. Schuck, Diversity in America—Keeping Government at a Safe Distance 123–31, 324 (2003). Professor Jan Ting, testifying before Congress, has similarly criticized the concept of diversity visas. See Jan Ting, Testimony to Subcomm. on Immigration, Border Security, and Claims, Comm. on the Judiciary, U.S. House of Reps. (Apr. 29, 2004).

For a well argued contrary view, see Andowah A. Newton, Injecting Diversity into U.S. Immigration Policy: The Diversity Visa Program and the Missing Discourse on its Impact on African Immigration to the United States, 38 Cornell Internat’l L.J. 1049 (2005). Newton emphasizes that, whatever the congressional motives, the program has ended up providing one of the few opportunities realistically available for African immigrants.

NONIMMIGRANT PRIORITIES

As you have seen in previous chapters, the United States immigration laws divide all non-U.S. citizens into two groups—immigrants and nonimmigrants. The former are admitted for permanent residence; the latter are admitted for specific purposes, such as study, temporary work, business, or pleasure, and ordinarily for only a temporary visit of fixed duration.

U.S. law first recognized nonimmigrants in 1819. See 2003 Yearbook of Immigration Statistics at 74. Despite that lineage, the academic literature on immigration has lavished almost exclusive attention on immigrants. The high stakes typically present in the immigrant cases make such emphasis understandable. As the practicing bar can attest, however, nonimmigrant cases also often raise difficult issues of great importance to the parties and to the public, and they typically make up a substantial proportion of the immigration lawyer's caseload. Moreover, nonimmigrants have numerical significance. In fiscal year 2007, there were over 37 million nonimmigrant admissions (not even counting the majority who were Canadian and Mexican commuters), compared to only 1,052,415 immigrants. 2007 Yearbook of Immigration Statistics, Nonimmigrant Supp. Table 1 (nonimmigrants), Table 1 (immigrants). That aside, nonimmigrants have been in the limelight in recent years, at first because of various guest worker proposals and then because of sweeping new restrictions introduced in the wake of September 11. For the moment, it is enough to note that some of the policy responses to September 11 caused marked drops in nonimmigrant admissions.

Because of the restrictions that the law places on nonimmigrants' lengths of stay and permitted activities, their admission criteria are generally less demanding than those for immigrants. For one thing, most immigrant admissions are numerically restricted; most nonimmigrant admissions are not. For another, the substantive eligibility rules are generally more stringent for immigrants.

Subject to some exceptions, noncitizens seeking admission are presumed to be immigrants and therefore subject to the higher standards of immigrant selection; to rebut that presumption they must show they qualify as nonimmigrants. INA § 214(b). To do that, they have to fit within one of the many categories of nonimmigrant laid out in section 101(a)(15) of the Act. Skim that provision now to get a sense of the kinds of nonimmigrants the law recognizes and the requirements they must meet.

A word on terminology: Both the State Department in issuing visas and DHS in granting admission often refer to nonimmigrant classes by the letters and numbers of the applicable subsections of INA § 101(a)(15). For example, section 101(a)(15)(F)(i) authorizes the admission of students, and section 101(a)(15)(F)(ii) authorizes the admission of their families. Consequently, students are said to enter on “F-1” visas, their families on “F-2” visas. The following chart shows the various nonimmigrant categories, their visa symbols, and the number of people in each category who were admitted in fiscal year 2007:

UNITED STATES DEPARTMENT OF HOMELAND SECURITY OFFICE OF IMMIGRATION STATISTICS
2007 YEARBOOK OF IMMIGRATION STATISTICS
Nonimmigrant Supplemental Table 1
<http://www.dhs.gov/ximgtn/statistics/publications/YrBk07NI.shtm>
NONIMMIGRANTS ADMITTED BY CLASS OF ADMISSION

Class of Admission	Number Admitted
All classes	37,149,651 ¹
Foreign government officials and families (A)	163,476
Temporary visitors	31,972,715
For business (B1) (total)	5,414,890
Visa Waiver, business	2,486,015
For pleasure (B2) (total)	26,557,825
Visa Waiver, pleasure	13,469,851
Transit aliens (C)	396,083
Treaty traders and investors	238,936
Treaty traders (E1)	51,722
Treaty investors (E2)	177,920
Treaty traders and investors, Australian Free Trade Agreement	9,294
Students	801,136
Academic students (F1 and F3)	788,063
Vocational students (M1)	13,073
Spouses and children of students (F2 and M2)	40,844
Representatives (and families) to international organizations (G)	120,926
Guam visitors for business or pleasure	932,346
Temporary workers and trainees (and their families)	1,118,138

1. This figure includes only those admissions that were officially recorded. In fiscal year 2007 most short-term admissions of Canadian and Mexican commuters were not recorded. See id.

Class of Admission	Number Admitted
H1-B	461,900
H-2	242,211
H-3 (trainees)	5,540
Spouses and children of H-nonimmigrants	144,136
O-1 workers, staff, and families	51,910
P workers and families	72,008
Q (cultural exchange)	2,412
R (religious workers and families)	32,043
TN and TD (NAFTA professional workers and families)	105,929
Representatives (and families) of foreign information media (I1)	43,928
Exchange visitors (J1)	443,482
Spouses and children of exchange visitors (J2)	45,804
Fiancé(e)s of U.S. citizens (K1)	32,991
Children of fiancé(e)s of U.S. citizens (K2)	5,516
Intracompany transferees (L1)	363,536
Spouses and children of intracompany transferees (L2)	167,537
NATO officials and families (N1-7)	18,888
LIFE Act [for certain spouses, fiancés, and children whose immigrant processing has been long delayed (K3 and V1-3)]	37,594
Other	100
Unknown	205,372

A nonimmigrant who seeks admission must overcome two separate hurdles: fitting into one of the specific statutory pigeonholes and avoiding the various affirmative grounds of inadmissibility. Using the same organization that chapter 3 used for immigrants, this chapter addresses only the problem of categorical qualification for nonimmigrants; the exclusion grounds for both immigrants and nonimmigrants are explored in the next chapter.

Finally, admission procedure is the subject of chapter 6. To understand the cases that follow, it is enough to know that the usual process for entering the United States as a nonimmigrant comprises at least two steps: applying for a visa at the appropriate United States consulate abroad, and presenting the visa to the CBP immigration inspector at the port of entry. As you will see, some nonimmigrants are exempt from the visa requirement, and conversely some must follow additional procedures. Labor certification is required in certain cases, employer attestations in certain others. For some categories, a person or company in the United States (an employer, a fiancé(e), etc., depending on the type of nonimmigrant) must first file a visa petition with USCIS.

A. COMMERCIAL CATEGORIES OF NONIMMIGRANTS²

1. BUSINESS VISITORS

International Union of Bricklayers and Allied Craftsmen v. Meese

United States District Court, Northern District of California, 1985.
616 F.Supp. 1387.

■ LEGGE, DISTRICT JUDGE.

Plaintiff International Union of Bricklayers and Allied Craftsmen (“International Union”) represents approximately 100,000 masonry craftsmen working in the construction industry in the United States. Plaintiff Local No. 7, California, International Union of Bricklayers and Allied Craftsmen (“Local 7”) is affiliated with plaintiff International Union in Northern California, and represents masonry craftsmen working in Lake County, California.

Defendants Edwin Meese III (“Attorney General”), George P. Schultz (“Secretary of State”), and the Immigration and Naturalization Service (“INS”) are charged with the administration and enforcement of the immigration laws in the United States. Defendant-intervenor Homestake Mining Company of California (“Homestake”) is a California corporation, and the owner of the McLaughlin Gold Project in Lake County, California.

* * *

A

Temporary Visitors for Business

The first class of nonimmigrant aliens relevant here is the “temporary visitor for business” class. Section 101(a)(15)(B) of the Act defines a “temporary visitor for business” as:

an alien (other than one coming for the purpose of study or of performing skilled or unskilled labor or as a representative of foreign press, radio, film, or other foreign information media coming to engage in such vocation) having a residence in a foreign country which he has no intention of abandoning and who is visiting the United States temporarily for business. . . .

2. See generally Austin T. Fragomen et al., Immigration Law and Business (1996) (2 vols.); 2 Gordon, Mailman & Yale-Loehr, chs.

12-29; Rodney A. Malpert & Amanda Petersen (eds.), Business Immigration Law: Strategies for Employing Foreign Nationals (2000).

An alien qualifying for this nonimmigrant status is entitled to receive a "B-1" visa.

Pursuant to his authority under the Act, the Secretary of State has promulgated a regulation defining the term "business" for purposes of the B-1 "temporary visitor for business" class:

The term "business", as used in section 101(a)(15)(B) of the Act, refers to legitimate activities of a commercial or professional character. It does not include purely local employment or labor for hire. An alien seeking to enter as a nonimmigrant for employment or labor pursuant to a contract or other prearrangement shall be required to qualify under [the regulations that govern H-2 temporary workers, discussed below].

* * *

Among the criteria utilized to determine an alien's eligibility for B-1 "temporary visitor for business" status is INS Operations Instruction 214.2(b)(5), an INS internal agency guideline that is the subject of this dispute. The Operations Instruction provides:

Each of the following may also be classified as a B-1 nonimmigrant if he/she is to receive no salary or other remuneration from a United States source (other than an expense allowance or other reimbursement for expenses incidental to the temporary stay):

* * *

(5) An alien coming to install, service, or repair commercial or industrial equipment or machinery purchased from a company outside the U.S. or to train U.S. workers to perform such service, provided: the contract of sale specifically requires the seller to perform such services or training, the alien possesses specialized knowledge essential to the seller's contractual obligation to provide services or training, the alien will receive no remuneration from a U.S. source, and the trip is to take place within the first year following the purchase.

* * *

Pursuant to the Operations Instruction, B-1 visas have been issued to the foreign laborers who came to the United States to work on the project owned by Homestake, and to foreign laborers to do other work throughout the United States. The central issue in this case is whether the Operations Instruction violates the Act and the regulations promulgated under the Act.

B

Temporary Workers

The second class of nonimmigrant aliens involved here is the "temporary worker" class. Section 101(a)(15)(H)(ii) of the Act defines a "temporary worker" as:

an alien having a residence in a foreign country which he has no intention of abandoning . . . [and] who is coming temporarily to the United States to perform temporary services or labor, if unemployed persons capable of performing such service or labor cannot be found in this country. . . .

An alien qualifying for this nonimmigrant status is entitled to receive an "H-2" [now H-2B—Ed.] visa.

* * *

Pursuant to his authority under the Act, the Attorney General has promulgated a regulation which requires the petitioning employer for an H-2 "temporary worker" applicant to seek labor certification from the Secretary of Labor prior to approval of the applicant's petition. * * *

II

The Present Case

* * *

Homestake began construction in early 1984 on its McLaughlin Gold Project in order to open a new gold mine. Due to metallurgical problems in the Lake County region, Homestake concluded that it was necessary to employ technology not used previously in the gold mining industry. Davy McKee Corporation ("Davy McKee"), Homestake's construction manager, therefore conducted a search to locate the appropriate technology.

On behalf of Homestake, Davy McKee agreed to purchase a newly-designed gold ore processing system from Didier-Werke ("Didier"), a West German manufacturing company. Although the purchase agreement required Didier to supply an integrated processing system, it was not possible to premanufacture the entire system in West Germany. The purchase agreement was therefore made contingent upon Didier's West German employees completing the work on the system at the project site in Lake County.

In September 1984, Didier submitted B-1 "temporary visitor for business" visa petitions on behalf of ten of its West German employees to United States consular officers in Bonn, West Germany. Relying upon INS Operations Instruction 214.2(b)(5), consular officers approved the petitions and issued B-1 visas to the West Germans. In January 1985, the West Germans entered the United States to work on the processing system. The work involves the installation of the interior linings of the system's autoclaves, and requires certain technical bricklaying skills.

* * *

Plaintiffs allege that the federal defendants' practice of issuing B-1 "temporary visitor for business" visas under the authority of INS Operations Instruction 214.2(b)(5) violates two provisions of the Act. First, plaintiffs allege that the practice violates section 101(a)(15)(B) of the Act, because the issuance of B-1 visas to aliens coming to the United States to perform skilled or unskilled labor is expressly prohibited by section 101(a)(15)(B). Second, plaintiffs allege that the practice violates section 101(a)(15)(H)(ii) of the Act, because aliens have been permitted to bypass the labor certification requirements contained in the regulations under section 101(a)(15)(H)(ii).

Plaintiffs therefore ask this court to declare that INS Operations Instruction 214.2(b)(5) violates the Act; to permanently enjoin the federal defendants from issuing B-1 visas under the authority of the Operations Instruction; and to order the federal defendants to reclassify the visa status of all B-1 “temporary visitor for business” alien nonimmigrants who are currently performing skilled or unskilled labor in the United States.

* * *

[In section III the court holds that the plaintiff labor unions have standing to raise these issues on behalf of their members—Eds.]

IV

The Validity of the Operations Instruction Under the Act

* * *

In testing the Operations Instruction against the Act, the court’s task is to interpret the Act in light of the purposes Congress sought to achieve in enacting it. The starting point must be the language employed by Congress. Absent a clearly expressed legislative intention to the contrary, the statutory language is to be regarded as conclusive.

A

The Language of the Act and the Operations Instruction

* * *

INS Operations Instruction 214.2(b)(5) provides that an alien may be classified as a “temporary visitor for business” nonimmigrant if:

he/she is to receive no salary or other remuneration from a United States source (other than an expense allowance or other reimbursement for expenses incidental to the temporary stay) . . . [and is] coming to install, service, or repair commercial or industrial equipment or machinery purchased from a company outside the U.S. or to train U.S. workers to perform such service. . . .

A comparison of the language of section 101(a)(15)(B) of the Act with the language of INS Operations Instruction 214.2(b)(5) demonstrates that the Operations Instruction contravenes that section of the Act. Section 101(a)(15)(B) unequivocally excludes from the B-1 “temporary visitor for business” classification an alien who is “coming for the purpose of . . . performing skilled or unskilled labor.” That exclusion is reinforced by the federal defendants’ own regulations. In this regard, the Secretary of State has promulgated a regulation defining “business” for purposes of section 101(a)(15)(B): “The term ‘business’ . . . refers to legitimate activities of a commercial or professional character. It does not include purely local employment or labor for hire." 22 CFR § 41.25(b) (1985) (emphasis added).

INS Operations Instruction 214.2(b)(5), however, does not contain an exclusion for an alien seeking to enter the United States to perform skilled or unskilled labor. The Operations Instruction provides that an alien may be classified as a "temporary visitor for business" if the alien is "coming to install, service, or repair commercial or industrial equipment or machinery." The effect of this language is to authorize the issuance of a B-1 visa to an alien coming to this country to perform skilled or unskilled labor. In the present case, for example, the West Germans undeniably are performing labor—whether it be deemed skilled or unskilled—in connection with the installation of the gold ore processing system at the McLaughlin Gold Project.

Similarly, a comparison of the language of section 101(a)(15)(H)(ii) of the Act with the language of INS Operations Instruction 214.2(b)(5) shows that the Operations Instruction also contravenes that section of the Act. Section 101(a)(15)(H)(ii) classifies an H-2 "temporary worker" as an alien "coming . . . to perform temporary services or labor, if unemployed persons capable of performing such service or labor cannot be found in this country." Because the Act requires the Attorney General to consult other agencies of the government concerning "temporary worker" visas, see INA § 214(c), the Attorney General has established H-2 labor certification procedures. Thus, an H-2 visa petition cannot be approved unless the alien's employer obtains either "[a] certification from the Secretary of Labor . . . stating that qualified persons in the United States are not available and that the employment of the beneficiary will not adversely affect wages and working conditions of workers in the United States similarly employed . . . [or] notice that such certification cannot be made."

In contrast, INS Operations Instruction 214.2(b)(5) does not require an alien to seek labor certification prior to obtaining a nonimmigrant visa. More importantly, the Operations Instruction authorizes the issuance of a nonimmigrant visa to a person performing skilled or unskilled labor, though qualified Americans may be available to perform the work involved. The Operations Instruction therefore lacks the safeguards contained in section 101(a)(15)(H)(ii) of the Act and the regulation promulgated under that section. Again, the present case illustrates this point, because the parties have stipulated that neither the West Germans nor their employer was required to seek labor certification from the Secretary of Labor prior to the issuance of the visas to the West Germans.

* * *

B

The Intent of Congress

* * *

The current substantive versions of sections 101(a)(15)(B) and 101(a)(15)(H)(ii) of the Act were enacted in 1952. Congress, however, demonstrated its concern for the protection of American workers as early as 1885. In the Act of Feb. 26, 1885, Congress enacted legislation prohibiting the entry of contract laborers. Contract laborers generally were unskilled aliens who received minimal wages in return for passage to the United States. The importation of those laborers was intended "to oversupply the demand for labor so that the domestic laborers would be forced to work at reduced wages." * * *

* * *

Significant changes in the immigration laws were enacted by Congress in the Immigration and Nationality Act of 1952. Congress amended section 101(a)(15)(B) of the Act—the successor to section 3(2) of the 1924 Act—to include a specific provision excluding an alien from the B-1 "temporary visitor for business" class who comes to the United States "for the purpose of . . . performing skilled or unskilled labor." Further, Congress enacted section 101(a)(15)(H)(ii) of the Act, thereby establishing the H-2 "temporary worker" class.

In taking these actions, Congress evidenced a continuing concern for the protection of American workers from unnecessary foreign competition. The House Report accompanying the 1952 Act explained that the purpose of section 101(a)(15)(H)(ii) was to:

grant the Attorney General sufficient authority to admit temporarily certain alien workers, industrial, agricultural, or otherwise, for the purpose of alleviating labor shortages as they exist or may develop in certain areas or certain branches of American productive enterprises. . . .

* * *

The foregoing legislative history demonstrates that one of Congress' central purposes in the Act was the protection of American labor. The legislative history also demonstrates that sections 101(a)(15)(B) and 101(a)(15)(H)(ii) of the Act were intended to restrict the influx of aliens seeking to perform skilled or unskilled labor in the United States. Thus, to the extent that INS Operations Instruction 214.2(b)(5) permits aliens to circumvent the restrictions enacted by Congress in those sections, the Operations Instruction is inconsistent with both the language and the legislative intent of the Act.

C

Defendants' Arguments

Defendants contend that INS Operations Instruction 214.2(b)(5) should be upheld because it embodies a reasonable administrative interpretation of the Act.

Defendants' argument centers on the purposes Congress sought to achieve in sections 101(a)(15)(B) and 101(a)(15)(H)(ii) of the Act. Defendants contend that those sections evidence Congress' intent to foster multiple purposes. Although defendants acknowledge that one such purpose was the protection of American labor, they argue that another was the promotion of international commerce. Further, defendants assert that the language in sections 101(a)(15)(B) and 101(a)(15)(H)(ii) reveals a tension between American labor interests and international commerce interests; that the Operations Instruction seeks to minimize the tension; and that the Operations Instruction is therefore consistent with the multiple purposes in the Act.

Defendants rely primarily upon the decision of the Board of Immigration Appeals in Matter of Hira, 11 I. & N. Dec. 824 (BIA 1966). In Hira, an alien employed by a Hong Kong custom-made clothing manufacturer had entered the United States under the authority of a B-1 "temporary visitor for business" visa. While in this country, the alien took orders on behalf of his employer from prospective customers, and took the measurements of those customers. Prior to the expiration of the alien's visa, the INS commenced deportation proceedings against him. The INS concluded that the alien's activities involved the performance of skilled labor, and ordered that the alien be deported for failure to maintain his B-1 "temporary visitor for business" status. On appeal, the Board of Immigration Appeals focused its analysis on the term "business" within section 101(a)(15)(B) of the Act. Adopting the Supreme Court's definition from an earlier version of the Act, the Board held that "business," for purposes of section 101(a)(15)(B) of the Act, "contemplate[s] only 'intercourse of a commercial character.'" In support of that definition, the Board alluded to prior administrative cases in which aliens were found eligible for "temporary visitor for business" status because "there was involved international trade or commerce and the employment was a necessary incident thereto." The Board also elaborated upon the underlying requirements for eligibility as a "temporary visitor for business" nonimmigrant:

The significant considerations to be stressed are that there is a clear intent on the part of the alien to continue the foreign residence and not to abandon the existing domicile; the principal place of business and the actual place of eventual accrual of profits, at least predominantly, remains in the foreign country; the business activity itself need not be temporary, and indeed may long continue; the various entries into the United States made in the course thereof must be individually or separately of a plainly temporary nature in keeping with the existence of the two preceding considerations.

Applying those principles the Board in Hira concluded that the alien's business was intercourse of a commercial character, even though he took prospective customers' measurements in connection with the business. Thus, the Board held that the alien was entitled to B-1 "temporary visitor for business" status. The Attorney General subsequently affirmed the Board's decision, and certified it as controlling.

Defendants argue that Hira controls the result in this case, since the principles underlying INS Operations Instruction 214.2(b)(5) and Hira are nearly identical. Defendants focus on the portion of Hira that permits the issuance of B-1 “temporary visitor for business” visas to an alien coming to the United States to engage in “intercourse of a commercial character,” or coming to work as a “necessary incident” to international trade or commerce. Defendants argue that here the West Germans came to this country only as a necessary incident to the purchase and sale of the gold-ore processing system, rather than as individuals hired expressly as laborers. Further, defendants contend that it must be presumed that Congress has acquiesced in the policies underlying the Operations Instruction, because Congress has been aware of those policies for many years but has failed to take action.

Defendants’ arguments are answered primarily by the language of the Act. It is important to reemphasize that in matters of statutory interpretation, a court must interpret the statute in light of the purposes Congress sought to achieve in enacting it. And absent a clearly expressed legislative intention to the contrary, the statutory language is regarded as conclusive. Under those principles, the language of section 101(a)(15)(B) of the Act which excludes an alien “coming for the purpose of . . . performing skilled or unskilled labor,” precludes defendants’ purported distinction between business and labor in this case; so does the expressed congressional intent of protecting American labor.

Similarly, there is no indication that Congress has acquiesced in the policies underlying INS Operations Instruction 214.2(b)(5). The current substantive versions of sections 101(a)(15)(B) and 101(a)(15)(H)(ii) were enacted in 1952. The Operations Instruction was not promulgated until 1972. And there is no suggestion from legislative history that Congress considered either the specific holding of the Board of Immigration Appeals in Hira in 1966, or Hira’s impact on other types of foreign labor performed in the United States.

The interpretation of a federal statute by the officials responsible for its administration is entitled to deference. A court, however, must reject an administrative interpretation “that [is] inconsistent with the statutory mandate or that frustrate[s] the policy that Congress sought to implement.” * * *

The court concludes * * * that INS Operations Instruction 214.2(b)(5) violates sections 101(a)(15)(B) and 101(a)(15)(H)(ii) of the Act.

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. Consider the hierarchy of the various “laws” relevant to this case: statute, then agency regulations, then the agency’s internal operations instructions. The agency regulations must conform to the statute (no one in Bricklayers Union is claiming they do not) and the INS (now DHS) Operations Instructions in turn must conform to the regulations. See Flores v. Bowen, 790 F.2d 740, 742 (9th Cir.1986). A fortiori, the Operations Instructions must conform to the statute; in Bricklayers Union the court holds they do not.

2. How a court interprets statutes reveals a great deal about the court's conception of its role and, in particular, its view of the allocation of power between judges and legislators. Over the years, three principal philosophies of statutory interpretation have competed for dominance:

The "Literal Plain Meaning Rule," as its name implies, focuses on the literal language of the statute. When that language admits of only one meaning, the court must adopt that meaning even if doing so will produce absurd results. (The Literal Plain Meaning Rule has no application to the case in which the statutory language is ambiguous.)

The "Social Purpose Rule" is at the other end of the spectrum. The court seeks out the purposes of the legislation and adopts whichever interpretation will best advance those purposes. To ascertain the purposes, the court has recourse to numerous sources. The statutory language itself is just one of those sources.

The "Golden Rule" is an intermediate approach. The court gives the literal language its ordinary meaning, unless doing so would produce an absurd or inconsistent result.

Which of these three approaches is followed in Bricklayers Union? Would the result have been different if either of the other approaches had been adopted?

3. The meaning of a statutory provision can sometimes be gleaned from its interaction with other provisions of the same statute. When that is done, the court's approach is often described as "contextual" or "systematic." How does the court in Bricklayers Union derive meaning from the interaction of INA §§ 101(a)(15)(B) and 101(a)(15)(H)(ii)?

4. The defendants identified competing economic policies that would be affected by the possible interpretations of section 101(a)(15)(B). How does the court know which policy Congress wanted to see prevail?

5. What point is the court making in its discussion of the legislative history of the provision restricting the admission of foreign laborers? Even if the history reveals the purpose underlying previous statutes, how does the court know Congress did not change its mind when it passed a new law in 1952?

6. Courts commonly say that the interpretation placed on a statute by the agency charged with administering it is entitled to judicial deference. The leading case is Chevron USA v. Natural Resources Defense Council, 467 U.S. 837, 104 S.Ct. 2778, 81 L.Ed.2d 694 (1984). But the scope of that principle is not at all clear. Many courts have accepted agency interpretations as long as those interpretations were "reasonable." Other courts have substituted their own statutory interpretations for those of the agencies even when the language was ambiguous enough that reasonable minds could differ. Why should courts defer at all to agency interpretation? And how does the court in Bricklayers Union apply the principle of agency deference?

7. Litigants will sometimes argue that Congress's failure to enact legislation expressly altering an accepted construction evidences acquiescence in that construction. What counter-arguments might generally be made? How does the court in Bricklayers Union handle the acquiescence argument?

8. Is Hira disapproved or distinguished?

9. B-1 visitors are ordinarily admitted for up to one year, with the possibility of multiple extensions in six-month increments. See 8 CFR § 214.2(b)(1) (2008). On a reciprocal basis, however, nationals of some designated countries may be admitted for indefinite durations. See 54 Fed.Reg. 27969 (July 3, 1989).

10. A firestorm of protest followed the district court's decision. U.S. companies feared that difficulties in securing repairs of highly complex machinery would not only cause the eventual deterioration of products already purchased, but also choke off companies' access to future state-of-the-art equipment. Foreign governments threatened reciprocal action. Ultimately, the United States government and the union agreed, with the court's consent, to a more limited injunction. See 51 Fed.Reg. 44266 (Dec. 9, 1986); Austin T. Fragomen et al., Proper Standards for Admission in the B-1 Category, 1990 Immigration & Nationality L.Rev. 363, 372. The resulting regulation provides:

Construction workers not admissible. Aliens seeking to enter the country to perform building or construction work, whether on-site or in-plant, are not eligible for classification or admission as B-1 nonimmigrants under section 101(a)(15)(B) of the Act. However, alien nonimmigrants otherwise qualified as B-1 nonimmigrants may be issued visas and may enter for the purpose of supervision or training of others engaged in building or construction work, but not for the purpose of actually performing any such building or construction work themselves.

8 CFR § 214.2(b)(5) (2008). The State Department, following suit, added analogous language to its visa regulations. See 22 CFR § 41.31(b)(1) (2008).

a. Why does the new regulation exempt individuals who supervise or train those engaged in building or construction work? Are the policy considerations any different from those applicable to the workers who actually do the building or construction?

b. Now is Hira still good law?

c. As the court points out, the BIA has said that manual work may be "business" (and thus the basis for a B-1 visa) rather than "labor" (for which labor certification and an H-2 visa would be necessary) if the work is "a necessary incident to international trade or commerce." See also Matter of Cote, 17 I. & N. Dec. 336, 338 (BIA 1980). The cases applying that criterion have had to struggle to draw the line. See generally 2 Gordon, Mailman & Yale-Loehr § 14.05. The linedrawing problems continue to plague the State Department, which has developed more specific guidance for consular officers. See 78 IR 937 (June 4, 2001).

11. In Greyhound Lines v. INS, Civ. No. 95-1608 (NHJ) (D.D.C. Oct. 23, 1995), a district court held that Canadian citizens who drove Greyhound buses from Montreal to New York City were not entitled to B-1 visas if, en route, they picked up passengers in the United States and discharged some of those passengers at other stops in the United States. The court found that the intra-United States journeys, which accounted for about 30% of the passengers on the Montreal-to-New York route, were not necessary incidents to international trade. The BIA had reached an analogous conclusion in the context of transportation of goods, and neither the BIA nor the court saw any reason to treat the transportation of passengers differently.

12. Although the procedures for obtaining B-1 and other visas are the subject of chapter 6 below, note for the moment that B-1 visitors from certain countries are exempted from having to procure visas before arriving in the United States. This visa waiver program, discussed on page 462 below, has been made stricter since September 11, 2001. The recent restrictions are discussed in chapter 10 (Immigration and National Security), section E.5.

PROBLEMS 1-3

Problem 1. X, a citizen and resident of Guatemala, owns a truck. To earn extra money, he would occasionally like to transport the products of various Guatemalan manufacturers from Guatemala to the United States. Should he be granted a B-1 visa? Does your answer change if, in addition to transporting goods from Guatemala to the United States, X also picks up goods at points in the United States that are en route to his ultimate destination and drops them off at intermediate points that are also en route?

Problem 2. Suppose X, instead of being an owner-operator, is an employee of a large Guatemalan trucking company. He will regularly drive the company's trucks back and forth between Guatemala and the United States, delivering and picking up goods. Is he entitled to a B-1 visa?

Problem 3. Y, a citizen and resident of Belgium, wants to come to the United States for two months to paint pictures of the Grand Canyon, which she would then bring home for sale (the pictures, not the Canyon). Should she be granted a B-1 visa? What if she plans to sell her paintings in the United States?

2. TREATY TRADERS AND INVESTORS

Closely related to the B-1 business visitor are the two groups of nonimmigrants described in INA § 101(a)(15)(E), which you should read now. Individuals admitted under prong (i) have "E-1" status and are known colloquially as “treaty traders.” Those admitted under prong (ii) have “E-2” status and are called “treaty investors.”

Since the person must be “entitled to enter the United States under and in pursuance of the provisions of a treaty,” the eligibility of a given individual rests ultimately on the terms of the particular treaty. In practice, however, the various treaties tend to track the statutory language. Thus, the best guides to the meanings of the treaties are the statute itself and other sources interpreting it. The latter sources include the views of the former INS, embodied in its regulations and Operations Instructions, and the State Department views, embodied in its regulations and in volume 9 of its Foreign Affairs Manual. There is also a fair amount of case law.

As of January 2006, according to the State Department, the United States had formally entered into such treaties with 80 countries. (Some of the treaties cover only traders, and others cover only investors, but most of them cover both.) U.S. Dept. of State, 9 Foreign Affairs Manual § 41.51 Exh. I (Jan. 2006). For periodic updates that include additional useful information, see Eugene Flynn, Countries Which the U.S. Recognizes as Eligible (or soon to be eligible) for E-1 or E-2 Status. As Professor Flynn points out, the breakups of the former Soviet Union and Yugoslavia have generated several new treaties.

Both categories of E-entrants are ordinarily admitted for up to two years initially, with an unlimited number of possible two-year extensions. 8 CFR § 214.2(e)(19, 20) (2008). Neither the statutory definition nor the regulations expressly require an intent to retain one’s foreign residence. (Compare, in this regard, the statutory requirements for the B-nonimmigrants discussed earlier and the H-2 nonimmigrants who will be discussed later.) The regulations, however, do require an intent to depart upon termination of E-status. 8 CFR § 214.2(e)(5) (2008); 22 CFR §§ 41.51(a)(1)(ii) (traders), 41.51(b)(1)(iii) (investors) (2008). How does an intent to depart differ in practical terms from an intent not to abandon one’s foreign residence? Is the government justified to read in either requirement?

As you will see in section F.1 below, an additional complication is “dual intent”—i.e., an intent to leave the United States by the expiration of one’s lawful stay, coupled with a hope of acquiring lawful permanent residence.

INA § 101(a)(15)(E) also authorizes the admission of the spouses and children who are following or accompanying to join either E-1 or E-2 visitors. In 2002, Congress added new INA § 214(e)(6), which grants the spouses permission to work. Pub. L. 107-124, 115 Stat. 2402 (Jan. 16, 2002).

Nice v. Turnage

United States Court of Appeals, Ninth Circuit, 1985.
752 F.2d 431.

■ PER CURIAM:

Nice’s application for a change in visa status from a “B-1 Visitor for Business” to an “E-2 Treaty Investor,” was denied on the ground, among others, that he failed to prove he was the “source of funds” used to make the investment. We affirm.

INA § 101(a)(15)(E)(ii) requires an applicant for nonimmigrant treaty investor status to show “he has invested . . . a substantial amount of capital.” (Emphasis added.) INS asked Nice to explain the source of the funds he invested in the car wash. Nice proffered a $25,000 check drawn on a foreign bank signed by Nice’s wife and used by Nice to make the investment. The Regional Commissioner noted several irregularities surrounding the check, including absence of proof of the identity of the principal who issued the power of attorney under which Mrs. Nice claimed to have acted in signing the check. The Commissioner concluded that Nice had failed to prove the funds invested were his own risk capital, and that the record suggested that in fact the investment had been made by Nice’s father-in-law.

Nice argues that an alien can be required to establish the source of invested funds only if necessary to show that a “sham investment” is not involved. He relies on a statement in the Report of the House Committee that the treaty investor provision “is intended to provide for the temporary admission of such aliens who will be engaged in developing or directing the operations of a real operating enterprise and not a fictitious paper operation.” We have characterized the legislative history as “of little assistance” in determining qualifications for treaty investor status. Certainly the passing reference in the House Report does not provide a reasonable basis for limiting the broad statutory requirement that the alien demonstrate that “he has invested” substantial capital in a local enterprise.

Nice claims he need only show the funds are in his “possession and control.” He relies on a portion of a 1977 State Department Circular Instruction stating that if an alien “can satisfactorily establish that he possessed and exercised dominion over the money invested, the manner in which it was originally acquired would be irrelevant.” On its face, the Circular addresses only * * * an unrelated regulation not at issue here. Moreover, other portions of the Circular indicate that the INS is expected to investigate the source of funds to determine whether the alien placed his own funds at risk.

Nice’s interpretation of § 101(a)(15)(E)(ii) would permit wholesale evasion of immigration quotas through the treaty investor provision. An alien could claim nonimmigrant treaty investor status merely by acting as a “front” for an investment in fact made by a third party.

We conclude the district court correctly held that INS could require proof that Nice was personally at risk and did not abuse its discretion in concluding that the proof offered by Nice was insufficient.

AFFIRMED.

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. The court rejects the application of the 1977 State Department Circular, concluding it is relevant only to another, unrelated, regulation. In doing so, is the court disputing the rule that, if an individual “possessed and exercised dominion over the money invested, the manner in which it was originally acquired would be irrelevant?” Or is the court simply saying that that rule doesn’t help Nice? Suppose Nice had proved that his father-in-law had given him the money, no strings attached. Would the result have been different? Should it be different? What does the court mean when it says that Nice’s interpretation would permit a noncitizen to act as a “front” for a third party investor?

2. What, precisely, is the likely purpose of the treaty investor provision? Would that purpose be impeded if a noncitizen came to the United States to direct and develop an enterprise in which some other noncitizen had invested? Would there be affirmative costs?

3. One exception to the requirement that the investor be personally at risk is that, with some qualifications, certain managerial or other skilled nonimmigrants may enter as the employees of eligible treaty investors. See generally 2 Gordon, Mailman & Yale-Loehr, § 17.04.

4. The statute requires that the person invest “a substantial amount of capital.” If you were the government attorney in charge of drafting guidelines on substantiality, would you employ a bright line test, or would you simply identify factors that should inform the determination? If the former, what test would you select? If the latter, what factors would you identify? See generally Matter of Walsh & Pollard, 20 I. & N.Dec. 60 (BIA 1988); see also 8 CFR § 214.2(e)(14) (2004) (investment amount must be “substantial” in relation to total cost of enterprise, sufficient to ensure the investor’s financial commitment, and large enough that the investor is likely to direct and develop the enterprise). The regulations add that the enterprise may not be “marginal.” 8 CFR § 214.2(e)(15) (2008).

5. An employee who seeks E-1 status to conduct trade for his or her foreign employer must either be in an executive/supervisory position or have skills that are essential to the company’s U.S. operations. 9 F.A.M. § 41.51, n. 1.1(6) (June 2006).

6. The treaty trader provision also requires “substantial” trade. For that purpose, the regulations now provide that the arrangement must contemplate ongoing activity, not an isolated transaction. 8 CFR § 214.2(e)(10) (2008).

7. As you have probably figured out already, there is considerable overlap between the B-1 and the E-1 requirements. Examining the statutory language and the cases and text you have now read, try to identify the tactical pros and cons of applying for E-1 status versus B-1 status.

3. TEMPORARY WORKERS

“Man hat Arbeitskräfte gerufen, und es kommen Menschen.” [We sought workers, and human beings came.] Max Frisch, Überfremdung I, in Schweiz als Heimat?, at 219 (1990).

As this quotation from a celebrated Swiss author suggests, the subject of temporary workers, or guest workers as they are commonly known in Europe, touches several raw nerves. Even with a clear initial understanding that the stay is meant to be temporary, roots inevitably form and deepen. Fundamental questions arise: Will there be a realistic opportunity to acquire lawful permanent residence down the road? If not, will the workers stay on anyway, in irregular status? If so, what will be the consequences? Will they be exploited, relative to either the norms of their host country or the norms of their countries of origin, during either the period of temporary lawful admission or thereafter? Are they filling a need that cannot be met by domestic workers at acceptable costs? What impact will the program have on the jobs, wages, and working conditions of domestic workers? The materials that follow touch on some of these questions. As discussed below, the questions are coming from several quarters, but a guestworker proposal floated by President George W. Bush in January 2004 and debated in Congress has added immediacy to the debate.

a. "SPECIALTY OCCUPATIONS," ATHLETES, AND ENTERTAINERS: H-1B's, O's, AND P's

Three categories of temporary workers—H-1B's, O's, and P's—are best considered together. Before going any further, you should read subsections H(i)(b), O, and P of INA § 101(a)(15).

INA § 101(a)(15)(H)(i)(b) is the principal vehicle for the admission of temporary professional workers. But the provision does not refer to "professionals."⁸ Instead, subsection H(i)(b) requires that the person be "in a specialty occupation."⁴ A "specialty occupation" is one that requires "theoretical and practical application of a body of highly specialized knowledge" and that, in the United States, requires at least a bachelor's degree in the particular specialty or the "equivalent" of a bachelor's degree. INA § 214(i)(1). Many of the more difficult issues have concerned those kinds of equivalency determinations. Apart from the various requirements that the occupation must meet in order to be a "specialty" occupation, the statute spells out the credentials that the individual must possess in order to be "in" that occupation. INA § 214(i)(2).

The H-1B nonimmigrant must be "coming temporarily to the United States." He or she may be admitted for up to six years. INA § 214(g)(4). As a result of free trade agreements with Chile and Singapore, a new "H-1B1" category exempts nationals of those two countries from the six-year dura-

3. Until the Immigration Act of 1990, H-1B status required "distinguished merit and ability." The Justice Department regulations defined that term to encompass "one who is a member of the professions or one who is prominent in his or her field . . ." 8 CFR § 214.2(h)(3)(ii)(A), as amended by 55 Fed.Reg. 2606, 2622 (Jan. 26, 1990). The Department's definition of "the professions," see id., was virtually identical to the wording now used to define "specialty occupation," below.

4. Besides members in specialty occupations, subsection H(i)(b) also includes fashion models "of distinguished merit and ability."

tional limit and eases some other H-1B requirements as well. See Daniel C. Horne, Requests for Evidence, 8 BIB 1626 (Oct. 15, 2003).

The durational limit does not, however, bar H-1Bs from entering with the hope of attaining LPR status at some future time. Indeed, entering and beginning work on an H-1B visa is now a standard, and perfectly legal, way to begin the process of acquiring LPR status. Often a noncitizen's skills are needed in the United States now, and the person qualifies substantively for employment-based immigrant preference, but the waiting period for LPR status is too long for the employer or the employee. In such cases, the relatively short processing times for H-1B visas enable the person to begin work in the interim. Congress in 1990 expressly declared that a noncitizen's seeking of permanent resident status is not "evidence of an intention to abandon a foreign residence for purposes of obtaining" an H-1B visa (or an L-visa, discussed below). Imm. Act 1990, § 205(b)(2), adding INA § 214(h).⁵ The subject of preexisting intent to remain is taken up more generally in section F.1 below.

One practical problem of increasing significance, however, is that the waiting periods for employment-based third preference status have become so long that frequently the H-1B status expires before the person's priority date for permanent resident status becomes current, at least for certain source countries. The American Competitiveness in the Twenty-First Century Act of 2000, Pub. L. 106-313, 114 Stat. 1251 (Oct. 17, 2000), allowed them to remain in some kind of vague status, and continue to work, until their LPR numbers become current. Then, in 2002, Congress permitted yearly extensions of H-1B status, beginning one year after the person files either an application for labor certification or a visa petition (described in chapter 6). See Twenty-First Century Department of Justice Appropriations Authorization Act, Pub. L. 107-273, 116 Stat. 1758, 1836-37, § 11030A (Nov. 2, 2002).

Since 1990, certain groups of nonimmigrants who formerly had been eligible for H-1B status are diverted into separate categories. Agricultural workers, athletes, and entertainers are now generally ineligible for H-1B visas. Instead, they must normally apply for H-2A, O, or P status, the requirements for which are discussed below. As you will see shortly, some of those requirements are more demanding, and some less demanding, than the requirements for H-1B status.

In an H-1B case, the employer must file a "labor condition application" (LCA) with the Department of Labor. INA §§ 101(a)(15)(H)(i)(b), 212(n). In the LCA the employer attests to several things, including (i) it is paying at least the prevailing wage level in the area of employment or the actual wage level at the place of employment, whichever is greater; (ii) the

5. The wording of that provision of the 1990 Act is odd, since the same statute eliminated the requirement that an H-1B have "a residence in a foreign country which he has no intention of abandoning." Imm. Act 1990, § 205(e). Perhaps Congress meant to say that the seeking of permanent resident status does not destroy the requirement (which the 1990 Act retained) that the H-1B nonimmigrant be "coming temporarily." INA § 101(a)(15)(H)(i)(b).

working conditions of similarly employed workers will not be adversely affected; (iii) there is not a strike or lockout; and (iv) the employer has notified its existing employees of the filing, in specified ways (so that they can object if they wish). See generally Carl M. Shusterman & David L. Neal, Survey and Analysis of H-1B Labor Condition Application Decisions, 72 IR 49 (Jan. 9, 1995).

Normally, the Labor Department's Employment and Training Administration (ETA) provides the necessary certification unless the LCA is "incomplete or obviously inaccurate." Complaints may be filed with the Department's Wage and Hour Division (WHD), which investigates those cases that it believes warrant investigation. WHD then issues a "determination" letter that states whether it has found a violation and, if so, the penalty. The penalty can include fines, back pay, and in certain cases an order making the employer ineligible to file LCA's, employment-based visa petitions, and certain nonimmigrant visa petitions for a prescribed time period. Any interested party may appeal the WHD's determination to an administrative law judge, then to the Secretary of Labor, and eventually to a federal court. See INA § 212(n); Ted J. Chiappari, Survey of Labor Condition Application Enforcement Proceedings, 73 IR 673 (May 20, 1996).

One of the more difficult and controversial LCA issues has been the method for computing the required wage. This problem is expertly analyzed in Margaret H. McCormick & David Stanton, Finding the Correct Wage for LCAs: Recent Developments in H-1B Practice, April 1995 Immigration Briefings.

Over the years, the Labor Department, trade unions, and others have worried that H-1B petitions generally, and LCA's in particular, are being abused. Following a 1996 audit, the Inspector General of the Labor Department severely criticized the LCA program (and also the permanent labor certification program that you saw in chapter 3) as paper shuffles that do not adequately protect American workers. More specifically, the Inspector General concluded that many employers were abusing the process by not paying H-1B's the advertised prevailing wage. See generally 73 IR 653 (May 13, 1996). Others have taken strong issue with those findings, questioning the accuracy of the results, the auditors' motives, and their understanding of the congressional objectives.⁶

In the past, when the interests of the sending countries were considered, the worries related principally to the problem of "brain drain." The same issue persists, but today the positive effects of creating diasporas in developed countries receive emphasis as well. See Michele R. Pistone & John J. Hoeffner, Rethinking Immigration of the Highly-Skilled and Educated in the Post-9/11 World, 5 Georgetown J. L. & Public Policy 495 (2007).

6. See, e.g., Stuart Anderson, Widespread Abuse of H-1Bs and Employment-Based Immigration? The Evidence Says Otherwise, 73 IR 637 (May 13, 1996); see also Demetrios G. Papaemmetriou & Stephen Yale-Loehr, Balancing Interests: Rethinking U.S. Selection of Skilled Immigrants 175-79 (1996) (excerpted in chapter 3 above).

Until 1990 there were no numerical limits on any categories of nonimmigrants. In that year, Congress limited the annual admissions of H-1B nonimmigrants to 65,000 (not counting their spouses and children). INA § 214(g)(1, 2). A wild ride ensued. In the late 1990s, an economic boom—particularly in the information technology sector—generated increasing demand for professional workers. To meet their needs, employers came to rely increasingly on foreign workers. The caps on H-1Bs were becoming a major source of frustration. In response, Congress passed the American Competitiveness and Workforce Improvement Act of 1998, Pub. L. 105-277, 112 Stat. 2681 (Oct. 21, 1998). Among other things, the Act provided temporary relief, increasing the H-1B caps to 115,000 in each of the fiscal years 1999 and 2000, and to 107,500 in fiscal year 2001. The caps were to revert to 65,000 starting in fiscal year 2002. Id., Div. C, § 411, amending INA § 214(g)(1)(A). But in 2000, when even the increased caps proved insufficient to accommodate the demand for professional workers, Congress passed the American Competitiveness in the Twenty-First Century Act of 2000, Pub. L. 106-313, 114 Stat. 1251 (Oct. 17, 2000). This statute further amended INA § 214(g)(1)(A) by increasing the H-1B caps to 195,000 for each of the fiscal years 2001, 2002, and 2003 and exempting higher education institutions and nonprofit and governmental research institutions from the caps.

The ink was barely dry on the 2000 law when an economic slowdown produced large layoffs of professional workers generally and foreign workers in particular. Starting in fiscal year 2004, therefore, Congress allowed the annual ceiling for H-1B workers to revert to the original 65,000 cap. Since then, the 65,000 cap has been reached every year and long delays have resulted. The procedures by which those who are disqualified by the cap (and first-time applicants) may apply or re-apply for the next fiscal year are described in a USCIS Notice, 69 Fed. Reg. 68154 (Nov. 23, 2004). As partial relief, Congress in December 2004 authorized an additional 20,000 H-1B visas per year for noncitizens who hold masters' degrees or higher from U.S. institutions of higher learning.⁷ Still, the cap for fiscal year 2009 was reached during a 5-day filing period that ended April 7, 2008.⁸

You might have noticed that the chart on page 357 above shows H-1B admissions of over 460,000, much higher than the 65,000 annual cap. The fact that the family members of the H-1B are not counted toward the cap does not explain the difference, since the latter are broken out later as a separate category. Rather, the explanation is twofold. First, there are the exemptions mentioned above, for employees of educational and research institutions and for holders of master's degrees from U.S. universities.

7. See Consolidated Appropriations Act, Pub. L. 108-447, 118 Stat. 2809, 3356, Div. J, § 425(a) (Dec. 8, 2004), adding INA § 214(g)(5)(C); 70 Fed. Reg. 23375 (May 5, 2005) (interim implementing regulations).

8. 85 IR 1185 (Apr. 14, 2008). For some creative suggestions for living with the H-1B cap, see William A. Stock, So, Now What? A Lighthearted Look at Strategies for Dealing with the H-1B Cap, 10 BIB 471 (Mar. 15, 2005).

Second, the chart displays admissions, not individuals, and many H-1B workers make multiple entries.

The strategies of the 1998 and 2000 statutes were to link the temporary numerical increases to more enduring reforms targeted at the root causes of the labor shortfall. Both laws followed heated debates over whether the increased numbers of foreign workers were really needed or were merely an industry device to intensify job competition and thereby reduce wages. The compromises included several new innovations. Congress imposed a $500 fee on employer H-1B petitions (again exempting higher education and nonprofit and government institutions) and subsequently increased the fee to $1000, the proceeds to be allocated mainly to job training programs for U.S. workers. See Pub. L. 106-311, 114 Stat. 1247 (Oct. 17, 2000). Firms adjudged to be "H-1B-dependent" under a formula that takes account of the total number of employees and the percentage who are H-1Bs are subjected to more rigorous requirements when filing their labor condition applications. And, to diminish the potential for employer exploitation, Congress added a "portability" provision that made it easier for H-1Bs to change jobs after their arrival.⁹

As noted earlier, any discussion of H-1B's must take into account several nonimmigrant categories created by the Immigration Act of 1990. One of them is INA § 101(a)(15)(O). The O-category covers athletes, entertainers, and persons in the arts, sciences, education, and business. In any of those fields, the O-nonimmigrant must have "extraordinary ability * * * which has been demonstrated by sustained national or international acclaim"—the same standard used to judge immigrants under one prong of the employment-based first preference. The O-category also covers certain members of the principal nonimmigrant's support staff and certain family members of either the principal or the support staff. Initial admission under the O-category may be for a period of up to three years, with possible one-year extensions. See 8 CFR §§ 214.2(o)(6)(iii), 214.2(o)(12)(ii) (2008).

The P-category covers, in its first subsection (the P-1s), internationally recognized (but not necessarily "extraordinary") athletes, and members of internationally recognized entertainment groups performing in specific events. Other subsections take in artists and entertainers who enter under reciprocal exchange programs (the P-2's), or entertainers or artists who would provide programs that are "culturally unique" (the P-3's). Unlike H-1B's, neither O's nor P's are numerically limited. P-1 individual athletes

9. See INA § 214(n). Some commentators have urged the repeal of the H-1B cap. See, e.g., Suzette Brooks Masters & Ted Ruthizer, The H-1B Straitjacket: Why Congress Should Repeal the Cap on Foreign-Born Highly Skilled Workers, Immigration Briefings (May 2000); see also Enid Trucios-Haynes, Temporary Workers and Future Immigration Policy Conflicts: Protecting U.S. Workers and Satisfying the Demand for Global Human Capital, 40 Univ. Louisville

Brandeis L.J. 967 (2002). Analogous issues in Australia and Germany are discussed, respectively, in Mary Crock, Contract or Compact: Skilled Migration and the Dictates of Politics and Ideology, 16 Georgetown Immigration L.J. 133 (2001); Kay Hailbronner, Labour Transfer Schemes—In Whose National Interest? Globalisation and the Transfer of Labour—The European Experience, 16 Georgetown Immigration L.J. 773 (2002).

may be admitted initially for up to five years, and extended for up to five additional years. 8 CFR §§ 214.2(p)(8)(iii)(A), 214.2(p)(14)(ii)(A) (2008). For all other P-entrants (including athletic team members and entertainers), initial admission is for up to one year and extensions are in one-year increments. 8 CFR §§ 214.2(p)(8)(iii), 214.2(p)(14)(ii)(B) (2008).

b. LESSER SKILLS AND LABOR SHORTAGES: H-2's

An "H-2" nonimmigrant comes to the United States "(a) * * * to perform agricultural labor or services * * * of a temporary or seasonal nature, or (b) * * * to perform other temporary service or labor if unemployed persons capable of performing such service or labor cannot be found in this country [except for foreign medical school graduates coming to perform professional medical services]." Under both prongs of H-2, the person must have "a residence in a foreign country which he has no intention of abandoning" and must be "coming temporarily to the United States."

Clause (a), pertaining to temporary agricultural laborers, was one of the major reforms enacted in 1986. But its roots are much deeper. As early as 1942, when U.S. labor was in short supply because of the war, the United States and Mexico began creating "bracero" programs to import temporary Mexican farmworkers.¹⁰ In the aftermath of the Bracero programs, approximately one million persons of Mexican ancestry—including some United States citizens—were "repatriated" to Mexico.¹¹

Until 1986, the admission of temporary agricultural workers was governed by the general provision applicable to other temporary workers—the provision now designated as section 101(a)(15)(H)(ii)(b), discussed below. That provision was seldom used in agriculture. Growers felt that the procedure associated with this general provision was too time-consuming to permit the harvesting of perishable crops. In practice, therefore, foreign agricultural laborers tended overwhelmingly to be undocumented. The prospect of punishing employers of undocumented immigrants (see chapter 12, § A.2, below) raised fears among growers that this supply of foreign labor would dry up.

In 1986, therefore, Congress created a new "H-2A" status, INA § 101(a)(15)(H)(ii)(a), and streamlined the procedures, id. § 218. The employer still requires a certification from the Labor Department that sufficient American workers cannot be found and that the nonimmigrant's employment will not "adversely affect the wages and working conditions"

10. See, e.g., Michael A. Olivas, The Chronicles, My Grandfather's Stories, and Immigration Law: The Slave Traders Chronicle as Racial History, 34 St. Louis Univ. L.J. 425, 435-39 (1990); cf. Juan R. Garcia, Operation Wetback, The Mass Deportation of Mexican Undocumented Workers in 1954 (1980).

11. See, e.g., Kevin R. Johnson, International Human Rights Class Actions: New Frontiers for Group Litigation, 2004 Michigan State L. Rev. 643, 661-70; Gilbert Paul Carrasco, Latinos in the United States—Invitation and Exile, in Juan F. Perea (ed.), Immigrants Out! The New Nativism and the Anti-Immigrant Impulse in the United States, at 190 et seq. (1997).

of American workers. Id. § 218(a). For that purpose, however, effective January 17, 2009, the Labor Department has switched from a traditional labor certification procedure to one in which the employer need only attest to having complied with the program requirements. 73 Fed. Reg. 77110 (Dec. 18, 2008). To assess the adequacy of the wages, the Labor Department annually publishes “adverse effect wage rates” (AEWR’s) that vary from state to state. These are the minimum hourly rates that employers must pay H-2A farmworkers. The rates vary from state to state and are updated annually. For fiscal year 2008, the minimum required hourly wage ranged from $8.41 (Arkansas, Louisiana, and Mississippi) to $10.86 (Hawaii). 73 Fed. Reg. 10288 (Feb. 26, 2008).

Agricultural guest workers are controversial. They can supply needed farm labor at wages that enable growers to keep prices down for consumers. Moreover, whether or not their wages are low by American standards, they are generally higher than what the same individuals would receive in their countries of origin. The dangers, however, are considerable. They include exploitation of the guestworkers through a combination of low wages and oppressive working conditions; the corresponding impact on the wages and working conditions of the domestic labor force; the potential for practical restrictions on guestworkers’ economic freedom; and the likelihood of guestworkers staying on in unlawful status. For those reasons, and also because of a general skepticism about the growers’ claims that domestic farm labor is in short supply, many counseled caution.¹²

The exploitation issues are highlighted in the excerpt that follows:

David Bacon, Be Our Guests

The Nation (Sept. 27, 2004).
Pages 22–26.

Julio Cesar Guerrero came north from Mexico in the spring of 2001 as a temporary contract worker. Recruited by Manpower of the Americas, he

12. U.S. Commission on Immigration Reform, Legal Immigration: Setting Priorities 172–73 (1995); Philip Martin, Guest Workers: New Solution or New Problem?, 2007 Univ. of Chicago Legal Forum 289. Philip Martin, Does the U.S. Need a New Bracero Program?, 9 J. Internat’l L. & Policy 127 (2003). For a good description of the present program, see Guadalupe Luna, “Agricultural Underdogs” and International Agreements: The Legal Context of Agricultural Workers within the Rural Economy, 26 New Mexico L. Rev. 9 (1996) (proposing international agreements to protect farmworkers). One of the more innovative challenges to guestworker programs that preclude family unification and eventual permanent residence and naturalization has been fashioned by Professor

Maria Ontiveros. She suggests possible violations of the Thirteenth Amendment bar on slavery and involuntary servitude. Maria L. Ontiveros, Noncitizen Immigrant Labor and the Thirteenth Amendment: Challenging Guest Worker Programs, 38 Univ. Toledo L. Rev. 923 (2007). The links among globalization, guestworkers, and democratic rights are thoughtfully explored in Ruben Garcia, Labor as Property: Guestworkers, International Trade, and the Democracy Deficit, 10 J. Gender, Race & Justice 27 (2006). For a creative proposal for outsourcing part of the guest worker screening function to trusted community leaders overseas, based on Canada’s positive experience with Jamaican guest workers, see Eleanor Brown, Outsourcing Immigration Compliance, 77 Fordham L. Rev. 2475 (2009).

was sent to North Carolina, where he began working on the tobacco farm of Anthony Smith. After a few weeks, his fingers started to hurt, and then, one by one, his fingernails began falling off. Although Smith told him he couldn't see a doctor, he went anyway. The doctor said his problem was possibly caused by working without gloves in fields sprayed with pesticides. So Guerrero, who was employed through the H2-A federal guest worker program, called Legal Aid of North Carolina. But Smith warned him not to talk with legal workers.

Guerrero returned to Mexico at the end of the season. The next year, when he tried to get another job, he found his name on a blacklist maintained by MOA and the North Carolina Growers Association (NCGA). Legal Aid protested, and as a result, Guerrero was sent to the United States again. That year, he worked for grower Rodney Jackson, who kept the workers' drinking water on a moving truck in the fields, forcing them to run after it with their mouths under the spigot. When Guerrero filed a complaint with the Occupational Safety and Health Administration, Jackson gave a warning notice and asked him to sign it. When Guerrero refused, Jackson fired him. A foreman took him to the bus station, telling him to go back to Mexico. Again Legal Aid intervened and got him assigned to another grower. Soon a growers' association representative gave Guerrero another warning notice, which he again refused to sign.

When the 2003 season began, Guerrero tried once more to sign up with MOA, but the recruiter told him that he'd already been given a second chance. Since he'd continued to make complaints, his name stayed on the blacklist.

Guerrero had had enough. In 2004 he became a plaintiff in a racketeering suit filed on April 13 in Wake County Superior Court, by Legal Aid of North Carolina, charging the NCGA with maintaining an illegal blacklist.

* * *

Andrew McGuffin, staff attorney for Legal Aid of North Carolina, cautions, "the problem isn't that we don't have worker protection laws. It's that with guest workers they're not enforced, and when workers try to use these laws, they're blacklisted."

The growers, through NCGA, and Legal Aid have been squaring off for years. The growers' handbook warns workers not to talk to Legal Aid staff, calling them "enemies of the H2-A program" who are "trying to eliminate your job." The handbook also warns workers that any effort to "deliberately restrict production" or to "work slowly" will result in discipline or termination. Strikes or slowdowns are prohibited.

Last September a foreman for grower Chester Pilson informed guest worker Juan Villarreal Abundiz that there was no more work for him because he'd talked with Legal Aid, and an NCGA rep told him he'd probably be denied a job the following season. Villarreal was brought to the association office in Vass, North Carolina—a huge barn with a balcony along one side. As 200 workers gathered below, a foreman named Santos and an NCGA employee addressed them from the balcony, instructing them to take Legal Aid's pink "know your rights" booklets out of their luggage and throw them in a trash can in the middle of the floor. According to Villarreal, NCGA head Stan Eury and his assistants gave him a paper he couldn't read and told him if he didn't sign it, he'd have to pay his own bus fare back to Mexico. Villarreal signed.

The blacklist is not secret. The handbook calls it a "record of eligibility [that] contains a list of workers, who because of violations of their contract, have been suspended from the program." Although the handbook says no one will be disciplined for reporting violations of their rights, in fact that happens all the time.

The US Department of Labor, which certifies employers for the H2-A program, has never taken action to end the practice. * * *

The 1997 list, called the "1997 NCGA Ineligible for Rehire Report," consists of 1,709 names. The reason for ineligibility is most often listed as abandoning a job or voluntary resignation. Legal Aid charges that when workers are fired for complaining, they're given a paper to sign saying they quit voluntarily. Among the hundreds of names are also many whose reason for ineligibility is given as "mother sick," "death in the family," "lazy," "slow," "work hours too long," "work too hot and hard" or "slowing up other workers." In 2003 the list for just one Mexican state, Durango, had 517 names.

Abuse of the H2-A program isn't limited to North Carolina. The most spectacular suppression of guest workers' rights came on November 21, 1986, when Caribbean cane cutters stopped work on the Fanjul family sugar plantation in south Florida. When the Fanjuls tried to pay a rate lower than what the workers considered fair, 384 cutters refused to leave their labor camp. The company called in the cops, who used guns, batons and dogs to force workers onto buses, some in their underwear. They were taken to Miami and repatriated.

* * *

Guest workers in Canada, who work under a program like H2-A, have had similar experiences. On April 25, 2001, Mexicans laboring in Mastron Enterprises' tomato greenhouses in Leamington, Ontario, stopped work over complaints of abuse by a foreman. The day following the protest, about twenty-four were repatriated.

Other workers told representatives of the United Farm Workers that they had been working twelve-hour days, six and a half days a week, without overtime pay, for $7 an hour. * * * "They think we're animals. The first threat that they always make is that if you don't like it, you can go back to Mexico." Chris Ramsaroop of Justicia for Migrant Workers observes, "To change their situation migrants must be guaranteed the right to form unions, the right to social and economic mobility in Canada, and most important, the right to regularization: Workers must have the right to apply for citizenship in Canada."

If Canadian guest workers can't get rights like these, in a country where labor rights are more vigilantly enforced, how likely is it that US guest workers will fare better?

According to the AFL-CIO, workers are routinely fired in 31 percent of all US union organizing drives. Most then face, in addition, disqualification from unemployment benefits as a result of the bogus claims that accompany such terminations. For guest workers, however, just being without a job violates the conditions for their visas, and makes them subject to immediate deportation.

In addition, they're strangers. It's much more difficult for them to find support from unions, legal aid workers or other community institutions. Jorge, a guest worker from Huehuetenango in Guatemala (who didn't want his real name used for fear of the blacklist), explained that when he was cheated on his wages "we didn't protest because we couldn't. We were far away from the company office," he said, "and maybe the next year they wouldn't give us the chance to go [to the US again]."

For Fernando Rodríguez Aguilar, even getting help from a priest was forbidden. Rodríguez was brought to North Carolina in 2002 to work for tobacco grower Jeffrey Lee in rural Johnston County. When he saw the crew leader selling alcoholic beverages in the fields, and cutting the hours of workers who wouldn't buy them, he complained to Father Tony Rojas. Then NCGA representative Jose Luis told him he shouldn't go to Father Tony's church. "If you keep going, you'll have problems," he threatened. Sure enough, the following season, MOA put Rodríguez on the blacklist.

Outside the realm of agriculture, temporary workers receive what is now called "H-2B" status. H-2B's are initially admitted for up to a year; they may receive one-year extensions, up to a total stay of three years. 8 CFR §§ 214.2(h)(9)(iii)(B), 214.2(h)(15)(ii)(C) (2008). Unlike the H-1's, the H-2B's until 2009 first had to apply for labor certification; after all, the whole point of section 101(a)(15)(H)(ii) is to enable employers to fill jobs for which labor is in short supply. Recall the Bricklayers litigation, in which the problem lay in determining whether the nonimmigrants in question were H-2's who had to apply for labor certification or business visitors (B-1's) who did not. Effective January 18, 2009, however, the Labor Department switched from a traditional labor certification procedure to one in which the employer need only attest to having complied with the program requirements—the same switch that it instituted for H-2A applications. 73 Fed. Reg. 78020 (Dec. 19, 2008).

No more than 66,000 H-2B's may be admitted in any one fiscal year. INA § 214(g)(1)(B). Exempt from that ceiling are the worker's family members, INA § 214(g)(2), and, as a result of REAL ID Act § 402(a), anyone who was granted H-2B status in the preceding three years, INA § 214(g)(9)(A). No more than 33,000 of the 66,000 workers subject to the ceiling may be admitted during the first half of any fiscal year. INA § 214(g)(10). The H-2B cap for the second half of fiscal year 2009 was reached on January 7, 2009 (almost 2 months before the start of that second half). See 86 IR 127 (Jan. 12, 2009).

In case you noticed the much higher figure in the nonimmigrant admissions chart on pages 346–47 above and are wondering how that can be, the answer is that that chart reflects the multiple admissions of many of the same individuals.

Professor Howard Chang has described the liberal paradox that policies on guest workers must somehow address. Americans receive the benefits of their cheap labor but, because there is no provision for eventually adjusting to LPR status, the American beneficiaries of that labor bear little or no cost for welfare expenditures. The potential for exploitation is therefore a concern. Yet, he suggests, guest workers might still be better off if allowed to come than if not allowed to come. Howard F. Chang, Liberal Ideals and Political Feasibility: Guest-Worker Programs as Second-Best Policies, 27 North Carolina J. Internat'l & Commercial Regulation 465 (2002). He ultimately advocates a cosmopolitan policy of liberal admission of guest workers combined with conferral of social benefits. See Howard F. Chang, The Immigration Paradox: Poverty, Distributive Justice, and Liberal Egalitarianism, 52 DePaul L. Rev. 759 (2003). Professor Leticia Saucedo adds that the employers themselves, through particular recruiting methods and exploitative wages and working conditions, have assured the foreign composition of the workforce. See Leticia Saucedo, The Employer Preference for the Subservient Worker and the Making of the Brown Collar Workplace, 67 Ohio State L.J. 961 (2006). The resulting segregation, and a proposed legal framework for challenging it, are described in Leticia M. Saucedo, Addressing Segregation in the Brown Collar Workplace: Toward a Solution for the Inexorable 100%, 41 Univ. Michigan J. L. Reform 447 (2008).

During the year 2000, the growing political strength of the United States Latino population, the popularity of Mexican President Vicente Fox, and support from American industry all combined to produce high-level negotiations aimed at linking a new temporary worker program for Mexican (and possibly other) nationals to a delayed legalization program. See Joint Statement of U.S.–Mexico High-Level Working Group on Migration (Apr. 4, 2001), digested in 78 IR at 642–43 (Apr. 9, 2001) (placing temporary worker program for Mexican nationals on agenda). The September 11, 2001 terrorist attacks brought the process to a temporary halt. In January 2004, however, President Bush announced he would propose an ambitious guest worker program, albeit without any provisions for eventual adjustment to permanent resident status. The details were not spelled out.

That announcement set off vigorous debate, but at this writing the future of the guest worker proposal is highly uncertain. Professor Cristina Rodríguez has argued that guestworker programs impede what should be two core objectives of an immigration policy—ensuring the mobility of workers and encouraging “reciprocity,” or the mutual adaptation of the immigrants and the receiving society. Cristina Rodríguez, Guest Workers and Integration: Toward a Theory of What Immigrants and Americans Owe

One Another, 2007 Univ. Chicago Legal Forum 219. Professor Enid Trucios-Haynes argues that the various legal restrictions on the employment of temporary noncitizen workers adversely affect the U.S. economy.¹³

Under current law, the H2-B must be coming “to perform * * * temporary service or labor.” The following case illustrates one of the more difficult problems:

Matter of Artee Corporation

Commissioner of the I.N.S., 1982.
18 I. & N. Dec. 366.

This case is before the Commissioner on certification of the Regional Commissioner’s decision of June 2, 1982.

The petitioner is seeking to classify the beneficiaries under section 101(a)(15)(H)(ii) of the Act, as machinists. The petitioner provides temporary help to technically-oriented firms.

The sole issue in this case is the temporary need of the petitioner for the services of the beneficiary. * * * The petitioner in this case is a temporary help service and I agree with the Regional Commissioner that it qualifies as a petitioner and is the actual employer of the beneficiaries. The Regional Commissioner found that, because of the current wide-spread shortage of machinists in the United States, the nature of the employment offered must be viewed as permanent and not temporary. The decision examined the use of the beneficiaries’ services by the customer of the help service in reaching this conclusion. I do not believe that this is the proper view of the employment situation involved. The test of the true nature of the temporary need for the position lies in examination of the temporary need of the temporary help service, not its customers.

Section 101(a)(15)(H)(ii) defines an H-2 temporary worker as an alien “who is coming temporarily to the United States to perform temporary services or labor, if unemployed persons capable of performing such services or labor cannot be found in this country . . .” As noted in Matter of Contopoulos, 10 I. & N. Dec. 654, 657 (Acting R.C.1964), “. . . both the coming to the United States and the performance of service or labor must be temporary, the term ‘temporary’ being used twice.” The nature of the duties to be performed were controlling, not the intent of the petitioner and the beneficiary concerning the time that the individual beneficiary would be employed in that position.

The Service now views this interpretation as incorrect. It is not the nature or the duties of the position which must be examined to determine the temporary need. It is the nature of the need for the duties to be performed which determines the temporariness of the position. Under this

13. Enid Trucios-Haynes, The Rhetoric of Reform: Noncitizen Workers in the United States, 29 SIU L.J. 43 (2004). For a lucid history of guestworker programs in the United States, see Lauren Gilbert, Fields of Hope, Fields of Despair: Legisprudential and Historic Perspectives on the Agjobs Bill of 2003, 42 Harvard J. Legislation 417 (2005).

interpretation the key question in Contopoulos is: "Can the petitioner credibly establish that she has not employed a mother's helper in the past and that her need for a mother's helper will end in the near, definable future?" Likewise, in the instant case, the primary question becomes: "Can Artee establish that they have not employed machinists in the past and will not need the services of machinists in the near, definable future?" Here, as in Contopoulos, we are considering the second temporary requirement of the statute which concerns the position itself and not the first requirement which relates to the intent of the alien to enter for a temporary period. The function of a temporary help service is to provide for the fluctuating needs of other enterprises for specified services. In this case the petitioner provides technically-oriented personnel of a skilled nature to industries requiring such services. The customers of the petitioner do not have a steady need for a specific number of employees. Their business fluctuates and in so changing, their personnel needs change. To meet their needs, the customers of the petitioner turn to the petitioner to provide temporary help. While it is true that the temporary help may be needed for periods of 2 to 3 years, it is also true that shorter periods can be involved and that the need of the customer may not continue.

The situation of a temporary help service differs, however. The business of a temporary help service is to meet the temporary needs of its clients. To do this they must have a permanent cadre of employees available to refer to their customers for the jobs for which there is frequently or generally a demand. By the very nature of this arrangement, it is obvious that a temporary help service will maintain on its payroll, more or less continuously, the types of skilled employee most in demand. This does not mean that a temporary help service can never offer employment of a temporary nature. If there is no demand for a particular type of skill, the temporary help service does not have a continuing and permanent need. Thus a temporary help service may be able to demonstrate that in addition to its regularly employed workers and permanent staff needs it also hires workers for temporary positions. For a temporary help service company, temporary positions would include positions requiring skill for which the company has a non-recurring demand or infrequent demand.

There is currently a wide-spread shortage of skilled machinists in the United States. Because of this shortage, the petitioner, as a prudent business measure, has ensured that it can supply machinists to its customers. Its need to supply machinists to its customers is ongoing. Therefore, as long as this universal shortage of machinists exists, the nature of the need for the position with the petitioner is such that the duties are not temporary and will persist as long as the shortage.

* * *

ORDER: The petition is denied.

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. In the Contopoulos case that the Commissioner disapproves, an LPR who wished to work on a two-year research project needed day care and Greek language instruction for her children during that period. She petitioned the former INS to grant H-2 status to a particular noncitizen for that purpose. The INS did not dispute that both the petitioner and the noncitizen beneficiary intended that the beneficiary's employment would end after two years. The INS nonetheless denied the petition. It reasoned that the duties in question—the care and rearing of children—would continue to exist when the employment was over. The fact that in two years the mother would be performing those duties herself rather than employing someone else was held to be irrelevant.

The Commissioner in Artee rejects the Contopoulos distinction in favor of a different distinction. Together, the two formulations suggest three possible interpretations that could be placed on the phrase “perform temporary services or labor”: the Contopoulos view, the Artee view, and the petitioner's view that was rejected in Artee. Before going further, make sure you can articulate all three possibilities.

2. How would Ms. Contopoulos have fared under the Artee test?

3. Is the literal statutory language “plain,” or does it permit more than one of the competing interpretations?

4. The operative phrase is “perform temporary services or labor.” Would it have made any difference if Congress had said “temporarily” instead of “temporary?”

5. Assume that the permanent business of the Artee Corporation is to hire foreign machinists under one-year, nonrenewable contracts, and to farm out those employees to various manufacturers during that year. Assume also that Artee has a track record of the employment actually ending after one year as agreed. Assume, finally, that there are not enough American machinists to fill this need.

On those assumptions, what policies would be furthered by the Commissioner's interpretation? What policies would be impeded?

6. The Commissioner concedes that “If there is no demand for a particular type of skill, the temporary help service does not have a continuing and permanent need.” In such a situation, however, wouldn't the noncitizen lose for failure to prove that “unemployed persons capable of performing such service or labor cannot be found in this country?” The point extends beyond the specific context of temporary help companies: How can anyone acquire H-2B status in the light of Artee? If there are sufficient American workers, won't the person lose on that ground? And if the mere absence of sufficient American workers enables the government to conclude that the employer's needs are permanent, doesn't the person lose on that ground? The Commissioner, seemingly aware of that paradox, left open a narrow window: “positions requiring skill for which the company has a non-recurring demand or infrequent demand.” Is that really all Congress meant to accomplish when it enacted this provision?

On the other hand, would a contrary interpretation—one requiring only that the employment of the particular noncitizen be temporary—render superfluous the phrase “coming temporarily to the United States?” (Probably not—but can you figure out why?)

7. Several courts have followed Artee. See, e.g., Seven Star, Inc. v. United States, 873 F.2d 225 (9th Cir.1989); Sussex Engineering, Ltd. v. Montgomery, 825 F.2d 1084 (6th Cir.1987) and cases cited id. at 1089 n.4. The regulations now codify Artee. They provide:

Temporary services or labor under the H-2B classification refers to any job in which the petitioner’s need for the duties to be performed by the employee(s) is temporary, whether or not the underlying job can be described as permanent or temporary.¹⁴

The relevant agencies have identified four situations in which the employer’s needs for the duties will be found to be temporary—one-time occurrences, seasonal needs, peakload needs, and intermittent needs. For more detail, see 8 CFR § 214.2(h)(6)(ii)(B) (2008); G.A.L. No. 1-95, note 14 above, § II.B.

8. As a result of 1970 legislation, the H-1 provision does not contain language analogous to the “perform temporary services or labor” requirement. The H-1 must be coming to the United States temporarily, but the services to be performed need not be temporary. Matter of Ord, 18 I. & N. Dec. 285 (Regional Comm’r 1982). If the beneficiaries in Artee had had college degrees, might they have been able to obtain admission?

c. TRAINEES: H-3’s

The H-3 must be a person who has “a residence in a foreign country which he has no intention of abandoning who is coming temporarily to the United States as a trainee.” INA § 101(a)(15)(H)(iii). Graduate medical training is excluded, and the training program may not be one “designed primarily to provide productive employment.” Id.

The H-3 program is tightly regulated to prevent its misuse as a vehicle for recruiting ordinary workers. See generally 8 CFR § 214.2(h)(7) (2008). An H-3 trainee may generally be initially admitted for (or granted extensions of stay up to a total of) two years. See 8 CFR §§ 214.2(h)(9)(iii)(C)(1), 214.2(h)(15)(ii)(D) (2008).

d. MISCELLANEOUS OTHER TEMPORARY WORKERS

The statute recognizes a few other categories of occupational nonimmigrants—crew members of foreign vessels and aircrafts, INA § 101(a)(15)(D); foreign journalists, id. § 101(a)(15)(I); official representatives of foreign governments and international organizations, id. § 101(a)(15)(A, G); and religious workers, id. § 101(a)(15)(R); see generally ¹⁴ 8 CFR § 214.2(h)(6)(ii)(A) (2008); see also U.S. Dept. of Labor, General Administration Letter No. G.A.L. 1-95, § II.A (Nov. 10, 1994), reproduced in 72 IR at 107-13 (Jan. 13, 1995).

Enid Trucios-Haynes, Religion and the Immigration and Nationality Act: Using Old Saws on New Bones, 9 Georgetown Immigration L.J. 1 (1995).

INA § 101(a)(15)(Q) is for the person who participates in an international cultural exchange program approved by the Attorney General for the purpose of providing practical training, employment, and the sharing of the history, culture and traditions of the country of the alien's nationality (emphasis added).

There are some other requirements as well. INA § 101(a)(15)(Q). The authorized period of admission is limited to fifteen months. 8 CFR § 214.2(q)(7)(iii) (2008).

This provision reflects the lobbying efforts of the Walt Disney organization, which envisioned the use of these Q-visas for foreign youth who might wish to come to the United States for short periods to work at Disneyland or Disney World. On Capitol Hill, the program was quickly dubbed the "Disney" provision. Since there is no requirement that qualified domestic workers be unavailable (an omission consistent with the congressional purpose of fostering cultural exchanges), since there is no quota on Q-visas, and since a wide range of programs would fit the broad statutory definition, the Q-category carries the potential for widespread use. To prevent its use as a back door for ordinary employment, the regulations say that the "work component must serve as the vehicle to achieve the objectives of the cultural component." 8 CFR § 214.2(q)(3)(iii)(C) (2008).

On January 1, 1994 the North American Free Trade Agreement Between the Government of the United States of America, the Government of Canada and the Government of the United Mexican States [NAFTA] went into effect. See the North American Free Trade Agreement Implementation Act, Pub. L. 103-182, 107 Stat. 2057 (Dec. 8, 1993). Building on the Canada-United States Free Trade Agreement, NAFTA expanded the free trade zone to include Mexico, thus reducing tariffs and other trade barriers among the three signatories.

Chapter 16 of NAFTA modifies slightly, for nationals of Mexico and Canada, certain of the criteria and procedures for certain of the nonimmigrant categories (business visitors, treaty traders and investors, intracompany transferees, and temporary professional workers). It also creates a specific nonimmigrant category for "NAFTA professionals."¹⁵

15. See NAFTA, ch. 16, Annex 1603, § C. The complexities of the NAFTA provisions on nonimmigrants are beyond the scope of this book, but some excellent descriptions are available. See, e.g., Harry J. Joe, Temporary Entry of Business Persons to the United States under the North American Free Trade Agreement, 8 Georgetown Immigration L.J. 391 (1994); Kevin R. Johnson, Free Trade and Closed Borders: NAFTA and Mexican Immigration to the United States, 27 U.C. Davis L.Rev. 937 (1994); James F. Smith, NAFTA and Human Rights: A Necessary Linkage, 27 U.C. Davis L.Rev. 793 (1994); Jorge A. Vargas, NAFTA, the Chiapas Rebellion, and the Emergence of Mexican Ethnic Law, 25 California Western Internat'l L.J. 1 (1994).

PROBLEMS 4-5

Problem 4. X, a United States citizen, owns a night club in Miami Beach. He ordinarily hires singers for one-week engagements. A number of the singers have become regulars who return for several stints per year. While on vacation in Mexico, X discovers "El Fantastico," a talented night club singer who is beginning to develop a popular following in and around Acapulco. X would like to bring "El Fantastico" back to the United States to perform in Miami Beach for a week. As X's lawyer, what possible avenues would you explore?

Problem 5. Y, a citizen of Argentina, is currently the tenth-ranked woman tennis player in her country. Last year she was ranked twelfth. She wants to come to the United States to compete in the U.S. Open. As her immigration lawyer, what should you do?

4. INTRA-COMPANY TRANSFEREES

The last commercial category of nonimmigrant covered here is the L-category. Read INA § 101(a)(15)(L) before studying the case that follows.

Karmali v. INS

United States Court of Appeals, Ninth Circuit, 1983.
707 F.2d 408.

■ CHOY, CIRCUIT JUDGE:

* * *

I

Karmali was born in Tanzania. He subsequently emigrated to Canada and became a Canadian citizen. In November 1976, Karmali began employment with AF-CHIM, a Canadian corporation closely held by his brother-in-law, Sultan Nazerali Walji. Karmali was "to assist and to investigate new holdings in the management of AF-CHIM's holdings wherever these holdings were located."

In April 1977, Walji and his wife (Karmali's sister) advanced money to Karmali in order to allow Karmali to purchase the Lantern Motel, Cafe, and KOA campground at Bonners Ferry, Idaho. On July 20, 1977, the purchase transaction was completed and Karmali entered the United States with his wife to operate the business. Karmali remained in the United States and managed the Idaho property * * *

On December 9, 1977, AF-CHIM filed a petition with the Service's Spokane office for an intra-company transfer visa on behalf of Karmali. The District Director denied the petition. The District Director's decision was appealed to the Regional Commissioner, who affirmed the decision and also denied AF-CHIM's subsequent motion for reconsideration. On December 29, 1980, the appellants filed a complaint in the district court, * * * contending that the Service's denial of the petition "was arbitrary and capricious and without legal basis,” and seeking “an order directing the [Service] to issue” the petition. The presiding magistrate concluded that the Regional Commissioner did not abuse his discretion in denying AF-CHIM’s petition and granted the Service’s motion for summary judgment. The instant appeal followed.

* * *

The Regional Commissioner interpreted the language “employed continuously for one year” in section 101(a)(15)(L) of the Act to mean one year of continuous employment abroad prior to seeking admission into this country as an intra-company transferee. Thus, the Regional Commissioner determined that Karmali does not qualify as an intra-company transferee because he entered the United States in July 1977, only eight months after he started working for AF-CHIM in Canada in November 1976, and remained and worked here until AF-CHIM filed the intra-company transferee petition for Karmali in December 1977. The appellants contend that the language “employed continuously for one year” means no more than what it says, and that neither section 101(a)(15)(L) nor its legislative history precludes a prospective intra-company transferee from spending part of the qualifying one-year employment period in the United States. Since Karmali’s presence in this country constituted continuous employment for AF-CHIM, the appellants argue, Karmali had satisfied the requisite one-year employment period by the time AF-CHIM filed the petition in December 1977.

The Service’s interpretation of the statutory language in question should be given deference. Olivares v. Immigration and Naturalization Service, 685 F.2d 1174, 1177 (9th Cir.1982) (“The interpretation of a statute by the agency or department charged with its administration is entitled to great deference and should be accepted unless demonstrably irrational or clearly contrary to the plain and sensible meaning of the statute.”). Despite the appellants’ bald assertion to the contrary, we find clear legislative support for the Service’s position that the requisite one year of continuous employment by a prospective intra-company transferee take place abroad.

Section 101(a)(15)(L) of the Act states that an intra-company transferee is not merely one “who, immediately preceding the time of his application for admission into the United States, has been employed continuously for one year,” but also one “who seeks to enter the United States temporarily.” As the Service persuasively notes, the two requirements evince congressional intent that the requisite one year of continuous employment take place abroad. Such an interpretation is supported by the following analysis of the section prepared by the House Judiciary Committee:

Consideration of the petition will involve verification of the prior employment of the individual for a continuous period of at least 1 year abroad by a company affiliated with the parent, subsidiary, or branch located in the United States and verification that the subject of the petition is in a managerial, executive, or specialized knowledge capacity and is the subject of a transfer to the United States [emphasis added by court].

While the Service's interpretation of section 101(a)(15)(L) as requiring one year of continuous employment abroad is plainly consistent with congressional intent, the appellants have not advanced any support for their assertion that part of the one-year employment period can be spent in the United States. We therefore conclude that the Service did not abuse its discretion. * * *

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. The Immigration Act of 1990, section 206(c), amended INA § 101(a)(15)(L) to permit the year of continuous employment to take place any time during the three-year period that preceded the application for admission. At the same time, Congress changed the L-provision in other respects not pertaining to the prior employment requirement. See Imm. Act § 206(a, b) and items 6 and 7 below. How might one argue that the 1990 amendments strengthen the vitality of the decision in Karmali?

2. The court in Karmali rejects a literal interpretation; it chooses instead to read into the statute a requirement that the year of previous employment take place abroad. To reach that result, it uses at least three common techniques of statutory interpretation:

(a) Deference to Administrative Agencies. The court invokes the maxim that the interpretation of the responsible agency should be accepted unless it is "demonstrably irrational or clearly contrary to the plain and sensible meaning of the statute." (Actually, that is a relatively strong description of the standard that a party challenging the agency interpretation must meet.) Recall similar reasoning in Bricklayers Union. There, however, the court found affirmative evidence that Congress had wanted to delegate the interpretive function to the agency. Does the court purport to find such evidence here?

Judicial deference is sometimes also explained as reflecting respect for the agency's expertise. But shouldn't an agency that adopts an interpretation at odds with the literal language be expected to explain why it has done so? Did the INS do that in this case?

(b) Use of Legislative History. The court cites the House Committee Report, which uses the word "abroad." How might Karmali's counsel have argued that the use of that word was inadvertent?

(c) Contextual Analysis. The court says the requirement of continuous employment for one year should be read in the context of the additional requirement that the L-nonimmigrant seek to enter the United States temporarily. Does that context really shed any light on whether the statute requires that the previous employment take place abroad?

3. If the statutory language conflicts with the language of the Committee report, which should control? What are the dangers in relying on the language of Committee reports?

4. What do you suppose prompted Congress to create L-status in the first place? Would those policies be impeded if the one-year employment requirement could be satisfied in the United States? Would any other policies be hindered? Is the court right to find the agency interpretation rational?

5. Could any noncitizen who wants to work in the United States simply create a foreign corporation, make herself the President of the company, wait a year, hire an American lawyer to set up a U.S. subsidiary, and then, once the subsidiary has been formed, enter the United States on an L-1 visa to work for that subsidiary? Would such a course of action frustrate the policy, reflected in the H-2 provision, of protecting American labor?

6. Note two other important statutory requirements for L visas: First, the U.S. office must be that of the foreign employer or its subsidiary or affiliate; that is why L's are called "intra-company transferees". Second, the employee must be "managerial" or "executive" or have "specialized knowledge." "Managers" include not only those who manage people but also those who manage company functions. INA § 101(a)(44)(A)(ii).

7. One who qualifies for L-status as a manager or executive may be admitted for up to seven years; one who qualifies on the basis of specialized knowledge may be admitted for up to five years. INA § 214(c)(2)(D).

8. INA § 101(a)(15)(L) also authorizes the admission of the spouses and children who are following or accompanying to join L-visitors. The spouses may work. INA § 214(c)(2)(E).

9. Under certain conditions, employers may file "blanket" petitions to import multiple intra-company transferees. See INA § 214(c)(2)(A).

5. COMPARING COMMERCIAL CATEGORIES

PROBLEMS 6-7

Problem 6. X, a citizen of the United Kingdom, attended Cal Tech for two years in his youth. While there, he studied mechanical engineering. Financially unable to finish his degree, he returned to the U.K. and began a long career at Irving, Ltd., a corporation that manufactures machine parts. During his first five years there, X served as an assistant to one of the company's engineers. His engineering work was outstanding, and he gradually moved up the corporate ladder into positions that combined technical and managerial responsibilities. For the past eight years he has been a second vice-president in the company's marketing division. He occasionally gives presentations at industry conferences in the U.K. and in that way has become reasonably well known. Irving, Ltd. would now like to send X to Cleveland for two to three years so that he can spend full time working with a drill manufacturer named Boring-Is-U's, one of Irving's most important clients. If he can come, X's job would be to solve product design problems; he would be trying to adapt Irving's production methods to the needs of Boring-Is-U's.

You are a lawyer retained by Irving Ltd. For what types of nonimmigrant visas would you consider applying, and what problems would you foresee?

Problem 7. Y, a citizen of Italy, developed a love of chess early in life. She served as President of the Chess Club during her two years as an undergraduate at the University of Arizona back in the late 1980's, but she dropped out of college after her sophomore year so that she could devote full time to competing in chess tournaments throughout Europe. She was quite successful, winning a number of lesser competitions and finishing respectably in several major ones.

Thirteen years ago, after several years of competitions, Y set up an Italian corporation whose business was to manufacture and distribute elegant chess sets. She ran the business herself, individually handcrafting the pieces at first, and eventually preparing designs for machine production. Soon the company was a thriving enterprise. Within five years, its annual worldwide sales were the equivalent of 3,000,000 U.S. dollars. Y also found time to continue competing in national and local chess tournaments. The most recent ratings of the Italian Chess Federation ranked her 17th in Italy.

Y is now anxious to expand her geographic and career horizons. While lawfully on vacation in the United States on a B-2 visa, she consults you, an immigration lawyer, for advice. She plans to return home to Italy before her authorized stay expires and continue to run her chess set business. In about a year or so, however, she would like to come to the United States to establish a second corporation. The main function of that corporation, which she estimates would require an initial investment of $200,000 (an amount she has available), would be to set up and promote professional chess tournaments throughout the United States. Y would want to run the company herself for at least the first two or three years. After that, depending on how well the company is doing and how much she is enjoying life in the United States, she would like the flexibility to decide then whether to stay on for a longer but still temporary period (rather than return to Italy at that time and hire someone else to run the U.S. company). Either way, her intention is to remain in the United States no longer than five years at the most. She also sees this United States company as a high-volume buyer of the chess sets manufactured by her Italian company. While in the United States, she would occasionally compete for prize money in some of the tournaments herself.

Y would like to know what options she has under the United States immigration laws and, if there is more than one choice, the tactical pros and cons of applying for the various possible nonimmigrant visas.

What advice will you give her?

B. EDUCATIONAL CATEGORIES

1. STUDENTS

The events of September 11, 2001 thrust foreign students into public focus and profoundly affected their decisions whether to come to the United States, as well as their lives while they are here. The main provision on foreign students is INA § 101(a)(15)(F), which you should now read carefully. This provision covers the “F-1” students (F-2 in the cases of spouses and children). Another, much smaller group of students come to the United States to attend vocational or other “nonacademic” institutions. INA § 101(a)(15)(M). A third related category that includes students as well as other educational visitors, INA § 101(a)(15)(J) (exchange visitors), is taken up in the next subsection.

In fiscal year 2007, almost 800,000 foreign students were admitted to the United States. 2007 Yearbook of Immigration Statistics, Nonimmigrant Supp. Table 1.

What do we know about them? The Institute of International Education, in its most recent comprehensive annual report, Open Doors 2008: International Students in the United States (2008) [Open Doors], summarized the data for academic year 2007–08: For the seventh consecutive year, India was the largest source country for foreign students in the United States, followed (in order) by China, South Korea, Japan, and Canada. Approximately 61% of all foreign students in the United States in academic year 2007–08 were from Asia. The University of Southern California (for the seventh straight year) led the nation in foreign student enrollment; rounding out the top ten, in order, were NYU, Columbia, Illinois, Purdue, Michigan, UCLA, Texas, Harvard, and Boston University. The most popular fields of study for foreign students that year were business and management (20% of the total), engineering (17%), physical and life sciences (9%), social sciences (9%), and mathematics and computer sciences (8%). Id.

The large numbers of foreign students clearly reflect foreign perceptions of the quality of U.S. universities, combined sometimes with hopes of living permanently in the United States after graduation. Jagdish Bhagwati & Milind Rao, The U.S. Brain Gain—At the Expense of Blacks?, 39 Challenge 50 (March 1996). Another major draw is the growing importance of English language proficiency in the globalized economy. Joyce Howard Price, World speaks our language and attends our colleges, Wash. Times, Dec. 29, 2004. There is evidence as well that the hands-on instructional methods practiced in many U.S. universities are becoming increasingly popular with foreign students. Id.

Educators generally agree that the United States benefits enormously from foreign students. For quite some time, fewer and fewer U.S. students have been applying to graduate programs, partly because the college-age

American population has been decreasing and partly because American college graduates have tended to opt for the work force rather than for long courses of further study. New York Times, Nov. 29, 1990, at 3. Consequently, U.S. colleges and universities have become ever more dependent on foreign students, particularly at the graduate level. In addition, foreign students now spend $15.5 billion per year in the United States, mainly on tuition, room, board, and other expenditures. Open Doors, above. 67% of these expenditures come from overseas sources, principally the students' families and governments. Open Doors, above. IIE President and CEO Allan Goodman puts it succinctly: "International students in U.S. classrooms widen the perspectives of their U.S. classmates, contribute to vital research activities, strengthen the local economies in which they live, and build lasting ties between their home countries and the United States." IIE Press Release, Nov. 15, 2004. As the 9/11 attacks sadly demonstrated, exposure to the United States does not guarantee good will; nonetheless, most observers agree that in the long run such exposure helps much more than it hurts.

Perhaps most importantly, the foreign graduate students who come to the United States tend to be the cream of the crop of their countries. In India, for example, only about 2% of the applicants are admitted to the Indian Institutes of Technology (modeled on M.I.T. and Cal. Tech.) A 1990 study found that the graduates of those "IIT's," as they are called, made up about 78% of all Indian PhD recipients in engineering in the United States. When PhDs of that caliber become permanent residents of the United States, as many do, they enhance the nation's scientific achievements and its competitive position in the world economy. Bhagwati & Rao, above.

Despite these mutual benefits, foreign students have not always been received with gracious hospitality. For at least two to three decades, signs of tension have become visible. Foreign students can be especially vulnerable during periods of political stress. During the Iranian hostage crisis of 1980, hostility toward Iranians in the United States was intense. President Carter ordered the Attorney General to require all Iranian students to report to INS offices so that they could be inspected for compliance with the conditions of their stay. 15 Weekly Compilation of Presidential Documents 2107 (1979). There followed a series of cases in which Iranian students were deported for highly technical violations of their student status, such as transferring schools before receiving INS approvals of the transfer requests. See, e.g., Matter of Yazdani, 17 I. & N. Dec. 626 (BIA 1981).

In the 1980s, politicians in several states called for state universities to charge their foreign students extra tuition. They argued that the extra charges would offset the subsidies reflected in the tuition rates for state residents and would eventually reduce the numbers of foreigners in American universities and later in the professional workforce. Baker, Foreign Students Under Fire, Newsweek (Oct. 19, 1987), at 73-74.

Resistance soon came from another quarter as well. One educator blamed foreign students for the low numbers of African-American PhDs. See Anthony DePalma, Drop in Black Ph.D.'s Brings Debate on Aid for Foreigners, New York Times, Apr. 21, 1992, at 1, quoting Frank Morris, then Dean of Graduate Studies at historically African-American Morgan State University. Others counter that the increasing numbers of foreign graduate students and the low number of African-American graduate students are unrelated. Bhagwati and Rao, above, for example, argue that the supply of slots in doctoral programs is highly elastic; that over the past two decades the number of Americans in Ph.D programs has remained roughly constant while the number of foreign doctoral students, and therefore total doctoral students, has risen; that foreign students are ineligible for affirmative action funding; and that the real explanation for the small number of African-American doctoral students in science and engineering has been the low number of African-Americans receiving bachelors' degrees in those fields. Bhagwati & Rao, above.

In the early to middle 1990s, the various concerns about foreign students merged into the more general anti-immigration fervor that by that time was sweeping the country. IIRIRA § 625 created INA § 214(m), which prohibits F-1 students from attending public elementary schools, INA § 214(m)(1)(A). The same provision prohibits F-1 students from attending public secondary schools unless they pay the full per-capita costs of their education, and it sets a maximum duration of twelve months. INA § 214(m)(1)(B). F-1 students may still attend private elementary and secondary schools. INA § 214(m)(2). Any student violating section 214 becomes not only deportable, see INA § 237(a)(1)(C)(i), but also inadmissible for five years after the date of the violation, INA § 212(a)(6)(G). In addition, IIRIRA § 641 required the Attorney General, in consultation with the Secretary of State and the Secretary of Education, to collect individualized information from colleges and universities on every foreign student they enroll. An institution that failed to provide the required information automatically lost its authority to accept foreign students. This system was the precursor of the SEVIS and US VISIT programs noted below.

But the most serious concerns about foreign students to date were those that set in after the terrorist attacks of September 11, 2001. Just nine days after the attacks, U.S. Senator Dianne Feinstein of California, upon learning that at least one of the hijackers had been admitted to the United States on a student visa to study English, proposed a six-month moratorium on all student visas. Diana Jean Schemo, A Nation Challenged: Foreign Students, New York Times, Sept. 21, 2001. She did not prevail, but a number of the post 9/11 security measures taken by Congress and the executive branch did aim specifically at foreign students. Some of the strategies had the effect of making the visa process more complicated and more protracted, creating unexpected delays that caused students to miss registration deadlines. Other strategies involved collecting, maintaining, and liberalizing access to a wide range of student information that might otherwise have been protected by the Family Educational Rights and Privacy Act of 1974 [FERPA]. The SEVIS program for foreign students was an outgrowth of those strategies, as was the more generic data collection system now known as US VISIT. These are discussed generally in chapter 10, section B below. As for their applicability to students, see Victor C. Romero, Noncitizen Students and Immigration Policy Post 9/11, 17 Georgetown Immigration L.J. 357 (2003). Long delays in the issuance of student (and other educational) visas resulted. Muslim and Arab nationals have been particularly affected, as discussed more fully in chapter 10, section F below. Finally, because several of the September 11 hijackers had taken flight training courses in the United States, Congress also specifically restricted the use of student visas to attend flight training schools. See Aviation and Transportation Security Act, Pub. L. 107-71, 115 Stat. 597 (Nov. 19, 2001), discussed in 78 IR at 1822 (Dec. 3, 2001).

Soon after September 11, these policies coincided with a drop in foreign student enrollment. Institute of International Education, Open Doors, Report on International Educational Exchange (2004). How much of that drop can be attributed to the post-September 11 security measures is hard to gauge, but many educators see at least some causal connection. The impact was especially noticeable with respect to applicants from the Middle East, whose numbers dropped by 10% in 2002-03 and then another 9% in 2003-04. Id. But other factors were also at play. Competition for foreign students from other English-speaking countries such as Canada, the UK, and Australia has become more aggressive, and bachelor's and master's degree programs in those other countries are often shorter and almost always much cheaper than in the United States. Id.; Price, above. Whether political opposition to the U.S. invasion of Iraq further contributed to the decline is difficult to say.

In recent years, however, the foreign student population has rebounded noticeably. In 2007-08, new foreign student enrollments were up 10% from the preceding year, following increases of 10% and 8% in the two years before that. See Institute of International Education, 2008 Report, above. The IIE attributes the change to enhanced outreach by both the State Department and the educational institutions themselves. Id.

The United States is not, of course, the only country in which foreign students have encountered hostility. In the late 1980s in England, bogus colleges often duped overseas students into paying exorbitant tuition for inadequate educational services. The British Home Office responded with well-publicized raids that snared both college staff and student victims. 3 Bulletin of the Joint Council for the Welfare of Immigrants, No. 7 (August 1988) at 7. In China, relations between African students and Chinese students were once tense. In December 1988, after a Saturday night brawl in Nanjing, thousands of Chinese students and University employees pelted the dormitories of the African students with rocks and shouted racial slurs for seven hours. These events were followed by several days of anti-African demonstrations. New York Times, Dec. 30, 1988, at A-3. Happily, those tensions appear to be a thing of the past.

To receive a student visa, one must generally pursue a course of full-time study. By way of exception, the regulations now allow an F-1 student to take less than a full courseload, upon the advice of school officials, when there are “initial difficulties with the English language or reading requirements, unfamiliarity with U.S. teaching methods, or improper course level placement,” and for certain other prescribed reasons. 8 CFR § 214.2(f)(6)(iii) (2008). Usually the “reduced course load must consist of at least six semester or quarter hours, or half the clock hours required for a full course of study.” Id.

At one time, F-1 students were admitted for fixed time periods. If they later discovered that they needed more time to complete their programs, the students could apply to the former INS for fixed-term extensions of stay. Today, however, foreign students are admitted for “duration of status.” A “designated school official” estimates a reasonable completion date for the particular program. The student may remain in the United States until that date, assuming he or she continues to be a full-time student in good standing. If unable to complete his or her studies by this time, the student applies to the university (not to USCIS) for an extension. It will be granted only upon a showing of “compelling academic or medical reasons, such as changes of major or research topics, unexpected research problems, or documented illnesses.” The university must then inform USCIS of the extension. 8 CFR § 214.2(f)(7) (2008). For an extension of an F-1 stay, one must “agree to depart the United States at the expiration of his or her authorized period of . . . extension . . .” 8 CFR § 214.1(a)(3)(ii) (2008).

An applicant for a student visa must also demonstrate sufficient funds. See generally INA § 212(a)(4). There are stringent restrictions on employment. Foreign students may work on campus, as part of their educational programs, up to 20 hours per week while school is in session and 40 hours per week during school vacations. Off-campus employment is generally allowed only when unforeseen circumstances arising after admission make employment after the first year economically necessary and USCIS grants permission. 8 CFR § 214.2(f)(9) (2008). Foreign students may also engage in “optional practical training” [OPT]. OPT may be utilized after completion of each higher education level (for example, once after a bachelor’s degree, again after a master’s degree, and yet again after a doctorate). See 8 CFR § 214.2(f)(10) (2008). Normally the maximum OPT period is one year, but in 2008 DHS issued an interim rule that extends the maximum to 29 months for F-1 students whose degrees are in science, technology, engineering, or mathematics and whose employers participate in E-Verify, the electronic government database designed to verify the lawfulness of one’s employment. The same interim rule provides what some have called “cap-gap” relief, extending an F-1 visa holder’s permissible stay and authorization to work during the pendency of an H-1B application. 73 Fed. Reg. 18944 (Apr. 8, 2008). For details, see Austin T. Fragomen, The New OPT Rule: New Options, Lingering Uncertainties for Foreign Students, 85 IR 2173 (Aug. 11, 2008).

2. EXCHANGE VISITORS

“Exchange visitors” are part of a mutual exchange program in which students, teachers, scholars, and others enter the country temporarily to pursue various education-related goals. The purposes of the program are to provide training that will enable the visitors to benefit their countries of origin when they return, to foster intellectual and cultural interchange, and in the process to build positive foreign relations. The exchange visitors themselves obtain J-1 status; their noncitizen spouses and minor children, if accompanying or following them, acquire J-2 status. Admission is authorized by INA § 101(a)(15)(J), which you should read now. See generally Naomi Schorr & Stephen Yale-Loehr, The Odyssey of the J-2: Forty-Three Years of Trying Not to Go Home Again, 18 Georgetown Immigration L.J. 221 (2004).

Probably the most popular use of J-visas has been for study in the United States. To a student, one advantage of a J-1 visa over an F-1 visa lies in the slightly more liberal employment rules governing J-visas (both for the principal nonimmigrant and for the spouse and children). Compare 22 CFR §§ 62.16, 62.23(g) (2008) and 8 CFR § 214.2(j)(1)(v) (2008) (J-visas) with 8 CFR § 214.2(f)(9, 15) (2008) (F-visas). Moreover, many of the exchange visitor programs provide fellowships or other types of funding.

The maximum duration of stay for exchange visitors depends on the category. Professors and researchers may stay five years, but with no extensions. 22 CFR § 62.20(I) (2008). J-students in degree programs may remain as long as they are pursuing full courses of study at the institutions for which they were approved and are “maintaining satisfactory advancement.” 22 CFR § 62.23(h)(1) (2008). Recall that students on F-1 visas similarly may remain for the duration of their student status. Thus, intended duration of stay is not usually a significant factor in choosing between F-1 and J-1 status.

Why, then, don't all noncitizens who wish to study in the United States request J-visas rather than F-visas? One reason is that the person might not qualify for J-status. The studies must be part of a specific program approved in advance by the State Department. In addition, the applicant must be sponsored by a U.S. government agency (including the State Department itself or the Agency for International Development), a recognized international agency, or one of various private agencies. See 22 CFR §§ 62.1(b), 62.3 (2008).

But the biggest hitch of all for J-entrants is INA § 212(e). The following materials explore some of its intricacies. Before going any further, read section 212(e) closely.

Sheku-Kamara v. Karn

United States District Court, Eastern District of Pennsylvania, 1984.
581 F.Supp. 582.

■ BECHTLE, DISTRICT JUDGE.

* * *

On August 27, 1978, Benedict V. Sheku-Kamara, (“Mr. Sheku-Kamara”), a citizen and native of Sierra Leone, entered the United States as an exchange visitor pursuant to section 101(a)(15)(J) of the Immigration and Nationality Act * * * (“the Act”), to pursue a program of graduate studies sponsored by the United Nations at the University of Pennsylvania. Since this program was admittedly financed by the U.S. Government, Mr. Sheku-Kamara was subject to INA § 212(e), which, inter alia, imposes a two year foreign residence requirement on all persons who enter the United States pursuant to INA § 101(a)(15)(J) and participate in a program financed by the United States (known as a “J-1” visa). The two year foreign residence requirement requires that all subject persons return to and reside and be physically present in the country of their nationality or last residence for an aggregate of at least two years following departure from the United States before applying for * * * [permanent residence].

On January 16, 1981, the Immigration and Naturalization Service (“INS”) completed a request by Mr. Sheku-Kamara for a change of program. The change, retroactive to October 9, 1979, transferred Mr. Sheku-Kamara’s sponsorship from the United Nations program to a privately funded program sponsored by the University of Pennsylvania. Mr. Sheku-Kamara received no Government funding while in this privately funded program.

On August 18, 1979, Mr. Sheku-Kamara married plaintiff, Mrs. Sheku-Kamara, nee Josephine Kebbie, in London, England. On March 6, 1980, plaintiff Jawa Sheku-Kamara, the son of Mr. and Mrs. Sheku-Kamara, was born in England. On August 5, 1980, the United States Embassy in London, England, issued a visa to Mrs. Sheku-Kamara and Jawa Sheku-Kamara as the dependents of Mr. Sheku-Kamara (known as “J-2” visas). Shortly thereafter Mrs. Sheku-Kamara and her son entered the United States.

While in the United States, Mrs. Sheku-Kamara applied to the INS for adjustment of status from nonimmigrant to immigrant pursuant to section 245 of the Act. On September 7, 1983, the application for adjustment of status was denied by defendant. The denial was based on the determination that Mrs. Sheku-Kamara was not eligible to become a lawful permanent resident of the United States since she, along with her child and husband, was subject to the two year foreign residence requirement imposed by INA § 212(e).

Plaintiffs * * * seek a declaratory judgment that they are not subject to the two year foreign residence requirement.

II. DISCUSSION

While it is not disputed that Mr. Sheku-Kamara is subject to the two year residence requirement, plaintiffs argue that they are not subject to the requirement because they entered the United States after Mr. Sheku-Kamara stopped participating in a Government funded program. Having entered at such time, plaintiffs argue that they did not receive any benefit from any Government funding and therefore Mr. Sheku-Kamara’s status should not be imputed to them. Plaintiffs' argument fails for a number of reasons.

Firstly, a regulation which governs this situation has been promulgated. The regulation as set forth in 8 CFR § 212.7(c)(4) provides:

A spouse or child admitted to the United States or accorded status under section 101(a)(15)(J) of the act to accompany or follow to join an exchange visitor who is subject to the foreign residence requirement of section 212(e) of the Act is also subject to that requirement.

Plaintiffs argue that this regulation is inapplicable to the situation before the court.¹⁶ Plaintiffs also argue that nothing in the Act, or in the relevant administrative history requires application of the foreign residence requirement to a spouse and child of an exchange visitor in a Government financed program where they, the spouse and child, enter the United States after the principal alien has left the Government financed program. Such an argument is incorrect since it ignores a plain reading of the regulation and is a narrow incorrect reading of the leading case on the subject.

In Matter of Tabcum, 14 I. & N. Dec. 113 (1972), a spouse of an exchange visitor was denied adjustment of her nonimmigrant status on the basis that she had entered the United States with her husband and therefore was subject to fulfilling the two year residence requirement prior to adjustment of status. The Regional Commissioner rejected the applicant's argument that the foreign residence requirement did not apply to spouses accompanying an exchange visitor. In so doing the Regional Commissioner noted that "to the extent she was permitted to enter and remain in the United States and was a beneficiary to the financial aspects of the principal alien's participation in the Government-sponsored program, she too derived benefits from such program."

Plaintiffs do not suggest that Matter of Tabcum is incorrect. Rather, they argue that Matter of Tabcum is supportive of their position that a spouse or child must in some way be a beneficiary of the financial aspects of a Government-sponsored program before they can be subject to the two year foreign residence requirement. While Matter of Tabcum does stand for the proposition that an exchange visitor's spouse [or child] who receives some benefit from the Government's funding of a program is subject to the two year requirement, the scope of the decision is broader. As the Regional Commissioner stated without qualification, "the two-year foreign residence requirement . . . applies to the spouse [and child] of an exchange visitor where the principal alien is subject to such provision." Additionally, the fact that plaintiffs have not derived any financial benefit from Mr. Sheku-Kamara's participation in a Government funded program is not dispositive where, as here, plaintiffs have received the more significant benefit of

16. [Footnote 8 in original] Plaintiffs do not argue that the regulation is invalid as against the statute but rather, only that the regulation is inapplicable to the circumstances of this case.

having been permitted to enter the United States solely because Mr. Sheku-Kamara has been and continues to be an exchange visitor.

Secondly, to decide that plaintiffs are not required to comply with the two year foreign residence requirement would create the anomalous result of putting plaintiffs, who derive their status solely through Mr. Sheku-Kamara, in a better position than Mr. Sheku-Kamara who remains subject to the two year requirement.

Thirdly, finding that plaintiffs are subject to the foreign residence requirement is consistent with one of the primary objectives of the Exchange Visitor Program which is to facilitate the impartation of live impressions of the United States and its culture to other societies. Even though this objective is directed primarily towards the principal alien, this court does not see why it cannot be equally applicable to a spouse and child of the principal alien thereby subjecting them to the foreign residence requirement.¹⁷

* * *

[The court grants summary judgment for the defendant.]

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. The plaintiffs in Sheku-Kamara seem to argue only that the regulation should be interpreted as inapplicable to the plaintiffs. Did they concede too much? Read the regulation carefully. Is it clear on its face? Now re-read section 212(e). Is it really clear from the statutory language whether any J-2's (even those who entered before the J-1 nonimmigrant had ceased receiving government funding) are subject to the two-year requirement?

2. The court concludes that Congress meant for the two-year requirement to apply to J-2's regardless whether they entered before or after the J-1 stopped receiving government funding. Evaluate the policy reasons the court gives in support of that conclusion.

3. Although the basis for subjecting Sheku-Kamara to section 212(e) was that his program had been government-financed, note that the home country's need for the J-1 nonimmigrant's skills is another common trigger for the two-year requirement. A third trigger affects certain graduate medical students. INA §§ 212(e)(iii), 214(l)(1).

Waivers aside, how do you feel about the two-year rule itself? In particular, should United States law impose such a constraint (a) in government funding cases and (b) in cases in which the home country needs the individual's skills? Argue both ways, keeping in mind not only

17. [Footnote 10 in original] It should be further noted, as it was in Matter of Tabcum, that in cases such as this where both a J-2 spouse and child are involved, if the spouse and child are not subject to the for-foreign residence requirement, the principal alien could possibly gain a back-door access to a waiver of the residence requirement on the basis of hardship grounds.

the purposes of a foreign exchange program but also the reasons for limiting it.

4. Section 212(e) provides no fewer than four different waivers of the two-year rule—requests by “interested United States government agenc[ies];” cases of “exceptional hardship;” no-objection letters from the applicants’ home countries; and persecution. Keep in mind too that even a person who is statutorily eligible for one of these waivers needs the favorable exercise of discretion. In practice, discretion is rarely exercised favorably in the government funding cases.

5. The “interested United States Government agency” contemplated by the waiver provision is typically the federal agency (if any) that has hired or wishes to hire the J-entrant. Common federal sponsors include the National Science Foundation, the Department of Defense, the Department of Energy, the Department of Education, and the Department of Health and Human Services. See Suzanne Seltzer, Demystifying the HHS Waiver Process, 9 BIB 1165 (Oct. 1, 2004).

6. A waiver request based on either exceptional hardship or persecution is initially submitted to USCIS; if the USCIS reaction is favorable, the request is then forwarded to the Waiver Review Division of the Office of Exchange Visitor Program Services, which is part of the State Department’s Bureau of Consular Affairs. 22 CFR § 41.63(b) (2008). In contrast, a waiver request from an interested government agency is submitted directly to the Waiver Review Division, and its recommendation is considered that of the Department of State. Id. § 41.63(c)(5). A no-objection letter from the individual’s home country is directed to the Secretary of State through diplomatic channels spelled out in the regulations. Id. § 41.63(d)(1). The Chief of the Waiver Review Division has the discretion to refer any of these cases to the (different and separate) Waiver Review Board, which then issues the required recommendation. 22 CFR § 41.63(g) (2008).

7. The more closely the exchange visitor’s program resembles what might be thought of as employment, the more controversial the program has been. For this reason, there has been much discussion about the use of exchange visitor visas by “au pairs.” An au pair is a foreign national who comes to the United States for a year to live with a host family, provide child care, and (now) attend a post-secondary educational institution at least part time. When the program works as intended, everyone benefits. The au pair receives a culturally enriching experience, educational benefits, and the opportunity to spend a year overseas. The host family receives dependable child care and the chance to form a close relationship with a young person from a different country. But the program has not always worked as expected. There have been perennial concerns that au pairs are exploited, that the au pair program is less a cultural experience than a source of cheap child care, and that some au pairs have been irresponsible in their duties.

Until 1997, the au pair program was temporary. In that year Congress made the program permanent and the requirements more rigorous. See Pub. L. 105–48, 111 Stat. 1165 (Oct. 1, 1997). The State Department has similarly upgraded the program. Generally, an au pair must be over age 18, a secondary school graduate, and proficient in English, and he or she must pass a background check. While in the United States, the person must attend a post-secondary educational institution for at least six hours per week and is limited to 45 hours per week of child care. 22 CFR § 62.31(a) (2008). The duration of stay is one year, 22 CFR § 62.31(c)(1) (2008), with a single extension of 6, 9, or 12 months for various sub-categories, 22 CFR § 62.31(o) (2008).

Even with these improvements, au pairs remain controversial. Professor Linda Kelly, examining the au pair program and other immigration policies in the light of society's "supermom" expectations, has proposed replacing the present program with one that insists on rigorous childrearing credentials and admits the qualifying applicants as skilled immigrants. Linda Kelly, The Fantastic Adventure of Supermom and the Alien: Educating Immigration Policy on the Facts of Life, 31 Connecticut L. Rev. 1045 (1999).

PROBLEMS 8-9

Problem 8. X, a citizen of Ghana, has been awarded a Smithford Foundation grant to pursue a bachelors degree in chemistry for four years at NYU. Smithford is a private nonprofit organization that receives 75% of its funds from private contributions and 25% from the U.S. government. By its terms, the grant is contingent upon X obtaining a J-1 visa.

X is not now certain of his future, post-degree plans. Graduate education is one possibility. Perhaps he will want to return to Ghana, or perhaps he will want to find a way to remain in the United States.

X has the option of turning down the Smithford grant and instead borrowing money from his parents to study at NYU, in which case he would be eligible only for an F-1 visa. But he would eventually have to pay his parents back, and in addition the amount they can spare is less than the amount of the Smithford grant (though still adequate to support himself, his wife, and his three young children, all of whom would be coming with him).

X wants to know whether he would be better off with a J-1 visa and a Smithford fellowship, or an F-1 visa and borrowed funds. As his lawyer, what advice do you give him?

Problem 9. Y, a citizen of India, entered the United States on a J-1 visa four years ago. She has received no government funding at all, but she does possess skills that are needed by her home country. A few months ago she married a United States citizen and applied to USCIS to adjust her status to that of LPR. With her application she requested a waiver of section 212(e), asserting exceptional hardship. She has contracted a life-threatening (but noncontagious) disease for which medical treatment is available only in the United States. Living with her and her new husband is her seven-year-old daughter from a previous marriage. Her daughter, who is an LPR, speaks only English, knows only American culture, and thus will find life difficult if the family has to move to India. You are the relevant USCIS official. Should you recommend the waiver?

C. TOURISTS

INA § 101(a)(15)(B) authorizes the admission of certain nonimmigrants who want to visit the United States temporarily either for business (the B-1's you studied earlier) or for pleasure (B-2's). As the chart at the beginning of this chapter shows, there were more than 26,000,000 B-2 visitors in fiscal year 2007—more than 70% of all nonimmigrants admitted that year. Except for those who enter under a special visa waiver program, see INA § 217 and page 462 below, the authorized period of initial admission ranges from six months to one year, and extensions may be granted in six-month increments. 8 CFR § 214.2(b)(1, 2) (2008).

The B-2 cases, though numerically significant, used to be relatively noncontroversial. When they were denied, it was usually because the consular officers believed the applicants intended to remain permanently. Try to imagine the fact situations likely to give rise to that belief.

In this post-September 11 world, all categories of noncitizens are now controversial. Increased scrutiny of almost all applicants for B-2 visas is now the norm, and those who seek to enter under the visa waiver program face a host of new restrictions, some concerning the applicants and some concerning the country of origin. See chapter 10, section E.5 below.

As the following case demonstrates, B-2's can encounter other admission problems as well.

Matter of Healy and Goodchild

Board of Immigration Appeals, 1979.
17 I. & N. Dec. 22.

* * *

[Two holders of B-2 visitor-for-pleasure visas arrived at U.S. ports of entry. Each one was carrying a letter of acceptance for admission to a nine-month program of the Claymont School for Continuing Education. The former INS had not approved the school for foreign students. The immigration judges and the BIA found both individuals inadmissible under old INA § 212(a)(26) (now 212(a)(7)(B)) as nonimmigrants who lacked valid nonimmigrant visas—Eds.]

The facts underlying the section 212(a)(26) charge present an issue common to both applicants, specifically, whether an alien seeking admission to the United States for the primary purpose of attending an educational institution that has not been approved by the Attorney General for attendance by alien students in accordance with section 101(a)(15)(F) of the Act, may be properly admitted as a nonimmigrant visitor for pleasure pursuant to section 101(a)(15)(B) of the Act.

Under section 101(a)(15) of the Act, every alien is considered to be an immigrant unless he is able to establish that he is entitled to nonimmigrant status under one of the specified classes of nonimmigrants designated by Congress in section 101(a)(15) * * *. Moreover, the burden is upon the alien to establish that he is entitled to the nonimmigrant classification and type of nonimmigrant visa for which he is an applicant.

The applicants conceded that they are not entitled to status as nonimmigrant students under section 101(a)(15)(F) inasmuch as the Claymont School has not been approved by the Attorney General or his delegate. Each applicant further acknowledged that the principal purpose of his visit was to participate in the basic course to which he was admitted at the Claymont School, that he had paid a deposit of $100 toward the $2,750 tuition for the course prior to seeking admission to the United States, and that he had been in attendance at the school since his parole into this country.

Counsel does not seriously contest the fact that the Claymont School is a school and that the applicants are students within the ordinary usage of those terms and we are satisfied that they are properly classifiable as such.¹⁸ Counsel argues instead that section 101(a)(15)(F) is solely concerned with alien students destined for approved schools. Since the Claymont School has not been accredited by the Service, he insists that the applicants are not subject to the provisions of section 101(a)(15)(F) of the Act but are admissible as visitors for pleasure. We disagree.

It is clear that absent Service approval of the school to which an alien student is destined, he may not establish eligibility for a nonimmigrant student visa under section 101(a)(15)(F). It does not follow ipso facto, however, that an alien bound for the United States for the primary purpose of pursuing a course of study at an unapproved school is entitled to status as a nonimmigrant visitor for pleasure under section 101(a)(15)(B). That such alien is not entitled to status as a nonimmigrant visitor is evident

18. [Footnote 2 in original] The purpose and program of the basic course at the Claymont School are described as follows in excerpts from the institution's 1977-78 catalog (Ex. 4A):

The Claymont School for Continuous Education is founded on the principle that true education must include techniques of self-perfecting in mind, body, and spirit and must realize the potential latent in normal men and women. . . . The daily schedule normally begins at 6 a.m. All students and staff share in psychological and spiritual exercises until breakfast. After breakfast, 4-5 hours are devoted to practical activities involving the acquisition of a wide variety of skills such as cooking, breadmaking, carpentry, house-painting, plumbing and electrical work, gardening, logging, animal and vegetable husbandry, repairs and special crafts and skills such as spinning, woodworking and pottery to meet particular needs. . . . In the afternoon . . . the two groups not on house duty attend classes, which include work at the Gurdjieff sacred gymnastics, psychology, cosmology, art, music, and theatre. There are also special classes, some conducted by the School staff, some by visiting tutors, on subjects such as health, ecology and intermediate technology. . . .

from the express terms of section 101(a)(15)(B) which includes among those classifiable as nonimmigrants:

an alien (other than one coming for the purpose of study or of performing skilled or unskilled labor or as a representative of foreign press, radio, film, or other foreign information media coming to engage in such vocation) having a residence in a foreign country which he has no intention of abandoning and who is visiting the United States temporarily for business or temporarily for pleasure; . . . (Emphasis added.)

While the statutory term “pleasure” is not defined in the Act, State Department regulation 22 CFR § 41.25 [now 41.31(b)(2) (2008)—Eds.] provides the following definition:

(c) The term “pleasure”, as used in section 101(a)(15)(B) of the Act, refers to legitimate activities of a recreational character, including tourism, amusement, visits with friends or relatives and rest; medical treatment, or activities of a fraternal, social or service nature.

It is thus apparent from the explicit language of section 101(a)(15)(B), as supplemented by the foregoing regulation, that the B-2, or visitor for pleasure, nonimmigrant category was not intended to be a “catch-all” classification available to all who wish to come to the United States temporarily for whatever purpose. Instead, as is the case with the other nonimmigrant classes enumerated by Congress in section 101(a)(15), section 101(a)(15)(B) was designed to encompass a specific, defined class of aliens; by the express terms of the statute, that class does not include aliens coming for the purpose of study. To accept counsel’s theory would not only disregard the explicit language of section 101(a)(15)(B) but would undermine the requirements for entitlement to student status under section 101(a)(15)(F) and the detailed regulations which have been promulgated to implement that section.¹⁹

We accordingly hold that an alien bound for the United States for the primary purpose of study is not admissible as a nonimmigrant visitor for pleasure as defined by section 101(a)(15)(B) but must instead establish his entitlement to nonimmigrant student status under section 101(a)(15)(F) and the pertinent regulations. We recognize that our decision in effect declares unapproved educational institutions such as the Claymont School to be unavailable to alien students. Our holding, however, is in keeping with the clear statutory scheme drawn by Congress which deems all aliens to be immigrants unless they can demonstrate that they qualify for status under one of the distinct nonimmigrant classes enumerated in section 101(a)(15). The dispositive fact is that Congress made no provision there-

19. [Footnote 3 in original] Section 101(a)(15)(F) and the correlative regulations manifestly have the dual purpose of protecting alien students by ensuring the legitimacy of the school to be attended and of facilitating the enforcement of the immigration laws with respect to those students.

under for aliens destined for the United States for the primary purpose of pursuing a course of study at an unapproved school.

* * *

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. Although B-2's are often thought of as tourists, the BIA acknowledges that the provision also authorizes visits for other purposes—including medical treatment, seeing friends or relatives, and so forth. In 2001, the State Department informed all diplomatic and consular posts that “accompanying one’s ‘significant other’ who is temporarily working or studying in the U.S. would be considered travel for pleasure” and that “this is true for both opposite and same-sex partners.” See John McCaslin, Washington Times, July 12, 2001.

But one activity from which all B-2 nonimmigrants are absolutely foreclosed is employment. In that respect, B-2s are unusual. All other nonimmigrant visa²⁰ categories either specifically contemplate employment or at least give USCIS the discretion to authorize employment in individual cases. See 8 CFR § 214.1(e) (2008). Why would the regulations single out the B-2 category as the only one for which the government has no discretion to authorize employment?

2. Given the express parenthetical in section 101(a)(15)(B), the BIA in Healy & Goodchild probably had little choice but to interpret the provision as it did. As a policy matter, however, why not have a nonimmigrant catchall provision for individuals who fall between the holes (rather than the present statutory approach of seeking to identify all possible purposes of temporary entry)?

3. What harm would result if Healy and Goodchild were admitted for nine months to complete their courses of study at an unapproved school?

D. FIANCÉS AND FIANCÉES

As you saw in chapter 3, marriage to an American citizen is one of the more important routes to admission for permanent residence in the United States. If the couple has not yet married, and the noncitizen spouse is already in the United States, the marriage can take place here. Then, depending on his or her immigration status, the noncitizen might or might not be able to acquire LPR status without leaving the country. See chapter 6, § F (adjustment of status) below.

But what if the couple have not yet married and the noncitizen is outside the United States? The citizen could, of course, travel to the noncitizen’s home country, assuming that country permits it. That can be expensive and, if both parties plan to return to the United States to live, wasteful. In addition it will often be difficult for the U.S. family members to attend the wedding. Moreover, the noncitizen cannot apply for an immigrant visa until after the marriage, and the processing can take a few months. The newlyweds would therefore have to choose between temporarily separating or remaining outside the United States in the interim—a potentially difficult wait if the citizen spouse has a job in the United States.

²⁰ Nonimmigrants admitted for transit purposes under INA § 101(a)(15)(C) without visas are also ineligible to work. 8 CFR § 214.1(e) (2008).

To alleviate the problem, Congress enacted the fiancé program described in INA §§ 101(a)(15)(K) and 214(d), both of which you should read now. The noncitizen fiancé(e) receives K-1 status; any noncitizen minor children accompanying or following to join receive K-2 status.

Section 214(d) requires that the fiancé(e)s have met each other during the two-year period preceding the filing of the petition. That provision was added by IMFA § 3(a), and it was controversial. Can you figure out why the requirement was added and what problems it can create? To what extent should United States immigration laws respond to cultural norms different from our own?

As you have seen, spouses of United States citizens normally acquire immigrant status as immediate relatives. Because immediate relatives are not numerically restricted, admission in this manner is theoretically immediate. In practice, however, long processing delays have kept spouses separated for lengthy periods. To diminish the problem, Congress in 2000 added INA § 101(a)(15)(K)(ii), which permits the spouses of United States citizens to enter as K-nonimmigrants (and to work) while their immigrant visas are being processed. See LIFE Act, § 1103(a). The noncitizen spouses receive “K-3” visas; their children following or accompanying to join receive “K-4” visas. Of course, the K-process itself can take time; how much separation time this provision actually avoids is therefore unclear.

If all goes well, the noncitizen fiancé(e) receives a visa, enters the United States, and marries the petitioning citizen within the statutory three-month period. But what if the noncitizen enters on a K-1 visa and the marriage does not take place within three months? Is that the end of it? Read on.

Moss v. INS

United States Court of Appeals, Fifth Circuit, 1981.
651 F.2d 1091.

■ GARZA, CIRCUIT JUDGE:

Appellant, Juanita de los Santos Moss, is a native and citizen of the Philippines. On or about July 16, 1977, she was admitted into the United States under a “K visa” as a nonimmigrant alien fiancée of a United States citizen as provided by [INA §] 101(a)(15)(K). * * *²¹

²¹. [Footnote 2 in original] INA § 214(d) [then] provide[d]:

[The petition] * * * shall be approved only after satisfactory evidence is submitted by the petitioner to establish that

The record indicates that Mrs. Moss had lived with her fiancé for a year while in the Philippines and it is undisputed that both parties intended to marry at the time of her entry into the United States. On October 18, 1977, (92 days after her entry)²² she married the man whom she had planned to marry. There is no doubt that the marriage was bona fide and no allegation has been made that she entered the United States for marriage solely in order to obtain immigration benefits. A child was born of their marriage, however, two months prior to the child's birth Mrs. Moss' husband abandoned her.

On March 16, 1978, the Immigration and Naturalization Service (I.N.S.) issued to Mrs. Moss a show cause order in order to establish her deportability. At the show cause hearing Mrs. Moss admitted that she had married ninety two days after her arrival but contended she was not subject to deportation because she had substantially complied with § 214(d) of the Act. The Immigration Judge, however, interpreted § 214(d) as a rigid and mandatory time period which must be strictly adhered to and, therefore, refused to allow evidence regarding the reasons why the marriage did not occur within the ninety-day time period. Consequently, the Judge found Mrs. Moss deportable because she was not married within the ninety-day period authorized by her "K visa". The Board of Immigration Appeals upheld the decision of the Immigration Judge.

The testimony at the hearing is not clear as to the reason why the marriage ceremony was not conducted within ninety days of Mrs. Moss' arrival. However, the testimony and record on appeal indicate that illness or other factors beyond Mrs. Moss' control may have caused the wedding to be delayed past the ninety-day time period. On appeal Mrs. Moss contends that § 214(d) does not set forth a hard and fast rule requiring a marriage ceremony within ninety days, but instead allows the ninety-day period to be tolled to compensate for delays beyond the alien's control. She argues that she substantially complied with § 214(d) and requests that her case be remanded in order that she may show that the delay in her marriage was due to no fault of her own. We believe Mrs. Moss' argument has merit.

In 1970 Congress added the "K visa" provision to § 101(a)(15) in order to allow an alien fiancée or fiancé to enter the United States to marry a United States citizen. "The purpose behind § 214(d) is to facilitate formation of marital relationships. . . . The relevant inquiry, enunciated in the statute, is whether the parties have a bona fide intent to marry after the alien enters." Menezes v. I.N.S., 601 F.2d 1028 (9th Cir.1979) (emphasis the parties have a bona fide intention to marry and are legally able and actually willing to conclude a valid marriage in the United States within a period of ninety days after the alien's arrival. In the event the marriage with the petitioner does not occur within three months of entry of the said alien and minor children, they shall be required to depart from the United States and upon failure to do so shall be deported * * * (emphasis added).

22. October 18 is actually 94 days after entry. If she had really married after only 92 days, there would probably be no issue here, since 92 days after July 16 would be October 16, which is exactly three months after entry.—Eds.

added). As a prerequisite to approval and issuance of the “K visa,” the Attorney General must be satisfied that the petitioner-citizen and alien have a bona fide intention to marry soon after the alien’s arrival.

Although the fourth sentence of § 214(d) provides for deportation in the event the marriage is not completed within ninety days, it seems the purpose of the time limit is to qualify the intention of the alien to soon marry upon entrance into the United States rather than to place an absolute and mandatory period of time within which the marriage ceremony must occur. “Marriage within the time limit essentially confirms the intent to marry after entry was bona fide.” Menezes v. I.N.S., supra.

In this case it is beyond dispute that the parties intended to be married within ninety days of Mrs. Moss’ arrival and were, in fact, married. It would be incongruous indeed to hold that the very same statute which facilitates entry into the United States for purposes of marriage would require deportation because the ceremony occurs two days late due to circumstances beyond the control of the nonimmigrant alien. As stated in Board Member Appleman’s dissenting opinion, Congress did not intend the ninety-day limit to be so rigidly applied that it could not be tolled when, due to circumstances beyond the aliens’ control, it becomes impossible to formalize the marriage within ninety days.²³ We hold that Mrs. Moss should have been allowed to show why she could not formalize her marriage within the ninety-day time period and, if she can demonstrate the two-day delay was due to factors beyond her control, the ninety-day time period must be tolled accordingly. For these reasons the decision of the Board of Immigration Appeals is reversed and the case remanded to the Immigration Judge for a determination of cause for the delay of the marriage.

REVERSED and REMANDED.

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. What do you think of the “substantial compliance” rule? What factors might have prompted the court to adopt a flexible interpretation?
2. Suppose as a member of the BIA you now had to decide whether a person who had been admitted on a fiancé(e) visa, and whose marriage had not taken place until four months after entry, is deportable. What would you do?
3. A person admitted under subsection K may not extend his or her stay, 8 CFR § 214.1(c)(3)(iv) (2008), may not change to a different nonimmigrant status, 8 CFR § 248.2(a)(2) (2008), and may not adjust his or her

23. [Footnote 4 in original] We also find it significant that § 214(d) uses both “ninety days” and “three months” to describe the time period contemplated by the statute. We take notice of the fact that, with the exception of February, any three month period of the year will always amount to more than ninety days. If Congress had intended, as I.N.S. suggests, that the time period of § 214(d) was of controlling importance, we believe Congress would have used greater precision in defining that time period.

status to that of permanent resident other than on the basis of the marriage to the citizen petitioner, INA § 245(d). The permanent residence that results from such adjustments of status will be conditional under IMFA. Id.

PROBLEM 10

X enters the United States on a valid K-1 visa. Two months later, her 10-year-old son from a prior marriage joins her by entering on a valid K-2 visa. Two months after that, X marries the citizen petitioner. Are she and her son deportable under INA § 214(d)?

E. A FEW OTHER NONIMMIGRANT CATEGORIES

INA § 101(a)(27) creates nonimmigrant “S” visas (often called “snitch” visas) for individuals who are able to share “critical reliable information” about either ordinary criminal organizations or terrorist organizations. Shortly after September 11, 2001 Congress made the “S” visa program a permanent part of immigration law; previously, it had been a temporary pilot program. Pub. L. 107-45, 115 Stat. 258 (Oct. 1, 2001). At about the same time, then Attorney General Ashcroft made clear that he wanted Justice Department employees to use them more frequently. The details on S visas and their renewed popularity are recounted in chapter 10, section B.6.

Statutes enacted in 2000 added several new nonimmigrant categories to the list. The details appear in Stephen Yale-Loehr et al., T, U and V Visas: More Alphabet Soup for Immigration Practitioners, 6 BIB 113 (Feb. 1, 2001). Here is a brief summary:

International trafficking of women and girls has become endemic:

Annually, at least 700,000 people, most of whom are women and children, are trafficked within and across international borders. Approximately 50,000 of those people are trafficked into the United States. Much of the trafficking involves trapping victims in the international sex trade through force, fraud, or coercion. However, a growing sector of victims are forced into labor.

The victims of trafficking are primarily impoverished women and girls who are lured into trafficking networks through “false promises of decent working conditions at relatively good pay as nannies, maids, dancers, factory workers, restaurant workers, sales clerks or models.” Other traffickers simply purchase “children from poor families and sell them into prostitution or into various types of forced or bonded labor.”

Once within the trafficking networks, the victims are frequently transported away from their home communities. They are forced to “engage in sex acts and slavery-like labor” through physical violence such as rape, torture, starvation, imprisonment, threats, physical abuse, and coercion. The traffickers threaten them with physical harm to themselves and their families if they escape or even attempt to escape. The women and children are often further victimized because they are illegally present in the United States.²⁴

In response, the Trafficking Victims Protection Act of 2000 (part of the Victims of Trafficking and Violence Protection Act of 2000, Pub. L. 106-386, 114 Stat. 1464 (Oct. 28, 2000)), Div. A, § 107(e), created a new INA § 101(a)(15)(T). The T-visas are for victims of “a severe form of trafficking in persons” who are physically present in the United States or a port of entry as a result of that trafficking. If age 18 or over, the person must comply with any reasonable request for assistance in the investigation or prosecution of the trafficking. Id. (For some reason the corresponding regulations state the minimum cooperation age as being 15 rather than 18. See 8 CFR § 214.11(b)(3)(ii) (2008)). The person must also demonstrate “extreme hardship involving unusual and severe harm upon removal.” The Secretary of Homeland Security may also grant T-status to designated family members who are accompanying or following to join. INA § 101(a)(15)(T). The principal T-nonimmigrant may work. INA § 101(i)(2). There is a limit of 5,000 T-visas per year, not counting the family members. INA § 214(o)(2). In practice, only a small percentage of the available T-visas have been issued. See Jennifer M. Chacón, Misery and Myopia: Understanding the Failures of U.S. Efforts to Stop Human Trafficking, 74 Fordham L. Rev. 2977, 3019 (2006). After three years the T-nonimmigrants may adjust to LPR status under prescribed conditions. INA § 245(l)(1)(A).

The Violence Against Women Act of 2000 (also part of the Victims of Trafficking and Violence Protection Act of 2000, above), Div. B, § 1513(b), created new INA § 101(a)(15)(U). The U-visas are for those who have “suffered substantial physical or mental abuse” as a result of any of several enumerated acts of violence. The list includes rape, torture, trafficking, incest, domestic violence, sexual assault, prostitution, female genital mutilation, involuntary servitude, abduction, felonious assault, and several other criminal acts. The person must possess information concerning that criminal activity and must help law enforcement officials to investigate or prosecute. Various family members may also be admitted if extreme hardship would otherwise ensue and the investigation or prosecution would be harmed without those family members’ assistance. INA § 101(a)(15)(U). For a creative suggestion that U-visas (for crime victims) be used to redress exploitative immigrant labor practices, see Leticia Saucedo, A New “U”: Organizing Victims and Protecting Immigrant Workers, 42 Univ. of Richmond L. Rev. 891 (2008). The annual numerical limit on U-visas is 10,000, not counting the family members. INA § 214(p)(2). U-nonimmigrants may work. INA § 214(p)(3)(B). After three years, U-nonimmigrants may adjust to LPR status under prescribed conditions. INA § 245(m)(1)(A).

24. Yale-Loehr et al., above, at 113-14; see also David Kyle & Rey Koslowski (eds.), Global Human Smuggling: Comparative Perspectives (2001); Nora Demleitner, The Law

at a Crossroads: The Construction of Migrant Women Trafficked into Prostitution, in Kyle & Koslowski, above, at 257 et seq.

Finally, the LIFE Act, also enacted in 2000, added INA § 101(a)(15)(V) to provide limited relief to certain long-divided families. As discussed earlier, to remedy the problem of lengthy administrative processing times for immigrant visas for spouses of United States citizens, the LIFE Act expanded K (fiancé) visas to admit spouses of citizens as nonimmigrants. The same statute provided analogous, but much more limited, relief for the spouses and children of LPRs. The new V-category permits their admission as nonimmigrants while they wait for their priority dates to become current, but only if the petition was filed before December 21, 2000, the petition has since been approved (even though the State Department has not yet issued the visa), and only after the wait has exceeded three years. INA § 101(a)(15)(V). There are no numerical limits on V-visas. Employment is permitted, INA § 214(q)(1)(A), and adjustment of status to permanent residence is contemplated, INA § 214(q)(3).

F. GENERAL NONIMMIGRANT PROBLEMS

1. INTENT TO REMAIN PERMANENTLY

Most of the nonimmigrant categories you have studied require either that the person seek to enter the country “temporarily,” e.g., INA § 101(a)(15)(B, H, J, L), or that the person have a foreign residence “which he has no intention of abandoning,” e.g., INA § 101(a)(15)(B, F, J), or both. In any of those cases, the individual who unequivocally intends to remain permanently in the United States is obviously ineligible.

The problem can arise in several contexts. The person might be applying for one of the relevant nonimmigrant visas. The person might already have received the visa and be applying for admission at a designated port of entry. After admission, the person might be applying for extension of his or her stay or for a change to another nonimmigrant status that is similarly inconsistent with an intent to remain permanently. Moreover, if after admission ICE discovers that the person originally entered with the intent to remain permanently, he or she might be deportable as one who was inadmissible at entry, INA § 237(a)(1)(A), or as one who failed to maintain his or her nonimmigrant status, INA § 237(a)(1)(C)(i). A finding of preconceived intent to remain can also be a negative factor in various discretionary determinations. Cubillos-Gonzalez v. INS, 352 F.2d 782, 783–84 (9th Cir.1965).

But preconceived intent to remain does not preclude a genuine change of mind. Of course, if the change occurs very soon after the initial admission, the immigration authorities are more likely to suspect fraud. Ultimately, however, the question presented is one of fact.

Preconceived intent to remain also differs from what has been called “dual intent.” A person might enter the United States with alternative plans in mind. The BIA and several courts have held that “a desire to remain in this country permanently in accordance with the law, should the opportunity to do so present itself, is not necessarily inconsistent with lawful nonimmigrant status.” Matter of Hosseinpour, 15 I. & N. Dec. 191, 192 (BIA 1975) (citing court decisions); accord, Lauvik v. INS, 910 F.2d 658, 660–61 (9th Cir.1990). Thus, if a nonimmigrant enters with the intent to remain only temporarily, but with the hope of acquiring LPR status some day if the law permits it, there is no violation.

Intent to remain raises not only legal issues, but also ethical ones. Professors David Weissbrodt and Laura Danielson summarize three of the sources of ethical constraints on immigration lawyers:

The Model Rules of Professional Conduct drafted by the American Bar Association (ABA) have now been adopted by more than three-fourths of the jurisdictions in the U.S., including Washington, D.C., either completely or with relatively minor changes. * * * There are still some states (e.g., New York) that apply the Model Code of Professional Responsibility, which was the ABA-drafted predecessor of the Model Rules. * * *

[There are] three sources of ethical constraint on the immigration lawyer. The first source is the Model Rules adopted by the ABA in 1983. The Model Rules include aspirational goals, rules of permissible conduct, and mandatory rules. In the Model Rules, the word “should” expresses an aspirational goal and the word “may” expresses other permissible conduct that lawyers are not necessarily required to follow. Almost all of the rules, however, mandate a minimum level of conduct for the lawyer. Should the attorney’s conduct fall below this minimum level he or she may be subject to sanction. The Model Rules use the words “shall” and “shall not” to identify rules for which lawyers may be disciplined.

The second source derives from the regulations governing the conduct of lawyers who appear before [DHS and EOIR]. The Code of Federal Regulations [now lists thirteen] nonexclusive reasons for suspending or disbaring the immigration lawyer, some of which overlap the Model Rules and some of which are unique to immigration practice. [8 CFR § 1003.102 (2008).] * * *

The third source is the Model Code adopted by the ABA in 1969. The Model Code identifies ethical considerations that the lawyer strives to achieve. Should the lawyer fail to abide by ethical considerations, however, there are theoretically no sanctions in most states. The Model Code also contains disciplinary rules that mandate a minimum level of conduct for the lawyer. Should the attorney’s conduct fall below this minimum level he or she may be subject to disbarment, suspension, or other sanction.

David Weissbrodt & Laura Danielson, Immigration Law and Procedure in a Nutshell 587–89 (5th ed. 2005).

Only in recent years has there been much writing on the ethical problems specific to immigration law. Here is an updated excerpt from one of the pioneering pieces:

David Weissbrodt and Laura Danielson, Should the Lawyer Tell the Client About a Fixed Intent to Immigrate?, in Immigration Law and Procedure in a Nutshell

Pp. 593-96 (5th ed. 2005).

Different sorts of ethical problems are raised in advising the client regarding his or her fixed intent to immigrate to the United States. The problem arises when a client, otherwise eligible for a non-immigrant visa, for example an F-1 student visa, informs the lawyer that he or she wants to immigrate to the United States. The client would be ineligible for the F-1 visa and most other nonimmigrant visas, however, if he or she has a present intent to immigrate. What should the lawyer tell the client to do? If the lawyer tells the client not to form a present intent to immigrate, would the lawyer be assisting the client in perpetrating a fraud?

Both the Model Code and the Model Rules have sections dealing with client fraud and the lawyer's duty, none of which provide any clear-cut solutions to this problem. Rule 1.2(d) of the Model Rules refers most directly to this situation: "[a] lawyer shall not counsel to engage, or assist a client, in conduct that the lawyer knows is criminal or fraudulent . . ." The Model Code contains similar prohibitions. According to DR 7-102(A) of the Model Code:

(A) a lawyer shall not: * * *

(6) Participate in the creation or preservation of evidence when he knows or it is obvious that the evidence is false.

(7) Counsel or assist his client in conduct that the lawyer knows to be illegal or fraudulent.

In addition, EC 7-6 of the Model Code discusses the lawyer's position in assisting the client in developing state of mind evidence. It provides:

[The lawyer] may properly assist his client in the development and preservation of evidence of existing motive, intent, or desire; obviously, he may not do anything furthering the creation or preservation of false evidence.

* * * Those provisions, however, do not resolve whether the client commits a fraud in declaring that he or she has no present intent to immigrate. It is not clear that the lawyer would assist the client in committing a fraud or in preserving false evidence by discussing the effect of the client's intent on his or her immigration status. The situation is made more complex because only the client knows his or her own intent. An attorney, however, can advise the client as to the consequences of pursuing a specific course of conduct, which is separate from the question of the client's intent.

Other sections of the Model Rules and the Model Code imply that the lawyer has an obligation to discuss the probable consequences of alternate courses of action with the client. Rule 1.2 of the Model Rules prohibits the lawyer from assisting the client in fraudulent conduct, but “a lawyer may discuss the legal consequences of any proposed course of conduct with a client and may counsel or assist a client to make a good faith effort to determine the validity, scope, meaning or application of the law.” Model Rule 1.2(d). EC 7–8 of the Model Code provides that “[a] lawyer should advise his client of the possible effect of each legal alternative.” In this situation, the lawyer is not urging the client to adopt one course of action over another. Rather, he or she is merely discussing the client’s two legal alternatives—to form a present intent to become an immigrant or a non-immigrant—and the legal effects of each. The lawyer explains the consequences and the client makes the decision about his or her present intent. Such advice does not appear to be the kind of fraud contemplated by the drafters of the Model Code and the Model Rules.

In addition, one might draw inferences from the drafting history of the Model Rules. In an earlier discussion draft of the Model Rules, Rule 2.3(a)(2) declared that a lawyer could not give advice that he or she “could reasonably foresee would . . . aid the client in contriving false testimony.” No counterpart to this draft Rule 2.3 appears in the Model Rules adopted in 1983. From this omission one could infer (1) that the drafting committee did not consider this advice an ethical violation, (2) that in a criminal law context this draft provision would be inappropriate, or (3) possibly that Rule 1.2 already covered this situation. In any case, even if draft Rule 2.3(a)(2) had appeared in the final version, the lawyer’s advice would be unethical only in the unlikely event that it aided the client in contriving false testimony. Hence, the immigration lawyer can probably ethically explain the consequences of the client’s present intent to immigrate on his or her eligibility for a nonimmigrant visa without ethical violation, so long as the lawyer does not suggest which course of action the client should actually adopt.²⁵

PROBLEMS 11–13 (PROBLEMS IN ETHICS)

In working out these problems, you need to know that Rule 1.3 of the ABA Model Rules of Professional Conduct requires the lawyer to “act with

25. See also Lauren Gilbert, Facing Justice: Ethical Choices in Representing Immigrant Clients, 20 Georgetown J. Legal Ethics 219 (2007) (exploring attorney’s ethical obligations when immigration client reveals information that conflicts with what is already in the record); Harry J. Joe, Ethics in Immigration Law: Immigration Benefit Fraud and the Peril of Conscious Avoidance, June 2002 Immigration Briefings (“wilful blindness,” or the conscious avoidance of information that would confirm the lawyer’s suspicion of fraud, can constitute knowledge for ethical purposes)—Eds.

reasonable diligence and promptness in representing a client.” The comment accompanying Rule 1.3 adds:

* * * A lawyer should act with commitment and dedication to the interests of the client and with zeal in advocacy upon the client’s behalf. However, a lawyer is not bound to press for every advantage that might be realized for a client. A lawyer has professional discretion in determining the means by which a matter should be pursued.

Consider also ABA Model Rule 1.6:

(a) A lawyer shall not reveal information relating to representation of a client unless the client consents after consultation, except for disclosures that are impliedly authorized in order to carry out the representation, and except as stated in paragraph (b).

(b) A lawyer may reveal such information to the extent the lawyer reasonably believes necessary:

(1) to prevent the client from committing a criminal act that the lawyer believes is likely to result in imminent death or substantial bodily harm; OR

(2) * * * [not applicable here].

Two final pieces of information: ABA Model Rule 1.6(b), which lists the exceptions to the confidentiality requirement, replaced Disciplinary Rule 4-101(C), subparagraph (3) of which had permitted a lawyer to reveal “the intention of his client to commit a crime and the information necessary to prevent the crime.” In some states, versions of DR 4-101(C) are still in force.

The last datum is that the “Terminology” section introducing the ABA Model Rules provides in item [5]:

“Knowingly,” “Known,” or “Knows” denotes actual knowledge of the fact in question. A person’s knowledge may be inferred from circumstances.

Problem 11. Your client tells you she plans to apply for an extension of her nonimmigrant visa. In the course of the conversation, however, she makes crystal clear that she intends to remain permanently in the United States whether she can do so lawfully or not. What, exactly, should you tell her?

Problem 12. After you give the client the advice you consider appropriate, she says she plans to file her application for an extension of her nonimmigrant visa anyway. She tells you she is “willing to take the chance of getting caught.” Should you report her to the government?

Problem 13. You now have a subtler client. The following exchange takes place:

Client: I’d like to get a green card. Is there any chance of that?

Lawyer (after exhausting all the possibilities): I'm afraid there's really no way.

Client: Then how about just extending my B-1? When it runs out, I'll stay on. The worst that can happen is they deport me.

Lawyer: Well, I have to tell you that if that's your intent you're not eligible for an extension. To qualify for a B-1 extension, you need an intent not to abandon your foreign residence.

Client: I'd still like you to send it in for me. I'll worry about my immigration problems when the time comes.

Lawyer: Sorry, that would violate my ethical obligations as an attorney.

Client (with knowing smile): OK, I understand the bind you're in. I just changed my mind. All I want to do is stay for another year. Then I plan to go home.

Lawyer: I appreciate your sensitivity, but obviously you're just saying this to insulate me. We both know you plan to stay on.

Client (still smiling): No, seriously, I really mean it. I'll leave in a year.

Lawyer: Sorry, I just can't do it.

Client (no longer smiling): OK, so you're an ethical lawyer. That's very nice. Fine. I'll agree not to commit a fraud. I truly will leave in a year. Honestly.

Lawyer: Well, I don't know . . .

Client: Hey, come on. Are you my lawyer or my judge?

You're still inclined not to believe him, but there is no way to be sure of your instincts. Should you fill out the application for him?

2. CHANGE OF NONIMMIGRANT STATUS

As the preceding materials demonstrate, intentions can change. A person who was admitted as a student might now wish to become a treaty trader. Someone who was admitted as a business visitor might want to switch to intra-company transferee. An individual admitted as a temporary worker might now wish to become an LPR.

For the nonimmigrant who would now prefer either another nonimmigrant category or permanent residence, and who qualifies substantively for the desired status, one procedural option is to go home and apply to the appropriate U.S. consulate for a new visa. But home might be far away, or home might be a country that cannot be counted on to allow the person to leave again or, for any of several other reasons, it might simply be more convenient to do the paperwork here.

Recognizing those needs, Congress has enacted two provisions. Under INA section 245, certain nonimmigrants (among others) can become permanent residents without leaving the United States. Under section 248, certain nonimmigrants can switch to different nonimmigrant categories without leaving the country. The usual terminology is that one adjusts to permanent resident status under section 245 but changes to another nonimmigrant status under section 248.

Section 245 will be explored fully in Chapter 6. The emphasis here will be on section 248, which you should read now. Note one important structural similarity: To receive the benefit of either section, the person must not only satisfy several specific conditions of eligibility, but also obtain the favorable exercise of administrative discretion. Notice too that the person has to have been lawfully admitted as a nonimmigrant; that he or she must be “continuing to maintain that status;” and that certain categories of nonimmigrants are ineligible to change to certain other categories.²⁶ Noncitizens who are inadmissible for having been unlawfully present for more than six months, and certain other designated noncitizens, are also ineligible for change of status. See INA §§ 212(a)(9)(B)(i), 248.

Suppose, instead of wanting to change to a different nonimmigrant category, a nonimmigrant simply wants to extend his or her existing stay. Normally, it is not necessary to return home for a new visa. The person generally may apply to USCIS for an extension (assuming the substantive criteria for the particular nonimmigrant category are met). 8 CFR § 214.1(c) (2008). Extensions are not available, however, to those who have overstayed or otherwise violated the terms of their existing stays, absent “extraordinary circumstances.” Id. § 214.1(c)(4).

PROBLEM 14

X, an Australian law professor, is doing research at the American Bar Foundation under a grant provided by the Australian government. He is here on a J-1 visa, and his authorized stay will expire eight months from now. He would like to enroll in an LL.M. program at U.C. Berkeley. No extension of his J-1 visa is possible. What should he do with respect to his immigration status? (This is tricky; read INA §§ 248 and 212(e) carefully).

26. The regulations exclude additional combinations. An M-1 nonimmigrant (vocational student) may not use section 248 to obtain F-1 (academic student) status. 8 CFR § 248.1(c)(1) (2008). And no one can use section 248 to obtain K (fiancé) or C (transit) status. Id. § 248.1(a).

EXCLUSION GROUNDS AND WAIVERS

As you saw in the two preceding chapters, every noncitizen who seeks admission to the United States must fit within one of the statutory categories of immigrant or nonimmigrant. Even then, however, there is another set of hurdles—the inadmissibility grounds (often called “exclusion grounds”). Under INA § 212(a), various classes of noncitizens are “ineligible to receive visas and ineligible to be admitted to the United States” unless they qualify for waivers under any of the specific statutory provisions that you will see throughout this chapter. The exclusion grounds cover a wide range of subject matter: communicable diseases, criminal activity, national security, poverty, protection of the work force, the functioning of the immigration system itself, and miscellaneous other concerns.

In addition to making noncitizens ineligible for visas and rendering them “inadmissible” at ports of entry, these provisions can affect noncitizens who are already present in the United States. Nonimmigrants can sometimes adjust to immigrant status without having to go abroad for new visas, but only if they are “admissible.” INA § 245(a). Many years after entry a noncitizen can be removed if, at the time of entry or adjustment of status, he or she was in fact “inadmissible.” INA § 237(a)(1)(A). The lawfulness of one’s original admission can also be called into question if he or she eventually applies for naturalization to United States citizenship. INA § 316(a).

As a result of IIRIRA, the exclusion grounds directly affect one other large group of noncitizens even though they are already in the United States—those who entered without inspection. Until 1996, noncitizens who were outside the United States and seeking to “enter” were subject to the various “exclusion” grounds, while those who had already entered—legally or illegally—could not be removed unless they fell within a separate list of “deportation” grounds. “Entry,” in other words, determined which set of grounds would govern a person’s physical removal.

In 1996, following a suggestion advanced in T. Alexander Aleinikoff & David A. Martin, Immigration Process and Policy 342–47 (1st ed. 1985), Congress decided that the line should be drawn instead at “admission.” In IIRIRA § 302(a), Congress amended INA § 235(a)(1) to say that “[a]n alien present in the United States who has not been admitted . . . shall be deemed for purposes of this Act an applicant for admission.” As an applicant for admission, such a person becomes inadmissible (with some exceptions) under INA § 212(a)(6)(A).

With so much turning on whether a noncitizen has been “admitted,” careful definition becomes crucial. At the same time that Congress enacted the above change, it replaced the statutory definition of “entry” with a definition of “admission.” The latter appears in INA § 101(a)(13) and raises some complex issues that will be deferred until chapter 7. See generally Linton Joaquin, The 1996 Immigration Act: Grounds of Inadmissibility and Deportability and Available Waivers, 73 IR 1641 (Nov. 25, 1996). For now, it is enough to know that the exclusion grounds apply not only to those who are outside the United States trying to come in, but also to those who are already here without having been admitted.

A further word on terminology: Before IIRIRA, noncitizens who were found to be “inadmissible,” and who did not receive discretionary relief, were “excluded.” Those who were found to be “deportable,” and who did not receive discretionary relief, were “deported.” IIRIRA changed the vocabulary. Now, noncitizens who are found either inadmissible or deportable, and who do not receive discretionary relief, are “removed.” This might mean either turning them away at the border or evicting them from the interior. The proceedings themselves used to be called either “exclusion” or “deportation” proceedings, depending on whether the person was inadmissible or deportable; now, both are called “removal” proceedings.

From the inception of immigration control in 1875, the exclusion grounds have expanded steadily in response to the changing social concerns of succeeding eras. The pattern is easy to describe: Congress frequently added new grounds but rarely repealed old ones.¹ In a famous passage, one court characterized the growing list of exclusions as “a magic mirror, reflecting the fears and concerns of past Congresses.” Lennon v. INS, 527 F.2d 187, 189 (2d Cir.1975).

The excerpt that follows will describe how and why the various exclusion grounds evolved. This account is of more than historical interest. Although recent amendments have been substantial, the vast majority of the older exclusion grounds remain intact. Moreover, immigration lawyers need at least a passing familiarity with even the repealed grounds. As noted earlier, a noncitizen’s admissibility at the time of his or her original entry (or adjustment of status) often affects removal, naturalization, and other immigration-related proceedings many years down the road. For all these reasons, your study of the exclusion grounds needs to include their historical roots.

1. The Immigration Act of 1990 was a large exception. For the first (and, so far, only) time in United States history, Congress repealed or narrowed several exclusion grounds. For an excellent description of the exclusion grounds added or changed by IIRI-

RA, see Enid Trucios-Haynes & Lois Gimpel Shaukat, Grounds of Inadmissibility under the Illegal Immigration Reform and Immigrant Responsibility Act of 1996, January & February 1998 Immigration Briefings (2 parts).

Committee on the Judiciary, United States House of Representatives, Grounds for Exclusion of Aliens Under the Immigration and Nationality Act

Serial No. 7, 1988.

Pp. 5-27.

* * *

The first Federal legislation designating excludable classes was enacted in 1875. During the period prior to 1875 there was a series of colonial and State enactments focusing primarily on the exclusion of paupers and convicts. The colony of Massachusetts enacted legislation prohibiting the entry of paupers as early as 1645, and a law enacted in 1700 excluded the infirm unless security was given that they would not become public charges. In colonial and subsequently State legislation, Massachusetts and New York adopted the practice of requiring security or bonds that would be forfeited if immigrants became public charges. * * *

During the earliest days of the colonial period, the British government adopted a policy of exporting convicts to the colonies. Concern about the exportation of convicts dates back to this period in our history. The colonies of Virginia and Pennsylvania adopted resolutions in the 17th century against the bringing in of "jail-bird" and "fellons" and Delaware enacted similar legislation in 1704. The States followed suit, with the encouragement of the Continental Congress which unanimously resolved on September 16, 1788: "That it be and it is thereby recommended to the several states to pass laws for preventing the transportation of convicted malefactors from foreign countries into the United States." Six States are reported to have "promptly adopted suitable laws."

Regulating the entry of aliens was considered the responsibility of the affected States well into the 19th century. At this point, the Federal Government began to take an increasing interest in regulating the admission of aliens. * * *

The Act of March 3, 1875 was the first Federal legislation designating excludable classes. The Act prohibited the entry of aliens convicted of certain crimes as well as the importation of women for the purpose of prostitution. With amendment, both exclusions remain in effect today.

* * *

[In 1882] Congress added mental defectives ("lunatic[s]" and "idiot[s]") and "any person unable to take care of himself or herself without becoming a public charge" to the excludable class * * *.

The 1882 legislation was enacted primarily in response to the U.S. Supreme Court's 1875 ruling that New York's attempts to regulate immigration by taxing or requiring bonds for incoming immigrants was unconstitutional. The Court held that the tax act was unconstitutional because it was a violation of the commerce clause, as were similar laws of Louisiana and California. This ended the State source of funds which had been used to assist the large numbers of immigrants entering through the immigrant depot of Castle Garden in New York, and gave rise to extensive lobbying for Federal control and financial support of immigration. * * *

* * *

[Historian John] Higham also observed, "Although the basic Chinese exclusion law was enacted in 1882, the year of the first general immigration law, the Congress that passed the two measures sensed no connection between them." The Chinese Exclusion Act of May 6, 1882 was enacted out of a concern for protecting domestic labor from foreign competition, combined with racial prejudice. It had more in common with subsequent racially-based numerical restrictions than with the qualitative grounds for exclusion. The Chinese exclusion laws were repealed by the Act of December 17, 1943.

* * *

The first of the alien contract labor laws was enacted on February 26, 1885, against a background of depression, strikes, and intense lobbying by the Knights of Labor. The Act prohibited the importation of contract foreign labor. Its purpose was to protect domestic labor, primarily by curtailing the practice of employers importing large numbers of foreign workers in order to force domestic workers to work at reduced wages. This was particularly prevalent in the coal fields. Certain exceptions to the prohibition were allowed, including skilled labor which could not be found in this country, and others were added and deleted by subsequent amendments. The contract labor provisions were the subject of considerable discussion and revision before their repeal in 1952. * * *

* * *

The 1891 Act increased the list of excludable aliens, adding insane persons, polygamists, and, in response to fear of epidemics in Europe, "persons suffering from a loathsome or a dangerous contagious disease." A medical examination of aliens before landing was required as part of the inspection process. * * * Regarding criminals, the 1891 Act made excludable "persons who have been convicted of a felony or other infamous crime or misdemeanor involving moral turpitude." This is the first use of the term "moral turpitude" in the immigration law, and it was adopted without comment in the accompanying reports.

* * *

The debate on the 1891 legislation also marked the beginning of a shift from a dominant concern about control of the largely involuntary or contracted migration of undesirables to a desire for more general restriction of the numbers and quality of immigrants coming voluntarily. The chief instrument of this restriction, proposed repeatedly until its final enactment in 1917, was the literacy test barring the entry of aliens who were unable to read or write. * * *

The House report on the 1891 legislation specifically rejected an "educational examination." However, legislation including a literacy requirement passed both houses 6 years later in 1897, only to be vetoed by President Grover Cleveland in the first of four Presidential vetoes. Quoting from President Cleveland's veto message:

A radical departure from our national policy relating to immigration is here presented. Heretofore we have welcomed all who came to us from other lands, except those whose moral or physical condition or history threatened danger to our national welfare and safety. * * *

The ability to read and write as required in this bill, in and of itself, affords, in my opinion, a misleading test of contented industry and supplies unsatisfactory evidence of desirable citizenship or a proper apprehension of the benefits of our institutions.

* * *

The exclusion of anarchists had been recommended during the 19th century by, among others, the Ford Committee in 1889. The adoption of such a provision in 1903 followed the assassination of President William McKinley in 1901 by Leon Czolgosz, described by John Higham as "an anarchist of American birth but obviously foreign extraction." * * *

The 1903 Act provided in section 2 for the exclusion of "anarchists, or persons who believe in or advocate the overthrow by force or violence of the Government of the United States or of all governments or of all forms of law, or the assassination of public officials." Section 38 prohibited the entry of anarchists and their affiliates in even greater detail. This marked a significant change in the law. As John Higham notes, "By forbidding the admission and authorizing the deportation of foreign proponents of anarchism, the law penalized newcomers for their opinions for the first time since 1798," under the unpopular Alien and Sedition Acts.

* * *

In addition to "idiots" and "insane persons," the 1903 Act provided for the exclusion of "epileptics," and "persons who have been insane within five years previously" and "persons who have had two or more attacks of insanity at any time previously." According to the report of the House Committee on Immigration and Naturalization, these additions were included "at the solicitation of some of the States whose asylums for treatment of the insane have become overcrowded with aliens, who, after the expiration of one year from the date of arrival, can not be deported, and thus become permanent and onerous charges upon communities having their own burdens of this kind to bear."

The 1903 legislation also provided a limited waiver of excludability for persons afflicted with a loathsome or dangerous contagious disease, in the case of wives or children sent for by immigrants who have filed for citizenship.

* * *

In what was described in the House report as a "humane provision," the 1903 Act provided for the return with any rejected alien who was helpless because of "sickness, physical disability, or infancy" of any accompanying alien whose protection or guardianship was required by the rejected alien. * * *

* * *

* * * More than a million aliens entered in fiscal year 1905 alone, which caused President Theodore Roosevelt to observe, "In other words, in the single year that has just elapsed there came to this country a greater number of people than came here during the one hundred and sixty-nine years of our colonial life which intervened between the first landing of Jamestown and the Declaration of Independence."

* * *

Exclusion of individual aliens on qualitative grounds continued to be the principal means of immigration control under the 1907 Act, which again enlarged the classes of excludable aliens. The Act's additions most notably did not include an educational or literacy test, which had been favored by immigration restrictionists and supported by President Roosevelt. * * *

* * *

Immigration legislation was vetoed three times [between 1911 and 1917], once by President William Taft and twice by President Woodrow Wilson. President Wilson's second veto was overridden, and the legislation was enacted as the Immigration Act of February 5, 1917. With amendments, the 1917 Act remained in effect until its recodification, revision, and repeal in 1952.

* * *

The focal point of the controversy over immigration legislation during the 20-year period beginning at the turn of the century, and particularly between 1911 and 1917, was the literacy requirement. Section 3 of the legislation enacted in 1917 provided for the exclusion of "all aliens over sixteen years of age, physically capable of reading, who can not read the English language, or some other language or dialect, including Hebrew or Yiddish," with exemptions for specified relatives of immigrants and U.S. citizens and for aliens seeking entry to avoid religious persecution.

The literacy requirement was controversial because it marked a turning point in U.S. immigration policy. Although it related to individual qualifications, the literacy test was perceived as a means of restricting the number of aliens entering. This shift in policy was more obvious in the next decade, with the adoption of outright numerical limitations, but there was no question that this was also the intent of the literacy provision. * * *

Commenting on President Wilson's veto in 1915, Congressman Augustus Gardner of Massachusetts said:

The President is entirely correct when he says in his veto message that the object of the literacy test in the immigration bill is restriction, not selection. The President believes that every able-bodied person not of questionable character ought to be admitted to this country. Now without doubt, that is our historic policy. . . .

We restrictionists believe that altogether too many able-bodied persons are coming into this country, whether their characters are good, bad, or indifferent. We believe that immigrants are coming too fast to be assimilated, and we believe that the low wages which they are willing to accept are a menace to our high standard of living. Therefore we declare that the time has come for Congress to abandon the historic policy of letting in every able-bodied person whose character is not questionable, and in lieu of that policy we believe that we ought to adopt the policy of substantially cutting down the number of immigrants, even if in so doing we are forced to exclude many persons who might prove to be desirable citizens.

The Dillingham Commission [established by Congress in 1907 had] recommended the literacy provision as the best means of restricting what they defined as the less desirable "new immigration." In their view, the "old immigration" occurred prior to 1883 and was essentially a movement of permanent settlers from Northern and Western Europe. The "new immigration" came primarily from Eastern and Southern Europe, and was made up predominantly of single males rather than families, many of whom were coming temporarily to make money in the cities. The "new immigration" was generally characterized by the Dillingham Commission in much less favorable terms than the "old immigration": more than 35 percent of the "new immigrants" were illiterate, they congregated together in groups rather than assimilating, and they were used to low wages and willing to accept them here, to the detriment of U.S. workers. * * *

The mathematical rationale behind the proposed literacy provision was explained as follows by Senator Dillingham on the Senate floor in 1916:

We took the nations from which this immigration comes so largely, the eastern and southern nations of Europe, and ascertained what the literacy percentage was among the people of those nations. We saw at once that if we adopted the educational test, it would substantially decrease the volume of that stream 30 percent, which was just about what we wanted to accomplish. On the other hand, the educational test would in no way affect England or Scotland or Ireland or the Scandinavian countries or Germany or France. The degree of illiteracy in those countries is negligible. . . .

Like the Commission he had chaired, Senator Dillingham urged Congress to adopt the literacy provision in lieu of any numerical formula as a means of restricting immigration.

* * *

President Woodrow Wilson vetoed bills containing the literacy provision twice, in 1915 and 1917, the second time unsuccessfully. He argued basically against the concept of restriction, and against basing eligibility on opportunity rather than personal quality. * * *

* * *

The 1917 legislation added to the list of those excludable as mental or physical defectives, "persons of constitutional psychopathic inferiority; persons with chronic alcoholism," and persons afflicted with tuberculosis "in any form." The report of the House Committee on Immigration and Naturalization went into some detail about the new eugenic category of "persons of constitutional psychopathic inferiority," noting that while the term was unfamiliar to laymen, "with alienists, however, it has a well-defined meaning. One has defined it to be 'a congenital defect in the emotional or volitional fields of mental activity which results in inability to make proper adjustment to the environments.'" * * *

The 1917 Act also limited the provision excluding aliens with a defect which would prevent them from earning a living to those with physical, as opposed to mental, defects, as in current law. Quoting from the report of the Senate Committee on Immigration, "The reasons for excluding a physically defective alien are likelihood of his becoming a public charge and inability by his own exertions to care for himself and those dependent upon him, while the real object of excluding the mentally defective is to prevent the introduction into the country of strains of mental defect that may continue and multiply through succeeding generations, irrespective of the immediate effect thereof on earning capacity."

* * *

The 1917 Act also added to the list of excludable aliens "persons who have been deported under any of the provisions of this Act, and who may again seek admission within 1 year from the date of such deportation, unless" [the Secretary of Labor consents to their reapplying.] The Senate Committee on Immigration explained that the purpose of this provision was "to reach the quite extensive and very annoying practice of aliens expelled from the country or debarred at the ports thereof immediately reattempting to break past the barriers and enter."

* * *

* * * [In] the Act of June 5, 1920 * * * [t]he excludable classes were enlarged to cover saboteurs, aliens engaged in writing, publishing, etc., matter advocating proscribed activities and aliens who were members of associations involved in the circulation of such matter. * * *

* * *

The purpose of the Immigration Act of May 26, 1924 was clearly stated in the title, which designated it as, "An act to limit the immigration of aliens into the United States, and for other purposes." Like the temporary Act of May 19, 1921, it accomplished this purpose directly rather than indirectly, by means of numerical limitations eventually in the form of the national origins quota system. * * * From 1921 to the present time, immigration has been regulated quantitatively as well as qualitatively, by the increasing list of grounds for exclusion. Together with the 1917 Act, the 1924 Act constituted the basic immigration law until 1952.

The 1924 Act [excluded] most aliens who were ineligible for citizenship * * *. At the time, this provision served to totally exclude the Japanese, and was controversial. According to the House Committee on Immigration and Naturalization, naturalization then was limited “to ‘free white persons and to aliens of African nativity and to persons of African descent’.” The Committee wrote, “All must agree that nothing can be gained by permitting to be built up in the United States colonies of those who can not, under the law, become naturalized citizens, and must therefore owe allegiance to another government.”

* * *

With the exception of legislation on the exclusion of subversives and related classes,² which is discussed separately below, only minor changes were made in the grounds for exclusion during the period 1924–1952, which encompassed the depression and World War II. The 1917 Act remained the basic law on exclusion during this lengthy period.

Significant changes were made in the administration of the 1917 Act beginning in 1929, in response to pressure from the Congress to impose numerical limits on Mexico, a move strongly opposed by the State Department on foreign policy grounds. According to historian Robert Divine, the State Department in January 1929 issued instructions to American consuls in Mexico ordering them to apply the exclusion grounds more stringently, particularly the provisions relating to literacy, contract labor, and becoming a public charge. Quoting Divine, “When an applicant was asked about his financial status, if he replied he had a job waiting for him in the United States, he was ruled out on the contract labor provision, while if he answered that he had no job in sight, he was rejected as likely to become a public charge.”

The change in policy was effective in reducing Mexican immigration to 12,703 in fiscal year 1930, compared to 40,154 in 1929. * * * The tactic was successful in heading off numerical limits on Mexico which, with the rest of the Western Hemisphere, remained subject only to qualitative restrictions until 1968.

* * *

The Immigration and Nationality Act of June 27, 1952, popularly known as the McCarran–Walter Act after its principal Senate and House sponsors, revised, codified, and repealed virtually all existing immigration law. President Harry Truman vetoed the bill, primarily because it carried

2. Important statutes enacted at the peak of the Cold War are discussed on pp. 16–18 below.—Eds.

forward the national origins quota system of numerical limitation. The bill was enacted over his veto and remains in effect today with substantial amendment, including the repeal of the national origins quota system in 1965. * * *

* * *

Among other things, the McCarran-Walter Act both lengthened and “strengthened” the list of excludable classes. Senator McCarran stated on the Senate floor, “our present laws are shot through with weaknesses and loopholes, and . . . criminals, Communists, and subversives of all descriptions are even now gaining admission into this country like water through a sieve and we cannot under our present laws effectively exclude or deport them.”

Based in large part on the recommendations of the Senate Judiciary Special Subcommittee’s report, the McCarran-Walter Act retained most of the previously existing grounds for exclusion, with the notable exception of the contract labor provision for which it substituted the labor certification requirement. It revised some of the previously existing categories, generally in the direction of expanding their coverage. It also added a number of new categories, including narcotics law violators and addicts, aliens coming to engage in immoral sexual acts, aliens entering by means of false statements, and aliens aiding illegal immigration. * * *

* * *

The preceding excerpt takes you through enactment of the 1952 Act. From then until 1990, the exclusion grounds underwent relatively little change. There were some amendments to existing grounds and the addition of three new grounds—foreign medical graduates who had not passed prescribed tests, Nazi war criminals, and certain noncitizens who have claimed immunity from criminal prosecution. See INA § 212(a)(32–34), pre-1990 version.

The pre-1990 list of exclusion grounds struck many as archaic. After years of debate they were overhauled by the Immigration Act of 1990, § 601, to date the only systematic narrowing of the exclusion grounds.

Only a few grounds changed significantly in content, but those few had been among the most controversial of the exclusions. The Act eliminated the exclusion of homosexuals; authorized the HHS Secretary to remove AIDS from the list of diseases that render noncitizens inadmissible; modernized and narrowed the exclusions relating to mental illness; repealed the exclusion grounds for illiteracy and mental retardation; and significantly narrowed various exclusion grounds based on political beliefs, statements, and associations. At the same time, Congress added an exclusion ground for anyone whose entry or activities in the United States might adversely affect United States foreign policy.

Since 1990, the former trend to expand the grounds for inadmissibility has reemerged. IIRIRA significantly lengthened the list. The more important changes will be noted in later sections of this chapter.

The exclusion grounds generally appear in INA § 212. That section also contains provisions—some automatic, others discretionary—for waiving certain exclusion grounds in certain circumstances. Most of the grounds for inadmissibility appear in subsection (a), but a few appear in other subsections.³ See, e.g., INA § 212(e, f, j, m, n); see also INA § 211. The remaining subsections provide for waivers. Skim section 212(a) now to get a sense of its layout.

How frequently are the various exclusion grounds invoked? The Visa Office (VO), a component of the State Department's Bureau of Consular Affairs, reports annually on the number of visa denials by exclusion ground, broken down separately for immigrants and nonimmigrants. The figures are reproduced below for fiscal year 2007. When reading them, keep in mind that often a visa is denied because of inadequate paperwork or some other curable defect in the application. Moreover, some inadmissible applicants qualify for waivers. Consequently, VO also reports the number of cases in which initial findings of ineligibility were overcome.⁴

3. For some time, the statutory exclusion grounds have generally been assumed to be exhaustive. The State Department regulations have allowed consular officers to deny visas "only upon a ground specifically set out in the law or implementing regulations." 22 C.F.R. § 40.6 (2008). The latter are either interpretations of INA § 212 or documentary requirements for establishing conformity with INA § 212. Similarly, noncitizens may be excluded at ports of entry only on the basis of the statutory grounds. Gegiow v. Uhl, 239 U.S. 3, 36 S.Ct. 2, 60 L.Ed. 114 (1915). But see Matter of O, 8 I. & N. Dec. 291 (Ass't Comm'r & BIA, 1959) (noncitizen may be excluded if, upon admission, he or she would immediately be deportable). In 1990, Congress implied for the first time that immigration officers have no discretion to deny either admission or adjustment of status, and that consular officers similarly have no discretion to deny visas, on grounds not laid out in INA § 212. See Imm. Act 1990, § 601(b), amending INA § 212(b) (requiring those officers to provide written notice of the specific exclusion grounds).

4. Sometimes an applicant who is found ineligible during a given fiscal year overcomes that ineligibility in the following fiscal year. In the chart that follows, the columns for ineligibilities overcome represent the number of overcomings recorded in fiscal year 2007, not the number of overcomings attributable to ineligibilities found in 2007. Also, a given applicant can be found inadmissible on more than one ground, and on more than one occasion on the same ground, in a given fiscal year. In this chart, all figures refer to the number of times a given inadmissibility ground was found or overcome, not the number of different applicants actually denied visas on such a ground.

SELECTED VISA INELIGIBILITIES IN FISCAL YEAR 2007⁵

[Note: The only grounds excerpted below are those in which at least one column was at least 1000.]

Exclusion Ground	Immigrants' Ineligibilities		Nonimmigrants' Ineligibilities
	Found	Overcome	Found	Overcome
Crime involving moral turpitude	757	217	4,404	2,844
Controlled substance violators	296	36	2,238	1,498
Controlled substance traffickers	246	1	1,308	355
Drug abuser or addict	1,193	0	85	27
Public charge	5,034	4,247	560	43
Labor certification	14,421	440	N/A	N/A
Misrepresentation	4,185	798	6,636	1,241
Smugglers (of persons)	625	50	1,445	225
Unlawfully present 181 days to one year	459	259	1,850	106
Unlawfully present one year or more	14,853	6,832	8,057	517
Unlawfully present after prior violation	2,224	0	1,385	311
Failure to establish entitlement to nonimmigrant status	N/A	N/A	1,578,178	19,510
Noncompliance with provisions of the INA or regulations issued pursuant thereto	240,738	160,633	507,310	442,474
Total	288,878	174,438	2,117,241	470,047

The remaining sections of this chapter will take you through some of the current exclusion grounds and waiver provisions. Coverage here will be highly selective.⁶

A. GROUNDS RELATED TO IMMIGRATION CONTROL

Most of the exclusion grounds reflect congressional judgments that certain classes of noncitizens would have an adverse impact on the nation's health and welfare. To implement this network of substantive exclusion grounds requires elaborate procedures. Not surprisingly, compliance with those procedures has also been made a condition of admittance. Many of the modern exclusion grounds are, in other words, simply instruments for making the immigration controls effective.

One group of exclusion grounds relating solely to immigration control concerns the integrity of documents. Thus, subsections 7(A) and 7(B) of INA § 212(a) exclude, respectively, immigrants and nonimmigrants who are not in possession of valid passports and visas (or sometimes alternative

5. Source: Report of the Visa Office 2007, Table XX, <http://travel.state.gov/pdf/FY07AnnualReportTableXX.pdf>.

6. Most of the inadmissibility grounds have counterpart deportability grounds, and many of the latter will be examined in chapter 7. One of the exclusion waivers, INA § 212(e) (for exchange visitors), was taken up on pages 398–401 above. The other waiver provisions are either statutorily limited to, or in some cases theoretically general but in practice commonly sought in relation to, cer-entry documents), subject to a discretionary waiver authority granted in section 212(k). Similarly, as you saw earlier, certain employment-based immigrants will be inadmissible under INA § 212(a)(5)(A) if they do not have “labor certification.” Although not directly concerned with documents, a provision excluding stowaways, INA § 212(a)(6)(D), serves analogous functions.

Certain of these documents-related exclusion grounds deal specifically with fraud. For example, noncitizens who have committed specified forms of document fraud are subject to administrative fines under INA § 274C; upon being formally ordered to pay such penalties, they become inadmissible, INA § 212(a)(6)(F), subject to discretionary waivers in certain family-related circumstances, INA § 212(d)(12). Noncitizens who procure visas, admission, or certain other documents or benefits by fraud or misrepresentation become inadmissible for life. INA § 212(a)(6)(C)(i). False claims of citizenship, both oral and written, constitute independent grounds for inadmissibility. INA § 212(a)(6)(C)(ii).

Another set of immigration-control-related exclusion grounds relates to surreptitious entry. As noted in the introduction to this chapter, IIRIRA renders inadmissible those noncitizens who are present in the United States without having been admitted or paroled, as well as those who arrive other than at officially designated ports of entry. INA § 212(a)(6)(A). Assisting other noncitizens to enter unlawfully is also a ground for inadmissibility, subject to certain conditions and waivers. INA §§ 212(a)(6)(E), 212(d)(11).

Some of the exclusion grounds encompass noncitizens who are or were out of status. INA § 212(a)(9)(B), another product of IIRIRA, is especially important. It renders certain noncitizens who have been “unlawfully present” in the United States for 180 days or for one year inadmissible for three years or ten years, respectively. Please read INA § 212(a)(9)(B) carefully at this time.

INA § 212(a)(9)(B)(ii) defines a person as being “unlawfully present” if he or she “is present in the United States after the expiration of the period of stay authorized by the Attorney General or is present in the United States without being admitted or paroled.” This definition has generated some difficult issues.⁷

One important interpretation source, binding on all USCIS adjudicators (but not on officials in other agencies, such as consular officers issuing visas or immigration judges and the BIA in the Justice Department’s EOIR) is section 40.9 of the USCIS Adjudicator’s Field Manual (AFM). This section of the AFM deals with the meaning of “unlawful presence.” It was comprehensively updated on May 6, 2009 and reproduced in 86 IR at 1420–70 (May 18, 2009). Under its terms, section 212(a)(9)(B) contemplates continuous unlawful presence, not an aggregate of two or more separate tain exclusion grounds. They are discussed along with the grounds to which they pertain.

7. See, e.g., James Feroli, Unlawful Presence, Voluntary Departure, and Stays of Voluntary Departure, Jan. 2006 Immigration stays. AFM § 40.9.2(a)(4)(A), 86 IR at 1432. For example, a person with two separate four-month periods of unlawful presence would not be inadmissible under the 180-day provision. Note that the two sub-prongs of section 212(a)(9)(B) are differently worded. The 3-year statutory exclusion refers to unlawful presence for “a period of more than 180 days . . . (emphasis added),” while the 10-year exclusion refers simply to unlawful presence “for one year or more.” INA § 212(a)(9)(B)(i). Nonetheless, the AFM makes clear that its interpretation applies to both sub-prongs.

Briefings; Lory Diana Rosenberg, Love and Marriage After Judicial Review: Challenging the Logistics of Unlawful Presence, 10 BIB 1781 (Dec. 1, 2005).

One issue concerns a remedy called “voluntary departure,” which you will study in chapter 8. It is common for either ICE or an immigration judge to allow a person under certain circumstances to depart voluntarily rather than be formally removed. Typically the person is given until a certain date to leave. The USCIS position is that an individual who has been granted the remedy of “voluntary departure” is not considered “unlawfully present” until the grant expires. AFM § 40.9.2(b)(3)(H), 86 IR at 1458.

What happens if a nonimmigrant violates the terms of his or her admission other than by overstaying? Suppose, for example, a person admitted as an F-1 student drops out of school or works without authorization. Does his or her presence become “unlawful” at that point? The violation of the terms of admission makes the person deportable, INA § 237(a)(1)(C)(i), but the USCIS position is that the presence does not thereby become unlawful, and thus the 180-day and one-year periods do not start to run, until the immigration judge hears the case and determines that the violation has occurred (or USCIS has denied a request for an immigration benefit). AFM § 40.9.2(b)(1)(E), 86 IR at 1463.

Importantly, the period in which a “bona fide” application for asylum is pending does not constitute unlawful presence unless the person was employed without authorization. INA § 212(a)(9)(B)(iii)(II). USCIS interprets “bona fide” to mean the application has “a reasonably arguable basis in fact or law, and is not frivolous.” AFM § 40.9.2(b)(2)(B), 86 IR at 1448. Nor does time spent while under age 18 count as unlawful presence. INA § 212(a)(9)(B)(iii)(I).

There has been little dispute concerning those issues. In contrast, there has been controversy on another, immensely important issue. When ICE believes someone is deportable, it begins removal proceedings by filing a document called a “notice to appear.” INA § 239(a)(1). Because of huge administrative backlogs, it can take months or sometimes even years to hold the removal hearing, and there is no authority to remove the person before the hearing has been held. Does the time from the notice to appear until the issuance of a removal order count as unlawful presence? The common position of USCIS and the Justice Department is that the mere pendency of removal proceedings does not affect the lawfulness of the person’s presence one way or the other. If the person’s presence is otherwise unlawful, it remains so. 8 CFR § 239.3 (2008); AFM § 40.9.2(b)(5)(A), 86 IR at 1462. Further complications arise if the immigration judge finds the person deportable but grants any of several discretionary remedies that you will study in chapter 8.

One other “unlawful presence” issue requires attention. Nonimmigrants who have been admitted for fixed durations frequently apply to USCIS for either extensions of stay or changes of status to other nonimmigrant categories. Suppose a person files such an application before his or her original stay has expired, but USCIS does not decide the application for an extension or change until after the person’s original stay has expired. In that situation, INA § 212(a)(9)(B)(iv) tolls the accumulation of unlawful presence time during the period from expiration of the original stay to the time USCIS decides the application, provided the application is “nonfrivolous” and the applicant has not worked without authorization. The tolling language applies only to the 3-year bar (not the 10-year bar), and even then the maximum tolling provided by the statute is 120 days. Under the literal language, therefore, any period of physical presence beyond the 120-day period constitutes unlawful presence, even if USCIS takes inordinate time to adjudicate the application. To remedy that consequence, USCIS designates the entire period during which a timely filed, nonfrivolous application for either extension of stay or change of status is pending as “a period of stay authorized by the Attorney General” for purposes of section 212(a)(9), provided the person has not worked without authorization. AFM § 40.9.2(b)(2)(G), 86 IR at 1451; id. § 40.9.2(b)(3)(B), 86 IR at 1454. The practical effect of the USCIS policy is to eliminate the 120-day limit and to extend the tolling to cover the 10-year bar as well as the 3-year bar. Similarly, unlawful presence time does not accrue while a properly filed application for adjustment of status (discussed in chapter 6, § F below) is pending. AFM § 40.9.2(b)(3)(A), 86 IR at 1452.

The 9(b) provisions have had harsh effects. One respected scholar and current DHS Deputy General Counsel has gone so far as to call for their outright repeal. See David A. Martin, Waiting for Solutions: Extending the Period of Time for Migrants to Apply for Green Cards Doesn’t Get at the Real Problem, Legal Times (May 28, 2001), at 66.

The last category of immigration-control-related exclusion grounds concerns the removal process more directly. INA § 212(a)(6)(B) (the no-show provision) renders inadmissible for five years any noncitizen who, without reasonable cause, fails to attend his or her removal hearing. Under INA § 212(a)(9)(A), noncitizens who are ordered removed are generally inadmissible for either 5 years or 10 years, depending on whether they were removed upon or after arrival (20 years for second offenders, forever for “aggravated felons,” a term that you will examine later). Under section 212(a)(9)(A)(iii), the Secretary of Homeland Security has the discretion to waive this ground of inadmissibility by consenting to the person applying for admission.

Finally, one who either was unlawfully present for “an aggregate period of more than one year” or was removed for any reason, and who then enters or attempts to enter “without being admitted,” becomes inadmissible for at least ten years, after which time the Secretary of Homeland Security may grant permission to reapply for admission. INA § 212(a)(9)(C). Since the statute expressly uses the term “aggregate,” the USCIS position is that two or more separate periods may be aggregated for purposes of section 212(a)(9)(C). See AFM § 40.9.2(a)(4)(B), 86 IR at 1433 (contrasting this interpretation with that of the slightly different language in section 212(a)(9)(B)).

An important and more general provision, INA § 212(d)(3)(A), authorizes joint Secretary of Homeland Security/Secretary of State waivers, for nonimmigrants only, of all but a handful of the exclusion grounds. You will see more on the 212(d)(3)(A) waivers later.

At this time, please read INA §§ 212(a)(6, 7, and 9), 212(d)(3)(A), and 212(i). You need to be familiar with them to do the Problems that follow. Note also that INA § 212(a)(9)(B)(i)(I) refers to the person having “voluntarily departed.” This concept is fully explored in chapter 8. For now, all you need to know is that a person who leaves the United States after having been ordered removed is not considered to have “voluntarily departed.”

PROBLEMS 1-5

Problem 1. X, a noncitizen, was born on July 1, 1990. On July 1, 2007, he made an unauthorized crossing into the United States and remained. On February 1, 2009, ICE apprehended X and initiated removal proceedings. One month later, while the removal proceedings were still pending, X left the United States on his own. It is now March 1, 2011. X meets the requirements for F-1 (student) status. Is he admissible?

Problem 2. Y (an adult) entered the United States on June 1, 2007 on a nonimmigrant visa that was valid for one year. On May 1, 2008, she applied for a one-year extension of stay. USCIS, believing that the request generated some difficult issues, considered her case until December 1, 2008, at which time it finally denied a renewal. Y stayed on nonetheless, and on March 1, 2009, Y gave birth, out of wedlock, to a baby girl (who is a United States citizen because of her birth in the United States). Y and her daughter remained in the United States until May 1, 2009. On that date, they returned to Y’s country of origin. It is now May 1, 2011, and Y has a job offer in the United States that would qualify her for employment-based immigrant status if she is otherwise admissible. Y has also recently learned that her young daughter has a life-threatening disease for which the only successful treatment is in the United States. Is Y admissible?

Problem 3. Z, a noncitizen, entered the United States surreptitiously on January 1, 2008. On December 1, 2008, ICE apprehended him, initiated removal proceedings, and detained him pending a removal hearing on February 1, 2009. At the hearing, Z was ordered removed and was kept in continued detention until his actual removal on February 5, 2009. Now, six years later, Z meets the requirements for employment-based second preference status and would like to immigrate to the United States. Is he admissible?

Problem 4. A, the noncitizen beneficiary of a family-sponsored second preference visa petition on which the priority date was not yet current, tried to enter the United States in May 2011 at an undesignated point in the middle of the night. He was apprehended and removed from the United States under INA § 212(a)(6)(A) for arriving at a place not designated as a port of entry. In October 2011 his priority date became current and he formally applied to the United States consulate for an immigrant visa. At the interview, the consular officer asked A whether he had ever before tried to enter the United States. A said he had not. The consular officer then noticed in A's file a letter from ICE revealing the prior removal order. Should the consular officer issue the visa?

Problem 5. B, a noncitizen, entered the United States on June 1, 2008 on a one-year B-1 business visitor visa. On August 1, 2008, she tried unsuccessfully to obtain a counterfeit birth certificate that would have stated her place of birth as Waterbury, Connecticut. Had she succeeded, she planned to use that document to support an eventual United States citizenship claim. Unable to obtain the birth certificate, B left the United States on October 1, 2008. It is now 2010, and B is back in her native country. She wants to return to the United States for a month's vacation. May the consular officer issue her a visitor for pleasure (B-2) visa?

B. POLITICAL AND NATIONAL SECURITY GROUNDS

Americans are often surprised to learn that our immigration laws exclude individuals solely because of their political views. To many people, inhibiting the free flow of ideas in this way seems incompatible with the tenets of a liberal democracy. Yet ideological restrictions have been part of United States immigration law since the beginning of the century. In fact, with one important exception discussed below, they have steadily expanded.

As the Judiciary Committee print at the beginning of this chapter pointed out, President McKinley was assassinated in 1901 by an anarchist of United States citizenship and birth but foreign ancestry. The aftermath included the first permanent⁸ statutory provision barring noncitizens because of their political views. That statute, enacted in 1903, excluded

8. The Alien Act of 1798, see Act of June 25, 1798, 1 Stat. 570, had also penalized certain noncitizens for their political opinions, but this statute expired after two years.

In the face of a highly unpopular reception, Congress declined to renew the law. See generally James M. Smith, Freedom's Fetters (1956).

anarchists and certain others who “believe in or advocate” the forceful overthrow of the United States government or all government. Act of March 3, 1903, ch. 1012, §§ 2, 38, 32 Stat. 1213, 1214, 1221.

From those humble origins, the list of politically related exclusion grounds grew long. Major amendments enacted after World War I broadened the original grounds to include, among others, people who wrote or published material advocating specified prohibited acts or who joined organizations that distributed such materials. Act of June 5, 1920, ch. 251, 41 Stat. 1008, 1009. In 1950, at the peak of the Cold War, Congress expressly made past or present membership in, or affiliation with, the Communist Party a specific ground for exclusion. See Internal Security Act of 1950, ch. 1024, Title I, § 22, 64 Stat. 987, 1006. By identifying the Communist Party by name, the 1950 Act eliminated the need for the government to prove in each case that the Communist Party advocated the forceful overthrow of the government. At the same time, section 22 of the 1950 Act added an exclusion ground for those who sought entry in order to engage in activities “prejudicial to the public interest.”

Enacted in 1952, the INA contained three broad exclusion grounds pertaining to either national security or political expression. INA § 212(a)(27), a carryover from the 1950 Act, covered noncitizens believed to be entering the United States to engage in activities “prejudicial to the public interest.” Section 212(a)(28), which was quite long, excluded anyone who had ever advocated, been members of or affiliated with any organization that advocated, or published or circulated writings advocating, any of certain political views, including communism, anarchy, or the propriety of overthrowing the United States government or all government. And section 212(a)(29) reached noncitizens believed likely to engage, after entry, in such activities as espionage, sabotage, or other subversion. The Immigration Act of 1990, § 601, added a related ground, now INA § 212(a)(3)(C), that covers certain individuals whose entries or activities might adversely affect U.S. foreign policy.

Of the various grounds, section 212(a)(28) always stood out as different in kind. For one thing, it was much longer than the others; Congress tried hard not to leave out any of the political viewpoints that it considered undesirable. In the postwar environments in which most of those exclusion grounds were conceived, a wide array of unpopular political philosophies incurred congressional disapproval.

More important, the various prongs of section 212(a)(28) covered beliefs, statements, advocacy, writings, publications, and associations—precisely the sorts of freedoms the First Amendment is generally designed to protect. Although the distinction should not be overstated, the other provisions covered activities generally not protected by the Constitution—either intended or expected future activities inimical to the national welfare. Section 212(a)(28) was thus typically regarded as being far less serious than the other “political” grounds.

That distinction is crucial to understanding the development of the present statutory exclusions and waivers. INA § 212(d)(3)(A) authorizes the Secretary of Homeland Security, after a favorable recommendation by the Secretary of State or a consular officer, to admit a nonimmigrant who is inadmissible on any ground other than a specified few. Under the pre-1990 numbering scheme, grounds 27, 29 and 33 (the last relating to Nazi war criminals) were the only ones for which 212(d)(3)(A) waivers were not permitted. Noncitizens who were excludable only under ground 28 thus qualified for those waivers. Indeed, the vast majority of the individuals found excludable on political grounds were charged under paragraph 28; the bulk of those were nonimmigrants; and the vast majority of those succeeded in obtaining 212(d)(3)(A) waivers.⁹ The current list of nonwaivable grounds is discussed in item 7 of the Notes and Questions below.

Still, over the years, many prominent individuals were excluded on those various political grounds. Most were political figures, scholars, or other authors. The list includes Hortensia de Allende (widow of slain Chilean President Salvador Allende), General Nino Pasti (the former Italian Senator and NATO General who had criticized United States missile deployment in Europe), former Canadian Prime Minister Pierre Trudeau (for once having attended an economic conference in Moscow), PLO Chair Yasir Arafat, and United Kingdom MP's Ian Paisley and Bernadette Devlin (at opposite ends of the Northern Ireland political spectrum). Also excluded were a number of Nobel Prize-winning authors—Gabriel Marquez, Carlos Fuentes, and Czeslaw Milosz. Others included Argentinean author Julio Cortazar, Italian playwright Dario Fo, British novelist Graham Greene, Canadian naturalist and biologist Farley Mowat, and French actors Maurice Chevalier and Yves Montand. See Grounds for Exclusion of Aliens, above; Arthur C. Helton, Reconciling the Power to Bar or Expel Aliens on Political Grounds with Fairness and the Freedoms of Speech and Association: An Analysis of Recent Legislative Proposals, 11 Fordham Internat'l L.J. 467 (1988); John A. Scanlan, Aliens in the Marketplace of Ideas: The Government, The Academy, and the McCarran-Walter Act, 66 Texas L.Rev. 1481, 1497 & n. 75 (1988); New York Times, Feb. 2, 1990, at A-1, A-4.

In 1975, the United States and 34 other nations signed the Final Act of the Conference on Security and Co-Operation in Europe (Helsinki, August 1, 1975) [commonly called the Helsinki Accords]. This historic agreement reflected a commitment to foster greater freedom of movement between signatory States and to encourage freer flows of information. With the Helsinki Final Act prominently in mind, Congress in 1977 passed the so-called McGovern Amendment, codified as 22 USC § 2691 and itself amended in 1978 and again in 1979.¹⁰ The McGovern amendment provided that, when a nonimmigrant was excludable solely "by reason of membership in or affiliation with a proscribed organization," the Secretary of State

9. See Committee on the Judiciary, United States House of Representatives, Committee Print, Grounds for Exclusion of Aliens Under the Immigration and Nationality Act (Sept. 1988), Table II-1 at 30-31 (exclusions under 212(a)(27)), Tables II-2, II-3 at 54-55 (exclusions under, and waivers of, 212(a)(28)), Table II-4 at 63 (exclusions under 212(a)(29)), Table II-5 at 65-66 (exclusions under 212(a)(33)).

10. See Pub.L. 95-426, § 119, 92 Stat. 963, 970 (Oct. 7, 1978); Pub.L. 96-60, § 109, 93 Stat. 395, 397-98 (Aug. 15, 1979).

“should” recommend a waiver, unless the Secretary of State certifies to Congress that the individual’s admission would be contrary to national security interests.

But the McGovern amendment did not halt the denial of visas on ideological grounds. It merely shifted the battleground. With its power to exclude people on the direct basis of their membership in proscribed organizations now curtailed, the government began to make greater use of then INA § 212(a)(27) (noncitizens who “seek to enter * * * to engage in activities which would be prejudicial to the public interest * * *”). The government’s strategy was to allege inadmissibility under section 212(a)(27), reasoning that the person’s membership in the proscribed organization would by itself make the entry “prejudicial to the national interest.” In Allende v. Shultz, 845 F.2d 1111 (1st Cir. 1988), the court rejected such an effort, holding that the government’s interpretation would effectively nullify the McGovern amendment.

As human rights have come to attract increased national and international attention, Congress has added a series of grounds excluding various classes of human rights violators. The first such ground, enacted in 1978, covered designated participants in Nazi war crimes before and during World War II. See Act of Oct. 30, 1978, Pub. L. 95-549, § 101, 92 Stat. 2065, at 2065, adding what is now INA § 212(a)(3)(E)(i). Over the ensuing years Congress added exclusion grounds for individuals who had engaged in genocide, INA § 212(a)(3)(E)(ii); foreign government officials who, within the preceding two years, were responsible for “particularly severe violations of religious freedom,” INA § 212(a)(2)(G); and, as part of the Intelligence Reform and Terrorism Prevention Act of 2004, Pub. L. 108-458, § 5501(a)(2), 118 Stat. 3638 (Dec. 17, 2004), those who have participated in acts of torture or, if acting under color of foreign law, extrajudicial killings, INA § 212(a)(3)(E)(iii).

Today, the most vigorous debate over the proper scope of the ideological and national security exclusions has centered around terrorism. The terrorism-related exclusion grounds are taken up separately below.

You should now skim INA § 212(a)(3) in its entirety.

NOTES AND QUESTIONS ON THE POLITICAL AND NATIONAL SECURITY GROUNDS

1. The present law contains no real counterpart to the broad “prejudicial to the public interest” language of old subsection 27,¹¹ but current subsection 3(A) excludes individuals believed to be seeking entry to engage in specified unlawful activities, including espionage, sabotage, and the forceful overthrow of the government. Subsection 3(A)(ii) extends to the case in which the consular officer or the Secretary of Homeland Security

11. But cf. INA § 212(f) (President may exclude noncitizen whose entry “would be detrimental to the interests of the United States”).

has reason to believe that the person seeks to enter the United States to engage in “any other unlawful activity.”

How broad do you think Congress meant that exclusion to be? Is a noncitizen who seeks to enter the United States to violate the littering laws really excludable? Criminal lawyers would regard such a violation as a civil offense (malum prohibitum) rather than a true crime (malum in se), but does that matter? The statute, after all, does not say “crime;” it says “unlawful activity.”

On the assumption that Congress nonetheless had no intention of excluding people for such trivial offenses, there remains the question whether even serious crimes are necessarily all included. If the consular officer had “reason to believe” that someone sought entry to commit a burglary, would exclusion under subsection 3(A)(ii) be appropriate? A literal interpretation would suggest that that person is indeed inadmissible, but courts commonly employ a maxim known as “eiusdem generis” (same class of things). Under that principle, when a list of specific words is followed by general words, the latter are often interpreted to apply only to things of the same class as the specific words. In McBoyle v. United States, 283 U.S. 25, 51 S.Ct. 340, 75 L.Ed. 816 (1931), for example, the Supreme Court had to decide whether the National Motor Vehicle Theft Act applied to airplanes. The statute defined “motor vehicle” as “an automobile, automobile truck, automobile wagon, motor cycle, or any other self-propelled vehicle not designed for running on rails.” The Court observed that all the specific vehicles listed were land vehicles and thus concluded that the last phrase was not meant to extend to airplanes. Given that principle, what limitations, if any, would you expect a court to place on the phrase “other unlawful activity” in INA § 212(a)(3)(A)(ii)?

2. Of particular interest is subsection 3(C), the foreign policy exclusion introduced by the Immigration Act of 1990. In response to fears that this provision might be used to exclude people on the basis of their beliefs, statements, or associations, Congress added the exceptions contained in subsections 3(C)(ii and iii). Do you think the exceptions sufficiently accommodate that concern? What is the difference between “potentially serious adverse foreign policy consequences” (the basic exclusion ground) and the compromising of “a compelling United States foreign policy interest” (the applicable standard when subsection 3(C)(iii) applies)?

3. Notice that Communist Party membership or affiliation is no longer an exclusion ground for nonimmigrants and that, even for immigrants, it is now subject to some fairly broad exceptions. INA § 212(a)(3)(D). This provision does, however, raise questions as to the nature of the proscribed associations. The courts and the BIA interpreted its predecessor to require a “meaningful association.”¹² The Supreme Court had previously read the same limitation into the analogous deportation ground. See Gastelum-Quinones v. Kennedy, 374 U.S. 469, 471, 83 S.Ct.

12. Firestone v. Howerton, 671 F.2d 317 (6th Cir.1970); Matter of Rusin, 20 I. & N. (9th Cir.1982); Berdo v. INS, 432 F.2d 824 (Dec. 128 (BIA 1989)).

1819, 1820, 10 L.Ed.2d 1013, 1015 (1963); Rowoldt v. Perfetto, 355 U.S. 115, 120, 78 S.Ct. 180, 183, 2 L.Ed.2d 140, 144 (1957). In Rowoldt, the noncitizen had joined the Communist Party voluntarily in the United States, paid dues, and attended meetings until his arrest for deportation proceedings, at which time he resigned. Even on those facts the association was held not to be meaningful. (In that case, though, the person had been an LPR for 43 years).

4. Are subsections 3(C) and 3(D) constitutional? There are two separate problems: First, do the excluded noncitizens have first amendment rights? Second, do their citizen sponsors have first amendment rights to receive the noncitizens' ideas? In chapter 2, you briefly encountered both questions. The answers given by the Supreme Court in Kleindienst v. Mandel seem to be: As to the first question, no. As to the second question, yes, but the rights are not violated as long as the government has a "facially legitimate and bona fide" reason for refusing the visa or admission. See pages 190–94 above.

5. Many of the people excluded under old subsection 212(a)(28) were scholars who had been invited to the United States to participate in academic conferences. Professor John Scanlan, in a thoughtful and interesting piece, has attacked the ideological exclusions of foreign academics in part by arguing that academic freedom occupies a special place in First Amendment law, such that the scope of the permitted discourse is given "the widest possible range * * * in the university setting." See John A. Scanlan, Aliens in the Marketplace of Ideas: The Government, the Academy, and the McCarran–Walter Act, 66 Texas L.Rev. 1481, 1485 (1988). What is your gut reaction?

6. To implement the national security exclusions, the government since 1904 has maintained a "lookout list" containing information on suspect individuals. The list, with names deleted but certain basic information about each entry retained, was finally divulged in 1990 as a result of a Freedom of Information Act request and the ensuing litigation. See Lawyers Committee for Human Rights v. INS, 721 F.Supp. 552 (S.D.N.Y.1989). The list was found to include more than 350,000 entries (some possibly duplicative) of people from 146 countries. See Lawyers Committee for Human Rights, The Alien Blacklist: A Dangerous Legacy of the McCarthy Era 4 (1990). About two-thirds of the names were entered during the 1980's. Id. at 6. Under the Immigration Act of 1990, § 601(c), the Attorney General [now the Secretary of Homeland Security] and the Secretary of State are required to update the lookout list and, in particular, to delete the name of every person who seeks a determination of admissibility and whose excludability is found to have been eliminated by the amendments to § 212. Since September 11, 2001, this and similar lists have been used primarily in the counterterrorism context. See generally chapter 10 below.

7. Under the current law, the only inadmissibility grounds that may not be waived for nonimmigrants under INA § 212(d)(3)(A) are those that cover individuals believed to be entering to engage in espionage, sabotage, forceful overthrow of the government, or "other unlawful activity," those relating to foreign policy, and those that relate to World War II-era Nazis and genocide. The terrorist exclusion, interestingly enough, remains waivable, even after the events of September 11. (In fact the REAL ID Act, § 104, gives the Secretary of State the “unreviewable discretion” to waive certain designated terrorism-related exclusion grounds for immigrants and nonimmigrants alike. See INA § 212(d)(3)(B)). Given the anti-terrorist political climate, why do you think Congress chose to make terrorism waivable?

8. One commentator writes as follows:

Every sovereign nation has the right to control its borders. But in a nation premised on the notion that sovereignty flows from the popular will and that the popular will is determined by political debate, ideological exclusions cannot be justified. They represent bad policy and bad law. If our government really believes that the decision to place American missiles in Western Europe cannot be sold to the American people if Nino Pasti is permitted to address a disarmament rally in the United States, then perhaps the decision should be reconsidered. The suppression of speech is surely not the answer in a constitutional democracy. * * *

Steven R. Shapiro, Ideological Exclusions: Closing the Border to Political Dissidents, 100 Harvard L. Rev. 930, 944–45 (1987). That statement was written before some of the recent liberalizations, but immigrants who are or were members of the Communist Party remain excludable on that basis alone, with some exceptions. Do you agree with Shapiro? Constitutional concerns aside, should INA § 212(a)(3)(D) be repealed entirely, modified, or left just as it is? See generally Kevin R. Johnson, The Antiterrorism Act, the Immigration Reform Act, and Ideological Regulation in the Immigration Laws: Important Lessons for Citizens and Noncitizens, 28 St. Mary's L.J. 833 (1997).

PROBLEMS 6–8

Problem 6. X is a British citizen and a lecturer in geology at Kings College, University of London. The University of Maryland has offered her a one-year visiting appointment, which X is keen to accept, mainly because she and the University are hopeful that the visit will lead to a permanent tenure-track appointment down the road. The only hitch is that X joined the British Communist Party a year ago and has been attending monthly meetings. You are the General Counsel for the University of Maryland. What advice will you give the geology Department?

Problem 7. Y and Z, both noncitizens, want to enter the United States for a two-week tour in which each would deliver a series of speeches critical of their government. Y is an opposition candidate for national office in his country. Z is a political ally of Y but is not herself a government official or candidate. Y and Z believe that their speeches will receive broader publicity if made in the United States than if made at home. The incumbent President of their country is extremely upset at the prospect of the United States giving Y and Z a “propaganda forum,” as he calls it, and has threatened to recall his Ambassador if either of the two speakers is admitted. Are they admissible?

Problem 8. W, a citizen of Bulgaria, is a world-renowned scientist interested in immigrating to the United States to join his 30-year-old daughter, who has lived in San Diego as an LPR for eight years. W has a permanent job offer from a leading United States think tank whose personnel manager has consulted you for advice. There appears to be little difficulty in getting W classified as an employment-based first preference immigrant, and the first preference is current, but W has been a vigorous and long-term member of the Communist Party and is not willing to terminate his membership. Will it be possible for W to immigrate?

THE TERRORISM EXCLUSIONS

Until the 1990's, foreign terrorism rarely occurred on United States soil—at least so it seemed. Security precautions were generally less stringent in the United States than in Europe and other places. The World Trade Center bombing, the Oklahoma City bombing (though not perpetrated by foreign nationals), and other events shocked Americans and brought terrorism into the public eye. One congressional response was AEDPA, a comprehensive anti-terrorism (and general immigrant-restriction) statute enacted in 1996. The terrorist attacks of September 11, 2001 triggered a variety of additional congressional and executive branch responses. Most relevant here is section 411 of the USA PATRIOT Act, which retroactively expanded the range of terrorism-related actions and associations that lead to inadmissibility under INA § 212(a)(3)(B). The REAL ID Act of 2005, § 103, lengthened the list further.¹³

INA § 212(a)(3)(B), as amended by these and other statutes, contains the terrorism-related exclusion grounds. This subsection is a long one, but it can be broken down into a few manageable parts, of which a few are the most important. First, subsection (i) lays out nine different terrorism-related exclusion grounds, some of which refer to those who “engage” (or have engaged or are “likely” to engage) in terrorism. Note that all of the grounds describe individuals who are associated in specified ways with either (a) terrorist activity or (b) terrorist organizations. Other important subsections (iii, iv, and vi) define the crucial terms “terrorist activity,” “engage,” and “terrorist organization,” respectively.

Subsection (vi) defines “terrorist organization” in two ways. The definition includes any organizations that either Congress (by statute) or the Administration (by publication in the Federal Register) has officially designated by name as terrorist organizations. Since September 11, 2001, many groups have been added to the list. See 8 BIB 1237 (Oct. 15, 2002). In addition, subsection (vi) includes as terrorist organizations any groups that engage in certain specified activities, whether or not they have been previously identified and designated as terrorist organizations.

13. See generally Susan Benesch & Devon Chaffee, The Ever-Expanding Material Support Bar: An Unjust Obstacle for Refugees and Asylum Seekers, 83 IR 465 (Mar. 13, 2006); Margaret Stock, Providing Material

Support to a Foreign Terrorist Organization: The Pentagon, The Department of State, The People's Mujahedin of Iran, & the Global War on Terrorism, 11 BIB 521 (June 1, 2006).

Please read INA § 212(a)(3)(B) in full at this time.

This exclusion ground comes up in various contexts. It surfaces in the general admission context, whenever a person who otherwise fits U.S. immigration criteria is suspected of involvement in terrorism. It also has an analog in the deportability grounds. See INA § 237(a)(4)(B). Of particular importance, various parts of the terrorism exclusion can also disqualify a person from admission as a refugee or an asylee, a problem highlighted in chapter 11 of the casebook.

Under INA § 212(a)(3)(B)(iv)(VI), the terrorism exclusion extends to a person who provides “material support” for a terrorist activity or for any of various actors. In recent years, thousands of individuals have been excluded on material support grounds. 83 IR 2255 (Oct. 23, 2006). One of the most contentious issues has been the meaning of the phrase “material support.” Please read section 212(a)(3)(B)(iv)(VI) carefully before turning to the case that follows.

Matter of S-K-

Board of Immigration Appeals, 2006.
23 I. & N. Dec. 936.

* * *

[Note: The BIA reconsidered this judgment in the light of intervening events and ultimately reached a different result. As explained in item 1 of the Notes and Questions below, however, the original decision retains its precedential force.—Eds.]

The respondent, a native and citizen of Burma, is a Christian and an ethnic Chin. According to the respondent, she faces persecution and/or torture if returned to Burma because the Government, currently a military dictatorship ruled by the majority Burman ethnic group, regularly commits human rights abuses against ethnic and religious minorities and, in fact, arrested and detained both the respondent’s brother and fiancé, the latter ultimately being killed by the military.

In 2001, the respondent became acquainted with an undercover agent for the Chin National Front (“CNF”) who was a friend of her deceased fiancé. She became sympathetic to the CNF’s goal of securing freedom for ethnic Chin people and donated money to the organization for approximately 11 months. In addition, she attempted to donate some other goods, such as a camera and binoculars, to the CNF, but they were confiscated after she had given them to the undercover agent. The agent informed the respondent that she should flee Burma because the Burmese military, known to torture anyone affiliated with the CNF, had seen a letter written by the respondent to the CNF; the military knew that the respondent was the person who had attempted to provide the material goods. The respondent was actually residing in Singapore at the time, but since her temporary work visa was about to expire and she could not return to Burma, she fled to the United States in order to request asylum.

Although the Immigration Judge found that the respondent had established a well-founded fear of persecution in order to qualify for asylum, he denied her application for relief because, by providing money and other support to the CNF, an organization which uses land mines and engages in armed conflict with the Burmese Government, the respondent provided material support to an organization or group of individuals who she knew, or had reason to know, uses firearms and explosives to endanger the safety of others or to cause substantial property damage. Therefore, she was statutorily barred from asylum and from * * * [some related remedies that you will study in chapter 11—Eds.]

* * *

II. ANALYSIS

A. Terrorist Organization

During oral argument and on appeal, the respondent argued that the Burmese Government is not legitimate because the military junta rules the country under martial law and crushes any attempts at democratic reform. According to the respondent, the United States does not recognize the Burmese Government's legislative acts, and therefore the CNF's actions are not unlawful under Burmese law. Rather, she asserts, the organization's actions are similar to those of forces fighting the Taliban in Afghanistan or forces rebelling against Saddam Hussein in Iraq, which are supported by the United States. Its goals are democracy and it uses force only in self-defense. Moreover, the CNF is allied with the National League of Democracy, which the United States has recognized as a legitimate representative of the Burmese people and is recognized by the United Nations. Therefore, the respondent contends that the Immigration Judge erred in concluding that the CNF is a terrorist organization. See section 212(a)(3)(B)(iii) of the Act (requiring that terrorist activity must be unlawful under the laws of the place where it is committed or under the laws of the United States).

* * *

During oral argument, the respondent pointed to testimony from the Assistant Secretary of State describing the Burmese military as a "group of thugs," as well as to the fact that the United States Government has passed the Burmese Freedom and Democracy Act of 2003, Pub. L. No. 108-61, 117 Stat. 864, acknowledging that the National League of Democracy is the legitimate representative of the Burmese people. * * *

* * * [T]he respondent acknowledged, upon questioning, that the United States does maintain a diplomatic relationship with the Burmese Government and maintains an embassy there. Therefore, in some sense or degree, the United States recognizes as legitimate the Burmese Government, which appears to consider the activities of the CNF unlawful.

Although the respondent urges us to determine that the Burmese Government is illegitimate and argues that we have such authority, we are unable to agree with the respondent's argument. While there may have been cases in which we determined that certain acts by foreign governments were unlawful in terms of harming individuals who sought asylum here, we have not gone so far as to determine that a foreign sovereignty would not be recognized by the United States Government. Such a determination is beyond our delegated authority and is a matter left to elected and other high-level officials in this country.

Furthermore, the respondent cites to past case law interpreting asylum applicants' claims and granting relief where aliens have attempted to overthrow governments that do not allow citizens to change the political structure and therefore exercise illegitimate power when prosecuting such individuals. In other words, she asserts that the motivation of the group seeking to effect change in a country must be analyzed in order to determine whether the harm produced is persecution or, as claimed in this case, terrorist activity. * * * Counsel for the respondent * * * was advocating that we apply a "totality of the circumstances" test.

We are unable to find any support for the respondent's assertion that such a test should be utilized. Our past case law is not inconsistent with some of the respondent's arguments. However, that case law does not address the bar to relief in section 212(a)(3)(B)(i)(I) of the Act. In this case, we are dealing with specific statutory language, which we read as applying to the respondent.

* * * [W]e find that Congress intentionally drafted the terrorist bars to relief very broadly, to include even those people described as "freedom fighters," and it did not intend to give us discretion to create exceptions for members of organizations to which our Government might be sympathetic. Rather, Congress attempted to balance the harsh provisions set forth in the Act with a waiver, but it only granted the power to make exemptions to the Attorney General and the Secretaries of State and Homeland Security, who have not delegated such power to the Immigration Judges or the Board of Immigration Appeals.

In sum, we find no error in the Immigration Judge's conclusion that the CNF is a terrorist organization within the definition of the Act. Contrary to the respondent's assertions on appeal and during oral argument, there is no exception in the Act to the bar to relief in cases involving the use of justifiable force to repel attacks by forces of an illegitimate regime. As noted by the Immigration Judge, there was sufficient evidence in the record to conclude that the CNF uses firearms and/or explosives to engage in combat with the Burmese military, and the respondent has not provided evidence that would rebut this conclusion or lead us to interpret the Act differently. Moreover, the record shows that the respondent knew or should have known of the CNF's use of arms. Thus, assuming the respondent provided material support to the CNF, her sole remedy to extricate herself from the statutory bar appears to lie in the waiver afforded by Congress for this purpose, for which the DHS stated at oral argument she is eligible to apply. However, the Immigration Judges and the Board have no role in the adjudication of such a waiver.

B. Materiality of Support Provided

* * * Since no evidence was submitted to support a conclusion that the respondent's contributions were relevant to a specific terrorist goal, the respondent asserts that finding that her contributions were material goes against congressional intent to tie materiality to terrorist activity. * * *

Section 212(a)(3)(B)(iv)(VI) of the Act states that "material support" includes "a safe house, transportation, communication, funds, transfer of funds or other material financial benefit, false documentation or identification, weapons (including chemical, biological, or radiological weapons), explosives, or training." * * *

We are unaware of any legislative history which indicates a limitation on the definition of the term "material support." * * * Rather, the statute is clearly drafted in this respect to require only that the provider afford material support to a terrorist organization, with the sole exception being a showing by clear and convincing evidence that the actor did not know, and should not reasonably have known, that the organization was of that character. Section 212(a)(3)(B)(iv)(VI)(dd) of the Act. We thus reject the respondent's assertion that there must be a link between the provision of material support to a terrorist organization and the intended use by that recipient organization of the assistance to further a terrorist activity. Especially where assistance as fungible as money is concerned, such a link would not be in keeping with the purpose of the material support provision, as it would enable a terrorist organization to solicit funds for an ostensibly benign purpose, and then transfer other equivalent funds in its possession to promote its terrorist activities.

We turn then to the respondent's claim that the statute's requirement of material support means that trivial or unsubstantial amounts of assistance, such as she allegedly provided, are not within the statutory bar. In Singh-Kaur v. Ashcroft, the Third Circuit found that the provision of very modest amounts of food and shelter to individuals who the alien reasonably should have known had committed or planned to commit terrorist activity did constitute material support. The court also found that the listed examples in section 212(a)(3)(B)(iv)(VI) of the Act were not exhaustive but were "intended to illustrate a broad concept rather than narrowly circumscribe a term with exclusive categories."

* * *

As the DHS contends, it is certainly plausible * * * that the list in section 212(a)(3)(B) was intended to have an expanded reach and cover virtually all forms of assistance, even small monetary contributions. Congress has not expressly indicated its intent to provide an exception for contributions which are de minimis. Thus the DHS asserts that the term “material support” is effectively a term of art and that all the listed types of assistance are covered, irrespective of any showing that they are independently “material.”

On the other hand, the respondent’s contrary argument that “material” should be given independent content is by no means frivolous. However, we find it unnecessary to resolve this issue now, inasmuch as we agree with the DHS that based on the amount of money the respondent provided, her donations of S$1100 (Singapore dollars) [then US$685] constituted material support. Specifically, the respondent testified that she contributed approximately S$100 per month over an 11-month period, representing approximately one eighth of her monthly income. This was sufficiently substantial by itself to have some effect on the ability of the CNF to accomplish its goals, whether in the form of purchasing weaponry or providing routine supplies to its forces, for example. We therefore agree with the Immigration Judge that the respondent provided material support to the CNF.

[The Board therefore affirms the removal order but notes the government’s new concession that she is eligible for more limited relief under the Convention Against Torture. For details on the latter, see pages 1145–64 of the main casebook. In addition, the government suggested she could apply for a discretionary 212(d)(3)(A) waiver—Eds.]

CONCURRING OPINION: Juan P. Osuna, Acting Vice-Chairman

I join the majority’s decision. I agree with the majority that the Immigration Judge properly denied the respondent’s applications for asylum and withholding of removal, as this result is compelled by the specific language of the statute. I write separately because I have considerable doubts that this result is what Congress had in mind when it enacted the “material support” bar to asylum.

We are finding that a Christian member of the ethnic Chin minority in Burma, who clearly has a well-founded fear of being persecuted by one of the more repressive governments in the world, one that the United States Government views as illegitimate, is ineligible to avail herself of asylum in the United States despite posing no threat to the security of this country. It may be, as the majority states, that Congress intended the material support bar to apply very broadly. However, when the bar is applied to cases such as this, it is difficult to conclude that this is what Congress intended.

Unfortunately, there is virtually no legislative history that accompanies the material support bar. We therefore have nothing to examine to determine congressional intent, beyond the statutory language itself. And that language mandates that we bar this respondent from asylum.

* * *

In enacting the material support bar, Congress was rightly concerned with preventing terrorists and their supporters from exploiting this country’s asylum laws. It is unclear, however, how barring this respondent from asylum furthers those goals. The respondent provided funds and some equipment to a member of the CNF, an organization that has not been designated by the Department of State as a terrorist organization under section 212(a)(3)(B)(vi) of the Act. The available information in the record indicates that the CNF engages in violence primarily as a means of self-defense against the Burmese Government, a known human rights abuser that has engaged in systematic persecution of Burmese ethnic minorities, including the Chin Christians. By reference to common definitions of the term “terrorism” and “terrorist,” it is doubtful that the CNF would be considered a terrorist organization. * * *

The CNF, however, is a group that has resorted to violence in self-defense, including the use of explosives. The Immigration Judge was thus correct to find that the assistance that the respondent provided to the CNF constituted material support to any individual who the respondent knew, or should have known, “has committed or plans to commit a terrorist activity.” Section 212(a)(3)(B)(iv)(VI)(bb) of the Act. The fact that this language goes beyond common notions of “terrorism” is immaterial in the context of this case.

Yet, the statutory language is breathtaking in its scope. Any group that has used a weapon for any purpose other than for personal monetary gain can, under this statute, be labeled a terrorist organization. This includes organizations that the United States Government has not thought of as terrorist organizations because their activities coincide with our foreign policy objectives. For example, the DHS conceded at oral argument that an individual who assisted the Northern Alliance in Afghanistan against the Taliban in the 1990s would be considered to have provided “material assistance” to a terrorist organization under this statute and thus would be barred from asylum. This despite the fact that the Northern Alliance was an organization supported by the United States in its struggle against a regime that the United States and the vast majority of governments around the world viewed as illegitimate.

It also includes groups and organizations that are not normally thought of as “terrorists” per se. Read literally, the definition includes, for example, a group of individuals discharging a weapon in an abandoned house, thus causing “substantial damage to property.” Section 212(a)(3)(B)(iii)(V) of the Act. This may constitute inappropriate or even criminal behavior, but it is not what we normally think of as “terrorist” activity. * * *

The broad reach of the material support bar becomes even starker when viewed in light of the nature of the Burmese regime, and how it is regarded by the United States Government. In 2003, Congress passed the Burmese Freedom and Democracy Act of 2003, Pub. L. No. 108-61, 117 Stat. 864, which, among other things, imposes sanctions on the Burmese Government as a result of its deplorable human rights record. The Secretary of State has designated Burma as one of a handful of “countries of particular concern” in light of this record, including its treatment of ethnic and religious minorities. In particular, the Burmese Government has engaged in arrests of Christian clergy, destruction of churches, prohibition of religious services and proselytizing by Christians, and forced conversions of Christians. These efforts are part of a larger effort to “Burmanize” the Chin ethnic minority. * * *

* * *

Accordingly, I concur in the majority’s result. I note, however, that the law provides for a limited waiver of the material support bar to be exercised by the DHS in appropriate cases. Section 212(d)(3) of the Act. I suggest that the DHS may wish to consider this respondent as someone to whom the grant of such a waiver is appropriate.

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. Postscript: Shortly after the BIA issued the decision that you just read, the Secretary of DHS exercised his discretion under INA § 212(d)(3)(B)(i) to waive the material support exclusion for Burmese Chins who meet certain conditions. The Attorney General then remanded S-K- to the BIA for reconsideration in the light of that waiver. Matter of S-K-, 24 I. & N. Dec. 289 (AG 2007). Soon after the Attorney General’s remand, Congress enacted the Consolidated Appropriations Act, Pub. L. 110-161, 121 Stat. 1844 (Dec. 26, 2007). Section 691(b) of that Act declared certain groups—including the CNF—not to be terrorist organizations based on any of their pre-enactment activities. As a result, DHS filed a written acknowledgment that S-K- was no longer ineligible for asylum, and the BIA granted asylum. Matter of S-K-, 24 I. & N. Dec. 475 (BIA 2008). Importantly, both the Attorney General in remanding and the BIA upon reconsideration emphasized that the original BIA decision in S-K- (the version you read) retains its precedential value.

2. Try to sort out the statutory logic. There were really two elements to the exclusion charge—finding that the Chin National Front was a “terrorist organization” and finding that S-K- afforded it “material support.” As to the former, section 212(a)(3)(B)(vi)(III) defines a terrorist organization as including a group that engages in any of the activities described in section 212(a)(3)(B)(iv). The latter provision, in turn, enumerates various “terrorist activities.” To be a “terrorist activity,” the government must show either that the activity was actually “unlawful” in the place where it was committed or that it would have been unlawful in the United States. INA § 212(a)(3)(B)(iii). In addition, the activity has to involve one of several enumerated acts. One act that will suffice is the use of any “explosive, firearm, or other weapon or dangerous device (other than for mere personal monetary gain).” INA § 212(a)(3)(B)(iii)(V)(b). Since the CNF was found to use such weapons, it was determined to be a “terrorist organization.”

The next question was whether S-K- herself had “engage[d] in terrorist activity.” That term is defined in INA § 212(a)(3)(B)(iv), which encompasses any of several acts. One of those is “to commit an act that the actor knows, or reasonably should know, affords material support, including . . .

funds” for specified purposes or to specified actors. INA § 212(a)(3)(B)(iv)(VI) [emphasis added]. In particular, S-K- became inadmissible for affording material support to a terrorist organization. See section 212(a)(3)(B)(iv)(VI)(dd). (The immigration judge had purported to rest the inadmissibility on section 212(a)(3)(B)(iv)(VI)(bb), which covers affording material support to an “individual,” but the BIA notes that the immigration judge had found the CNF to be a “terrorist organization.” That finding would have been irrelevant if the real charge had been merely that S-K- provided material support to an individual.)

3. As is evident from the literature, from the concurring opinion of Mr. Osuna in S-K-, and from the eventual government waivers discussed in item 11 below, there is a growing consensus that not all organizations which literally satisfy the current statutory definition of “terrorist organization” are equally dangerous or equally culpable. S-K- analogizes the Chin National Front (CNF) to the Northern Alliance that sought to dislodge Afghanistan’s Taliban government and to the forces that resisted Saddam Hussein in Iraq. Classifying the CNF as a “terrorist organization” does seem counter-intuitive. But why? Is it because of their goals or their activities or both? As a policy matter, what criteria should determine whether to classify an organization as “terrorist?” Is there a distinction to be drawn between “good” unlawful organizations and “bad” unlawful organizations, or are good and bad purely in the eye of the beholder?

Let’s start with goals. At least three different sympathetic factors were noted at various points in the opinion—that the Burmese regime which the CNF is resisting is undemocratic; that the regime is otherwise a notorious human rights abuser (noted by the concurring opinion); and that the U.S. government regards the insurgents, and not the Burmese government, as the legitimate representative of the Burmese people. Should those circumstances insulate an organization from being classified as “terrorist?” Or should even groups that fight against brutal and totalitarian regimes be expected to refrain from tactics that the U.S. regards as “terrorist?” Argue both ways.

4. Whatever its goals, an organization cannot be classified as a “terrorist organization” unless it is either specifically singled out as such or found to engage in “terrorist activity.” See INA § 212(a)(3)(B)(vi) (cross-referencing provisions that in turn refer to section 212(a)(3)(B)(iv), which lists various ways in which one can “engage” in “terrorist activity.”) And “terrorist activity” itself is defined in section 212(a)(3)(B)(iii). That latter provision contains two required elements: First, the activity has to be “unlawful under the laws of the place where it is committed (or which, if it had been committed in the United States, would be unlawful under the laws of the United States or any State).” Second, the activity has to involve one of several things that the statute proceeds to list. Some of the items in the list are very specific—e.g. hijacking or sabotage of conveyances, assassination, etc. Others are worded more generally. Review the list now to get a sense of the acts that are covered.

Consider the “unlawful” element first. Under the statute it is enough that the activity is unlawful “under the laws of the place where it is committed.” But what if the very purpose of the activity is to resist repressive or even unconscionable laws in the first place? According to the New York Times, “[t]he United States has acknowledged that the law would also bar Iraqis who helped American marines find Jessica Lynch” (the U.S. private who was captured in Iraq and rescued by U.S. marines in April 2003). Since Iraqi law did not authorize the use of force on an Iraqi hospital, the action was unlawful and, because it involved the use of weapons, was a “terrorist activity” under the literal language of the U.S. statute. See NYT, Apr. 3, 2006 (editorial).

Should it be sufficient that the relevant acts are unlawful under the laws of the country in which they take place (and involve one of the designated actions)?

5. The requirement that the act be “unlawful” under the home country’s laws generated a specific problem in S-K-. The CNF is allied with the National League of Democracy (NLD). As the Board acknowledges, both the U.S. and the U.N. have recognized the NLD as “a legitimate representative” [later the Board changes this to “the legitimate representative”] of the Burmese people. The argument, therefore, was that the U.S. does not recognize the legitimacy of the Burmese government’s legislative Acts, and thus those Acts cannot be relied upon to classify the CNF’s actions as “unlawful.” The BIA rejected that argument. It reasoned that the U.S. maintains diplomatic relations with the Burmese government and maintains an embassy there, so that “in some sense or degree, the United States recognizes as legitimate the Burmese Government.” Do you agree?

6. Observations about the breadth of the “terrorist activity” definition usually focus less on the “unlawful” element and more on the list of specific qualifying acts. Board member (and Acting Chair) Osuna, in the excerpt you read, calls the scope of the statutory language “breathtaking.” He offers examples of unlawful acts that no one would think of as terrorism. See especially the subsection applicable in S-K-, section 212(a)(3)(B)(iii)(V)(b). It designates as a terrorist activity the use of any “weapon or dangerous device (other than for mere personal monetary gain), with intent to endanger, directly or indirectly, the safety of one or more individuals or to cause substantial damage to property.” Many terrorist acts would fit that definition, but so too would many garden variety crimes that have nothing to do with terrorism as that term is commonly understood. Professor David Cole uses the examples of an LPR who “brandished a kitchen knife in a domestic dispute with her abusive husband” or who “found himself in a barroom brawl, picked up a bottle, and threatened another person with it.” David Cole, Enemy Aliens, 54 Stanford L. Rev. 953, 971 (2002). Indeed, some acts of non-political, youthful vandalism would satisfy the literal statutory definition of terrorist activity if the damage is “substantial.”

7. Assuming a group qualifies as a terrorist organization, the next question is what it means to provide “material support” to that organization. One subissue here is whether nominal support is enough. Both DHS and the State Department have insisted that the statute covers even insignificant support. See David A. Martin, Major Developments in Asylum Law Over the Past Year, 83 IR 1889, 1895 (Sept. 1, 2006). In S-K the Board avoided the issue by finding her monetary contribution substantial. Should there be a substantiality requirement?

8. Until recently, DHS and DOS also “steadfastly maintained” that there was no duress exception to the material support bar. Martin, above, at 1895. This position led to some extreme results. A woman from Sierra Leone, raped and threatened with machetes by guerrillas who forcibly occupied her house, was barred from asylum for having provided them “material support.” The same was true of a Liberian woman who was held as a sex slave and forced to cook for a guerrilla organization. Colombians who were forced by guerrillas to provide water and to dig graves suffered similar fates. New York Times, Apr. 3, 2006 (editorial).

This has now changed. On April 27, 2007, after a series of other waivers discussed in item 11 below, the Secretary of Homeland Security gave blanket authority for USCIS to issue discretionary waivers in certain cases of material support provided under duress. See Secretary of Homeland Security, Exercise of Authority under Sec. 212(d)(3)(B)(i) of the Immigration and Nationality Act (Apr. 27, 2007). Under the Secretary’s order, the authority to grant waivers will exist only when the material support was provided to a terrorist organization that the government had officially designated by name—not when the support is provided to an organization that is simply found on the facts to engage in terrorist activities. The Order goes on to list some of the factors relevant to whether duress will be found—the possibility that the person could reasonably have withheld support; the severity and type of threatened harm; who was harmed; and the perceived imminence and likelihood of the threatened harm.

In addition, the USCIS is to examine “the totality of the circumstances” in deciding whether a given applicant deserves a waiver based on duress. For this purpose, in addition to duress, the USCIS is to consider the amount, type and frequency of material support provided, the nature of the activities committed by the terrorist organization, the alien’s awareness of those activities, the length of time since material support was provided, the alien’s conduct since that time, and any other relevant factor.

Should duress be a defense? Does your answer depend on whether it was physically impossible for the person to avoid giving material support, as distinguished from the case where the person could have refused but would have risked death or serious bodily harm by doing so? Or would your answer be the same in both cases?

9. The material support ground contains a mens rea requirement. The act must be one that “the actor knows, or reasonably should know, affords material support” for terrorist activities, or to certain individuals, or to a terrorist organization. What if the actor knows the facts but does not know that the U.S. law considers the group a “terrorist organization?”

10. One of S-K’s arguments was that under the terrorist exclusion it is not enough to provide material support to a terrorist organization; rather, she argued, the statute requires a link between the support and a specific terrorist activity. If the CNF were found to engage in both terrorist activities and lawful activities, therefore, her argument would be that any support earmarked for the latter would not be a ground for exclusion. The BIA in this case rejected that argument. Was it right to do so?

11. As the BIA observes, the government has the discretion to waive the material support exclusion ground, as well as other selected terrorist exclusions. Either the Secretary of State or the Secretary of Homeland Security may grant the waiver, in each case after consulting with each other and with the Attorney General. INA § 212(d)(3)(B)(i). In item 8 above, you read about one of the blanket waivers issued under that provision. There have been others. In 2006, Burmese Karen refugees living in temporary refugee camps in Thailand received blanket waivers of the material support bar. See U.S. Dept. of State, Media Note (Aug. 30, 2006). Later that year the State Department announced a similar waiver for Burmese Chin refugees in Malaysia, Thailand, and India. 83 IR 2255 (Oct. 23, 2006). In 2007 the Secretary of Homeland Security announced a blanket waiver for two groups—those who acted under duress (subject to various conditions), as discussed in item 8 above; and certain individuals who provide material support to eight named groups. U.S. Dept. of Homeland Security, Press Release (Jan. 12, 2007). For detailed updates, see 72 Fed. Reg. 26138 (May 8, 2007). Certain Colombians acting under duress have also received a blanket waiver. See 12 BIB 1460 (Oct. 15, 2007). DHS will consider individual discretionary waivers in cases of administratively final removal orders whenever relief was denied solely because of a terrorism-related ground for which the Secretary of DHS has exercised his or her exemption authority. The procedures vary depending on whether the individual is detained. See 85 IR at 2879–80 (Nov. 3, 2008). As you saw in S-K–, the BIA disclaims any authority to issue a waiver itself or hear an appeal from a DHS waiver denial.

12. Certain associations with terrorist organizations are also grounds for inadmissibility, with differing required levels of actual or imputed awareness that the organization engages in the proscribed activities. Note also INA § 212(a)(3)(B)(i)(VII), which bars from admission any noncitizen who “endorses or espouses terrorist activity.”

A related exclusion ground arises out of EBSVERA § 306. It extends the concept of guilt by association with an organization one step further—to guilt by association with a country. It renders inadmissible any nonimmigrant who is “from” a country that the Secretary of State has designated as a “state sponsor of terrorism,” unless after consultation with other Departments the Secretary of State finds that the particular individual “does not pose a threat to the safety or national security of the United States.” The term “state sponsor of terrorism” is defined to mean a country that the Secretary of State determines has “repeatedly provided support for acts of international terrorism.” Id. § 306(b).

C. CRIMINAL GROUNDS

Most of the crime-related exclusion grounds have deportation analogs that you will see later in much more detail. For now, read closely INA §§ 212(a)(2)(A, B, C) and 212(h). Note in particular the sweeping breadth of the drug exclusions. See Nancy Morawetz, Rethinking Drug Inadmissibility, 50 William & Mary L. Rev. 163 (2008) (criticizing overuse of controlled substance exclusions for past minor drug offenses).

As you will see in chapter 7, one deportability ground is that the person has been convicted of an “aggravated felony,” now defined expansively to cover a wide range of criminal offenses. (There is no analogous inadmissibility ground.) You might have noticed that relief under INA § 212(h) is unavailable to anyone who has been convicted of an aggravated felony after having been admitted as an LPR. In Matter of Michel, 21 I. & N. Dec. 1101 (BIA 1998), the Board interpreted this disqualification literally, holding it did not bar 212(h) relief to an otherwise eligible aggravated felon who had never been admitted to permanent residence. Despite the anomaly of treating former LPRs more harshly than those otherwise similarly situated (including undocumented immigrants), the Board felt bound by the plain language.

The same portion of section 212(h) also disqualifies anyone who has previously been admitted as an LPR and who, since that admission, has not lawfully resided continuously in the United States for at least seven years “immediately preceding the initiation of [removal] proceedings.” (Keep this language in mind when you do Problem 12 below.) This strange provision was interpreted in Matter of Ayala-Arevalo, 22 I. & N. Dec. 398 (BIA 1998). Ayala was admitted as an LPR and did not subsequently reside in the United States for seven years. At the time of his admission, he in fact had been inadmissible (on fraud grounds). He thus argued that he had not been “lawfully” admitted for permanent residence and therefore did not fall within the disqualification. The BIA disagreed. To avoid an “arbitrary and capricious” result, id. at 401, it interpreted the disqualification as covering even those who had been “unlawfully” admitted to permanent residence. The decision prompted a strong dissent from Board member Lory Rosenberg. Id. at 403–07. Contrast the statutory interpretation approach in Ayala-Arevalo with that in Michel, where the Board had construed the statute literally even in the face of an anomaly.

Is it unconstitutionally discriminatory for Congress to treat LPRs less favorably than undocumented immigrants? At least one district court held the distinction violative of equal protection, concluding it “defies logic.” Young Hak Song v. INS, 82 F. Supp.2d 1121 (C.D. Cal. 2000). But the courts of appeals, invoking the principle of special judicial deference to Congress in immigration cases and finding theoretical justifications for the apparent anomaly, have upheld the statutory distinction. Those courts have accepted three possible rationales: First, Congress wanted to expedite the removal of aggravated felons and might have selected LPR aggravated felons as a “first step.” Second, Congress might have reasoned that LPRs already have more rights than undocumented immigrants and thus should be held to a higher standard. And third, the fact that immigrants who enjoyed important rights were willing to jeopardize them by committing crimes might indicate that LPR aggravated felons will have higher recidivism rates than undocumented aggravated felons.¹⁴

Section 212(h) relief also requires the favorable exercise of discretion. Under the Justice Department regulations, discretion “in general” will not be exercised favorably “in cases involving violent or dangerous crimes, except in extraordinary circumstances, such as those . . . cases in which an alien clearly demonstrates that the denial . . . would result in exceptional and extremely unusual hardship” (a higher standard than the statutory “extreme hardship” requirement). 8 CFR § 212.7(d) (2008). The courts have held that the regulation is not ultra vires, since the statute delegates discretion to the Attorney General. See, e.g., Pimentel v. Mukasey, 530 F.3d 321 (5th Cir. 2008); Mejia v. Gonzales, 499 F.3d 991 (9th Cir. 2007).

Using the provisions cited in this subsection (and, if necessary, any others you have already studied), work out answers to the following Problems:

PROBLEMS 9–12

Problem 9. W, a citizen of Canada, was born on April 1, 1988. On March 1, 2006 she was arrested for burglary, a crime held to involve moral turpitude and punishable by up to two years imprisonment. W pleaded guilty on May 1, 2006. On June 1, 2006, the trial judge imposed a one-year jail sentence, which she began serving that day. She was released early, for good behavior, on December 1, 2006.

It is now February 1, 2012. W has applied for an F–1 (student) visa to pursue a bachelor’s degree at the University of Florida, where she has been accepted for admission. She has no United States relatives. You are the consular officer. What action should you take?

Problem 10. Assume the same facts as in Problem 9, except that this time W tells you about one additional brush she had with the law: A year ago she committed shoplifting (also a crime involving moral turpitude), was apprehended by the shopkeeper, and confessed to the police. She was not arrested, because the shopkeeper did not press charges. The maximum

14. See, e.g., Latu v. Ashcroft, 375 F.3d 1012, 1020–21 (10th Cir. 2004); Finau v. INS, 277 F.3d 1146 (9th Cir. 2002) (amended opinion); De Leon-Reynoso v. Ashcroft, 293 F.3d 633 (3d Cir. 2002); Lukowski v. INS, 279 F.3d 644 (8th Cir. 2002); Moore v. Ashcroft, 251 F.3d 919, 925 (11th Cir. 2001); Lara-Ruiz v. INS, 241 F.3d 934, 947–48 (7th Cir. 2001). Since the district court that had decided Young Hak Song is situated in the Ninth Circuit, its decision is now implicitly disapproved by Finau.

penalty for shoplifting in the Canadian province where her act took place was six months in jail. As a consular officer, what should you do?

Problem 11. Y and his wife, citizens of Spain, have a twenty-four-year-old United States citizen son. They decide they would like to immigrate to the United States. The problem is Y. In response to a question from the consular officer, Y admitted that twenty-five years ago, as a 22-year-old college senior, he had bought two marijuana cigarettes, had tried one of them, had not liked it, had sold the second one to a friend, and had never tried illicit drugs again. May Y be admitted?

Problem 12. Z, a citizen of Ghana, was admitted as an LPR in November 1997 under one of the employment preferences. In early 2008, ICE discovered that Z had fraudulently misstated her professional credentials. On April 1, 2008, Z was criminally convicted of defrauding the United States. (Assume this is a crime that involves moral turpitude, but not an “aggravated felony,” a term you will explore more fully in chapter 7.) She was sentenced to a year in prison. Removal proceedings were convened in the prison facility, and she was ordered removed. On December 1, 2008, after serving eight months, she was released and the removal order was executed. It is now November 1, 2011. Z is back in Ghana. She has now entered into a bona fide marriage with a United States citizen. Z’s new husband needs to return to the United States to be with his mother, who has leukemia and is expected not to survive more than a few years. Z would like to immigrate to the United States with her husband. Will she be admitted?

D. ECONOMIC GROUNDS

As the historical summary in section A illustrated, Congress from time to time has enacted exclusion grounds that were either explicitly economic or at least partly driven by economic concerns. Some of the latter—including some of the medical exclusions and illiteracy—reflected fears that the classes of noncitizens they covered were likely to require public assistance.

The Immigration Act of 1990 repealed many of those grounds. Only two explicitly economic grounds were left: INA §§ 212(a)(5)(A) (labor certification), which you have already studied, and 212(a)(4) (public charge), which will be considered presently. The illiteracy ground has been repealed, and as discussed below the health-related exclusions have been narrowed.

In 1996, Congress added another “economic” exclusion. In recent years, many wealthy Americans have discovered that they could reduce their income tax liability by renouncing their United States citizenship and moving to other countries. That way, they would be neither United States citizens nor LPRs. See generally Alice G. Abreu, Taxing Exits, 29 U.C. Davis L.Rev. 1087 (1996). IIRIRA § 352 added a new exclusion ground for those who formally renounced their United States citizenship “for the purpose of avoiding taxation by the United States.” INA § 212(a)(10)(E). You will see more on that in chapter 13.

The main economic exclusion ground is INA § 212(a)(4) (noncitizens “likely at any time to become public charges”). Emma Lazarus’s inspiring words, “Give me your tired, your poor * * *,” were inscribed in the Statue of Liberty in 1903, see John Higham, Send These to Me: Immigrants in Urban America 71–74 (rev. ed. 1984), but by 1882 Congress had already acted to exclude “any person unable to take care of himself or herself without becoming a public charge.” Act of August 3, 1882, ch. 376, § 2, 22 Stat. 214.

The public charge provision raises two basic implementation questions: What does “public charge” mean? And what evidence will permit a prediction that a person is “likely” to become one?

As to the first question, the State Department Foreign Affairs Manual, amended in important ways in 1999, 76 IR 980 (June 28, 1999), clarifies that the mere receipt of public funds does not make a person a public charge. Rather, the State Department defines “public charge” to mean “primarily dependent on the U.S. Government for subsistence,” as demonstrated by “the receipt of public cash assistance for income maintenance” or “institutionalization for long-term care at U.S. Government expense.” 9 F.A.M. § 40.41 n.2a (2008). These include such programs as Supplemental Security Income (SSI), Temporary Assistance for Needy Families (TANF), and state general assistance. Id. n.2.1. Even programs for which qualifying requirements include income specifications do not necessarily constitute cash assistance “for income maintenance;” the State Department offers as examples of non-public-charge programs the Food Stamp Program, Medicaid (other than long-term institutional care), the Child Health Insurance Program (CHIP), emergency medical services, the nutritional program for women, infants, and children (WIC), energy assistance, Head Start, job training programs, provision of in-kind services such as soup kitchens or crisis counseling, and several others. Id. n.2.2. The question in all cases is whether the program is “intended to be a primary source of cash for income maintenance.” Moreover, earned cash benefit programs like Social Security payments and veterans benefits are not considered public-charge programs. Id.

Trying to predict the likelihood that a given individual will become a public charge is more problematic. Often an applicant for an immigrant visa lines up a permanent job that will produce an adequate income. If not, however, the applicant can still avoid public charge problems by showing funds sufficient to provide support until a job is found. How much will be required depends, of course, on the needs of the applicant and his or her dependents and on the applicant’s prospects for getting work. As a result of IIRIRA § 531(a), the public charge exclusion ground now lays out the factors that will affect public charge determinations. They include age, health, family status, financial status, education, skills, and “affidavits of support.” INA § 212(a)(4)(B).

That last item has been controversial. Until 1996, a person who could not show sufficiently promising prospects of adequate employment was allowed to submit an "affidavit of support," in which a sponsor stated a willingness to come to the applicant's aid in the event aid is later needed. State courts were divided over whether such affidavits were legally binding on the affiant, see 9 F.A.M. § 40.41 n.6.4 (1993), but even in states where affidavits were held not to be binding, they were often accepted as strong evidence of future support. See, e.g., Matter of Kohama, 17 I. & N. Dec. 257 (INS Assoc. Comm'r 1978). The factors affecting the weight to be placed on affidavits of support included the motivation of the sponsor, his or her relationship to the applicant, and of course the sponsor's financial ability to provide the promised support. See 9 F.A.M. § 40.41 n.6.2 (1993).

In 1996, heightened public hostility toward both immigrants and welfare recipients culminated in long-anticipated welfare "reform." The Personal Responsibility and Work Opportunity Reconciliation Act of 1996, Pub. L. 104-193, 110 Stat. 2105 (Aug. 22, 1996) [hereafter the Welfare Act], restricted welfare in many ways and took special aim at immigrants, as discussed in chapter 13 below. Affidavits of support prompted particular concern, to which Congress responded in section 423 of the Welfare Act, adding new INA § 213A (amended a few weeks later by IIRIRA § 551(a)). The new section puts severe restrictions on affidavits of support.¹⁵

The most important change was to make the affidavit a binding contract. It must be "legally enforceable against the sponsor by the sponsored immigrant, the Federal Government, any state (or any political subdivision of such state), or by any other entity that provides any means-tested public benefit." INA § 213A(a)(1)(B). The promise is binding for 40 qualifying quarter-years after the immigrant last receives benefits or until naturalization if sooner. INA § 213A(a)(2).

The sponsor must be a United States national or an LPR, over age 18, and domiciled in the United States. INA § 213A(f)(1)(A, B, C). The sponsor must be the person who is petitioning for the immigrant's admission. INA § 213A(f)(1)(D). If the petitioner lacks the required resources (see below), he or she may join with another person as a co-sponsor. INA § 213A(f)(5).

The combination of the foregoing requirements has significant effects independent of the public charge issue. Before 1996, a United States citizen could petition for the admission of an otherwise qualifying noncitizen family member even if the petitioner was living overseas. That is no longer possible. Since the petitioner must be a sponsor (either alone or jointly), and since a sponsor has to be domiciled in the United States, citizens domiciled overseas may no longer petition for the admission of their family members. See David A. Martin, (then) INS General Counsel, Legal Opinion 97-10 (July 8, 1997), reproduced in 75 IR at 380-83 (Mar. 16, 1998). Nor, according to the former INS, can a citizen domiciled overseas solve the problem by enlisting a co-sponsor domiciled in the United States; a co-sponsor will not suffice unless the petitioner is also eligible to be a sponsor. Id. The only opening in such cases is that the citizen petitioner, although physically overseas, might be able to prove that his or her foreign presence is temporary and that the plan is to return to the United States. Id.; accord, 8 CFR §§ 213a.1, 213a.2(c)(1)(ii)(A) (2008) (domicile defined as residence that the sponsor has the “intention to maintain . . . for the foreseeable future.”) The sponsor may therefore reside overseas temporarily.

¹⁵. The regulations spell out most of the details. See 8 CFR § 213a (2008); 22 CFR § 40.41 (2008).

The sponsor’s income must be at least 125% of the poverty level. See INA §§ 213A(f)(1)(E), 213A(f)(6). Moreover, for immediate relative and family-sponsored petitions (except for certain widowed and certain abused family members), affidavits of support are mandatory, not optional. INA § 212(a)(4)(C).

Even before the 1996 reforms, the sponsor’s assets and income were treated as if they belonged to the beneficiary for purposes of calculating the latter’s eligibility for specified federal welfare programs, for varying periods of years after admission. Section 421 of the Welfare Act expanded these “deeming” provisions. Subject to some exceptions added by IIRIRA § 552, the Welfare Act extended deeming to all federal means-tested benefits and lengthened the time period during which deeming would operate (until naturalization or until the applicant has worked for 40 qualifying quarter-years, whichever comes sooner). Section 422 of the Welfare Act authorized states to take similar action with respect to state means-tested benefits.

The public charge ground may be waived upon the giving of what is usually called a “public charge” bond. INA § 213. The person who furnishes the bond promises to indemnify the United States or any state or local governmental unit in which the sponsored individual becomes a public charge. Security may be provided. In practice, the decision whether to accept such a bond is made in the local USCIS office after a request from a consular officer abroad. 8 CFR § 213 (2008). Such requests are made “only in borderline cases.” 9 F.A.M. § 40.41 n.4.6-4 (2008).

As noted above, sponsors must now demonstrate income equal to 125% of the federal poverty levels. For purposes of that requirement, the State Department uses the Poverty Income Guidelines prepared and revised annually by the Department of Health and Human Services. These guidelines are designed principally for use in administering federal welfare programs, awarding block grants, and compiling Census data.

For fiscal year 2009, the HHS Poverty Guideline was $10,830 per year for a one-person household plus $3,740 for each additional person (higher figures for Alaska and Hawaii). See 74 Fed. Reg. 4199 (Jan. 23, 2009). The sponsor’s annual income must therefore be 125% of that figure.

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. Which philosophy do you prefer—that of Emma Lazarus or that reflected in INA § 212(a)(4)? Do they necessarily conflict?

2. Should affidavits of support be legally binding on the sponsors? Argue both ways.

3. Why should an affidavit of support be mandatory? What if the beneficiary has an independent means of support, such as a job offer or savings?

4. Was Congress right to insist that the sponsor be the petitioner?

5. Was it wise for Congress to require the sponsor's income to be 125% of the poverty level (rather than 100%)? Should family unity be a luxury reserved for middle and upper income Americans?

6. The deeming provisions of the 1996 welfare reform legislation were highly contentious, mainly because they could result in low-income immigrants being denied welfare years later if they fall into distress. In theory immigrants may enforce the promises made by their sponsors, but with the passage of time not all sponsors will remain financially capable of providing the promised support. The question whether lawfully admitted immigrants should be disqualified from federal or state welfare benefits is taken up more generally in chapter 13.

E. PUBLIC HEALTH AND MORALS

Several exclusion grounds might be broadly characterized as concerned with either public health or safety or the congressional view of public morals. The health and safety grounds, see generally INA § 212(a)(1), describe various physical and mental disorders.¹⁶ Until 1990, these included people who "are mentally retarded," "are insane," "have had one or more attacks of insanity," and, among others, those with disorders that might affect their abilities to earn livings. See INA § 212(a)(1-7), pre-1990 version. The Immigration Act of 1990 narrowed the list significantly. Now, neither a physical nor a mental disorder is generally a basis for exclusion unless the associated behavior poses one of several specified threats. See INA § 212(a)(1)(A)(iii). Even then, discretionary waivers are possible. INA § 212(g)(3). Drug addicts and drug abusers are specifically inadmissible. INA § 212(a)(1)(A)(iv).

But by far the most significant modern issue connected with the health exclusions has been how to handle AIDS and HIV. Since 1891, the immigration laws have barred the admission of noncitizens with various diseases. Act of March 3, 1891, ch. 551, § 1, 26 Stat. 1084. During the 1980's and early 1990's there was much wrangling over whether the law excluded, and whether the law should exclude, individuals infected with HIV, the virus that causes AIDS.¹⁷ Given the volatility of the debate on AIDS, 16. See also INA § 212(a)(5)(B) (restricting admission of foreign physicians).

17. The tortured history is summarized in the first edition of this coursebook at 351-53, and discussed in greater detail in

Jorge L. Carro, From Constitutional Psychopathic Inferiority to AIDS: What is in the Future for Homosexual Aliens?, 7 Yale L. & Policy Rev. 201, 222-23 (1989); Juan P. Osuna, The Exclusion from the United States of neither Congresses nor Presidents have been anxious to take responsibility for policies that would facilitate the admission of noncitizens with HIV.

In 1993, Congress amended INA § 212(a)(1)(A)(i) to exclude noncitizens who are determined by the Department of Health and Human Services to have “a communicable disease of public health significance,” specifically including HIV/AIDS. National Institutes of Health Revitalization Act, Pub.L. 103-43, 107 Stat. 122, § 2007 (1993). The specific statutory language concerning HIV/AIDS was deleted in 2008, see Pub. L. 110-293, 122 Stat. 2918 (June 30, 2008), but the HHS regulations still list HIV/AIDS as a communicable disease of public health significance. See HHS interim final rule, 73 Fed. Reg. 58047-58 (Oct. 6, 2008). The Secretary of Homeland Security has the discretion to waive the communicable disease exclusion ground—including in cases of HIV/AIDS—for certain close family members of United States citizens or LPRs. INA § 212(g)(1). Gay males in permanent relationships with United States citizens have seldom benefitted from the waiver provision because, as you saw in chapter 3, § B.2.a above, United States immigration law does not recognize same-sex marriages. Even with the waiver provision, there are serious questions whether the United States policy comports with the international law restrictions on the treatment of people with HIV. See Joan Fitzpatrick & William McKay Bennett, A Lion in the Path? The Influence of International Law on the Immigration Policy of the United States, 70 Washington L. Rev. 589, 608-618 (1995).

For opposing views on whether HIV should be a basis for exclusion, compare Carro, above, at 221-28 (immigrants testing positive for HIV should be excluded) with Lynn Acker Starr, The Ineffectiveness and Impact of the Human Immunodeficiency Virus (HIV) Exclusion in U.S. Immigration Law, 3 Georgetown Immigration L.J. 87 (1989) (HIV should not be ground for exclusion).

Quite apart from the subject of public health, some exclusion grounds are rooted in congressional perceptions of public morality. The Immigration Act of 1990 significantly trimmed that list. Gone are the exclusions of homosexuals, see chapter 3, § B.2.a above, and of noncitizens “coming to the United States to engage in any immoral sexual act,” INA § 212(a)(13), pre-1990 version. The former exclusion of those who “advocate polygamy,” INA § 212(a)(11), was cut back to cover only immigrants, and then only if they are “coming to the United States to practice polygamy,” INA § 212(a)(10)(A) (emphasis added). There remains the exclusion of noncitizens involved in prostitution or other commercialized vice (even absent criminal convictions). INA § 212(a)(2)(D).

QUESTION

Should United States law exclude noncitizens with HIV? Is your answer the same for immigrants as for nonimmigrants?

Aliens Infected with the AIDS Virus: Recent Developments and Prospects for the Future, 16 Houston J. Internat'l L. 1, 7-12 (1993).

ADMISSION PROCEDURE

The procedures for admitting noncitizens to the United States changed substantially after September 11, 2001. Those changes that relate specifically to national security are collected in chapter 10, which takes up the question of national security more comprehensively. Within that chapter, the sections most relevant to admission procedure are the ones on intelligence-gathering (section B), visa policies (sections E.1 through E.4), border enhancement strategies (section F), and profiling practices (section G). To minimize repetition, most of the new admission-related national security precautions are mentioned only briefly in the present chapter.

A. THE EARLY DAYS

During the first few decades of the twentieth century, immigrants typically arrived by boat at either of two main receiving points. Asians ordinarily came to Angel Island, in San Francisco Bay. Europeans usually arrived at Ellis Island, in New York Harbor.¹

The passages that follow will give you the general flavor of life and process on Angel Island:

Him Mark Lai, Genny Lim & Judy Yung, Island—Poetry and History of Chinese Immigrants on Angel Island 1910–1940

Pp. 8, 42, 52, 54, 56, 60, 73, 109–11, 116, 118, 130 (2d ed. 1986).

Angel Island, now an idyllic state park out in San Francisco Bay not far from Alcatraz, was the point of entry for the majority of the approximately 175,000 Chinese immigrants who came to America between 1910 and 1940. Modeled after New York's Ellis Island, the site was used as the immigration detention headquarters for Chinese awaiting * * * the outcomes of medical examinations and immigration papers. It was also the holding ground for deportees awaiting transportation back to the motherland. The ordeal of immigration and detention left an indelible mark in the minds of many Chinese, a number of whom wrote poetry on the barrack walls, recording the impressions of their voyage to America, their longing for families back home, and their outrage and humiliation at the treatment America accorded them.

1. See generally Ann Novotny, Strangers at the Door: Ellis Island, Castle Garden, and the Great Migration to America (1971);

Thomas M. Pitkin, Keepers of the Gate: A History of Ellis Island (1975).

When the center's doors shut in 1940, one of the most bitter chapters in the history of Chinese immigration to America came to a close. The poems expressing the thoughts of the Chinese immigrants were locked behind those doors and soon forgotten. Those poems have been resurrected and preserved in this book. It was by accident that they have survived. The three of us, offspring of Angel Island inmates, plunged into the project of translation and historical documentation as a personal hobby which later evolved into this book. * * *

[The authors also interviewed immigrants who had been detained at Angel Island and immigration officials who had been stationed there. The following account of one detainee describes her arrival, lockup, and daily life on the island:]

* * *

"When we arrived, they locked us up like criminals in compartments like the cages at the zoo. They counted us and then took us upstairs to our rooms. There were two to three rooms in the women's section, all facing the shore. Each of the rooms could fit twenty or thirty persons. The spring beds could be folded up. The main door was locked, but we could go into the other rooms from the hallway. The hall was wide, with tables and chairs where you could play dominoes. You didn't have to stay in your room during the day. You could come out into the hall. There was also an office there. We could ask questions of the white woman who took care of us at the office. One kid who had stayed for two years could speak English. He called her Mama. He was eight or nine. He translated for us. The woman even gave haircuts to the three boys staying in the women's section then. There was a back yard that was fenced in so we couldn't get out. We could hang our wash out there. It wasn't too bad. It was just that you couldn't go out. The place was very clean. There were two bathrooms and three or four stalls inside of each. The toilet doors were cut off at the bottom so they could see your feet. Maybe it was because they were afraid of people committing suicide. There were wash basins and sinks, bathtubs, hot water, toilet paper, and soap for us to use. People chatted in the hallway or in their rooms, sang for pleasure, or read books. The old-timers were familiar with one another, but they left the newcomers pretty much alone. We were Sam Yup [a geographic region of China—Eds.] and didn't know them. When we arrived, we were kind of shy and distant, so there really wasn't much to say."

Mrs. Woo, age 23 in 1940

[Here are some varying impressions of the adjudication procedure in actual practice:]

"At that time, a new arrival was held for a hearing before a Board of Special Inquiry, as we called it. That consisted of two inspectors, a stenographer, and an interpreter. The inspector, to whom the case was assigned, was handed the file with any related files of that person's family. It was up to him to review the old file and start questioning the applicant about his birth and family home and in the course of the questioning and testimony, it would develop the applicant was either very much in accord with the old files or that there were rather serious discrepancies between him and the other family members. It was the only means we had, although it wasn't a very good method, because in a way, the Immigration Service built up a way for them to be coached and learn their testimony to get by. We just worked on the theory that this was the law and we had to carry it out. I felt each was entitled to a fair deal and I tried to give it to him as best as I could. In a way, it (laws discriminating against the Chinese) did touch me, and when the Exclusion Law was repealed, I thought that was a good thing.

* * *

"They (interrogation rooms) were bright, airy rooms. There would be the stenographer's desk and another desk or two. When the applicant was brought in, he would be given a seat where he could be at ease and talk as he wished and where the interpreter would communicate with him. Around 15 percent of the cases I handled were women. I don't remember any prostitutes, except one instance after World War II. There were many, many boys coming through—12, 14, 15 years old, a lot of them smart kids. They were very sure of themselves.

"The testimony was taken directly on the typewriter. He would be questioned about his birthday, his parents, his brothers and sisters, and about the village he lived in. That might be quite brief or it might drag out with some inspectors to forty or fifty pages of typed testimony. It took from one to three or four days for him and the witnesses altogether. There usually was a certain field to be covered, according to his claims and the old claims. Usually you would start with the immigrant himself and check his testimony against his relatives'. If the testimonies matched, we had to give them the benefit of the doubt. A minor discrepancy would not carry much weight. If it was something serious . . . I remember a case of a boy whose father was bringing him in. He said his mother was so-and-so, but his father said his mother was so-and-so. He wasn't landed.

"After the Board heard the testimony, they would be pretty much in accord as to what was right and what was not. Any disagreement would mean a denial for the person. If two voted to land him and one voted to deny him, the dissenting member could appeal the case. But if he didn't wish to appeal, the person was landed. If the testimony was in accord, the file would be sent to the detention quarters and the person ordered to land. If denied, the person was not notified until the testimony was all summarized, but he would be given that notice eventually. If the applicant wished to appeal, the copy of the testimony would be sent to the central office in Washington and the attorney handling the case would be given a copy from which he made his appeal. They (Washington) would probably make its decision based on the transcript alone. More than 75 percent passed the interrogation at Angel Island. There could have been indications of fraud in some of them, but nothing that would stand up in court to debar them. Of those that were denied here, there was always an appeal to Washington and probably only 5 percent of those denied were ever really deported. Some who were deported came back and tried again, and made it. They knew you knew they were here before. If we found they were using another name, they could be excluded. Those deported had photographs taken that were held here to be checked. I've known of families of four or five coming together. They would question one briefly, just to a certain point. Then they would call back the first one and just go a little bit further. So they couldn't get together and talk about what they had just said.

"The interpreters we had were pretty good on most of the dialects. They would use one interpreter with one applicant. Then when they had a witness, they would change interpreters. The inspector in charge had to rotate the interpreters so that the first interpreter would usually not be available when recalled for a second hearing with the same applicant. I one time asked one of our interpreters what percentage of cases were fraudulent. I asked if 90 percent were. He said probably. I was aware of it from the beginning. I remember one case I was very sorry about. The father had brought a boy in, although it really was a daughter that he had had. She later came and I forget how he brought it up that she was really his daughter, and she really was, but the boys that he had gotten paid for bringing in had spoiled things for her. She was deported, but she married a G.I. and later came back.

"There were few bribes offered. I know it did happen, but the cases were very rare. I don't think I ever had anything offered to me, but in a few cases, some of the others had. It was something that was hard to prove. I was aware that coaching papers were being sneaked in. They (the administration) tried to prevent it. I did hear of a capsule being put in a bowl of soup with a note inside. They got the capsule but nothing developed from it. I know the kitchen help used to give them a lot of help (laughs), but there was nothing we could do about it."

Immigration inspector #1, 1929-1940

* * *

"When it was my turn to be interrogated, they first made me wait in a small room. After awhile, they called me in and started asking me this and that, this and that, until I had a headache. After three or four hours of this, they confined me to a downstairs room where I stayed overnight. The next day, they questioned me again. They very seldom question you one day only and allow you to return upstairs. One strange question they asked me was: 'What is your living room floor made of?' I replied, 'Brick.' They said, 'Okay. What is the floor under your bed made of?' So I thought if the living room floor was brick, then the bedroom must also be brick. So I said, 'Brick!' They typed the answer down and didn't say anything. The next day, they asked the same question and I replied, 'Brick' again. They said my father had said it was dirt. What happened was that the floor was dirt at first, but later, after my father left for America, I changed the floor myself to brick. Where I really went wrong was in answering the question about who gave me the passage money. My father had written that he would send the money home to my mother to give me so that's what I said. But what happened was my father didn't really have the money and another relative loaned the money to my mother. So although I was a real son, I failed the interrogation. My deepest impression of Angel Island now was the rudeness of the white interrogators. They kept saying, 'Come on, answer, answer.' They kept rushing me to answer until I couldn't remember the answers anymore. And it wasn't just the whites. The Chinese interpreters did too."

Mr. Leung, age 24 in 1936

"During the interrogation, if the inspector pursued a point, the situation would become tense. They even asked me where the rice bin was kept. Can you imagine? If your father had said the left side and the son, the right side, that won't do. In our days, we didn't have electricity, just kerosene lamps. And you know, a kerosene lamp's a moveable object. So what was I supposed to say if they asked where was the lamp kept? My father might have said the middle of the table or the end of the table. I didn't know. I couldn't understand why they asked such questions. They asked about everything and anything. When I was serving as a witness for my brother, they asked me how far the *shameen*² was from the wharf. I said, 'Very close.' The next time I was interrogated, they asked me the same question and I replied the same, 'Very close.' They then said, 'Okay, come get your brother tomorrow.' They were trying to trap me. I was interrogated only once for several hours in one day. I knew that most people who were interrogated in the morning would be landed the next day. It was bad if no news came by then."

Mr. Poon, age 18 in 1927

* * *

"Prior to interrogation, you were not allowed to have any visitors. The guards said, 'Here they come, here they come!' but they never let you see them. When I went, the interrogators were very thoughtful. The white lady gave me some candy and by the time I had finished eating my candy, the interrogation was over. It took not more than ten minutes. They asked a few questions, nothing much: what is your father's name, what village are you from, how old are you, so forth. Maybe they asked less questions than usual because they had questioned my husband first. They questioned him,

2. [Footnote 33 in original] Cantonese pronunciation of Shamian, an island on the Pearl River at Guangzhou, where the United States Consulate used to be located.

then me, then my son. After they finished the interrogation, two days later, I was able to get on the ship. I took the boat and my relatives met me in San Francisco.”

Mrs. Jew, age 33 in 1922

* * *

“If the guard came in and called out a name and said ‘sai gaai,’³ it meant that that person was freed to land. If an applicant was to be deported, the guard would make motions as if he were crying.”

Mr. Lee, age 20 in 1930

[The following poems were among those found inscribed on the prison walls:]

10 Poem by One Named Xu From Xiangshan Encouraging the Traveler

Just talk about going to the land of the Flowery Flag and my countenance fills with happiness.

Not without hard work were 1,000 pieces of gold dug up and gathered together.

There were words of farewell to the parents, but the throat choked up first. There were many feelings, many tears flowing face to face, when parting with the wife.

Waves big as mountains often astonished this traveller.

With laws harsh as tigers, I had a taste of all the barbarities.

Do not forget this day when you land ashore.

Push yourself ahead and do not be lazy or idle.

* * *

12

Today is the last day of winter,

Tomorrow morning is the vernal equinox.

One year’s prospects have changed to another.

Sadness kills the person in the wooden building.

* * *

3. [Footnote 27 in original] Probably a corruption of “Hou sai gaai,” a colloquial term meaning “good fortune.” At other times, guards apparently also shouted, “Seung ngon,” or “go ashore.”

15

The insects chirp outside the four walls.

The inmates often sigh.

Thinking of affairs back home,

Unconscious tears wet my lapel.

* * *

19

Living on Island away from home elicits a hundred feelings.

My chest is filled with a sadness and anger I cannot bear to explain.

Night and day, I sit passively and listlessly.

Fortunately, I have a novel as my companion.

* * *

24

I, a seven foot man, am ashamed I cannot extend myself.

Curled up in an enclosure, my movements are dictated by others.

Enduring a hundred humiliations, I can only cry in vain.

This person's tears fall, but what can the blue heavens do?

* * *

65

Bidding farewell to the wooden building, I return to Hong Kong.

From hence forward, I will arouse my country and flaunt my aspirations.

I'll tell my compatriots to inform their fellow villagers.

If they possess even a small surplus of food and clothing,

They should not drift across the ocean.

For fascinating transcripts of the immigration inspections of two other Chinese detainees at Angel Island, see the illuminating article by their son, Bill Ong Hing, No Place for Angels: In Reaction to Kevin Johnson, 2000 Univ. Illinois L. Rev. 559.

B. MODERN PROCEDURE: PRELIMINARY COMMENTS

In some respects little has changed since the days of Angel Island. Certain categories of arriving noncitizens are still routinely detained while their admission decisions are pending. See pages 166–71 above. And the courts still hold, as you saw in chapter 2, that the Constitution provides little protection—substantive or procedural—to the noncitizen who seeks initial admission to the United States.

In other respects, however, we have come a long way. The Immigration and Nationality Act, the regulations of several administrative agencies, and other less formal agency action together provide a process far more intricate, and in most cases fairer, than the procedure of several decades ago. You will also see a massive exception. “Expedited removal” and other abbreviated procedures introduced in 1996 actually leave less procedural protection for certain large categories of arriving noncitizens than was the case at Angel Island.

The next few sections of this chapter will take you through these processes. Several federal Departments are involved: the Department of Homeland Security; the Department of Justice, mainly its Executive Office for Immigration Review [EOIR]; the Department of State; and the Department of Labor. In cases that involve medical exclusions, the Department of Health and Human Services also plays a role.

Although the procedure for admitting immigrants is generally more exacting than that for nonimmigrants, many of the steps you will study are common to both. You can think of the admission process as comprising up to four hurdles that the prospective entrant must clear:

The first hurdle applies only to individuals who seek certain statuses. Generally, immigrants applying under the second and the third employment-based preferences must first obtain labor certification. See INA § 212(a)(5)(A) and chapter 3, § C.1.b above. Employers of certain nonimmigrants must also apply for labor certification or, in some instances, file “labor condition applications” (“LCA’s”). See chapter 4, § A.3 above.

The second hurdle, also limited to certain statuses, is the visa petition, which is filed with USCIS. Its purpose is to establish that the noncitizen beneficiary meets the requirements of the particular status claimed—for example, immediate relative, preference category, etc.

The third potential step is getting a visa. (Some noncitizens are exempt from this requirement, as you will see.) Once USCIS has approved a visa petition (if one is required), the beneficiary next ordinarily files a visa application with the appropriate United States consulate abroad. The beneficiary will need to persuade the consulate not only that he or she fits the definition of the applicable status, but also that none of the affirmative grounds for inadmissibility applies. The process involves paperwork and, in the case of certain statuses, a personal interview. The terrorist attacks of September 11, 2001 have clearly resulted in more resource-intensive background checks for greater numbers of visa applicants. (Under specified circumstances that you will study in section F, it is possible for certain noncitizens who are already in the United States, and who now meet the substantive requirements for admission as LPRs, to “adjust status” in the United States, thus avoiding the need to travel abroad for immigrant visas.)

The fourth hurdle is actual admission to the United States. Armed with a visa, the person appears at an authorized entry point and formally applies for admission. A visa is usually essential to admission, see INA § 212(a)(7), but it does not guarantee admission. Under a double-check system, the CBP immigration inspector may reexamine the noncitizen to assure that none of the statutory inadmissibility grounds applies. In practice, for travelers in possession of visas, the border inspection has normally been quite cursory, though less so since September 11, 2001.

Before proceeding further, figure out why the law would generally impose this multi-step process—visa petition, visa application, and inspection at port of entry (all preceded by labor certification in certain employment-related contexts). Would it be better to have a single agency make all the determinations on which admissibility hinges?⁴

The next several sections will cover all these procedural steps (except labor certification, which was addressed in chapter 3). Keep in mind that, with some exceptions, a noncitizen is subject to inspection and possible exclusion (“removal”) every time he or she seeks admission. After initial admission, however, immigrants and certain categories of nonimmigrants who leave the United States for brief periods will ordinarily be readmitted upon presentation of certain documents at ports of entry. See 8 CFR §§ 211.1(a)(2) (immigrants), 214.1(b) (certain nonimmigrants) (2008).

C. VISA PETITIONS

Here is some basic information about the mechanics and terminology associated with visa petitions: First, the petition itself is a standardized form. The party who files it is called the “petitioner;” the noncitizen on whose behalf the petition is filed is called the “beneficiary.” Two particular forms are in such common use that their numbers have become part of the lingo: The visa petition filed with USCIS on behalf of immediate relatives and family-based preference immigrants is the I-130; for employment-based immigrants, it is the I-140.

Certain employment-based first preference immigrants (those with “extraordinary ability”) may either petition for themselves or have others, such as their employers, petition for them. INA § 204(a)(1)(E). For most other employment-based preferences, the petitioner must be the employer. INA § 204(a)(1)(F).

4. See generally United States Commission on Immigration Reform, Becoming an American: Immigration and Immigrant Policy 161-69 (recommending consolidation of all admission functions in State Department), 175-83 (recommending establishment of independent agency to review immigration-related administrative decisions) (Sept. 1997).

An excellent critique by Professor Lenni Benson depicts much of the superfluous processing as “bureaucratic borders” superimposed upon physical borders. See Lenni B. Benson, Breaking Bureaucratic Borders: A Necessary Step Toward Immigration Law Reform, 54 Administrative L. Rev. 203 (2002).

In immediate relative and family preference cases, the United States citizen or LPR family member is normally the one who must file the visa petition. INA § 204(a)(1)(A, B). If that person declines to do so, the would-be immigrant is generally powerless to apply for LPR status. This means the United States spouse has enormous power over the noncitizen beneficiary. Until 1994, that source of power left noncitizen spouses exceptionally vulnerable to subtle or even explicit pressure not to complain about domestic violence or other abuse.

In 1994, as part of a comprehensive crime statute, Congress authorized certain abused immigrants to petition on their own behalf. See Pub. L. 103-322, § 40701, 108 Stat. 1796, 1953-55 (Sept. 13, 1994), amending INA § 204(a)(1). The provision applies to those who have been battered, or subjected to “extreme cruelty,” by their United States citizen or LPR spouses. The 1994 law also required the self-petitioner to show good moral character, prior residence in the United States with the spouse, good faith in entering into the marriage, and extreme hardship to the petitioner or the petitioner’s child. It established analogous protections for noncitizen children who have been battered, or subjected to extreme cruelty, by their citizen or LPR parents (or parents’ spouses).⁵

Still, the 1994 legislation left some difficult obstacles for battered self-petitioners. For one thing, while the law clearly contemplates self-petitions from people who are already present in the United States, nothing in the law exempts the self-petitioner from removal on the ground of presence without admission. Thus, the self-petitioner must take a calculated risk. Having brought her presence to the attention of ICE, she now risks removal if the petition is denied.⁶ Professors Linda Kelly and Cecelia Espenosa have both discussed another difficult practical obstacle. If, as often happens, both parties to a physical dispute are charged with domestic violence, and convictions ensue, the battered woman might be unable to establish the “good moral character” required for self-petitions.⁷ Finally, extreme hardship can be quite difficult to prove.

The Victims of Trafficking and Violence Prevention Act of 2000, Pub. L. 106-386, § 1503, 114 Stat. 1464, 1518 (Oct. 28, 2000), addressed some of these concerns but not all of them. It repealed the extreme hardship requirement and provided a discretion to waive the good moral character requirement in certain instances in which the otherwise disqualifying behavior was connected to the original violence. Related statutory provisions authorize nonimmigrant U-visas for certain domestic violence victims who cooperate with the police (see chapter 4) and relax the requirements for the discretionary remedy known as cancellation of removal in the cases of certain victims of battery or other extreme cruelty (see chapter 8).

5. See generally Janet M. Calvo, A Decade of Spouse-Based Immigration Laws: Coverture’s Diminishment, But Not Its Demise, 24 Northern Illinois Univ. L. Rev. 153 (2004); Linda Kelly, Stories from the Front: Seeking Refuge for Battered Immigrants in the Violence against Women Act, 92 Northwestern L. Rev. 665 (1998).

6. Thanks to Professor Victor Romero and his students for spotting this issue.

7. See Linda Kelly, Domestic Violence Survivors: Surviving the Beatings of 1996, 11 Georgetown Immigration L.J. 303, 315 n.63 (1997); Cecelia M. Espenosa, No Relief for the Weary: VAWA Relief Denied for Battered Immigrants Lost in the Intersections, 83 Marquette L. Rev. 163 (1999) (urging repeal of the good moral character requirement because it can be triggered by the false claims of a violent spouse that the victim was also guilty of domestic abuse).

Linda Kelly, Stories From the Front: Seeking Refuge for Battered Immigrants in the Violence Against Women Act

92 Northwestern Univ. L. Rev. 665, at 665 (1998).

Sonya's Story:

We met at a vocational and technical education school. We began dating and fell in love. I was four months into my pregnancy when we got married. The abuse started when I became pregnant and gradually progressed in severity. The verbal insults turned into physical abuse. When I fought back he would beat me and then force me to have sex with him. He told me that because I was not willing to please him as a good wife should, I had become a mere servant in his home. He would hide food. He said that I could eat it off the floor since I was no more than a dog. When he hid my passport I hid one of his guns that he would keep on top of the television. The police only told him to be careful with Latin women because they had fiery tempers. He laughed as they left and told me that he would show me that he had the power because he was American and that no one would believe me. He would yell at me that I was nothing but an [undocumented] immigrant and that he, as a citizen, had all the power.

In a separate, unpublished writing, Professor Kelly posed the following two questions:

Question 1. What problems may a victim of domestic violence like Sonya encounter in documenting and proving the abuse? How does a domestic violence survivor's position as an undocumented immigrant compound this problem?

Question 2. What problems may a victim of domestic violence encounter in documenting and proving good faith marriage? How does a domestic violence survivor's position as an undocumented immigrant compound this problem?

How and where is the visa petition filed? USCIS operates several regional "service centers," each of which serves certain local "districts." See 8 CFR § 100.4(e) (2008). In the past, almost all interaction between individual applicants and the former INS occurred at the district level. Today, each regional service center adjudicates a wide variety of applications and petitions for which personal interviews are assumed to be generally unnecessary. Most visa petitions filed within the United States are mailed directly to those regional service centers. Certain U.S. citizen petitioners who live outside the United States may file in offices overseas. 8 CFR § 204.1(e)(2) (2008). All visa petitions, wherever filed, must be supported by documents that establish the essential facts. 8 CFR § 204.1(f,g) (2008).

Recall that immigrants who are subject to numerical quotas receive “priority dates” fixing their places in the queue. The priority date for a family-based preference immigrant is the date that the visa petition was filed. INA § 203(e)(1); 22 CFR § 42.53(a) (2008). The priority date for an employment-based preference immigrant is similarly the date on which the petition was filed, INA § 203(e)(1), but for this purpose the regulations deem the visa petition filed on the date the request for labor certification was accepted for processing (assuming the particular preference category in fact requires labor certification). 8 CFR § 204.5(d) (2008).⁸

The regulations do not give the visa petitioner the right to be heard orally.⁹ They do provide, however, that, before an adverse decision can be made on the basis of derogatory non-classified information of which the petitioner or beneficiary is unaware, he or she must be given that information and an opportunity to respond. 8 CFR § 103.2(b)(16)(i) (2008). The procedure must also comport with the demands of due process, and for that purpose the balancing test set out in Mathews v. Eldridge (see page 154 above) applies. Ali v. INS, 661 F.Supp. 1234, 1249–51 (D.Mass.1986).

When USCIS denies a visa petition it must state its reasons for doing so. 8 CFR § 204.2(a)(3) (2008). That is important, because denials of visa petitions are subject to both administrative and judicial review. In the case of administrative review, the forum depends on the type of visa petition. Denials of most kinds of family-based petitions are appealable to the BIA. 8 CFR § 1003.1(b)(5) (2008). Denials of employment-based petitions are normally appealable within USCIS to a unit called the Administrative Appeals Office (the AAO).¹⁰ Until 1996, judicial review of the final administrative decision concerning either type of visa petition was explicitly made

8. If an individual labor certification is unnecessary because the immigrant’s occupation is listed on the Labor Department’s Schedule A, the priority date will be the date on which the visa petition is filed with USCIS. 8 CFR § 204.5(d) (2008).

9. USCIS has the discretion to require both the petitioner and the beneficiary to appear in person for an interview, 8 CFR § 103.2(b)(9) (2008), but in practice that authority is seldom invoked. The only basis for denying a visa petition is that the petitioner has not shown the beneficiary has the claimed status, see Matter of O, 8 I. & N. Dec. 295, 297 (BIA 1959); that decision—unlike the later determination whether any of the exclusion grounds applies—can normally be made without a personal interview.

10. Former 8 CFR § 103.1(f)(iii)(B) (2003) expressly authorized such appeals. DHS has now chosen not to codify that authority, see 68 Fed. Reg. 10923 (Mar. 6, 2003), but the current regulations still mention the Administrative Appeals “Unit” (its former name), 8 CFR § 103.3(a)(1)(iv) (2008). On the allocation of administrative appellate authority between the BIA and the former AAU (now AAO), see Stephen H. Legomsky, Forum Choices for the Review of Agency Adjudication: A Study of the Immigration Process, 71 Iowa L.Rev. 1297 (1986).

available in federal district court. INA § 279. As discussed in chapter 9, however, IIRIRA § 381 amended INA § 279; the amended version authorizes suits by the United States but not suits against it. Nonetheless, general federal question jurisdiction under 28 USC § 1331 might well be available. See pages 497–98 below.

Once USCIS approves an immigrant visa petition, it forwards the approval to the State Department's National Visa Center (NVC), in Portsmouth, New Hampshire. The NVC checks the petition for accuracy and completeness, creates a file, and sends the file to the appropriate United States consulate overseas. See generally 71 IR 714–16 (May 27, 1994). At that point, the visa application process—examined in the next section—begins.

In recent years serious backlogs have accumulated in the processing of visa petitions (among other forms), with the result that even those immigrants whom Congress has chosen to exempt from the numerical quotas (e.g., immediate relatives) have been routinely subjected to disturbing delays. In section 204(a) of the Immigration Services and Infrastructure Improvements Act of 2000, which is title II of the American Competitiveness in the Twenty-First Century Act of 2000, Pub. L. 106–313, 114 Stat. 1251 (Oct. 17, 2000), Congress mandated the Attorney General to take whatever measures were necessary to reduce the “backlog in the processing of immigration benefit applications, with the objective” of eliminating the backlog entirely within one year (i.e., by October 17, 2001). Funding was provided for that purpose. Id. The objective was not met, but when Congress passed the Homeland Security Act in 2002, it included a provision, section 458, which set a new target date of one year after enactment of the HSA, i.e., by November 25, 2003. That target too went unmet, but since then USCIS has introduced a “Backlog Elimination Plan” designed to reduce the waiting times. See 82 IR 536 (Mar. 28, 2005). For the details, and for websites that display current waiting times, see item 5 at the end of section A of chapter 3 above.

One controversial INS solution to the backlog problem was to introduce, in 2001, a concept that it called “premium processing.” Those employer petitioners who are willing to pay a fee of $1000 (in addition to the regular filing fee) could have their petitions processed within 15 days. The direct beneficiaries are the employers, who hope to recruit and hire foreign workers as quickly after a job becomes available as possible, and of course the noncitizen employees. The former INS pledged, however, to use the additional revenues to hire additional staff to reduce the processing times for other petitioners as well. See generally 66 Fed. Reg. 29682–86 (June 1, 2001); 78 IR 920 (June 4, 2001).

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. As an immigration lawyer, what documents would you submit to prove the facts essential to successful visa petitions for each of the four family-sponsored preference categories? What sorts of complications can you envision? See generally 8 CFR § 204 (2008).

2. INA § 205 authorizes the Secretary of Homeland Security to revoke a previous approval of a visa petition “for what he deems to be good and sufficient cause.” The regulations, 8 CFR § 205.1 (2008), specify certain events that will trigger automatic revocation. Keeping in mind the substantive requirements for the various statuses, try to figure out what events should be included in that list.

3. Apart from automatic revocation, USCIS may revoke a visa petition for any other “good and sufficient cause” in the particular case, including simply a change of heart. INA § 205. The beneficiary must receive notice of an intention to revoke and an opportunity to respond. See Matter of Ho, 19 I. & N. Dec. 582 (BIA 1988); Matter of Estime, 19 I. & N. Dec. 450 (BIA 1987).

4. The approval of a visa petition may not be revoked once the beneficiary has begun his or her journey to the United States. INA § 205. Revocations are appealable to the BIA in family cases, 8 CFR § 1003.1(b)(5) (2008), and to the Administrative Appeals Office of USCIS in employment cases (procedure no longer codified). The courts are divided over whether revocations of approved visa petitions are reviewable in court. Compare Jilin Pharmaceutical USA v. Chertoff, 447 F.3d 196 (3d Cir. 2006), and El-Khader v. Monica, 366 F.3d 562 (7th Cir. 2004) (no) with ANA International v. Way, 393 F.3d 886 (9th Cir. 2004) (yes). As the court acknowledged in Jilin, 447 F.3d at 205 n.11, the combination of allowing judicial review of visa petition denials but not revocations of approved visa petitions generates a perverse incentive. Rather than deny a petition it does not wish to approve, USCIS can simply grant the petition and then immediately revoke the grant, thus insulating its decision from judicial review.

Florida Bar v. Matus

Supreme Court of Florida, 1988.
528 So.2d 895.

■ BARKETT, JUSTICE.

This cause is before us upon The Florida Bar’s petition to enjoin Dr. Francisco J. Matus d/b/a Latinoamericana De Inmigracion, Inc., from the unauthorized practice of law. * * *

* * *

The allegations indicate that the respondent is not a member of The Florida Bar and engaged in the following activities:

1. On or about May 18, 1987, Florida Bar staff investigator Enrique T. Torres visited Respondent’s offices * * *. Respondent’s office displayed diplomas, degrees, presidential appointments and presidential citations from Nicaragua, as well as a State of Florida Notary Public Appointment.

2. At the time of the May 18, 1987, visit, Torres obtained a business card from Respondent. The card, printed in Spanish, represented Respondent as a general immigration service, showing the corporate logo and the services offered, including, but not limited to, tourist visa extensions, student visas, political asylum, and residency. The business card lists Respondent, Dr. Francisco J. Matus, as president of Latinoamericana De Inmigracion, Inc. Respondent also advertises his availability to perform the above services in "La Estrella de Nicaragua", a Spanish publication circulated in Miami.

3. During the May 18, 1987, visit, Torres indicated to Respondent that he wished to obtain permanent residence status for his girlfriend who had entered the United States illegally from Peru in 1980. Respondent informed Torres that his girlfriend would need documentation and affidavits showing her residency in the United States from the date of her arrival. Respondent informed Torres that upon receiving the documents, Respondent would complete the documentation required by the new amnesty program for a fee of two hundred and fifty (250) dollars.

4. During the May 18, 1987, visit, Torres further asked Respondent whether he could assist Torres in obtaining an extension of his tourist visa. Respondent informed Torres that he had all of the forms in his office and would file the necessary extension with the Immigration Service for a fee of four hundred (400) dollars. Torres then asked Respondent whether he could assist Torres in obtaining permanent residence status in the United States. Respondent informed Torres that for a fee of three thousand (3,000) to five thousand (5,000) dollars, he could arrange a marriage between Torres and an American citizen. After the marriage, Respondent would file the necessary documentation to obtain permanent residence status for Torres.

5. Respondent was not and is not authorized by Federal Law or the Immigration and Naturalization Service to perform the services outlined in paragraphs two (2) through four (4) above.

The preparation of forms to effect a change in immigration status requires legal training and familiarity with immigration laws, and failure to properly prepare the forms could result in great harm, including deportation. Holding oneself out to be an attorney when not so licensed itself constitutes the unauthorized practice of law.

Accepting the uncontested allegations in this petition as true, we hold that respondent held himself out as legally qualified to perform immigration services, which constitutes the unauthorized practice of law in Florida. We therefore permanently enjoin and restrain respondent from engaging in the acts complained of and from otherwise engaging in the practice of law in this state.

It is so ordered.

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. In the present case the Florida State Bar sought merely to enjoin Matus from continuing to practice law. You should be aware, however, that the unauthorized practice of law is also a criminal offense and a growing problem in immigration. Increased numbers of notaries and other nonlawyers hold themselves out as qualified to take on immigration cases.

In addition to criminal and civil legislation and to the ethical constraints imposed by state disciplinary codes, attorneys (and others) who practice before USCIS or EOIR are subject to the disciplinary rules laid out in the DHS and DOJ regulations. Those rules, revamped in 2000, see 65 Fed. Reg. 39513 (June 27, 2000), appear in 8 CFR § 1003.102 (2008). One provision disciplines anyone who “[k]nowingly or with reckless disregard makes a false or misleading communication about his or her qualifications or services.” Id. § 1003.102(f).

2. Identify all the things Matus did that the court found wrongful.

3. If you have taken a course in professional responsibility, you know that it is not easy to determine when particular services amount to the practice of law. In the specific context of immigration, the regulations provide some guidance. They define “practice” to include “the preparation or filing of any brief or other document, paper, application, or petition on behalf of another person . . .” 8 CFR § 1001.1(i) (2008). The word “preparation,” in turn, is defined as “the study of the facts of a case and the applicable laws, coupled with the giving of advice and auxiliary activities, including the incidental preparation of papers, but does not include the lawful functions of a notary public or service consisting solely of assistance in the completion of blank spaces on printed Service forms by one whose remuneration, if any, is nominal and who does not hold himself out as qualified in legal matters or in immigration and naturalization procedure.” 8 CFR § 1001.1(k) (2008).

4. In a 1992 legal opinion elaborating on those regulations, the then INS General Counsel, Grover Joseph Rees III, quoted approvingly from a case called Unauthorized Practice Committee v. Cortez, 692 S.W.2d 47 (Tex. 1985): “Although the act of recording a client’s responses to the questions on the form I-130 probably does not require legal skill or knowledge, the act of determining whether the I-130 should be filed at all does require special legal skills.” See 69 IR 823, 827 (July 6, 1992). See also Memorandum from Hon. Doris Meissner, Commissioner of the INS, to various INS officers (Jan. 18, 1995), reproduced in March 1995 AILA Monthly Mailing at 203, 205.

5. Are the current regulations consistent with Cortez (and therefore with the former INS General Counsel’s opinion citing Cortez?) The regulations seem to allow a nonlawyer to help a client fill out a standardized form as long as remuneration is nominal and the nonlawyer does not hold himself or herself out as qualified in legal or procedural matters. Does Cortez allow that?

6. The Texas Attorney General recently shut down large numbers of immigration shops engaged in the unauthorized practice of law. See 83 IR 2263-64 (Oct. 23, 2006).

7. Apart from the unauthorized practice of law, those who help people fill out immigration forms or assemble documents need to worry about the consequences of either false or frivolous filings. IIRIRA created several new offenses and stiffened the penalties for some old ones:

a. INA § 274C(a)(5) makes it a civil offense, punishable by fines of $250 to $2000 for first offenders (higher for repeat offenders), “to prepare, file, or assist” the filing of any immigration-related application or document “with knowledge or reckless disregard of the fact that such application or document was falsely made.”

b. A provision of the U.S. criminal code, 18 USC § 1546(a), para. 4, makes it a crime, punishable by up to ten years in prison, to “knowingly present any [application or document required by the immigration laws] which contains any . . . false statement or which fails to contain any reasonable basis in law or fact” (emphasis added).

c. Under INA § 274C(e), a person who “knowingly and willfully fails to disclose, conceals, or covers up the fact that they have, on behalf of any person and for a fee or other remuneration, prepared or assisted in preparing an application which was falsely made” is subject to a prison term of up to five years and barred from preparing future applications. The term “falsely made” is defined in section 274C(f).

PROBLEMS 1-3

Problem 1. Your friend, a United States citizen who has just married a noncitizen, knows that you are a law student and that you are enrolled in an immigration course. She cannot afford to hire an attorney, so she asks whether you would fill out her I-130 (visa petition) for her. The marriage is clearly genuine, and her case strikes you as straightforward. But you have just read the Matus decision and the information following it, and this has made you nervous about helping her. Should you do it?

Problem 2. Rule 5.5(b) of the ABA Model Rules of Professional Responsibility prohibits a lawyer from “assist[ing] a person who is not a member of the bar in the performance of activity that constitutes the unauthorized practice of law.” The analogous provision in the old ABA Model Code (still followed in some states) was Disciplinary Rule 3-101: “A lawyer shall not aid a non-lawyer in the unauthorized practice of law.”¹¹ That Disciplinary Rule was supplemented by Ethical Consideration 3-6, which provided:

11. Under the ABA Model Code, the Ethical Considerations (EC’s) were the standards to which all attorneys were urged to aspire. The Disciplinary Rules (DR’s) were the mandatory rules that were to give rise to disciplinary proceedings. The Model Rules abandoned that terminology.

EC 3-6. A lawyer often delegates tasks to clerks, secretaries, and other lay persons. Such delegation is proper if the lawyer maintains a direct relationship with his client, supervises the delegated work, and has complete professional responsibility for the work product. This delegation enables a lawyer to render legal service more economically and efficiently.

In 2000, the Justice Department added an analogous disciplinary ground for practice before the former INS, immigration judges, and the BIA. It punishes anyone who “[a]ssists any person, other than a practitioner [who is authorized to practice in those forums], in the performance of activity that constitutes the unauthorized practice of law.” 8 CFR § 1003.102(m) (2008).

You are a third-year law student enrolled in your school’s clinical program. You have been placed in an office that handles immigration cases for low-income clients. The office handles a high volume of cases, and your personal case load is a heavy one. One of your tasks is to interview the client, fill out an intake sheet, and then, while the client is waiting, bring the intake sheet to your supervisor, a licensed attorney who reads the sheet and discusses the case with you. If there are no unusual problems, and if the next step in the case is to prepare a form for the client to submit to USCIS, the office procedure is that you fill out the form, make copies for the office files and the client, mail the forms and supporting documentation to USCIS, and provide the client any other necessary instruction, including whether and when the client should return to your office. Are you engaged in the unauthorized practice of law? Is the supervising attorney complying with his or her ethical duties?

Problem 3. Your client, X, is a licensed attorney who has been charged with violating INA § 274C(e). The facts are uncontested. X is an immigration lawyer. He helped prepare an I-130 visa petition for his United States citizen client, Y. Y was petitioning for immediate relative status on behalf of her noncitizen daughter. Y’s daughter in fact was 21 years old, but Y told X that Y’s daughter was only 19 (which would have qualified her as an immediate relative). Y gave X a forged birth certificate showing her daughter’s age as 19. X, unaware of the fraud, then filed the visa petition and the accompanying documents, including the forged birth certificate. Although the petition specifically asked for the name of the preparer, if any, X deliberately left that line blank. He told Y, “My name is mud right now with USCIS. I think you’re better off if they don’t know I’m your lawyer.” USCIS detected the forged birth certificate, and now X faces criminal prosecution and possible imprisonment.

As X’s attorney, what arguments might you make? Before answering, read carefully subsections (e) and (f) of INA § 274C.

D. VISA APPLICATIONS

With only a few narrow exceptions, noncitizens need visas to enter the United States. INA §§ 211(a), 212(a)(7)(A) (immigrants), 212(a)(7)(B)(i)(II) (nonimmigrants). The authority for issuing visas and the basic information the applicants must furnish are described in INA §§ 221 and 222.

One major exception is the visa waiver program. Under INA § 217, the Secretary of Homeland Security and the Secretary of State have jointly implemented a program under which nationals of countries that have historically low rates of visa refusals may enter the United States as tourists or business visitors for up to 90 days without having to procure visas. There are several other requirements. For example, the country must be one that agrees to extend reciprocal privileges to United States citizens; the individual must present a return ticket and must not be a safety threat; and various responsibilities are placed on the commercial carriers that transport non-visa passengers. The designated countries are listed in 8 CFR § 217.2(a) (2008). At this writing 35 countries are on the list; 29 of them are in Europe. See chapter 10.E.5 below.

While some had worried about the security implications of the visa waiver program even before September 11, the worries intensified after the events of that day. As debate raged over whether the trade and tourism benefits of the program outweighed its security risks, Congress responded with a series of measures designed to keep the program intact but tighten security. See chapter 10.E.5 below.

This section of the chapter will examine the visa process in more detail. See also James A.R. Nafziger, Review of Visa Denials by Consular Officers, 66 Washington L.Rev. 1, § IV.B (1991). If the type of visa the person is seeking requires preliminary steps, such as labor certification or USCIS approval of a visa petition or both, then the following discussion assumes those steps have been completed.

1 Charles Gordon, Stanley Mailman & Stephen Yale-Loehr, Immigration Law and Procedure

§ 8.04 (2004).

[1]—Comparison Between Nonimmigrant and Immigrant Visas, In General

While the procedures for processing nonimmigrant visas (NIVs) and immigrant visas (IVs) are similar, there are also basic differences that set them apart. In both instances, they are designed to screen the applicants to determine whether they are eligible for the status they seek. And in both, visa issuance provides a document that permits the applicant to obtain transportation to the United States and which satisfies the requirement for admission, subject to the [CBP] second check at inspection. Again in respect of both, the applicant is subject to qualitative grounds of exclusion, although not all of these apply to nonimmigrants, and some of the waiver provisions are not available to immigrants. * * *

* * *

The major practical difference between IVs and NIVs stems from the disparity in importance usually attributed to the two. Nonimmigrant visas are used for usually short periods of stay, immigrant visas for permanent residence, which often leads to citizenship. This factor largely accounts for the more detailed attention ordinarily given to immigrant visa applications. It is reflected, for example, in the application forms: a single, short one for nonimmigrants; several detailed questionnaires for immigrants. Moreover, while both are subjected to a computer check, an immigrant visa applicant must also produce police certificates from abroad and is put through extensive FBI and security clearances. Moreover, on-site checks to verify employment letters are more common for IVs than NIVs.

* * *

Finally, the difference in sheer volume of business is dramatic. * * * The need to service the large and widespread demand for NIVs, and to do so promptly, is why there are many more consular posts with NIV jurisdiction than for IV issuance. And at large posts that handle both types of visas, there is a separate queue for each in different areas.

The regulations make no reference to the representation of applicants by lawyers. Under Visa Office policy, and ordinarily in practice, such representation is honored and posts will communicate with designated counsel. Allowing counsel to be present at interviews, however, is a matter of consular discretion, and practice varies.

* * *

[2]—Nonimmigrant (Temporary)

An application for a nonimmigrant visa is usually made at the consular post abroad where the alien resides. [As a result of the Intelligence Reform and Terrorism Prevention Act of 2004, Pub. L. 108-458, 188 Stat. 3638, § 5301 (Dec. 17, 2004), adding INA § 222(h), with only limited exceptions every applicant for a nonimmigrant visa between ages 14 and 79 now requires an in-person interview with a consular officer.—Eds.]

Application is made on Form DS-156,¹² an innocuous-looking short form that asks all the right questions surrounding the purpose of an applicant's trip. Photographs are also needed, and such documents as the consul requests.

B-2 (tourist) visas are usually issued without the need for supporting documents. An E-1 (treaty trader) or E-2 (treaty investor) application, on the other hand, will clearly require extensive documentation to show that the substantive requirements are met. Even here, documentation may be minimized if the treaty company has the basic documentation on file with the consulate. For some visas, official documents must also be presented:

12. A copy of this form, completed by a fictional applicant for a student visa, appears on pages 796-97 below.—Eds.

for example, for the student (F-1), the school's I-20 form; for the exchange visitor (J-1), the program sponsor's form DS-2019.

Still other visas require the prior approval of a visa petition by [USCIS]. These are the temporary worker (H), intracompany transferee (L), fiance(e) (K), alien of extraordinary ability in the sciences, arts, education, business or athletics (O), and athlete or performing artist (P). Under DHS regulations, consuls have a larger role in the issuance of certain L visas under blanket petition approvals by USCIS. It should be stressed that even in respect of applications based on individual petitions, approval by USCIS does not guarantee issuance of the visa by the consul, who must determine the applicant's personal eligibility. The burden of proving eligibility is always on the applicant.

The key question is usually whether the applicant is a bona fide nonimmigrant, namely, seeking to enter the United States temporarily for the purpose contemplated by the requested category. The application will also be denied if the alien is qualitatively ineligible, for example, has been convicted of certain crimes, unless the disqualification can be, and is, waived.

The nonimmigrant visa is to be endorsed or inserted on a page of the passport or equivalent document and includes the date and place of issuance, the visa classification, the limited number of entries for which it is valid or the word "multiple," and the period of validity. In the case of classifications requiring a petition, the validity of the visa may not exceed the period of the petition approval by INS.

Note: There is no necessary relationship between the validity of the visa and the length of time for which the alien will be admitted to the United States. The admission period is set by the CBP inspector at the time of admission and is ordinarily limited only by the regulations and by the validity of the petition, if a petition is required.

[3]—Immigrant (Permanent)

* * *

Applications for immigrant visas are ordinarily to be made at the consular post abroad that services the applicant's residence. An alien living temporarily in the United States is considered to be a resident of the consular district of his or her last residence abroad. While no personal appearance need ordinarily be made at the consulate during the processing, at the end the applicant must physically attend the scheduled interview with the consul to secure the visa. The residence rule, even with its exceptions, is extremely problematic in cases where it is a hardship for aliens to return to their home country.

The regulation requires a consulate to accept an application from a nonresident applicant who is physically within the consular district, and expects to remain long enough in another country to process the visa. Consuls may, in their discretion, and must, at the direction of the Department, accept the cases of aliens who are neither residents of the consular district nor physically there. Moreover, consulates are encouraged to exercise their discretion in accepting cases that clearly involve hardships, but most, under severe budget constraints, are reluctant to do so.

* * *

Visa processing consists of a succession of “packets” sent by the consular office, containing information and questionnaires to be completed and returned by the applicant. If the applicant is successful, the processing culminates in an interview with a consul at which a formal application, Form OF-230 Parts I and II, is signed, and the visa issued on Form OF-155.

* * * [I]mmigrant visa petitions approved by USCIS are sent to the National Visa Center (NVC) in Portsmouth, New Hampshire. That center transmits the approval to the appropriate consular office and so notifies the alien beneficiary and any attorney of record, or simply the attorney, if there is one and the beneficiary is in the United States. The notice is accompanied by the initial packet.

* * *

Visa processing also includes government agency clearances to determine whether the applicant is excludable on criminal or subversive grounds, and requires the applicant to submit police certificates relating to previous residences outside the United States.

It is not until all of the preliminary inquiries are completed and a visa number allocated, if one is needed, that a medical examination and formal interview are scheduled, and the consul either issues or refuses the visa. A visa, if issued, is annexed to a signed copy of the formal application, Form OF-230 Parts I and II, and a copy of each document requested by the consul, and given to the immigrant for presentation to the CBP inspector at entry.

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. Once issued, a visa will be valid only for a limited time. An immigrant visa must be used (i.e., presented to a CBP inspector at a United States port of entry) within six months. INA § 221(c). For nonimmigrant visas, the validity periods vary by nonimmigrant category and by country of origin, according to State Department regulations. See 22 CFR § 41.112(b) (2008).

2. Why doesn't the law permit noncitizens to apply for visas at any U.S. consulate they wish (assuming the particular consulate issues the type of visas they seek)?

3. Attorneys do not usually accompany applicants to their visa interviews, and consular officers are generally not enthusiastic about attorneys' involvement. The State Department's Foreign Affairs Manual says that, if “the consular officer is reasonably satisfied that an attorney-client relationship exists, correspondence between the post and the attorney may [emphasis added] be treated with the same courtesy provided to the visa applicant.” 9 F.A.M. § 40.4 n.12 (2007). Why do you think the State Department is not excited about having attorneys present during the visa interviews?

4. As a practical matter, consular officers exercise a great deal of subjective discretion. A scandal at the United States consulate in Sao Paulo, Brazil exposed the dangers of those powers. The consulate engaged in explicit racial and economic stereotyping and fired an officer who refused to comply with the “profiles.” The officer sued and won reinstatement. See Olsen v. Albright, 990 F.Supp. 31 (D.D.C. 1997).

According to the manual issued by the consulate, “Officers sometimes use abbreviations on the [visa application forms]: RK = Rich Kid, LP= Looks Poor, TP = Talks Poor, LR = Looks Rough, TC = Take Care.” Some of the stated reasons for denying nonimmigrant visas included “Slimy looking[;] wears jacket on shoulders w/ earring,” “bad appearance,” “looks + talks poor.” 990 F.Supp. at 33. The manual also contained a passage headed “KOREAN/CHINESE FRAUD,” which said “Major fraud; hard to check. * * * Visas are rarely issued to these groups unless they have had previous visas and are older.” Id. The manual then listed certain Brazilian cities “known for fraud”—most of them with predominantly black populations—and cautioned that “anyone born in these locations is suspect unless older, well-traveled, etc.” Id. A separate memorandum distributed to all the U.S. consulates in Brazil instructed that “Arab and Chinese last names set off bells and whistles, regardless of what passport/nationality they may have. * * * Most Brazilians have no interest in [assuming a false identity], but Arabs and Chinese are two groups to worry about.” Id. at 34.

Apart from the economic and racial stereotyping, the dismissed officer’s superiors had told him “that he should spend approximately three minutes per interview and that he should attempt to achieve a thirty percent refusal rate. To achieve these goals, they said, Plaintiff should base his judgment on the profiles” [emphasis added]. Id. As the court noted, id. at 37, the law is otherwise: “[N]o person shall receive any preference or priority or be discriminated against in the issuance of an immigrant visa because of the person’s race, sex, nationality, place of birth, or place of residence [except as specifically provided by the INA].” INA § 202(a)(1)(A).

5. The Sao Paulo affair pre-dated the September 11, 2001 terrorist attacks. Since September 11, the visa process has come under heavy criticism from a different direction. There is a widely held perception that the visa process, beset by large volumes and little time for scrutiny of each individual application, is a point of great vulnerability. How the process can be substantially improved when approximately 13 million tourists alone received visas in 2007 (see page 356 above) is a major challenge for policymakers.

One move Congress made was to inject the new Department of Homeland Security into the visa process. While individual visa applications are still decided by the State Department’s consular officers at posts overseas,

HSA § 428 now charges the Secretary of Homeland Security with administering the visa issuance process, issuing regulations, and arranging for DHS officials to train consular officers and monitor their visa decisions for compliance with security needs. See 6 USC § 236(b)(1). In addition, personal interviews are now required in the vast majority of nonimmigrant cases (see above), new data gathering and data technologies are required (with particularly stringent requirements for student visas), and noncitizens from certain countries designated as harboring terrorists require scrutiny at higher levels of government. Further, when a visa is denied, the consular officer is now required to enter the relevant information into an electronic database. Later, if the same noncitizen files another visa application, the consular officer must review the information on the previous denial, document that he or she has reviewed that record, and, if inclined to grant the visa, explain why approval is now appropriate. HSA § 429, adding 6 USC § 237. For the details on these and other national security precautions imposed on the visa process, see chapter 10, sections E.1 through E.4 below

What if the consular officer refuses to issue the visa? Does the applicant have any recourse?

At present, despite the magnitudes of the individual interests often at stake, there is no administrative appeal, and no judicial review, of a consular decision denying an application for either an immigrant or a nonimmigrant visa. Some limited safeguards do exist. The State Department regulations require the principal consular officer at the particular post to review all refusals. 22 CFR §§ 41.121(c) (2008) (nonimmigrants), 42.81(c) (2008) (immigrants). And the Department may issue an “advisory” opinion. Id. §§ 41.121(d) (nonimmigrants), 42.81(d) (immigrants). If it does, its opinion binds the consulate on “an interpretation of law.” Id. On a question of fact or on “an application of the law to the facts,” the opinion is purely advisory; the consulate is free to reject the Department’s advice as long as it submits reasons for doing so. Id.

Beyond internal consular review and State Department advisory opinions, the statute arguably forbids, and in any event clearly does not require, the Secretary of State to provide for administrative appeals of visa denials. INA § 104(a) charges the Secretary of State with the administration and enforcement of all immigration laws “relating to (1) the powers, duties and functions of diplomatic and consular officers of the United States, *except those powers, duties and functions conferred upon the consular officers relating to the granting or refusal of visas; * * ” (emphasis added).¹³

13. Professor Nafziger has suggested that a reason for insulating the Secretary of State from visa decisions might have been to enable the Secretary “to disclaim responsibility for a politically delicate exclusion” when complaints are registered by foreign officials. James A.R. Nafziger, Review of Visa Denials by Consular Officers, 66 Washington L.Rev. 1, 24 (1991).

Further, under HSA § 428(b)(1), adding 6 USC § 236(a)(1), the Secretary of Homeland Security may not alter or reverse a consular officer's denial of a visa application (but may refuse a visa that the consular officer had approved). Judicial review, for more mysterious reasons that will be examined shortly, has also been held generally unavailable.

Over the years, a steady chorus of scholarly commentary has denounced this notion of "consular absolutism."¹⁴ In a legal system in which far less important agency adjudication is routinely subjected to both administrative and judicial review, consular absolutism is a striking phenomenon. What is keeping this doctrine afloat? The most authoritative study of consular nonreviewability to date is the thoughtful 1990 report by Professor James Nafziger for the Administrative Conference of the United States. The following passages, excerpted from a revised version of that Report, identify and evaluate some of the practical concerns that underlie the nonreviewability principle:

James A.R. Nafziger, Review of Visa Denials by Consular Officers

66 Washington L.Rev. 1, 53-63 (1991).

* * *

The judiciary is understandably skeptical about the weight to be given practical considerations when "fundamental rights are involved." Although "[p]rocedure by presumption is always cheaper and easier than individualized determination," administrative convenience by itself is not a persuasive justification for cutting the corners of individual claims. Practical considerations are, however, highly influential in shaping legislative or administrative reform.

* * *

Consular officers are well trained, representing one of the most carefully selected, career-groomed corps of government, the Foreign Service. Consular officers possess high levels of competence and morale. Most officers have had special training in the visa process and are familiar with the characteristics and idiosyncracies of the local culture. They generally have an experienced eye for fraud and chutzpah by applicants.

14. A sample includes Sam Bernsen, Consular Absolutism in Visa Cases, 63 IR 388 (1986); Charles Gordon, Recent Developments in Judicial Review of Immigration Cases, 15 San Diego L.Rev. 9, 16-17 (1977); Stephen H. Legomsky, Immigration and the Judiciary—Law and Politics in Britain and America 144-51 (1987); James A.R. Nafziger, Review of Visa Denials by Consular Officers, 66 Washington L.Rev. 1 (1991); Harry N. Rosenfield, Consular Non-Reviewability: A Case Study in Administrative Absolutism, 41 A.B.A.J. 1109 (1955); Leon Wildes, Consular Nonreviewability—A Reexamination, 64 IR 1012 (1987); see also Commission on Immigration Reform, Becoming an American: Immigration and Immigrant Policy at 175-83 (Sept. 1997) (advocating administrative review of selected visa denials, as well as judicial review, id. at 82).

On the other hand, to err is human and any exercise of discretion is potentially fallible. That is why the decisions of other agencies of government are subject to review despite their expertise. Consular interpretation of such terms as "public charges" and "reason to believe" are necessarily subjective, and guidelines are not always effective in promoting uniformity or consistency. To the extent that errors are avoidable, the prospect of review would also encourage accountability. It would encourage consular officers to maintain a high level of care and commitment to applying the law correctly. Few officers would relish reversal by an outsider.

More importantly, a belt-tightening budget restricts the scope and efficacy of consular expertise. Many consulates are so financially hard-pressed that they cannot devote much time and expert judgment to a single applicant. "Batching" or group processing of applications in the same class may be necessary. On-line interviews of applicants for nonimmigrant visas average a minute or less because of severe budget constraints that spread on-line officers very thinly. Officers have little time to carefully investigate documents and employment letters and may rely heavily on income, property, and other guidelines without undertaking a more effective, case-by-case appraisal of applicants. Similarly, supervising officers often do not have enough time to review each visa denial thoroughly. Spot checks or random samplings of denials are often the only alternative. Binding decisions on interpretations of the law by the Visa Office, congressional inquiries, and other intra-departmental processes of review, though important, are too sporadic to substitute for careful review within the consulate. Thus, budget constraints lead to a need for outside review. Internal review procedures are deficient, not because the working relationship between consular and reviewing officers is too cozy to ensure an objective review, but because too little time and money is available for a thorough review of all denials.

* * *

Efficient and effective management of the visa process would seem to require speed and finality, insulation of initial policymaking from judicial review, and uniformity or consistency of decisions. These normal considerations of public administration might appear to be especially significant in the specific context of consular activity because of possible foreign policy implications of visa decisions. It is questionable, however, whether the foreign dimension of consular decisions should routinely set them apart from other types of administrative decisions, such as domestic decisions to locate state penitentiaries or nuclear power plants on the Canadian or Mexican border. In any event, review of consular determinations simply applying the INA to the facts in a particular case would not seem to involve "an initial policy determination of a kind clearly for nonjudicial discretion." Nor is the need for a quick decision necessarily strong enough to overcome the need for a more deliberate, potentially correct decision. Delay of a final visa denial to allow for review is not likely to cause the kind of problem that delay of a more truly political decision, such as whether to suspend trade and tariff concessions, is apt to entail.

The need for uniformity or consistency of decisions justifies either greater regulatory control over consular discretion or review of consular decisions. Of these, the former might help alleviate the need for the latter.

* * *

* * *

The prospect of overburdening the State Department or clogging the courts has been cited as an important justification for non-reviewability. Today, perhaps, it is the major practical justification, and at least partially explains INA section 104's mysterious insulation of visa denials from supervision by the Secretary of State. It has been used to support an inference against judicial review drawn from that provision. The volume of appeals is, of course, a serious consideration. Consulates issue close to a million visa denials every year. It is difficult to estimate what percentage of denied applicants would take advantage of judicial review if it were available. At a time when the federal courts are already overburdened, authorizing judicial review of all visa denials would therefore be quite risky. On the other hand, barring all judicial review seems unnecessary to avoid court congestion. Any burden to the government could be controlled to a large extent by the standard of review selected.

Moreover, specialists have argued that the volume of appeals of visa denials would be small. Only a small proportion of denied applicants are likely to seek judicial review. Unlike deportation cases, where aliens already in the United States may have some incentive to file frivolous court actions to obtain delay, the visa applicant waiting to enter the United States has nothing to gain from delay. Further, financial costs are associated with judicial review, particularly when the alien must arrange for filing from abroad.

The likely demand for judicial review is reflected in the exclusion cases. In fiscal year 1984, for example, thousands of aliens were excluded at United States entry points. Yet, only twenty-seven aliens in that year exercised their statutory right to obtain judicial review of their exclusion orders, and only ten of these were non-asylum petitioners. Significantly, these petitioners had already traveled to the United States, often at great expense. Visa applicants would seem even less likely to have actions brought on their behalf in court.

If the burden on the judicial system were still deemed to be excessive, Congress might limit the categories of visas from whose denials appeal could be taken. Thus, only family reunification cases, national security cases, or cases where the applicant has a "real stake" or "high stake" in obtaining a visa might be reviewable. Gradual inclusion of nonimmigrant visa denials in a review process might begin with a pilot program involving a single class or two of visas, such as treaty trader and treaty investor visas. * * *

* * *

* * * A serious problem under present budgetary constraints is that the record available for either administrative or judicial appeal would be very limited. On-line consular officers must state reasons for visa denials, but often have too little time to record much more than a citation of authority for a denial, with perhaps a few scribbled words of factual explanation. Sometimes consular notations are scarcely legible. If the issue on appeal is whether an officer has applied the law to the facts, but that officer had too little time to write up the facts or to communicate them clearly and legibly, what can an administrative appeals board or court review? With more time and resources to create a clearer, more complete record for appeal, much of this problem would dissolve. Under present budgetary circumstances, it might be unfair to sustain an appeal on the basis of an inadequate record, and yet it also seems unfair to applicants to allow the characteristic inadequacy of a consular refusal sheet to inhibit a more adequate review process.

In evaluating the adequacy of the record of a visa denial, the credibility and demeanor of applicants are often determinative factors. Although administrative tribunals seldom defer to assessments of credibility by executive officials, such assessments play a particularly important role in the visa process; by definition, applicants are generally unable to appear in the United States. * * *

Voice recordings on cassette tape might substitute for the parsimonious and sometimes cryptic written records of consular adjudications. Such recordings, however, involve two problems. First, recording an adjudication could interfere with its integrity: the existence of the process itself might encourage both applicants and officers to rehearse and perform as they might not otherwise. Voice recordings do not, of course, convey live images, which are ordinarily critical in determinations of an applicant's credibility and demeanor. Videotapes would largely resolve this problem, but do not appear to be politically feasible at this time because of strong opposition by the consular corps.

* * *

The visa process necessarily relies on judgmental factors of an applicant's demeanor and credibility, as well as evolving circumstances in the local socio-economic environment. These factors argue for a relatively limited standard of review of consular discretion (as opposed to more objective issues of law and fact), such as whether a denial was "arbitrary, capricious, an abuse of discretion, or otherwise not in accordance with law."

* * *

Another type of cost is psychological, namely, the threat and perceived nuisance that review might present to already overburdened consular officers. Nobody likes to be overruled. Moreover, little love is lost between attorneys and consular officers. The aversion of some officers to further involvement of attorneys is understandable. Still, experienced foreign service officers have minimized the psychological cost and were openminded about the possibility of a modest formalization of the review process. They acknowledged that the guidance and encouragement of greater uniformity that review could provide might make their work easier.

From time to time various members of Congress have proposed legislation that would create, within the State Department, an administrative review board to hear appeals from designated categories of visa denials. See, e.g., H.R. 3305 (1993) (per Rep. Frank); S. 3202, § 3 (1969) (per Sen. Kennedy); H.R. 1156 (1999) (per Rep. Frank). The following bill, introduced unsuccessfully in 1987, is illustrative:

H.R. 2567

Rep. Gonzalez, 1987.

A BILL

To establish a Visa Review Board within the Department of State to review denials of certain visa applications.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, SECTION 1. VISA REVIEW BOARD.

(a) AMENDMENT TO INA.—Chapter 3 of title II of the Immigration and Nationality Act is amended by adding after section 224 the following new section:

“VISA REVIEW BOARD

“SEC. 225. (a)(1) There is hereby established, within the Department of State, a Visa Review Board (hereinafter referred to as the ‘Board’) which shall be composed of regular and ad hoc members to be appointed by the Secretary of State. Regular members shall serve on a full-time basis. Ad hoc members may be designated from among senior officers of the Department of State or from persons not employed by the Department. Members shall be attorneys in good standing admitted to practice in any State, or in any territory or possession of the United States.

“(2) In considering any appeal, the Board shall act through a panel of 3 members, not more than 2 of whom may be ad hoc members, and not more than 1 of whom may be a current consular officer.

“(3) The Board shall have authority, as provided in this section, to review the case of aliens specified under paragraph (4) who have been denied visas.

“(4) An alien referred to in paragraph (3) is an alien described as follows:

“(A) a special immigrant (as defined in section 101(a)(27));

“(B) an immediate relative (as defined in section 201(b));

“(C) an immigrant having a preference status under section 203(a) [now 203(a, b)—Eds.];

“(D) a nonimmigrant described in sections 101(a)(15)(F), 101(a)(15)(J), or 101(a)(15)(M), who is seeking to reenter the United States; or “(E) a nonimmigrant described in sections 101(a)(15)(E)(ii), 101(a)(15)(H), 101(a)(15)(K), or 101(a)(15)(L).

“(b)(1) Whenever a consular officer shall deny an immigrant or nonimmigrant visa to an alien described in subsection (a)(4), such consular officer shall inform such alien (and [the petitioner]) * * * of the provisions for review under this section.

“(2) The Board shall review each denial by a consular officer of an immigrant or nonimmigrant visa to an alien described in subsection (a)(4) upon the request of such alien, or of [the petitioner]. * * * Such request for review must be made in writing to the Board within 60 days after receipt of notice of the denial and may be accompanied by an affidavit, signed by such alien or by [the petitioner,] * * * setting forth any facts which have a bearing upon such alien’s eligibility for a visa.

“(c)(1) Upon receipt of any request for review under subsection (b), the Board shall, within 15 days, notify the consular officer with respect to whose decision a review is sought, and, upon receipt of such notice, such officer shall promptly (but in no event greater than 30 days after such receipt) forward to the Board a concise statement of the material facts upon which the denial of a visa was based.

“(2) The Board may, at any time after receiving a request for review under subsection (b), obtain from any consular officer such information, together with certified copies of such documents, reports, records, and other data, which are available to or obtainable by such officer, as the Board may deem necessary to properly review the case of any alien.

“(3) In reviewing the decision of a consular officer denying a visa to an alien, the Board shall hear testimony and receive evidence from (A) any official of the Government requesting the privilege to be heard with respect to a matter pending before the Board, and (B) the attorney or other designated representative of the alien * * * whose case the Board is reviewing, or the attorney or other designated representative of the [petitioner.] * * *

“(d)(1) In reviewing the decision of any consular officer denying a visa to an alien, the Board shall consider all the information before it with respect to such alien, and shall give due consideration to the reasons set forth by such officer for denial of a visa. To be effective, the decision of the Board must be concurred in by at least two members, and shall affirm, overrule, or remand, for further consideration, the decision of such officer.

“(2) If the Board overrules the decision of a consular officer with respect to the eligibility of an alien for a visa, such officer shall, upon notification by the Board, promptly cause the issuance of the visa to such alien which would have been issued to the alien if the visa had been approved.

“(e) Nothing contained in this section shall require the Board, or any officer or employee of the United States or any consular officer to make public disclosure of any confidential information the disclosure of which, in the opinion of the Board, such officer or employee, or such consular officer, as the case may be, would be prejudicial to the public interest, safety, or security.”

(b) REGULATIONS.—Within 120 days after the date of the enactment of this Act, the Secretary of State shall establish rules and regulations implementing the authority of the Visa Review Board established under section 225 of the Immigration and Nationality Act (as added by subsection (a)).

SIMULATION EXERCISE

(1) Assume that the House Judiciary Committee has reported out H.R. 2567 favorably and that the bill is now being debated on the House floor. You are a member of the House of Representatives and a supporter of the bill. Outline the points you would make in your speech.

(2) Assume you are opposed. Outline the points you would now make in your speech.

On the subject of administrative appeal, the principal debate has been at the policy level: Should a formal administrative review mechanism be created and, if so, what properties should it possess? Analogous policy questions surround judicial review as well, but the central question there, in contrast, has been one of statutory interpretation: Does the current statute require, permit, or prohibit judicial review of visa refusals?

Hermina Sague v. United States

United States District Court, District of Puerto Rico, 1976.
416 F.Supp. 217.

■ TORRUELLA, DISTRICT JUDGE.

On September 18, 1971 in France, * * * Plaintiff Berger, a citizen of the Republic of France, married * * * Plaintiff Sague, a citizen of the United States of America. Thereafter, on November 9, 1973, Plaintiff Berger applied for an immigration [sic] visa to the United States Consular Officer in France. His application was denied by said official pursuant to a decision that Plaintiff Berger was ineligible for a visa under INA § 212(a).

Plaintiffs contend that the denial of Plaintiff Berger's visa has deprived them of enjoying a family life together with Plaintiff Berger's relatives, who live within the territory of the United States, and has deprived both of them of rights, privileges and immunities guaranteed by the Constitution and Laws of the United States. Plaintiffs have thus filed an action pursuant to 42 USC § 1981 et seq., requesting that this Court declare unconstitutional the laws upon which Defendants relied to deny Plaintiff Berger's petition, and seek an order directing Defendants to grant a visa to Plaintiff Berger. Plaintiffs further claim monetary damages from Defendants.

Defendants have filed a Motion to Dismiss alleging that this Court lacks jurisdiction over the subject matter of this action in that the same is tantamount to a judicial review of the consular officer's decision to withhold the visa, a procedure which Defendants contend is not contemplated by any law.

We are forced to conclude that this contention is well taken.

The exclusion of aliens from within the territory of a nation is a fundamental act of sovereignty concomitant with the executive power to control the foreign affairs thereof. This exercise of executive power is promulgated exclusively through the representatives of said Branch of Government, without judicial intervention. Kleindienst v. Mandel, 408 U.S. 753, 92 S.Ct. 2576, 33 L.Ed.2d 683 (1972).

* * *

Congress has conferred upon consular officers the authority to issue visas to eligible immigrants under the provisions of the law, INA §§ 101(a)(9, 16), 221. It has been consistently held that the consular officer's decision to issue or withhold a visa is not subject, either to administrative or judicial review. U.S. ex rel. Ulrich v. Kellogg, 30 F.2d 984 (C.A.D.C., 1929), cert. den. 279 U.S. 868, 49 S.Ct. 482, 73 L.Ed. 1005 (1928); Licea-Gomez v. Pilliod, 193 F.Supp. 577, 582 (N.D.Ill., 1960); Burrafato v. United States Department of State, 523 F.2d 554 (C.A.2, 1975); Loza-Bedoya v. Immigration and Naturalization Service, 410 F.2d 343, 347 (9th Cir.1969); Kleindienst v. Mandel, supra.

Since 1929, in United States ex rel. Ulrich v. Kellogg, wherein a German citizen married to a United States citizen applied for a nonimmigrant visa to the United States consul in Berlin, it has been held that:

We are not able to find any provision of the immigration laws which provides for an official review of the action of the consular officer in such cases by a cabinet officer or other authority.

In the case of Licea-Gomez v. Pilliod, the plaintiff asked the Court to clarify his status in applying for an immigrant visa. The Court held:

To allow plaintiff a hearing and adjudication on his eligibility for citizenship would completely circumvent the provisions of the Immigration and Nationality Act of 1952 granting exclusively to consuls the right to issue visas. Such a hearing would mean that everyone denied a visa by a consul could present himself at a border without a visa and get an adjudication on his status under any of the various exclusionary provisions of INA § 212. Then after such a declaration, if favorable, he could reapply to the consul. This is certainly not what Congress intended in the statute, and the Court cannot here undermine the statutory scheme and allow plaintiff by this proceeding, to review the consul's action.

In the case of Loza-Bedoya v. Immigration and Naturalization Service, cited by both parties, the petitioner asked for a visa in Mexico which was denied based upon erroneous information in his records. He sought to correct that information through a motion to reopen his deportation case. The Court did find the error in the records which excluded petitioner from obtaining the visa, but held:

Though erroneous this Court is without jurisdiction to order an American consular official to issue a visa to any alien whether excludable or not.

* * *

Plaintiff Berger is not within the territory of the United States.

In Brownell v. Thom [sic—Tom] We Shung, the Supreme Court held that exclusion orders may be challenged either by habeas corpus or by declaratory judgment action. * * * Nevertheless, the Supreme Court noted:

We do not suggest, of course, that an alien who has never presented himself at the borders of this country may avail himself of the declaratory judgment action by bringing the action from abroad.

The Court further cited Senate Report Number 1137, 82d Cong., 2d Sess., as follows:

Exclusion procedures . . . The omission of the language is not intended to grant any review of determinations made by consular officers . . .

Additionally, in the legislative history of the Immigration and Nationality Act, we find further support for Defendant's contention:

Consular decisions.—Although many suggestions were made to the committee with a view toward creating in the Department of State a semijudicial board, similar to the Board of Immigration Appeals, with jurisdiction to review consular decisions pertaining to the granting or refusal of visas, the committee does not feel that such body should be created by legislative enactment, nor that the power, duties and junctions [sic] conferred upon consular officers by the instant bill should be made subject to review by the Secretary of State.

(House Report No. 1365, 82nd Congress, 2d Session), 1952.

* * *

Plaintiff Sague contends that as a citizen of the United States, married to an alien to whom a visa has been denied, she has been deprived of her right to live within the territory of the United States with her husband and her family. However plausible this argument may seem, there is no constitutional right of a citizen spouse, who voluntarily chooses to marry an alien outside the jurisdiction of the United States, to have her alien spouse enter the United States. No citizen can, by the individual action of contracting matrimony in a foreign jurisdiction with an alien, deprive the United States of as fundamental an act of sovereignty as is the determination of what aliens may enter its territory.

* * *

In the case at bar, Plaintiff Berger, an alien, was denied a visa to enter the United States by the consular officer in France. He is not within the territorial jurisdiction of the United States. He has not been the subject of an exclusion or deportation proceeding. He seeks review of the consul's determination. As the Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit held in the case of United States ex rel. London v. Phelps, * * *

Whether the consul has acted reasonably or unreasonably, is not for us to determine. Unjustifiable refusal to visé a passport may be ground for diplomatic complaint by the nation whose subject has been discriminated against . . . It is beyond the jurisdiction of the court.

* * *

Therefore, this Court concludes that it lacks jurisdiction to entertain this petition.

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. The doctrine that consular decisions denying visas are not subject to judicial review originated with a pair of appellate court decisions handed down in the 1920's: United States ex rel. London v. Phelps, 22 F.2d 288 (2d Cir.1927) and United States ex rel. Ulrich v. Kellogg, 30 F.2d 984 (D.C.Cir. 1929). Those two opinions together provided three rationales that form the basis for most of the modern decisions. The court in London, without elaborating, held it lacked "jurisdiction" to review the denial of a visa. London, 22 F.2d at 290. In Ulrich, the court actually addressed and rejected on the merits the plaintiff's argument that the consular officer had erred. Ulrich, 30 F.2d at 985-86. After doing so, however, the court made two observations that have found their way into the modern cases. Citing the Immigration Act of 1924, the court said "the authority to issue a visa is committed to 'consular' officers" (emphasis added). Id. at 986. (The actual wording of the cited provision was that a "consular officer * * * may [under specified conditions] issue" a visa. Act of May 26, 1924, ch. 190, § 2(a), 43 Stat. 153). Second, the court said: "We are not able to find any provision of the immigration laws which provides for an official review of the action of the consular officers in such case by a cabinet officer or other authority." Ulrich, 30 F.2d at 986.

Thus, three themes—a lack of jurisdiction, the absence of a statutory provision that affirmatively authorizes review, and the “committing” of the visa-issuing authority to the consular officers—emerge from the early cases. Stephen H. Legomsky, Immigration and the Judiciary—Law and Politics in Britain and America 144–51 (1987). The notes that follow will explore those three themes and some miscellaneous others.

2. The court in Hermina Sague accepts the government’s argument that there is no “jurisdiction over the subject matter.” Later in the opinion the court quotes with approval the language in London disclaiming “jurisdiction.” Whatever merit that unexplained conclusion might have commanded in 1927, when London was decided, it was baffling at the time Hermina Sague was decided and it is baffling today. INA § 279, which was part of the original 1952 Act and thus was in force at the time of Hermina Sague, then read: “The district courts of the United States shall have jurisdiction of all causes, civil and criminal, arising under any of the provisions of this title” [title II]. The present issues arose under Title II. INA §§ 221 and 222 (both within title II) lay out the general procedures to be followed by visa applicants and consular officers. INA § 221(a) specifically authorizes the consular officer to issue visas, and INA § 221(g) forbids visa issuance to anyone who is ineligible under section 212(a) or other provisions of law. INA § 212(a), which you have already studied, is also within title II. It sets out the substantive grounds for denying visas. If there was an ambiguity in INA § 279, it is not apparent.

Today the analysis would change. In IIRIRA § 381, Congress restricted the use of INA § 279. It now applies only to suits brought by the government; private plaintiffs can no longer invoke section 279 as a basis for federal jurisdiction.

But a broader grant of federal jurisdiction still exists. Under 28 USC § 1331 (think back to your civil procedure course), the district courts “have original jurisdiction of all civil actions arising under the Constitution, laws, or treaties of the United States.” At the time Hermina Sague was decided, this provision also required that the amount in controversy exceed $10,000. Given that limitation, INA § 279 was necessary if the courts were to have jurisdiction to review the myriad of immigration decisions that the statute and regulations authorized. For the same reason, outside the realm of immigration, Congress enacted statutes conferring federal jurisdiction over a range of cases presenting other specific issues of federal law. But in 1976, Congress eliminated the amount-in-controversy requirement for actions against the federal government, Pub.L. 94–574, § 2, 90 Stat. 2721 (Oct. 21, 1976), and in 1980 Congress abolished the requirement entirely, Pub.L. 96–486, § 2(a), 94 Stat. 2369 (Dec. 1, 1980). As a result, the federal courts obtained jurisdiction over all cases that present questions of federal law. Statutory grants of jurisdiction over specific federal subject matter (like section 279) thus became superfluous.

To summarize: At the time of Hermina Sague, 28 USC § 1331 (general federal question jurisdiction), which then required a minimum amount in controversy, probably did not apply, but INA § 279 seemed right on point.

Today, the reverse is true: Section 279 is now inapplicable because the plaintiffs are private parties, but general federal question jurisdiction, shorn of its amount-in-controversy requirement, seems directly on point. (There is, however, one other wrinkle, which you will see in question 3(e) below.)

Perhaps the court thought that the applicant's absence from the United States destroyed the court's jurisdiction. Yet courts have long asserted the jurisdiction to review orders excluding noncitizens at ports of entry, see pre-1996 version of INA § 106(b) and present INA § 242(a), even though, as you have seen, noncitizens at ports of entry are similarly regarded as being outside the United States. For purposes of territorial jurisdiction, should visa denials be treated differently?

3. One of the rationales in Ulrich was that no statutory provision affirmatively authorized review of visa denials. The court in Hermina Sague quotes that rationale with approval. Since 1946, however, the Administrative Procedure Act (APA) has presumed reviewability: “[F]inal agency action for which there is no other adequate remedy in a court [is] subject to judicial review.” 5 USC § 704. That provision applies “except to the extent that (1) statutes preclude judicial review; or (2) agency action is committed to agency discretion by law.” Id. § 701(a). The Supreme Court has repeatedly interpreted that language as requiring judicial review unless there is “clear and convincing evidence” of a contrary congressional intent. See, e.g., Abbott Laboratories v. Gardner, 387 U.S. 136, 141, 87 S.Ct. 1507, 1511, 18 L.Ed.2d 681, 687 (1967).

In Hermina Sague was there clear and convincing evidence of a congressional intent to preclude judicial review of visa denials? On the one hand, INA § 279 (in the form in which it appeared at the time of Hermina Sague) and general federal question jurisdiction today, seem to provide affirmatively for such review. On the other hand:

a. For the proposition that visa denials are “not subject to either administrative or judicial review” (emphasis added), one court has cited INA § 221(a). See Loza-Bedoya v. INS, 410 F.2d 343, 347 (9th Cir.1969), where, as noted in Hermina Sague, the court acknowledged that the visa had been denied on legally erroneous grounds but disavowed any power to intervene. Does INA § 221(a) support that position?

b. In Licea-Gomez v. Pilliod, 193 F.Supp. 577 (N.D.Ill. 1960), the court similarly refused to review, saying “[A] consul’s decision to withhold a visa is not reviewable, not even by the Secretary of State” (citing INA §§ 104(a) and 221, Ulrich, and one other case). “This is what Congress has provided,” the court added. You have already reviewed section 221. Does section 104(a) support the court’s position that there is no judicial review of visa denials?

c. Some courts have cited legislative history that they have read as evidencing an intent to bar judicial review. The court in Hermina Sague, for example, quotes a passage from House Report No. 1365, prepared in connection with the 1952 Act. Does the quoted passage shed any light on Congress's intentions concerning judicial review?

d. Unlike the preceding evidence, the excerpt the court cites from Senate Report No. 1137 needs to be taken seriously. The full passage is reproduced in Tom We Shung, 352 U.S. at 185 n. 6, 77 S.Ct. at 256 n. 6, 1 L.Ed.2d at 230 n. 6 (1956). Prior bills, which the Report cites, would have imposed various restrictions on the scope of judicial review of what were then called exclusion orders (i.e., orders refusing admission at ports of entry). In contrast, the bill that Senate Report 1137 was accompanying (soon to become the INA) omitted those particular restrictions. The portion of the Report reproduced in Hermina Sague cautioned that the omissions were "not intended to grant any review of determinations made by consular officers * * *." Is this "clear and convincing" evidence of a congressional intent to preclude judicial review of visa denials?

e. Could the government argue today that, by amending INA § 279 to make it unavailable to private plaintiffs (see item 2 above), Congress in 1996 implicitly precluded the use of general federal question jurisdiction to challenge immigration decisions? As the government attorney, what points might you make in support of that position? As the visa applicant's attorney, how would you respond? Before answering the latter question, you should (a) read INA § 279 in full; and (b) note the conference committee's explanation of its amendment to section 279. The explanation reads, in full:

This section clarifies that the grant of jurisdiction under section 279 of the INA is to permit the Government to institute lawsuits for enforcement of provisions of the INA, not for private parties to sue the Government. This has no effect on other statutory or constitutional grounds for private suits against the Government.

Congressional Record at H-10901, § 381 (Sept. 24, 1996).

4. There is some indication that the court in Ulrich was also influenced by the breadth of the consular officers' discretion in adjudicating visa applications. The power was, the court said, "committed" to consular officers. Ulrich, 30 F.2d at 986. Today the word "committed" has statutory significance. As noted in item 3 above, the APA exempts an agency decision from judicial review not only when a statute precludes review (already discussed), but also when the "agency action is committed to agency discretion by law." 5 USC § 701(a). The phrase "committed to agency discretion" clearly means more than that the decision is discretionary; otherwise, the APA provision permitting courts to set aside agency action found to be an "abuse of discretion," 5 USC § 706(2)(A), would be meaningless. But precisely when action will be held "committed" to agency discretion is difficult to predict. In Heckler v. Chaney, 470 U.S. 821, 830, 105 S.Ct. 1649, 1655, 84 L.Ed.2d 714, 723 (1985), the Supreme Court interpreted that exception to apply when "a court would have no meaningful standard against which to judge the agency's exercise of discretion." The State Department regulations provide:

A visa can be refused only upon a ground specifically set out in the law or implementing regulations. The term “reason to believe,” as used in INA § 221(g), shall be considered to require a determination based upon facts or circumstances which would lead a reasonable person to conclude that the applicant is ineligible to receive a visa * * *.

22 CFR § 40.6 (2008). Combining what you already knew about the statutory exclusion grounds with what you just read concerning the meaning of “committed to agency discretion by law” and the authority of consular officers to deny visas, do you think visa decisions are “committed” to agency discretion by law?

Note: As you will see in section B.6 of chapter 9 below, Congress in 1996 barred courts from reviewing certain administrative decisions that the statute specifies to be discretionary. INA § 242(a)(2)(B)(ii). The REAL ID Act of 2005, § 101(f)(2), clarifies that that bar is not limited to removal proceedings. Nonetheless, since visa decisions require findings of fact and interpretations of law (rather than the exercise of statutory discretion), section 242(a)(2)(B)(ii) seems inapplicable here.

5. 6 USC § 236(f) now provides that “[n]othing in this section [which deals generally with visa issuance] shall be construed to create or authorize a private right of action to challenge” a visa grant or denial. Does that provision bear on whether visa denials are judicially reviewable?

6. How do the explicit racial profiling and other improper criteria employed in Sao Paulo (see pages 485–86 above), together with at least the possibility of more subtle practices in other United States consulates, affect the present issue? Are these practices an argument for or against review of visa denials?

7. Apart from the basic themes traceable to London and Ulrich, some courts have cited the plenary congressional power over immigration as a basis for holding visa denials unreviewable. See, e.g., Pena v. Kissinger, 409 F.Supp. 1182 (S.D.N.Y.1976), followed in Rivera de Gomez v. Kissinger, 534 F.2d 518 (2d Cir.1976). In Hermina Sague, a complication was that the underlying substantive argument was a constitutional one. The plenary power doctrine that you studied in chapter 2 would probably have prevented the plaintiffs from succeeding even if the court had held visa denials otherwise reviewable. (In fact, despite its conclusion that visa denials are unreviewable, the court seems to reject the constitutional argument on the merits.) In most of the reported visa denial cases, however, the alleged errors have concerned either the interpretation of the statutory inadmissibility ground or the application of the statutory language to the facts. In those cases, does the plenary power doctrine aid the analysis of whether visa denials are reviewable?

8. Another tricky problem in visa denial cases is “standing.” It is sometimes said that a nonresident noncitizen outside the United States lacks standing to sue in a United States court. See, e.g., Berlin Democratic Club v. Rumsfeld, 410 F.Supp. 144, 152 (D.D.C.1976). That rule is not airtight, and in addition a court will sometimes recognize the standing of a United States citizen who is adversely affected by a decision concerning a noncitizen overseas. See generally Nafziger, above, at 60.

9. The principle of consular nonreviewability has become sufficiently entrenched that courts are frequently content simply to cite other court decisions that have declined to review, without seriously examining the source or legitimacy of the nonreviewability principle. See, e.g., Burrafato v. United States Dept. of State, 523 F.2d 554, 555–56 n. 2 (2d Cir.1975) (citing London). One commonly mis-cited case is Kleindienst v. Mandel, discussed for its constitutional significance on pages 193–94 above. The Supreme Court in that case arguably was not being asked to review the consular visa denial, but rather to review the Attorney General's refusal to grant a waiver that would eventually have permitted the consul to issue a visa. At any rate, as others have pointed out, see Nafziger, above, at 32–34, the Court in Mandel did actually review the challenged decision, however characterized; only the standard of review (“facially legitimate and bona fide reason”) was deferential. And it remains unclear whether even that component of the Court's deference could be attributed to the fact that the challenged decision was (arguably) a visa denial, rather than to the fact that the particular challenge entailed a constitutional attack on the statute. Id.

10. In Saavedra Bruno v. Albright, 197 F.3d 1153 (D.C. Cir. 1999), the nation's leading court of appeals on matters of administrative law gathered up a combination of these arguments to uphold the principle of consular absolutism. The dominant themes were deeply imbedded precedent, the plenary power doctrine, the assumed absence of congressional authorization (the court did not explain why general federal question jurisdiction did not apply), and the need to protect national security. The court also added one new element. It noted that, starting in 1961, habeas corpus was the only vehicle for challenging an exclusion order (i.e., an order removing a noncitizen at a port of entry). Assuming that habeas would be unavailable in the absence of custody, the court concluded that exclusion orders were therefore unreviewable if the noncitizen was not in custody. Assuming further that Congress could not have meant to give noncitizens who had not yet even reached ports of entry (i.e., those who had been denied visas) greater review rights than those who were excluded at the border, the court concluded that Congress must therefore have intended to make visa denials unreviewable. The court was apparently unaware that in 1996 Congress had repealed the provision on which this argument rested. As you will see in chapter 9, Congress replaced habeas with the petition for review in the court of appeals as the vehicle for obtaining judicial review of exclusion orders (now called removal orders). INA § 242(a)(1) (except for the special expedited removal procedure, discussed below). And petitions for review do not require custody. Thus, the anomaly that the court thought consular absolutism prevented had ceased to exist.

11. Whatever one's opinion of the reasons courts have invoked for holding visa denials unreviewable, the fact is that the results have now been generally uniform over time. At this point, do you think Congress can be said to have acquiesced in those decisions?

12. Notwithstanding what has been said up to this point, a handful of courts have found ways around the principle of consular nonreviewability in sympathetic cases. See, e.g., Abourezk v. Reagan, 785 F.2d 1043, 1050–52 & n. 6 (D.C.Cir.1986) (United States citizen plaintiffs had standing to obtain review of State Department officials’—not consular officers’—decisions to refuse visas), aff’d per curiam by 3–3 vote, 484 U.S. 1, 108 S.Ct. 252, 98 L.Ed.2d 1 (1987); cf. Shimizu v. Department of State, No. CV–89–2741–WMB (C.D.Cal.1990) (reviewing revocation of visa outside United States, and expressly distinguishing visa denials).

In Legal Assistance for Vietnamese Asylum Seekers v. Dept. of State, 45 F.3d 469 (D.C. Cir. 1995), the court by a 2–1 vote reviewed on the merits the policy of the U.S. embassy in Hong Kong not to process Vietnamese visa applications. The court went on to hold the policy violative of a statutory prohibition on nationality discrimination. IIRIRA § 633, however, then amended INA § 202(a)(1) to expand the authority of the Secretary of State to determine the procedures and locations for processing immigrant visa applications. The Supreme Court vacated the court of appeals decision and remanded for further consideration in the light of IIRIRA. 519 U.S. 1, 117 S.Ct. 378, 136 L.Ed.2d 1 (1996).

The decision in Abourezk is especially significant, since the Court of Appeals for the D.C. Circuit—without mentioning its prior decision in Ulrich—founded subject matter jurisdiction on both 28 USC § 1331 (general federal question) and INA § 279. See 785 F.2d at 1050; see generally Katherine L. Vaughns, A Tale of Two Opinions: The Meaning of Statutes and the Nature of Judicial Decision-Making in the Administrative Context, 1995 Brigham Young Univ. L. Rev. 139 (criticizing both the majority and dissenting opinions in Abourezk as too result-oriented).

13. When the U.S. consulate in Tel Aviv denied visas to a married couple, the two spouses both attempted to challenge the denials in an Israeli court. That court too declined jurisdiction, on grounds of sovereign immunity. Aronson v. United States, Civ. Action 073998/04 (Mag. Ct. Tel Aviv, Apr. 26, 2006).

14. The European nations typically allow judicial review of visa denials. See Bryan Paul Christian, Visa Policy, Inspection and Exit Controls: Transatlantic Perspectives on Migration Management, 14 Georgetown Immigration L.J. 215, 222–23 (1999).

15. As a policy matter, the pros and cons of judicial review of agency action generally resemble those you encountered earlier in connection with administrative review, though with a few important differences. See Stephen H. Legomsky, Immigration and the Judiciary—Law and Politics in Britain and America 273–98 (1987). The practical consequences of judicial review are difficult to predict. For a welcome and much needed empirical assessment of those effects, see Peter H. Schuck & E. Donald Elliott, Studying Administrative Law: A Methodology for, and Report on, New Empirical Research, 42 Administrative L.Rev. 519 (1990).

E. ACTUAL ADMISSION

1. AT THE BORDER

Upon arriving at United States ports of entry,¹⁵ travelers encounter CBP immigration inspectors. The job of the immigration inspector is to determine whether the traveler is a United States citizen and, if not, whether any of the inadmissibility grounds enumerated in INA § 212(a) appear to apply. In practice, as noted earlier, this border inspection is ordinarily superficial. The noncitizen passenger either has a proper entry document (typically a visa or, for a returning resident, a green card), in which case he or she has already undergone rigorous screening, or lacks a proper entry document, in which case he or she will generally be inadmissible on that ground alone unless entering under the visa waiver program. See INA § 212(a)(7).

New security precautions devised in the wake of September 11, however, make the process more rigorous than in former times. Starting January 1, 2004, all nonimmigrant visitors are fingerprinted and digitally photographed, and their travel documents are scanned. These and other new national security border initiatives are detailed in chapter 10, section B.3 below. Other border enhancement strategies, most of which are aimed at immigration enforcement generally rather than at national security specifically, are covered in chapter 12.

At a typical airport, seaport, or land border, travelers present their papers to immigration inspectors who perform “primary inspection”—for most people, a quick process that entails scanning the passport (and visa, if there is one) and checking a “lookout” list on the computer. If there are doubts or complications, the person is referred to a “secondary inspections” area for more intensive scrutiny.

As a result of 1996 amendments, immigration officers at ports of entry may remove certain arriving noncitizens through a special process known as “expedited removal.” This procedure is described in subsection E.4 below. When the regular process applies, however, the immigration officer decides whether the noncitizen is “clearly and beyond a doubt entitled to be admitted.” If so, then the person is admitted; if not, then he or she “shall be detained” for a removal proceeding. INA § 235(b)(2)(A). The “shall be detained” language does not literally require detention in all cases; other statutory provisions give the Secretary of Homeland Security the discretion to “parole” a noncitizen into the United States temporarily for emergent reasons, subject to some constraints in the case of certain

15. The inspection procedure described in this section ordinarily takes place on United States soil. Passengers departing from certain countries undergo “preinspection” at overseas airports. 8 CFR § 235.5 (2008).

individuals who are removable on criminal or national security grounds. See INA §§ 212(d)(5), 236.

2. HEARINGS BEFORE IMMIGRATION JUDGES¹⁶

At one time, the INA referred to “exclusion” hearings. IIRIRA renamed them “removal” hearings. Despite what you might have assumed, only a small proportion of those arriving passengers whom the immigration officers refuse to admit actually exercise their statutory right to a hearing. The vast majority simply give up and go home. Why? A large part of the answer is the new expedited removal procedure, described below. In addition, many are unwilling to accept detention. Some, not being represented by counsel, might feel intimidated. And some might want to avoid a formal removal order, which would bar future admission for up to five years (longer for second removals and for aggravated felons). INA § 212(a)(9)(A). The Secretary of Homeland Security has the discretion to permit such noncitizens to withdraw their applications for admission and depart immediately. INA § 235(a)(4). This discretion is a mixed blessing. Immigration inspectors can use this power compassionately, to enable individuals to avoid the bar on future readmission, but at least one study suggests that immigration inspectors often pressure noncitizens to withdraw their applications in order to fit the schedules of the relevant airlines and reduce the officers’ paperwork. Janet A. Gilboy, Implications of “Third-Party” Involvement in Enforcement: The INS, Illegal Travelers, and International Airlines, 31 L. & Society Rev. 505 (1997).

A removal proceeding formally begins when ICE files, in the immigration court, a document called a “Notice to Appear.” 8 CFR §§ 1003.14(a), 1003.15 (2008). It specifies the time and place of the hearing, the alleged facts and charged inadmissibility grounds, and the individual’s procedural rights. INA § 239(a). To afford the person at least some opportunity to secure counsel, the hearing may not start until ten days after service of the Notice to Appear, unless the noncitizen requests an earlier date. INA § 239(b)(1). If he or she is unable to procure counsel within ten days, the hearing may proceed without counsel. INA § 239(b)(3).

In a removal proceeding the opposing parties are the noncitizen and ICE. The immigration judges, until 1983 employees of the former INS, are today formally independent of the immigration agencies. They are part of the Justice Department’s Executive Office for Immigration Review. See 8 CFR § 1003.10 (2008); see also INA § 101(b)(4).

The procedures followed in removal hearings are contained in INA § 240 and in the “Rules of Procedure for Immigration Judge Proceedings,” which appear in 8 CFR §§ 1003.12–1003.47 (2008). Although the formal rules of evidence do not apply, removal hearings are solemn affairs in which both parties are commonly represented by counsel. The hearings are 16. The term is defined in INA title “special inquiry officers.” § 101(b)(4). Before 1996, the INA used the recorded verbatim, and formal records are maintained. Id. §§ 1003.28, 1003.36.

INA § 291 has always made clear that an arriving noncitizen bears the burden of proving admissibility. Before IIRIRA, however, the INA did not specify the standard of proof that the immigration judge was supposed to apply at the exclusion hearing. IIRIRA § 304, in creating new INA § 240, appears to address that issue. According to INA § 240(c)(2)(A), an applicant for admission must now prove he or she “is clearly and beyond doubt entitled to be admitted and is not inadmissible under section 212.” If interpreted literally, that amendment is quite far-reaching. It is one thing to require an immigration officer to refer the person for a hearing upon finding that he or she is not “clearly and beyond doubt” entitled to be admitted. It is another to insist on such a showing as a requirement for prevailing at the hearing. This test, on its face, seems tantamount to a reverse “beyond a reasonable doubt” test. (Actually it seems even stronger, because not even a “reasonable” doubt is permitted.)

One possible ameliorating interpretation¹⁷ arises from an ambiguity in the language quoted above. Does the phrase “clearly and beyond doubt” modify only the words “entitled to be admitted,” or does it also modify the succeeding words “and is not inadmissible?” Note that the word “is” appears twice. Literally, the statute requires the noncitizen to prove that he or she (a) “is clearly and beyond doubt entitled to be admitted” and (b) “is not inadmissible.” But what’s the difference between “entitled to enter” and “not inadmissible,” anyway? The latter refers explicitly to the inadmissibility grounds laid out in INA § 212. Perhaps the former phrase refers only to the person’s need to qualify affirmatively under one of the quota-exempt or preference categories—family, employment, or diversity. Under that interpretation, the noncitizen would have to prove his or her affirmative credentials clearly and beyond doubt and would have to prove by some unspecified standard (as was true before IIRIRA) that none of the inadmissibility grounds applies.

You have seen that, as a result of IIRIRA, noncitizens who are alleged to be present in the United States without having been admitted (formerly described as entry without inspection) are regarded as applicants for admission. This means they must establish either that they are admissible or that they in fact have been lawfully admitted. Under INA § 240(c)(2)(B), the noncitizen must make the latter showing by “clear and convincing evidence.”

Obtaining counsel for removal hearings is not always easy. Many noncitizens who seek admission cannot afford to pay for counsel. Some legal services organizations provide free representation to noncitizens, but those that receive funding from the Legal Services Corporation are prohibited from representing most categories of noncitizens. See pages 665–66 below. And, although the Equal Access to Justice Act (EAJA) has been interpreted as allowing attorney fee awards to the prevailing parties in certain kinds of immigration-related administrative proceedings, see page 667 below, removal proceedings are not among them. See Matter of Saa, No. A28 852 512 (BIA, May 12, 1989) and Matter of Shaker, No. A27 560 431 (BIA, May 12, 1989), both digested in 66 IR at 656 (1989).

17. The authors thank Gerald Neuman for spotting this distinction.

3. APPEALS FROM IMMIGRATION JUDGE DECISIONS

The regulations authorize either the noncitizen or ICE to appeal to the Board of Immigration Appeals (BIA) from an adverse decision of the immigration judge in removal proceedings. 8 CFR § 1003.1(b)(1, 3) (2008). The BIA, as noted earlier, is part of the Attorney General's Executive Office for Immigration Review. You will see a more detailed description of BIA procedure in chapter 9, § B.4 below.

Until IIRIRA, the usual procedure for obtaining judicial review of an administratively final exclusion order was to apply for habeas corpus in federal district court. INA § 106(b) (pre-IIRIRA version). Now the general rule is that judicial review of a removal order—whether for inadmissibility or deportability—is by petition for review filed directly in the court of appeals. INA § 242(a)(1). There are, however, several exceptions to the reviewability of removal and removal-related decisions. These exceptions, and other details of the review process, are discussed in section E.4 and chapter 9 below.

4. EXPEDITED REMOVAL

In 1993, the television show “60 Minutes” reported that large numbers of noncitizens were arriving at New York's JFK Airport without documents and claiming asylum. Because there was not enough detention space to hold them pending the exclusion hearings to which they were then entitled, the documentary reported, these individuals were going underground. The media had a field day.¹⁸

Several bills were introduced in Congress to cure this problem through an abbreviated procedure known generically as “summary exclusion.” Because the various summary exclusion provisions were typically included in more sweeping immigration reform bills that bogged down for other reasons, it took three years for summary exclusion to become law (by which time the former INS had essentially solved the JFK problem by expanding the detention facilities). Under the name “expedited removal,” summary exclusion was resuscitated in 1996 by AEDPA § 422 and promptly amended by IIRIRA § 302(a). The amended version now appears as INA § 235(b)(1). It applies whenever the immigration officer at the border “determines” that an arriving noncitizen is inadmissible under either section 212(a)(6)(C) (fraud) or section 212(a)(7) (lack of proper documents). INA § 235(b)(1)(A)(i). One important qualification, considered in more detail in chapter 11, § B.7.b.iv below, is that noncitizens who indicate a fear of persecution or an intention to apply for asylum receive screening interviews. The purpose of those interviews is to determine whether their cases are strong enough to warrant providing the regular asylum procedures that you will study in chapter 11. INA § 235(b)(1)(A)(i, ii).

18. See, e.g., David Cole, Legal Times, Tribune, May 22, 1993, at A-8; Atlanta J. & Dec. 27, 1993, at 26; David Crosland, Wash. Post, Aug. 8, 1993 at C-7; San Diego Union-Const., Mar. 30, 1993, at 12.

Except for asylum claimants, here is how the expedited removal procedure works: Once the immigration inspector concludes that an arriving noncitizen is inadmissible under either of the two listed grounds, the person is ordered removed without further hearing. INA § 235(b)(1)(A)(i). There is no administrative appeal, except for returning LPRs, admitted refugees, and people who have already received asylum. INA § 235(b)(1)(C). Subject to the same exceptions, there is no judicial review with respect to either admissibility or relief from removal. INA § 242(e)(5). The only permissible judicial review of expedited removals is on the issues of whether the person is a citizen, whether the person was in fact ordered removed, and whether the person comes within one of the above exceptions (LPRs, refugees, and asylees). INA § 242(e)(2). The statute even purports to bar constitutional challenges to the statute and accompanying regulations (beginning 60 days after the statute took effect). INA § 242(e)(3). Whether Congress can constitutionally bar judicial review of removal decisions, especially when the challenge is to the constitutionality of the statute itself, is not clear. See chapter 9, § B.6.b below.

Debates over both the effectiveness and the fairness of expedited removal are volatile, and the verdict is still out. Most observers agree there are both benefits and dangers, but there is much debate over which predominate and about ways to improve the process. Does expedited removal discourage illegal immigration? Does it save substantial administrative resources? On the other hand, do the lesser procedural safeguards lead to injustice or other harm to refugees or other applicants? These are the questions that will continue to require direct observation, empirical investigation, and anecdotal evidence from noncitizens and their representatives.

Because most of the controversy over expedited removal has related to its use in potential asylum cases, the subject will be revisited in that context. See chapter 11, § B.7.b.iv below.

5. OTHER SPECIAL REMOVAL PROCEDURES

a. NATIONAL SECURITY AND FOREIGN POLICY CASES

You saw in the Mezei case, pages 156–71 above, how the tension between fairness to the individual and protection of national security can generate difficult policy issues in the context of admission procedure. One especially hard question is how to provide adequate notice and opportunity to be heard without disclosing confidential information that would endanger public safety.

INA § 235(c) sets up a special procedure for cases that present such issues. “If an immigration officer or an immigration judge suspects that an arriving alien may be inadmissible under [INA §§ 212(a)(3)(A)(i or iii), (B), or (C)], the officer or judge shall order the alien removed (emphasis added).” INA § 235(c)(1). The designated exclusion grounds cover those who seek to enter the United States to engage in acts involving sabotage, espionage, violent overthrow of the government, etc.; those involved in specified ways in terrorism; and certain individuals whose admission or activities in the United States would adversely affect the country’s foreign policy.

The Secretary of Homeland Security automatically reviews these removal orders. If the Secretary concludes, based on confidential information the disclosure of which would be “prejudicial to the public interest,” that a noncitizen is inadmissible on one of the specified grounds, then the Secretary may order the person removed without further hearing. Otherwise, the Secretary decides what further inquiry is to be conducted. INA § 235(c)(2). The noncitizen may submit a written statement and additional information for the Secretary to consider. INA § 235(c)(3).

b. TERRORISM CASES

Noncitizen terrorists, already covered by the special national security procedures just discussed, may also be removed through another expedited process. Unlike the INA § 235(c) procedure for national security cases, the special removal procedure for alleged terrorists applies to both inadmissible and deportable noncitizens. It is considered in chapter 10 below. As of this writing the special terrorist removal court has yet to be convened, but other measures, such as closed removal hearings and secret evidence removal hearings, have been used frequently and remain controversial. For detailed discussions of the latter procedures, see chapter 10, sections D.3 and D.4 below.

F. ADJUSTMENT OF STATUS

With few exceptions, the admission procedure outlined in the preceding sections requires a noncitizen to obtain a visa from a United States consulate abroad. Ordinarily, that process makes a good deal of sense. Before burning their bridges back home, and before incurring the expense and effort of travel to the United States, inadmissible individuals are usually (not always) weeded out at the visa stage. Moreover, from the government’s point of view, rigorous consular screening permits a faster and easier border inspection.

But suppose the noncitizen, instead of being abroad when the process is initiated, is already in the United States, either lawfully or unlawfully? Assume further that he or she meets all the substantive requirements for admission as an immigrant and that the particular immigrant category is current. Does it make sense to require the person to leave the United States, get an immigrant visa, and then come back?

Until 1952, that is precisely what Congress required. As one commentator has explained:

* * * In effect, the alien was required to leave the country in order to return. This illogical requirement did not escape the notice of either the immigration bureaucracy or interested aliens. Not only did the practice cause monetary and emotional hardship for the alien and her family, but it generated unnecessary paper work and delay for the agencies involved. * * *

Due to the problems caused by this requirement, the INS created the pre-examination program in the 1930s. This program permitted adjustment applicants to apply for the benefit in Canada rather than returning to their country of origin. [Essentially the same program would later be resurrected under the name "State-side Criteria Program."—Eds.] * * *

Joe A. Tucker, Assimilation to the United States: A Study of the Adjustment of Status and the Immigration Marriage Fraud Statutes, 7 Yale L. & Policy Rev. 20, 42-43 (1989).

Allowing the immigrant to do the paperwork in Canada was better than requiring a trip to more remote countries, but the question remained why the processing could not be performed in the United States. In 1952, when Congress enacted the INA, it included for the first time a provision authorizing certain noncitizens already here to "adjust their status" to that of LPR without having to leave the country. INA § 245. Today, adjustment is not just a footnote; in fiscal year 2007, this procedure accounted for more than 60% of all legal immigration to the United States. 2007 Yearbook of Immigration Statistics, Table 6.

Adjustment in no way relaxes the substantive criteria for LPR status (except indirectly with respect to one particular inadmissibility ground, INA § 212(a)(9)(B)(i), discussed below). The adjustment applicant must be admissible as an immigrant, and the particular immigrant category must be current. INA § 245(a). In addition, one who applies for adjustment of status must meet extra requirements not imposed on those who seek LPR status through the traditional visa route.

These extra requirements have changed frequently over time. They have been part of what immigration lawyers know as the continuing saga of INA § 245(i). Until the Immigration Act of 1990, a person had to have been "inspected and admitted [essentially a nonimmigrant] or paroled" to qualify for adjustment of status to permanent residence. INA § 245(a). Those who had entered without inspection were therefore ineligible. There were several other disqualifications, collected in INA § 245(c). These included crew members, most people (other than immediate relatives and special immigrants) who have been out of status at any time after entry, and certain nonimmigrants admitted without visas.

All those restrictions (and some new ones) were at least temporarily softened in 1994, when Congress enacted temporary legislation to permit and affirmatively encourage adjustment of status. Section 506(b) of Pub. L. 103-317, 108 Stat. 1724, 1765-66 (Aug. 26, 1994), added a new subsection 245(i) to the INA. This amendment exempted certain noncitizens from the disqualifications created by their entries without inspection or by subsection 245(c). To qualify for a 245(i) exemption, however, the applicant had to pay an additional penalty fee of $1000. Former INA § 245(i)(1). (Some were excused from the penalty fee.) Congress passed this provision both to raise revenue and to encourage applicants for permanent residence to use adjustment of status rather than overburden U.S. consulates abroad.

These temporary provisions survived until January 14, 1998. Since then, there have been temporary, limited restorations of 245(i). Visa petitions or labor certification applications that were filed before January 14, 1998 may still be processed under section 245(i). Pub. L. 105-119, § 111(a), 111 Stat. 2440, 2458 (Nov. 26, 1997), amending INA § 245(i). The LIFE Act, in section 1502, allowed individuals who were present in the United States on December 21, 2000 to file 245(i) applications until April 30, 2001. Bills have been introduced in Congress to reinstate section 245(i) on a limited basis. Like many other proposed immigration reforms, however, extensions of section 245(i) face an uphill battle in the wake of the September 11, 2001 terrorist attacks.

At the same time that Congress in 1998 allowed 245(i) to lapse, it added a partly analogous provision solely for certain employment-based applicants. Under INA § 245(k), otherwise eligible applicants for the 1st, 2nd, 3rd, and some 4th preference employment-based slots could adjust their status, even if currently or formerly out of status, provided they had entered lawfully and were not out of status more than 180 days.

One of the reasons the former version of section 245(i) was so important was its interaction with another provision that you studied in chapter 5. INA § 212(a)(9)(B)(i)(I), you will recall, renders inadmissible for three years any noncitizen who has been unlawfully present more than 180 days but less than one year. But the inadmissibility attaches only upon the person's departure from the United States before the commencement of removal proceedings. Thus, if a person who has been out of status more than 180 days but who now meets all the substantive requirements for immigrant status leaves the United States to obtain his or her visa, the person becomes inadmissible, and therefore ineligible for a visa, for three years. The same point applies to section 212(a)(9)(B)(i)(II), the one-year unlawful presence/ten-year bar. In contrast, if the person were allowed to apply for adjustment of status, he or she would not have to leave the country and thus would not be inadmissible, even though out of status. In this situation, therefore, there is much more at stake than the expense and inconvenience of traveling overseas to get the visa. One's very ability to become an LPR in the near future can hinge on the availability of section 245(i). With that point in mind, Professor (and former INS General Counsel) David Martin has suggested simply repealing the unlawful presence exclusion grounds that lie at the heart of the 245(i) debate. David A. Martin, Waiting for Solutions: Extending the Period of Time for Migrants to Apply for Green Cards Doesn't Get at the Real Problem, Legal Times (May 28, 2001), at 66.

At this time, please read INA § 245(a, b, c, and k).

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. INA § 245(a) says an immigrant visa must be “immediately available” at the time the application is filed. If the applicant is subject to a numerical quota, a visa will not be considered “immediately available” unless the latest Visa Office Bulletin shows either that the particular preference category is current in the applicant’s country or that the person’s priority date has been reached. See 8 CFR § 245.1(g)(1) (2008). Obviously, this constraint is inapplicable to immediate relatives and anyone else exempt from numerical limitations. In addition, a visa will not be considered available until USCIS has approved the visa petition. 8 CFR § 245.2(a)(2)(i)(B) (2008). For administrative convenience, however, USCIS generally permits the simultaneous submission of the visa petition and the adjustment of status application, provided approval of the visa petition would make the visa immediately available. Id. That would be the case, for example, when the applicant is an immediate relative or a preference immigrant whose country/preference combination is current. Note too that in recent years the administrative processing of adjustment applications has been badly backlogged. See generally page 475 above.

2. What do you think of the disqualifications for entering without inspection or for otherwise being out of status? How do you feel about the concept of 245(i)?

3. Should INA § 245 be discretionary? If a noncitizen now meets all the admission requirements for immigrants (both numerical and qualitative), then why give immigration officials the discretion to deny adjustment?

4. Normally there is no administrative appeal from a USCIS decision denying an application for adjustment of status. 8 CFR § 245.2(a)(5)(ii) (2008). The only administrative recourse for an applicant who believes USCIS wrongly denied adjustment is to wait for ICE to initiate removal proceedings (typically on the ground that by then the person’s authorized stay will have expired) and then renew the adjustment application before the immigration judge. Id. (In that event, however, the applicant might then encounter a § 245(c)(2) problem).

Before IIRIRA, the courts were divided over whether the applicant could seek judicial review of an INS decision denying adjustment, instead of waiting for deportation proceedings and then renewing the application. But IIRIRA added INA § 242(a)(2)(B)(i), which bars review of “any judgment regarding the granting of relief under [various relief provisions, including section 245].” The REAL ID Act, § 101(f)(2), passed in 2005, amended that provision to specify that it applies both in and outside of removal proceedings. It is now clear, therefore, that this jurisdictional bar applies to both USCIS and immigration judge denials of adjustment of status. Even still, the bar is not as sweeping as it first appears. The courts have generally construed it to preclude judicial review of only the discretionary components of the listed remedies. A determination that the applicant is statutorily ineligible for adjustment (for example, because the person is out of status, or is inadmissible because of a criminal conviction, etc.) appears to remain reviewable—at least when the challenge to the ineligibility determination raises a question of law, see INA § 242(a)(2)(D), and perhaps even when the challenge raises a question of fact. But there remains at least one fly in the ointment. While the general bar on judicial review of adjustment of status denials now clearly applies both in and outside of removal proceedings, it is less clear whether the same is true of the new exception for questions of law, since section 242(a)(2)(D) contains the qualifier “raised upon a petition for review.”

A separate question is whether a court will grant mandamus to require the government to decide a long-delayed application for adjustment of status. On that issue, the courts are divided. See generally chapter 9, § B.6.a.ii below.

5. Under certain conditions a grant of adjustment of status may be rescinded. See INA § 246 and chapter 9, § E.7 below.

PROBLEMS 4–7

To do the Problems that follow, you will need to consult INA § 245(a, c, and k) and review sections 212(a)(6)(A), 212(a)(9)(A), and 212(a)(9)(B).

Problem 4. You represent X, a 19-year-old noncitizen lawfully in the United States on a student (F-1) visa. She is authorized to remain for the duration of her student status, which is expected to last another two years. X would like to become an LPR, and at the moment she qualifies for family-sponsored 2A status as the unmarried daughter of an LPR, but the latest Visa Office Bulletin shows a 7-year wait for that category for her country. As her attorney, what would you advise her to do?

Problem 5. Y, a noncitizen, entered the United States without inspection or admission 15 months ago. Now married to a United States citizen, he would like to become an LPR. Will he be able to obtain either an immigrant visa at a U.S. consulate overseas or adjustment of status in the United States?

Problem 6. Z is a 46-year-old business executive from a country that severely restricts emigration. He entered the United States 14 months ago as a business visitor (B-1) and was authorized to remain one year. He has not applied for any extension of his nonimmigrant stay. Unbeknownst to his country’s authorities, who would never have let him leave had they known, Z’s mother is a citizen and resident of the United States. He thus qualifies for family-sponsored first preference status, which you should assume is current. Z is convinced, however, that if he were to return home to apply for an immigrant visa, his government would not permit him to leave again. Z now comes to you for legal advice. What should you tell him? See 22 CFR § 42.61(a) (2008).

Problem 7. W, a citizen of Pakistan, entered the United States on a student visa and was admitted for the duration of his student status. He enrolled at Arizona State University to do a master’s degree in physics.

Soon after W received his master's degree in June, he began his "optional practical training" (OPT), a post-graduation employment training program authorized by the regulations for up to 29 months for science graduates. One month later, in July, his OPT employer offered him a permanent position that would begin as soon as he obtained lawful permanent resident status in the United States. W, delighted, consulted you, an immigration lawyer, as soon as he received the offer. You helped the company apply for and receive labor certification, and six months later USCIS approved the required visa petition. His priority date became current ten months after that. You immediately filed an application for adjustment of status to permanent residence. One month before the expiration of W's OPT, to your surprise, USCIS denied adjustment on the ground that W had once been convicted, in Pakistan, of a crime involving moral turpitude. Your research found no case precisely on point, but analogous cases suggested USCIS was probably wrong to classify the particular crime as one that involves moral turpitude. You informally reported your findings to the director of the local USCIS office, but you could not convince her. It is now one week after the expiration of OPT, and W is out of status. ICE has not instituted any removal proceedings. W has not worked, and within a few months his savings will run out. What are his options?

CHAPTER 7

DEPORTABILITY GROUNDS

A. GENERAL CONSIDERATIONS

As you will recall, IIRIRA restructured much of what used to be called the “exclusion” and “deportation” processes. Now there is a single name for the proceeding at which a noncitizen’s inadmissibility or deportability is decided—a “removal” proceeding. INA § 240.

Functionally, however, IIRIRA preserves the fundamental distinction between what used to be called exclusion and deportation. There is still a list of grounds on which noncitizens who seek admission to the United States will be found “inadmissible,” see INA § 212(a), and a separate list of grounds on which noncitizens who have already been admitted to the United States will be found “deportable,” see INA § 237(a). Moreover, the availability of discretionary relief for either “inadmissible” or “deportable” individuals still depends on which of the two sets of grounds applies, as you will see in chapter 8. Finally, there were only a few significant procedural differences between exclusion and deportation even before IIRIRA, and most of those were also preserved. As you will see in chapter 9, the burden of proof still varies depending on whether the charge is inadmissibility or deportability. So does the length of time that a person who has been found inadmissible or deportable must wait before returning. Nor does it seem likely that the distinction between noncitizens arriving at ports of entry and those who are already in the interior of the country will lose its constitutional significance—at least not because of IIRIRA.

In practice, therefore, the traditional line between exclusion and expulsion remains intact. But IIRIRA moved one important group of noncitizens from one side of the line to the other. Before IIRIRA, “entry” determined whether a noncitizen would be tested against the exclusion grounds or the deportation grounds. The former were for people who had not yet “entered;” the latter were for those who had entered, legally or illegally. Following a suggestion first advanced by Professors T. Alexander Aleinikoff and David Martin in Immigration Process and Policy at 342–47 (1st ed. 1985), Congress decided to redraw the line at “admission.” Noncitizens who have not yet been admitted must contend with the grounds for inadmissibility; those who have already been admitted contend with the grounds for deportability. The practical consequence of the change is that noncitizens who have entered but have not been admitted—i.e., those people who entered without inspection—are now considered inadmissible rather than deportable. See INA §§ 212(a)(6)(A), 235(a)(1).

Because both the policy considerations and the legal consequences of expelling noncitizens who have reached the interior frequently differ from those concerning the removal of noncitizens arriving at ports of entry, it will sometimes be convenient to use the terms “exclusion” and “deportation” to refer, respectively, to the removal of arriving noncitizens and the removal of noncitizens from the interior. The reader should understand that such usages are now meant only as generic descriptions, not statutory terminology.

This chapter is the first of three on the removal of “deportable” noncitizens, a term used to describe those who fall within any of the deportability grounds listed in INA § 237(a). The present chapter examines those grounds and also the “inadmissibility” of noncitizens who are present without admission. Chapter 8 will consider various forms of discretionary relief available in deportation cases. Chapter 9 will take up deportation procedure.

The chapter separation is not as clean as might be ideal. A few of the affirmative defenses are confined to specified deportability grounds. Those defenses are convenient to discuss in this chapter, in conjunction with the particular grounds that they waive. Similarly, although procedure is treated in chapter 9, a few of the basic procedural elements are worth laying out now so that you can better follow the cases. For a more detailed overview of deportation procedure, see chapter 9, § A below.

In a removal proceeding the opposing parties are ICE and the noncitizen. ICE starts the formal process by serving on the noncitizen a document called a Notice to Appear (until 1996 an “Order to Show Cause”). INA § 239. That document alleges facts and specifies the statutory deportability (or inadmissibility) grounds that ICE is charging, in much the same way that a criminal indictment or information alleges facts and specific criminal offenses. A Justice Department official known as an immigration judge presides over the removal hearing. After considering the evidence and the arguments, he or she determines whether the person is a noncitizen and, if so, whether the person is “deportable”—i.e., whether the noncitizen fits within one or more of the alleged deportability grounds. If the person is found deportable, the immigration judge next decides whether the individual is eligible for, and deserving of, any affirmative discretionary relief for which he or she has applied.

If the immigration judge finds the person is not deportable, the proceedings are terminated. If the immigration judge finds the person deportable and denies discretionary relief, an order of removal is entered. And if the immigration judge finds the person deportable but grants discretionary relief, then, depending on the particular form of relief granted, the immigration judge either orders the proceedings terminated or grants “voluntary departure,” a remedy discussed in the next chapter. Some forms of discretionary relief additionally result in the award of LPR status.

Either ICE or the noncitizen may appeal the immigration judge’s order to the Board of Immigration Appeals. The noncitizen, but not ICE, can obtain judicial review of the BIA decision by filing a “petition for review” directly in the applicable United States court of appeals, INA § 242(a)(1), subject to some large exceptions that you will see in chapter 9. Most of the opinions you will read on the removal of deportable noncitizens, therefore, are decisions of the BIA, a court of appeals, or the Supreme Court.

1. HISTORICAL OVERVIEW OF AMERICAN DEPORTATION POLICY

As is plain from chapter 2, the Supreme Court has read the Constitution as giving Congress virtual carte blanche to decide which classes of noncitizens should be deported. For a superb history of the origins and political development of the U.S. deportation regime, see Daniel Kanstroom, Deportation Nation—Outsiders in American History (2007). Here is a brief summary of some of the more significant philosophical shifts:

6 Charles Gordon, Stanley Mailman, and Stephen Yale-Loehr, Immigration Law and Procedure

§ 71.01[2] (2007).

The measures adopted by Congress to eject aliens and for the ejection of those deemed undesirable have occupied a constantly expanding orbit. The first deportation efforts were contained in the Alien and Sedition Acts of 1798, which authorized the President to deport: (1) resident aliens who were citizens of nations at war with the United States (alien enemies); and (2) aliens whom the President judged “dangerous to the peace and safety of the United States.” The latter section apparently was never invoked, and was allowed to expire at the end of its two-year term. The Alien Enemy Act, however, remains on the statute books.

Almost ninety years elapsed before the appearance of any additional legislation dealing with deportation. In 1888 Congress sanctioned the deportation of alien contract laborers within one year after entry. This power of expulsion was extended in 1891 to all aliens who had entered in violation of law. The immigration statutes since then have included similar directives for the deportation of aliens entering in violation of law. The period of limitations for bringing such proceedings was steadily enlarged, and finally was eliminated in the Immigration and Nationality Act (INA) of 1952, making it possible to bring expulsion proceedings for any irregular entry, however remote.

In the early phase of this development, the deportation statutes were an adjunct to the process of exclusion. Barring the admission of undesirables and ejecting those who evaded the bar were regarded as different sides of the same coin. * * *

In 1910 Congress decreed that aliens identified with prostitution in the United States should be deported. This was an expansion in the horizon of the deportation statute, for it reached aliens who had entered properly, but who had misbehaved while residing in this country. In effect, deportation was imposed as a form of punishment for such misconduct. Thereafter,

Congress added constantly to the catalogue of misbehavior that subjects an alien to expulsion. [The resulting expulsion grounds enumerated in the present statute predominantly reflect post-entry conduct—Eds.]

2. THE THEORY OF DEPORTATION

Although the word “deportation” no longer appears in the INA, it will be convenient to use it here to describe the removal of a noncitizen from the interior of the United States (as distinguished from removal at a port of entry). As the cases in these three chapters will demonstrate, deportation is a harsh sanction. Depending on one’s personal circumstances and on the destination country, deportation can entail great economic hardship, restricted personal freedom, and fundamental and unwelcome lifestyle changes. If the person has established roots—family, friends, employers, or others—the separation can be particularly traumatic, both for the deported individual and for those who remain behind. [for these and other reasons, Professor Juliet Stumpf has argued for replacing the all-or-nothing remedy of deportation with a more graduated system of sanctions. See Juliet Stumpf, Fitting Punishment, 66 Wash. & Lee L. Rev., issue 4 (2009).]

Apart from the suffering of the affected individuals, nagging questions persist. Of whose society is the noncitizen really a product? At what point, if any, should the country in which the noncitizen resides take responsibility for his or her behavior? Is a country that deports a long-term resident because of recent misconduct sloughing off to another nation an undesirable person for whom the sending nation should be responsible?

Those actual and potential negatives make it important to ask what purposes deportation serves. As you saw earlier, the courts have consistently denied that deportation is designed to punish. See, e.g., Mahler v. Eby, 264 U.S. 32, 39, 44 S.Ct. 283, 286, 68 L.Ed. 549, 554 (1924); Bugajewitz v. Adams, 228 U.S. 585, 591, 33 S.Ct. 607, 608, 57 L.Ed. 978, 980 (1913).

Commentators have questioned the dogma that deportation is not punishment. One of the present authors addressed this issue in a pair of student Notes in 1976 and 1977. The first Note argued that both the consequences and the purposes of deportation at least arguably mirror those of criminal punishment. Stephen H. Legomsky, Recent Development, Deportation of an Alien for a Marijuana Conviction Can Constitute Cruel and Unusual Punishment, 13 San Diego L. Rev. 454, 456–64 (1976). The second Note focused more specifically on the expulsion of noncitizen criminal offenders. It compared the purposes of deportation with those of traditional criminal punishment, argued that analytically the two sets of purposes are virtually indistinguishable, suggested that the only convincing rationale for the deportation of noncitizen criminal offenders was incapacitation, and concluded that to avoid double punishment such deportation decisions should be individualized rather than categorical. Stephen H. Legomsky, The Alien Criminal Defendant, 14 San Diego L. Rev. 105, 121–27 (1977). More modern commentary has explored those themes further.¹

1. See, e.g., Javier Bleichmar, Deportation as Punishment: A Historical Analysis of the British Practice of Banishment and Its Impact on Modern Constitutional Law, 14

What, exactly, are the justifications for deportation? As the preceding excerpt from Gordon, Mailman & Yale-Loehr noted, the historical function of deportation was to serve as a check on the admission process. Deportation was originally conceived as a device for removing those noncitizens who should not have entered in the first place—either because they never were admitted or because they were admitted but shouldn't have been. In the latter instance, perhaps the contract between the noncitizen and the government can be thought of as having been void or at least voidable right from the start; deportation thus provides a remedy akin to rescission.

A related theory recognizes deportation as a means of expelling those noncitizens who were properly admitted but who, after entry, violated conditions that had been imposed on them at the time of entry. An example would be the noncitizen who is deported for having worked without authorization. See, e.g., Guy S. Goodwin-Gill, International Law and the Movement of Persons Between States 255, 262 (1978). Under that theory, deportation can be analogized to a remedy for breach of a valid contract.

As you will see in the next subsection, however, today's deportation grounds encompass a wide variety of post-entry behavior that cannot realistically be linked either to admissions errors or to violations of conditions imposed at entry. Instead, the thrust of our modern deportation policy is simply to remove from our midst those noncitizens whose continued presence Congress finds injurious to the public welfare. See, e.g., Mahler v. Eby, 264 U.S. 32, 39, 44 S.Ct. 283, 286, 68 L.Ed. 549, 554 (1924); Bugajewitz v. Adams, 228 U.S. 585, 591, 33 S.Ct. 607, 608, 57 L.Ed. 978, 980 (1913). In theory, even under this conception one would have to read into the contract an implied term that certain behavior (which might not have been a deportation ground at the time of entry or even at the time of the person's conduct) will be grounds for removal.

What is your opinion of these justifications? Can you think of others?

3. CURRENT DEPORTABILITY GROUNDS

Section 237(a) of the Immigration and Nationality Act lays out the grounds for removing deportable noncitizens from the United States, as well as some of the provisions for waivers of, and exemptions from, those grounds. Additional waivers and exemptions appear in other sections of the INA and will be taken up in this chapter or the next one. You should now skim section 237(a) to get a general sense of its layout and of the sorts of things that can make a person deportable.

Georgetown Immigration L.J. 115 (1999); Daniel Kanstroom, Deportation, Social Control, and Punishment: Some Thoughts about Why Hard Laws Make Bad Cases, 113 Harvard L. Rev. 1890 (2000); Won Kidane, Committing a Crime While a Refugee: Rethinking the Issue of Deportation in Light of the Prin- ciple Against Double Jeopardy, 34 Hastings Const. L.Q. 383 (2007); Robert Pauw, A New Look at Deportation as Punishment: Why at Least Some of the Constitution's Criminal Procedure Provisions Must Apply, 52 Administrative L. Rev. 305 (2000).

In recent years the number of formal removals has steadily increased, reaching 319,382 in fiscal year 2007. A far greater number—that year, 891,390—left the United States under grants of “voluntary departure,” a remedy explored in the next chapter. 2007 Yearbook of Immigration Statistics, Table 36. For now, note that, despite its name, voluntary departure does not mean the person had the option of staying; it means only that the forced departure is not regarded as a “removal” for purposes of various statutory penalties on removal that will be taken up later. Almost 100,000 of the formal removals were on crime-related grounds. Id., Table 37.

4. DEPORTATION AND STATUTORY INTERPRETATION

Courts often apply special statutory interpretation principles in deportation cases. One of the more important has long been associated with the following Supreme Court decision:

Fong Haw Tan v. Phelan

Supreme Court of the United States, 1948.
333 U.S. 6, 68 S.Ct. 374, 92 L.Ed. 433.

■ MR. JUSTICE DOUGLAS delivered the opinion of the Court.

An alien “who is sentenced more than once” to imprisonment for a term of one year or more because of conviction in this country of a crime involving moral turpitude committed after his entry shall, with exceptions not material here, be deported. It appears that petitioner, a native of China, was convicted of murder under each of two counts of an indictment, one count charging the murder of one Lai Quan, the other charging the murder on or about the same date of one Ong Kim. The jury fixed the punishment for each murder at life imprisonment. He was thereupon sentenced to prison for the period of his natural life by one judgment, construed by the Circuit Court of Appeals to impose that sentence on him for each of the convictions. Sometime thereafter a warrant for his deportation to China issued. Later he was paroled, released from prison, and taken into the custody of the Immigration Service. He then filed a petition for a writ of habeas corpus challenging the legality of his detention. The District Court denied the petition. * * * The Circuit Court of Appeals affirmed. The case is here on a petition for a writ of certiorari which we granted because of the contrariety of views among the circuits concerning the meaning of the statutory words “sentenced more than once.”

The Ninth Circuit view is that a conviction and sentence for more than one offense, whether at the same or different times and whether carrying concurrent or consecutive sentences, satisfy the statute. * * * The Second Circuit holds that an alien who is given consecutive sentences is sentenced more than once, while an alien who is given concurrent sentences is not, even though the crimes are distinct. The Fourth Circuit takes the position that the statute is satisfied whether or not the sentences imposed run concurrently or consecutively provided that the two crimes which are committed and for which separate sentences are imposed arise out of separate transactions. The Fifth Circuit takes the view that an alien is "sentenced once when, after a conviction or plea of guilty, he is called before the bar and receives judgment, whether for one or several crimes, with one or several terms of imprisonment. He is sentenced more than once when that happens again." That view is an adaptation of the position taken earlier by a District Court in the same circuit that Congress by this provision aimed to deport "repeaters," viz. "persons who commit a crime and are sentenced, and then commit another and are sentenced again."

The latter is the reading we give the statute. There is a trace of that purpose found in its legislative history. Congressman Sabath who proposed the provision as an amendment said it was aimed at the alien "who is a criminal at heart, a man who is guilty of a second offense involving moral turpitude and for the second time is convicted." Congressman Burnett, who was in charge of the bill on the floor of the House, gave the same emphasis when he said that the amendment proposed "that those who committed a second crime involving moral turpitude showed then a criminal heart and a criminal tendency, and they should then be deported." The Committee Report in the Senate put the matter into sharper focus when it stated that the provision was "intended to reach the alien who after entry shows himself to be a criminal of the confirmed type." Perhaps the plainest "confirmed type" of criminal is the repeater. We give expression to that view by reading this provision of the statute to authorize deportation only where an alien having committed a crime involving moral turpitude and having been convicted and sentenced, once again commits a crime of that nature and is convicted and sentenced for it.

We resolve the doubts in favor of that construction because deportation is a drastic measure and at times the equivalent of banishment or exile. It is the forfeiture for misconduct of a residence in this country. Such a forfeiture is a penalty. To construe this statutory provision less generously to the alien might find support in logic. But since the stakes are considerable for the individual, we will not assume that Congress meant to trench on his freedom beyond that which is required by the narrowest of several possible meanings of the words used.

Reversed.

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. To interpret the phrase "sentenced more than once," the Court turns first to the legislative history. What principle does the Court distill from that history? Assuming that principle can be imputed to Congress, does the interpretation that the Court ultimately places on the disputed phrase follow? Finally, should the Court assume that the cited statements represent the will of Congress? What are the pros and cons of reading significance into (a) comments like those of Representatives Sabath and Burnett, and (b) the Senate committee report?

2. The last full paragraph of the Court's opinion is the part most frequently quoted. Do you agree that doubts in deportation statutes should be construed in favor of the noncitizen? This principle is still frequently invoked, though it is seldom clear whether it actually influences outcomes or serves merely as a makeweight or afterthought. See, e.g., INS v. St. Cyr, 533 U.S. 289, 320, 121 S.Ct. 2271, 150 L.Ed.2d 347 (2001); Jobson v. Ashcroft, 326 F.3d 367, 376 (2d Cir. 2003).

3. In Chevron USA v. NRDC, 467 U.S. 837, 843-44, 104 S.Ct. 2778, 81 L.Ed.2d 694 (1984), the Supreme Court held that courts must defer to "reasonable" interpretations of federal statutes by the relevant administrative agencies. In the deportation context, Chevron deference can collide head-on with Fong Haw Tan.²

4. In David R. Woodward & Ronald M. Levin, In Defense of Deference: Judicial Review of Agency Action, 31 Administrative L. Rev. 329 (1979) (written before Chevron), the authors focus their analysis of judicial deference on the benefits of the agency's accumulated specialized expertise. That expertise, they say, "is assumed to result not only from the frequency of an agency's contact with the statute, but also from its immersion in day-to-day administrative operations that reveal the practical consequences of one statutory interpretation as opposed to another." Id. at 132. If the authors are right about the sources of the relevant agency expertise, then (a) does their rationale favor judicial deference to the BIA in deportation cases? And (b) does the 2002 transfer of executive functions from the former INS (which was in the Justice Department, as is the BIA) to DHS affect the arguments for Chevron deference to BIA decisions?

5. In chapter 2, you saw that in constitutional cases the Supreme Court has shown exceptional deference to Congress at the expense of the noncitizen. The Fong Haw Tan principle, applicable to statutory interpretation cases, stands in marked contrast. Why the difference? See generally Stephen H. Legomsky, Immigration and the Judiciary—Law and Politics in Britain and America 155-70, 177-222, 239-41 (1987) (comparing judicial approaches to statutory and constitutional interpretation).

6. The Notes that follow the Bricklayers Union case in chapter 4 (see page 366 above) summarize the three principal schools of statutory interpretation—the Literal Plain Meaning Rule, the Golden Rule, and the Social Purpose Rule. Review them now. What result would each of them produce in the present case?

7. The Court notes the Fourth Circuit view that the provision in question should be read to require two crimes arising out of separate transactions. The present statute adopts that approach; the analogous current deportability ground covers any noncitizen who, after entry, "is

2. For a thoughtful analysis, see Brian G. Slocum, The Immigration Rule of Lenity and Chevron Deference, 17 Georgetown Immigration L.J. 515 (2003); cf. John W. Guen-delsberger, Judicial Deference to Agency Decisions in Removal Proceedings in Light of INS v. Ventura, 18 Georgetown Immigration L.J. 605 (2005).

convicted of two or more crimes involving moral turpitude, not arising out of a single scheme of criminal misconduct * * *." INA § 237(a)(2)(A)(ii).

B. THE MEANING AND SIGNIFICANCE OF "ENTRY" AND "ADMISSION"

Until IIRIRA, one of the most important words in immigration law was "entry." First, as noted earlier, no deportation proceedings could be brought at all unless and until the noncitizen had made an entry. That might sound like a benefit to the noncitizen, but in most cases it was detrimental. When a noncitizen was found merely to be seeking entry, rather than to have achieved it, the government could institute exclusion proceedings instead. As you will see, the inadmissibility grounds are generally somewhat broader than the deportability grounds, the provisions for affirmative relief are narrower, and the procedural safeguards—both constitutional and statutory—are fewer.

Second, either the manner or the timing of the person's entry was an essential element of many of the specific deportation grounds enumerated in the pre-IIRIRA version of the INA. See, e.g., INA § 241(a) (pre-IIRIRA), grounds 1(A) (inadmissible at time of "entry"), 1(B) ("entered" without inspection or at an unauthorized place), 2(A)(i) (convicted of crime involving moral turpitude that was committed within five years after "entry").

Third, entry into the United States was an essential element of certain criminal offenses. See, e.g., INA §§ 275, 276, 277; see generally chapter 12 of this book.

IIRIRA has drained the word "entry" of much of its significance. Now, as you have seen, it is "admission," not "entry," that determines whether a noncitizen will be subject to the inadmissibility grounds or the deportability grounds. See INA § 240(e)(2). In addition, IIRIRA § 308(f) amended many of the specific inadmissibility and deportability grounds by replacing "entry" with "admission" and "enter" with "be admitted." In the contest for "most important word," admission has clearly surpassed entry.

For several reasons, however, entry is still a crucial concept in immigration law. Some of the inadmissibility grounds still use either the word "entry" or the word "enter." See, e.g., INA §§ 212(a)(3)(C)(i), 212(a)(5)(A)(i), 212(a)(6)(E), 212(a)(7)(A)(i)(I). The same is true of some of the deportability grounds. See, e.g., INA §§ 237(a)(1)(A) (inadmissibility at "entry"), 237(a)(1)(E) (smuggling noncitizens within five years of "entry"), 237(a)(5) (becoming a public charge within five years of "entry"). Congress's decision to change only selected grounds of inadmissibility and deportability, and to leave other grounds intact, was clearly deliberate. IIRIRA § 308(f) referred to designated grounds, and sometimes to only designated uses of the word "entry" in the same ground, when it could have directed that the substitution be made throughout all of INA sections 212 and 237.

In chapter 8, you will encounter a number of statutory relief provisions for deportable (and sometimes inadmissible) noncitizens. You might note here that several of these provisions similarly retain the word "entry" or "enter" in specifying which noncitizens qualify. See, e.g., INA §§ 245(c)(2), 245(i)(1) (adjustment of status), 249 (registry).

In the same vein, the criminal provisions mentioned above continue to make "entry" an essential element of various offenses.

"Entry" can also occasionally make a difference when it comes to procedure. Although arriving noncitizens and those who have effected entry without inspection are both required to prove admissibility, the standards of proof for the two classes of people vary slightly. See INA § 240(c)(2). Moreover, while arriving noncitizens whom immigration inspectors find inadmissible on document or fraud grounds are automatically subjected to the expedited removal procedure described in chapter 6, that procedure is inapplicable to noncitizens who have been present in the United States at least two years, and even its applicability to those present less than two years is at the discretion of the Attorney General. INA § 235(b)(1)(A). Arguably, "entry" determines presence. In addition, if a noncitizen who has been ordered removed (or who leaves under an alternative method known as "voluntary departure") subsequently "reenter[s]" the United States, the prior removal order is reinstated and the person can be ejected without a new removal hearing. INA § 241(a)(5).

Finally, even in those places where Congress replaced "entry" with "admission," the former remains important. That is because Congress's definition of "admission" itself refers to "entry." As a result of IIRIRA § 301(a):

The terms "admission" and "admitted" mean, with respect to an alien, the lawful entry of the alien into the United States after inspection and authorization by an immigration officer. * * * [emphasis added].

INA § 101(a)(13). (This definition is subject to an important exception for returning residents that will be considered shortly.)

So "entry" retains importance, both because it is vital to understanding "admission" and for independent reasons. Unfortunately, the question whether someone has entered the United States is not as straightforward as you might assume, for not every physical crossing into United States territory constitutes an entry. Two main problems have arisen over the years. The following case illustrates one of them:

Matter of Ching and Chen

Board of Immigration Appeals, 1984.
19 I. & N. Dec. 203.

The immigration judge, in a decision rendered August 10, 1984, found that the applicants are amenable only to deportation proceedings and therefore he ordered these exclusion proceedings terminated. The Immigration and Naturalization Service appeals. The appeal will be dismissed.

The applicants are a 22-year-old female and an 18-year-old male, natives and citizens of the People's Republic of China * * *. They were among a group of five aliens traveling from Hong Kong to Guatemala via Tokyo and Los Angeles on a commercial airline. Upon arrival at Los Angeles International Airport on July 20, 1984, the carrier (airline) presented the group for inspection and admission under the transit without visa (TRWOV) privilege.³ The examining immigration officer denied the five aliens entry as TRWOVs and issued to the carrier a Form I-259 (Notice to Detain, Deport, Remove, or Present Aliens), formally directing that they be detained by the carrier pending their removal on the carrier's next available return flight to Hong Kong. The aliens apparently made no attempt to obtain a further determination of their admissibility as TRWOVs at a continued or deferred inspection, or to pursue their applications for admission at an exclusion hearing before an immigration judge, but agreed to abide by the examining immigration officer's decision and return to Hong Kong. They then apparently were kept in isolation in a waiting area or lounge within the airport until their final removal by the carrier could be effected. While in this carrier custody, the instant two applicants surreptitiously left the detention lounge and the Los Angeles International Airport, abandoning their passports, airline tickets, and baggage. Two days later they were apprehended on board an eastbound commercial bus at the border patrol check point at Sierra Blanca, Texas. The Service served the applicants with Orders to Show Cause and held them in custody at a Service detention facility. The Service later cancelled the Orders to Show Cause and instead issued to each applicant a Form I-122 (Notice to Applicant for Admission Detained for Hearing Before Immigration Judge) placing them in these exclusion proceedings.

The applicants argued before the immigration judge that the exclusion proceedings should be terminated because they properly were subject only to deportation proceedings in that they had succeeded in entering the United States without inspection; they asserted this result is consistent with a factually analogous case, Matter of A-, 9 I & N Dec. 356 (BIA 1961), where an alien stowaway detained on board a vessel awaiting removal who subsequently escaped from the carrier's custody, landed on shore, and remained in the country undetected for 2 years was held to have effected an "entry" and so was amenable only to deportation proceedings. The Service countered that this matter is controlled by Matter of Lin, 18 I & N Dec. 219 (BIA 1982), where an alien who absconded from a Service detention facility while awaiting an exclusion hearing did not make an entry into the United States and was properly placed in exclusion proceedings. The immigration judge agreed with the applicants and terminated the exclusion proceedings. This appeal by the Service followed.

3. Certain noncitizens "proceeding in immediate and continuous transit through the United States" need not obtain visas. See INA §§ 101(a)(15)(C), 212(d)(4)(C).—Eds.

Resolution of this case turns upon whether the applicants actually "entered" the United States and so are subject only to deportation proceedings. Section 101(a)(13) of the Immigration and Nationality Act, generally defines "entry" as "any coming of an alien into the United States from a foreign port or place or from an outlying possession." In Matter of Pierre, 14 I & N Dec. 467 (BIA 1973), we examined prior case precedent involving the entry issue and synthesized a three-part analysis, concluding that an entry involves: (1) a crossing into the territorial limits of the United States, i.e., physical presence; (2)(a) inspection and admission by an immigration officer or (b) actual and intentional evasion of inspection at the nearest inspection point; and (3) freedom from official restraint. Moreover, it is well settled that an alien's parole from Service custody into the United States does not constitute an entry and he is not entitled to deportation proceedings. Similarly, an alien detained by the Service, rather than granted parole, pending an exclusion hearing who escapes from custody does not enter the United States and remains subject to exclusion proceedings. Matter of Lin.

Under the facts herein, we conclude that the applicants' escape from carrier custody into the United States constituted an entry. The applicants arrived by aircraft at Los Angeles International Airport and remained in the custody of the carrier before, during, and after completion of the inspection process; when they sought admission under the TRWOV privilege and were refused such status by the examining immigration officer, the applicants simply remained in the carrier's custody pending their return to Hong Kong. The applicants did not seek to further test their admissibility as TRWOVs but ostensibly accepted the immigration officer's refusal of admission and agreed to return home. It is clear that the inspection process was not to be ongoing or held in abeyance but that the applicants' inspection was completed and the determination of the immigration officer was final. Thus, this case is readily distinguishable from Matter of Lin, where the alien absconded after being placed in exclusion proceedings and while awaiting a hearing before an immigration judge; Lin's processing for admission was not finalized but his application for admission was a continuing application throughout the exclusion proceedings. Here, by contrast, the applicants' inspection and application for admission were completed and they remained in the carrier's custody within the detention lounge without having actually "landed", i.e., they were in a position legally equivalent to aliens "on the threshold" [sic] and outside a United States land border. In summary, the critical distinction between this case and Lin is that Lin was already in exclusion proceedings (following service of a Form I-122) and awaiting a formal hearing when he escaped whereas here the applicants were not in exclusion proceedings pursuing a continuing application for admission but their application and inspection were completed, the determination was final, and they were merely awaiting return transportation. In effect, the applicants made two separate attempts to enter the United States: their first failed when they were rejected for admission as TRWOVs; their second succeeded when they slipped away from the detention lounge, evading detection by either carrier or Service authorities and fleeing into the country's interior. This successful second attempt which combined the applicants' physical presence with their actual and intentional evasion of inspection while free of official restraint satisfies the Pierre three-part test and so constitutes an entry.

We agree with the applicants that their situation is legally analogous to that in Matter of A. There, the alien had been discovered on board a commercial ocean vessel as a stowaway before it arrived in port in the United States. Upon arrival, the alien was inspected by an immigration officer who determined the alien was a stowaway and refused him entry. Accordingly, the carrier was ordered to detain the stowaway on board and remove him when the ship left port. See section 273(d) of the Act. Thus, formal disposition by the Service of the stowaway's application for admission was concluded. However, he later managed to escape from the ship and come ashore and was not apprehended in the United States until 2 years later. The Board held that the alien had entered without inspection and his removal could be enforced only through deportation proceedings. This is essentially what occurred in this case as well. Both here and in Matter of A, the aliens, although physically present within this country's territorial jurisdiction, did not actually "land" in the United States, their inspections and applications for admission were completed and a final determination was made refusing to admit them and ordering them removed, and they were detained by the carrier pending final removal during which time they escaped and made their way into the United States. Therefore, consistent with Matter of A, the instant applicants must be deemed to have entered the United States without inspection.

* * *

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. In 1993, the freighter "Golden Venture," carrying 300 passengers, ran aground on a sand bar just 100–200 yards off the coast of New York. It turned out that the passengers were would-be Chinese immigrants who were being transported as part of a multi-million dollar immigrant smuggling ring. They would pay the large fees by agreeing to years of indentured servitude in the United States. Matter of G, 20 I. & N. Dec. 764, 766–68 (BIA 1993).

Seven passengers died. Some of the survivors remained on the ship and were eventually rescued. Some others swam to shore and were confined to the beach, in an area cordoned off by the former INS. Still others escaped into the interior; many of the latter were then apprehended after varying periods of time. Id. at 769.

The BIA concluded that those who had either stayed with the ship or made it no further than the cordoned off beach area had never become free of official restraint, the third element of the Pierre test. In contrast, those individuals who had reached the interior, only to be detected and apprehended later, were free of official restraint and therefore had "entered" the United States. The problem was that, amidst all the confusion and the urgency, the INS was not able to record which passengers had been rescued from the ship, which ones had swum safely to shore and remained there, and which ones had been apprehended in the interior. The BIA ruled that each individual would have the burden of proving "entry" and that anyone who did not sustain his or her burden could properly be placed in exclusion proceedings. Id. at 770-71. Subsequent judicial decisions reached similar conclusions. See, e.g., Chen Zhou Chai v. Carroll, 48 F.3d 1331, 1343 (4th Cir. 1995) (passenger rescued from ship had never become free of official restraint); Xin-Chang Zhang v. Slattery, 55 F.3d 732, 754-55 (2d Cir. 1995) (person who swam ashore but was always under surveillance was not free of official restraint).

With the enactment of IIRIRA, of course, there are no longer "exclusion" and "deportation" proceedings; there are only "removal" proceedings. Nor will the admissibility of noncitizens like Ching, Chen, and the Golden Venture passengers depend on whether they effected "entries." If they entered, they will probably be inadmissible for being present without admission; if they didn't, they will be inadmissible for having arrived at places that were not designated ports of entry. Either way, they will be placed in removal proceedings and found inadmissible.

In this context, then, is "entry" now irrelevant? Not quite. Among the various consequences that "entry" now generally retains, at least two are specifically applicable here: (1) the difference between mandatory expedited removal and, for those who are apprehended quickly, discretionary expedited removal; and (2) for those who have previously been ordered removed, the loss of the right to a removal hearing if they illegally "reenter."

But aside from the relevance of "entry" to the specific facts of Ching and Chen and the Golden Venture episode, the earlier general discussion demonstrates the wide variety of contexts in which "entry" retains importance. For that reason, definitional issues remain alive. And since IIRIRA § 301(a) repealed the statutory definition of "entry," the question now is whether the cases interpreting the word "entry" are still good law. On the one hand, the legislation has not affirmatively superseded them. On the other hand, most of those cases (not all) were decided at a time when a statutory definition of "entry" was on the books; whether these cases will continue to inform the meaning of that term is a question that so far has received little judicial guidance.

2. Read carefully the language of INA § 275(a), which imposes criminal penalties on noncitizens who enter the United States in certain specified ways. Would knowledge of that provision have affected your strategy if you had been representing Ching and Chen in the exclusion case you just read?

3. The problem in Ching and Chen is a classic example of the question "Is this fact situation more like case X (Matter of Lin) or more like case Y (Matter of A)?" The difficulty here is that it is not obvious why Matter of Lin and Matter of A should have been decided differently in the first place. How does the Board distinguish them from each other? As a matter of policy, does the articulated distinction explain why Lin had to face exclusion proceedings when A did not?

4. Why should Lin be treated less favorably than the noncitizen who crosses the border surreptitiously, evades immigration personnel, makes her way inland, and then, like Ching and Chen, is apprehended two days later?

5. Apply the elements of the Pierre test to the facts of Ching and Chen.

6. If you were unable to come up with convincing explanations for the result combinations noted in questions 3 or 4 above, can you devise a better general formulation—one that would avoid those kinds of anomalies?

PROBLEMS 1-3

Problem 1. X, a noncitizen, arrived at a United States airport on a flight from Lisbon. She waited in line to pass through immigration control. When her turn came, the immigration inspector looked at her passport and her B-2 (visitor for pleasure) visa stamp, asked her a few questions, and then told her to go through, adding “Enjoy your stay.” On the other side of the room, 35 feet in front of her, was a doorway that led to the baggage claim area and eventually to Customs. Just as she was about to pass through the doorway, another immigration inspector, who happened to be walking past her en route to his lunch break, noticed what looked like needle marks on her arm. He pulled her aside, questioned her further, and detained her pending a medical inspection. Has she made an “entry?” See generally Correa v. Thornburgh, 901 F.2d 1166, 1171-72 (2d Cir.1990); Matter of Patel, 20 I. & N. Dec. 368 (BIA 1991).

Problem 2. Y, a noncitizen, furtively crossed the border from Tijuana, Mexico to San Ysidro, California in the middle of the night at a point not designated for crossing. A Border Patrol officer standing 50 feet on the United States side of the border spotted Y while he was on the Mexican side. The officer kept Y under surveillance until he had proceeded about 100 yards into United States territory. At that point, the officer placed Y under arrest. Has he “entered?” (In United States v. Ruiz-Lopez, 234 F.3d 445 (9th Cir. 2000) (as amended), the court held that border surveillance constituted restraint, and thus there was no entry, for purposes of an analogous criminal statute.)

Problem 3. Suppose in the previous Problem the Border Patrol officer, instead of apprehending Y 100 yards inside United States territory, had tracked him until that point and then lost sight of him. Suppose further that Y escaped into the night, made his way north, and was picked up three days later in Los Angeles. Has he now “entered?” See United States v. Hernandez-Herrera, 273 F.3d 1213, 1218-20 (9th Cir. 2001) (holding person who was under surveillance but who then escaped it, even for just 50 yards, not to have made an "entry," for purposes of criminal prosecution for entry without inspection).

The second common type of entry problem arises when an LPR leaves the United States temporarily and then returns. Is the return an "entry?" The following landmark case, still highly controversial, discusses the problem:

Rosenberg v. Fleuti

Supreme Court of the United States, 1963.
374 U.S. 449, 83 S.Ct. 1804, 10 L.Ed.2d 1000.

■ MR. JUSTICE GOLDBERG delivered the opinion of the Court.

Respondent Fleuti is a Swiss national who was originally admitted to this country for permanent residence on October 9, 1952, and has been here continuously since except for a visit of "about a couple hours" duration to Ensenada, Mexico, in August 1956. The Immigration and Naturalization Service, of which petitioner Rosenberg is the Los Angeles District Director, sought in April 1959 to deport respondent on the ground that at the time of his return in 1956 he "was within one or more of the classes of aliens excludable by the law existing at the time of such entry," INA § 241(a)(1).⁴ In particular, the Service alleged * * * that he had been excludable at the time of his 1956 return as an alien "afflicted with psychopathic personality," INA § 212(a)(4),⁵ by reason of the fact that he was a homosexual. Deportation was ordered on this ground and Fleuti's appeal to the Board of Immigration Appeals was dismissed, whereupon he brought the present action for declaratory judgment and review of the administrative action. It was stipulated that among the issues to be litigated was the question whether § 212(a)(4) is "unconstitutional as being vague and ambiguous." The trial court rejected respondent's contentions in this regard and in general, and granted the Government's motion for summary judgment. On appeal, however, the United States Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit set aside the deportation order and enjoined its enforcement, holding that as applied to Fleuti § 212(a)(4) was unconstitutionally vague in that homosexuality was not sufficiently encompassed within the term "psychopathic personality."

The Government petitioned this Court for certiorari, which we granted in order to consider the constitutionality of § 212(a)(4) as applied to respondent Fleuti. Upon consideration of the case, however, and in accordance with the long-established principle that "we ought not to pass on questions of constitutionality * * * unless such adjudication is unavoidable," we have concluded that there is a threshold issue of statutory

4. Now INA § 237(a)(1)(A).—Eds.

5. Now repealed. See pp. 271-72 above.—Eds.

interpretation in the case, the existence of which obviates decision here as to whether § 212(a)(4) is constitutional as applied to respondent.

That issue is whether Fleuti's return to the United States from his afternoon trip to Ensenada, Mexico, in August 1956 constituted an "entry" within the meaning of § 101(a)(13) of the Immigration and Nationality Act of 1952, such that Fleuti was excludable for a condition existing at that time even though he had been permanently and continuously resident in this country for nearly four years prior thereto. Section 101(a)(13), which has never been directly construed by this Court in relation to the kind of brief absence from the country that characterizes the present case, reads as follows:

The term "entry" means any coming of an alien into the United States, from a foreign port or place or from an outlying possession, whether voluntarily or otherwise, except that an alien having a lawful permanent residence in the United States shall not be regarded as making an entry into the United States for the purposes of the immigration laws if the alien proves to the satisfaction of the Attorney General that his departure to a foreign port or place or to an outlying possession was not intended or reasonably to be expected by him or his presence in a foreign port or place or in an outlying possession was not voluntary * * *.⁶

The question we must consider, more specifically, is whether Fleuti's short visit to Mexico can possibly be regarded as a "departure to a foreign port or place * * * [that] was not intended," within the meaning of the exception to the term "entry" created by the statute. Whether the 1956 return was within that exception is crucial, because Fleuti concededly was not excludable as a "psychopathic personality" at the time of his 1952 entry.⁷

The definition of "entry" as applied for various purposes in our immigration laws was evolved judicially, only becoming encased in statutory form with the inclusion of § 101(a)(13) in the 1952 Act. In the early cases there was developed a judicial definition of "entry" which had harsh consequences for aliens. This viewpoint was expressed most restrictively in United States ex rel. Volpe v. Smith, in which the Court, speaking through Mr. Justice McReynolds, upheld deportation of an alien who, after 24 years of residence in this country following a lawful entry, was held to be excludable on his return from "a brief visit to Cuba." The Court stated that "the word 'entry' * * * includes any coming of an alien from a foreign

6. IIRIRA § 301(a) replaced this "entry" definition with a definition of "admission." See items 11-15 of the Notes and Questions following this case—Eds.

7. [Footnote 2 in original] The 1952 Act became effective on December 24, 1952, and Fleuti entered the country for permanent residence on October 9, 1952, a fact which is of significance because § 241(a)(1) of the Act only commands the deportation of aliens "excludable by the law existing at the time of such entry * * *." Hence, since respondent's homosexuality did not make him excludable by any law existing at the time of his 1952 entry, it is critical to determine whether his return from a few hours in Mexico in 1956 was an "entry" in the statutory sense. If it was not, the question whether § 212(a)(4) could constitutionally be applied to him need not be resolved.

country into the United States whether such coming be the first or any subsequent one." Although cases in the lower courts applying the strict re-entry doctrine to aliens who had left the country for brief visits to Canada or Mexico or elsewhere were numerous, many courts applied the doctrine in such instances with express reluctance and explicit recognition of its harsh consequences, and there were a few instances in which district judges refused to hold that aliens who had been absent from the country only briefly had made "entries" upon their return.

Reaction to the severe effects produced by adherence to the strict definition of "entry" resulted in a substantial inroad being made upon that definition in 1947 by a decision of the Second Circuit and a decision of this Court. The Second Circuit, in an opinion by Judge Learned Hand, refused to allow a deportation which depended on the alien's being regarded as having re-entered this country after having taken an overnight sleeper from Buffalo to Detroit on a route lying through Canada. Di Pasquale v. Karnuth. Judge Hand recognized that the alien "acquiesced in whatever route the railroad might choose to pull the car," but held that it would be too harsh to impute the carrier's intent to the alien, there being no showing that the alien knew he would be entering Canada. "Were it otherwise," Judge Hand went on, "the alien would be subjected without means of protecting himself to the forfeiture of privileges which may be, and often are, of the most grave importance to him." If there were a duty upon aliens to inquire about a carrier's route, it "would in practice become a trap, whose closing upon them would have no rational relation to anything they could foresee as significant. We cannot believe that Congress meant to subject those who had acquired a residence, to the sport of chance, when the interests at stake may be so momentous." Concluding, Judge Hand said that if the alien's return were held to be an "entry" under the circumstances, his "vested interest in his residence" would "be forfeited because of perfectly lawful conduct which he could not possibly have supposed would result in anything of the sort. Caprice in the incidence of punishment is one of the indicia of tyranny, and nothing can be more disingenuous than to say that deportation in these circumstances is not punishment. It is well that we should be free to rid ourselves of those who abuse our hospitality; but it is more important that the continued enjoyment of that hospitality once granted, shall not be subject to meaningless and irrational hazards."

Later the same year this Court, because of a conflict between Di Pasquale and [a Ninth Circuit decision], granted certiorari in the latter case and reversed a deportation order affecting an alien who, upon rescue after his intercoastal merchant ship was torpedoed in the Caribbean during World War II, had been taken to Cuba to recuperate for a week before returning to this country. Delgadillo v. Carmichael. The Court pointed out that it was "the exigencies of war, not his voluntary act," which put the alien on foreign soil, adding that "[w]e might as well hold that if he had been kidnapped and taken to Cuba, he made a statutory 'entry' on his voluntary return. Respect for law does not thrive on captious interpretations." Since "[t]he stakes are indeed high and momentous for the alien who has acquired his residence here," the Court held that

"[w]e will not attribute to Congress a purpose to make his right to remain here dependent on circumstances so fortuitous and capricious as those upon which the Immigration Service has here seized. The hazards to which we are now asked to subject the alien are too irrational to square with the statutory scheme."

The increased protection of returning resident aliens which was brought about by the Delgadillo decision, both in its result and in its express approval of Di Pasquale, was reflected in at least two subsequent lower-court decisions prior to the enactment of § 101(a)(13). * * *

It was in light of all of these developments in the case law that § 101(a)(13) was included in the immigration laws with the 1952 revision. As the House and Senate Committee Reports, the relevant material from which is quoted in the margin,⁸ make clear, the major congressional concern in codifying the definition of "entry" was with "the status of an alien who has previously entered the United States and resided therein * * *." This concern was in the direction of ameliorating the harsh results visited upon resident aliens by the rule of United States ex rel. Volpe v. Smith, supra, as is indicated by the recognition that "the courts have departed from the rigidity of [the earlier] rule," and the statement that "[t]he bill [gives] due recognition to the judicial precedents." It must be recognized, of course, that the only liberalizing decisions to which the Reports referred specifically were Di Pasquale and Delgadillo, and that

8. [Footnote 8 in original] The House and Senate Committee Reports preceding enactment of the bill both contained the following relevant paragraph:

"Section 101(a)(13) defines the term 'entry.' Frequent reference is made to the term 'entry' in the immigration laws, and many consequences relating to the entry and departure of aliens flow from its use, but the term is not precisely defined in the present law. Normally an entry occurs when the alien crosses the border of the United States and makes a physical entry, and the question of whether an entry has been made is susceptible of a precise determination. However, for the purposes of determining the effect of a subsequent entry upon the status of an alien who has previously entered the United States and resided therein, the preciseness of the term 'entry' has not been found to be as apparent. Earlier judicial constructions of the term in the immigration laws, as set forth in United States ex rel. Volpe v.

Smith, generally held that the term 'entry' included any coming of an alien from a foreign country to the United States whether such coming be the first or a subsequent one. More recently, the courts have departed from the rigidity of that rule and have recognized that an alien does not make an entry upon his return to the United States from a foreign country where he had no intent to leave the United States (Di Pasquale v. Karnuth), or did not leave the country voluntarily (Delgadillo v. Carmichael). The bill defines the term 'entry' as precisely as practicable, giving due recognition to the judicial precedents. Thus any coming of an alien from a foreign port or place or an outlying possession into the United States is to be considered an entry, whether voluntary or otherwise, unless the Attorney General is satisfied that the departure of the alien, other than a deportee, from this country was unintentional or was not voluntary."

there is no indication one way or the other in the legislative history of what Congress thought about the problem of resident aliens who leave the country for insignificantly short periods of time. Nevertheless, it requires but brief consideration of the policies underlying § 101(a)(13), and of certain other aspects of the rights of returning resident aliens, to conclude that Congress, in approving the judicial undermining of Volpe, supra, and the relief brought about by the Di Pasquale and Delgadillo decisions, could not have meant to limit the meaning of the exceptions it created in § 101(a)(13) to the facts of those two cases.

The most basic guide to congressional intent as to the reach of the exceptions is the eloquent language of Di Pasquale and Delgadillo themselves, beginning with the recognition that the "interests at stake" for the resident alien are "momentous," and that "[t]he stakes are indeed high and momentous for the alien who has acquired his residence here." This general premise of the two decisions impelled the more general conclusion that "it is * * * important that the continued enjoyment of [our] hospitality once granted, shall not be subject to meaningless and irrational hazards." See also Delgadillo, supra. Coupling these essential principles of the two decisions explicitly approved by Congress in enacting § 101(a)(13) with the more general observation, appearing in Delgadillo as well as elsewhere, that "[d]eportation can be the equivalent of banishment or exile," it is difficult to conceive that Congress meant its approval of the liberalization wrought by Di Pasquale and Delgadillo to be interpreted mechanistically to apply only to cases presenting factual situations identical to what was involved in those two decisions.

The idea that the exceptions to § 101(a)(13) should be read nonrestrictively is given additional credence by the way in which the immigration laws define what constitutes "continuous residence" for an alien wishing to be naturalized. Section 316 of the 1952 Act, which liberalized previous law in some respects, provides that an alien who wishes to seek naturalization does not begin to endanger the five years of "continuous residence" in this country which must precede his application until he remains outside the country for six months, and does not damage his position by cumulative temporary absences unless they total over half of the five years preceding the filing of his petition for naturalization. This enlightened concept of what constitutes a meaningful interruption of the continuous residence which must support a petition for naturalization, reflecting as it does a congressional judgment that an alien's status is not necessarily to be endangered by his absence from the country, strengthens the foundation underlying a belief that the exceptions to § 101(a)(13) should be read to protect resident aliens who are only briefly absent from the country. Of further, although less specific, effect in this regard is this Court's holding in Kwong Hai Chew v. Colding, that the returning resident alien is entitled as a matter of due process to a hearing on the charges underlying any attempt to exclude him, a holding which supports the general proposition that a resident alien who leaves this country is to be regarded as retaining certain basic rights.

Given that the congressional protection of returning resident aliens in § 101(a)(13) is not to be woodenly construed, we turn specifically to construction of the exceptions contained in that section as they relate to resident aliens who leave the country briefly. What we face here is another harsh consequence of the strict "entry" doctrine which, while not governed directly by Delgado, nevertheless calls into play the same considerations, which led to the results specifically approved in the Congressional Committee Reports. It would be as "fortuitous and capricious," and as "irrational to square with the statutory scheme," to hold that an alien may necessarily be deported because he falls into one of the classes enumerated in § 212(a) when he returns from "a couple hours" visit to Mexico as it would have been to uphold the order of deportation in Delgado. Certainly when an alien like Fleuti who has entered the country lawfully and has acquired a residence here steps across a border and, in effect, steps right back, subjecting him to exclusion for a condition, for which he could not have been deported had he remained in the country seems to be placing him at the mercy of the "sport of chance" and the "meaningless and irrational hazards" to which Judge Hand alluded. In making such a casual trip the alien would seldom be aware that he was possibly walking into a trap, for the insignificance of a brief trip to Mexico or Canada bears little rational relation to the punitive consequence of subsequent excludability. There are, of course, valid policy reasons for saying that an alien wishing to retain his classification as a permanent resident of this country imperils his status by interrupting his residence too frequently or for an overly long period of time, but we discern no rational policy supporting application of a re-entry limitation in all cases in which a resident alien crosses an international border for a short visit. Certainly if that trip is innocent, casual, and brief, it is consistent with all the discernible signs of congressional purpose to hold that the "departure * * * was not intended" within the meaning and ameliorative intent of the exception of § 101(a)(13). Congress unquestionably has the power to exclude all classes of undesirable aliens from this country, and the courts are charged with enforcing such exclusion when Congress has directed it, but we do not think Congress intended to exclude aliens long resident in this country after lawful entry who have merely stepped across an international border and returned in "about a couple hours." Such a holding would be inconsistent with the general purpose of Congress in enacting § 101(a)(13) to ameliorate the severe effects of the strict "entry" doctrine.

We conclude, then, that it effectuates congressional purpose to construe the intent exception to § 101(a)(13) as meaning an intent to depart in a manner which can be regarded as meaningfully interruptive of the alien's permanent residence. One major factor relevant to whether such intent can be inferred is, of course, the length of time the alien is absent. Another is the purpose of the visit, for if the purpose of leaving the country is to accomplish some object which is itself contrary to some policy reflected in our immigration laws, it would appear that the interruption of residence thereby occurring would properly be regarded as meaningful. Still another is whether the alien has to procure any travel documents in order to make his trip, since the need to obtain such items might well cause the alien to consider more fully the implications involved in his leaving the country. Although the operation of these and other possibly relevant factors remains to be developed "by the gradual process of judicial inclusion and exclusion," we declare today simply that an innocent, casual, and brief excursion by a resident alien outside this country's borders may not have been "intended" as a departure disruptive of his resident alien status and therefore may not subject him to the consequences of an "entry" into the country on his return. The more civilized application of our immigration laws given recognition by Congress in § 101(a)(13) and other provisions of the 1952 Act protects the resident alien from unsuspected risks and unintended consequences of such a wholly innocent action. Respondent here, so far as appears from the record, is among those to be protected. However, because attention was not previously focused upon the application of § 101(a)(13) to the case, the record contains no detailed description or characterization of his trip to Mexico in 1956, except for his testimony that he was gone "about a couple hours," and that he was "just visiting; taking a trip." That being the case, we deem it appropriate to remand the case for further consideration of the application of § 101(a)(13) to this case in light of our discussion herein. If it is determined that respondent did not "intend" to depart in the sense contemplated by § 101(a)(13), the deportation order will not stand and adjudication of the constitutional issue reached by the court below will be obviated. * * *

* * *

■ MR. JUSTICE CLARK, with whom MR. JUSTICE HARLAN, MR. JUSTICE STEWART and MR. JUSTICE WHITE join, dissenting.

I dissent from the Court's judgment and opinion because "statutory construction" means to me that the Court can construe statutes but not that it can construct them. The latter function is reserved to the Congress, which clearly said what it meant and undoubtedly meant what it said when it defined "entry" for immigration purposes as follows: * * *. That this definition of "entry" includes the respondent's entry after his brief trip to Mexico in 1956 is a conclusion which seems to me inescapable. The conclusion is compelled by the plain meaning of the statute, its legislative history, and the consistent interpretation by the federal courts. Indeed, the respondent himself did not even question that his return to the United States was an "entry" within the meaning of § 101(a)(13). Nonetheless, the Court has rewritten the Act sua sponte, creating a definition of "entry" which was suggested by many organizations during the hearings prior to its enactment but which was rejected by the Congress. I believe the authorities discussed in the Court's opinion demonstrate that "entry" as defined in § 101(a)(13) cannot mean what the Court says it means, but I will add a few words of explanation.

The word "entry" had acquired a well-defined meaning for immigration purposes at the time the Immigration and Nationality Act was passed in 1952. * * *

* * *

These cases and others discussed by the Court establish the setting in which the Immigration and Nationality Act was passed in 1952. The House and Senate reports quoted by the Court show that the Congress recognized the courts' difficulty with the rule that "any coming" of an alien into the United States was an "entry," even when the departure from the country was unintentional or involuntary. The reports discuss the broad rule of the Volpe case and the specific limitations of the Di Pasquale and Delgadillo cases, citing those cases by name, and conclude with the following language:

[The dissent here quotes the language reproduced in the last two sentences of original footnote 8 of the majority opinion.—Eds.]

* * *

Thus there is nothing in the legislative history or in the statute itself which would exempt the respondent's return from Mexico from the definition of "entry". Rather, the statute in retaining the definition expressed in Volpe seems clearly to cover respondent's entry, which occurred after he knowingly left the United States in order to travel to a city in Mexico. That the trip may have been "innocent, casual, and brief" does not alter the fact that, in the words of the Court in Delgadillo, the respondent "plainly expected or planned to enter a foreign port or place."

It is true that this application of the law to a resident alien may be harsh, but harshness is a far cry from the irrationality condemned in Delgadillo. There and in Di Pasquale contrary results would have meant that a resident alien, who was not deportable unless he left the country and reentered, could be deported as a result of circumstances either beyond his control or beyond his knowledge. Here, of course, there is no claim that respondent did not know he was leaving the country to enter Mexico and, since one is presumed to know the law, he knew that his brief trip and reentry would render him deportable. The Congress clearly has chosen so to apply the long-established definition, and this Court cannot alter that legislative determination in the guise of statutory construction. Had the Congress not wished the definition of "entry" to include a return after a brief but voluntary and intentional trip, it could have done so. The Court's discussion of § 316 of the Act shows that the Congress knows well how to temper rigidity when it wishes. Nor can it be said that the Congress was unaware of the breadth of its definition. Even aside from the evidence that it was aware of the judicial precedents, numerous organizations unsuccessfully urged that the definition be narrowed to accomplish what the Court does today. Thus, it was urged that the Act's definition of "entry" "should, we believe, be narrowed so that it will not be applicable to an alien returning from abroad, after a temporary absence, to an unrelinquished domicile here." Other groups complained also that "[t]he term 'entry' is defined to mean any coming of an alien into the United States. It is recommended that this be narrowed to provide that a return, after a temporary absence, to an unrelinquished domicile, shall not constitute a new entry." Despite such urging, however, the Congress made no change in the definition. Further, this Court in 1958 specifically recognized that the word "entry" retained its plain meaning, stating that "a resident alien who leaves the country for any period, however brief, does make a new entry on his return * * *"

All this to the contrary notwithstanding, the Court today decides that one does not really intend to leave the country unless he plans a long trip, or his journey is for an illegal purpose, or he needs travel documents in order to make the trip. This is clearly contrary to the definition in the Act and to any definition of "intent" that I was taught.

* * *

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

IIRIRA § 301(a) repealed the statutory "entry" definition that the Court in Fleuti was interpreting and replaced it with a definition of "admission." INA § 101(a)(13). Nonetheless, for reasons that will be taken up presently, the decision in Fleuti remains vital. In the Notes and Questions that follow, items 1 through 9 require you to analyze and critique this landmark decision, item 10 considers a related issue, and items 11-15 then explore the statutory changes.

1. What principle of judicial decisionmaking led the Court to address the "entry" issue rather than the "psychopathic personality" issue? What would you assume is the rationale for that principle?

2. The majority and dissenting opinions in Fleuti invoke several common statutory interpretation techniques. Consider first the literal language of the statutory "entry" definition. Precisely which word or phrase does the Court refuse to interpret literally? What interpretation does the Court place on that phrase?

3. The Fleuti Court's rejection of seemingly clear statutory language has angered some commentators. One student writer, criticizing the Court's refusal to give the statute its "obvious meaning," began his analysis of Fleuti by quoting a famous judicial passage:

[W]e are in the never-never land of the Immigration and Nationality Act, where plain words do not always mean what they say.

Yuen Sang Low v. Attorney General, 479 F.2d 820, 821 (9th Cir.1973), quoted in Comment, Exclusion and Deportation of Resident Aliens: The Re-Entry Doctrine and the Need for Reform, 13 San Diego L.Rev. 192, 197 (1975); see also id. at 198. The authors of the original edition of another casebook began the set of Notes following Fleuti by asking "Isn't Fleuti an embarrassment to the United States Supreme Court?" T. Alexander Aleinikoff & David A. Martin, Immigration Process and Policy 335 (1st ed. 1985).

It is not surprising that a decision like Fleuti would stir strong emotions. People have powerful convictions about the proper role of courts to begin with. In Fleuti, the Court deviated not only from the literal statutory language, but also from what some might see as compelling historical evidence of congressional intent (more on the latter in a moment).

But is it really so obvious that the Court exceeded proper bounds? Isn't this simply a case in which the Court rejected the Literal Plain Meaning Rule of statutory interpretation in favor of the Golden Rule? (See page 366 above.) Wouldn't a literal construction have produced an absurd result? If you think not, then answer this question: Why would Congress have wanted the deportation of an LPR to hinge on whether the person had once made an innocent, casual, and brief visit outside the United States? Alternatively, even if such a result does not rise to the level of the "absurd," might not the Court's analysis simply reflect its preference for the Social Purpose approach?

4. To answer that last question, it is necessary of course to ascertain what the congressional purpose actually was. Several items of evidence are available. Both sides agree, for example, that section 101(a)(13) was intended to codify the decisions in Di Pasquale and Delgadillo. That being so, how can the two sides reach such differing conclusions about what the provision means?

5. The dissent finds more specific evidence of congressional intent. It observes that several organizations had urged in committee hearings that the proposed entry definition be amended to make clear that the exception encompasses the temporary absences of LPRs. The dissent reads significance into Congress's refusal to amend the bill as suggested. If you were Fleuti's counsel, how might you respond to that argument?

6. The preceding notes focus attention on the literal language of the disputed provision and on the legislative history, both as evidence of congressional intent. Related provisions can be additional sources of evidence. In Fleuti, both sides support their readings of section 101(a)(13) by citing another INA provision, section 316 (dealing with naturalization). What contrary inferences do the two sides draw from section 316? Can you generalize the opposing arguments into statutory interpretation principles that transcend the specific provisions at issue here?

7. The dissent argues that Fleuti, like anyone else, is presumed to know the law, and that he must therefore be treated as having realized that a temporary visit to Mexico would subject him to exclusion upon his return. How might Fleuti's counsel have responded to that argument (assuming the opportunity presented itself before the Supreme Court's decision)?

8. Fleuti has been applied in a long list of BIA and lower court decisions. Those decisions have made clear that even a trip much longer than the "couple hours" of Fleuti's visit can be non-meaningful. In some cases, absences of several months have qualified as non-meaningful.⁹

9. See, e.g., Itzcovitz v. Selective Service Local Bd. No. 6, 447 F.2d 888 (2d Cir.1971); cf. Jubilado v. United States, 819 F.2d 210 (9th Cir.1987) (departure not meaningful enough to permit exclusion proceedings rather than deportation proceedings); Git Foo

Wong v. INS, 358 F.2d 151 (9th Cir.1966) (analogous determination whether foreign visit disturbed continuity of physical presence for purposes of provision affording affirmative relief from deportation).

9. To this point, discussion has focused on whether an overseas trip by an LPR was meaningful enough that, upon return to the United States, he or she is subject to the legal consequences of an "entry" or an "admission." A different question is whether the trip was so meaningful that it exposes the returning LPR to a consequence even more severe—a finding that the person has relinquished, or abandoned, his or her LPR status.

For this purpose, INA § 101(a)(27)(A) defines a "special immigrant" as an LPR "returning from a temporary visit abroad." Abandonment turns on whether the visit is found to be "temporary." Temporariness, in turn, rests on the intent of the LPR. The intent required to make the visit temporary, however, is not an intent to retain one's LPR status; rather, as several cases have held, the LPR must have had, at the time of departure from the U.S., "the intent to return to the United States within a relatively short period." Khodagholian v. Ashcroft, 335 F.3d 1003, 1007 (9th Cir. 2003). More specifically,

A permanent resident alien returns from a "temporary visit abroad" only when (a) the permanent resident's visit is for a period relatively short, fixed by some early event, or (b) the permanent resident's visit will terminate upon the occurrence of an event having a reasonable possibility of occurring within a relatively short period of time. [In the latter case], if the event does not occur within a relatively short period of time, the visit will be considered a "temporary visit abroad" only if the alien has a continuous, uninterrupted intention to return to the United States during the entirety of his visit.¹⁰

Evidence of the requisite intention can include (in addition to the actual length of the visit and the person's conduct overseas) family ties, property, and business affiliations in both the United States and the foreign country. Khodagholian, 335 F.3d at 1007.

Of course, even if the person substantively qualifies as a returning LPR, all the admissibility requirements, including the documentary requirements, remain in effect. By way of exception, if the absence does not exceed one year, the LPR may satisfy the documentary requirements simply by presenting his or her valid, unexpired "green card" (formally called a "permanent resident card" or form I-551). See 8 C.F.R. § 211.3 (2008). In addition, an LPR may apply in advance for a "reentry permit" for a trip of (usually) no more than two years. INA § 223; 8 C.F.R. § 223.3 (2008). If the LPR then presents the reentry permit upon return, his or her LPR status will be found to continue unless the government proves abandonment by "clear, unequivocal, and convincing evidence."¹¹

10. Id. at 1006–07, quoting Chavez-Ramirez v. INS, 792 F.2d 932, 936–37 (9th Cir. 1986); accord, Moin v. Ashcroft, 335 F.3d 415, 419 (5th Cir. 2003); Ahmed v. Ashcroft, 286 F.3d 611, 613 (2d Cir. 2002).

11. Moin, 335 F.3d at 419; cf. Khodagholian, 335 F.3d at 1006 (burden of proof shifts to government when person has "colorable claim to returning resident status"). For some helpful commentary on the issue of

10. In 1987, Rep. Romano Mazzoli, then chair of the House immigration subcommittee, introduced H.R. 2921. One of its provisions, section 101, would have amended INA § 101(a)(13) to read:

The term "entry" means any coming of an alien (other than an alien having a lawful permanent residence in the United States) into the United States, from a foreign port or place or from an outlying possession, whether voluntarily or otherwise.

The bill did not pass. Had it become law, what would its practical consequences have been? Had you been a member of Congress, would you have supported it?

11. As noted earlier, IIRIRA § 301(a) replaced the statutory "entry" definition with definitions of the words "admission" and "admitted." In doing so, Congress in effect modified and codified the Fleuti principle. The new provision reads:

(A) The terms "admission" and "admitted" mean, with respect to an alien, the lawful entry of the alien into the United States after inspection and authorization by an immigration officer.

* * *

(C) An alien lawfully admitted for permanent residence in the United States shall not be regarded as seeking an admission into the United States for purposes of the immigration laws unless the alien—

- (i) has abandoned or relinquished that status,
- (ii) has been absent from the United States for a continuous period in excess of 180 days,
- (iii) has engaged in illegal activity after having departed the United States,
- (iv) has departed from the United States while under legal process seeking removal of the alien from the United States, including removal proceedings under this Act and extradition proceedings,
- (v) has committed an offense identified in section 212(a)(2), unless since such offense the alien has been granted relief under section 212(h) or 240A(a), or
- (vi) is attempting to enter at a time or place other than as designated by immigration officers or has not been admitted to the United States after inspection and authorization by an immigration officer.

INA § 101(a)(13).

abandonment of LPR status, see Gordon, Mailman & Yale-Loehr, § 35.02; Lory Diana Rosenberg, Ask Lory—Clash of Intentions, 8

BIB 1881 (Dec. 15, 2003); Stephen Yale-Loehr and Roni Reed, Preserving Permanent Residency, 1 BIB 14 (1996).

The Fleuti decision, of course, remains essential to understanding how the law evolved to its present state. Moreover, as the preceding notes and questions illustrate, the opinion in Fleuti is a rich store of statutory interpretation techniques. Apart from its historical relevance and its contributions to legal process, though, is the Fleuti principle still a part of United States immigration law?

As a first step toward answering that question, identify the specific differences between the present statutory definition of "admission" and the principle announced in Fleuti.

12. Notice the structure of new INA § 101(a)(13). It defines "admission" as "lawful entry" after inspection and authorization. Then it creates an exception; an LPR will not be regarded as seeking admission "unless" one of certain things is true—the person has relinquished permanent residence, or the absence has been greater than 180 days, or the person has committed a crime covered by section 212(a)(2), etc. Thus, if there has been a lawful entry, and a returning LPR does not fall within any of the listed categories, there will not be a new admission.

But what about the converse? The statute says an LPR will not be regarded as seeking admission unless one of several events has occurred. If one of the listed events has occurred, does the statute imply that an LPR who has made an entry is regarded as seeking an admission? Or does the statute simply not take a position either way on that issue? Suppose you say to someone, "I'm definitely going jogging tomorrow unless it rains." Do you necessarily mean that you won't jog if it does rain, or do you mean merely that you will jog if it doesn't rain and that you might or might not jog if it does?

In Matter of Collado-Munoz, 21 I. & N. Dec. 1061 (BIA 1998) (amended opinion), the Board held that a returning LPR who falls within one of the six subcategories listed in section 101(a)(13)(C) is to be regarded as seeking admission. In such circumstances, the Board held, Fleuti is irrelevant. Several courts of appeals have deferred to the Collado interpretation in varied contexts without acknowledging any of the arguments made above.¹²

In contrast, the dissent of BIA member Lory Rosenberg in Collado adopted the above reasoning. She observed that the word "unless" ordinarily does not imply the converse and illustrated the point with additional examples drawn mostly from other legal settings. 21 I. & N. Dec. at 1071–73. Later the same year a federal district court followed suit. It noted that returning LPRs who do not fit any of the six subcategories are not regarded as seeking admission. For those returning residents who fall within any of the six subcategories, the court then held, the Fleuti doctrine determines whether the departure meaningfully interrupted the person's permanent residence in the United States. Richardson v. Reno, 994 F.Supp. 1466 (S.D.Fla. 1998), rev'd on other grounds, 162 F.3d 1338 (11th Cir. 1998) (amended opinion). Thus, while the majority of courts have read an implied converse into the statute, opinion has not been unanimous. The current status of Fleuti, therefore, remains open.

12. See, e.g., Camins v. Gonzales, 500 F.3d 872 (9th Cir. 2007) (but holding the new provision non-retroactive); Malagon de Fuentes v. Gonzales, 462 F.3d 498 (5th Cir. 2006); Tapia v. Ashcroft, 351 F.3d 795 (7th Cir. 2003); Tineo v. Ashcroft, 350 F.3d 382 (3d Cir. 2003); Rivera-Jiminez v. INS, 214 F.3d 1213 (10th Cir. 2000).

Assume, however, that an implied converse is read into the statute, so that a returning LPR who has "entered" is automatically regarded as seeking admission if one of the enumerated events has occurred. Now suppose that a returning LPR has been away more than 180 days or has committed a crime listed in INA § 212(a)(2), or that the case falls within one of the other listed categories. Does this mean the person is regarded as seeking admission? The answer still would seem to depend on whether there has been an "entry." But what does "entry" mean? Does Fleuti still define that term? If so, then even a visit that exceeds 180 days might not result in an "entry" when the combination of Fleuti factors suggests the intent was not to depart in a manner meaningfully interruptive of permanent residence. The Board in Collado-Munoz did not explain how the word "entry," in the "admission" definition of section 101(a)(13), is to be defined. Argue both ways on the issue of whether Fleuti still governs the definition of "entry" in the (now fewer) contexts in which that term remains relevant.

13. Here is another situation where Fleuti arguably still applies: An LPR leaves the country for less than 180 days and the trip is perfectly innocent. Some time after returning, he or she is charged with being deportable for having been inadmissible at the time of "reentry." (Assume the person had been admissible at the time of the original admission.) To determine whether the return constituted an entry, should the court apply the Fleuti factors?

14. With respect to the unlawful activity factor, the literal language of the new definition is much farther reaching. The Fleuti Court spoke only about "the purpose of leaving the country" being "contrary to some policy reflected in our immigration laws." The new law, in INA § 101(a)(13)(C)(v), sweeps in anyone who "has committed" any of the offenses included in INA § 212(a)(2) (the crime-related inadmissibility grounds). Did Congress literally mean that, once an LPR commits such an offense, he or she is forever barred from invoking the returning LPR exception to the admission definition? Or did Congress have in mind only those offenses that are connected with the trip? Consider also section 101(a)(13)(C)(iii), which covers the person who "has engaged in illegal activity after having departed the United States." On its face this language is even broader than that of subsection C(v).

15. There are also two types of retroactive situations in which Fleuti might apply. First, IIRIRA § 309(a) makes clear that the definitional change effected by IIRIRA § 301(a) does not govern anyone whose removal proceeding began before April 1, 1997 (subject to a limited exception at the discretion of the Attorney General, see IIRIRA § 309(c)). Fleuti is clearly applicable in those cases. Second, does Fleuti apply even to proceedings commenced after April 1, 1997, if the charges rest on alleged "entries" that occurred before that date? This is an important question. There is no statute of limitations on removal, so inadmissible LPRs who entered before April 1, 1997 can be found deportable decades later. If deportability is alleged in such a case, would Fleuti guide the entry determination (even if its use in situations like the one in item 13 above is otherwise rejected)?

16. As you saw earlier, under certain circumstances a person may receive adjustment of status under INA § 245(a). The new status will be that of "an alien lawfully admitted for permanent residence" [emphasis added]. The use of the word "admitted" has given rise to some tricky problems. The BIA initially held that adjustment of status gives rise to an "admission" for purposes of the removal grounds that use that term, even though it conceded that adjustment of status does not meet the statutory definition of "admission" in section 101(a)(13) because it does not involve an "entry." Matter of Shanu, 23 I. & N. Dec. 754 (BIA 2005). But the Fourth Circuit reversed that decision on appeal, holding that the statutory "admission" definition in section 101(a)(13) is exclusive and that, therefore, adjustment of status is not an admission. Aremu v. DHS, 450 F.3d 578 (4th Cir. 2006). The other courts of appeals agree. See, e.g., Abdelqadar v. Gonzales, 413 F.3d 668 (7th Cir. 2005); Shivaraman v. Ashcroft, 360 F.3d 1142 (9th Cir. 2004). The Seventh Circuit in Abdelqadar, in fact, went so far as to hold that only one's initial admission counts for purposes of the various removal grounds that depend on admission; the returns from subsequent trips do not.

One wrinkle, still not definitively resolved, is whether adjustment of status counts as an admission when there would otherwise be no admission at all—i.e., where a person entered without inspection and subsequently (as was fairly common under prior law) adjusted status. The BIA has answered that question in the affirmative, Matter of Rosas-Ramirez, 22 I. & N. Dec. 616 (BIA en banc 1999), and at least one court agrees, Ocampo-Duran v. Ashcroft, 254 F.3d 1133, 1134–35 (9th Cir. 2001). The court in Aremu, 450 F.3d at 583 n.6, expressly withheld its opinion on that question. The whole subject is expertly examined in Elwin Griffith, Admission and Cancellation of Removal under the Immigration and Nationality Act, 2005 Michigan State L. Rev. 979, 986–93.

17. The combined effects of the Fleuti line of cases and related provisions of statutes and regulations have been to restrict the practical abilities of lawful permanent residents and others to travel overseas. These effects are thoughtfully synthesized in Nancy Morawetz, The Invisible Border: Restrictions on Short-Term Travel by Noncitizens, 21 Georgetown Immigration L.J. 201 (2007).

PROBLEMS 4–6

Problem 4. Under INA § 237(a)(2)(A)(i)(I), which you will study later in this chapter, a noncitizen is deportable if he or she commits, within five years after "admission," a crime involving "moral turpitude" punishable by a year or more, and is subsequently convicted. A, admitted as an LPR six years earlier, goes abroad for seven months on an innocent trip. A few months after returning, he commits a crime involving moral turpitude that is punishable by more than a year. A is convicted. Is he deportable?

Problem 5. B, also admitted as an LPR six years ago, similarly commits a crime involving moral turpitude. She too is convicted. After serving her sentence, B goes abroad for one month on an innocent trip. Shortly after being readmitted, B is charged with being deportable for having been inadmissible at "entry." The alleged entry is her return from overseas, and the alleged ground of inadmissibility is INA § 212(a)(2)(A)(i)(I) (convicted of crime involving moral turpitude). Is B deportable?

Problem 6. Noncitizen C, lawfully present in the United States on an F-1 student visa, is studying at SUNY Buffalo. She and some of her American friends went to Toronto for a week over the spring break. When she returned at the end of her vacation, she presented her original documents to the immigration inspector and was allowed in. In case it ever affects her future status, does that return constitute an "admission?"

C. DEPORTABILITY GROUNDS CONCERNED WITH IMMIGRATION CONTROL

Most of the deportability grounds listed in INA § 237(a) are aimed at those noncitizens whom Congress regards as substantively undesirable. These are people whom Congress perceives as threats to public health or safety, public morality, the economy, or national security.

Enforcing those restrictions and analogous ones contained in the exclusion grounds requires an elaborate system of immigration control. The efficacy of that system depends on rules. As this section demonstrates, violations of those rules are themselves grounds for removal.

1. ENTRY WITHOUT INSPECTION

Until 1996, noncitizens who entered the United States without inspection were deportable. INA § 241(a)(1)(B), pre-1996 version. As you saw in chapter 5, that year Congress repealed entry without inspection as a deportability ground and instead made presence in the United States without admission a ground for inadmissibility. A noncitizen also commits a criminal offense by entering without inspection. See INA § 275. After a prior removal order, the offense can be a felony. INA § 276.

In case you are wondering, it can be a criminal offense even for a United States citizen to enter the country surreptitiously. The customs laws require every "individual" who arrives "in the United States other than by vessel, vehicle, or aircraft" to enter at an authorized crossing point and immediately report his or her arrival to the customs officer. 19 USC § 1459(a). Offenders are subject to civil fines and, in the case of intentional violations, criminal penalties—including imprisonment for up to a year. Id. § 1459 (e, f, g). See also INA § 215(b) (unlawful for United States citizen “to depart from or enter, or attempt to depart from or enter, the United States” without valid passport, except as otherwise provided by President).

2. ENTRY WHILE INADMISSIBLE AND RELATED ISSUES

One important deportability ground is INA § 237(a)(1)(A), which renders deportable “[a]ny alien who at the time of entry or adjustment of status was within one or more of the classes of aliens inadmissible by the law existing at such time.” Of all the deportability grounds, inadmissibility at entry most clearly reflects the view of deportation as an instrument for correcting errors or lapses in the admission process. It is invoked in a wide variety of contexts.

One especially common use is where the person entered while inadmissible because of fraud. Ordinarily in those cases, inadmissibility is alleged under INA § 212(a)(6)(C)(i), which you should re-read now. In some such cases, however, ICE also alleges inadmissibility under INA § 212(a)(7)(A) (not in possession of valid entry documents), the theory being that the fraud rendered the entry documents invalid. In still others, ICE invokes the more specific provisions that make noncitizens either inadmissible or deportable for false claims of United States citizenship. See, respectively, INA §§ 212(a)(6)(C)(ii), 237(a)(3)(D).

False citizenship claims actually raise one other interesting issue, which Professor Gerald Neuman noted in an October 23, 1997 e-mail to the author. In Reid v. INS, 420 U.S. 619, 95 S.Ct. 1164, 43 L.Ed.2d 501 (1975), decided before IIRIRA, the Supreme Court held that a noncitizen who gains entry by falsely claiming to be a United States citizen has not been “inspected” and therefore is deportable for having entered without inspection. As noted earlier, IIRIRA eliminated entry without inspection from the list of deportability grounds but added presence without admission to the list of inadmissibility grounds. Professor Neuman wondered whether Reid survives IIRIRA. If entry via a false citizenship claim still results in no “inspection,” then the person presumably has also not been “admitted,” because the latter requires a lawful entry “after inspection.” INA § 101(a)(13)(A). (At any rate there is probably no “lawful” entry.) Under that interpretation, a noncitizen who gains entry by falsely claiming United States citizenship is inadmissible for being present without admission.

In order to answer the Questions and Problems that follow, please review INA §§ 212(a)(6)(A)(i), 212(a)(6)(C)(i, ii), 212(a)(7)(A), and 237(a)(1)(A). Then read INA §§ 237(a)(3)(D)(false citizenship claim as deportability ground) and 237(a)(1)(H) (provision for waiving certain frauds).

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. Explain why the last sentence of INA § 237(a)(1)(H) is necessary, when section 237(a)(1)(H)(i)(II) already covers people who are inadmissible under subsections 5(A) and 7(A) for reasons directly resulting from the fraud.

2. Explain why, in section 237(a)(1)(H)(i)(II), it was necessary to include, in the list of exceptions to the “otherwise admissible” requirement, section 212(a)(7)(A). After all, if the noncitizen is “in possession of an immigrant visa or equivalent document,” as the provision requires, then why would he or she need an exemption from section 212(a)(7)(A)?

3. To obtain relief under INA § 237(a)(1)(H), the person also needs the favorable exercise of discretion. In INS v. Yueh-Shaio Yang, 519 U.S. 26, 117 S.Ct. 350, 136 L.Ed.2d 288 (1996), the Supreme Court held the BIA could lawfully consider the underlying fraud as a negative factor for purposes of the discretionary hurdle even though fraud is the misconduct that applicants for 237(a)(1)(H) relief will always be seeking to waive. Especially is this true, the Court said, when there has been a whole pattern of fraud.

PROBLEMS 7-13

Problem 7. X, a noncitizen, enters the United States in the middle of the night at a place not designated as an inspection facility, returns home on her own initiative after a month, and then, ten years later, marries a United States citizen, obtains an immigrant visa, and is admitted. A year later, ICE somehow learns of her earlier entry. Is there any ground on which she is deportable?

Note: In the pre-IIRIRA case of Gunaydin v. INS, 742 F.2d 776 (3d Cir.1984), two LPRs traveled to Mexico, returned to the United States without inspection, were charged with being deportable for entering without inspection, and then, while proceedings were pending, left again and returned through proper channels. The court held that a proper entry does not erase a prior entry without inspection and that accordingly they were deportable. The Gunaydin holding no longer applies directly, because entry without inspection is no longer a ground for deportability, but is there nonetheless another way for ICE to urge the same result? Consider INA § 237(a)(1)(A).

Problem 8. In Problem 7 above, should X have been admitted when she presented herself at a port of entry the second time? If the answer is yes (i.e., if you conclude that no apparent ground of inadmissibility applied to her at that time), should the immigration inspector have admitted her and then, the moment she entered, have told her that she is now deportable on the ground you discovered in Problem 7?

Problem 9. A, a 30-year-old married noncitizen male, has a United States citizen father. To obtain a family-sponsored first preference visa, A tells the consular officer that he has never been married. A receives his visa and is admitted to the United States as an LPR. A year later, ICE discovers the fraud. What deportability charges should it bring? Will A be eligible for relief under INA § 237(a)(1)(H)?

Problem 10. B was admitted for permanent residence as the wife of a United States citizen. One year later, ICE learns that, eighteen years before entry, at age 22, B had committed a burglary, had been convicted, and had received a two-year prison sentence. Yet B had answered “no” to a question on her visa application asking whether she had ever been convicted of a crime. ICE institutes removal proceedings.

To analyze this Problem, you will have to review INA § 212(h) and the description of it on pages 455–56 above. Since the present Problem involves deportability, you need to know that section 212(h) can be applied retroactively, in the following way: If a person is deportable for having entered while inadmissible, and the inadmissibility ground was one of the crime-related grounds that section 212(h) waives, then section 212(h) can waive that earlier inadmissibility—provided the person met all the requirements for 212(h) relief at that earlier time. Matter of Millard, 11 I. & N. Dec. 175 (BIA 1965). (Credit is due to Professor Virgil Wiebe and his students for identifying the retroactivity issue.)

With that information, do you think INA § 237(a)(1)(H) will be of any use to B?

Problem 11. Noncitizen C, age 17 and married, enters the United States lawfully on an F-1 student visa. She is authorized to remain for the duration of her student status. One year after admission, she obtains a final divorce decree and applies for adjustment of status as the child of a United States citizen (immediate relative). USCIS grants the application. A year after that, however, ICE receives information suggesting C originally entered with a preconceived intent to remain permanently (not permitted for F-1’s). ICE brings removal proceedings. It alleges she is deportable under section 237(a)(1)(A) as having entered while inadmissible under sections 212(a)(6)(C)(i) (fraud) and 212(a)(7)(A) (not in possession of valid immigrant visa). Will section 237(a)(1)(H) be of use to her?

Problem 12. D, a noncitizen, marries a United States citizen. He obtains an immigrant visa and is admitted for conditional permanent residence on the basis of the marriage. Almost two years later, USCIS makes a finding pursuant to the Immigration Marriage Fraud Amendments that the marriage was genuine and still legally intact. Consequently, it removes the condition. A year after that, however, ICE is tipped off that the marriage has been a sham from its inception. It charges D with being deportable under INA § 237(a)(1)(A) for having entered while inadmissible under INA § 212(a)(6)(C)(i) (fraudulent visa and fraudulent admission). Will section 237(a)(1)(H) be useful to D?

Problem 13. Noncitizen E arrives at a United States port of entry and presents a counterfeit United States passport. She is admitted. A year later, she gives birth to a child in the United States. Two years after that, she is apprehended and the passport fraud is discovered. On what grounds will she be removable? Will she qualify for relief under INA § 237(a)(1)(H)?

3. POST-ENTRY CONDUCT RELATED TO IMMIGRATION CONTROL

In this section on deportability grounds related to immigration control, the first two subsections dealt generally with defects in the noncitizen's entry. This third subsection concerns post-entry events.

One such ground is INA § 237(a)(1)(B), which describes any noncitizen who "is present in the United States in violation of this Act or any other law * * *." That language is sometimes invoked when a nonimmigrant violates the conditions of his or her stay—for example by overstaying or by working without authorization. Those kinds of violations simultaneously trigger INA § 237(a)(1)(C)(i) (failure to maintain, or to comply with the conditions of, one's nonimmigrant status.)

You will recall that, under IMFA, noncitizens admitted on the basis of certain marriages receive only conditional permanent residence for the first two years. INA § 216. The same is true under an analogous program for the conditional admittance of immigrant investors. INA § 216A. An immigrant whose conditional status was terminated under either program becomes deportable under INA § 237(a)(1)(D). This provision too can be thought of as reaching individuals who fail to comply with one particular condition on which they are admitted.

In the previous subsection, you saw that inadmissibility at the time of entry is a ground for deportability. INA § 237(a)(1)(A). The same provision makes deportable any noncitizen who was inadmissible at the time he or she received adjustment of status.

INA §§ 261–266 impose certain registration, address reporting, and other requirements on various classes of noncitizens present in the United States. See especially INA § 265(a) (noncitizens subject to registration requirement must report changes of address within ten days). Wilful violations of these requirements are criminal offenses, INA § 266, and can be grounds for deportability even without criminal convictions. INA § 266(b). As discussed more fully in chapter 10, section B.2, the government has rediscovered the registration provisions and is enforcing them far more vigorously in the wake of September 11.

Finally, INA § 237(a)(1)(E) covers certain cases of people-smuggling. A criminal conviction is not required. The Secretary of Homeland Security has the discretion to waive this ground for LPRs who assist only certain family members. INA § 237(a)(1)(E)(iii).

D. CRIME-RELATED DEPORTABILITY GROUNDS

Criminal activity can affect a noncitizen's immigration status in various ways. It can constitute a ground for inadmissibility or a ground for deportability or both. It can destroy a person's statutory eligibility for various forms of affirmative relief from removal. It can determine whether a person will be detained while removal proceedings are pending. It can make a person ineligible for naturalization. And it can weigh against the favorable exercise of administrative discretion in a range of contexts. The immigration consequences of criminal activity are complex, but there is a good deal of helpful literature.¹³

The link between immigration law and criminal law runs in two directions. Increasingly, the government uses the criminal justice machinery to enforce the immigration laws, and conversely it uses the immigration laws—primarily the deportation laws—to enforce the criminal laws.¹⁴ Professor Jennifer Chacón observes that recent changes in both laws and enforcement priorities have disproportionately targeted “gang members” in ways that can be not only excessive but also self-defeating. Jennifer M. Chacón, Whose Community Shield?: Examining the Removal of the “Criminal Street Gang Member,” 2007 Univ. of Chicago Legal Forum 317. One article argues that the incorporation of criminal justice into immigration law has been asymmetric; harsh criminal enforcement techniques and consequences have found their way into immigration law while the expansive procedural safeguards of the criminal adjudication process have not. Legomsky, The New Path, note 14 above.

Are immigrants prone to crime? A comprehensive study by the National Bureau of Economic Research suggests they are not. Because the vast bulk of criminal offenses are committed by young males, the study focused

13. See especially Dan Kesselbrenner & Lory D. Rosenberg, National Lawyers Guild, Immigration Law and Crimes (originally published in 1984, updated periodically); Maryellen Fullerton & Noah Kinigstein, Strategies for Ameliorating the Immigration Consequences of Criminal Convictions: A Guide for Defense Attorneys, 23 American Criminal L. Rev. 425 (1986); Anna Marie Gallagher, Immigration Consequences of Criminal Convictions: Protecting Your Client's Immigration Interests in Criminal Proceedings, April 2001 Immigration Briefings; Lory Diana Rosenberg & Nelson Vargas-Padilla, An Odyssey of Immigration Consequences of Crime: The BIA's 2001 Interpretations, 78 IR 909 (June 4, 2001); Lory D. Rosenberg & Nelson Vargas-Padilla, Immigration Consequences of Crimes on the Doorstep of the Twenty-First Century, 77 IR 685 (May 26, 2000).

14. See, e.g., Jennifer M. Chacón, Unsecured Borders: Immigration Restrictions, Crime Control and National Security, 39 Conn. L. Rev. 1827 (2007); Nora V. Demleitner, Immigration Threats and Rewards: Effective Law Enforcement Tools in the “War” on Terrorism, 51 Emory L.J. 1059 (2002); Daniel Kanstroom, Criminalizing the Undocumented: Ironic Boundaries of the Post-September 11th “Pale of Law,” 29 No. Carolina J. Internat'l L. & Commercial Regulation 639

(2004); Daniel Kanstroom, Deportation, Social Control, and Punishment: Some Thoughts about Why Hard Laws Make Bad Cases, 113 Harvard L. Rev. 1890 (2000); Stephen H. Legomsky, The Alien Criminal Defendant, 14 San Diego L. Rev. 105 (1977); Stephen H. Legomsky, The New Path of Immigration Law: Asymmetric Incorporation of Criminal Justice Norms, 64 Washington & Lee L. Rev. 469 (2007); Stephen H. Legomsky, Recent Development, Deportation of an Alien for a Marijuana Conviction Can Constitute Cruel and Unusual Punishment, 13 San Diego L. Rev. 454 (1976); Maria Isabel Medina, The Criminalization of Immigration Law: Employer Sanctions and Marriage Fraud, 5 George Mason L. Rev. 669 (1997); Teresa A. Miller, Blurring the Boundaries Between Immigration and Crime Control After September 11, 25 Boston College Third World L. Rev. 81 (2005); Teresa A. Miller, Citizenship and Severity: Recent Immigration Reforms and the New Penology, 17 Georgetown Immigration L.J. 611 (2003); Robert Pauw, A New Look at Deportation as Punishment: Why at Least Some of the Constitution's Criminal Procedure Provisions Must Apply, 52 Administrative L. Rev. 305 (2000); Juliet Stumpf, The Crimmigration Crisis: Immigrants, Crime, and Sovereign Power, 56 American Univ. L. Rev. 367 (2006).

on men aged 18-40 in the United States. Within that group, the study found immigrants to be less likely, not more likely, to be institutionalized than the native-born “and much less likely to be institutionalized than native-born men with similar demographic characteristics.” The same study found that recent immigrants are less likely than earlier immigrants to be institutionalized. Kristin F. Butcher & Anne Morrison Piehl, Recent Immigrants: Unexpected Implications for Crime and Incarceration, NBER Working Paper No. 6067, at i (June 1997). A more recent study has confirmed the findings of relatively low immigrant crime rates. See Ruben G. Rumbaut & Walter A. Ewing, Immig. Policy Center, Amer. Immig. Law Foundation, The Myth of Immigrant Criminality and the Paradox of Assimilation, at 3 (2007).

Nonetheless, starting in the late 1980's, the subject of noncitizen criminals began to attract heightened public scrutiny and spur frenzied congressional activity. A stream of amendments has generally expanded the crime-related inadmissibility and deportability grounds, narrowed the availability of discretionary relief, added to the powers of law enforcement personnel, and abbreviated the procedures used in selected categories of crime-related removal cases. You will encounter most of those changes in this section and in the next two chapters. The various immigration authorities have responded in kind, redoubling their efforts to apprehend and remove noncitizens convicted of crimes. A record of almost 100,000 noncitizens were removed on criminal grounds in 2007. See 2007 Yearbook of Immigration Statistics, Table 37.

Although the present concern is with the deportability grounds that hinge on criminal conduct, it will be convenient to include here the few affirmative defenses that are specific to the crime-related deportability grounds. The more generic affirmative defenses appear in the next chapter.

Before confronting some of the specific crime-related deportability grounds, you should now skim INA § 237(a)(2) to get a general sense of its coverage.

Have you ever wondered how ICE finds out that a noncitizen has been convicted of a crime? Sometimes the individual reveals the conviction when answering a specific question in an application form or in a personal interview. Sometimes an informant will provide a tip. In addition, ICE employs full-time investigators to ferret out noncitizens who have committed crimes. See generally Maryellen Fullerton & Noah Kinigstein, Strategies for Ameliorating the Immigration Consequences of Criminal Convictions: A Guide for Defense Attorneys, 23 American Criminal L. Rev. 425, 426-27 (1986) (now somewhat dated in its details). Moreover, under 42 USC § 3753(a)(11), any state that wants to receive federal drug control grants must agree to furnish to the immigration authorities, free of charge and within 30 days, certified records of conviction of all noncitizens who are convicted of crimes in that state. Still, despite the increased congressional attention, some commentators believe that the logistical barriers to removing high proportions of criminal noncitizens remain formidable. See generally Peter H. Schuck & John Williams, Removing Criminal Aliens:

The Pitfalls and Promises of Federalism, 22 Harvard J. L. & Public Policy 367 (1999) (lamenting the slow pace of removal of noncitizen criminals, ascribing some of the obstacles to federalism, and urging greater use of state law enforcement personnel).

1. WHAT IS A CONVICTION?

Common to several deportability grounds is a requirement that the person have been “convicted” of a crime. See, e.g., INA §§ 237(a)(2)(A)(i, ii, iii, iv), 237(a)(2)(B)(i), 237(a)(2)(C, D, E(1)), 237(a)(3)(B).

Defining “conviction” has been difficult, however, largely because in modern times both the federal government and the states have crafted various formulas for avoiding the harsh effects of criminal convictions—especially in cases of youthful offenders, first-time offenders, and lower-level crimes. In the immigration context, the BIA has frequently had to adapt its definition of “conviction” to the changes in federal and state criminal procedures. The history is summarized well in Matter of Ozkok, 19 I. & N. Dec. 546 (BIA 1988), and in Matter of Punu, 22 I. & N. Dec. 224 (BIA 1998) (Rosenberg dissent).

In 1996, Congress for the first time provided a statutory definition of “conviction” for purposes of the INA. It reads:

a formal judgment of guilt of the alien entered by a court or, if adjudication of guilt has been withheld, where

(i) a judge or jury has found the alien guilty or the alien has entered a plea of guilty or nolo contendere or has admitted sufficient facts to warrant a finding of guilt, and

(ii) the judge has ordered some form of punishment, penalty, or restraint on the alien’s liberty to be imposed.

INA § 101(a)(48)(A), added by IIRIRA § 322(a)(1). For purposes of this definition, probation is punishment. Matter of Punu, 22 I. & N. Dec. 224, 228 (BIA 1998).

In many states, sentencing judges have the discretion to defer entry of final judgments of guilt in certain cases. Typically, the judge in such a case accepts a plea of guilty or nolo contendere or finds guilt, then orders the defendant to pay a fine and/or serve a period of probation, and, absent further problems, terminates the proceeding without ever entering a formal judgment of guilt. Before IIRIRA, many of those proceedings were held not to have resulted in “convictions.” But after IIRIRA, the finding or admission of guilt, followed by an order of punishment, amounts to a conviction. See Punu, above.

The word “conviction” also implies a “crime.” The so-called “civil offenses” do not qualify. In Matter of Eslamizar, 23 I. & N. Dec. 684 (BIA 2004), a noncitizen was found guilty of a “violation” under Oregon law. The Oregon procedure required proof only by a preponderance of the evidence, not beyond a reasonable doubt, and it provided no right to either counsel or a jury trial. The Board held that, to give rise to a conviction of a crime for immigration purposes, the procedure has to provide “the constitutional safeguards normally attendant upon a criminal conviction.” The Oregon procedure for trying alleged “violations” did not meet that standard. In dictum, the Board exempted foreign convictions from that requirement; for them, the test is whether the foreign jurisdiction treats the proceeding as criminal.

Until IIRIRA, it was also clear that the immigration consequences of a conviction would not attach until the conviction was final. The leading case was Pino v. Landon, 349 U.S. 901, 75 S.Ct. 576, 99 L.Ed. 1239 (1955). The courts uniformly held that a conviction was not final while a direct appeal as of right was still pending. (Neither a discretionary appeal nor a collateral attack on the conviction precluded finality.) Not yet clear, however, is whether INA § 101(a)(48)(A), added by IIRIRA and reproduced above, eliminated the finality requirement. In Matter of Cardenas Abreu, 24 I. & N. Dec. 795 (BIA en banc 2009), a state appellate court had agreed to accept a late-filed appeal of a criminal conviction. By a vote of 8–6, the BIA held that the pendency of that late-filed appeal did not disturb the finality of the conviction for immigration purposes. Seven of the members—Member Grant concurring and Member Greer (joined by five others) dissenting—interpreted the statute as retaining the finality requirement; two members (Member Pauley concurring, joined by one other)—construed the statute as dispensing with the finality requirement entirely; and the other five members expressed no view on the issue. The courts of appeals are similarly divided.¹⁵

Most of these issues can be lumped under the heading “Was there ever a conviction?” In many cases, however, the original existence of a conviction is clear under any standard, and the question is whether subsequent events have erased that conviction for purposes of immigration.

While the validity of a criminal conviction may not be collaterally attacked in removal proceedings, see, e.g., Zinnanti v. INS, 651 F.2d 420, 421 (5th Cir.1981), there are post-conviction remedies that can be pursued in the court that entered the conviction. A full examination of those remedies is beyond the scope of this book, but a few are common enough in deportation cases to warrant consideration here. For a thorough treatment, see Dan Kesselbrenner & Lory D. Rosenberg, National Lawyers Guild, Immigration Law and Crimes (continually updated).

15. The cases are cited in Cardenas-Abreu, 24 I. & N. Dec. at 797 n.3; see generally Anna Marie Gallagher, Immigration Consequences of Criminal Convictions: Protecting

Your Client's Immigration Interests in Criminal Proceedings, April 2001 Immigration Briefings 8–9.

a. WITHDRAWING GUILTY PLEAS

United States v. Parrino

United States Court of Appeals, Second Circuit, 1954.
212 F.2d 919.

■ HINCKS, CIRCUIT JUDGE.

* * * [The defendant] pleaded guilty to the second count of the indictment which charged a conspiracy to kidnap—an offense denounced by Section 1201(c) of the Code—whereupon the first count, charging commission of the substantive offense denounced by Section 1201(a), was dismissed with the consent of the United States Attorney. * * *

This motion, invoking Rule 32(d) of the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure, seeks to vacate the judgment of conviction and to permit the defendant to withdraw his prior plea of guilty (on the strength of which a sentence of two years was imposed which now has been fully served) on the ground that he pleaded guilty only in reliance on the assurance of his counsel at the time that the plea would not have effect of subjecting him to deportation, and that now, notwithstanding that assurance, a deportation proceeding has been instituted against him, the validity of which depends upon the conviction which in turn depended solely upon his plea of guilty. Thus is presented the question whether on the underlying record it would constitute “manifest injustice” within the purview of Rule 32(d) to hold him to his plea and leave the judgment of conviction undisturbed.

Before proceeding to discuss this question we should state that the record on this appeal amply supports the finding below that in fact before changing his plea the defendant was indeed informed by the lawyer then representing him that a plea of guilty would not subject him to deportation. The pending motion is supported in that respect not only by affidavits of the defendant and his wife but also by the lawyer himself. And there is no dispute that this information, doubtless innocently made, was erroneous. Although there was no express finding by the court below that the defendant acted in reasonable reliance on this erroneous information, for purposes of this opinion we assume that that was so.

But even so, we think the order should be affirmed. Generally in criminal cases, the defendant’s surprise as to the severity of sentence imposed after a plea of guilty, standing alone, is not such manifest injustice as to require vacation of the judgment and permission to withdraw a plea of guilty. True, when surprise stems from a misunderstanding, reasonably entertained, of remarks by the Judge himself, * * * or from assurances by the United States Attorney, it may be ground for post-conviction relief. But surprise, as in the instant case, which results from erroneous information received from the defendant’s own attorney, at least without a clear showing of unprofessional conduct, is not enough.

Moreover, here the subject-matter of the claimed surprise was not the severity of the sentence directly flowing from the judgment but a collateral consequence thereof, namely, deportability. * * *

Doubtless there may frequently arise tax evasion cases in which after conviction on a plea of guilty the defendant is unpleasantly surprised when, confronted with a civil action for the recovery of the evaded taxes, he finds a defense foreclosed by his plea in the criminal cases. And after pleading guilty to an offense which, though of small dimensions, is classified as a felony, a defendant may be shocked to find that he has lost his civil rights,—or that, after his conviction has faded into the past, he is faced with loss of his employment because he can only answer in the affirmative some questionnaire demanding to know if he has ever been convicted of a felony. The writer of this opinion, during his tenure on the trial bench, was more than once consulted by young men, duly convicted on a plea of guilty to a comparatively small offense, who were distressed to find that a later consequence of their plea was ineligibility for enlistment in the armed services. We think it plainly unsound to hold, as now in principle we are urged to hold, that such defendants are subjected to manifest injustice, if held to their plea, merely because they did not understand or foresee such collateral consequences. * * *

* * *

Order affirmed.

■ FRANK, CIRCUIT JUDGE (dissenting).

* * *

The defendant before he pleaded guilty was primarily concerned, not with the length of the jail sentence that might be imposed, but with the question uppermost in his mind, whether as a consequence of being again sentenced, he could be deported. As previously noted, he addressed this question to his lawyer, a former Commissioner of Immigration, who unequivocally answered No. But for that answer, he would not have entered his plea of guilty which he now seeks to withdraw.

My colleagues say that to prevent “manifest injustice,” such permission to withdraw a guilty plea must be granted if a defendant’s surprise related to the length of his sentence and stemmed from defendant’s reasonable misunderstanding of remarks made by the judge or by the prosecutor. But my colleagues hold (a) that surprise as to the grave consequences of a sentence—here deportation—does not have the same effect; and that, in any event, (b) it does not suffice that the surprise was induced by the advice of the defendant’s own lawyer—even when, as here, that advice was so thoroughly wrong as, in itself, to disclose unmistakable glaring incompetence on the part of that lawyer. I disagree as to both (a) and (b). I shall discuss them in turn.

1. Deportation, while not literally constituting criminal punishment, may have far more dire effects on this defendant than his sentence of imprisonment for two years. For all practical purposes, the court sentenced him to serve (a) two years in jail and (b) the rest of his life in exile.¹⁶ * * *

* * *

16. At the time of this decision, a deportation order barred future readmission forever, unless the INS, in its discretion, granted permission to reapply for admission.

2. This is not a case of collateral attack on a judgment of conviction by way of habeas corpus or the like. In such cases, some (not all) courts have held there is no lack of due process because of defendant's counsel's gross incompetence, if his counsel was of defendant's choosing. But here the issue is not one of unconstitutionality. The issue is this: On a motion to vacate a conviction and withdraw a guilty plea, in order to permit defendant to go to trial, does the fact that the plea resulted from the grossly erroneous advice to the defendant by his own lawyer render it "manifestly unjust" to leave the consequent conviction standing? Several courts have held that it does—and (contrary to my colleagues' suggestion) without any showing that the lawyer was guilty of what my colleagues call "unprofessional conduct" (which I assume means conduct justifying disbarment).
* * *

In cases where a defendant on appeal from a conviction asks reversal on the ground that his lawyer made a mistake during the trial, many courts have denied relief unless the mistake was magnificent and clearly prejudiced defendant. Those courts in such cases seem to have felt (1) that what might seem to be a mistake, was part of the lawyer's deliberate tactics, or (2) that, in the heat of trial, some "errors of judgment" on the part of counsel, when under such pressure, are so likely often to occur that they should not invalidate a conviction. But here the lawyer's mistake did not occur during a trial; he was under no pressure whatever; there was no need for haste. And his error cannot conceivably be described as one involving merely "bad judgment."

The courts (as I have said) do reverse a conviction on appeal when defendant's counsel was hopelessly incompetent and the incompetence seriously prejudiced defendant. So, e.g., where counsel was unfamiliar with the rules of evidence, or did not know that "he could procure witnesses and have forcible process to obtain them in defendant's behalf."

That a lawyer who had served as a Commissioner of Immigration, even if he had been asked for a curbstone opinion only, should give advice flatly contrary to the deportation statute would be surprising enough. But when, with ample time to examine the statute, and a Supreme Court decision sustaining its validity, this lawyer did not do so and recklessly gave completely wrong advice, he was, beyond any possible doubt, egregiously derelict in the discharge of his duty to his client. Surely the courts have a considerable responsibility for the conduct of lawyers whom they admit to practice and whom they thereby invest with power to counsel laymen. To be sure, as my colleagues say, a court does not represent "that the members of its bar are infallible." But it does, I think, represent that they will not recklessly fail to read a statute before answering a single simple legal question. What is the sense of the constitutional requirement that defendant have counsel before pleading guilty, if the counsel be utterly

The same result would occur today for Parrino, but only because his particular crime would qualify as an aggravated felony.

INA. § 212(a)(9)(A). Generally, the present statute prescribes a ten-year bar after removal from the interior. Id.—Eds.

without legal competence to guide his client? When a lawyer gives his client an erroneous opinion on a question the correct answer to which, by no stretch of the imagination, could be considered doubtful, and the client, relying on that opinion, enters a plea of guilty which will disastrously affect his future life, it is hard to understand how it can be maintained that "manifest injustice" has not occurred. If not, I wonder how manifest the injustice must be.

* * *

My colleagues, surprisingly, refer to cases in which a defendant who, without any previous inquiry as to the consequences, is convicted on a plea of guilty, later learns that, because of his conviction, he has lost his civil rights or is ineligible for enlistment in the armed services. What has any such case to do with this case where the defendant did inquire whether conviction could lead to a life of exile and received the answer that it could not, an answer given by his lawyer, who ought eminently to know how ridiculous that answer was?

We must not be gullible but must eye with due suspicion attempts to use the Rule to circumvent justice. But, as Cardinal de Retz observed, more men become dupes through fear of being taken in than through over-gullibility. As an earnest that this man is not playing a game with the court, not seeking by clever tricks to evade his just deserts, we have this striking fact: He has already served his two-year jail sentence. Yet he is willing to take the chance of a new trial, as a result of which, unless the jury acquits him, he will not be sent again to jail but to the death chair, so that the sentence he has served will count for nothing.

Sometimes a statute inescapably commands judges to conform to a legal ritual indifferent to justice. Then, regret it as we may, we judges must administer "injustice according to law." But we should regard such instances as exceptional, deplorable, and should not, generalizing from them, conclude that doing justice is not our role, that the "administration of justice" is an empty phrase not to be taken literally. When, therefore, a Rule tells us in the plainest words to avoid manifest injustice, I believe we should eagerly embrace the opportunity, not extend earlier decisions to escape it.

* * *

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. First, what do you think of the principle that, before accepting a guilty plea, the trial judge must advise the defendant of the direct consequences but not the collateral consequences? Second, what do you think of the rule that deportation is only a collateral consequence? Today most courts subscribe to both propositions.¹⁷

17. See the long list of cases cited in People v. Pozo, 746 P.2d 523, 526 (Colo. 1987). For a potent attack on the collateral consequences rule (not just in the deporta-

2. As of 2003, somewhere between 18 and 21 states had passed laws that require either the sentencing judge or the defense attorney to advise the noncitizen defendant that a conviction might jeopardize his or her immigration status.¹⁸

3. A related theory for attacking convictions like those in Parrino is that the attorney's incompetence constituted ineffective assistance of counsel, in violation of the Sixth Amendment right to counsel in a criminal case.

This subject is taken up separately in chapter 9, § B.2.d below.

b. EXPUNGEMENTS

Under various federal and state statutes, it is sometimes possible to expunge criminal convictions. The statutes are diverse; some apply to youth offenders, others to first offenders, and still others to adults who have been sentenced to probation. Do such expungements erase the convictions for immigration purposes? A long line of cases has fashioned complex rules that hinge on whether the statute is state or federal, whether it is for adults or youth offenders, and whether the conviction is a crime involving moral turpitude, a drug offense, a firearms offense, or some other crime. For a good summary, see Anne J. Greer & Teresa L. Donovan, "Conviction" as Defined Under the Immigration and Nationality Act: An Evolving Meaning, Mar. 2006 Immigration Briefings.

Much of the case law developed before 1996. In that year, Congress added to the INA a specific definition of "conviction," INA § 101(a)(48)(A), as you have seen. The definition for the most part tracked the language of the then most recent BIA decisions. In a dramatic shift, the BIA in 1999 interpreted the new statutory language to mean that expungement under a state rehabilitative statute never erases the conviction for immigration purposes. Matter of Roldan, 22 I. & N. Dec. 512 (BIA 1999). The Board based its decision on what it believed to be the plain language of the statutory conviction definition and on the congressional purpose of promoting uniform results from state to state. There were two strong dissents. For an effective criticism, see James A.R. Nafziger & Michael Yimesgen, The Effect of Expungement on Removability of Non-Citizens, 36 Univ. Michigan J. L. Reform 915 (2003). The BIA has since recognized one narrow exception, for expungements under state statutes that correspond to federal juvenile delinquency provisions. See Matter of Devison, 22 I. & N. Dec. 1362 (BIA 2000).

tion context), see Gabriel J. Chin & Richard W. Holmes, Effective Assistance of Counsel and the Consequences of Guilty Pleas, 87 Cornell L. Rev. 697 (2002). For an analogous attack on the principle that deportation is a merely collateral consequence, see Lea McDermid, Deportation is Different: Noncitizens and Ineffective Assistance of Counsel, 89 California L. Rev. 741, 756-64 (2001).

18. See Attila Bogdan, Guilty Pleas by Non-Citizens in Illinois: Immigration Consequences Reconsidered, 53 DePaul L. Rev. 19, 49-50 (2003); John J. Francis, Failure to Advise Non-Citizens of Immigration Consequences of Criminal Convictions: Should This Be Grounds to Withdraw a Guilty Plea?, 36 Univ. Michigan J. L. Reform 691, 694 n.13 (2003).

What happens if a final judgment of conviction is entered, but the judgment is reversed or vacated because of a flaw in the original proceeding? It might seem obvious that such a conviction does not suffice for removal purposes, and the Attorney General has so indicated. Matter of Marroquin-Garcia, 23 I. & N. Dec. 705, 713 (A.G. 2005) (statutory definition of “conviction” is “clearly not intended to encompass convictions that have been formally entered but subsequently reversed on appeal or in a collateral proceeding for reasons pertaining to the factual basis for, or procedural validity of, the underlying judgment”).¹⁹ If, for example, the particular reason for vacating the conviction was that the criminal court had failed to comply with a state statute requiring judges to advise noncitizen defendants of the possible deportation consequences of their guilty pleas, the conviction will cease to exist for immigration purposes. Matter of Adamiak, 23 I. & N. Dec. 878 (BIA 2006).

In what can only be described as a caricature of judicial formalism, one court—the Fifth Circuit—has held otherwise. In Discipio v. Ashcroft, 369 F.3d 472 (5th Cir. 2004), the court held that even a conviction that is reversed because of flaws in the underlying original judgment survives for purposes of removal. The court acknowledged that that result defied both common sense and the statute itself, id. at 473, but felt bound to reach that conclusion because one of its prior decisions, Renteria-Gonzalez v. INS, 322 F.3d 804 (5th Cir. 2002), while admittedly presenting a different issue (whether vacating a conviction on equitable grounds for the apparent purpose of avoiding removal eliminates the conviction) had used broad language which, literally read, would extend to reversals on the merits. Under those circumstances, the Discipio panel said, it was powerless to distinguish Renteria-Gonzalez on the facts; only the full court sitting en banc or the Supreme Court could do that. The government later announced that it would reconsider its position, and the court seized the opportunity to vacate its decision as moot. Discipio v. Ashcroft, 417 F.3d 448 (5th Cir. 2005). Ultimately, the government decided it would no longer consider convictions valid for immigration purposes once the convictions had been reversed because of flaws in the original judgments. See Gaona-Romero v. Gonzales, 207 Fed. Appx. 386 (5th Cir. 2006) (unpublished).

Thus, the general rule now is that convictions that have been expunged or vacated because of legal error do not count for immigration purposes. In contrast, with some exceptions, convictions that are expunged for reasons of rehabilitation or to prevent deportation continue to exist for immigration purposes. Nath v. Gonzales, 467 F.3d 1185, 1188–89 (9th Cir. 2006); Pickering v. Gonzales, 465 F.3d 263, 269 (6th Cir. 2006). Professor Andrew Moore, in Criminal Deportation, Post-Conviction Relief and the Lost Cause of Uniformity, 22 Georgetown Immigration L.J. issue 4 (forthcoming 2009), explores the current distinction between convictions that are vacated 19. Accord, Pickering v. Gonzales, 465 F.3d 263 (6th Cir. 2006); Pinho v. Gonzales, 432 F.3d 193 (3d Cir. 2005); Matter of Rodriguez-Ruiz, 22 I. & N. Dec. 1378 (BIA 2000); see generally Lory Diana Rosenberg, Recognition of Vacation of Conviction and Matter of Pickering: Comedy or Tragedy?, 8 BIB 1103 (July 1, 2003).

because of defects and those vacated for rehabilitative or humanitarian reasons. He argues that neither of the stated objectives of that distinction—achieving uniformity and preventing judges from impeding deportation—has been achieved. The distinction has also generated some interesting burden of proof questions, which are explored in question 3 below.

The federal First Offender Act (the FFOA) permits expungements of convictions of simple possession of narcotics by first-time offenders. Before IIRIRA, it was clear that federal first offender expungements eliminated the convictions for removal purposes. At least two courts have expressly declined to decide whether IIRIRA altered that result. Acosta v. Ashcroft, 341 F.3d 218, 224 (3d Cir. 2003); Gill v. Ashcroft, 335 F.3d 574, 578–79 (7th Cir. 2003). On the assumption that the FFOA exception survives IIRIRA, however, the question has arisen whether the same is true of expungements under similar state statutes. The Ninth Circuit has held that it is, reasoning that to recognize federal expungements while withholding recognition from similar state expungements would be irrational and, therefore, violative of equal protection. Lujan-Armendariz v. INS, 222 F.3d 728 (9th Cir. 2000). The courts in Acosta and Gill, above, disagree, holding that under IIRIRA's statutory definition of conviction, a conviction survives the state equivalent of an FFOA expungement; cf. Vasquez-Velezmoro v. USINS, 281 F.3d 693 (8th Cir. 2002) (conviction survives at least in the case where the defendant's sentence exceeded the maximum that would have been allowable under the analogous federal law). The BIA also disagrees with the Ninth Circuit view and has announced it will not apply it except in Ninth Circuit cases. Matter of Salazar-Regino, 23 I. & N. Dec. 223 (BIA 2002).

The Attorney General has declined to decide the continued viability of either the FFOA exception or its state equivalents. Matter of Marroquin-Garcia, 23 I. & N. Dec. 705, 717 (A.G. 2005). The Attorney General did subsequently hold, however, that, at least when a conviction does not involve first-time simple possession of narcotics, the federal definition “encompasses convictions . . . that have been vacated or set aside under an expungement statute for reasons that do not go to the legal propriety of the original judgment, and that continue to impose some restraints or penalties upon the defendant's liberty.” Id. at 705. The same now appears to be true in the Ninth Circuit, where the court declined to recognize an expungement entered pursuant to a general adult expungement statute. Murillo-Espinoza v. INS, 261 F.3d 771 (9th Cir. 2001).

Finally, in Dillingham v. INS, 267 F.3d 996 (9th Cir. 2001), the Ninth Circuit gave effect to a foreign expungement of a drug conviction, where the person would have qualified for expungement under the U.S. federal First Offenders Act had the violation been one of United States federal law. The court reached that result on equal protection grounds, finding no rational basis for recognizing United States federal and state expungements while refusing to recognize foreign expungements.

Be careful to distinguish sentencing changes from changes to a conviction. In Matter of Cota-Vargas, 23 I. & N. Dec. 849 (BIA 2005), a noncitizen was convicted of receiving stolen property and was sentenced to probation for 365 days. The trial judge reduced the sentence to 240 days of probation for the specific purpose of eliminating the relevant removal ground. By a 2–1 vote, the BIA held the modified sentence controls, regardless of the court’s reason for reducing the sentence. The Board distinguished Pickering, noting that in that case the court had been bound by the statutory definition of “conviction,” not a consideration in Cota-Vargas.

QUESTIONS

1. As a policy matter, should expungements erase any criminal convictions, for purposes of deportability?

2. How do the philosophical premises for recognizing at least certain expungements compare with the philosophical premises that underlie the definition of “conviction” in INA § 101(a)(48)(A)?

3. Recall that, for immigration purposes, the continuing validity of a conviction that has been vacated depends on whether the reason for vacating it was a flaw in the original judgment, rather than immigration or rehabilitation objectives. But which party has the burden of proving the reason that the conviction was vacated? In Matter of Chavez-Martinez, 24 I. & N. Dec. 272 (BIA 2007), the BIA held that a noncitizen who seeks to reopen a removal proceeding because a conviction has been vacated has the burden of proving that the conviction was not vacated for immigration or rehabilitation purposes, citing a circuit split on the burden of proof issue. The Board reasoned that the noncitizen was a “direct party” to the criminal proceedings and “is therefore in the best position to know why the conviction was vacated.” It also noted the “late stage of the proceedings” (meaning the motion to reopen stage), and distinguished Pickering on the ground that the present case involved a motion to reopen. First, based on those two rationales, if the same issue were to arise in a simple appeal of a removal order rather than on a motion to reopen, to whom do you think the BIA would assign the burden of proof? Second, who should have the burden of proof, either in a direct appeal or on a motion to reopen? In answering the latter question, identify the criteria that you think should generally determine who has the burden of proof in any setting, and then ask how the rationales you have identified would apply to this issue.

c. EXECUTIVE PARDONS

Under INA § 237(a)(2)(A)(v), a Presidential or gubernatorial pardon eliminates deportability under § 237(a)(2)(A), which covers moral turpitude crimes, aggravated felonies, and convictions of high-speed flight from immigration checkpoints. There is no analogous provision for the other crime-related deportability grounds.

d. MISCELLANEOUS COLLATERAL ATTACKS

Collateral attacks on criminal convictions can take a variety of other forms as well. See, e.g., Ira P. Robbins, The Revitalization of the Common Law Civil Writ of Audita Querela as a Post-Conviction Remedy in Criminal Cases: The Immigration Context and Beyond, 6 Georgetown Immigration L.J. 643, 672-87 (1992). The old writ of error "coram nobis" can also sometimes be used to vacate a criminal conviction because of error at trial. See Julie M. Song, In re L: Overcoming an Aggravated Felony Conviction through the Common Law Remedy of Coram Nobis, 77 IR 993 (July 24, 2000).

2. CRIMES INVOLVING MORAL TURPITUDE

INA §§ 237(a)(2)(A)(i and ii) cover certain noncitizens who have been convicted of one or more crimes involving "moral turpitude." The issues here are multitudinous; these materials provide only a sampling. Read both subsections now. See generally Norton Tooby & JJ Rollin, Crimes of Moral Turpitude—The Complete Guide (2008 ed.).

a. THE MEANING OF "CRIME INVOLVING MORAL TURPITUDE"

Marciano v. INS

United States Court of Appeals, Eighth Circuit, 1971.
450 F.2d 1022.

■ VAN OOSTERHOUT, CIRCUIT JUDGE.

* * *

[Petitioner] * * * entered the United States on an immigration visa on January 20, 1967. * * * Petitioner admits that he was convicted of statutory rape in violation of Minnesota Statutes Annot. § 609.295(4), that he was sentenced to three-years imprisonment and that his conviction was affirmed by the Supreme Court of Minnesota on April 3, 1969. He contends, however, that such conviction does not form a basis for deportation for the reasons hereinafter stated.

* * *

I.

Petitioner's first contention that the phrase "crime involving moral turpitude" as defined in the deportation statute lacks sufficient standards to justify deportation and is therefor [sic] unconstitutional for vagueness has been rejected by the Supreme Court in Jordan v. DeGeorge. We are foreclosed by that decision from considering the constitutional issue urged.

II.

We are satisfied that petitioner's second contention to the effect that the statutory rape offense of which he was convicted is not a crime involving moral turpitude lacks merit. Minnesota Statutes Annot. § 609.295(4), the criminal statute under which petitioner was convicted, reads:

“Whoever has sexual intercourse with a female child under the age of 18 years and not his spouse may be sentenced as follows:

* * *

(4) if the child is 16 years of age but under the age of 18 years and the offender is 21 years of age or older, by imprisonment for not more than three years.”

* * *

The Minnesota Supreme Court * * * holds that criminal intent is not an element of an offense against a minor under the age of consent and that an honest belief of the accused that the victim had reached the age of consent when in fact she had not constitutes no defense. * * *

* * *

* * * Marciano was told by his victim that she was fifteen or sixteen years of age prior to the commission of the offense, that the petitioner had sexual intercourse with the victim on the date charged, and that petitioner was the aggressor. * * *

Federal courts [and the BIA—Eds.] have consistently held that statutory rape is a crime involving moral turpitude. * * *

* * *

The deportation order is affirmed.

■ GARNETT THOMAS EISELE, DISTRICT JUDGE (dissenting).

I must dissent from the opinion of the majority.²⁰ I feel that a proper reading of the phrase “crime involving moral turpitude”, contained in INA § 241(a)(4), would require that the case be returned to the Board of Immigration Appeals to determine if the petitioner’s criminal conduct here did or did not, factually, “involve moral turpitude.” * * *

* * * What might be called the “traditional” rule of construction of this phrase was expressed well by Judge Learned Hand:

“Neither the immigration officials, nor we, may consider the circumstances under which the crime was in fact committed. When by its definition it does not necessarily involve moral turpitude, the alien cannot be deported because in the particular instance his conduct was immoral.”

Other decisions make it clear that the “definition” of the crime referred to in this statement of the rule includes the terms of the statute, any

20. [Footnote 1 in original] Petitioner also states in his brief that aliens are not being dealt with according to any uniform standards applicable generally across the country. This is true. For example, in the present case, the information charged that the girl was sixteen at the time of the violation of Minnesota’s laws. The two could have engaged in the act of intercourse in any one of twenty-seven states without Marciano being subject to prosecution for “statutory rape”. In any of those states, he would not have committed this crime, and thus Congress’ requirements for deportation would not have been met. * * *

definitive construction of it by state courts, and the language of the indictment or information. The Service and reviewing courts, in following this approach, must determine whether all hypothetically possible criminal conduct, falling within those limits, must necessarily involve moral turpitude. If it does, the alien may be deported; if not, he may not be.²¹ This rule is followed in the Second, Seventh, Ninth and District of Columbia Circuits, and probably in the Fifth Circuit as well.

* * * The reason stated for the rule, when a rationale is given, is one of practical administrative convenience. It is said, probably correctly, that it would be extremely difficult and time-consuming for the Immigration Service to examine into the factual context of every conviction sustained by an alien to see whether moral turpitude was, or was not, present in the circumstances of the particular crime as committed. In addition, examples are often given of conduct clearly criminal, but which would just as clearly not have involved moral turpitude. To relieve the Service of a heavy factfinding burden, and to prevent miscarriages of justice in instances where the conduct did not involve moral turpitude, five Circuits have said that the crime as charged must under all possible sets of circumstances necessarily involve moral turpitude before the alien can be deported. Under this rule, it does not matter how clear it is that the particular petitioner-alien did indeed engage in morally turpitudinous conduct. In fact, the Service and the courts, using this approach, are barred from inquiring into the facts of any individual case and can only look at the indictment, the language of the statute, and court decisions construing same.

More recently, however, the First Circuit has criticized the traditional rule and adopted a somewhat different one. That court, in Pino v. Nicolls, 215 F.2d 237 (1954), indicated its view that the accurate application of the older rule would practically emasculate § 241(a)(4):

“[I]t is possible to conceive of circumstances under which almost any crime might be committed for the purest of motives, motives, however, which the law does not accept as a defense.”

This criticism seems to me entirely valid, and I would add the additional observation that the criticized rule must certainly have resulted in the permitting of any number of aliens who had indeed committed crimes involving moral turpitude to remain in this country. I cannot believe that Congress intended for such persons to be allowed to remain simply because there might have been no moral turpitude in the commission by other individuals (real or hypothetical) of crimes described by the wording of the same statute under an identical indictment.

21. [Footnote 2 in original] This rule could be supported by the grammatical structure of the statute, as could the one I advocate in this opinion. I do not believe that prior decisions have made an analysis of the grammar as such. Here “crime” in the phrase “crime involving moral turpitude” could be interpreted with reference to: (1) the statutory or common law statement; or (2) the facts alleged to constitute the violation. My view is that the statutory or common law statement cannot constitute a “crime”. The crime must consist in the acts in violation of that legal statement.

This Court, in its opinion today, appears to implicitly agree that the traditional rule is not the best one.²² Certainly it has not followed it. Rather, it appears to adopt and follow the rationale stated in Pino v. Nicolls:

“If the crime in its general nature is one which in common usage would be classified as a crime involving moral turpitude, neither the administrative officials in a deportation proceeding nor the courts on review of administrative action are under the oppressive burden of taking and considering evidence of the circumstances of a particular offense so as to determine whether there were extenuating circumstances which might relieve the offender of the stigma of moral obliquity.”

The majority here takes the same approach, and this is the point at which my disagreement begins.

I cannot agree that Pino v. Nicolls adopted the best rule when it asked that the Service and the reviewing courts look only to the “general nature” of the crime and its classification in “common usage”. Congress did not decree deportation where there was a conviction of a crime which “generally” or “commonly” involves moral turpitude. It said that deportation was the consequence when the crime involved moral turpitude, and I can only assume that it meant when moral turpitude was in fact involved.

