There are many instances in which the application of the Pino v. Nicolls rule would itself result in a miscarriage of justice. There are the cases cited by Judge Anderson in his dissent in Tillinghast v. Edmead, 31 F.2d 81 (1st Cir.1929), of a mother stealing milk for her hungry child, of a “foolish college student” stealing a sign, and of a boy stealing an apple from an orchard; and there is the situation posed by Judge Learned Hand of a boy’s forcing his way into a vacant building. There are, of course, literally hundreds of other examples that could be given. All of these hypothetical situations are crimes, involving criminal intent and criminal culpability. All of them could result in deportation under the rule of Pino v. Nicolls, and of the majority here, because such crimes as larceny, burglary, and breaking and entering “usually”, “commonly” and “generally” involve moral turpitude. None of them can be said to involve moral turpitude, however; not, at least, without further examination into the factual context. It might be that today some crimes would be held to involve moral turpitude which judges writing in past years did not think contravened the moral standards of that time. The converse might be true with regard to other types of offenses. The point is that I do not believe Congress intended for all aliens in these, and many other hypothetical situations, [to] be deported. The statute says deportation shall follow when the crime committed involves moral turpitude, not when that type of crime “commonly” or “usually” does.

22. [Footnote 4 in original] If the “traditional” rule were to be followed here, the decision of the Board of Immigration Appeals, in my opinion, would have to be reversed and Marciano discharged from the effect of the deportation order.

It seems obvious, therefore, that both the "traditional" rule and the Pino v. Nicolls rule produce results contrary to those intended by the plain language of the deportation statute. The Pino v. Nicolls rule, in addition, mandates the extremely severe consequence of deportation from this country in at least some instances which may admittedly (by its very hypothesis) result in gross miscarriages of justice. The rule I think preferable has, as far as I am aware, been stated at the appellate levels only in the dissent in Tillinghast v. Edmead, supra. Judge Anderson there quoted the lower court opinion and urged it upon his colleagues. I will do the same here:

"Whether any particular conviction involves moral turpitude under this test may be a question of fact. Some crimes are of such character as necessarily to involve this element; others * * * do not; and still others might involve it or might not. As to this last class the circumstances must be regarded to determine whether moral turpitude was shown."

Perhaps the Pino v. Nicolls analysis ("it is possible to conceive of circumstances under which almost any crime might be committed for the purest of motives") is so universally applicable that it would completely eliminate the first of these three categories of crimes, but that for present purposes is immaterial. I think the three-classification approach is the most appropriate one, however nearly all-inclusive the "might or might not" class may be.

* * *

Since moral turpitude is different from criminality, the statute seems to require that that element be assessed separately. Undoubtedly it is difficult for the Service to make continual determinations of the nation's shifting and often indistinct moral standards. Nevertheless, it seems to me that such determinations are what the law requires. Considerations of administrative convenience should certainly be secondary to the determination and enforcement of the obvious legislative intent. It may or may not be wise to charge an administrative agency with this sort of duty, but Congress has done so and the Supreme Court has said that the standard provided is sufficiently definite that administrators will be able to apply it.

* * *

At the time of Marciano's original guilty plea, Minnesota law required only two elements to be shown to sustain a conviction under its statutory rape statute: an act of intercourse, and the statutorily prescribed age of the girl. Defenses such as the previous unchaste character of the girl, reasonable mistake as to age, a marriage which the parties thought they had contracted in the past but which was void for some technical defect,²³ all of

23. [Footnote 6 in original] This situation is clearly possible under the Minnesota statute. A man over twenty-one and a girl over sixteen, with the consent of her parents, may legally marry. If such a couple went through a marriage ceremony which they thought was valid, but which was not because, say, the person performing the ceremony was not licensed properly, the man might nevertheless be convicted under the

which are available as defenses to at least some other states' "statutory rape" laws, were no bar in Minnesota to prosecution or conviction. Neither, of course, was the consent of the girl to the act. * * *

No one can reasonably say that every act warranting conviction under a statute such as Minnesota's would necessarily constitute a crime involving moral turpitude. I do not think, therefore, that this crime can be put into the first classification suggested by Ex parte Edmead, with Mr. Marciano consequently deported without a factual determination ever having been made as to the presence or absence of moral turpitude.

* * *

I must concede that the four judicial, and the one administrative, decisions cited by the majority, along with several others, are unanimous in holding "statutory rape" to be a crime involving moral turpitude without regard to the actual, factual context. I also concede, arguing, that such crimes "usually" and "commonly" involve moral turpitude.²⁴ The particular decisions reveal very little about the nature of the offenses as defined by the separate states' laws or about the circumstances surrounding the crimes as committed by the particular individuals in those cases. With knowledge of such matters I might, or might not, have agreed with the results reached in those decisions. However, to the extent that they hold the factual context irrelevant, and to the extent that they hold that every hypothetically possible instance of intercourse with an underage female must of necessity involve moral turpitude, I must disagree with them. I might be inclined to a different view if fornication and adultery were held in all instances to involve moral turpitude, but such is not the case. I believe the appellation, the short title, of the crime (particularly the word "rape") has had a tendency to mislead courts in the past. I seriously doubt that in today's society an instance of consensual intercourse necessarily involves moral turpitude just because the state in which the act took place has raised the age of consent to eighteen years. * * *

In summary, the "traditional" rule would prevent the deportation of many persons who had committed crimes actually involving moral turpitude. On the other hand, under the rule of Pino v. Nicolls, now apparently followed by this Court, persons committing crimes not involving moral turpitude may be deported if such crimes are generally ones that, when committed, involve moral turpitude. It seems unlikely that Congress intended either result.

* * *

Act if he had intercourse with his assumed "wife" on their assumed "honeymoon" because the girl would not be "his spouse" and thus excepted under the Act. See Minn.Statutes Anno. § 609.295(4).

24. [Footnote 7 in original] Actually, the validity of such an assumption is doubtful at best. It would certainly be true if we were dealing with Delaware's statutory rape law, which sets the age of consent at seven years, or with the laws of a state setting it at ten, or twelve. Minnesota, however, is among the states with the highest ages of consent, and the proposition assumed above for argument's sake is extremely tenuous when speaking of a state statute that includes young women a few days short of their eighteenth birthday within its prohibition.

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. The court first dismisses, as precluded by the Supreme Court decision in Jordan v. DeGeorge, the argument that the statutory phrase “moral turpitude” is unconstitutionally vague. Surfacing most commonly in the criminal context, the doctrine that statutory language must not be unduly vague stems from fairness concerns that are part of procedural due process. See, e.g., Palmer v. City of Euclid, 402 U.S. 544, 91 S.Ct. 1563, 29 L.Ed.2d 98 (1971). Before leaving this portion of Marciano, try to figure out (a) precisely what it is about vague statutes that makes them unfair, and (b) whether those objections apply to the provision that makes conviction of a “moral turpitude” crime a deportability ground.

2. On the main issue—what it means to say that a crime involves moral turpitude—Attorney General Mukasey issued an important opinion shortly before leaving office. His position, like that of Judge Eisele in Marciano, focuses on the conduct of the particular defendant, and for mostly the same reasons. In Matter of Silva-Trevino, 24 I. & N. Dec. 687 (AG 2008), the Attorney General announced the following three-step process: The adjudicator asks first whether there is a “realistic probability, not a theoretical possibility” that a person whose actual conduct did not involve moral turpitude could be convicted under the particular statute. If the essential elements of the statute make it impossible to commit the crime without moral turpitude, or if no actual case can be found in which such a result has occurred, then the adjudicator is to hold that the noncitizen’s crime involves moral turpitude. If one or more actual cases can be found in which the defendant was convicted without having shown moral turpitude, then the adjudicator is to proceed to step 2. In that step the adjudicator is to examine the record of conviction, including the trial or plea transcript. If the record reveals whether the defendant’s conduct involved moral turpitude, then the inquiry ends there. If the record is inconclusive on that score, then the adjudicator moves to step 3. This involves ranging beyond the record, examining all available evidence that might indicate whether the defendant acted with moral turpitude. In conducting that inquiry, however, the adjudicator must accept as fact any findings necessarily made in the criminal proceedings; those issues may not be relitigated. Because courts generally defer to the interpretations of the agency charged with administering the statute, this Attorney General opinion is likely to influence future interpretations of the courts of appeals. In Keungne v. United States Attorney General, 561 F.3d 1281 (11th Cir. 2009), however, decided only four months later, the Eleventh Circuit continued to follow the traditional categorical approach and did not mention the decision in Silva-Trevino.

3. The dissenting opinion of Judge Eisele suggests three different views of what Congress meant by the requirement that the “crime” involve moral turpitude—the traditional view, the view of the majority opinion in Marciano, and the view of the dissent. Articulate all three views and then identify the pros and cons of each.

4. Is Judge Eisele correct to assume that the Marciano majority implicitly adopted the Pino formulation?

5. This issue has produced more than its share of confusion. In Matter of R, 6 I. & N. Dec. 444 (1954), where the BIA explicitly adopted the traditional view, this sentence appears: “If we find that violation of the law under any and all circumstances involves moral turpitude, then we must conclude that all convictions under that law involved moral turpitude although the ‘particular acts evidence no immorality’” (emphasis in original). Id. at 448. Does the “although” clause make sense?

6. How does the Pino view, which the dissent ascribes to the Marciano majority, actually work? What is meant by “common usage?” Is this an appeal to the sense of the community? If so, what community? Is the court expected to seek out the gut instincts of the “reasonable person” whom you came to know and admire in torts? Is deportation ultimately to be decided by the rider on the Clapham omnibus?

7. In theory, the vast majority of courts today subscribe to the traditional rule, e.g., Knapik v. Ashcroft, 384 F.3d 84 (3d Cir. 2004), although that pattern might change quickly in the light of Silva-Trevino, item 2 above. In practice, it is difficult to see how some of the crimes that have been held to involve moral turpitude (see especially the larceny hypotheticals cited in the dissent) could possibly be said to involve moral turpitude in all the fact situations that those crimes could conceivably embrace. Do the courts truly mean to suggest that the “mother stealing milk for her hungry child” has acted not only criminally but with moral turpitude as well?

8. The three views discussed up to this point go to the question of what must involve moral turpitude—the crime in the abstract, the actual conduct of the particular defendant, or something in between. Under any of those views, there remains the question of what “moral turpitude” means. The leading definition is “an act of baseness, vileness, or depravity in the private and social duties which a man owes to his fellow men, or to society in general, contrary to the accepted and customary rule of right and duty between man and man.” Marciano, 450 F.2d at 1025; Sosa-Martinez v. United States Attorney General, 420 F.3d 1338, 1341 (11th Cir. 2005). Apart from its archaic gendered language, the weakness in this definition lies in its probably unavoidable level of generality. How does a court determine whether an act is base, vile, or depraved? (Is the disjunctive to be taken literally? Can an act be vile and depraved without being base?) Does this formulation have religious connotations? Should a court ask whether a given act violates the Ten Commandments? Whether the sin is cardinal rather than venial? What, in other words, does this definition add to the phrase “moral turpitude?”

In Silva-Trevino, the Attorney General commented on this issue as well. He concluded that moral turpitude requires “reprehensible” conduct and “some form of scienter.” 24 I. & N. Dec. at 706. For the latter purpose, the opinion implies that even simple negligence is enough; the opinion states repeatedly that moral turpitude will be found if the person “knew or reasonably should have known” the essential facts. Id. at 705–09.

9. Along the same lines, whose standards are to govern whether conduct is “reprehensible?” This question has several dimensions: Is it the court’s moral standards or those of the community? If the latter, then which community—national, state, local, ethnic? And what is the pertinent time period for assessing social mores? Should a court go by the values prevailing at the time the phrase “moral turpitude” first appeared in an immigration statute? (The phrase first emerged in an exclusion provision. See Act of March 3, 1891, ch. 551, § 1, 26 Stat. 1084.) The last time the deportation provision was amended? The last time the INA was amended? The time of the conduct that gave rise to the crime? The time of the removal hearing? Which of these options would you select? The BIA position is that “contemporary moral standards” are the governing criteria. Matter of Torres-Varela, 23 I. & N. Dec. 78 (BIA 2001).

10. The accumulated case law now provides a fairly detailed catalog of crimes that do, and crimes that do not, involve moral turpitude. Certain patterns emerge: Crimes that involve fraud or intent to defraud are almost always classified as moral turpitude crimes. Simple assault—including domestic violence, see Matter of Sanudo, 23 I. & N. Dec. 968 (BIA 2006)—generally does not involve moral turpitude, but aggravated forms of assault (e.g. assault with a deadly weapon, assault with intent to kill, etc.) generally do. So do murder and voluntary manslaughter, but involuntary manslaughter ordinarily does not, unless the particular statute requires “reckless” conduct, Franklin v. INS, 72 F.3d 571 (8th Cir. 1995). If a crime does not involve moral turpitude, then repeated convictions of the same offense do not give rise to moral turpitude even if a statute makes a repeat performance an “aggravated” offense. Matter of Torres-Varela, 23 I. & N. Dec. 78 (BIA 2001) (aggravated driving under the influence). In contrast, aggravated driving under the influence can be a crime involving moral turpitude if defined to require knowledge that one’s license has been suspended because of prior offenses. Matter of Lopez-Meza, 22 I. & N. Dec. 1188 (BIA 1999). For lists of which crimes have been held to involve moral turpitude and which have not, see 6 Gordon, Mailman & Yale-Loehr § 71.05[1][d][iii].

In Silva-Trevino, the Attorney General ultimately held that “sexual contact” with a minor involves moral turpitude, but only if the defendant actually knew or reasonably should have known that the victim was a minor. Since the statute in that case did not allow mistake of age as a defense, the Attorney General had to remand to the BIA for a finding concerning the noncitizen’s knowledge. See item 2 above.

PROBLEMS 14–16²⁵

Which of the following individuals have been convicted of crimes involving moral turpitude? For each, apply all three of the views discussed by Judge Eisele.

Problem 14. A committed a mercy killing. She took the life of her father, who had been in the final weeks of a clearly fatal disease and who had been suffering intense physical pain. She was convicted of voluntary manslaughter.

Problem 15. A state statute makes it a crime to receive property if the person “knows or should have known that said property is stolen.” B was charged with that offense. At trial, a prosecution witness testified she had overheard the defendant saying he had known all along the property had been stolen. The defendant denied having made that statement. The jury found him guilty, and a judgment of conviction was entered.

Problem 16. C, arrested after a brutal beating of his wife, was charged with assault with intent to kill. The jury found him guilty of a lesser charge, simple assault. At the removal hearing, the immigration judge made a finding that C in fact had harbored an intent to kill.

b. “COMMITTED WITHIN FIVE YEARS . . . AFTER THE DATE OF ADMISSION”

Read INA § 237(a)(2)(A)(i) carefully before doing the following Problems:

PROBLEMS 17–18

Problem 17. X was admitted to the United States as an LPR in February 2005. In December 2009 he was arrested on charges of state income tax fraud (in the amount of $3,000), punishable in this jurisdiction by up to five years in state prison. At a jury trial in March 2010, he was found guilty and a judgment of conviction was entered. He was sentenced to six months in county jail. Assume this jurisdiction holds that this crime involves moral turpitude. Is X deportable?

Problem 18. Y was admitted to the United States as an LPR on November 16, 2003. In December 2008 he went to Bangladesh to visit his relatives and to start up a business that would export gift items to the United States. When he returned ten months later, in October 2009, he was greeted by the local sheriff and arrested on charges of petit larceny, a crime punishable in this jurisdiction by up to one year of confinement. The subsequent indictment alleged that the acts constituting the larceny had occurred “on or about November 15, 2008.” In January 2010, Y was

25. As discussed in section D.4 below, conviction of an “aggravated felony” is an independent ground for deportability; no showing of moral turpitude is required. INA § 237(a)(2)(A)(iii). The crimes committed in this set of Problems might or might not be aggravated felonies, depending on the sentencing. For purposes of this exercise, assume they are not. Under that assumption, the moral turpitude issues are not moot.

convicted of petit larceny and sentenced to six months in jail. Is he deportable?

c. SENTENCING REQUIREMENTS

One other requirement under section 237(a)(2)(A)(i) is that “a sentence of one year or longer may be imposed” (emphasis added). That language reflects a change introduced by AEDPA § 435 in 1996. Before then, only a person actually sentenced to a year or more would be deportable on this ground. INA § 241(a)(2)(A)(i)(II) (pre-1996 version). Now, potential punishment is what counts for this purpose.

d. TWO CRIMES INVOLVING MORAL TURPITUDE

A separate deportability ground, INA § 237(a)(2)(A)(ii), reaches noncitizens who after admission have been convicted of two crimes involving moral turpitude “not arising out of a single scheme of criminal misconduct,” regardless of how many years after admission and regardless of the nature or length of the sentence. The quoted phrase is not defined in the statute, and the courts have essentially divided into two camps.

In Pacheco v. INS, 546 F.2d 448 (1st Cir.1976), the First Circuit held that, to constitute a single scheme, the crimes “must take place at one time; there must be no substantial interruption that would allow the participant to disassociate himself from his enterprise and reflect on what he has done.” Id. at 451. Applying that test, the court in Pacheco found that two break-ins separated by two days did not arise out of a “single scheme.” The BIA approved the Pacheco approach in Matter of Adetiba, 20 I. & N.Dec. 506 (BIA 1992), and several other circuits have followed suit. See Adetiba, 20 I. & N.Dec. at 508–12 and cases cited therein.

The Ninth Circuit rejects Pacheco and Adetiba. Emphasizing that the statute refers to a single scheme rather than to a single act, the court in Gonzalez-Sandoval v. United States INS, 910 F.2d 614 (9th Cir.1990), held it sufficient that the two crimes “were planned at the same time and executed in accordance with that plan.” Id. at 616.

Read INA § 237(a)(2)(A)(ii) and then do the following Problem:

PROBLEM 19

X, a noncitizen, was admitted to the United States as an LPR on June 14, 2004. On October 7, 2009, X was tried on two counts of bribing a public official, a crime punishable by up to ten years in prison. The evidence showed that X had given the head of the city licensing division $1000 in cash to secure a liquor license for one of X’s two restaurants, and that later that same day X had returned to give the same official another $1000 to obtain a liquor license for the other restaurant. Several weeks later a secretary who had witnessed both exchanges came forward. She was able to testify at trial that the exchanges had taken place in June 2009, though she could not recall the exact date. X was convicted on both counts and, because of some unusually sympathetic circumstances, received concurrent sentences of only six months. Is X deportable?

e. JUDICIAL RECOMMENDATIONS AGAINST DEPORTATION

Until the Immigration Act of 1990, the law provided an important remedy known as the “judicial recommendation against deportation.” Immigration lawyers generally used the acronym “JRAD” (pronounced “jay-rad”). It applied only to those noncitizens who were otherwise deportable under the predecessor of INA §§ 237(a)(2)(A)(i) (conviction of one crime involving moral turpitude) or 237(a)(2)(A)(ii) (two or more such crimes)—not, for example, to anyone deportable because of drug offenses (discussed below). Under former INA § 241(b)(2) the sentencing judge, at the time of sentencing or within thirty days thereafter, could make a “recommendation” that the person not be deported. Before deciding whether to issue the recommendation, the judge had to give the prosecution and the former INS “due notice” and an opportunity to be heard. Despite its name, a properly issued JRAD was more than just helpful advice; it prohibited the INS from deporting the person on the basis of the particular crime.

These timing and notice requirements were rigidly interpreted. In many cases, neither the criminal defense lawyer nor the judge had ever heard of JRADs, and it was only after the INS had initiated deportation proceedings and the noncitizen had engaged an immigration lawyer that the criminal court learned of the existence of this remedy. By then, the 30-day time period had long since elapsed. Sentencing judges who believed that the facts of particular cases warranted clemency attempted to issue late JRADs, but the courts and the BIA were virtually unanimous in rejecting those attempts. See, e.g., Velez-Lozano v. INS, 463 F.2d 1305, 1308 (D.C.Cir.1972) (“troubled by a deportation that will now occur because of failings in the trial judge and petitioner’s trial counsel,” but feeling bound to invalidate the JRAD); United States ex rel. Piperkoff v. Esperdy, 267 F.2d 72 (2d Cir.1959) (sentencing judge may not avoid 30-day limit by vacating criminal conviction, entering new judgment, and then issuing JRAD within 30 days of new judgment); Matter of M.G., 5 I. & N. Dec. 531 (BIA 1953) (criminal defense lawyer requested JRAD in time, but judge was on vacation and returned after 30-day period had expired; late JRAD held invalid). Occasionally, a sentencing judge would hold that the defense lawyer’s failure to request a JRAD constituted ineffective assistance of counsel, vacate the sentence on that ground, pronounce a new sentence, and at the same time issue a JRAD. One court upheld a JRAD issued under those circumstances. Janvier v. United States, 793 F.2d 449 (2d Cir.1986).

The Immigration Act of 1990, § 505, repealed the JRAD provision. The repeal was retroactive to the extent that it prohibited courts from issuing future JRADs even in connection with pre-1990 convictions. Id. § 505(b). Under the interpretation of the former INS, however, the repeal provision does not destroy the validity of pre-1990 JRADs. See Renteria-Gonzalez v.

INS, 322 F.3d 804, 811 n.5 (5th Cir. 2002) (amended opinion). Even today, therefore, the immigration lawyer needs to know what a JRAD is and what its consequences are.

JRADs raise a fundamental question about who should decide whether to remove a noncitizen who has been convicted of a crime. Congress can make the decision itself by enacting fixed rules, or it can delegate discretionary power to others. When it takes the latter course, it must decide who those others are and how much discretion they should have. Authorizing judges to issue binding JRADs thus shifts some measure of power from the immigration officials to the courts. What would be the pros and cons of restoring JRADs?

One alternative, more radical than the resurrection of JRADs, is also worth considering. Instead of prescribing removal unless the sentencing judge recommends against it, the statute could bar removal unless the sentencing judge recommends in favor of it. Such an approach would eliminate the problem of noncitizens being removed because of their attorneys', or judges', ignorance of immigration law. The idea might sound far-fetched, but it has in fact been adopted in the United Kingdom (which doesn't mean it isn't far-fetched). See Immigration Act 1971, § 3(6). What do you think of that approach?

More recently, Congress has authorized the sentencing judges to enter removal orders themselves in certain criminal cases. These "judicial deportations" will be taken up in chapter 9 below.

3. DRUG OFFENSES

Narrow classes of noncitizen drug offenders have been deportable since 1922. See Act of May 26, 1922, ch. 202, 42 Stat. 596, 597. Over the years, Congress has expanded the range of drug offenses that would trigger deportation. The main drug-related deportability ground today is INA § 237(a)(2)(B), which you should now read carefully. Note that this ground refers to the federal statutory definition of "controlled substance" in 21 USC § 802. Subsection (6) of the latter provision, in turn, defines a "controlled substance" as any substance that appears in one of five schedules contained within 21 USC § 812. Under 21 USC § 811, the Attorney General has the authority to expand those schedules.

Since 1988, a noncitizen convicted of any offense that is considered "illicit trafficking in a controlled substance" has more to worry about than INA § 237(a)(2)(B). Such an offense is also classified as an "aggravated felony." INA § 101(a)(43)(B). Noncitizens convicted of aggravated felonies are subject to removal on an additional ground, INA § 237(a)(2)(A)(iii), and they are adversely affected in other ways that are explored in the next subsection.

PROBLEMS 20-21

For purposes of the next two Problems, ignore any issues concerning aggravated felonies.

Problem 20. A was admitted as an LPR at age 13. Eight years later, A was convicted of selling two marijuana joints to his college roommate. Is he deportable?

Problem 21. B, a noncitizen, pleads guilty, in state court, to one count of driving while under the influence of a controlled substance. The state's definition of "controlled substance" includes some drugs that do not appear in the federal definition. The record of conviction does not specify the particular drug that B used. Is she deportable?

You have seen in this subsection a number of respects in which the deportability provisions treat even the mildest drug offenses more severely than some of the more serious crimes involving moral turpitude: the five-years-after-entry requirement that is part of INA § 237(a)(2)(A)(i) but not part of section 237(a)(2)(B)(i); the one-year-sentence requirement for which the same is true; and the availability of executive pardons when deportability is based on § 237(a)(2)(A)(i) but not when it is based on section 237(a)(2)(B)(i). Earlier you saw a similar pattern in the inadmissibility grounds. See INA § 212(a)(2)(A)(ii) (containing exceptions to the inadmissibility of people convicted of crimes involving moral turpitude but not for those convicted of drug offenses). When the particular drug offenses also constitute aggravated felonies (see the next subsection), the treatment is harsher still. What do you think of this pattern? If you are not satisfied, in what general direction would you move the law? Liberalize the drug provisions? Toughen the provisions that govern crimes involving moral turpitude? Both? Congress's approach has been to make more of the moral turpitude crimes aggravated felonies. For another approach, see Stephen H. Legomsky, Reforming the Criteria for the Exclusion and the Deportation of Alien Criminal Offenders, 12 In Defense of the Alien 64 (1990).

4. AGGRAVATED FELONIES

In 1988, heightened concerns about drug abuse led Congress to add a new deportation ground that would soon expand far beyond the drug context. The Anti-Drug Abuse Act of 1988, Pub.L. 100-690, §§ 7342, 7344, 102 Stat. 4181, 4469-71 (Nov. 18, 1988), created a new concept called "aggravated felony" and rendered deportable any noncitizen who, after entry (now changed to "after admission"), has been convicted of an aggravated felony. INA § 237(a)(2)(A)(iii).²⁶

The consequences of making a crime an aggravated felony are far-reaching. One major consequence is that, unlike the deportability ground

²⁶ Some good general summaries include Lory Diana Rosenberg & Nelson Vargas-Padilla, An Odyssey of Immigration Consequences of Crime: The BIA's 2001 Interpretations, 78 IR 909, 911-12 (June 4, 2001); Lory D. Rosenberg & Nelson Vargas-Padilla, Immigration Consequences of Crimes on the Doorstep of the Twenty-First Century, 77 IR 685 (May 26, 2000).

for moral turpitude crimes, aggravated felonies don't have to be committed within five years after admission in order to give rise to deportability. An LPR who was first admitted as a small child and who commits an aggravated felony at age 60 becomes deportable. Also unlike the moral turpitude provision, an aggravated felony makes a person deportable without regard to the potential or actual sentence (although some crimes—not all—won't be "aggravated felonies" unless certain sentencing requirements are met.) As you will see later, calling a crime an aggravated felony also eliminates most discretionary relief possibilities (chapter 8), deletes certain procedural safeguards (chapter 9), triggers mandatory detention from the time removal proceedings begin until the time the person is removed, INA § 236(c)(1)(B), prevents the person after removal from ever returning to the United States without special permission from the Secretary of Homeland Security, see INA § 212(a)(9)(A)(ii), and subjects the person to a 20-year prison term if found in the United States unlawfully without that special permission, INA § 276(b)(2). In addition, under the United States Sentencing Guidelines, the sentence imposed in a federal criminal case can be increased dramatically if the person has previously been deported because of a conviction of an aggravated felony, see 18 USC App. § 2.L.1.2(b)(1)(A), though the recent Supreme Court decision in United States v. Booker, 543 U.S. 220, 125 S.Ct. 738, 160 L.Ed.2d 621 (2005), has made those guidelines advisory rather than mandatory. For that reason, the case law on criminal sentence enhancement has become a fertile source of the meaning of "aggravated felony."

All these otherwise sweeping consequences would be relatively unsurprising if the definition of aggravated felony were narrow enough. The original definition was, in fact, a modest one. It included murder, drug trafficking, and firearms trafficking (plus conspiracies and attempts to commit these crimes). See Pub. L. 100-690, 102 Stat. 4181, § 7342 (Nov. 18, 1988).

From its humble origins, however, the aggravated felony definition has grown into a colossus. A series of amendments have steadily expanded its reach, to the point where an "aggravated felony" need not be "aggravated" and, as explained below, need not be a felony.²⁷

Among the many prongs of the aggravated felony definition that you will soon see, some expressly require that the crime be a felony, not a misdemeanor. Most, however, do not say. A divided BIA had once held en banc that at least one of the prongs that was silent on the issue (sexual abuse of a minor) had to be a felony in order to be an "aggravated felony." Matter of Crammond, 23 I. & N. Dec. 9 (BIA 2001), vacated on unrelated

27. See, e.g., Imm. Act 1990, § 501(a)(3); Immigration and Nationality Technical Corrections Act of 1994, Pub.L. 103-416, § 222, 108 Stat. 4305, 4320-22 (Oct. 25, 1994); AEDPA § 440(e) (1996); IIR-IRA § 321 (1996). For strong criticisms of the broad reach and severe consequences of the aggravated felony provisions, see Nancy Morawetz, Understanding the Impact of the 1996 Deportation Laws and the Limited Scope of Proposed Reforms, 113 Harvard L. Rev. 1936, 1939 (2000); Shoba Sivaprasad Wadhia, The Policy and Politics of Immigrant Rights, 7 Temple Political & Civil Rights L. Rev. 387, 393 (2007).

jurisdictional grounds, 23 I. & N. Dec. 179 (BIA 2001). But shortly thereafter the BIA, in another divided en banc decision, reversed course. In Matter of Small, 23 I. & N. Dec. 48 (BIA 2002), the Board held that the “sexual abuse of a minor” prong of the aggravated felony definition does indeed cover misdemeanors. Rather than reexamine the issue on the merits, the BIA relied principally on the fact that, by then, three courts of appeals had interpreted the same provision to encompass misdemeanors. See United States v. Gonzales-Vela, 276 F.3d 763 (6th Cir. 2001); United States v. Marin-Navarette, 244 F.3d 1284 (11th Cir. 2001); Guerrero-Perez v. INS, 242 F.3d 727 (7th Cir. 2001).

One major complication has been retroactivity. As just noted, a series of statutes has expanded the aggravated felony definition. These various enactments have provided differing degrees of retroactivity. To understand the variations, remember that labelling a crime an aggravated felony has many consequences—not just deportability. It is necessary, therefore, to distinguish between the effective date of a change in the definition of “aggravated felony” and the effective dates of the provisions that assign various specific consequences to aggravated felony convictions.²⁸ The complexity has prompted two commentators to say, in reference to the retroactivity issue, “If you’re not confused, you don’t understand the situation.”²⁹ For present purposes it is enough to note the retroactivity issues rather than try to resolve them.

One last observation: When you study the aggravated felony definition in INA § 101(a)(43), you might notice that some of the listed crimes require a “term of imprisonment” of a certain duration (e.g. subsections F, G, P, R, and S) while others require only that a certain sentence “may be imposed” or that the offense be “punishable” by a certain term (e.g., subsections J, Q, and T). When the phrase “term of imprisonment” is used, Congress means to refer to the sentence actually imposed (not the maximum possible sentence under the statute). INA § 101(a)(48)(B).

At this time, please read INA §§ 237(a)(2)(A)(iii), 101(a)(43), and 101(a)(48)(B).

One of the most important prongs of the aggravated felony definition is prong (F), which relates to “crimes of violence.” The following Supreme Court opinion explores its limits:

Leocal v. Ashcroft

Supreme Court of the United States, 2004.
543 U.S. 1, 125 S.Ct. 377, 160 L.Ed.2d 271.

■ CHIEF JUSTICE REHNQUIST delivered the opinion of the Court.

Petitioner Josue Leocal, a Haitian citizen, * * * immigrated to the United States in 1980 and became a lawful permanent resident in 1987. In ²⁸ The authors are indebted to Lory Rosenberg and Daniel Kanstroom for articulating this distinction.

²⁹ James P. Fleissner & James A. Shapiro, Federal Sentences for Aliens Convicted of Illegal Reentry Following Deportation: Who Needs the Aggravation?, 9 Georgetown Immigration L.J. 451 (1995); see also Matter of Reyes, 20 I. & N. Dec. 789 (BIA 1994); Matter of A.A., 20 I. & N. Dec. 492, 495-500 (BIA 1992).

January 2000, he was charged with two counts of DUI causing serious bodily injury under Fla. Stat. § 316.193(3)(c)(2), after he caused an accident resulting in injury to two people. He pleaded guilty to both counts and was sentenced to two and a half years in prison.

In November 2000, while he was serving his sentence, the Immigration and Naturalization Service (INS) initiated removal proceedings against him pursuant to § 237(a)[(2)(A)(iii)] of the INA. Under that provision, “any alien who is convicted of an aggravated felony . . . is deportable” and may be removed upon an order of the Attorney General. Section 101(a)(43)[(F)] of the INA defines “aggravated felony” to include, inter alia, “a crime of violence (as defined in section 16 of title 18, but not including a purely political offense) for which the term of imprisonment [is] at least one year.” Title 18 USC § 16, in turn, defines the term “crime of violence” to mean:

(a) an offense that has as an element the use, attempted use, or threatened use of physical force against the person or property of another, or

“(b) any other offense that is a felony and that, by its nature, involves a substantial risk that physical force against the person or property of another may be used in the course of committing the offense.”

Here, the INS claimed that petitioner’s DUI conviction was a “crime of violence” under § 16, and therefore an “aggravated felony” under the INA.

In October 2001, an Immigration Judge found petitioner removable, relying upon the Eleventh Circuit’s decision in Le v. United States Attorney General, 196 F.3d 1352 (1999) (per curiam), which held that a conviction under the Florida DUI statute qualified as a crime of violence. The BIA affirmed. Petitioner completed his sentence and was removed to Haiti in November 2002. In June 2003, the Court of Appeals for the Eleventh Circuit dismissed petitioner’s petition for review, relying on its previous ruling in Le, supra. We granted certiorari to resolve a conflict among the Courts of Appeals on the question whether state DUI offenses similar to the one in Florida, which either do not have a mens rea component or require only a showing of negligence in the operation of a vehicle, qualify as a crime of violence. * * * We now reverse the Eleventh Circuit.

Title 18 USC § 16 was enacted as part of the Comprehensive Crime Control Act of 1984, which broadly reformed the federal criminal code in such areas as sentencing, bail, and drug enforcement, and which added a variety of new violent and nonviolent offenses. Congress employed the term “crime of violence” in numerous places in the Act, such as for defining the elements of particular offenses, see, e.g., 18 USC § 1959 (prohibiting threats to commit crimes of violence in aid of racketeering activity), or for directing when a hearing is required before a charged individual can be released on bail, see § 3142(f) (requiring a pretrial detention hearing for those alleged to have committed a crime of violence). Congress therefore provided in § 16 a general definition of the term “crime of violence” to be used throughout the Act. Section 16 has since been incorporated into a variety of statutory provisions, both criminal and noncriminal.

Here, pursuant to § 237(a) of the INA, the Court of Appeals applied § 16 to find that petitioner’s DUI conviction rendered him deportable. In determining whether petitioner’s conviction falls within the ambit of § 16, the statute directs our focus to the “offense” of conviction. See § 16(a) (defining a crime of violence as “an offense that has as an element the use . . . of physical force against the person or property of another” (emphasis added)); § 16(b) (defining the term as “any other offense that is a felony and that, by its nature, involves a substantial risk that physical force against the person or property of another may be used in the course of committing the offense” (emphasis added)). This language requires us to look to the elements and the nature of the offense of conviction, rather than to the particular facts relating to petitioner’s crime.

Florida Stat. § 316.193(3)(c)(2) makes it a third-degree felony for a person to operate a vehicle while under the influence and, “by reason of such operation, cause . . . serious bodily injury to another.” The Florida statute, while it requires proof of causation of injury, does not require proof of any particular mental state. * * * Many States have enacted similar statutes, criminalizing DUI causing serious bodily injury or death without requiring proof of any mental state or, in some States, appearing to require only proof that the person acted negligently in operating the vehicle. The question here is whether § 16 can be interpreted to include such offenses.

Our analysis begins with the language of the statute. See Bailey v. United States, 516 U.S. 137, 144, 133 L. Ed. 2d 472, 116 S. Ct. 501 (1995). The plain text of § 16(a) states that an offense, to qualify as a crime of violence, must have “as an element the use, attempted use, or threatened use of physical force against the person or property of another.” We do not deal here with an attempted or threatened use of force. Petitioner contends that his conviction did not require the “use” of force against another person because the most common employment of the word “use” connotes the intentional availment of force, which is not required under the Florida DUI statute. The Government counters that the “use” of force does not incorporate any mens rea component, and that petitioner’s DUI conviction necessarily includes the use of force. To support its position, the Government dissects the meaning of the word “use,” employing dictionaries, legislation, and our own case law in contending that a use of force may be negligent or even inadvertent.

Whether or not the word “use” alone supplies a mens rea element, the parties’ primary focus on that word is too narrow. Particularly when interpreting a statute that features as elastic a word as “use,” we construe language in its context and in light of the terms surrounding it. The critical aspect of § 16(a) is that a crime of violence is one involving the “use . . . of physical force against the person or property of another.” (Emphasis added.) As we said in a similar context in Bailey, “use” requires active employment. While one may, in theory, actively employ something in an accidental manner, it is much less natural to say that a person actively employs physical force against another person by accident. Thus, a person would “use . . . physical force against” another when pushing him; however, we would not ordinarily say a person “uses . . . physical force against” another by stumbling and falling into him. When interpreting a statute, we must give words their “ordinary or natural” meaning. The key phrase in § 16(a)—the “use . . . of physical force against the person or property of another”—most naturally suggests a higher degree of intent than negligent or merely accidental conduct. Petitioner’s DUI offense therefore is not a crime of violence under § 16(a).

Neither is petitioner’s DUI conviction a crime of violence under § 16(b). Section 16(b) sweeps more broadly than § 16(a), defining a crime of violence as including “any other offense that is a felony and that, by its nature, involves a substantial risk that physical force against the person or property of another may be used in the course of committing the offense.” But § 16(b) does not thereby encompass all negligent misconduct, such as the negligent operation of a vehicle. It simply covers offenses that naturally involve a person acting in disregard of the risk that physical force might be used against another in committing an offense. The reckless disregard in § 16 relates not to the general conduct or to the possibility that harm will result from a person’s conduct, but to the risk that the use of physical force against another might be required in committing a crime. The classic example is burglary. A burglary would be covered under § 16(b) not because the offense can be committed in a generally reckless way or because someone may be injured, but because burglary, by its nature, involves a substantial risk that the burglar will use force against a victim in completing the crime.

Thus, while § 16(b) is broader than § 16(a) in the sense that physical force need not actually be applied, it contains the same formulation we found to be determinative in § 16(a): the use of physical force against the person or property of another. Accordingly, we must give the language in § 16(b) an identical construction, requiring a higher mens rea than the merely accidental or negligent conduct involved in a DUI offense. This is particularly true in light of § 16(b)’s requirement that the “substantial risk” be a risk of using physical force against another person “in the course of committing the offense.” In no “ordinary or natural” sense can it be said that a person risks having to “use” physical force against another person in the course of operating a vehicle while intoxicated and causing injury.

In construing both parts of § 16, we cannot forget that we ultimately are determining the meaning of the term “crime of violence.” The ordinary meaning of this term, combined with § 16’s emphasis on the use of physical force against another person (or the risk of having to use such force in committing a crime), suggests a category of violent, active crimes that cannot be said naturally to include DUI offenses. * * * Interpreting § 16 to encompass accidental or negligent conduct would blur the distinction between the “violent” crimes Congress sought to distinguish for heightened punishment and other crimes.

* * *

[Here the Court observes that, just nine months before incorporating crimes of violence into the aggravated felony definition, Congress enacted an unrelated provision that similarly distinguished crimes of violence from both DUI and reckless driving. See INA § 101(h).—Eds.]

This case does not present us with the question whether a state or federal offense that requires proof of the reckless use of force against a person or property of another qualifies as a crime of violence under 18 USC § 16. DUI statutes such as Florida’s do not require any mental state with respect to the use of force against another person, thus reaching individuals who were negligent or less. Drunk driving is a nationwide problem, as evidenced by the efforts of legislatures to prohibit such conduct and impose appropriate penalties. But this fact does not warrant our shoehorning it into statutory sections where it does not fit. The judgment of the United States Court of Appeals for the Eleventh Circuit is therefore reversed, and the case is remanded for further proceedings consistent with this opinion.

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. Throughout this book you have encountered the principle that courts must defer to “reasonable” interpretations of federal statutes by the administrative agencies that are charged with administering them. Chevron USA v. NRDC, 467 U.S. 837, 843–44, 104 S.Ct. 2778, 81 L.Ed.2d 694 (1984). Yet deference to the BIA was noticeably absent in Leocal. Why do you suppose that was? Consider Tran v. Gonzales, 414 F.3d 464 (3d Cir. 2005). There the court held that no judicial deference is due to a BIA interpretation of a federal criminal statute for purposes of whether the offense is a “crime of violence.” The court reasoned that “interpretation of criminal statutes is a task outside the BIA’s special competence and congressional delegation, while it is very much a part of this Court’s competence.” Id. at 467. Using similar reasoning, courts have held more generally that a federal court need not defer to the BIA’s determination of whether a particular federal crime is an aggravated felony.³⁰

Second, consider a related point. In Leocal, the Chevron deference principle combined in an odd way with two BIA practices—the practice of overruling its prior interpretations and the practice of considering itself bound by the law of the circuit in which a case arises. Originally, the BIA position was that DUI is a crime of violence. See, e.g., Matter of Puente-Salazar, 22 I. & N. Dec. 1006, 1012–13 (BIA 1999) (en banc). In Le v. United States Attorney General, 196 F.3d 1352, 1353–54 (11th Cir. 1999),

30. See, e.g., Bobb v. Attorney General, 458 F.3d 213, 217 n.4 (3d Cir. 2006); Soliman v. Gonzales, 419 F.3d 276, 281 (4th Cir. 2005). Cf. Garcia-Lopez v. Ashcroft, 334 F.3d the Court of Appeals for the Eleventh Circuit reached a similar result (albeit with respect to a slightly differently worded statute), and it did so by deferring to what it regarded as the BIA's "reasonable" interpretation. Then in Matter of Ramos, 23 I. & N. Dec. 336, 346 (BIA 2002) (en banc), the BIA overruled Puente and held that, in cases that arise in circuits that have not yet passed on the issue, DUI was not a crime of violence unless the particular statute required the reckless or intentional use of force against the person or property of another. If a case arises in a circuit that holds otherwise, the BIA said, it will follow the law of that circuit. Id. at 346-47. Since the present case (Leocal) arose in the Eleventh Circuit, the BIA felt bound by the Eleventh Circuit position that DUI is a crime of violence—even though the Eleventh Circuit in turn had arrived at that position by deferring to the BIA's own prior, and since repudiated, stance!

840, 843 n.3 (9th Cir. 2003) (reaching same conclusion for purposes of crimes involving moral turpitude).

Now that the Supreme Court has resolved this specific issue, of course, the new BIA position on DUI has become the law of the land. But the same combination of practices—judicial deference to the agency interpretation, corresponding agency deference to the court of appeals for the relevant circuit, and the power of an agency to overrule its prior interpretation—remains alive on all other questions of law that come before the BIA and the courts. What do you think are the reasons for Chevron deference in the first place? Given those reasons, does this combination of practices make sense?

2. Like the BIA, the Supreme Court in Leocal adopted a categorical approach to determining whether an offense is a "crime of violence." Rather than ask whether Mr. Leocal used physical force on the person or property of another, or whether his particular actions posed a substantial risk of such force being used, the Court confined its inquiry to the elements of the statute. It asked whether the criminal statute in question required, as an element of guilt, that the defendant use physical force, or create a substantial risk of such force, on the person or property of another. For the same reasons, domestic violence is not necessarily a crime of violence for aggravated felony purposes. Ortega-Mendez v. Gonzales, 450 F.3d 1010 (9th Cir. 2006); Matter of Sanudo, 23 I. & N. Dec. 968 (BIA 2006). Earlier you saw that the same categorical test governs whether a crime involves "moral turpitude" for purposes of INA § 237(a)(2)(A)(i)(I). (In each of those contexts, a modification is required when a statute has two or more prongs; in those cases, the court may consult the charging document to determine which of the two prongs triggered the conviction.)³¹

First, as a matter of statutory interpretation, do you agree with the Supreme Court that 18 USC § 16 contemplates a categorical test for crimes of violence? Second, note that the courts have applied a categorical test for aggravated felonies generally, not just for crimes of violence. Under INA § 101(a)(43)(G), for example, a "theft" offense will be an aggravated felony

31. Gattem v. Gonzales, 412 F.3d 758, 765 (7th Cir. 2005). Thoughtful analyses include Andrew Moore, Matter of Jacques Martin, 7 BIB 1502 (Dec. 1, 2002); and Rebecca if the term of imprisonment is at least one year. The Supreme Court has held that whether a particular offense qualifies as a “theft” offense is determined by comparing the elements of the statutory crime to the “generic” definition of “theft,” not by looking at the facts of the individual case. See, e.g., Gonzales v. Duenas-Alvarez, 549 U.S. 183, 127 S.Ct. 815, 166 L.Ed.2d 683 (2007). The same is true of “sexual abuse of a minor” for purposes of INA § 101(a)(43)(A). See Espinoza-Franco v. Ashcroft, 394 F.3d 461, 465 (7th Cir. 2005). As a policy matter, what do you think is the better way to decide whether a crime is an aggravated felony—a categorical test or a test that rests on the facts of the individual case?

Sharpless, Toward a True Elements Test: Taylor and the Categorical Analysis of Crimes in Immigration Law, 62 Univ. Miami L. Rev. 979 (2008).

3. As the Supreme Court points out, the circuits had split on the question whether DUI is a crime of violence for aggravated felony purposes. Yet the Supreme Court, not noted for its unanimity in immigration cases (or, for that matter, in any controversial cases), reached a 9–0 decision in Leocal. Was the statutory interpretation a slam dunk? What do you think accounts for this rare display of unanimity?

4. Suppose a state statute makes it a felony to “possess a firearm after having been convicted of a felony.” After Leocal, would the possession offense be a “crime of violence” for aggravated felony purposes?

5. The Court in Leocal leaves open whether the “use” element of the “crime of violence” definition contemplates only the intentional use of force, or whether a statute that requires reckless force would suffice. On that issue, post-Leocal decisions have split. For a summary of the cases, see Brian S. Green, Circuit Courts Split on Mens Rea Requirement after Leocal v. Ashcroft, Immigration Law Today at 8 (July/August 2006). As a policy matter, should the immigration laws treat the person convicted of an intentional battery more harshly than the person convicted of a reckless killing?

6. The courts of appeals are divided over whether vehicle burglaries are prong (b) crimes of violence. Compare United States v. Guzman-Landeros, 207 F.3d 1034 (8th Cir. 2000) and Lopez-Elias v. Reno, 209 F.3d 788 (5th Cir. 2000) (both holding yes) with Ye v. INS, 214 F.3d 1128, 1133–34 (9th Cir. 2000) (holding no). The Supreme Court in Leocal says in dictum that burglary is a crime of violence, since by its nature it involves a substantial risk that the burglar will use force against a victim. But there is no indication that the Court thought about vehicle burglary, a crime for which that risk might well be lower than for the traditional residential burglary. Under the categorical approach, a general burglary statute that encompasses vehicle burglary might thus be found not to be a crime of violence, notwithstanding the dictum in Leocal.

A complication here is that INA § 101(a)(43)(G) specifically makes burglary an aggravated felony, as long as the term of imprisonment is at least one year. In Taylor v. United States, 495 U.S. 575, 590–99, 110 S.Ct. 2143, 109 L.Ed.2d 607 (1990), however, the Supreme Court held that for sentence enhancement purposes the “burglary” prong of aggravated felony has a uniform, generic federal meaning, which the Court found requires the breaking and entering of a building or structure—not a vehicle. Following

Taylor, the BIA and the courts now appear in agreement that the same is true for purposes of removal proceedings against aggravated felons; thus, a conviction of vehicle burglary does not satisfy prong (G) of the aggravated felony definition in removal proceedings.³²

7. One other prong of the aggravated felony definition that has attracted recent attention is INA § 101(a)(43)(B). It covers “illicit trafficking in a controlled substance, . . . including a drug trafficking crime (as defined in section 924(c) of Title 18).” Of course, any crime that fits that description will also normally render the person deportable under INA § 237(a)(2)(B), which covers convictions of “controlled substance” offenses. The aggravated felony provision remains critical nonetheless, because, as you have seen, aggravated felony convictions preclude most forms of discretionary relief and have a host of other adverse consequences as well.

The second sub-prong of section 101(a)(43)(B) refers to “drug trafficking” crimes. Under 21 USC § 924(c)(2), a “drug trafficking crime” is defined as “any felony punishable under the Controlled Substance Act . . . [emphasis added].” The key word is “felony.” A federal conviction usually presents no significant issue. But suppose a person is convicted of a state drug offense, and the particular state classifies the offense as a felony, but the same conduct would have been only a misdemeanor under federal law. Conversely, suppose the person is convicted of a state misdemeanor drug offense but the federal law makes the same conduct a felony. These scenarios are especially common in cases of simple possession, particularly for first offenders. When they arise, which drug law—federal or state—determines whether the offense is a “felony?”

Resolving a circuit split, the Supreme Court by a vote of 8-1 (Justice Thomas dissenting) held in Lopez v. Gonzales, 549 U.S. 47, 127 S.Ct. 625, 166 L.Ed.2d 462 (2006), that a drug crime which a state classifies as a felony but which federal law classifies only as a misdemeanor is not a drug trafficking crime. This holding has tremendous practical importance. As the Court observed, many states make possession of even small amounts of marijuana a felony, while federal law does not. 127 S.Ct. at 633 n.10, 166 L.Ed.2d at 474 n.10. In dictum the Court implied that the federal classification would also govern the converse situation; i.e., a drug crime that a state classifies only as a misdemeanor but which federal law classifies as a felony is a drug trafficking crime. 127 S.Ct. at 633, 166 L.Ed.2d at 475.

8. In Gonzales v. Duenas-Alvarez, 549 U.S. 183, 127 S.Ct. 815, 166 L.Ed.2d 683 (2007), the Supreme Court held that the “theft” prong of the aggravated felony definition, INA § 101(a)(43)(G), encompasses aiders and abettors of theft. The Court reasoned that all 50 states have now abrogated the old common law distinctions between the perpetrators of crimes and those who assist them; each of the parties is guilty of the same substantive offense. Given that rationale, the Court’s holding can probably be assumed to extend to all prongs of the aggravated felony definition, not just the theft prong.

32. See, e.g., Lopez-Elias v. Reno, 209 F.3d 788 (5th Cir. 2000); Solarzano-Patlan v. INS, 214 F.3d 1128, 1132 (9th Cir. 2000); Matter of Perez, 22 I. & N. Dec. 1325 (BIA 2000); Ye v. INS, 207 F.3d 869, 873 (7th Cir. 2000); Ye v. INS, 207 F.3d 869, 873 (7th Cir. 2000); Ye v. INS, 207 F.3d 869, 873 (7th Cir. 2000).

9. The expansions of the aggravated felony definition, having swept in many minor criminal offenses, have provoked severe criticisms from immigration commentators and journalists. In 2000, Pulitzer Prize-winning New York Times columnist Anthony Lewis brought the case of Mary Ann Gehris to the nation's attention. See Anthony Lewis, This Has Got Me in Some Kind of Whirlwind, N.Y. Times, Jan. 8, 2000, at A13; Anthony Lewis, Measure of Justice, N.Y. Times, June 23, 2000, at A13. Gehris had been adopted by U.S. citizen parents and brought to the United States at age 2. Later in life she pleaded guilty to a misdemeanor battery charge for pulling the hair of a woman who had been with Gehris's boyfriend. Gehris received a one-year suspended sentence. The former INS sought to remove her as an "aggravated felon" on the ground that battery is a "crime of violence" for which she had been sentenced to "at least one year" (the suspension of sentence being irrelevant under section 101(a)(48)(B)). Had the removal succeeded, she would have been barred forever from returning to the United States, absent special permission from the Secretary of Homeland Security. Only the unusual national publicity prevented that result. The Georgia State Board of Pardons and Paroles granted her a pardon, thus erasing her conviction for removal purposes. See Joseph Justin Rollin, Humpty Dumpty Logic: Arguing Against the "Aggravated Misdemeanor" in Immigration Law, 6 BIB 445 (May 15, 2001).

Other relatively minor misdemeanors, such as petty larceny, can similarly give rise to "aggravated felony" removals, as long as the person receives at least a one-year sentence, suspended or otherwise. See, e.g., United States v. Christopher, 239 F.3d 1191 (11th Cir. 2001) (shoplifting); United States v. Graham, 169 F.3d 787 (3d Cir. 1999) (petit larceny).

10. Some common criminal defense strategies have emerged in response to the aggravated felony provisions. Because many of the offenses listed in the aggravated felony definition require a term of imprisonment of "one year or more," defense attorneys now frequently ask sentencing judges who are otherwise inclined to impose one-year sentences to impose 364-day sentences instead. In addition, the BIA has held that, if a sentence of one year or more is imposed but then vacated to permit the judge to reduce the sentence to under one year, the new sentence is the one that counts. This strategy succeeded in Matter of Min Song, 23 I. & N. Dec. 173 (BIA 2001); accord, Matter of Cota-Vargas, 23 I. & N. Dec. 849 (BIA 2005).

11. One prong of the aggravated felony definition, INA § 101(a)(43)(M)(i), covers fraud or deceit when "the loss to the victim or victims exceeds $10,000." The Supreme Court has now held that the $10,000 loss need not be an element of the criminal statute; the government may prove it by individualized evidence, including (as was the case here) by the defendant's own stipulation. Nijhawan v. Holder, 2009 WL 1650187 (2009).

12. Do you think the combination of an expanded “aggravated felony” definition and the broad consequences of an aggravated felony conviction have made the resulting law too harsh, or are the results appropriate?

PROBLEMS 22-24

In the following Problems, ignore any complications presented by the varying retroactivity of the several statutory amendments.

Problem 22. Six years after his admission as an LPR, X stole several thousand dollars and was later convicted of grand theft. The crime is punishable by up to five years in prison, and X received a sentence of one year, of which six months were suspended. Is he deportable?

Problem 23. Six years after being admitted to the United States as an LPR, Y committed the misdemeanor of “breaking and entering the dwelling of another.” Y was convicted and received the maximum sentence of one year, but she was released from confinement after four months for good behavior. Is she deportable?

Problem 24. You have just received a frantic phone call from your client, Z, whom you helped to obtain LPR status seven years ago. Z is in France, and is in some trouble. While on a three-month summer vacation in Paris, Z was involved in a fight with some locals and was arrested by the police. Claiming Z had a knife (he denies it), the prosecutor charged him with assault with a deadly weapon, a felony punishable by up to twenty years in prison. Because Z is a French national, the authorities allowed him to remain at large pending a preliminary hearing at which he was ordered to appear. Calling the charge “bogus,” Z did not show up at the hearing, choosing instead to leave town and spend the rest of his summer in the French Riviera. The police put out a warrant for his arrest. After further investigation, however, the police became convinced that Z had not had a knife and that in fact he had been acting only in self-defense. Still, they were upset at his failure to appear, and when he was apprehended a few days later in the Riviera, he was arrested and charged with the crime of failure to appear before a court pursuant to a court order.

Z was brought before a French court and pleaded guilty to the charged offense. The judge has given him a choice between paying a fine equivalent to about US $1500 or spending 15 days in jail. Z wants to know whether confinement would jeopardize his immigration status. He has called you because his French criminal lawyer knows nothing about U.S. immigration law. What advice will you give him?

5. MISCELLANEOUS CRIMINAL GROUNDS

The deportability grounds discussed in the preceding subsections are by far the most important of the grounds that are based on criminal convictions: crimes involving moral turpitude, drug offenses, and aggravated felonies. There are, however, a number of other crime-related deportability grounds. Several of these cover noncitizens who have been convicted under specified federal statutes. See, e.g., INA § 237(a), paragraphs 2(C)(certain firearms offenses), 2(D) (national security offenses), 2(E)(domestic violence), 3(B) (failure to register and document fraud). Unlike section 237(a)(2)(A)(i), none of these miscellaneous grounds requires either that a particular sentence be imposed or that the crime be committed within a certain number of years after admission.

There are, in addition, deportability grounds that do not require a criminal conviction at all, even though the conduct they describe often happens also to constitute a criminal offense. This category includes some of the immigration control provisions you saw earlier, such as smuggling noncitizens into the United States, INA § 237(a)(1)(E), marriage fraud, id. § 237(a)(1)(G), and breach of certain registration and reporting requirements, id. § 237(a)(3)(A). Other deportability grounds that describe what are also criminal acts include illegal voting, id. § 237(a)(6), certain of the grounds concerned with war crimes, affiliation with subversive groups, and certain threats to national security, id. § 237(a)(4)(A, B, D). You will see this latter group in section E below.

One last crime-related deportability ground is worthy of mention. As you saw earlier, a nonimmigrant who fails to maintain his or her status or to comply with the conditions of that status is deportable under INA § 237(a)(1)(C)(i). Under INA § 214(a), the admission of nonimmigrants “shall be for such time and under such conditions as the [Secretary of Homeland Security] may by regulations prescribe * * *.” The regulations declare that a condition of every nonimmigrant’s stay is obedience to all federal or state laws prohibiting “the commission of crimes of violence * * * for which a sentence of more than one year imprisonment may be imposed.” 8 CFR § 214.1(g) (2008) [emphasis added]. Under that regulation, a conviction of such a crime makes the person deportable for having failed to maintain status. Id. Note that the language “may be imposed” is broader than the statutory “term of imprisonment” language in the corresponding portion of the aggravated felony definition, INA § 101(a)(43)(F). The latter refers to the sentence actually imposed. INA § 101(a)(48)(B).

Can they really do that? Doesn’t this regulation effectively add a new deportability ground? If so, is that something Congress has authorized DHS to do? Is the policy of this regulation consistent with the limitations built into §§ 237(a)(2)(A)(i), 237(a)(2)(A)(iii), and related provisions?

What other conditions is DHS entitled to add? Could it lawfully declare, as a condition of every nonimmigrant’s stay, that the person must refrain from violating any law punishable by confinement for any length of time or by a fine of at least, say, $100? Could it make compliance with all laws a condition of stay? For that matter, could DHS spell out behavior that is not against the law at all, but which DHS considers socially undesirable, and then deem that behavior a violation of a nonimmigrant’s conditions of stay?

NOTE ON COMPARATIVE LAW, SEPARATION OF POWERS, AND THE MAKING OF IMMIGRATION POLICY

Apart from the issue of its legality, the DHS regulation just discussed raises interesting questions about who should define the grounds on which noncitizens may be removed. In the United States a common assumption has been that broad, sufficiently important national policy decisions—as distinguished from the application of those policies to individual cases—should be made by Congress. For the most part, the immigration laws reflect that assumption. The INA spells out in detail the qualifying categories for the admission of both nonimmigrants and immigrants; the numerical quotas on immigrants; the grounds for inadmissibility and for deportability; the fact situations in which the immigration officials are permitted to waive either inadmissibility or deportability; the basic elements of the procedures for admitting and removing noncitizens; and the substantive criteria and procedures governing both the acquisition and the loss of citizenship. To be sure, there are exceptions. As you will see in Chapter 11, the President has wide powers to decide which overseas refugees to admit and how many. ICE has wide latitude in its enforcement and prosecution priorities. And BIA precedent decisions (as well as judicial decisions) establish important policies. But there is no question that Congress makes the bulk of the crucial policy decisions in immigration law.

It is not that way in all other democracies. In most Parliamentary systems, for example, major national policy decisions—even when formally enshrined in Acts of Parliament—are normally driven by the views of the executive branch. See, e.g., Geoffrey W.R. Palmer, Unbridled Power—An Interpretation of New Zealand's Constitution and Government 8, 28–29, 38, 70–71 (2d ed. 1987). Moreover, Parliaments are far more likely than the United States Congress to expressly delegate broad policymaking authority to the executive branch. In the United Kingdom, for example, the Immigration Act 1971 provides only a few specific grounds for deportation: § 3(5)(b) (family member being deported); § 3(6) (convicted of offense punishable by conviction and recommended for deportation by court); and sched. 2, paras. 8, 9 (“removal” of “illegal entrants”, defined in § 33(1) as those who enter in breach of the immigration laws, in breach of prior deportation orders, or by deception). Parliament has given the Home Secretary the residual authority to deport any non-British citizen whenever the Secretary “deems his deportation to be conducive to the public good.” Id. § 3(5)(a). Would you favor a similar grant of power to the Secretary of Homeland Security in the United States? Cf. Mexico (not a parliamentary country), where the executive has broad discretion in deciding whom to “expel.” See generally Carlos Narvaez-Hasfura, Immigration in Mexico and America: Constitutional Reciprocity within a Plenary Power, Part 2 (J.S.D. dissertation, Washington University School of Law, 1995).

6. THE MERITS OF REMOVING NONCITIZEN CRIMINAL OFFENDERS

In section A.2 of this chapter, you read a brief introduction to the theory of deportation. This is an appropriate point at which to consider a slightly more specific problem: Under what circumstances, if any, should noncitizens who have committed crimes be removed?

The first question to resolve is whether it is ever appropriate to remove noncitizens on the basis of criminal activity. Don't jump to conclusions here. Think about the purposes of removal and try to work out whether those purposes apply when the particular ground is a criminal conviction.

Assuming you are not prepared to rule out per se the removal of noncitizens on criminal grounds, what should the criteria be? You have seen the crime-related deportability grounds up close, and have witnessed complications, ambiguities, and anomalies. If you have found yourself criticizing various elements of the statutory scheme, the exercise that follows will give you the chance to be constructive.

DRAFTING EXERCISE

You are the counsel to the House subcommittee responsible for immigration. The chair of the subcommittee is a reform-minded Representative who tends generally to be on the same ideological wavelength as you. Knowing that you are familiar with the existing crime-related deportability grounds and that you are generally dissatisfied with them, she is giving you a crack at revising them. Draft a new set of provisions to govern the deportability of noncitizen criminal offenders. You are not obligated to retain the moral turpitude, aggravated felony, or any other provisions of existing law, though you are free to do so if you wish.³³

E. POLITICAL AND NATIONAL SECURITY GROUNDS

In chapter 5, section B you saw the political and national security inadmissibility grounds in some detail. There is an analogous set of deportability grounds. They generally either track the language of the corresponding inadmissibility grounds or expressly incorporate them by reference. See generally INA § 237(a)(4).

One significant exception concerns the Communist Party. You saw in chapter 5, section B, that even after the statutory liberalizations in 1990 various affiliations with the Communist Party can render immigrants (but not nonimmigrants) inadmissible from the United States. In contrast, there 33. For some attempts at solution, see Stephen H. Legomsky, Reforming the Criteria for the Exclusion and the Deportation of Alien Criminal Offenders, 12 In Defense of the Alien 64 (1989) (proposing length of sentence as the principal determinant); Bryan Lonegan, American Diaspora: The Deportation of Lawful Residents from the United States and the Destruction of Their Families, 32 NYU Rev. L. & Social Change 55 (2007) (calling for a more careful balancing of crime-related deportation and its human impact); Jacqueline P. Ulin, Note, A Common Sense Reconstruction of the INA's Crime-Related Removal System: Eliminating the Caveats from the Statue of Liberty's Welcoming Words, 78 Washington Univ. L.Q. 1549 (2000) (proposing presumption of deportability after felony conviction, and requiring felon to prove either absence of threat to public safety or personal stakes that outweigh threat).

is no longer any deportability ground based specifically on affiliation with the Communist Party.

Until 2005, the terrorism-related grounds were another exception. The pre-2005 deportability grounds for terrorism were substantially narrower than the corresponding inadmissibility grounds; only the latter, for example, covered the person who is “likely” to engage in terrorist activity or one who is a “representative” of a terrorist organization. Compare former INA §§ 212(a)(3)(B), 237(a)(4)(B). The REAL ID Act, § 105(a), expanded the terrorism-related deportability grounds to cover all of the corresponding inadmissibility grounds. For a fuller discussion, see the coverage of this topic in chapter 5, section B, as well as the material in chapter 10, section C (on the national security measures that have affected both inadmissibility and deportability).

Finally, even when the deportability grounds are narrower than the corresponding inadmissibility grounds, the latter can come into play after arrival. As you saw earlier, INA § 237(a)(1)(A) renders deportable any noncitizen who was inadmissible at the time of either entry or adjustment of status.

F. OTHER DEPORTABILITY GROUNDS

Several other deportability grounds, not neatly classifiable under any of the preceding section headings, also deserve mention. Roughly speaking, these miscellaneous grounds reflect economic, moral, and health-related concerns. Most such grounds overlap at least two of those categories, and some indirectly implicate law enforcement concerns as well. See, e.g., INA § 237(a), subsections 1(C)(ii) (violating health-related conditions imposed at entry), 2(B)(ii) (past or present drug abuse or addiction).

Under INA § 237(a)(5), a noncitizen who becomes a “public charge” within five years after entry is deportable unless he or she can affirmatively show causes arising after entry. This provision needs to be considered in the context of related legal developments. As you saw in chapter 5, comprehensive welfare reform legislation enacted in 1996 (amended by IIRIRA) raised the barriers for intending immigrants, in part by conditioning admittance on binding affidavits of support. As you will see in chapter 13, that same legislation (with some exceptions) also disqualified even LPRs from most of the main public assistance programs. Together with existing barriers, these provisions greatly reduce the likelihood of LPRs being eligible for public assistance soon after entry. An immigrant who nonetheless meets the welfare eligibility requirements needs to consider section 237(a)(5) before deciding whether to apply.

G. TIME LIMITS

Most of the deportability grounds either explicitly require acts or events occurring “at the time of” or “after” entry or admission, e.g., INA

§ 237(a), subsections 1(A), 2(A, B, C), 4(A, B), and 5, or else require the kinds of events—such as violating the conditions of one's stay or getting convicted under a United States statute—that, practically speaking, invariably occur only after entry, e.g., subsections 1(C, D), 3(A, B), and 4(C). Although there are a few exceptions, e.g., subsections 1(E) (smuggling of noncitizens), 4(D) (various human rights violators), the basic pattern should not be particularly surprising. It is usually (not always) unnecessary for the deportation grounds to cover pre-entry conduct because, if conduct that occurs before entry is the kind that would have triggered removal had it occurred after entry, that pre-entry conduct will ordinarily be a ground for exclusion. In such a case, the person will ordinarily have been inadmissible at the time of entry, and therefore deportable under § 237(a)(1)(A).

Apart from those explicit or implicit requirements that acts or events take place at or after entry or admission, most of the deportability grounds operate without regard to time. Is that good? There are at least four different kinds of time limits to which deportability grounds could be made subject. The discussion that follows examines the degree to which the INA already does, and the degree to which it should, embody these various types of limitations.

What will here be called a category I time limit is the kind that confines the deportation ground to those acts or events that occur within a certain number of years after entry or admission. At present, only a few deportability grounds are subject to this kind of time limit. See, e.g., INA § 237(a), subsections 1(E) (smuggling of noncitizens), 2(A)(i) (crimes of moral turpitude), and 5 (public charge). What are the pros and cons of category I time limits?

A category II limitation would constrain the time interval between the act or event that makes the person deportable and the commencement of removal proceedings. This type of restriction is what lawyers in most areas of both civil and criminal practice call a “statute of limitations.” In the United States, deportation provisions were once subject to such time limits. See, e.g., Act of March 3, 1903, ch. 1012, § 20, 32 Stat. 1213, 1218. In some countries they still are. In New Zealand, for example, when deportation is based on a criminal conviction, not only must deportation proceedings begin, but the actual deportation order must issue, no later than six months after the judgment of conviction (or six months after release from imprisonment). Immigration Act 1987, § 93. In the United States, however, the 1952 Act eliminated statutes of limitations on deportation, and at the time of this writing no deportability grounds contain them.

Interestingly, there are some analogous concepts elsewhere in our immigration laws. If a noncitizen receives adjustment of status at a time when he or she is in fact ineligible for it, the INS will have only five years to rescind the grant of adjustment. INA § 246. Recall also INA § 212(a)(2)(A)(ii)(I), which renders inadmissible any noncitizen convicted of a crime involving moral turpitude, but subject to an important exception: A person who committed only one such crime, and who committed it while under age 18, will not be denied a visa once five years have passed since the commission of the offense (or since his or her release from any resulting confinement).

Congress might have envisioned that last five-year rule as a limited analog of the five-year limit built into the corresponding deportability ground, section 237(a)(2)(A)(i). There is a certain symmetry. Under the exception to the exclusion ground, the person prevails if the visa issuance is more than five years after the crime. Under the deportability provision, the individual prevails if the crime is more than five years after admission.

But that mirror image relationship is deceiving. Think about why Congress would enact the five-year exception contained in section 212(a)(2)(A)(ii)(I). You will probably discover that the reasons are similar to those offered generally for category II limitations. (What would you assume those reasons are?) Now recall the reasons you came up with earlier for the (category I) five-year requirement that is part of section 237(a)(2)(A)(i). You will probably discover that, if Congress had wanted to build into section 237(a)(2)(A)(i) a time limit serving roughly the same purposes as the one it built into section 212(a)(2)(A)(ii)(I), it would have prohibited removal more than five years after the criminal act.

A category III limitation would combine the periods encompassed by categories I and II. It would require that any removal proceedings be started within a certain number of years after entry (or admission). By now you have probably figured out the dominant theme underlying category I: Roots develop with time. The deeper those roots, the more hardship removal is likely to cause. If that rationale—compassion for those who have acquired roots—is the principal function of category I limitations, wouldn't a category III limitation do a better job? Should an individual who has lived here thirty years be deportable on the basis of a crime that was committed four years after entry? How would you compare the relative advantages of category I and category III limitations?

A category IV limitation would require that the conduct on which removal is based occur after the enactment of the statutory provision that makes the conduct a deportability ground. This would be a bar on ex post facto legislation. As you saw in Harisiades, pages 181–82 above, the ex post facto clause of the United States Constitution has been held not to prohibit retroactive deportation laws. (The clause pertains only to punishment, and deportation technically is not punishment.) Until 1990, a few deportability grounds were expressly confined to acts or events that occur “hereafter” (meaning after enactment of the “hereafter” language). E.g., INA §§ 241(a)(3, 11, 17), pre-1990 version. After the 1990 Act the word “hereafter” no longer expressly qualifies any of the deportability grounds, though issues persist concerning the retroactivity of the specific deportability ground for aggravated felons. See section D.4 above; see also INA § 237(a)(1)(A) (entered while inadmissible “by the law existing at [the time of entry]”). Professor Nancy Morawetz has argued that retroactive deportation laws violate due process.³⁴

34. See Nancy Morawetz, INS v. St. Cyr and Stop Retroactive Deportation Laws, in David A. Martin & Peter H. Schuck (eds.), Cyr: The Campaign to Preserve Court Review

What do you see as the pros and cons of category IV limitations?

The following Problems illustrate some of the time limits just discussed. To do them, reread the portions of INA §§ 212(a)(1)(A)(iv) and 237(a)(2)(B)(ii) that deal with drug addicts.

PROBLEMS 25–27

Problem 25. X, a noncitizen, entered the United States and then left. While away, she became addicted to heroin and then rehabilitated. Several years after her rehabilitation, Congress enacted what is now INA § 237(a)(2)(B)(ii). After that, she reentered the United States. Is she deportable?

Problem 26. After the enactment of INA § 237(a)(2)(B)(ii), noncitizen Y, in his native country, became addicted to heroin but rehabilitated. Then he entered the United States. Is he deportable?

Problem 27. After the enactment of INA § 237(a)(2)(B)(ii), noncitizen Z entered the United States. She then became addicted to heroin, but later she was rehabilitated. She then left the country. Now, two years later, she wants to come back. Is she admissible? If she is readmitted, will she be deportable?

Immigration Stories (2005), chap. 11; Nancy tion Laws and the Due Process Clause, 73
Morawetz, Rethinking Retroactive Deportation, NYU L. Rev. 97 (1998).

RELIEF FROM DEPORTABILITY

Noncitizens who fall within any of the grounds set out in INA § 237(a) are said to be “deportable.” But the immigration laws do not require the removal of every deportable noncitizen. The statute authorizes several forms of relief. In part, these relief provisions reflect the realities that removal has potentially severe consequences and that, while many of the deportability grounds entail extreme misconduct, many others do not. The relief provisions also reflect the philosophy that even serious misconduct must be weighed against other factors, such as long-term residence, or an unusual degree of hardship, or the likelihood of persecution in a foreign country. Moreover, some of these provisions eliminate the need to hold formal removal proceedings, thus avoiding significant administrative costs. Indeed, one of the remedies you will study—voluntary departure—accounts for the vast majority of dispositions in cases where admittedly deportable noncitizens are apprehended.

A word about coverage: The relief provisions examined in this chapter can be thought of as affirmative defenses—i.e., defenses for which the noncitizen has the burden of proof. They do not include, therefore, the defense that an essential element of the particular deportability ground has not been made out. Also omitted are those few affirmative relief provisions that are specific to particular deportability grounds. Those were covered in the previous chapter—executive pardons, the section 237(a)(1)(H) fraud waiver, etc. For convenience, the persecution-related remedies are deferred to chapter 11.

Despite the title of this chapter, some of the remedies discussed here can waive inadmissibility as well as deportability. Because most of the major remedies discussed in this chapter require specified periods of prior presence or residence in the United States, however, the only arriving noncitizens whom those remedies would typically affect are returning residents. When a particular remedy also waives inadmissibility, that feature will be noted.

All the relief provisions have different requirements, and many have different consequences. Among the variables that distinguish the remedies covered in this chapter are (1) the deportability grounds to which the provision supplies a defense; (2) the prerequisites to obtaining relief; (3) whether, once those prerequisites are met, relief is automatic or subject to the exercise of someone’s discretion; (4) how far-reaching the consequences are (permitting the person to remain permanently, or simply putting removal on temporary hold, or something lesser still); and (5) who decides whether to grant relief (the immigration judge and the BIA in removal proceedings, or USCIS outside removal proceedings).

As you study the various remedies, you will notice several recurring limitations. Here are a few to bear in mind:

First, individuals who are properly notified of their removal hearings and fail to appear, or who receive voluntary departure (discussed below) and fail to leave on time, become ineligible to apply for any of several specified remedies for ten years. See INA §§ 240(b)(7), 240B(d). The unavailable remedies include cancellation of removal, voluntary departure, and registry. All are considered below.

Second, aggravated felons (and in some cases other criminal offenders as well) are expressly disqualified from most of the major relief provisions, including cancellation of removal, INA §§ 240A(a)(3), 240A(b)(1)(C), voluntary departure, INA § 240B(a)(1), and registry, INA § 249. Moreover, a conviction of an aggravated felony precludes a showing of good moral character, INA § 101(f)(8), which is itself a required element of several of the relief provisions.

Third, anyone who is deportable on terrorist grounds (and in some cases other national security grounds) is also barred from several forms of discretionary relief. See, e.g., INA §§ 240A(c)(4) (cancellation of removal), 240B(a)(1), 240B(b)(1)(C) (voluntary departure), 249(d) (registry).

Fourth, as a result of regulations issued in 2005, DHS now requires anyone who applies for any form of relief that confers a right to reside in the United States (including, for example, cancellation of removal, adjustment of status, registry, and asylum) to provide certain biographical and biometric data. Using those data, DHS then performs elaborate identity, law enforcement, and national security background checks. Relief may not be granted until those checks are satisfactorily completed. DHS hopes to perform the checks promptly, ideally after a removal hearing has been scheduled but before it has actually taken place; at this writing it is uncertain whether that expectation is realistic.¹

Finally, IIRIRA § 306(a)(2) severely curtailed judicial review of denials of discretionary relief. It amended INA § 242(a)(2)(B) to bar judicial review of “any judgment regarding the granting of relief under” certain provisions (which include cancellation of removal, voluntary departure, and adjustment of status). The same law bars review of almost every “other decision or action of the Attorney General the authority for which is specified under this title to be in the discretion of the Attorney General.” But these provisions have been held not to bar all judicial review of orders denying discretionary relief. As you will see in chapter 9, § B.6.a.ii below, the courts have usually remained willing to review, for example, some agency determinations that applicants are statutorily ineligible for discretionary relief.

¹. See generally 70 Fed. Reg. 4743 (Jan. 26, 2005), amending 8 CFR § 1208.4 and adding 8 CFR § 1003.47 and

A. LASTING RELIEF

The most sweeping forms of relief are those that enable the person not only to avoid removal, but also to attain (or in some cases retain) LPR status. Here are a few such remedies:

1. CANCELLATION OF REMOVAL

The phrase "cancellation of removal" made its debut with the enactment of IIRIRA § 304(a)(3), which added section 240A to the INA. In IIRIRA, Congress scaled down two existing remedies and then gathered them under one umbrella.

The first prong of the cancellation provision, INA § 240A(a) [here called "cancellation of removal part A"], describes a remedy that is available only to certain LPRs. Its most common use is in cases where the deportability charges stem from criminal convictions.

The second prong of cancellation of removal, INA § 240A(b), is here called "cancellation of removal part B." The caption for part (b) refers to cancellation of removal for "certain nonpermanent residents," and indeed the remedy is most commonly requested by noncitizens who are out of status. But nothing in the actual text precludes the use of part (b) by those LPRs who do not meet all the requirements of part (a).

The cancellation provision also contains other subsections (c, d, and e), but these subsections do not create additional remedies. They set out various limitations and definitions that apply to both part (a) and part (b).

a. CANCELLATION OF REMOVAL: PART A

i. General Applicability and Scope

This remedy has had a tumultuous history. Its form, location, and content have all changed over the years. To understand the rationale, modern operation, and practical impact of cancellation of removal part A (and because its immediate predecessor is still applicable in many situations, as discussed below), it is necessary to consider some of the crucial historical events that brought us to where we are today.²

2. Professor Elwin Griffith, in The Road between the Section 212(c) Waiver and Cancellation of Removal under Section 240A of the Immigration and Nationality Act—The Impact of the 1996 Reform Legislation, 12 Georgetown Immigration L.J. 65 (1997), comprehensively analyzes the issues that arose under former INA § 212(c) and the effect of substituting cancellation of removal. For some good descriptions of the pre-IIRIRA version of this remedy, see Lory D. Rosenberg & Denise Sabagh, A Practitioner's Guide to INA § 212(c), Immigration Briefings (April 1993); Stephen Yale-Loehr, An Overview of INA § 212(c), Immigration Briefings (Feb. 1995).

The origins of what is now cancellation part A can be found in the Immigration Act of 1917, ch. 29, § 3, 7th proviso, 39 Stat. 874, 878 (Feb. 5, 1917). The so-called 7th proviso read, in its entirety, as follows:

[A]liens returning after a temporary absence to an unrelinquished United States domicile of seven consecutive years may be admitted in the discretion of the Secretary of Labor, and under such conditions as he may prescribe.

This seemingly simple provision and its successors have generated some immensely complicated case law, only a portion of which needs to be recounted here.

Notice first: All this original provision said was that certain returning residents may be admitted. What, you might be wondering, does any of that have to do with deportability?

The explanation lies in a trilogy of important cases. The first was Matter of L., 1 I. & N. Dec. 1 (BIA), approved by A.G. (1940). A long-term LPR was convicted of a crime involving moral turpitude. As would be the case today, see INA § 237(a)(2)(A)(i), the crime did not render him deportable because it occurred more than five years after his initial admission. Fifteen years later, however, L left the United States for two months to settle a family matter and was readmitted upon his return. The former INS charged he was deportable for having entered the United States after having been convicted of a crime involving moral turpitude. The modern equivalent would be deportability under INA § 237(a)(1)(A) for having entered while inadmissible under section 212(a)(2)(A)(i)(I) because of conviction of a moral turpitude crime. Since there was no Fleuti doctrine at the time, L was clearly deportable. The only question was whether he qualified for relief under the 7th proviso.

The Attorney General acknowledged that the literal statutory language covered only exclusion cases. Matter of L., 1 I. & N. Dec. at 5. But L would not have been deportable had he remained in the United States. Moreover, even having left, he would have qualified for relief had he applied for it at the border upon his return. Observing that “[n]o policy of Congress could possibly be served by such irrational result” [meaning the result that would be reached if relief were unavailable in deportation proceedings], id., the Attorney General concluded that relief could be granted nunc pro tunc, thereby waiving the inadmissibility that had existed at the time of L’s readmission. The effect of the waiver was to eliminate an essential element of the deportability charge.

The second case in the trilogy was Matter of G.A., 7 I. & N. Dec. 274 (BIA 1956). By this time, INA § 212(c) had replaced the 7th proviso, but the content was substantially similar. Again a long-term LPR was convicted of a crime. This time, however, the offense involved marihuana. Unlike the moral turpitude offense of which L had been convicted, G.A.’s marihuana offense rendered him deportable under INA § 241(a)(11) [now 237(a)(2)(B)(i)] even though he had committed the crime more than five years after admission. Several years after the conviction, G.A., like L, departed and returned to the United States. His trip made him deportable on the additional ground, INA § 241(a)(1) [now 237(a)(1)(A)], that he had entered the United States while inadmissible under section 212(a)(23) [now 212(a)(2)(A)(i)(II)] because of his drug conviction. The BIA granted section 212(c) relief. Citing Matter of L., the Board waived, nunc pro tunc, the inadmissibility that had existed at the time of G.A.'s return. The waiver eliminated the charge of inadmissibility at entry.

But there remained the more direct deportation charge under then section 241(a)(11). That charge did not rest on G.A.'s reentry; it resulted solely from the fact of the marihuana conviction. The BIA held nonetheless that, when section 212(c) is invoked to waive a ground of inadmissibility arising from a criminal conviction, the INS may not then base deportability on the same conviction. The effect of the decision was to extend section 212(c) to deportability even when the particular deportability ground did not hinge on inadmissibility at entry.

The opinion in G.A. avoided an anomaly: A decision to waive the inadmissibility resulting from a criminal conviction reflects a judgment that, all things considered, the person should be permitted to maintain his or her permanent residence in the United States. That discretionary judgment would be defeated if, after inadmissibility is waived, the person could be deported on the basis of the very misconduct that had just been forgiven.

In avoiding that anomaly, however, the opinion in G.A. left a troubling question: If G.A. had not left the United States after his conviction, would he still have been eligible for relief under section 212(c)? The provision appears to say no. That result, however, seems unfair and arbitrary. Why should someone lose out simply because, after a criminal conviction, he or she does not leave and return to the United States? Conversely, why should someone who is otherwise deportable gain an affirmative advantage simply by leaving the United States and then returning?

The third case in the trilogy addressed that dilemma. In Francis v. INS, 532 F.2d 268 (2d Cir.1976), which you read earlier for its teachings on the standard of constitutional review in deportation cases, see pages 181–86 above, the court recognized the anomaly. Finding that it would indeed be irrational to limit section 212(c) relief to those long-term LPRs who temporarily leave the United States after the events that render them deportable, the court held that such a distinction violated equal protection. The effect of Francis was to extend the reach of section 212(c) to otherwise eligible individuals who had never left the United States. The BIA quickly acceded to Francis, and several other circuits soon followed suit, although one circuit has since overruled its prior embrace of the Francis decision.³

3. See Matter of Silva, 16 I. & N. Dec. 26 (1976), followed by Cortes-Castillo v. INS, 997 F.2d 1199 (7th Cir. 1993); Tapia-Acuna v. INS, 640 F.2d 223 (9th Cir.1981), overruled in Abebe v. Mukasey, 554 F.3d 1203 (9th Cir. en banc 2009) (noting that the relevant inquiry is not into Congress's actual rationale, but into whether a "hypothetically rational" Congress could have adopted the statutory scheme at issue, and concluding

Through this trilogy of cases, relief was thus extended to deportable noncitizens, even those who had not made temporary overseas excursions. Taken individually, each of the expansions served a rational purpose; each one avoided an anomalous result. Taken together, though, these decisions moved 212(c) far beyond the literal statutory language.

And that proved to be the rub. In Matter of Granados, 16 I. & N. Dec. 726 (BIA 1979), the BIA abruptly halted the expansion. It held that 212(c) relief would not be a defense to deportability unless the particular deportability ground is also a ground of inadmissibility. In Granados, the deportability ground covered those who had been convicted of certain weapons offenses. Because there was no analogous inadmissibility ground at the time, the Board held Granados ineligible for relief.

Then, in Matter of Hernandez-Casillas, 20 I. & N. Dec. 262 (1990), the BIA overruled Granados. Hernandez, an LPR, was deportable for having entered without inspection after a temporary trip abroad (apparently trying to smuggle undocumented immigrants across the border). There was (and still is) no exclusion ground analogous to entry without inspection. The Board observed that section 212(c), by its terms, made certain exclusion grounds nonwaivable. As long as the particular deportability ground was not analogous to one of these nonwaivable exclusion grounds, the Board held, section 212(c) would apply. It would not be necessary to link the deportability ground affirmatively to one of the waivable exclusion grounds. Either approach, the Board reasoned, would be “equally logical and bear equally little resemblance to the statute as written.” Id. at 266.

But the battle was not over. Under 8 CFR § 3.1(h)(1)(iii) (2006), the Commissioner of the former INS could request the Attorney General to review a decision of the BIA. The Commissioner made such a request in this case, arguing not merely that the Board had erred in declining to require an exclusion analog, but that 212(c) relief should be held entirely unavailable in deportation proceedings. In his letter to the Attorney General transmitting the administrative record, BIA chairperson David L. Milhollan called the INS request “unprecedented” in its scope:

Rather than simply requesting review of the specific matters in issue in Matter of Hernandez, the Service is requesting consideration of some 50 years’ of statutory construction dating to Attorney General Jackson’s 1940 decision in Matter of L. * * * [As this request] is first made by the Service in this referral, this issue was neither briefed by the parties before the Board nor addressed in the Board decision now on review.

Letter from Hon. David L. Milhollan to Hon. Dick Thornburgh, April 6, 1990, at 1, reproduced in 67 IR 480 (1990). The letter went on to list several early and more recent official INS affirmations that section 212(c) may be applied in deportation proceedings. Id. For that and other reasons, that “Congress could have limited section 212(c) relief to aliens seeking to enter the country from abroad in order to ‘create an incentive for deportable aliens to leave the country’” (discussed in item 2 of the Notes following Francis in chapter 2 above).

the letter strongly urged the Attorney General to decline the INS invitation. Attached to the letter was a ten-page summary of the fifty-year evolution of the law on this subject. Id. at 481. The Attorney General agreed not to revisit Francis or the cases extending 212(c) to deportation.

He did, however, reverse the BIA and reinstate Granados. See 20 I. & N. Dec. at 28-93. Section 212(c), the Attorney General ruled, was meant to waive only those deportability grounds that are also grounds for exclusion. That way, he reasoned, the application of section 212(c) would bear at least some relationship to the statutory language referring to admission.

From a policy standpoint, the Attorney General's decision led to some peculiar results. Some deportability grounds embrace conduct that gives rise not only to removal but also to future inadmissibility. Others embrace conduct (presumably thought by Congress to be less serious, not more serious) that triggers removal but not future exclusion. The effect of the Attorney General's interpretation is that relief will be available to noncitizens charged with the offenses Congress regarded as the most serious but not to those charged with the offenses Congress regarded as less serious. Would Congress really have wanted conduct that is not a basis for exclusion at all to be treated more harshly than conduct that is a basis for exclusion? Along the same lines, suppose Congress had toughened the immigration laws by adding a specific exclusion ground for noncitizens who had ever entered the United States without inspection. Under the Attorney General's ruling, the effect of Congress's new get-tough policy would have been just the opposite—to provide relief to such individuals.⁴

Despite all these difficulties, the Fifth Circuit affirmed the Attorney General in a memorandum decision, 983 F.2d 231 (BIA 1993), and the other courts of appeals almost uniformly affirmed subsequent BIA decisions applying the Attorney General's ruling.⁵

IIRIRA codified many of the foregoing developments. It has effectively approved the original trilogy on which subsequent developments have been based. The new provision makes clear that relief will be available to both inadmissible and deportable noncitizens, even when the particular charge does not rest on entry or admission. It is equally clear under the new provision that a deportable noncitizen will not have to leave and return in order to qualify. The Hernandez-Casillas issue has also been resolved; the new provision does not require deportable noncitizens to identify a comparable inadmissibility ground, as the Attorney General had required under the old provision. IIRIRA also settled many of the timing issues described below.

4. Further anomalies resulted from the Board's subsequent interpretations of the exclusion analog requirement. Those developments are detailed in previous editions of this coursebook. See, e.g., the fourth edition at 578-79.

5. See, e.g., Gjonaj v. INS, 47 F.3d 824, 827 (6th Cir. 1995); Rodriguez-Padron v.

INS, 13 F.3d 1455, 1459-60 (11th Cir. 1994); but cf. Cat v. INS, 84 F.3d 597 (2d Cir. 1996) (applying Attorney General's rule, but only in cases where enactment of analogous exclusion ground would have been logically possible).

At this time, read carefully INA § 240A(a).

ii. Timing

As you have just seen, INA § 240A(a) contains two separate timing requirements. The first is five years of LPR status. One issue is when LPR status ends. The INA doesn't say, but the regulations provide that LPR status "terminates upon entry of a final administrative order of exclusion, deportation, or removal." 8 CFR § 1.1(p) (2008). For this and other purposes, the administrative order is deemed final when the BIA affirms it or the time for filing a BIA appeal lapses. INA § 101(a)(47)(B). Further, LPR status obtained by fraud will not be recognized at all for purposes of cancellation of removal part A. Matter of Koloamatangi, 23 I. & N. Dec. 548 (BIA 2003).

Second, cancellation of removal part A requires that the person "resided in the United States continuously for 7 years after having been admitted in any status." INA § 240A(a)(2). In Matter of Blancas, 23 I. & N. Dec. 458 (BIA 2002), the Board held that for this purpose nonimmigrant stays are fully counted. The former INS had argued in Blancas that most nonimmigrant categories are inconsistent with an intent to reside permanently and that counting such stays as residence would therefore reward those who wrongly intend to remain permanently. The BIA disagreed. It observed that a contrary interpretation—i.e., one requiring LPR status for seven years—would render the five-year LPR requirement superfluous.

Many other issues arise: When does continuous residence start? Does time spent in unlawful presence count? When does continuous residence end? When the person committed the act that triggered deportability? When the notice to appear is issued, or served? When deportability is conceded? When the immigration judge issues a removal order? When the BIA does so (or when the appeal time has lapsed)? Only when judicial review has been completed, or the time period for applying for it has lapsed?

For some of the answers, read carefully INA § 240A(d)(1).

iii. Disqualifications

Certain noncitizens are statutorily disqualified from cancellation of removal part A (and in some instances part B as well). Among the more important classes disqualified from part A are aggravated felons. INA § 240A(a)(3). See INA § 240A(c) for a list of other ineligible classes.

iv. Discretion

In addition to establishing statutory eligibility, the applicant must show he or she merits the favorable exercise of discretion. As to the exercise of that discretion, see generally Matter of C.V.T., 22 I. & N. Dec. 7 (BIA 1998).

QUESTIONS

1. Step back for a moment from all the technical distinctions that this relief provision has generated. What are the basic policy tradeoffs that cancellation of removal part A, reflects?

2. Both the present provision and its predecessors have required determinations of when LPR status ends. Make a list of the various points in time that courts could use to mark the end of lawful permanent residence. Then articulate the pros and cons of the various possibilities, thinking about how they relate to what permanent residence really means and to what cancellation of removal part A is designed to achieve.

PROBLEMS 1-3

Problem 1. A was admitted to the United States as an LPR in June 2003. In June 2007, ICE issued a Notice to Appear for a removal hearing, alleging A had been convicted of a crime involving moral turpitude. The immigration judge terminated the removal hearing, ruling that the particular crime did not involve moral turpitude. In 2008, A took a 100-day summer vacation in Europe. In July 2010, he committed a drug offense (possession of cocaine), pleaded guilty, and was sentenced to probation. In August 2010, ICE issued a notice to appear for another removal hearing. This time, the immigration judge found A deportable for having been convicted of violating a law relating to a controlled substance. Is A eligible for cancellation of removal part A? Cf. Matter of Cisneros-Gonzalez, 23 I. & N. Dec. 668 (BIA en banc, 2004) (holding, in the context of cancellation of removal part B, that the term “notice to appear” in INA § 240A(d)(1) refers only to the notice filed in the current removal proceeding, not to any filed in prior proceedings). In that case, the person had been previously (and properly) deported, had returned without inspection, and had then accumulated ten new years of physical presence.

Problem 2. In April 2002, B was admitted to the United States for one year on a business visitor visa. She overstayed, but in April 2004 she adjusted her status to that of LPR on the basis of her marriage to a United States citizen. (Her immediate relative status exempted her from the section 245(c)(2) bar for people who have failed to maintain continuous lawful status.) In May 2009, B was found in possession of illegal amphetamines and three months later was convicted of that crime. An immigration judge has found her deportable. Is B eligible for cancellation of removal part A?

Problem 3. C was admitted to the United States on an L-1 intra-company transferee visa in 2000. In February 2004 he married a United States citizen. In August 2004, with his authorized stay still not having expired, he obtained adjustment of status as an immediate relative. In April 2008, ICE discovered that his marriage had been a sham and issued a Notice to Appear for a removal hearing. ICE alleged that C was deportable for having been inadmissible (on fraud grounds) at the time of adjustment of status. See INA § 237(a)(1)(A). In June 2008, the immigration judge ordered C removed, and in June 2009 the BIA affirmed. In September 2009, C moved to reopen for the purpose of applying for cancellation of removal part A, alleging that by then he had accrued the required 5 years of LPR status. Is C now eligible for cancellation?

b. CANCELLATION OF REMOVAL: PART B

INA § 240A(b) contains a modified version of a remedy that, until IIRIRA, was known as “suspension of deportation.”⁶ Unlike cancellation of removal part A, which is available only to LPRs, cancellation part B can be invoked by anyone who otherwise meets its requirements. In practice, the principal beneficiaries of part B are undocumented immigrants.

Now please read INA § 240A(b)(1).

A few initial observations: First, this remedy is available to both inadmissible and deportable noncitizens. Since one eligibility requirement is ten years of continuous physical presence in the United States, however, the usual type of inadmissibility that cancellation part B will waive is presence without admission. In addition, arriving noncitizens who return from temporary visits abroad after ten years of undocumented presence in the United States may also apply for cancellation part B.

Second, there are two separate branches of cancellation part B—a general branch, and a special branch for certain victims of domestic violence. The special branch was added in 1994 by the Violence Against Women Act (VAWA). See Pub.L. 103-322, § 40703, 108 Stat. 1796, 1995 (Sept. 13, 1994).

The two branches contain roughly parallel requirements—continuous physical presence, good moral character, and hardship. Both provisions are subject to various disqualifications. The general difference is that, for applicants who have been “battered or subjected to extreme cruelty” under specified circumstances, the requirements are relaxed. The details appear in INA § 240A(b)(2). Among other things, under VAWA, the continuous physical presence requirement is shorter, the standard for demonstrating hardship is more lenient, and an applicant can establish good moral character despite criminal conviction if her conviction is “connected to the alien’s having been battered or subjected to extreme cruelty.” INA 240A(a)(2)(C). For cases defining what an applicant for VAWA relief must show to establish that she has experienced “extreme cruelty,” see Hernandez v. Ashcroft, 345 F.3d 824 (9th Cir. 2003) (establishing that “extreme cruelty” is a question of fact reviewable by the court) and Perales-Cumpean v. Ashcroft, 429 F.3d 977 (10th Cir. 2005) (concluding that determining what behavior constitutes “extreme cruelty” is discretionary and is therefore not reviewable).

6. For an excellent history and analysis of the practical effects of the changes, see Elwin Griffith, The Transition Between Suspension of Deportation and Cancellation of Removal for Nonpermanent Residents under the Immigration and Nationality Act: The Impact of the 1996 Reform Legislation, 48 Drake L. Rev. 79 (1999).

Professor Lee Teran has urged the elimination of the requirement that battered spouses and children show “extreme hardship” in order to win relief. See Lee J. Teran, Barriers to Protection at Home and Abroad: Mexican Victims of Domestic Violence and the Violence Against Women Act, 17 Boston Univ. Internat’l L.J. 1 (1999). Her suggestion was heeded for purposes of the self-petitioning procedure (see chapter 6), but the special cancellation of removal provision still requires a showing of extreme hardship. INA § 240A(b)(2)(A)(v).

Third, as is true of cancellation part A, applicants for cancellation part B have two separate hurdles to clear. They must establish statutory eligibility, and then they must receive the favorable exercise of discretion.

Finally, note that under INA § 240A(e)(1) “the Attorney General may not cancel the removal and adjust the status under this section” (or under the former suspension of deportation provision) of more than 4000 individuals in any fiscal year. As this language indicates, this remedy accomplishes two things: It avoids removal, and it results in LPR status. The Justice Department’s interim regulations regard the two parts of the remedy as inseparable and establish a queuing system analogous to the preference-based quota systems that you saw in chapter 3. Once relief has been granted to 4000 applicants in a given fiscal year, immigration judges and the BIA may not grant relief in any further cases that year, even conditionally. They may deny pending applications for cancellation on certain statutory eligibility grounds but will reserve decision on all other pending applications. These pending applications will be taken up in the order in which they were filed, as soon as the quota permits.⁷

The Nicaraguan Adjustment and Central American Relief Act, Pub. L. 105–100, Title II, 111 Stat. 2160, 2193 (Nov. 19, 1997) [NACARA], among other things relaxed the substantive criteria for cancellation of removal part B for certain nationals of Guatemala, El Salvador, the Soviet Union and its successor republics, and most Eastern European nations. The details are discussed in subsection (iv) below. For now, it is enough to note that these NACARA adjustments are not counted against the 4000 limit. INA § 240A(e)(3)(A).

i. Continuous Physical Presence

When IIRIRA replaced suspension of deportation with cancellation of removal part B, it made the continuous physical presence requirement more demanding. One change was an increase in the length of the period from 7 years to 10. See INA § 240A(b)(1)(a). IIRIRA also specified, for the first time, that service of a Notice to Appear automatically ends a person’s continuous physical presence. INA § 240A(d)(1). As a result, it is impossible to reach the ten-year threshold while waiting for a removal hearing or an appellate proceeding. (Commission of any of several crimes will also

7. See 8 CFR § 240.21(c) (2008); see New Rule on the Suspension/Cancellation Ceiling, 3 BIB 1083 (Nov. 1, 1998).
generally Nadine Wettstein, The Peddler Sells His Caps: The EOIR and INS Issue a terminate continuous physical presence, id., but the subsequent conviction would have been an independent disqualifying event anyway. INA § 240A(b)(1)(C)).

The last major change that IIRIRA made to the continuous physical presence requirement concerns the meaning of “continuous.” What happens if the person has made one or more temporary trips outside the United States? You will recall that the Fleuti doctrine, discussed on pages 529–44 above, has been used to relieve LPRs of the consequences of reentry when they return from temporary overseas visits that were not meant to be meaningfully interruptive of permanent residence. In Wadman v. INS, 329 F.2d 812 (9th Cir. 1964), the court applied the same principle to determine whether a temporary excursion destroyed the continuity of one’s physical presence in the United States, for purposes of suspension of deportation.

After Wadman, and until 1984, the courts and the BIA applied the meaningful interruption test almost universally.⁸ In 1984, however, the Supreme Court dropped a bombshell. The case was INS v. Phinpathya, 464 U.S. 183, 104 S.Ct. 584, 78 L.Ed.2d 401 (1984). A noncitizen who had overstayed her nonimmigrant visa left the United States for three months and, while abroad, defrauded the United States consulate in order to obtain the new visa that she then used upon her return. The BIA found no continuous physical presence and denied suspension. The Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit remanded for reconsideration, holding that the BIA had failed to apply the proper formula.

In the Supreme Court, the former INS argued that this time the Ninth Circuit had gone too far. The INS granted that the continuous physical presence language requires a flexible interpretation, under which only meaningful absences destroy continuity, but contended that on these facts the absence was meaningful. Three Justices—Brennan, Marshall, and Stevens—accepted the INS argument. But a majority of the Justices went much further. They held that even a non-meaningful absence would preclude continuous physical presence. In so holding, they took on an issue that was not raised by the facts, that no one had argued or briefed, that required the disapproval of twenty years of virtually unbroken case law, that reached a result at odds with the BIA interpretation, and that produced law far more extreme than what even the INS had sought. Interpreting the continuous physical presence requirement literally, the Court held that any absence, no matter how insignificant, would disrupt the continuity of the person’s physical presence and thus, if the absence occurred in the past seven years, preclude suspension. No matter how long the individual had resided in the United States, how commendably he or she had lived, or how severe the resulting hardship, the immigration judge and the BIA would have no power to suspend deportation if, within the past seven years, the person had gone shopping for the afternoon in Tijuana.

8. See, e.g., McColvin v. INS, 648 F.2d 935, 938–39 (4th Cir.1981) (though departure held meaningfully interruptive); Heitland v. INS, 551 F.2d 495, 501–04 (2d Cir.1977) (same); Matter of Wong, 12 I. & N. Dec. 271 (BIA 1967) (applicable nationwide, id. at 276).

Congress was not pleased. Five months later the House voted 411-4 to supersede Phinpathya. The House bill would have amended the INA to provide expressly that only a meaningfully interruptive absence would disrupt continuous physical presence. 130 Cong.Rec. 16348-50 (June 14, 1984). The Senate did not act on the issue that year, but when Congress passed IRCA two years later it added a provision that read:

An alien shall not be considered to have failed to maintain continuous physical presence * * * if the absence from the United States was brief, casual, and innocent and did not meaningfully interrupt the continuous physical presence.

INA § 244(b)(2) (pre-IIRIRA).

In IIRIRA, Congress preserved the practice of permitting temporary absences, but it replaced the flexible test (innocent, casual, brief, and no meaningful interruption) with two bright line rules. Under the new provision, INA § 240A(d)(2), a single departure of more than 90 days automatically destroys continuous physical presence, as do cumulative absences of more than 180 days. At least one court has held, however, that these were not the only absences capable of destroying the requisite continuity of physical presence; voluntary departure (discussed below) will also have that effect, but only if the noncitizen was informed that voluntary departure was actually being granted and accepted it. Reyes-Vasquez v. Ashcroft, 395 F.3d 903, 907-09 (8th Cir. 2005).

Finally, note that for certain noncitizens who have been battered or otherwise subjected to “extreme cruelty,” the continuous physical presence requirement has been reduced to three years. INA § 240A(b)(2)(B).

QUESTIONS

1. What do you think are the rationales for (a) having such a remedy as cancellation of removal part B in the first place; (b) requiring a certain number of years of physical presence; (c) requiring that the physical presence be continuous; and (d) applying bright line rules, rather than weighing factors, to decide whether the continuity has been broken?

2. Is there a technical glitch in the drafting of section 240A? To qualify, the person has to have been physically present for ten years “immediately preceding the date of such application.” INA § 240A(b)(1)(A). But the application is filed in removal proceedings, after service of the Notice to Appear has already terminated the person’s continuous physical presence. INA § 240A(d)(1). Under the literal wording, then, how can anyone qualify for relief? How would you amend the statute to eliminate the problem?

PROBLEM 4

A, her husband, and their three young children were all admitted to the United States in October 1999 (A as the principal, on an H-1B visa, and the others as accompanying spouse and children on H-4 visas). In October 2005, all received adjustment of status to lawful permanent residence. Every summer, starting in 2000, the family has taken a three-week vacation overseas to visit relatives. In December 2009, ICE served all the family members with notices to appear, alleging all were deportable for having obtained adjustment of status while inadmissible, under INA § 237(a)(1)(A). All the family members would experience various unusually severe hardships if ordered removed. Will they be eligible for cancellation of removal?

ii. Hardship

Ever since suspension of deportation (the predecessor to cancellation of removal part B) was introduced in 1940, eligibility has required a showing that deportation would cause some special brand or degree of hardship. Over the years, however, Congress has flip-flopped in its views of precisely how severe the hardship should have to be. The changes are well summarized by former BIA member Lory Rosenberg:

[W]hen the first suspension provision was enacted in 1940, the required showing was only “serious economic detriment to a citizen or legally resident alien who is the spouse, parent, or minor child of such deportable alien.” In 1952, for a variety of reasons, the socio-political pendulum swung in the opposite direction and Congress enacted the far more restrictive standard of “exceptional and extremely unusual hardship.” Ten years later, Congress retreated from this position, and while it retained “exceptional and extremely unusual” as the standard for relief under section 244(a)(2) of the Act [the prong for noncitizen criminal offenders and those who are deportable on certain other particularly serious grounds—Eds.], it required only “extreme hardship” for section 244(a)(1) [all other] cases.

Matter of O.J.O., 21 I. & N. Dec. 381, 398 (BIA 1996) (en banc) (Rosenberg, concurring).

Three months after that description appeared, the pendulum swung again. In converting suspension of deportation to cancellation of removal part B, Congress once again amended the hardship standard. The requirement of “exceptional and extremely unusual hardship,” previously reserved for the most serious categories of deportable noncitizens, was made applicable to all applicants except those who have been battered or otherwise subjected to extreme cruelty. INA §§ 240A(b)(1)(D), 240A(b)(2)(E). In addition, for the person who applies under the general provision, even “exceptional and extremely unusual hardship” to the applicant is not enough; now, the requisite hardship must be suffered by the applicant’s qualifying family member. In contrast, for the person who applies under the battered spouse or child provision, extreme hardship to the applicant will suffice. Id. The difference between “extreme hardship” and “exceptional and extremely unusual hardship” is one of degree and will be taken up shortly.

Whatever the exact formulation, the hardship requirement has typically been the most formidable hurdle to clear. Certainly this is the element that has spawned the most litigation.

The issue of when hardship is “exceptional and extremely unusual” (or just plain “extreme,” in the case of battered family members) can surface in either of two distinct settings that it is crucial to separate. The issue arises in its most direct form when a noncitizen in removal proceedings applies to the immigration judge for cancellation. The applicant has the burden of establishing the required hardship (along with all the other elements of cancellation of removal). Since the immigration judge’s decision whether to order removal is appealable to the BIA, the BIA frequently becomes enmeshed in hardship determinations as well. Before IIRIRA, when the courts could freely review denials of suspension of deportation, they too would make frequent contributions to the law on extreme hardship.

IIRIRA § 306(a)(2) curbed judicial involvement in these issues. It barred the courts from reviewing “any judgment regarding the granting of relief under section . . . 240A.” INA § 242(a)(2)(B)(i). As you will see in chapter 9, the courts have generally interpreted this provision as allowing judicial review of the non-discretionary prerequisites to cancellation of removal. The hardship determination has been held to be discretionary in nature, however, and therefore not directly reviewable. See Romero-Torres v. Ashcroft, 327 F.3d 887 (9th Cir. 2003); Gonzalez-Oropeza v. United States Attorney General, 321 F.3d 1331, 1332–33 (11th Cir. 2003).

But there is a second way in which the hardship issue arises. This one requires more explanation and will likely continue to keep the courts occupied with hardship issues. As you might recall, it is only while removal proceedings are pending before the immigration judge (or the BIA) that one may apply for cancellation at all. 8 CFR §§ 1240.11(a), 1240.20(b) (2008). Suppose a person is ineligible for cancellation at the time of those administrative proceedings but, before actual removal from the United States, he or she becomes eligible.

That scenario used to be quite common. Removal proceedings can drag on, and delays often occur between issuance of a final removal order and the person’s physical departure. During that latter interval, the required duration of continuous physical presence might have accrued. Today, that particular sequence can no longer occur, because, as noted earlier, service of the Notice to Appear terminates one’s continuous physical presence. But other events can make noncitizens eligible. A new personal development, for example, might permit a showing of exceptional and extremely unusual hardship. Or new personal circumstances might enhance the general equities that influence the exercise of administrative discretion required for cancellation of removal.

In any of those cases, as in any other case where previously unavailable evidence affects either deportability or eligibility for affirmative relief, the proper procedure is to move to reopen removal proceedings. 8 CFR §§ 1003.2, 1003.23 (2008). If the BIA has already handed down a decision in the case, then the motion is filed with the BIA. Id. § 1003.2. Otherwise the motion is filed with the immigration judge. Id. § 1003.23. (The requirements for motions to reopen are taken up separately in chapter 9.)

The immigration judges and the BIA have the discretion to grant or deny a motion to reopen. If such a motion is granted, and if its purpose was to enable the person to apply for cancellation, he or she then files the cancellation application with the immigration judge at the reopened hearing. There the immigration judge will have to determine (a) whether the applicant meets the various statutory prerequisites for removal; and (b) if so, whether discretion should be favorably exercised. The decision of the immigration judge in this reopened proceeding is appealable to the BIA. 8 CFR § 1003.1(b)(3) (2008). By the same token, if the immigration judge denies the motion to reopen, that denial is appealable to the BIA. Id.

Thus, a noncitizen who files a motion to reopen is virtually assured the opportunity to get his or her case before the BIA one way or the other. Although there is no automatic right to a stay of removal while a motion to reopen is pending, 8 CFR § 1003.6(b) (2008), immigration judges and the BIA for obvious reasons often hesitate to allow removal to occur before they have had a chance to at least glance at the motions. Moreover, as you will see in chapter 9, most courts hold that BIA decisions denying reopening, and sometimes BIA decisions denying cancellation itself, are reviewable in the courts of appeals. Once the petition for review is filed, the court has the discretion whether to stay removal pending its review. INA § 242(b)(3)(B).

The combination of these various procedural rules means that the filing of a motion to reopen will frequently delay removal whether the motion ultimately succeeds or not. For that reason, motions to reopen have been extremely controversial. ICE, and at times the BIA, have seen them as procedural devices calculated primarily to buy noncitizens additional time in the United States. The immigration bar sees them as legitimate and necessary vehicles for raising new considerations relevant to the decision whether to remove. See generally chapter 9, § B.5 below.

As you study the cases that follow, keep in mind that a substantive decision to grant cancellation of removal avoids removal and confers LPR status. In contrast, a decision to reopen entitles the person only to an evidentiary hearing at which he or she will have the opportunity to prove the facts necessary for cancellation (and possibly a temporary stay of removal). Because the consequences of the two decisions are so different, be sure you are clear which of them is actually being reviewed in a given case. In addition, you should keep track of whether the relevant standard is the lower “extreme hardship” test for battered spouses or children or the now more generally applicable “exceptional and extremely unusual hardship” test.

INS v. Jong Ha Wang

Supreme Court of the United States, 1981.
450 U.S. 139, 101 S.Ct. 1027, 67 L.Ed.2d 123.

■ PER CURIAM.

[This case was decided long before IIRIRA. The INA section numbers, the terminology, and several of the eligibility requirements have now changed, as discussed in the preceding text. But the essential issues raised in this opinion remain relevant today.—Eds.]

Section 244 of the Immigration and Nationality Act (Act), as amended, provides that the Attorney General in his discretion may suspend deportation and adjust the status of an otherwise deportable alien who (1) has been physically present in the United States for not less than seven years; (2) is a person of good moral character; and (3) is “a person whose deportation would, in the opinion of the Attorney General, result in extreme hardship to the alien or to his spouse, parent, or child, who is a citizen of the United States or an alien lawfully admitted for permanent residence.” The Attorney General is authorized to delegate his powers under the Act, INA § 103, and his authority under § 244 has been delegated by regulation to specified authorities in the Immigration and Naturalization Service.

The § 244 issue usually arises in an alien’s deportation hearing. It can arise, however, as it did in this case, on a motion to reopen after deportation has been duly ordered. The Act itself does not expressly provide for a motion to reopen, but regulations promulgated under the Act allow such a procedure. The regulations also provide that the motion to reopen shall “state the new fact to be proved at the reopened hearing and shall be supported by affidavits or other evidentiary material.” Motions to reopen are thus permitted in those cases in which the events or circumstances occurring after the order of deportation would satisfy the extreme-hardship standard of § 244. Such motions will not be granted “when a prima facie case of eligibility for the relief sought has not been established.”

Respondents, husband and wife, are natives and citizens of Korea who first entered the United States in January 1970 as nonimmigrant treaty traders. They were authorized to remain until January 10, 1972, but they remained beyond that date without permission and were found deportable after a hearing in November 1974. They were granted the privilege of voluntarily departing by February 1, 1975. They did not do so. Instead, they applied for adjustment of status under § 245 of the Act, but were found ineligible for this relief after a hearing on July 15, 1975. Their appeal from this ruling was dismissed by the Board of Immigration Appeals in October 1977. Respondents then filed a second motion to reopen their deportation proceedings in December 1977, this time claiming suspension under § 244 of the Act. Respondents by then had satisfied the 7-year-continuous-physical-presence requirement of that section. The motion alleged that deportation would result in extreme hardship to respondents’ two American-born children because neither child spoke Korean and would thus lose “educational opportunities” if forced to leave this country. Respondents also claimed economic hardship to themselves and their children resulting from the forced liquidation of their assets at a possible loss. None of the allegations was sworn or otherwise supported by evidentiary materials, but it appeared that all of respondents’ close relatives, aside from their children, resided in Korea and that respondents had purchased a dry-cleaning business in August 1977, some three years after they had been found deportable. The business was valued at $75,000 and provided an income of $650 per week. Respondents also owned a home purchased in 1974 and valued at $60,000. They had $24,000 in a savings account and some $20,000 in miscellaneous assets. Liabilities were approximately $81,000.

The Board of Immigration Appeals denied respondents' motion to reopen without a hearing, concluding that they had failed to demonstrate a prima facie case that deportation would result in extreme hardship to either themselves or their children so as to entitle them to discretionary relief under the Act. The Board noted that a mere showing of economic detriment is not sufficient to establish extreme hardship under the Act. This was particularly true since respondents had "significant financial resources and there [was] nothing to suggest that the college-educated male respondent could not find suitable employment in Korea." With respect to the claims involving the children, the Board ruled that the alleged loss of educational opportunities to the young children of relatively affluent, educated Korean parents did not constitute extreme hardship within the meaning of § 244.

The Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit, sitting en banc, reversed. Contrary to the Board's holding, the Court of Appeals found that respondents had alleged a sufficient prima facie case of extreme hardship to entitle them to a hearing. The court reasoned that the statute should be liberally construed to effectuate its ameliorative purpose. The combined effect of the allegation of harm to the minor children, which the court thought was hard to discern without a hearing, and the impact on respondents' economic interests was sufficient to constitute a prima facie case requiring a hearing where the Board would "consider the total potential effect of deportation on the alien and his family."

The Court of Appeals erred in two respects. First, the court ignored the regulation which requires the alien seeking suspension to allege and support by affidavit or other evidentiary material the particular facts claimed to constitute extreme hardship. Here, the allegations of hardship were in the main conclusory and unsupported by affidavit. By requiring a hearing on such a motion, the Court of Appeals circumvented this aspect of the regulation, which was obviously designed to permit the Board to select for hearing only those motions reliably indicating the specific recent events that would render deportation a matter of extreme hardship for the alien or his children.⁹

9. [Footnote 5 in original] The present regulation is framed negatively; it directs the Board not to reopen unless certain showings are made. It does not affirmatively require the Board to reopen the proceedings under any particular condition. Thus, the regulations may be construed to provide the Board with discretion in determining under what circumstances proceedings should be reopened. See Villena v. INS, 622 F.2d 1352 (CA9 1980) (en banc) (Wallace, J., dissenting). In his dissent, Judge Wallace stated that INS had discretion beyond requiring proof of a prima facie case:

"If INS discretion is to mean anything, it must be that the INS has some latitude in deciding when to reopen a case. The INS

Secondly, and more fundamentally, the Court of Appeals improvidently encroached on the authority which the Act confers on the Attorney General and his delegates. The crucial question in this case is what constitutes "extreme hardship." These words are not self-explanatory, and reasonable men could easily differ as to their construction. But the Act commits their definition in the first instance to the Attorney General and his delegates, and their construction and application of this standard should not be overturned by a reviewing court simply because it may prefer another interpretation of the statute. Here, the Board considered the facts alleged and found that neither respondents nor their children would suffer extreme hardship. The Board considered it well settled that a mere showing of economic detriment was insufficient to satisfy the requirements of § 244 and in any event noted that respondents had significant financial resources while finding nothing to suggest that Mr. Wang could not find suitable employment in Korea. It also followed that respondents' two children would not suffer serious economic deprivation if they returned to Korea. Finally, the Board could not believe that the two "young children of affluent, educated parents" would be subject to such educational deprivations in Korea as to amount to extreme hardship. In making these determinations, the Board was acting within its authority. As we see it, nothing in the allegations indicated that this is a particularly unusual case requiring the Board to reopen the deportation proceedings.

The Court of Appeals nevertheless ruled that the hardship requirement of § 244 is satisfied if an alien produces sufficient evidence to suggest that the "hardship from deportation would be different and more severe than that suffered by the ordinary alien who is deported." Also, as Judge Goodwin observed in dissent, the majority of the Court of Appeals also strongly indicated that respondents should prevail under such an understanding of the statute. * * *

The Attorney General and his delegates have the authority to construe "extreme hardship" narrowly should they deem it wise to do so. Such a narrow interpretation is consistent with the "extreme hardship" language, which itself indicates the exceptional nature of the suspension remedy. Moreover, the Government has a legitimate interest in creating official procedures for handling motions to reopen deportation proceedings so as readily to identify those cases raising new and meritorious considerations. Under the standard applied by the court below, many aliens could obtain a hearing based upon quite minimal showings. As stated in dissent below, "by using the majority opinion as a blueprint, any foreign visitor who has fertility, money, and the ability to stay out of trouble with the police for seven years can change his status from that of tourist or student to that of permanent resident without the inconvenience of immigration quotas. This should have the right to be restrictive. Granting such motions too freely will permit endless delay of deportation by aliens creative and fertile enough to continuously produce new and material facts sufficient to establish a prima facie case. It will also waste the time and efforts of immigration judges called upon to preside at hearings automatically required by the prima facie allegations."

strategy is not fair to those waiting for a quota.” (Goodwin, J., dissenting). Judge Goodwin further observed that the relaxed standard of the majority opinion “is likely to shift the administration of hardship deportation cases from the Immigration and Naturalization Service to this court.”

We are convinced that the Board did not exceed its authority and that the Court of Appeals erred in ordering that the case be reopened. Accordingly, the petition for certiorari is granted, and the judgment of the Court of Appeals is reversed.

So ordered.

■ BRENNAN, MARSHALL and BLACKMUN would grant the petition for certiorari and give the case plenary consideration.

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. It is hornbook administrative law that a reviewing court generally may not affirm the decision of an administrative agency “unless the grounds upon which the agency acted in exercising its powers were those upon which its action can be sustained.” SEC v. Chenery Corp., 318 U.S. 80, 95, 63 S.Ct. 454, 462, 87 L.Ed. 626, 637 (1943). Put another way, a court will not ordinarily affirm an agency decision on a ground not invoked by the agency itself. Can you figure out the rationale for that principle?

What reason did the BIA give for its refusal to reopen deportation proceedings to permit an application for suspension? What two reasons does the Supreme Court give for upholding the BIA decision? Is the Supreme Court decision compatible with Chenery?

2. The Ninth Circuit had held in this case that (a) a BIA decision refusing to reopen deportation proceedings is reviewable only for abuse of discretion; but (b) if the purpose of the motion is to obtain the opportunity to apply for suspension, and the noncitizen makes out a “prima facie case” that he or she is eligible for suspension, it is an abuse of discretion not to reopen; and (c) the present applicants had made out such a prima facie case.

As Judge Sneed noted in his Ninth Circuit concurrence, see Jong Ha Wang v. INS, 622 F.2d 1341, 1350 n. 1 (9th Cir.1980), the BIA itself invented the “prima facie case” test in 1972. The Ninth Circuit in Jong Ha Wang (and in its previous decisions) adopted that test. At the time of Jong Ha Wang, however, neither the BIA nor the courts had ever explained what the term means. By analogy to other areas of law you have studied, can you surmise what must constitute a prima facie case of eligibility for suspension? Do you agree with the Ninth Circuit that the present allegations establish a prima facie case? See Abudu v. INS, 802 F.2d 1096, 1100 (9th Cir.1986), rev’d, INS v. Abudu, 485 U.S. 94, 108 S.Ct. 904, 99 L.Ed.2d 90 (1988).

3. Should allegations that establish a prima facie case of eligibility require the BIA to reopen, or should the BIA have the discretion to deny reopening even then? One instance in which that issue arises is where the Board concludes that, even if the person ultimately proves statutory eligibility, there are negatives that would persuade the Board to deny suspension (now cancellation) on discretionary grounds in any event. The Supreme Court held in INS v. Rios-Pineda, 471 U.S. 444, 105 S.Ct. 2098, 85 L.Ed.2d 452 (1985), that in such a case the BIA does not abuse its discretion by denying reopening. Accord, INS v. Abudu, 485 U.S. 94, 105, 108 S.Ct. 904, 912, 99 L.Ed.2d 90, 102 (1988) (dictum).

The same question arises when the BIA concludes that the allegations would establish extreme hardship if true, but the BIA finds the allegations outlandish on their face. Should a denial of reopening be held to constitute an abuse of discretion in that instance?

Assume, however, that the applicant alleges non-outlandish facts establishing a prima facie case of eligibility, and that there are no factors clearly requiring a negative exercise of discretion. What are the pros and cons of a rule that would require the Board to reopen under those circumstances?

Note, incidentally, that the Justice Department regulations now expressly say "The Board [of Immigration Appeals] has discretion to deny a motion to reopen even if the party moving has made out a prima facie case for relief." 8 CFR § 1003.2(a) (2008).

4. In his Ninth Circuit concurring opinion, Judge Sneed said:

* * * Were [the BIA's] refusal based solely on the belief that the facts as alleged are insufficient to constitute hardship under section 244(a)(1), the issue before us should be merely whether this conclusion reflects an abuse of discretion on the part of the Attorney General. A hearing should be unnecessary because the alien's version of the facts has been accepted by the INS [sic—he must mean the BIA—Eds.] A hearing to establish what is admitted serves no purpose * * *. Were this case in that posture I would conclude the Attorney General has not abused his discretion in refusing to open deportation proceedings.

On the other hand, were the refusal to reopen based wholly, or even in material part, on an assertion or belief that the facts are other than the alien asserts, it would be, I believe, an abuse of discretion not to reopen deportation proceedings for a hearing. As previously indicated it is not clear on what ground the refusal to reopen was based in this case [because it is not clear what the BIA means by the phrase "prima facie case."] Where facts are disputed a hearing is necessary to permit the Attorney General's discretion to be exercised wisely and on the basis of all the relevant facts.

622 F.2d at 1230.

Is Judge Sneed right to suggest that a hearing would be pointless under his first scenario? Suppose the moving papers contain the following allegations: The noncitizen parents, ordered removed to Thailand, have a ten-year-old, fifth grade, United States citizen child who has lived in the United States all her life and speaks only English. The child has two surviving grandparents. They live 50 miles away and see the child about once every two weeks on average. The child has a sensitive nature and would be extremely sad to leave her grandparents and her friends. In addition, she would feel great isolation because both her inability to speak the Thai language and her striking cultural differences would make it difficult for her to make friends with the other children.

Let us assume those allegations are undisputed. Does it follow that the BIA can intelligently assess the degree of hardship without a hearing? Shouldn't it want to know how great the child's sense of linguistic and cultural isolation would be? Shouldn't it want to know how saddened the child would be by separation from her grandparents and her friends? These are questions of degree. Don't they depend on how sensitive this child really is, and on how meaningful a relationship she had with her grandparents? Is it really true that a hearing at which the immigration judge could question the child, her parents, and her grandparents "serves no purpose" because "the alien's version of the facts has been accepted by the [former] INS"? When the "facts" are statements of degree, can they be neatly categorized as either accepted or disputed? Finally, is it really obvious that the BIA would not change its mind after a hearing?

5. Do you agree with Judge Goodwin, whom the Supreme Court quotes approvingly near the end of its opinion, that the Ninth Circuit decision would be a blueprint for unfairly jumping the queue and attaining LPR status?

6. At bottom, the litigation in Jong Ha Wang raises fundamental questions about the allocation, between the administrative authorities and the courts, of the power to decide what level of hardship qualifies as "extreme" (now "exceptional and extremely unusual"), or at least the power to decide what hardship qualifies as severe enough to justify a hearing on the issue. In one of the more frequently quoted sentences of this opinion, the Court states, "The Attorney General and his delegates have the authority to construe 'extreme hardship' narrowly should they deem it wise to do so." Do you agree? Can the statement be reconciled with the Fong Haw Tan principle that ambiguities in deportation statutes should be construed favorably to the noncitizens?

7. What has the Supreme Court actually held here? Can you take anything concrete from this case?

8. The Ninth Circuit opinion in Jong Ha Wang had offered guidance concerning the factors that should influence extreme hardship determinations. Similar observations can be found in the decisions of other courts. They include the following:

a. Equities that arise while the person knows he or she is here illegally should generally be weighted less heavily than equities that arise during legal status, but even the former cannot be discounted entirely. 622 F.2d at 1346.

b. The applicant need only demonstrate extreme hardship to one of the persons listed in the statute: the applicant's citizen or LPR spouse, parent, or child. But the applicant may also prevail by showing that the “aggregate hardship to two or more of those persons * * * is extreme even if the hardship as to any one person would not be extreme viewed in isolation.” Id. at 1347 & n.6.

c. Economic loss alone is not per se extreme hardship, but it is an additional factor to be considered along with others, id. at 1348, and in some cases might be extreme enough to be independently sufficient, id. at 1348-49.

d. Other factors include medical problems, the ages of the children, the effects of removal on the children’s education, separation from other relatives, and the difficulties in adjusting to life in a foreign country. Id. at 1348 n.7.

e. The evidence of hardship must be considered cumulatively. Id. at 1349; accord, Watkins v. INS, 63 F.3d 844 (9th Cir. 1995).

9. Even the post-Wang decisions have made clear that it is appropriate for a reviewing court to remand when the BIA failed to consider all relevant factors. See, e.g., Cao v. United States Dep’t of Justice, 421 F.3d 149 (2d Cir. 2005); Ordonez v. INS, 137 F.3d 1120 (9th Cir. 1998); Blanco v. INS, 68 F.3d 642, 646 (2d Cir. 1995).

10. Judicial reactions to Wang have been mixed. In several cases heard soon after Wang, courts that had reversed BIA decisions before Wang ended up rehearing those cases after Wang and ultimately affirming the BIA. See, e.g., Hee Yung Ahn v. INS, 651 F.2d 1285 (9th Cir. 1981); Hamid v. INS, 648 F.2d 635 (9th Cir.1981); Ki Yun Cho v. INS, 649 F.2d 867 (9th Cir.1981).

Hamid is particularly illustrative. A noncitizen moved the BIA to reconsider its denial of his motion to reopen. He attached the affidavit of his United States citizen wife stating that, when she married him, she had had no idea he could be deported. The BIA found that statement “inherently unbelievable” and thus not warranting a hearing. Do you agree? Before taking immigration law, would you have known that the government deports the husbands of American citizens? Apart from that, note the Board’s reason for refusing a hearing: that it doubted the truth—not the sufficiency—of the allegations in the moving papers. Did Wang compel the Ninth Circuit’s turnaround on that point?

Hamid is instructive on another point as well. The applicant had attached a letter from his infant son’s pediatrician. The letter stated the child “showed severe and unusual reactions to routine immunizations of diphtheria” and other diseases prevalent in Pakistan, the country to which Hamid would be deported. Administrative Record at 50. The child could not safely be vaccinated against those diseases and, consequently, risked serious illness or even death if the family were to accompany the deported father to Pakistan. Id. In its first decision the court found that evidence persuasive and held the BIA had abused its discretion in denying the hearing that reopening would have required. After the Supreme Court decision in Wang, the court of appeals reheard the case and upheld the BIA, reasoning that there might be medical facilities in Pakistan that could treat the child if he were to contract one of the life-threatening diseases the doctor had listed. 648 F.2d at 637. Is that degree of substantive deference required by Wang?

The Fifth Circuit has also read the Wang edict broadly. Although ultimately reversing the BIA for failure to consider all the relevant factors, the court in Ramos v. INS, 695 F.2d 181, 185 (5th Cir.1983), said that in light of Wang “we doubt that there remains much, if any, scope for judicial substantive review * * * of no ‘extreme hardship’ determinations” (emphasis added). Quoting that language approvingly, the court in Hernandez-Cordero v. United States INS, 819 F.2d 558 (5th Cir.1987), held that substantive abuse of discretion could be found “only in a case where the hardship is uniquely extreme, at or closely approaching the outer limits of the most severe hardship the alien could suffer * * *.” Id. at 563 (again acknowledging the propriety of procedural review). This means, as the court says later, “virtually no substantive review.” Id.

Many courts, however, have refused to throw in the towel. For a long list of examples, see Developments in the Law, Immigration Policy and the Rights of Aliens, 96 Harvard L.Rev. 1286, 1396–97 (1983). As that passage illustrates, however, most reversals are based on procedural grounds, of which three are particularly common: the failure to consider a relevant factor, the failure to weigh the various hardship components cumulatively, and the failure to give reasons for the decision. Id. Accord (on all three propositions), Arrozal v. INS, 159 F.3d 429 (9th Cir. 1998).

What some call undue judicial intrusion, others call responsible judicial review of agency action. What some call appropriate judicial deference, others call abdication of duty. A clear picture of the amount of leeway Congress intended to give an administrative agency can seldom be gleaned from the literal language of the statutory grant. Inevitably, that picture reflects the judge’s personal conception of the respective roles of courts and agencies. Given Wang, where would you draw the line?

11. The Ninth Circuit is without question the preeminent circuit on matters of immigration law, historically receiving as many immigration cases as all other circuits combined (though the Second Circuit immigration caseload is rising rapidly, as you will see in chapter 9, section B.6 below). The Ninth Circuit’s expertise in this subject area is of course no reason for the Supreme Court to rubber-stamp its decisions, but one would expect the Supreme Court to study the issues carefully before reversing.

In Jong Ha Wang, there was further reason to treat the Ninth Circuit opinion with particular respect. The decision was not that of a three-judge panel, but that of a nine-judge limited en banc court. Because en banc decisionmaking is so labor-intensive, courts generally reserve that procedure for cases that are either unusually important or require the overruling of a prior three-judge panel decision. In Jong Ha Wang, the en banc court produced a comprehensive and detailed opinion intended to provide concrete guidance to all involved in extreme hardship cases. The nine judges who participated in the en banc decision were on the whole a generally conservative lot. (Seven of those nine, and three of the five who made up the majority, had been appointed by Republican Presidents.)

Thus presented with a comprehensive, en banc decision by a court possessing special expertise in the subject area, the Supreme Court, one might assume, would surely proceed cautiously before reversing. So when you reached the end of the majority opinion, and saw that three Justices “would grant the petition for certiorari and give the case plenary consideration,” you might have wondered: “Isn’t that what the majority just did?” As it turns out, it is not. The Supreme Court in Jong Ha Wang employed a special summary procedure usually reserved for cases that either require emergency action or are extremely clear-cut. It reversed the en banc decision of the Ninth Circuit without allowing oral argument and without even waiting for briefs!

Why would the Supreme Court act so precipitously? Was it trying to do more than simply correct what it perceived as a legal error? Was it sending a more general signal? What might the message be? The fiery relationship between the Supreme Court and the Ninth Circuit during the early 1980’s is explored again on pages 731–32 below. For commentary on the generally hostile tone of the Supreme Court in Jong Ha Wang, see Michael G. Heyman, Immigration Law in the Supreme Court: The Flagging Spirit of the Law, 28 J. of Legislation 113, 116–19 (2002).

12. After the Supreme Court’s decision in Jong Ha Wang, the question remains: When the BIA denies a motion to reopen to apply for suspension (now cancellation of removal part B), and the basis for the denial is that the applicant did not establish sufficient hardship, what is the job of the reviewing court? To put the question another way, what is the practical effect of Wang?

The Wang decision and the Notes and Questions following it have explored the scope of the judicial role when the BIA has found the showing of hardship insufficient to warrant reopening removal proceedings for the purpose of applying for cancellation of removal. It is now time to back up and consider the substantive standards that immigration judges and the BIA apply in the first place. As noted earlier, people applying under the general provision of cancellation of removal Part B (i.e., not the special provision for battered spouses and children) must now establish “exceptional and extremely unusual hardship,” rather than the “extreme hardship” that was required at the time of Wang. In the conference committee report accompanying IIRIRA, the committee said the change was meant to emphasize that the harm must be “substantially beyond that which ordinarily would be expected to result from the alien’s deportation.” Cong. Rec. at H10896 (Sept. 24, 1996).

The committee interpreted Matter of O.J.O., 21 I. & N. Dec. 381 (BIA en banc 1996), as “holding that forced removal of an alien who has become ‘acclimated’ to the United States” would suffice for extreme hardship, and went on to make clear that mere acclimation would not satisfy the committee's proposed "exceptional and extremely unusual standard." Cong. Rec. at H10896 (Sept. 24, 1996). (The committee's interpretation of O.J.O. is debatable; the Board in that case actually examined a combination of factors, not just the person's acclimation to the United States.) The committee also made clear that a person could not satisfy the proposed higher standard merely by showing that his or her United States citizen child "would fare less well in the alien's country of nationality than in the United States." Id. Since decisions that have found "extreme hardship" based solely on acclimation to the United States or on a child doing "less well" were rare indeed (if they ever existed at all), the precise impact of the amendment on the outcomes of actual cases is difficult to quantify.

But it is clearly having some impact. The following discussion illustrates:

Matter of Recinas

Board of Immigration Appeals, en banc, 2002.
23 I. & N. Dec. 467.

■ VILLAGELIU, BOARD MEMBER:

The respondents have appealed from the decision of an Immigration Judge * * * denying their application for cancellation of removal * * *. The appeal will be sustained.

I. FACTUAL BACKGROUND

The adult respondent is a 39-year-old native and citizen of Mexico. She is the mother of four United States citizen children, aged 12, 11, 8, and 5, and the two minor respondents, aged 15 and 16, both of whom are natives and citizens of Mexico. Her parents are lawful permanent residents and her five siblings are United States citizens. She is divorced and has no immediate family in Mexico.

The three respondents entered the United States in 1988 on nonimmigrant visas and stayed longer than authorized. Except for a brief absence in 1992, they have remained in this country since their initial entry.

II. ISSUE

The sole issue on appeal is whether the Immigration Judge erred in finding that the respondent failed to demonstrate that her removal would result in exceptional and extremely unusual hardship to her four United States citizen children and/or her lawful permanent resident parents.¹⁰

III. ANALYSIS

* * *

10. [Footnote 5 in original] As the Immigration Judge noted, the minor respondents do not have a qualifying relative for purposes of cancellation of removal.

A. Exceptional and Extremely Unusual Hardship Standard

In Matter of Monreal, 23 I. & N. Dec. 56 (BIA 2001), we first considered the “exceptional and extremely unusual” hardship standard in a precedent decision in the case of a 34-year-old Mexican national who was the father of three United States citizen children. We held that to establish exceptional and extremely unusual hardship under section 240A(b) of the Act, an alien must demonstrate that his or her spouse, parent, or child would suffer hardship that is substantially beyond that which would ordinarily be expected to result from the person’s departure. We specifically stated, however, that the alien need not show that such hardship would be “unconscionable.” We also noted that, in deciding a cancellation of removal claim, consideration should be given to the age, health, and circumstances of the qualifying family members, including how a lower standard of living or adverse country conditions in the country of return might affect those relatives.

After reviewing the case, we dismissed the respondent’s appeal, finding that he had not satisfied the new hardship standard. We noted that the respondent had been working for 10 years at his uncle’s business, but had a brother living in Mexico who also worked for the same business. Our decision emphasized that the respondent was in good health and would be able to work and support his United States citizen children in Mexico. We further found that, upon his return to Mexico, the respondent would be reunited with family members, including his wife (the mother of their three children), who had already returned to Mexico with one of the children. Finally, we noted that the respondent’s children were in good health and that the eldest, who was 12 years old, could speak, read, and write Spanish.

We revisited the issue in Matter of Andazola, 23 I. & N. Dec. 319 (BIA 2002), finding that the exceptional and extremely unusual hardship standard was not met in the case of a single Mexican woman. The respondent had two United States citizen children, who were 11 and 6 years old. Their father (who apparently had authorization to remain in the United States) contributed financially to the family, was a presence in the lives of the children, and could continue to help support the family upon their return to Mexico. All of the respondent’s siblings were living in the United States, but were without documentation. The respondent had not shown that her United States citizen children would be deprived of all schooling, or of an opportunity to obtain any education. In denying relief, we considered it “significant” that the respondent had accumulated assets, including $7,000 in savings and a retirement fund, and owned a home and two vehicles. We noted that these assets could help ease the family’s transition to Mexico. Accordingly, we found that the case presented a common fact pattern that was insufficient to satisfy the exceptional and extremely unusual hardship standard.

While any hardship case ultimately succeeds or fails on its own merits and on the particular facts presented, Matter of Andazola and Matter of Monreal are the starting points for any analysis of exceptional and extremely unusual hardship. * * *

* * *

C. Assessment of Hardship

While this case presents a close question, we find it distinguishable from both Matter of Monreal and Matter of Andazola. As we noted in those decisions, the exceptional and extremely unusual hardship standard for cancellation of removal applicants constitutes a high threshold that is in keeping with Congress' intent to substantially narrow the class of aliens who would qualify for relief. Nevertheless, the hardship standard is not so restrictive that only a handful of applicants, such as those who have a qualifying relative with a serious medical condition, will qualify for relief. We consider this case to be on the outer limit of the narrow spectrum of cases in which the exceptional and extremely unusual hardship standard will be met. Keeping in mind that this hardship standard must be assessed solely with regard to the qualifying relatives in this case, we find the following factors to be significant.

The respondent has raised her family in the United States since 1988, and her four United States citizen children know no other way of life. The respondent's children do not speak Spanish well, and they are unable to read or write in that language.

Unlike the children in Monreal and Andazola, the respondent's four United States citizen children are entirely dependent on their single mother for support. The respondent is divorced from the children's father, and there is no indication that he remains involved in their lives in any manner. This increases the hardship the children would face upon return to Mexico, as they would be completely dependent on their mother's ability, not only to find adequate employment and housing, but also to provide for their emotional needs.

The respondent has been able to leave her children in the care of her lawful permanent resident mother while she attended courses to obtain a vehicle inspector's certificate and established a business. This assistance from her mother has enabled her to support her children within a stable environment. The respondent's ability to provide for the needs of her family will be severely hampered by the fact that she does not have any family in Mexico who can help care for her six children. As a single mother, the respondent will no doubt experience difficulties in finding work, especially employment that will allow her to continue to provide a safe and supportive home for her children.

From the perspective of the United States citizen children, it is clear that significant hardship will result from the loss of the economic stake that their mother has gained in this country, coupled with the difficulty she will have in establishing any comparable economic stability in Mexico. We emphasize that the respondent is a single parent who is solely responsible for the care of six children and who has no family to return to in Mexico.

These are critical factors that distinguish her case from many other cancellation of removal claims.

In addition to the hardship of the United States citizen children, factors that relate only to the respondent may also be considered to the extent that they affect the potential level of hardship to her qualifying relatives. In Andazola we found that similar factors were not sufficient to meet the high standard of exceptional and extremely unusual hardship. However, in this case, there are additional factors that we find raise the level of hardship, by a close margin, to that required to establish eligibility for relief.

The respondent's lawful permanent resident parents also are qualifying relatives. While we have not considered their hardship in assessing the respondent's claim, her parents form part of the strong system of family support that the respondent and the minor qualifying relatives would lose if they are removed from the United States.

Although the minor respondents lack a qualifying relative for purposes of cancellation of removal, their existence also cannot be ignored. In a family such as this, headed by a single parent, the hardship of their parent inherently translates into hardship on the rest of the family, in this case to all six children. In considering the hardship that the United States citizen children would face in Mexico, we must also consider the totality of the burden on the entire family that would result when a single mother must support a family of this size. Unlike the situation in Monreal and Andazola, all of the respondent's family, including her siblings, reside lawfully in the United States. We find this significant because they are unlikely to be subject to immigration enforcement and will probably remain in the United States indefinitely. The respondent's family members are very close and have been instrumental in helping her raise her children and obtain the necessary funds to establish her business. The loss of this support would further increase the hardship that she, and therefore her United States citizen children, would suffer if they are compelled to return to Mexico, where no support structure exists.

Finally, we note that the respondent's prospects for lawful immigration through her United States citizen siblings or lawful permanent resident parents are unrealistic due to the backlog of visa availability for Mexican nationals with preference classification. There are no other apparent methods of adjustment available to any of the respondents. These are factors we have previously found to be significant when considering an identical hardship standard for suspension of deportation.

The hardship factors present in this case are more different in degree than in kind from those present in Monreal and Andazola. For this reason, we see no need to depart from the analysis set forth in those cases. Part of that analysis requires the assessment of hardship factors in their totality, often termed a "cumulative" analysis. Here, the heavy financial and familial burden on the adult respondent, the lack of support from the children's father, the United States citizen children's unfamiliarity with the Spanish language, the lawful residence in this country of all of the respondent's immediate family, and the concomitant lack of family in Mexico combine to render the hardship in this case well beyond that which is normally experienced in most cases of removal. The level of hardship presented here is higher than that established in either Monreal or Andazola and, in our view, is sufficient to be considered exceptional and extremely unusual.

We emphasize, in conclusion, that this decision cannot be read in isolation from Monreal and Andazola. Those cases remain our seminal interpretations of the meaning of "exceptional and extremely unusual hardship". The cumulative factors present in this case are indeed unusual and will not typically be found in most other cases, where respondents have smaller families and relatives who reside in both the United States and their country of origin.

IV. CONCLUSION

Given the unusual facts presented in this case, we find that the adult respondent has shown that her United States citizen children will suffer exceptional and extremely unusual hardship if she is removed from the United States. Accordingly, her appeal will be sustained and she will be granted cancellation of removal.

As the adult respondent has been granted relief and appears to have no impediment to adjusting her status, the minor respondents are likely to soon have a qualifying relative for purposes of establishing eligibility for cancellation of removal. Given this fact, we find it appropriate to remand their records to the Immigration Judge for their cases to be held in abeyance pending a disposition regarding the adult respondent's status.

* * *

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. With this line of cases the Board has confirmed that the new "exceptional and extremely unusual hardship" does indeed make a difference—both intrinsically and because the new standard considers only hardships experienced by the applicant's family members, not the applicant's own hardships no matter how severe. In both Matter of Monreal-Aguinaga, 23 I. & N. Dec. 56, 59-64 (BIA 2001), and Matter of Andazola, 23 I. & N. Dec. 319, 322, 324 (BIA 2002), the Board said that the applicant might have prevailed under the old standard but did not meet the new one.

2. Which way, exactly, does having lawfully resident family members in the United States cut? Does it bolster the showing that removal would cause exceptional and extremely unusual hardship or undercut it? Argue both ways.

3. The hardship determination requires the application of law to varying fact situations. What, if anything, does the Recinas opinion tell us about the role of precedent in such cases?

4. In Recinas, the undocumented mother has four U.S. citizen children and two undocumented children. The Board finds the former would suffer exceptional and extremely unusual hardship if their mother is removed. The two undocumented children, however, enter the case with no qualifying family members who are U.S. citizens or LPRs. The statute limits the list of qualifying citizen or LPR family members to spouses, parents, and children—not siblings. Yet no one will dispute that these two children’s equities are at least as strong as those of their mother. What policy options are available for plugging that apparent gap in the law? Consider not only curative changes to the language of the hardship requirement, but any broader statutory changes as well.

iii. Other Hurdles: Good Moral Character, Disqualified Groups, Discretion, and Reporting to Congress

Although the physical presence and hardship requirements can be significant barriers to cancellation of removal part B, there are other hurdles as well. As you saw earlier, for example, INA § 240A(b)(1)(B) requires good moral character for the entire ten years. INA § 101(f) lays out several classes of noncitizens who, as a matter of law, lack good moral character (not only for purposes of cancellation, but also for purposes of other provisions of the Act that contain that phrase). These preclusive categories include alcoholism, specified criminal activities, and “false testimony for the purpose of obtaining any benefits” under the INA. The list is not exhaustive. That the person does not fall within any of the precluded categories does not compel a finding of good moral character. Matter of Turcotte, 12 I. & N. Dec. 206 (BIA 1967).

Certain noncitizens who meet the physical presence, hardship, and good moral character requirements are nonetheless disqualified from applying. These classes of individuals are described in INA § 240A(c). They include crew members, certain exchange visitors, and most people who are inadmissible or deportable on political or national security grounds. Recall too that cancellation is one of the remedies that noncitizens who fail to appear at their removal hearings or who fail to meet other specified obligations are ineligible to obtain for ten years. INA §§ 240(b)(7), 240B(d).

INA § 240A(b), like section 240A(a) (for LPRs), says the Attorney General (and therefore the immigration court, see 8 CFR § 1240.20 (2008)) may cancel the removal of a noncitizen who satisfies the various statutory prerequisites discussed thus far. The word “may” implies the exercise of administrative discretion. This discretion should be distinguished from, and is broader than, the discretion inherent in the “exceptional and extremely unusual hardship” determination. It has not been the norm to deny cancellation of removal part B (or its predecessor, suspension of deportation) on discretionary grounds when the person has established statutory eligibility, but such denials do sometimes occur.

Former BIA Chairperson Maurice Roberts, concerned about the breadth of the administrative discretion, has suggested the issuance of guidelines that would at least articulate some of the relevant factors.¹¹ Do you think such an enterprise would be (a) feasible and (b) beneficial?

Until 1983, an administratively final decision to grant suspension of deportation was subject to one last hurdle: congressional acquiescence. Former INA § 244(c) provided that suspension grants under section 244(a)(1) (then applicable to the less serious deportation grounds) required congressional inaction for a specified time, and that grants under section 244(a)(2) (then applicable to the more serious deportation grounds) required affirmative approval of both Houses of Congress. As you saw on pages 201–06 above, the Supreme Court explicitly struck down the first type of “legislative veto” in INS v. Chadha, 462 U.S. 919, 103 S.Ct. 2764, 77 L.Ed.2d 317 (1983). In 1988, Congress repealed both legislative veto provisions. Pub.L. 100–525, § 2(q), 102 Stat. 2609, 2614 (Oct. 24, 1988).

iv. NACARA

As a result of prolonged civil war in Nicaragua, Guatemala and El Salvador and some related legal and political developments in the United States, there have been hundreds of thousands of undocumented Central Americans living in uncertain status in the United States for many years. You will see more on this subject in chapter 11, in the context of asylum and related remedies.

In an attempt to alleviate at least part of the problem, Congress in 1997 passed the Nicaraguan Adjustment and Central American Relief Act, Pub. L. 105–100, Title II, 111 Stat. 2160, 2193 (Nov. 19, 1997), best known as NACARA. This statute granted special dispensations to nationals of certain named countries. The relief it provided is of two kinds.

The more generous relief, in the nature of an amnesty, is for certain nationals of Nicaragua and Cuba. It is discussed in chapter 12 below. (A subsequent, more limited amnesty for certain Haitian nationals is simultaneously discussed.)

Certain nationals of selected other countries—Guatemala, El Salvador, the former USSR and its successor republics, and most Eastern European nations—received a lesser but still important form of relief that will be taken up here. They received the right to apply for cancellation of removal (and adjustment of status) under the less onerous substantive criteria embodied in the pre-IIRIRA suspension of deportation provision. This latter relief is usually referred to as “special rule” cancellation of removal. Moreover, if a person receives special rule cancellation, then his or her spouse, child, and (if here by October 1, 1990) adult son or daughter may receive special rule cancellation as well. NACARA § 203(a, b).

To qualify for the special rule, the person has to have entered before a specified date in 1990. (The date varies depending on the applicant’s nationality.) One must affirmatively apply. As noted earlier, the substantive requirements are virtually the same as those formerly in place under the pre-IIRIRA version of suspension of deportation. The most important relaxations are the seven-year physical presence requirement (rather than the new requirement of ten years), the requirement of merely “extreme” hardship to oneself or one’s family members (rather than the more demanding “exceptional and extremely unusual” hardship only to one’s family members); and the inapplicability of the IIRIRA rule that continuous physical presence ends with the filing of a notice to appear or with the commission of a designated crime. Note, however, that under even those more liberal rules, the remedy is still discretionary. There is no judicial review of a decision by the immigration judge or the BIA denying special rule cancellation. NACARA § 203(a)(1).

11. See Maurice A. Roberts, The Exercise of Administrative Discretion Under the Immigration Laws, 13 San Diego L.Rev. 144, 158, 164–65 (1975). The late Judge Friendly expressed similar sentiments. See Wong Wing Hang v. INS, 360 F.2d 715, 718 (2d Cir. 1966).

Even though the adjustments of status that result from NACARA are exempt from the 4000 limit, some of those grants—namely, those to the Guatemalan and Salvadoran beneficiaries—are deducted from the quotas available in future years for two other programs that you studied earlier. Under the statutory formula, one-half of the Guatemalan and Salvadoran adjustments are subtracted from the annual ceilings for diversity immigrants, and the other one-half from the annual ceilings for the “other workers” prong of the employment-based third preference category. In no event, however, may the reduction to either quota exceed 5000 in any given fiscal year. NACARA § 203(d). Given the hundreds of thousands of NACARA beneficiaries, the maximum reductions of 5000 per year to the diversity and “other workers” programs will continue for many years.

2. REGISTRY

Another remedy used principally by undocumented but long-term residents is INA § 249, which you should read now. Familiarly known as “registry,” this provision confers a discretionary authority on the Attorney General to award LPR status to certain noncitizens who entered the United States before a specified date. From time to time, Congress has advanced that date. The most recent amendment, part of IRCA in 1986, advanced the cutoff date from June 30, 1948 to January 1, 1972. Many have criticized the practice of defining the required length of stay by reference to a fixed date. The leading immigration law treatise points out that that feature makes registry “a remedy of constantly decreasing utility” and suggests replacing the practice of periodic statutory amendments with a specific qualifying period (X years), as is done with cancellation of removal. 4 Gordon, Mailman & Yale-Loehr § 54.01. Do you agree?

Notice a few crucial features of section 249: The applicant may not fall within any of the more serious inadmissibility grounds; must have maintained continuous residence (not the more easily interrupted physical presence) since entry; and must be of good moral character. Finally, registry is one of the remedies made generally unavailable for ten years to individuals who have failed to appear at their removal hearings or failed to comply with their voluntary departure orders. INA §§ 240(b)(7), 240B(d).

Before removal proceedings, one applies to USCIS for registry. Once proceedings have begun, the application is filed with the immigration judge. See 8 CFR § 249.2(a) (2008).

Try to formulate hypotheticals in which a person who is ineligible for cancellation of removal part B is eligible for registry, and vice-versa.

3. LEGALIZATION

Unauthorized immigrants might also secure relief from removal through broad-scale legislative legalization of their status. Congress periodically has considered whether to adopt a legalization program, or amnesty, as it is referred to by the popular press and many participants in the debate. In 1986, Congress passed the largest scale immigration amnesty or legalization program to date as part of the Immigration Reform and Control Act (IRCA). In 2006 and 2007, legalization represented a centerpiece of the comprehensive immigration reform legislation considered by both houses of Congress.

In some ways the words legalization and amnesty are both imprecise labels for the 1986 IRCA program and the reforms contemplated in recent years. Other remedies—cancellation of removal part B and registry—are also analytically “legalization” or “amnesty” programs. Like IRCA, they legalize, or forgive, noncitizens who are here unlawfully, and like IRCA they provide a means to attain LPR status. But by legalizing the status of millions of formerly unauthorized immigrants through comprehensive legislative action, IRCA embodied a broad policy judgment regarding immigration writ large, rather than case-by-case adjudication of individual equities. The IRCA legalization program and debates over legalization are discussed in detail in chapter 12 below.

4. ADJUSTMENT OF STATUS

In chapter 6 you encountered INA § 245, which establishes a procedure known as “adjustment of status.” In that chapter you saw adjustment simply as an alternative to the visa process. Noncitizens who originally entered the United States as nonimmigrants or parolees, but who now wish to become LPRs without having to return home for visas, may apply for adjustment if they meet various conditions.

In the deportability context, adjustment can serve a dual function—affirmative relief from removal and (as before) a means of attaining LPR status without leaving the United States. At this time you should re-read INA § 245 to refresh your recollection of its requirements and its consequences. Note particularly the requirement that the person be “admissible.” As is true when one applies for permanent residence from abroad, the various provisions for waiving specified exclusion grounds can also be used by adjustment applicants to establish admissibility. See, e.g., Matter of Parodi, 17 I. & N. Dec. 608, 611 (BIA 1980).

As a result of a series of changes to section 245 over the past several years, complications now arise when noncitizens who are out of status apply for adjustment of status in removal proceedings. Consider, first, those who are deportable as overstayers. Before 1986, adjustment was an ideal remedy for nonimmigrants who had overstayed or otherwise violated the terms of their admission, had been found deportable, and had become substantively qualified to immigrate. As you learned in chapter 6, however, Congress in that year required adjustment applicants to have continuous lawful status. Not many people who have continuously maintained lawful status are deportable. Those whose deportability charges stem from criminal activity might have maintained status, but most of the crime-related deportability grounds are also exclusion grounds that make the individual not “admissible” and therefore ineligible for adjustment on that basis alone. So the main categories of deportable noncitizens who, immediately after 1986, could still benefit from adjustment were those whom Congress exempted from the continuous status requirement—immediate relatives, special immigrants, and those whose transgressions were “through no fault of [the noncitizen] or for technical reasons.” INA § 245(c).

As discussed in more detail above, the temporary creation of INA § 245(i) in 1994 generally enabled otherwise eligible overstayers to qualify for adjustment by paying a penalty fee. The lapsing of section 245(i) in January 1998 largely eliminated that possibility. With one significant exception, section 245(i) is now of little practical use to people who are in removal proceedings. See pages 508–10 above. The exception is that those who are deportable for overstaying or otherwise violating the terms of their nonimmigrant visas, and who are exempt from the out-of-status bar because they are now either immediate relatives, INA § 245(c)(2), or employment-based preference immigrants who have not been out of status more than 180 days, INA § 245(k), can still qualify for adjustment of status.

Remember also that adjustment of status is one of the remedies that is now unavailable for ten years to those noncitizens who fail to appear at removal hearings or fail to comply with the terms of their voluntary departure orders (considered below). See INA §§ 240(b)(7), 240B(d).

Once removal proceedings have begun, the application for adjustment of status is filed with the immigration judge. 8 CFR § 245.2(a)(1) (2008). The IJ’s eventual decision on adjustment of status will be reflected in his or her ultimate decision whether to order removal; the latter decision, in turn, is appealable to the BIA in the usual way. 8 CFR § 1003.1(b)(3) (2008). As you will see in chapter 9, section B.6, adjustment denials are not judicially reviewable except for errors of law. INA §§ 242(a)(2)(B)(ii), 242(a)(2)(D).

5. PRIVATE BILLS

One remedy of last resort is the “private immigration bill”—legislation that provides LPR status for a specific individual when existing general provisions would not.¹² These were once quite common. For one stretch

12. Excellent summaries of the history of, and criteria and procedures for, private bills include Anna Marie Gallagher, Remedies of Last Resort: Private Bills and Pardons, during the 1960's, they constituted about 50% of all bills introduced in Congress—several thousand each year.¹³ As a result of numerous scandals—including the ABSCAM affair, in which an FBI sting operation caught several members of Congress accepting bribes from foreign business persons in exchange for the introduction of private bills—both the number of such bills introduced and the number enacted have slowed to a trickle. In the two years leading up to IRCA (1995–96), only 27 private immigration bills were introduced and only two were enacted. INS, 1998 Statistical Yearbook of the Immigration and Naturalization Service, Table 75 at 237.

Several commentators predicted that IIRIRA, by severely curtailing other discretionary relief from removal, might prompt at least a modest resurgence of private immigration legislation.¹⁴ It appears they were right. In the two Congresses that followed IIRIRA (105th and 106th, covering calendar years 1997–2000 inclusive), the number of bills introduced jumped from 27 to 67 and then to 121, and the number enacted increased from 2 to 9 and then to 18. In the three subsequent Congresses (107th, 108th, and 109th), the number of bills introduced remained at similar levels, with 66, 98, and 73, introduced, respectively. The number of bills passed dropped, however, to 4, 4, and then 0.

In one high-profile example in the years after IIRIRA, Rep. Bill McCollum, a Florida Republican, introduced a bill on behalf of the son of a powerful Republican party official. After serving four years in prison for 13 felony convictions on theft and fraud counts, the son had been ordered deported to Canada, his country of nationality. As a result of IIRIRA's elimination of all other avenues of discretionary relief, existing law left him without a remedy. Having actively supported IIRIRA, McCollum drew criticism for seeking relief on behalf of the friend of a party official. McCollum denied any political motive for the bill. Syndicated columnist Anthony Lewis observed "Congressman McCollum may be moved by the human consequences of the 1996 law now that he sees them. It is easy to be for harsh measures in the abstract. It is not so easy when you see the result in shattered lives." See Anthony Lewis, Abroad at Home: The Quality of Mercy, New York Times, Feb. 27, 1999 at A15.

Over the last decade or so, private bills have been directed predominantly at non-citizens unable to acquire lawful status through no fault of their own, such as orphan adoptees who have aged out before adoption and immigration petitions can be completed, and non-citizens married to citizens who die before the former's permanent resident adjustment has been

Feb. 2006 Immigration Briefings; Robert Hopper & Juan P. Osuna, Remedies of Last Resort: Private Bills and Deferred Action, June 1997 Immigration Briefings; Bernadette Maguire, Immigration: Public Legislation and Private Bills (1997); Ryan Quinn & Stephen Yale-Loehr, Private Immigration Bills: An Overview, 9 BIB 1147 (Oct. 1, 2004); David completed. See Margaret Mikyung Lee, Private Immigration Legislation: CRS Report for Congress (Aug. 9, 2005). At least six private bills were pending in the House at the time this edition went to press. The various bills would provide relief for, among others, a woman whose asylum application was denied but who gave birth to a child with cerebral palsy in the United States; a young adult who was born with severe birth defects and was adopted by an American couple, but whose petition for permanent residency was denied because he turned 16 before the adoption was formalized; and a woman who married a U.S. citizen police officer who was killed in the line of duty before his wife's petition for permanent residence could be approved.

Weissbrodt & Laura Danielson, Immigration Law and Procedure in a Nutshell 99–104 (5th ed. 2005).

13. Hopper & Osuna, note 12 above, at 3.

14. Id.; see also Weissbrodt & Danielson, note 12 above, at 96.

The first step in obtaining a private immigration bill is persuading a member of Congress to introduce it. Once such bills are introduced, they are ordinarily routed to the immigration subcommittees of the Judiciary Committees of the respective Houses. Both subcommittees now have formal rules that lay out the procedures for, and discuss generally the substantive criteria for granting, private immigration legislation. The latest versions of those rules are reproduced in 79 IR at 420-27 (Mar. 18, 2002). Further examples of the kinds of hardships to which Congress has and has not been receptive appear in Quinn & Yale-Loehr, note 12 above, at 1149-51.

The rules do not provide for automatic stays of removal pending congressional consideration of private bills. In practice, however, the immigration agencies have stayed removal upon receiving congressional subcommittee chairs' requests for reports. Quinn & Yale-Loehr, note 12 above, at 1151-52.

Philosophically, what do you think of the concept of private immigration bills? What functions do they serve? What dangers do they present?

B. LIMITED RELIEF

1. DEFERRED ACTION

ICE does not bring removal proceedings against every noncitizen whom it suspects of being deportable. For one thing, it recognizes that in some cases extraordinary sympathetic factors would make removal unconscionable. For another, ICE could not remove all deportable individuals even if it wanted to. Removal proceedings require apprehension, investigation, processing, possibly detention, prosecution, adjudication, removal, and record-keeping. Like any other government agency, ICE has limited resources that it wants to deploy efficiently.

For some time, government policy (starting with the former INS) has been to refrain from initiating removal proceedings in certain unusually sympathetic cases. That policy has been given different names over the years: "prosecutorial discretion," "nonpriority status," and, most commonly today, "deferred action." Whatever the name, the theory has been that the case is simply put on the back burner. Technically ICE remains free to proceed against the person in the future if its workload or its priorities change; realistically, since the actual reason for holding back is the presence of exceptionally sympathetic factors, relief will typically be permanent unless those factors change.

Not until John Lennon and Yoko Ono came to the United States in the early 1970's and retained attorney Leon Wildes to help them with an assortment of immigration problems did the details of the non-priority program, as it was then called, become public knowledge.¹⁵ Mr. Wildes successfully used the Freedom of Information Act, 5 USC § 552, to pry from the former INS its unpublished description of the criteria for nonpriority status and the facts of cases in which nonpriority status had previously been granted. As a result of that litigation, the INS published an Operations Instruction describing the program. In general, that Operations Instruction prescribed nonpriority status for cases in which "humanitarian" factors would make deportation "unconscionable."¹⁶ It was later amended, and at some point it simply disappeared from the INS Operations Instructions without any Federal Register notice or opportunity for public comment, but prosecutorial discretion remains. See 6 Gordon, Mailman & Yale-Loehr § 72.03[2][h] n.120.

The Ninth Circuit, finding that the deferred action program fell within the Administrative Procedure Act's "general statement of policy" exception to its usual notice-and-comment requirements, had previously upheld a similarly unpublished change to the deferred action program. See Madaluna v. Fitzpatrick, 813 F.2d 1006 (9th Cir. 1987). Whether the same principle would apply to a full rescission of the Operations Instruction has not been tested. Importantly, the Ninth Circuit made clear that its willingness to recognize the exemption from the notice and comment procedures rested on the content of the particular policy, not on the INS decision to call it an internal Operations Instruction rather than a regulation.

On her last day in office (November 17, 2000), former INS Commissioner Doris Meissner sent a memorandum to all relevant INS personnel spelling out the INS policy on deferred action. The memo, reproduced in 77 IR at 1673-85 (Dec. 4, 2000), is widely believed to reflect the Commissioner's view that, in light of the harshness of the IIRIRA restrictions on formal discretionary relief, greater use of prosecutorial discretion in sympathetic cases should be encouraged.

Commissioner Meissner's memo explained that the source of the agency's prosecutorial discretion, like that of other prosecutorial agencies, was its finite resources. Consequently, she said, the overriding criterion in the decision whether to institute removal proceedings was the relative impor-

15. Lennon and Ono were in the United States to search for Ono's child by a prior marriage. Although Ono had been awarded custody, the father had absconded with the child. The former INS instituted deportation proceedings, and Lennon and Ono sought nonpriority status in order to continue their search. Leon Wildes, The Nonpriority Program of the Immigration and Naturalization Service Goes Public: The Litigative Use of the Freedom of Information Act, 14 San Diego L. Rev. 42, 44-45 (1976).

16. Id. at 49-50.

tance of the applicable federal government interest. 77 IR at 1676. She provided a list of more specific factors. They include whether the person is an LPR, the duration of his or her residence, any criminal history, humanitarian concerns, whether there were past immigration violations, the likelihood of ultimate removal, the availability of alternative courses of action, how long a bar to future return removal would create, past cooperation with authorities, military service, the person's role in the community, and the availability of detention space. Id. At 1680. The overall tone of the memo is perhaps best captured in these two sentences: "[I]t is appropriate and expected that the INS will exercise this authority in appropriate cases. * * *. Supervisory officials * * * should encourage their personnel to bring potentially suitable cases for the favorable exercise of discretion to their attention for appropriate resolution." Id. at 1682-83.

Near the end of the memo, however, there appears the following important paragraph:

The principles set forth in this memorandum* * * are intended solely for the guidance of INS personnel in performing their duties. They are not intended to, do not, and may not be relied upon to create a right or benefit, substantive or procedural, enforceable at law by any individual or other party in removal proceedings, in litigation with the United States, or in any other form or manner.

Id. at 1685.

That last paragraph reflects the controversial history of deferred action. In 1979 the Ninth Circuit held that an INS decision denying deferred action was judicially reviewable for abuse of discretion. Nicholas v. INS, 590 F.2d 802 (9th Cir.1979). See Leon Wildes, The Operations Instructions of the Immigration Service: Internal Guides or Binding Rules?, 17 San Diego L. Rev. 99 (1979). The court based that result on its finding that the deferred action program existed as a benefit to the noncitizen in sympathetic cases rather than as an internal guide to the efficient exercise of prosecutorial discretion.¹⁷ (Had the purpose been the latter, then a decision to prosecute could have been set aside only upon a showing that race, religion, or other impermissible considerations had induced the INS to depart from established norms. Nicholas, 590 F.2d at 805). At the time of Nicholas, the Operations Instructions prescribed deferred action whenever the District Director found deportation would be "unconscionable" because of "appealing humanitarian factors." See INS OI 103.1(a)(1)(ii) (1979). The INS response was to amend the Operations Instruction to emphasize the INS goal of structuring prosecutorial discretion. INS Operations Instruction 242.1(a)(22) (1993). The strategy worked. In Siverts v. Craig, 602 F.Supp. 50, 53 (D.Haw.1985), a district court within the Ninth Circuit held Nicholas inapplicable to the new version of the deferred action instruction. Today, as a result of IIRIRA § 306(b), the decision to commence removal proceedings is clearly unreviewable, see INA § 242(g) and Botezatu v. INS, 17. Contra, Pasquini v. Morris, 700 F.2d 658 (11th Cir.1983).

195 F.3d 311 (7th Cir. 1999), and as noted earlier the Operations Instruction no longer exists. Commissioner Meissner's cautionary paragraph was undoubtedly designed to preserve the insulation of denials of deferred action from judicial review. She might also have hoped to deflect arguments that deferred action unlawfully nullifies the limitations attached to the various statutory forms of discretionary relief.

Today, the details of the deferred action program appear mainly in internal ICE memoranda. A memo from ICE's Principal Legal Advisor (OPLA), spells out the most significant criteria. They vary depending on the stage of the proceeding, but they generally include factors that relate to special humanitarian considerations, military service, likelihood of future eligibility for permanent residence, likelihood of success on the merits, fairness, and efficiency. See Memorandum from William J. Howard, Principal Legal Advisor (Oct. 24, 2005), reproduced, 11 BIB 562 (June 1, 2006); see also Mia E. Cohen & Robert P. Deasy, Practice Hints and Tips from the Liaison Committees, AILA Dispatch (July/August 2006), at 12-13. A 2007 ICE memo confirmed the Meissner memo and added special instructions for cases that involve nursing mothers. Internal Memo from Julie L. Myers, Assistant Secretary, ICE (Nov. 7, 2007). These internal memos are welcome developments, but Leon Wildes lamented in a July 25, 2006 e-mail that immigration law is increasingly relegated to intra-office memoranda, with the result that the humane spirit of memoranda like that of Mr. Howard is often disregarded in practice.

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. INA § 237(a) provides that “[a]ny alien * * * in and admitted to the United States shall, upon the order of the Attorney General, be removed if the alien is within one or more of the following classes of deportable aliens” (emphasis added). Given the mandatory word “shall,” is deferred action legal? Apart from that particular barrier, from what source did the INS, and now ICE, derive the authority to provide relief from removal? Could ICE lawfully announce a policy not to remove any noncitizen who has displayed good moral character for the past three years?

2. Should the availability or scope of judicial review turn on whether the program was intended as a benefit to the noncitizen or as a device for administrative efficiency? What would be the practical pros and cons of allowing judicial review of ICE denials of deferred action?

3. Once ICE has filed a Notice to Appear with the immigration judge, the IJ acquires jurisdiction over the case. At that point ICE no longer has the discretion not to prosecute; it may file a motion to dismiss (without prejudice), but it is up to the IJ whether to grant the motion. Matter of G-N-C-, 22 I. & N. Dec. 281 (BIA 1998).¹⁸

18. For the most current analyses of deferred action and some helpful practice pointers, see Robert Hopper & Juan P. Osuna, Remedies of Last Resort: Private Bills and Deferred Action, June 1997 Immigration Briefings at 9-12; Leon Wildes, The Deferred

2. VOLUNTARY DEPARTURE

The person who receives and accepts a grant of voluntary departure under INA § 240B leaves the United States “voluntarily;” in exchange, no formal removal order issues. The practical consequences of that latter fact are discussed below. For now, you should note that there are actually two distinct types of voluntary departure, differentiated by timing.

Under subsection (a) of INA § 240B, the Secretary of Homeland Security may permit certain noncitizens to depart voluntarily, at their own expense, either in lieu of removal proceedings or before removal proceedings have been completed. (INA § 241(e)(3)(C) provides an exception to the “own expense” rule.) Aggravated felons, individuals who are inadmissible under the terrorism exclusion, and those who were previously removed but then returned while still inadmissible are all ineligible. INA §§ 240B(a)(1), 240B(c). The person “may” be required to post bond, INA § 240B(a)(3), and the voluntary departure period may be as long as 120 days, INA § 240B(a)(2).

Subsection (b) authorizes voluntary departure at the conclusion of removal proceedings, again at the individual’s own expense. Under this subsection, the applicant is subject not only to the same disqualifications as those who apply under subsection (a), see INA §§ 240B(b)(1)(C), 240B(c), but also to several others that you will soon discover. See especially sections 240B(b)(1)(A) (one year of physical presence immediately preceding the notice to appear) and 240B(b)(1)(B) (good moral character for the five years immediately preceding the application). Bond for subsection (b) applicants is mandatory, not discretionary. INA § 240B(b)(3). If voluntary departure is granted under subsection (b), the maximum period allowed is 60 days. INA § 240B(b)(2).

The regulations empower both ICE and EOIR (immigration judges and the BIA) to grant voluntary departure, but in differing circumstances. ICE has authority to grant voluntary departure only under subsection (a) of section 240B, and only in lieu of removal proceedings. 8 CFR § 240.25(a) (2008). If proceedings have not yet commenced (because no Notice to Appear has yet been filed), then ICE simply grants voluntary departure on its own. If proceedings have commenced (with the filing of the Notice to Appear), and ICE agrees to voluntary departure, then it has two options. One option is to join with the noncitizen in a motion to the immigration judge to dismiss the case. If the motion is granted, ICE may then grant voluntary departure. The other option is to join with the noncitizen in requesting the immigration judge to grant voluntary departure, which he or she may then do. Id. § 240.25(d).

At a certain point, however, even the immigration judge loses the power to grant voluntary departure under subsection (a) of section 240B. To explain what that point is, a brief detour is necessary.

Action Program of the Bureau of Citizenship and Immigration Services: A Possible Remedy for Impossible Immigration Cases, 41 San Diego L. Rev. 819 (2004).

Before holding a full removal hearing, an immigration judge normally schedules a shorter and less formal event called a “master calendar” hearing. The main purposes of the master calendar hearing are to complete certain preliminary tasks, get a sense of the complexity of the issues likely to arise, and to set a date and time for the full hearing. For more detail on master calendar hearings, see page 653 below.

Under the regulations, one who applies to an immigration judge for voluntary departure under subsection (a) must apply either before or during the master calendar hearing. Moreover, the immigration judge may grant subsection (a) voluntary departure only up to 30 days after the master calendar hearing, unless ICE stipulates to such a grant some time before the completion of removal proceedings. 8 CFR § 1240.26(b) (2008). Thus, absent an ICE stipulation, the only brand of voluntary departure that an immigration judge has the power to grant more than 30 days after the master calendar hearing (and note that the actual removal hearing is almost always more than 30 days later) is subsection (b) voluntary departure. Id. § 1240.26(c). For that, the substantive requirements are more stringent and the maximum duration is shorter (60 days rather than 120 days). The practical effect of the regulation is to bar a subsection (a) voluntary departure application at a point long before “removal proceedings have been completed” (the deadline that the statute imposes in subsection (a)). See also Matter of Arguelles-Campos, 22 I. & N. Dec. 811, 820 (BIA 1999) (Grant, concurring) (noting this administrative interpretation).

The voluntary departure provision is inartfully drafted. Subsection (a) purports to operate “prior to the completion” of removal proceedings. Taken alone, that provision implies, and the regulations discussed above similarly assume, that subsection (a) voluntary departure may be granted either before proceedings begin or while they are going on. In contrast, the more difficult subsection (b) voluntary departure may be granted only “at the conclusion” of removal proceedings. The problem is that a grant of voluntary departure ends the removal proceeding; by definition, therefore, it is always at the conclusion of the proceeding (assuming a proceeding has commenced). Under the literal wording, therefore, the portion of subsection (a) that authorizes voluntary departure “prior to completion” is useless. If proceedings have commenced but not finished, voluntary departure ends the proceedings and therefore would seem to be governed by subsection (b). The regulations commendably take a nonliteral approach and allow the more lenient subsection (a) voluntary departure even after commencement of removal proceedings.

The timing distinctions drawn by the voluntary departure provisions are significant for another reason as well. Recall the “unlawful presence” exclusion that you studied in chapter 5. Under INA § 212(a)(9)(B)(i), one who was unlawfully present in the United States for more than 180 days but less than a year, and who “voluntarily departed . . . prior to the commencement of [removal] proceedings [emphasis added]” is inadmissible to return for three years. Whether one departs before or after the filing of the Notice to Appear therefore has legal significance, as the Problems below illustrate.

The vast majority of the deportable noncitizens leave the United States do so by way of voluntary departure rather than removal. In fiscal year 2007, 319,000 noncitizens were removed from the United States—a record high. By contrast, more than 891,000 noncitizens departed voluntarily. In fiscal year 2006, 280,974 noncitizens were removed, and 1,043,381 voluntarily departed. See 2007 Yearbook of Immigration Statistics at 95 & Table 36. The bulk of the voluntary departures occur before proceedings have commenced.

As you might have gathered from those figures, pre-hearing voluntary departures are enormously beneficial to the government. To hold almost a million removal hearings per year would impose staggering costs. Post-hearing voluntary departures, while not avoiding the costs of the hearings, at least save the costs of transporting the individuals out of the country.

That the government benefits so significantly from voluntary departure is both good and bad. On the positive side, tremendous resources are saved. The danger, however, is that ICE can be tempted to pressure noncitizens who have arguably valid cases to accept voluntary departure. In Orantes-Hernandez v. Meese, 685 F.Supp. 1488 (C.D. Cal. 1988), aff'd, 919 F.2d 549 (9th Cir. 1990), a federal district court found and enjoined systematic INS efforts to coerce Salvadoran asylum claimants to forego their asylum claims and leave the country voluntarily. The court found that INS agents directed, intimidated, or otherwise coerced Salvadorans within their custody, who had not expressed a desire to return to El Salvador, to sign form I-274A for voluntary departure. INS agents used a variety of techniques to procure voluntary departure, ranging from subtle persuasion to outright threats and misrepresentations. Many class members were intimidated or coerced to accept voluntary departure even when they had unequivocally expressed a fear of returning to El Salvador.

685 F.Supp. at 1494.¹⁹ An especially difficult issue is how to deal with pressure exerted on noncitizen children to accept voluntary departure rather than request removal hearings. See Irene Scharf & Christine Hess, What Process is Due? Unaccompanied Minors' Rights to Deportation Hearings, 1988 Duke L.J. 114.

What is in it for the noncitizens? Absent coercion or deception, why would they ever agree to leave voluntarily? There are at least two important reasons: First, noncitizens who are formally ordered “removed” (other than upon arrival at a port of entry) are ineligible to return to the United States for at least ten years (twenty years for a second offense, forever if convicted of an “aggravated felony”), unless they can obtain permission from the Secretary of Homeland Security to reapply for admission sooner. INA § 212(a)(9)(A). If they return anyway, they face felony charges. INA ¹⁹. The injunction was slightly modified in 2007. See 84 IR 1786 (Aug. 6, 2007).

§ 276. In contrast, those who accept voluntary departure (and who pay their own way) are not subject to that particular bar, although as the Problems below illustrate, they are not home free either.

A second, often overlooked advantage of voluntary departure is more practical. Frequently there is little to gain by waiting for a removal hearing, and in the meantime the individual must either post bond or remain in detention. In contrast, one who departs voluntarily might simply try to reenter surreptitiously. See T. Alexander Aleinikoff & David A. Martin, Immigration Process and Policy 465 (1st ed.1985).

Both forms of voluntary departure are among the remedies now generally unavailable for ten years to noncitizens who have failed to appear at removal hearings after proper notice, or who have failed to honor the terms of a prior voluntary departure order. See INA §§ 240(b)(7), 240B(d)(1)(B). Conversely, one who is granted voluntary departure but fails to depart within the designated time becomes ineligible for several other remedies, including adjustment of status. INA 240B(d)(1)(B). Until recently, that consequence presented a common dilemma: What if a person is found deportable and granted voluntary departure, but, before expiration of the voluntary departure period, circumstances change or new evidence is discovered that makes the person eligible for adjustment of status or some other affirmative relief? The person may move to reopen (subject to the parameters discussed in chapter 9, section B.5 below) to apply for adjustment of status, but the motion typically will not be decided until long after the voluntary departure period has expired. Without some kind of fix, this would mean that either the person leaves before the motion has been acted upon, in which case the motion is deemed withdrawn, or the person fails to leave on time, with the result that the person becomes ineligible for adjustment. To avoid that dilemma, noncitizens sometimes request the BIA to withdraw the grant of voluntary departure. In Dada v. Mukasey, ___ U.S. ___, 128 S.Ct. 2307, 171 L.Ed.2d 178 (2008), the Supreme Court held that the BIA must permit the noncitizen to withdraw from voluntary departure before it has expired, so as not to generate automatic ineligibility for the underlying affirmative relief. The noncitizen does, of course, take a risk in doing so. Upon withdrawal of the voluntary departure grant, the removal order is automatically reinstated. If the motion to reopen does not ultimately succeed, the removal order could bar or delay future readmission under INA § 212(a)(9)(A)(i).

Congress has barred judicial review of orders denying voluntary departure. See INA §§ 240B(f), 242(a)(2)(B)(i). Even more drastic is INA § 240B(e), which empowers the Secretary of Homeland Security to “limit eligibility for voluntary departure.” The provision places no explicit parameters on the Secretary’s power to add further restrictions, and it purports to bar all judicial review of such regulations. Id.

In two leading 1935 cases, the Supreme Court struck down congressional attempts to delegate virtually unlimited regulatory discretion. See A.L.A. Schechter Poultry Corp. v. United States, 295 U.S. 495, 55 S.Ct. 837, 79 L.Ed. 1570 (1935); Panama Refining Co. v. Ryan, 293 U.S. 388, 55 S.Ct.

241, 79 L.Ed. 446 (1935). Since then, the “nondelegation doctrine” has not been invoked to strike down a statutory grant of authority. But the courts still profess to require that Congress, when delegating power, supply at least an “intelligible principle” for the agency to apply when regulating. E.g., Mistretta v. United States, 488 U.S. 361, 372 (1989).

Does INA § 240B(e) cross the line? Has Congress given the Secretary of Homeland Security any “intelligible principle” to apply in deciding what substantive limits to attach to eligibility for voluntary departure? If not, does the nondelegation doctrine collide with the plenary power doctrine that you encountered in chapter 2? Given the bar on judicial review, would anyone even be able to test those arguments in court?

The former INS used to employ on occasion a device known as “extended voluntary departure” (EVD). The most significant modern use of EVD was as a blanket permission to remain in the United States, for nationals of a particular country in which either political or natural conditions would have made return exceptionally dangerous. Often such grants were limited to those who had entered the United States before a specified date. The Immigration Act of 1990, § 302, however, replaced EVD with a new program known as “temporary protected status” (TPS). The program is contained in INA § 244 and discussed in chapter 11, § C.2.a below.

Please read INA § 240B before approaching the Questions and Problems below.

QUESTIONS

1. How do the requirements for, and the consequences of, voluntary departure under subsection (a) differ from those under subsection (b)?
2. As you discovered when answering question 1, subsection (b) is both more demanding and generally less beneficial to the noncitizen once granted. First, why would Congress desire that result? Consider an analogy offered by Professor Nora Demleitner in a February 8, 1998 e-mail to the author. She compares the voluntary departure scheme to the federal criminal sentencing guidelines, which allow sentence reductions for defendants who plead guilty. The stated rationale for that guideline is that a person should be rewarded for “accepting responsibility” and for saving the time and expense of a trial. Second, what are the disadvantages of making subsection (b) less generous than subsection (a)?

PROBLEMS 5-6

Before attempting these Problems, carefully review subsections 9(A) and 9(B) of INA § 212(a). Be prepared for some strange results.

Problem 5. X, a noncitizen, entered the United States without inspection. Eight months later he was apprehended. His wife, an LPR, had earlier filed a family-sponsored 2A petition on his behalf, and his priority date is likely to come up about two years from now. ICE has offered him voluntary departure in lieu of commencing removal proceedings. He calls you to ask whether he should accept the offer. What advice will you give him?

Problem 6. Now assume the same facts as in Problem 5, except that this time X was apprehended 14 months after entering. Would your advice change?

3. OBJECTIONS TO DESTINATION

Sometimes the place a noncitizen is sent is as important as the fact of removal. Yet, until 1950, the noncitizen had little say in the matter. He or she could introduce evidence on the issue, but the official who presided over the deportation hearing (as it was then called) had the ultimate say as to destination. See 6 Gordon, Mailman & Yale-Loehr, § 72.08[2][a]. After several changes over the years, see, e.g., Internal Security Act of 1950, § 23, 64 Stat. 987, 1010 (Sept. 23, 1950); Matter of R., 5 I. & N. Dec. 29, 39–40 (BIA 1953), the immigration judge at the removal hearing now selects the removal country. That selection is structured, however, by INA § 241(b)(2), which you should now read carefully.²⁰

As you have just seen, section 241(b)(2) sets up a multi-step approach to selecting the removal country. Step 1 is the noncitizen's designation of a preferred country. If ordered removed, the person must be removed to the designated country unless any of several exceptions applies, in which case the designation may be disregarded. INA § 241(b)(2)(A, B, C). In that event, step 2 kicks in, and the person must be removed to the country of which he or she is a "subject, national, or citizen," again with some exceptions. INA § 241(b)(2)(D). If one of the exceptions applies and the person is not removed to the step 2 country, then step 3 requires the immigration judge to choose from one of six other possibilities—the country from which the person was admitted to the United States, the person's country of birth, etc. INA § 241(b)(2)(E)(i–vi). (Of course, the various criteria will often refer to the same country.) Finally, if removal to those six countries is "impracticable, inadvisable, or impossible," then (in what the Supreme Court describes as a fourth step, see below), the immigration judge is free to designate "another country whose government will accept the alien into that country." INA § 241(b)(2)(E)(vii).

In the early 2000's, a major country-of-removal problem arose with respect to Somalia, which was without any functioning government. Removals to Somalia were physically possible, either by force or by the absence of resistance, but formal "acceptance" was not. The Somalia problem precipitated a broader debate over which of the several steps involved in the selection of a destination country should be interpreted as being contingent on that country's affirmative acceptance. (There was a related debate over whether a country like Somalia, lacking a functioning government, can even be considered a “country” for purposes of section 241(b)(2)). In Jama v. ICE, 543 U.S. 335, 125 S.Ct. 694, 160 L.Ed.2d 708 (2005), the Supreme Court construed the statute as permitting removal even to a country that cannot or does not affirmatively accept the person into its territory (except under step 4, which expressly requires the country’s consent). See also 8 CFR §§ 241.15 (DHS) and 1240.10(f) (DOJ).

²⁰ INA § 241(b)(1) contains analogous rules for noncitizens who are ordered removed upon arrival. As is evident, the latter individuals have far less freedom of destination.

It is one thing for a court—even the Supreme Court of the United States—to hand down a decision. It is another thing for the executive branch to enforce it. Since Somalia had no functioning government, Jama had no way to obtain a Somali passport, without which the airlines would not let Jama board. At a hearing in federal district court in Minneapolis shortly after the Supreme Court decision, it emerged that ICE had been exploring some unorthodox ways to return Jama to Somalia. These included trying to obtain a false passport through “contacts in Egypt,” “negotiating with mercenaries and warlords for permission to land a chartered plane that could drop Jama off,” and bringing Jama to the border and then physically pushing him onto the Somali side, as Jama’s lawyer attested U.S. officials had done in the past. The district judge called the ICE arguments “hogwash” and said the contemplated ICE actions “sound more than vaguely illegal.” See Eric Black, The Star Tribune (Minneapolis), Mar. 25, 2005.

The case that follows illustrates another important contemporary setting in which the country of destination issue can arise—shifting borders. In the process the case raises fundamental questions about the contrasting objectives of deportation and extradition.

Linnas v. INS

United States Court of Appeals, Second Circuit, 1986.
790 F.2d 1024.

■ ALTIMARI, CIRCUIT JUDGE:

* * *

Karl Linnas was born in Estonia in 1919 and entered the United States in 1951 under the auspices of the Displaced Persons Act. In order to gain admittance to the United States as a displaced person, Linnas informed members of the Army Counter Intelligence Corps that he had been a university student during the years 1940 to 1943. In May 1951 Linnas signed an immigration form stating that he had “never advocated or assisted in the persecution of any person because of race, religion or national origin.” Upon entering the United States some three months later, Linnas swore to the truth of that statement. The New York State Supreme Court (Suffolk County) admitted Linnas to citizenship in 1960.

[A federal district court ordered Linnas denaturalized upon finding he had procured naturalization by concealment and misrepresentation. See INA § 340(a) and chapter 13 below. The court here recounts the atrocities committed by Linnas during his tenure as Chief of the Nazi concentration camp in Tartu, Estonia.—Eds.]

* * *

Following Linnas' denaturalization, the government began deportation proceedings under section 242 of the INA. Immigration Judge Howard I. Cohen ruled on May 19, 1983 that Linnas was deportable. Linnas had designated "the free and independent Republic of Estonia" as the country to which he wished to be deported. The independent Republic of Estonia was forcibly incorporated into the Soviet Union following World War II. Linnas apparently intended his designation to mean the office building in New York currently housing the representatives of the independent Republic of Estonia. Immigration Judge Cohen, however, apparently took Linnas' designation to mean that geographic territory historically associated with the Republic of Estonia and currently incorporated in the Soviet Union. In attempting to comply with § 243 of the INA,²¹ Immigration Judge Cohen ordered that Linnas be deported from the United States to Estonia, but that if Estonia was unwilling to accept Linnas he was to be deported to the Soviet Union. The Soviet Union, which had tried Linnas in absentia and sentenced him to death for his war crimes, was the only country which had expressed a willingness to accept Linnas. * * *

Linnas filed a timely appeal to the BIA. On July 31, 1984 the BIA affirmed the decision of the immigration judge except as to the country of deportation. The BIA remanded the case to the immigration judge with instructions to consider the effect of the United States' non-recognition of the Soviet annexation of Estonia and to articulate a statutory basis for the designation of a country of deportation.

On remand, Immigration Judge Cohen reviewed the three step process delineated in § 243(a) of the INA for designation of a country of deportation. Step one, the designation of a country by the deportee, was ruled inapplicable because of Linnas' designation of an office building in New York. Step two, the designation of a country of which the deportee is a citizen, was also held inapplicable. Linnas claimed to be a citizen of the Republic of Estonia, but that country no longer exists as an independent geographic territory. Under step three, the immigration judge may designate deportation to any country which falls within one of seven categories. Immigration Judge Cohen, therefore, considered deportation: * * *

- (4) to the country in which the place of his birth is situated at the time he is ordered deported; * * * or
- (7) if deportation to any of the foregoing places or countries is impracticable, inadvisable, or impossible, then to any country which is willing to accept such alien into its territory.

INA § 243(a). On April 9, 1985, after considering a letter from the Legal Advisor of the Department of State to the effect that Linnas' deportation to the Soviet Union would not violate the nonrecognition policy, Immigration

21. Now INA § 241(b)(2)—Eds.

Judge Cohen held that Linnas should be deported to the Soviet Union under either category (4) or (7). Linnas once again appealed to the BIA, which, in a decision dated October 16, 1985, affirmed the immigration judge's decision based on § 243(a)(7).

* * *

Linnas claims that his deportation to the Soviet Union is in fact a disguised extradition. Linnas was convicted in absentia in the Soviet Union and sentenced to death for his war crimes. Linnas contends that the Soviet trial was a sham and that deporting him to the Soviet Union is in fact extradition in the absence of an extradition treaty. Linnas argues that to deport him under these circumstances will deprive him of his life without due process.

The irony of Karl Linnas objecting to execution without due process is not lost on this court. The right to due process is, of course, essential to the American system of ordered liberty, and must be extended to all persons in the United States. The fact that Linnas enjoys the right to due process has enabled him to remain in the United States until 1986 even though the government began the denaturalization process in 1979. The considerable length of time that Linnas has been able to remain in the United States after the discovery of his heinous past is a small price to pay for a system of law which separates our government from the government that Linnas served as Chief of the Tartu concentration camp. We now, therefore, examine the merits of the petitioner's due process claim.

* * * [N]o extradition has taken place in this case. Extradition may be applied to either a citizen or noncitizen, whereas deportation applies only to noncitizens such as Linnas. Extradition is initiated by a foreign state. While the Soviet Union may have an interest in the trial of Nazi war criminals, the impetus for the denaturalization and removal of Linnas appears to have come from the government of the United States. The legislative history of the Holtzman amendment indicates that the Congress intended to rid this nation of Nazi war criminals, not to court favor with nations having no extradition treaties with the United States. Ruling this procedure to be an extradition would greatly reduce the ability of this nation to deport those who have committed crimes of moral turpitude in their own countries.

In addition, Linnas was given the same opportunity given to any deportee to designate a country to which he wished to be sent. Linnas designated an office building in New York, thus wasting the opportunity to choose a proper place of deportation. The fact that such an opportunity was offered, however, strongly undercuts his contention that his deportation was a disguised attempt to extradite him to the Soviet Union. The record also indicates that the government made at least some attempt to find a country other than the Soviet Union which would accept Linnas. There is no support in the record for Linnas' claim that the government's efforts in this regard were a mere facade. Linnas' own failure to designate a country of deportation lends credence to the immigration judge's finding that no country other than the Soviet Union would accept him. Accordingly, there was no abuse of discretion in designating the Soviet Union as the country of deportation under INA § 243(a)(7). That designation did not transform the deportation of Linnas into an extradition.

* * *

We are not, however, deaf to Linnas' protestations concerning the fate which may await him in the Soviet Union. In Gallina v. Fraser this court permitted the extradition of a man convicted in absentia in a foreign country. The Gallina court hypothesized, however, that there could arise a situation in which the person to be removed from the United States would be subjected to "procedures or punishment so antipathetic to a federal court's sense of decency" as to require judicial intervention. This is not such a case.

The foundation of Linnas' due process argument is an appeal to the court's sense of decency and compassion. Noble words such as "decency" and "compassion" ring hollow when spoken by a man who ordered the extermination of innocent men, women and children kneeling at the edge of a mass grave. Karl Linnas' appeal to humanity, a humanity which he has grossly, callously and monstrously offended, truly offends this court's sense of decency.

* * *

The petition for review is denied.

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. Postscript: In 1987 Linnas was deported to the former Soviet Union. Before the death sentence that had been imposed in absentia could be carried out, he died of natural causes.

2. Estonia is now once again an independent country. Similar problems have arisen, however, with respect to Yugoslavia. In Osmani v. INS, 14 F.3d 13 (7th Cir. 1994), a native of Macedonia had been ordered deported to Yugoslavia before the breakup of the latter. After affirming the deportation order, the court urged the BIA to modify the order to specify Macedonia as the country of deportation. The court explicitly held that the fact the United States had not yet recognized Macedonia did not bar such an order. Id. at 15.

3. The wording of present INA § 241(b)(2) differs from that of former section 243(a), but the substance is virtually identical.

4. Should Congress amend INA § 241(b)(2) to allow the noncitizen to designate a second choice in the event he or she is rejected by the first country? Should there be opportunity for a third choice? As many choices as the person wishes?

5. What do you think of Linnas's tactical decision to designate "the free and independent Republic of Estonia"? What should the immigration judge do when the noncitizen's designation is ambiguous?

6. What would have happened if the Soviet Union had been unwilling to receive Linnas? Consider the other options provided by section 241(b)(2), and read also section 241(a)(1, 2, 3, 7).

7. Suppose a citizen and resident of Canada has no interest in emigrating to the United States but would love a free South Pacific vacation. What prevents her from entering the United States surreptitiously, turning herself in, refusing voluntary departure, and designating Fiji?

8. The crux of Linnas's argument was that the United States was using deportation as a ploy to extradite him to the Soviet Union. First, precisely how do the characteristics and purposes of deportation (now removal) differ from those of extradition? Second, given those differences, would it be bad policy to use deportation as an instrument for accomplishing the goals of extradition (assuming the elements of the deportability ground are all present)? In a case where the IJ has the discretion to select the destination country, would it be an abuse of discretion to take into account the fact that country X, to which the person resists being sent, affirmatively wants that person back?

9. What limitations does the court place on its holding? After Linnas, under what circumstances might a court invalidate, as a disguised extradition, a decision to remove a noncitizen to a particular country?

10. Assume that the noncitizen's designated country (W) says no; that the country of citizenship (X) no longer exists; that country Y requests his or her extradition; and that country Z, to which the person wants to go, says yes. Would the immigration judge abuse his or her discretion by ordering removal to country Y rather than Z?

A somewhat similar problem arose in a celebrated English case, R. v. Governor of Brixton Prison, ex parte Soblen [1963] 2 Q.B. 243 (Div.Ct. and Ct. of Appeal). Dr. Robert Soblen, an American citizen, had been convicted in the United States of conspiracy to commit espionage. He escaped to Israel, but the Israeli authorities placed him on a specially chartered plane to the United States. During the flight, Soblen deliberately cut his wrists. Upon a stopover in London, he was rushed to the hospital for emergency treatment. Once he was physically able to travel again, the British Home Secretary ordered him deported on the statutory ground that his removal would be "conducive to the public good." Although the pertinent extradition treaty did not cover espionage, the United States requested Soblen's return. Soblen requested deportation to Czechoslovakia, which had issued him an entry visa (and which was then still in existence). The Home Secretary, in his discretion, chose nonetheless to deport Soblen to the United States. (The U.K. did not have an automatic designation provision analogous to INA § 241(b)(2)). No reasons for the destination decision were given.

The English trial court and then the Court of Appeal affirmed the decision of the Home Secretary. The opinions of the various Court of Appeal judges reasoned that the United States, being the country of citizenship, was the only country required by international law to receive Soblen; that the Home Secretary might simply have been motivated by a legitimate desire to help an ally; or that perhaps the Home Secretary's purpose had been to deter the type of conduct by which Soblen had gained admission to England in the first place. (The story has a grim postscript; after exhausting his legal appeals, Dr. Soblen committed suicide.)

What is your reaction to the reasons given by the Court of Appeal for upholding the decision of the Home Secretary? See generally Stephen H. Legomsky, Immigration and the Judiciary—Law and Politics in Britain and America 39–40, 97–99 (1987).

11. Step aside for a moment from the legal analysis employed in Linnas. Do you detect in the court's opinion any external factors that might have played a part in the result?

12. Another provision, INA § 241(b)(3)(A), prohibits removal to any country in which the "alien's life or freedom would be threatened * * * because of the alien's race, religion, nationality, membership in a particular social group, or political opinion" (with some exceptions). That provision will be explored in depth in chapter 11.

PROBLEM 7

X, born in the Netherlands, emigrated from there to the United States, stopping for a week in Suriname en route. Several years later he became a naturalized United States citizen. To attain naturalization he had to take an oath renouncing his Dutch citizenship. See INA § 337(a)(2). (Naturalization is taken up in chapter 13, § A.1 below. Assume for now that the law of the Netherlands gives full effect to such renunciations.) Three years ago, upon finding that X had misrepresented material facts in his naturalization application, a federal district court revoked his naturalization under INA § 340(a). X has now been ordered removed. He designated Suriname as the country to which he wished to be removed, but Suriname has refused to accept him. The Dutch government has indicated it will receive X, but he would prefer to go to Canada, which is also willing to take him. Given section 241(b)(2), does the immigration judge have the discretion to order X removed to Canada?

4. STAYS OF REMOVAL

After an immigration judge or the BIA has issued a final removal order, ICE generally gives the person a certain amount of time to take care of any personal matters before leaving the United States. Sometimes, however, that time is not enough. In such a case the remedy is to request ICE, in its discretion, to grant a temporary stay under 8 CFR § 241.6 (2008).

Stays are especially important in the context of motions to reopen removal proceedings. The mere filing of a motion to reopen does not automatically stay removal, 8 CFR §§ 1003.6(b) (2008), and once removal occurs, the motion to reopen is deemed withdrawn, 8 CFR § 1003.2(d) (2008). Thus, unless removal is stayed while the motion to reopen is pending, ICE could, by removing the person, prevent a decision on the motion to reopen. It is best, therefore, to couple a motion to reopen with a request for a stay to permit a decision on the motion. Try to figure out why the regulations would choose not to make stays pending motions to reopen automatic, and what might prompt the IJ or the BIA to deny a stay request that accompanies a motion to reopen.

C. MISCELLANEOUS DEFENSES

A number of other defenses to removal require brief mention. One is citizenship. Since only noncitizens may be removed, see, e.g., INA § 237(a) (“Any alien” * * *); Ng Fung Ho v. White, 259 U.S. 276, 42 S.Ct. 492, 66 L.Ed. 938 (1922), a person who can prove United States citizenship will have a complete defense to removal. Chapter 13 will acquaint you with the requirements and consequences of citizenship.

You saw in chapter 2 the difficulties faced by anyone who challenges an INA provision on any of the more common constitutional grounds—due process, equal protection, and the First Amendment, to name a few. One frequent argument, thus far rejected by all the courts to which it has been addressed, has been made in cases where deportable parents have United States citizen children. The argument is that removing the parents results de facto in the unconstitutional removal of the citizen children. Rejecting that contention, courts have reasoned (a) that a citizen child cannot make a real choice about where to live and thus is dependent on the decision of his or her parents; (b) that the child’s removal from the country is not inevitable because the parents might choose to leave the child with foster parents in the United States; and (c) that, when old enough, the citizen child will be free to return to the United States. See Newton v. INS, 736 F.2d 336, 342–43 (6th Cir.1984), quoting Acosta v. Gaffney, 558 F.2d 1153, 1157–58 (3d Cir.1977). What is your reaction?²²

Other generally unsuccessful constitutional defenses include all of those that would have required the courts to characterize removal as punishment. You saw one early example in Fong Yue Ting, pages 136–55 above, where the Supreme Court rejected a procedural due process challenge that the Court believed rested on classifying deportation as punitive

22. Professor David Thronson explores de facto deportation and situates it in the larger context of conflict between immigration policy and family law. See generally David B. Thronson, Creating Crisis: Immigration Raids and the Destabilization of Im- migrant Families, 43 Wake Forest L. Rev.391 (2008); David B. Thronson, Choiceless Choices: Deportation and the Parent-Child Relationship, 6 Nevada L.J. 1165, 1193–97 (2006).

in nature. Similarly holding that deportation is not punishment, courts have turned away challenges based on the ex post facto clause, e.g., Bugajewitz v. Adams, 228 U.S. 585, 33 S.Ct. 607, 57 L.Ed. 978 (1913), and on the cruel and unusual punishment clause, Lieggi v. U.S.I.N.S., memorandum decision noted at 529 F.2d 530 (7th Cir.1976), rev'g 389 F.Supp. 12 (N.D.Ill.1975).

Sometimes a person becomes deportable partly because a government official either acted wrongly or failed to take timely action. In those cases, noncitizens have sometimes argued that the government should be estopped from deporting them. Those efforts too have been unsuccessful. The leading case is INS v. Miranda, 459 U.S. 14, 103 S.Ct. 281, 74 L.Ed.2d 12 (1982), where the former INS had failed to act on an immediate relative petition for eighteen months. Eventually the marriage dissolved, the citizen spouse withdrew the petition, deportation proceedings were initiated, and the immigration judge denied the noncitizen's application for adjustment of status and ordered deportation. Summarily reversing the Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit, the Supreme Court refused to estop the INS from going forward with the deportation. The Court held that, if estopping the government is ever permissible (an issue it has still not decided as of this writing), it requires at a minimum a showing of "affirmative misconduct." On the facts of Miranda, such a showing was not made.

What constitutes affirmative misconduct is not so clear. You might have assumed that the word "affirmative" was meant to signify action rather than inaction, but evidently that distinction is not the key. In two of the cases cited approvingly in Miranda, affirmative misstatements by government officials were held not to constitute "affirmative misconduct." See Schweiker v. Hansen, 450 U.S. 785, 101 S.Ct. 1468, 67 L.Ed.2d 685 (1981); Montana v. Kennedy, 366 U.S. 308, 81 S.Ct. 1336, 6 L.Ed.2d 313 (1961). Rather, the Court in Miranda appeared to have in mind a degree of blameworthiness that surpassed the level of fault reflected in the particular governmental errors at issue in the cited cases. See generally Bill Ong Hing, Estoppel in Immigration Proceedings—New Life from Akbarin and Miranda, 20 San Diego L.Rev. 11 (1982).

D. A PERSPECTIVE ON RELIEF FROM DEPORTABILITY

In this chapter you have encountered the major forms of relief requested by deportable noncitizens. Most of them are in the form "If A, B, and C, then the Attorney General (or the Secretary of Homeland Security, as the case may be) may do X." Most of the provisions, in other words, restrict the relevant official's humanitarian discretion to the case in which certain statutory prerequisites have been met.

Contrast that system with New Zealand's Immigration Act 1987. Under that statute, the Minister of Immigration "may * * * order * * * deportation" in specified cases. Id. §§ 91(1), 92(2) (emphasis added). Under section 63 of the Act, any person who has been ordered removed may appeal to the Minister, who may cancel the removal order when “exceptional circumstances of a humanitarian nature [would make removal] unjust or unduly harsh” and “it would not in all the circumstances be contrary to the public interest to allow the appellant to remain.” An advisory panel makes recommendations to the Minister on the exercise of the discretion conferred by that provision. Id. § 94.

The contrast highlights a perennial battle in administrative law—fixed rules versus administrative discretion. Professor Daniel Kanstroom makes a strong argument for more fixed rules and less delegated discretion in immigration cases. See Daniel Kanstroom, Surrounding the Hole in the Doughnut: Discretion and Deference in U.S. Immigration Law, 71 Tulane L. Rev. 703 (1997) (also arguing for other ways to structure discretion, including judicial review); see also Daniel Kanstroom, Deportation Nation: Outsiders in American History (2007).

Professor Gerald Neuman, after identifying multiple pockets of discretion in immigration law generally and deportation law specifically, acknowledges the benefits of discretion but exposes its many dangers. Gerald L. Neuman, Discretionary Deportation, 20 Georgetown Immigration L.J. 611 (2006). He observes that “discretionary deportation practices tend to reduce the legal position of lawfully admitted aliens to the insecure status tolerated (but not required) by constitutional doctrine,” id. at 611, and to blur the lines between admitted and non-admitted aliens. He demonstrates how the existence of enforcement discretion presented such dangers after the attacks of September 11, 2001. In the months after the attacks, the government detained hundreds of Muslim non-citizens who were in violation of the immigration laws, none of whom were ever charged with terrorist offenses. Neuman writes that this fact either “shows the government’s success in using routine violations to disguise its enforcement choices,” or it suggests that “the government may only have achieved a marginal reduction in illegal immigration at high cost, while temporarily reassuring the public that measures were being taken to protect it.” Id. at 646. Whatever the government’s strategy, however, its use of discretion was “shielded from juridical examination by the Supreme Court’s then-recent strictures against the effects of a selective enforcement defense to deportation.” Id. For a comparative U.S.–U.K. perspective on the role of immigration discretion, see Stephen H. Legomsky, Immigration and the Judiciary—Law and Politics in Britain and America at 81–107, 170–76 (1987).

Should either (a) ICE or (b) immigration judges be granted a similar open-ended discretion not to remove deportable noncitizens? Compare the merits of the United States and New Zealand approaches.

CHAPTER 9

DEPORTATION PROCEDURE

The two preceding chapters introduced you to the grounds on which noncitizens may be found deportable and the affirmative relief provisions available to some deportable noncitizens. Here the focus shifts to procedure.

As you now know, IIRIRA abolished the terms “exclusion” proceedings and “deportation” proceedings, substituting the term “removal” proceedings for both. But there are still two classes of removable noncitizens—those who are “inadmissible” and those who are “deportable.” You have seen that each class has its own set of substantive grounds and its own set of affirmative relief provisions.

In addition, despite the common name (“removal”), the procedures for these two classes of removable noncitizens continue to differ. The procedures for determining inadmissibility are part of the larger admission process, which you encountered in chapter 6. The procedures for removing deportable noncitizens are treated here. And since it is cumbersome to keep referring to “procedures for removing deportable noncitizens,” this book will use the shorter term “deportation procedure” for that purpose. Recognize, however, that when used in this way “deportation” is a generic word, no longer a term of art.

A second complication is that, since 1996, presence without admission (formerly called entry without inspection) has been a ground for inadmissibility, not deportability. INA § 212(a)(6)(A). Nonetheless, certain of the procedural issues such cases present—especially issues relating to apprehension, detention, and burden of proof—fit more easily into a discussion of deportation procedure than into a discussion of admission procedure. Consequently, this chapter will also encompass the procedural problems arising from the removal of those who are present without admission.

We start with a general overview of the deportation process. Succeeding pages will explore in some detail a sampling of the more specific problems associated with deportation procedure. Remaining sections will immerse you in a simulated removal hearing of your own and examine some of the exceptions to the usual deportation process.

A. OVERVIEW¹

1. APPREHENSION

Removable noncitizens are apprehended in a variety of places—in border areas and in the interior; in vehicles and on foot; in factories, in agricultural fields, in restaurants, in other places of business, and occasionally in dwellings. Sometimes the discovery is by chance encounter; at other times apprehension is the product of investigation and planning. In most instances apprehensions are effected by employees of ICE or CBP. In many cases, however, other federal law enforcement officers or even state or local police arrest a person suspected of criminal activity and later report to ICE when they discover that the individual is not a United States citizen.² Where is the statutory authority for these various operations? And which government officials are clothed with these responsibilities?

The INA charges the Secretary of Homeland Security with “the administration and enforcement” of the immigration laws. INA § 103(a)(1). More specifically, it gives the Secretary both the power and the duty “to control and guard the boundaries and borders of the United States against the illegal entry of aliens.” INA § 103(a)(5). Another provision, INA § 287(a), lists several specific powers that properly designated DHS employees may exercise without a search or arrest warrant. Those pertinent here include (1) the power to interrogate any person believed to be a noncitizen as to his or her right to be in the United States; (2) the power to arrest any noncitizen in the country if there is “reason to believe that the alien so arrested is in the United States in violation of [the immigration laws] and is likely to escape before [an arrest] warrant can be obtained;” (3) within a “reasonable distance³ from any external boundary,” the power to board any vessel within United States territorial waters and any train, aircraft, or other vehicle, for the purpose of searching for noncitizens; and (4) within twenty-five miles of any external boundary, the power to enter private lands other than dwellings for the purpose of patrolling the border. The Secretary has authorized every DHS employee who bears the title “immigration officer” to exercise one or more of those powers. 8 CFR § 287.5(a) (2008). Immigration officers include all immigration inspectors at the border, all border patrol agents, all investigators, and many others. 8 CFR § 103.1(b) (2008). The Secretary may also deputize properly trained state employees to perform investigation, apprehension, and detention functions. See INA § 287(g).

1. See also Victor C. Romero, Everyday Law for Immigrants (2009); David Weissbrodt & Laura Danielson, Immigration Law and Procedure in a Nutshell, ch. 9 (5th ed. 2005).

2. Conversely, DHS agents may arrest individuals suspected of crimes that are not related to immigration. INA § 287(a)(5).

3. With some exceptions, the regulations define “reasonable distance” as 100 miles. 8 CFR § 287.1(a)(2) (2008).

These various statutory powers—none of which requires a warrant—are quite sweeping. Not surprisingly, except at the border or its “functional equivalent,” the courts have recognized various Fourth Amendment limitations. The details of those limitations are beyond the scope of this book, but you should note generally that in certain situations the immigration officer must have a “reasonable suspicion” that the subject is not a citizen; in others, there must be reasonable suspicion not only that the person is a noncitizen, but also that he or she is in the United States in violation of law; still other actions require “probable cause” (a higher standard than reasonable suspicion) to believe the person is a noncitizen who is here unlawfully. There are several variables. In general, more is demanded when the person is in the interior than when the person is at or near the border; more is demanded when mobile units engage in roving patrols than when DHS sets up stationary highway checkpoints through which all vehicles must pass; more is demanded for a search than for a mere stop/interrogation; and still more is required for an arrest. See generally David Carliner, Lucas Guttentag, Arthur C. Helton & Wade Henderson, The Rights of Aliens and Refugees 118–39 (2d ed. 1990). One issue of recently increased importance is whether ethnic profiling is ever a permissible practice in immigration apprehensions and arrests. This subject is taken up in chapter 10, § G below.

Until 1956, every deportation proceeding began with the person’s arrest. See 8 CFR § 242 (1952). In that year, the Justice Department amended its regulations to eliminate the requirement of an arrest; instead, proceedings were to begin when the former INS filed a document then called an “order to show cause,” 21 Fed.Reg. 98 (Jan. 6, 1956), now a “notice to appear,” discussed below, 8 CFR § 1003.14(a) (2008). As noted above, however, the power to arrest still exists.

2. BEFORE THE HEARING

Unless DHS has granted voluntary departure, it must decide whether “there is prima facie evidence that the arrested alien was entering, attempting to enter, or is present in the United States in violation of the immigration laws.” 8 CFR § 287.3(b) (2008). If there is prima facie evidence, DHS refers the case to an immigration judge for a removal hearing. Id. It does this by issuing a Notice to Appear, serving it on the alleged noncitizen, and filing it with the “immigration court.” INA § 239; 8 CFR § 239 (2008). In deportation cases, notices to appear are usually issued by ICE, but a range of other DHS agencies and officials are also authorized to issue them. See 8 CFR § 239.1 (2008). In some cities, one or more immigration judges are permanently based. In others (called “detail cities”), hearings are held by nearby immigration judges who visit periodically. The service of the notice to appear officially commences removal proceedings and vests jurisdiction in the immigration judge.

The Notice to Appear serves several useful functions. It explains the nature of the proceeding, states the time and place of the person’s required appearance before the immigration judge, and instructs the person to keep the government apprised of his or her address and the consequences of failing to do so. INA § 239(a)(1). Those consequences include the possibility of an in absentia removal hearing, a subject discussed separately in section D.3 below. The notice to appear also specifies the deportability grounds charged and recites all the factual allegations necessary to establish those charges. One court has held that res judicata bars removal proceedings on charges that could have been brought in prior removal proceedings. Bravo-Pedroza v. Gonzales, 475 F.3d 1358 (9th Cir. 2007). Finally, the service of the Notice to Appear marks the start of a ten-day waiting period, designed to give the person a chance to secure counsel, before the removal hearing may be scheduled. INA § 239(b)(1).

DHS must also decide whether to detain the person pending a final removal decision. The detention decision is extremely important, because removal proceedings typically take at least several months, and sometimes several years, to complete. Detention entails not only a loss of liberty for the detainee, but also impaired access to counsel, potential economic and other hardships for the detainee's family members, and of course great expense for the government. Stephen H. Legomsky, The Detention of Aliens: Theories, Rules, and Discretion, 30 Univ. Miami Inter-American L. Rev. 531 (1999).

Today, detention is mandatory for certain categories of noncitizens. In 1988, Congress required detention for aggravated felons (a category then defined narrowly) while deportation proceedings were pending. Pub. L. 100-690, §§ 7341, 7343(a), 7344, 102 Stat. 4181, 4469-71 (Nov. 18, 1988). In 1996, AEDPA and IIRIRA combined to extend mandatory detention to several other major categories: (1) almost anyone who is inadmissible or deportable on crime-related grounds (not just aggravated felons); (2) those who are inadmissible or deportable on terrorism grounds (expanded by sections 411 and 412 of the USA PATRIOT Act of 2001); (3) most arriving passengers (including those subject to expedited removal); and (4) individuals awaiting the execution of final removal orders. See INA §§ 235(b)(1)(B)(iii)(IV), 235(b)(2)(A), 236(c)(1)(A, B, C, D), 241(a)(1, 2, 3). In 2003, the Supreme Court in Demore (pages 226-38 above) upheld the constitutionality of mandatory detention, at least for noncitizens charged with crime-related deportability grounds.

In all other cases DHS has the discretion whether to detain the person without bond, release on cash bond of at least $1500, or release on "conditional parole." INA § 236(a). Release is permitted only if DHS is satisfied that the individual "would not pose a danger to property or persons and * * * is likely to appear for any future proceeding." 8 CFR § 236.1(c)(8) (2008).

The regulations give DHS only 48 hours to make two decisions—whether to file a notice to appear and whether to detain or release the person on bond. 8 CFR § 287.3(d) (2008). By way of exception, DHS is given "an additional reasonable period of time" when there is an "emergency or other extraordinary circumstance." Id.; see generally Shoba Sivaprasad Wadhia, Under Arrest: Immigrants' Rights and the Rule of Law, 38 Univ. of Memphis L. Rev. 853, 873-78 (2008).

While removal proceedings are pending the person is not permitted to work, unless he or she would have been eligible to work had removal proceedings not been brought. INA § 236(a)(3). Special problems arise in the case of juveniles. See Reno v. Flores, 507 U.S. 292, 113 S.Ct. 1439, 123 L.Ed.2d 1 (1993).

The regulations allow a person who is dissatisfied with the DHS custody decision to obtain a de novo bond redetermination hearing before an immigration judge. 8 CFR § 1003.19 (2008). The redetermination hearing, which is entirely separate from the removal hearing, is informal and often (in "detail cities," usually) telephonic. See 8 CFR § 1003.19(b) (2008). Either the noncitizen or DHS may appeal the immigration judge's custody decision to the BIA. 8 CFR §§ 1003.1(b)(7), 1003.19(f) (2008). In any case in which DHS ordered the person detained or set the bond amount at $10,000 or more, a release order by the IJ is automatically stayed if DHS within one day files a notice of an intent to appeal and within ten days files an actual notice of appeal. The automatic stay lasts until the BIA decides the case. 8 CFR § 1003.19(i)(2) (2008).

With all the powers to stop, interrogate, arrest, and detain, the question arises whether DHS is required to advise the suspects of their various procedural rights. In Miranda v. Arizona, 384 U.S. 436, 86 S.Ct. 1602, 16 L.Ed.2d 694 (1966), the Supreme Court held that statements made during custodial interrogations may not be used in criminal proceedings unless the statements were preceded by warnings that the person has the right to remain silent, that any statement he or she chooses to make may be admitted into evidence, and that there is a right to have a lawyer present. The lower courts have held the Miranda rule inapplicable to deportation proceedings.⁴

Although the Constitution does not require Miranda warnings in removal proceedings, the regulations require more limited advice at various stages. When DHS decides to institute removal proceedings against a person whom it already has in custody, it must advise that any statements the person makes can be used against him or her, must advise of the right to counsel at the person's own expense, and must provide a list of any free legal services programs available in the locale. 8 CFR § 287.3(c) (2008). The enumerated advisals include no mention of the right to remain silent. As you will see momentarily, the IJ must also advise of certain rights, at the removal hearing.

But you should notice one important limitation common to all those provisions: Each of them comes into play only at some point after DHS has made the decision to institute formal proceedings. Id. By delaying that decision, therefore, DHS can extract valuable information before the person learns of his or her rights. It was not always that way. As the leading immigration treatise observes:

4. See, e.g., Bustos-Torres v. INS, 898 F.2d 1053, 1056 (5th Cir.1990); Nai Cheng Chen v. INS, 537 F.2d 566, 568 (1st Cir.1976) (but immigration officers sometimes gives Miranda warnings anyway to preserve option of bringing criminal prosecution).

For almost 15 years * * * the questioning of prospective deportees who were in custody or otherwise meaningfully deprived of their freedom of action customarily was preceded by a warning of their right to silence and to the assistance of counsel. This practice was ended in 1980, and the regulations now require such a warning only after deportation or removal proceedings are started.

6 Gordon, Mailman & Yale-Loehr, § 72.02[2][f]. Why would DHS make that change? Is it justifiable?

Under the Vienna Convention on Consular Relations, art. 5(i), 21 U.S.T. 77, 84, 596 U.N.T.S. 261, 268 (Apr. 24, 1963), consulates have the right to represent their own nationals before the tribunals of the host state. Because of a Memorandum of Understanding on Consular Protection of Mexican and United States Nationals (May 7, 1996) and an earlier settlement agreement in United States domestic litigation, U.S. immigration officials who believe an arrestee is unlawfully in the United States must notify the person of his or her right to communicate with the relevant consulate. For a good discussion, see Jorge A. Vargas, Consular Protection to Illegal Migratory Workers and Mexican Undocumented Minors: Two Sensitive Issues Addressed by the Thirteenth Annual Meeting of the United States-Mexico Binational Commission, 6 Florida State Univ. J. Transnat'l L. & Policy 143 (1996).

Soon after DHS has filed the Notice to Appear with the immigration court, the noncitizen or his or her counsel appears at a master calendar hearing. Sometimes, especially in detail cities, the master calendar hearing is telephonic. At this hearing, the noncitizen might plead to the allegations and deportability charges contained in the Notice to Appear and might designate the country to which he or she would prefer to be sent in the event removal is ordered. Simple cases and uncontested cases are sometimes finally decided at this stage. In other cases, however, the IJ uses the master calendar hearing to identify the issues and set a schedule for the filing of any motions or applications for relief. The IJ then estimates the amount of time the removal hearing is likely to take and schedules a hearing date accordingly.

During the interval between the master calendar hearing and the actual removal hearing, various procedural events can occur. Either party may request a continuance, which the IJ has the discretion to grant “for good cause shown.” 8 CFR § 1003.29 (2008). Either party may move to change venue, id. § 1003.20(b), to remand to DHS for consideration of an application that would moot removal proceedings, or to suppress evidence. (As you will see later, the grounds for suppressing evidence as illegally obtained are quite narrow.) Limited discovery is possible; in particular, the regulations expressly authorize depositions, id. § 1003.35, and Freedom of Information Act requests, id. §§ 103.8 et seq. The IJ also has the discretion, exercised occasionally, to hold a pre-hearing conference “to narrow issues, to obtain stipulations between the parties, to exchange information voluntarily, and otherwise to simplify and organize the proceeding.” Id. § 1003.21(a).

Certain of these procedural devices will be unrealistic when the parties are not represented by counsel. In every case in which removability is contested, and in certain other situations, ICE must be represented by a lawyer known as a “trial attorney.” See 8 CFR §§ 1240.2(b), 1240.10(d) (2008). The trial attorneys work under the auspices of ICE, in the Office of the Principal Legal Advisor (OPLA). HSA § 442(c). The noncitizen has a statutory right to be represented by counsel, but only at his or her own expense; unlike indigent criminal defendants, indigent noncitizens in removal proceedings generally have no right to appointed counsel. INA § 240(b)(4)(A). Section B.2 below will examine the devices by which indigent noncitizens can sometimes secure representation.

3. THE REMOVAL HEARING⁵

The Administrative Procedure Act (APA), 5 USC § 556, prescribes various procedures generally applicable to federal administrative agencies engaged in formal adjudication. As you will see later, the Supreme Court has interpreted the INA as exempting deportation [now removal] hearings from those procedures. In most respects, however, the conduct of removal hearings is functionally equivalent to that of the hearings subject to the APA. Some differences do exist and they will be explored below.

The opposing parties at a removal hearing are ICE and the noncitizen. An immigration judge (IJ) presides over the hearing. The hearing is normally held at an EOIR “immigration court,” although in recent years video conferencing has been used increasingly.⁶

As you saw earlier, the IJ’s are subject to the general supervision of the Chief Immigration Judge, who in turn is part of the Executive Office for Immigration Review (EOIR). EOIR was created by the Attorney General in 1983, see 48 Fed.Reg. 8039 (Feb. 25, 1983); 8 CFR §§ 1003.0, 1003.9, 1003.10 (2008), and remains part of the Department of Justice. The IJ’s are not article III judges, but they clearly perform judicial functions and many of the physical trappings are similar to those of the general article III courts—judicial robes, a raised dais, separate tables for the two sides, sometimes a witness box, etc.

In recent years, concerns have arisen about the politicization of the process for appointing IJ’s, as well as the job security and the decisional independence of both IJ’s and BIA members. See sections B.1 and B.4 below. In response, the National Association of Immigration Judges (NAIJ)

5. See generally U.S. Dept. of Justice, The Immigration Court Practice Manual (updated periodically on EOIR website, http://www.usdoj.gov/eoir/vll/OCIJPracManual/ocj_page1.htm); Regina Germain, Putting the “Form” in Immigration Court Reform, 84 Denver L. Rev. 1145 (2007).

6. See 81 IR 1495–96 (Oct. 25, 2004); Lory Rosenberg, Arrests, Jails, and Video Hearings, 9 BIB 1233 (Oct. 15, 2004).

favors converting the immigration judge corps and the BIA into a two-tiered, article I immigration court.⁷

In deportation cases, removal hearings are open to the public, except that the IJ has the discretion to limit the number in attendance to accommodate the physical facilities and may close the hearing entirely to protect witnesses, abused spouses or children, other parties, or the public interest. 8 CFR § 1003.27 (2008). The increased use of closed removal hearings and secret evidence removal hearings in cases that raise issues of national security is taken up in chapter 10, sections D.3 and D.4.

The IJ turns on a tape recorder at the start of the hearing. It remains on throughout the hearing unless the IJ wishes to go off the record. 8 CFR §§ 1003.28, 1003.36, 1240.9 (2008). The IJ then announces for the record that he or she is holding a removal hearing and states the noncitizen's name and "A-number" (an identification number assigned by DHS), the time and place of the hearing, and the presence of the parties, their counsel, and any interpreters. If the individual is not already represented, the IJ advises of the right to counsel at no expense to the government and makes sure the person has received a list of any free legal services programs locally available. Id. § 1240.10(a). The IJ verifies that the Notice to Appear has been served on the noncitizen and then enters it into the record as an exhibit. The IJ reads various other rights and explains the contents of the Notice to Appear in nontechnical terms unless, as is common when the person is represented by counsel, these explanations are waived. After that, the IJ places the person under oath. Id.

If the person has not already pleaded to the allegations in the Notice to Appear, the IJ takes the pleading at this time. The noncitizen (or counsel) must either admit or deny each of the factual allegations and then concede or deny deportability. Id. § 1240.10(c). The IJ also permits the person to designate the country to which he or she wishes to be sent in the event removal is ordered. INA § 241(b)(2).

At the removal hearing, ICE first has the burden of proving by clear and convincing evidence that the subject of the hearing is a noncitizen. Only then, see, e.g., Murphy v. INS, 54 F.3d 605 (9th Cir. 1995), does the burden shift to the noncitizen to prove by clear and convincing evidence that he or she is lawfully present pursuant to a prior admission. INA § 240(c)(2)(B). If the noncitizen does so, the burden shifts back to ICE to prove the alleged deportability grounds by clear and convincing evidence. INA § 240(c)(3)(A). One may be ordered removed only on the grounds formally charged, but at any time during the proceeding ICE may lodge additional charges. 8 CFR § 1003.30 (2008). In that event the noncitizen may receive a reasonable continuance to prepare to meet the new charges. Id. The noncitizen has the burden of establishing eligibility and deserved-

7. The arguments by the President of the NAIJ appear in Dana Leigh Marks, An Urgent Priority: Why Congress Should Establish an Article I Immigration Court, 13 BIB 3 (Jan. 1, 2008); see also Michele Benedetto, Crisis on the Immigration Bench, 73 Brooklyn L. Rev. 467 (2008) (similarly criticizing the structure and funding of the immigration judge bench and calling for an ethics review board).

ness for any affirmative relief for which he or she applies at the hearing. INA § 240(c)(4)(A).

If deportability is contested, ICE presents its case first. When it finishes, the noncitizen presents his or her case. The ICE case may consist of documents, live testimony, or both. When ICE calls a witness, the ICE trial attorney conducts direct examination and the noncitizen then has the opportunity to cross-examine. ICE may re-examine the witness if it wishes. If it does so, then the noncitizen may re-cross. During the noncitizen's case-in-chief, the same process applies in reverse; the noncitizen examines the witness, ICE cross-examines, and so forth. During either side's case, the IJ is free to interject additional questions. Some IJ's ask only a few questions; others play a more active role.

If the IJ finds the person deportable, the hearing may enter a second phase in which the noncitizen applies for one or more forms of affirmative relief (voluntary departure, cancellation of removal, adjustment, asylum, etc.). In this phase the noncitizen proceeds first, attempting to establish all the elements required for the relief sought. ICE then has the opportunity to put on any evidence relevant to that relief.

The testimony of all witnesses is under oath or affirmation. 8 CFR §§ 1003.34, 1240.7(b) (2008). Formal rules of evidence, however, do not apply in removal proceedings. Bustos-Torres v. INS, 898 F.2d 1053, 1055 (5th Cir.1990). The regulations allow the admission of any relevant evidence, 8 CFR § 1240.7(a) (2008), but as discussed in section B.3 below, the courts have added a fundamental fairness test for hearsay evidence. The "exclusionary rule" applicable in criminal proceedings is generally inapplicable in removal proceedings. See pages 713–30 below.

If the noncitizen lacks an adequate command of the English language, EOIR will supply an interpreter to interpret the noncitizen's own testimony (but not the testimony of other witnesses or the exchanges between the IJ and counsel). See El Rescate Legal Services, Inc. v. EOIR, 959 F.2d 742 (9th Cir. 1991) (amended opinion). Some interpreters are EOIR employees; others (especially those who interpret the less common foreign languages) work for EOIR on a contract basis as needed. See generally William R. Robie, The Purpose and Effect of the Proposed Rules of Procedure for Proceedings Before Immigration Judges, 1 Georgetown Immigration L.J. 269, 279 (1986). Deficiencies in the quality of the interpretation have been a longstanding problem in removal proceedings. If severe enough, these deficiencies can violate due process or undermine the factual basis for an immigration judge's non-credibility finding. See, e.g., He v. Ashcroft, 328 F.3d 593 (9th Cir. 2003). Foreign language documents require certified English translations. 8 CFR § 1003.33 (2008).

After all the evidence is in, the IJ renders a decision. The decision may be an oral one announced in the presence of the parties, or it may be rendered in written form and served on the parties later. 8 CFR §§ 1003.37(a), 1240.13 (2008). Either way (unless deportability was conceded), the decision must contain the IJ's findings as to deportability and the IJ's reasons. Id. § 1240.12(a). The decision must also contain a formal order directing removal to a specified country, terminating proceedings, or otherwise disposing of the case (for example, by granting voluntary departure within a specified time period). Id. § 1240.12(c).

4. ADMINISTRATIVE REVIEW

Each of the opposing parties (the noncitizen and ICE) has the right to appeal the decision of the IJ to the Board of Immigration Appeals (BIA). 8 CFR § 1003.1(b)(3) (2008). The BIA, like the IJs, is part of EOIR. Unlike the IJ's, who are scattered in various cities throughout the United States and ride circuit to other cities, the BIA sits in a fixed location (Falls Church, Virginia). It now has fifteen members, appointed by the Attorney General. Id. § 1003.1(a)(1).

As a result of controversial reforms inaugurated in 2002 and 2003 by Attorney General Ashcroft, the Board now decides a large share of its cases by single-member "affirmances without opinion" (AWOs). The remaining cases are usually decided by three-member panels and are typically accompanied by reasoned opinions. See generally section B.4 below. Some of the latter opinions are designated for publication and become binding precedents for DHS officials and IJs. 8 CFR § 1003.1(g) (2008). Occasionally the Board decides cases en banc. The Attorney General has reserved the power to review the decisions of the BIA, id. § 1003.1(h), but typically exercises this power only when a case raises exceptionally important questions of law or policy.

The process begins when the noncitizen or ICE files a notice of appeal. It must be filed within thirty days after service of the IJ's decision. See 8 CFR § 1003.38(b) (2008). The filing of that notice automatically stays execution of the IJ's decision. Id. § 1003.6(a). There are specific time deadlines for preparing and reviewing the transcripts, filing briefs, and rendering decisions. See id. §§ 1003.1(e)(8), 1003.3(c), 1003.5. The BIA reviews the immigration judge's legal conclusions and exercises of discretion de novo, but as a result of the 2002 reforms the BIA may not reverse findings of fact, including credibility determinations, unless they are "clearly erroneous." Id. § 1003.1(d)(3).

5. JUDICIAL REVIEW

The law that governs judicial review of removal orders is a technical minefield; you will encounter some of the details in section B.6 below. A few basic principles are worth understanding at this juncture.

Ordinarily, the exclusive procedure for obtaining judicial review of a removal order is to file a petition for review in the United States Court of Appeals for the circuit in which the removal hearing was held. INA § 242(b)(2). To be reviewable, the removal order must be administratively final. INA § 242(a)(1).

In IIRIRA and the REAL ID Act, Congress carved out several broad exceptions to the availability of judicial review. The two main exceptions relate generally to removal orders based on criminal convictions and challenges to the denial of discretionary relief. INA §§ 242(a)(2)(B, C). In both instances, however, the courts may continue to review questions of law. INA § 242(a)(2)(D). Expedited removal orders are also generally immune from judicial review. INA § 242(a)(2)(A). The details of these limitations are considered in section B.6 below.

There are several conditions to filing petitions for review. Generally, the petitioner must first exhaust all administrative remedies, INA § 242(d)(1), including appeal to the BIA. The petition must be filed within thirty days of the administratively final removal order. INA § 242(b)(1).

At one time, the service of the petition for review automatically stayed removal pending the court's decision unless (as was rare) the court ordered otherwise. As a result of IIRIRA, however, the government is now free to remove the noncitizen before the court has decided the petition for review unless the court has affirmatively granted a request for a stay. INA § 242(b)(3)(B). The reviewing court decides the case on the basis of the administrative record, not by taking new evidence of its own. Id. § 242(b)(4)(A).

A word on terminology: During administrative proceedings before the IJ or the BIA, the person whom the government seeks to remove is called the "respondent." Once the person petitions for review in the court of appeals, he or she becomes the "petitioner" and the government becomes the "respondent."

6. THE EXECUTION OF THE REMOVAL ORDER

IIRIRA tightened the rules for executing final orders of removal. Congress directed that noncitizens be removed within 90 days of the dates their orders become administratively final (with adjustments in cases where there has been judicial review or confinement). INA § 241(a)(1). Congress also provided, in INA § 241(a)(2), that the Attorney General [now the Secretary of Homeland Security] "shall detain the alien" during the removal period. It is not clear whether the word "shall" is to be taken literally, because the same provision goes on to say that "[u]nder no circumstances during the removal period shall the Attorney General release" certain of those removable noncitizens—namely, those whose removability rests on almost any of the crime-related grounds. INA § 241(a)(2). The latter prescription seems inexplicable if the former is meant to be construed literally. Finally, if the person is in prison because of a conviction for a nonviolent offense, the Secretary may execute the removal order even before the criminal sentence has been completed (with the state's permission in the case of state prisoners). INA § 241(a)(4)(B).

One event that can delay removal is a stay granted in connection with a motion to reopen or reconsider. In general, a motion to reopen is appropriate when one of the parties discovers previously unavailable evidence that might alter the decision; in contrast, a motion to reconsider typically challenges the correctness of the decision at the time it was rendered. See 8 CFR §§ 1003.2 (motions to BIA), 1003.23(b) (motions to IJ), 103.5 (motions to DHS) (2008). These motions are controversial because of the delays they can entail. The filing of a motion to reopen or reconsider does not automatically stay the challenged decision, but the body to whom the motion is made has the discretion to stay execution while the motion is pending. See id. §§ 1003.2(f), 1003.23(b)(1)(v), 103.5(a)(1)(iv) (2008). As discussed in section B.5 below, however, both EOIR and Congress have imposed severe restrictions on the filing of motions to reopen or reconsider.

If no stays or other formal barriers remain, DHS prepares to execute the removal order. The noncitizen's cooperation in securing the necessary travel documents is important,⁸ and IIRIRA may impose civil fines on any noncitizen who "fails to make timely application in good faith" for the necessary travel documents, willfully fails to depart, or otherwise hampers departure. INA § 274D. Under INA § 241(a)(2) detention is possibly mandatory (there is some ambiguity) for noncitizens who have been ordered removed. If for some reason the person is not in DHS detention, DHS serves a formal notice to report for removal at a specified time and place. This letter is known in the vernacular as a "bag and baggage" letter, though some people have been heard to call it a "run" letter.

At the latest, the government will have custody over the person from the time the person reports for removal until it escorts him or her onto the plane or other vehicle (or to the border if removal is to a contiguous country.)⁹ Subject to various restrictions that you saw in chapter 8, § B.3 above, deportable noncitizens who are ordered removed are usually sent to the countries that they designated at their removal hearings.

B. A SAMPLING OF SPECIFIC PROCEDURAL INGREDIENTS

1. IMMIGRATION JUDGES

Sidney B. Rawitz, From Wong Yang Sung to Black Robes

65 IR 453-59 (1988).

* * *

Few will dispute that immigration judges wield great power in making decisions that profoundly affect individual lives. Their judicial attire lend-

8. The travel document need not be a passport. Often it is simply a letter issued by the foreign country's U.S. consulate verifying that the person is a national of that country. For this and some of the other information on the mechanics of executing removal orders, the author thanks Chester Moyer, Officer in Charge, St. Louis Suboffice, former INS.

9. If the person is dangerous to others (e.g., because of serious criminal activity or mental illness), the airline might require a DHS officer to accompany him or her all the way to the final destination. And if the person must change planes en route, DHS normally makes "meet and greet" arrangements in which law enforcement officers from the relevant DHS districts escort removed noncitizens to their connecting flights.

ing verisimilitude, they bring dignity and authority to the hearings over which they preside. But it was not always thus. Their predecessors as INS hearing officers labored in an uncertain and unrewarding environment. They possessed none of the independence guaranteed today's immigration judges; by and large, they did not command respect; and they were poorly compensated for their efforts.

* * *

In 1950, I was one of the Examiners assigned to the Hearing Review Unit of the Adjudications Division in the INS Central Office. Our principal duties were to review deportation and exclusion hearing records and prepare decisions for the signature of the Assistant Commissioner. The Central Office, after a war-time exile to Philadelphia, had been brought back to Washington in 1948 and relocated in a ramshackle two-story building known as Tempo X, across from the D.C. Armory and a stone's throw from where RFK stadium now stands.

I recall well that wintry afternoon of February 20, 1950, when a colleague, visibly excited, burst into my Tempo X office to tell me: "You can stop whatever you're working on. The Court has just decided the Sung case." Wong Yang Sung was the name of the deserting Chinese crewman who rocked—and nearly capsized—the boat of the Immigration Service.¹⁰

Let me briefly describe the procedures the U.S. Supreme Court invalidated on that memorable day. Expulsion (or deportation) proceedings were carried out under the authority of the Immigration Act of February 5, 1917, which stipulated in § 19 that certain designated aliens "shall upon the warrant of the Attorney General be taken into custody and deported." This meager statutory language constituted the authority for the deportation process. To initiate the deportation proceeding, the alien was served with a warrant of arrest which informed him in summary language of the section(s) of law and ground(s) upon which his deportation was being sought. No recitation of factual allegations was served on the alien then or at any time in the proceedings.

Hearings were conducted by an immigrant inspector whose duties also included investigating like cases of deportable aliens. When performing the hearing officer function, the immigrant inspector was referred to as the "Presiding Inspector," but he was not permitted to hear a case in which he had been the investigating officer unless the alien consented.

In the more complex and lengthy hearings, an "examining officer" might be assigned to represent the government. Before the days of the feminist movement, these hearings were known as "two-man" hearings. Mostly there were "one-man" hearings. The presiding inspector, an employee under the supervision and control of the District Director, presented the government's evidence, interrogated the alien and all witnesses, and prepared a recommended decision. The presiding inspector was graded by the U.S. Civil Service Commission in an immigrant inspector classification series, in the equivalent range between a GS-7 and GS-9.¹¹

10. [Footnote 2 in original] Wong Yang Sung v. McGrath, 339 U.S. 33, 70 S.Ct. 445, 94 L.Ed. 616 (1950).

The deportation hearing typically commenced with a series of threshold questions put to the alien by the presiding inspector:

What is your full, true, and correct name?

Have you ever been known by any other name?

What was your father's name?

What was your mother's name?

When and where were you born?

Of what country are you a citizen?

When and where did you last enter the United States?

By what means of transportation did you arrive in the United States?

The questions went on. The alien's testimony was extracted bit by bit, in both relevant and nonrelevant detail, consuming needless time and resulting in multiple pages of transcript even when the basis of deportability might rest on a simple "remained longer" or "entry without inspection" charge. An alien's application for discretionary relief would elicit similar detailed interrogation by the presiding inspector.

The presiding inspector was required to set forth formal Findings of Fact and Conclusions of Law as to deportability, which could easily consume an entire typewritten page. Not infrequently, the presiding inspector elected to set forth Findings of Fact and Conclusions of Law on issues of discretionary relief such as an application for suspension of deportation.

The hearings were recorded by live stenographers—today almost an extinct species. The stenographer attending the hearing was responsible for preparing the transcript and certifying in writing to the accuracy of the record.

When an immigrant inspector was assigned to conduct a hearing, he was handed the alien's entire file to review. The file was the repository of all information concerning the particular alien and might contain hearsay, "spite" letters, classified information, or other prejudicial material.

After the presiding inspector's recommended decision was served on the alien, the entire case file, including the hearing transcript, was forwarded to the Central Office. Following action by an Examiner in the Hearing Review Unit, as previously described, the case went to the O.A.R.—Office of Adjudications Review—for further scrutiny. If the proposed decision appeared satisfactory, the O.A.R. Examiner initialed and sent the case to the

11. [Footnote 6 in original] Only a tors were burdened with college education. small number of the 90-120 presiding inspec-

Assistant Commissioner for signature. An adverse decision was appealable without fee to the Board of Immigration Appeals (BIA).

As can be seen, there was no paucity of review. But, again, bear in mind that the presiding inspector combined functions of prosecutor and judge and at each level the entire file, regardless of the contaminating nature of its contents, was in the hands of the reviewing authority.

* * *

The Administrative Procedure Act (APA) was enacted in 1946 in the wake of a strong demand for reform of federal agency administrative and hearing procedures. In regard to the conduct of hearings, the APA sought not only to assure the independence and impartiality of the hearing examiner but, as its fundamental purpose, to curtail or invalidate the frequent practice of embodying in one person or agency the duties of prosecutor and judge.

Faced with the reality of the APA, the INS General Counsel and the Office of the Solicitor General of the Department of Justice pooled their wisdom and concluded that deportation proceedings were exempted from the statute's reach. Their confidence was bolstered as they saw their views prevail in the U.S. District Court and the Court of Appeals over Wong Yang Sung's contention that the deportation order entered in his case was invalid because the proceedings had not conformed to the APA. But, as so often has happened, the Supreme Court confounded the government's experts. In its 6-1 decision in the Sung case, the Court held that the APA was indeed applicable to deportation hearings.

* * *

[The pertinent provision of the APA, 5 USC § 554, prescribes certain procedural safeguards, including the separation of the adjudication function from both prosecution and investigation functions, whenever adjudication is "required by statute to be determined on the record after an opportunity for an agency hearing." At the time of Wong Yang Sung, no statute required such a hearing in deportation cases. The Court interpreted the phrase "required by statute," however, to include hearings that were required by due process, and it further held that in deportation cases due process required hearings on the record. The Court bolstered its textual reasoning by observing that the APA had been enacted primarily to curtail precisely the kinds of commingling of functions that then characterized deportation hearings.—Eds.]

The torpedo delivered by the 1950 Sung decision caught the Service totally unprepared to deal with its consequences. All pending deportation proceedings and unexecuted deportation orders in which the hearings had been conducted subsequent to the enactment of the APA in 1946 were necessarily invalid for failure to comply with the statute's requirements. There were thousands of such cases which would now have to be reopened for de novo APA hearings. Adding to the dismay, the Service had no hearing examiners who had been selected and appointed in conformity with section 11 of the APA.

With disaster close at hand, INS prevailed upon the Civil Service Commission to grant it authority to make temporary appointments of APA Hearing Examiners. Most of the incumbent presiding inspectors received such appointments. Hearings resumed under APA strictures and, of course, an examining/prosecuting officer appeared in behalf of INS in every case.

This revolutionary state of affairs enjoyed a short life. Congress responded to supplications by INS for an exemption from APA coverage. INS argued that the volume of deportation proceedings made adherence to that statute both too costly and too cumbersome. The Act of September 27, 1950, an appropriations bill, contained a rider giving the Service its exemption. Thus, the Supreme Court's edict conforming deportation hearing procedures to the APA lost its vitality after a mere seven months. However, it had unleashed forces which were to have a more profound effect.

For about the next two years, from September 1950 until December 24, 1952, the effective date of the Immigration and Nationality Act (INA), the Service substantially reverted to its former hearing procedures, albeit with greater awareness of the need to measure up to prevailing concepts of fairness and administrative due process. The officers conducting deportation hearings during this period were allowed to continue using the title of Hearing Examiner, thereby giving the final burial to the title of Presiding Inspector.

Presumably aware of this history in writing the INA, Congress made changes and some improvements in the INS hearing systems, but eschewed the opportunity to initiate fundamental reforms. One of the more notable improvements was the designation of special inquiry officers to conduct hearings and make decisions in both exclusion and expulsion proceedings.

Special Inquiry Officers (SIO's) were defined as immigration officers whom "the Attorney General deemed specially qualified to conduct specified classes of proceedings." But therein reposed a problem. With the effective date of the 1952 Act close at hand, the agency had taken no steps to make the determination of who was "specially qualified." Caught short once more, INS asked the Civil Service Commission for authority to appoint temporary SIO's. The authority was granted with the understanding that an examination process would be developed looking toward the selection and appointment of permanent SIO's at the then elevated grade of GS-11.

For the officers who had been conducting deportation hearings, these had been years of upheaval and uncertainty. With no assurance of eventual retention as SIO's, a number concluded that it was time to redirect their careers through transfers to positions in more stable activities.

This brings us to the SIO selection process. It was decided at the outset that it would not be feasible to determine who was "specially qualified" for the SIO position without an oral interview of each candidate. It was further decided, in another breakthrough, that naturalization examiners, of whom a substantial number were attorneys, would be deemed to meet a specialized experience requirement, notwithstanding their general lack of immigration hearing experience. Finally, agreement was reached to award extra points in the rating scale to holders of college and law degrees. This may seem unexceptional today, but it was another 90-degree turn by an agency which in shaping its personnel policies had generally viewed border patrol experience more positively than higher education.

* * *

The appointment of "specially qualified" SIO's to conduct exclusion and deportation hearings pursuant to procedures deliberately mandated by Congress in the INA failed to still the critics who had seen the Sung decision as their finest hour. Law professors and immigration attorneys renewed their attacks on what they perceived to be a continuing lack of overall fairness in the hearing process and specifically on the INS failure to ensure both separation of functions and the independence of the SIO's. It would take another two to three years before INS, prodded by the Justice Department, would undertake extensive internal reforms from which would emerge the progenitor of today's corps of immigration judges.

It was in 1956 that truly radical changes were made in the INS hearing structure:

- SIO's were removed from operational supervision by District Directors and placed organizationally under a Chief Special Inquiry Officer acting through four Regional Special Inquiry Officers. The positions of Chief SIO and Regional SIO were newly created. The Chief SIO was made responsible solely to the Commissioner.
- The Order to Show Cause (OSC), a major innovation, replaced the warrant of arrest as the instrument for initiating a deportation proceeding. The pleading process was introduced at the same time.
- To avoid commingling of functions, an examining/prosecuting officer was made mandatory in every case in which deportability was contested.
- The novel concept of creating a "Record File" for the SIO's use was put into practice as a means of insulating him from prejudicial material that might be contained in the alien's general file.

* * *

Concurrently with these changes, a plan was approved to phase out all non-attorneys from the SIO position as soon as feasible. This would not turn out to be a major problem, for by this time nearly four out of five SIO's were members of the bar. Attrition, transfers, and reduction in force would play their part in reaching the goal of an all-attorney corps of SIO's.

Between 1956 and 1962 the SIO's were upgraded twice to reach the GS-13 level. Their next two promotions to GS-14 and GS-15 (their current grade) would come at a somewhat slower pace.

In 1973, having mounted their own vigorous campaign, the SIO's were authorized to use the working title of Immigration Judge and to wear the traditional robes of the judiciary in their "courtrooms." Finally, in 1983, they achieved a long-sought objective when they were granted a divorce a vinculo matrimonii from INS and positioned within the Executive Office for Immigration Review, a newly created entity within the Department of Justice.

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. Footnote 21 of the Rawitz article (not reproduced above) reads:

In 1955 the Supreme Court ruled that the procedural provisions of the APA, including those relating to the appointment and selection of examiners and separation of functions, were inapplicable to deportation hearings conducted under the INA. Marcello v. Bonds, 349 U.S. 302, 75 S.Ct. 757, 99 L.Ed. 1107 (1955).

The Marcello decision makes clear that, at least since the enactment of the INA in 1952, the APA has not governed the conduct of deportation (now removal) hearings. In most respects, however, INA § 240(b) and the various agency regulations together provide roughly the same procedure that the APA would require if it applied.

2. The main procedural ingredient of APA procedure that is commonly cited as missing from removal hearings is separation of functions. When formal APA procedure applies (i.e., when a hearing on the record is "required by statute" within the meaning of Wong Yang Sung), the presiding officer at the hearing must not have been "engaged in the performance of investigative or prosecuting functions for an agency * * * in that or a factually related case." 5 USC § 554(d). Moreover, he or she must not "be responsible to or subject to the supervision or direction of an employee or agent engaged in the performance of investigative or prosecuting functions for an agency." Id. § 554(d)(2).

Be sure to distinguish at least four types of "separation of functions" problems: (1) The adjudicator has been an investigator in the same case or in a factually related case; (2) The adjudicator, when not adjudicating cases, investigates or prosecutes other unrelated cases; (3) The adjudicator, at the hearing, is empowered to perform prosecutor-type functions such as presenting evidence and examining witnesses; and (4) The adjudicator's supervisor has investigation or prosecution responsibilities. Which of those arrangements characterize removal proceedings? Which ones would violate the APA if the APA applied to removal? What are the dangers in each? Should the APA be made applicable to removal hearings?

3. From 1983, when immigration judges were first removed from the former INS, until 2001, there was rarely any reason to doubt the decisional independence of the immigration judges. In April 2001, however, the INS telephoned the Office of the Chief Immigration Judge, ex parte, to complain about a ruling of immigration judge William Van Wyke. Chief Immigration Judge Michael J. Creppy intervened, granting an INS request that the immigration judge had denied. Judge Van Wyke then recused himself from the case. Excerpts from Judge Van Wyke's opinion follow:

On April 16, 2001 the court ordered this case administratively (i.e. temporarily) closed over INS objection because no non-frivolous reason was shown for keeping it open at the time. * * * The court had waited over 90 days for the INS to adjudicate a visa petition that serves as a predicate for the next likely step—a hearing on an application for adjustment of status. The INS trial attorney had failed or refused to inquire of his client when the necessary work would be completed, obstructing the meaningful calendaring of the case for any particular date. In similar cases the INS has stalled half a year to a year in adjudicating such petitions while the potential beneficiaries lingered in jail and removal proceedings stood still. * * *

* * *

* * * If the court ordered a respondent's lawyer to submit an application on a client's behalf by a certain date and the attorney offered similar excuses for inaction, immediate and grave consequences would follow for his client. The asymmetry of ordering one party, but asking, begging, pleading and cajoling the other party hearing after hearing without effect, can only diminish the court's stature as an authoritative and independent arbiter in the public's eyes. To recalendar this case for no other reason than to offer a forum for still further demonstrations of the court's impotence and the INS's intransigence serves no useful purpose.

* * * [T]he [INS] motion to recalendar shall be and is hereby DENIED.

The court's decision on this motion will not be given practical effect, however, because the Office of the Chief Immigration Judge (OCIJ) has intervened in this case and recalendared it on its own motion, or in response to the INS motion, over the IJ's objection. This was done following a telephone call by INS district counsel to the OCIJ on or about April 19, 2001, complaining about the IJ's April 16 decision, and a commitment by the Office of the Chief Immigration Judge to "look into it." On April 23 the OCIJ directed this IJ to vacate his April 16 decision and place the case back on the active docket, because the decision was supposedly contrary to BIA precedent due to the lack of INS consent to the closing, and because it conflicted with administrative goals of the OCIJ. On April 24 this IJ asked the OCIJ to reconsider its order. The Chief Immigration Judge is an administrative and policy officer without appellate or other legal authority to overrule the immigration judge's procedural decisions in the case, see 8 CFR 3.9, 3.1(b), and ethical rules require the Chief Immigration Judge as well as immigration judges to refrain from taking action in a specific case following an ex parte communication about the case by one of the parties. ABA Model Code of Judicial Conduct, Canon 3.B.7. The OCIJ decided to bypass the immigration judge on April 27 and issued its own order to the court clerk to return the case to the court's active docket. * * *

The court's decision to close the case temporarily was not a mere "administrative" one subject to OCIJ's general direction. The existence of three BIA precedents in contested appeals is ample demonstration that a decision to administratively close is of a legal nature affecting the rights of the parties, and not a mere administrative one that has no particular meaning or impact. * * * As an administrative office which does not hear specific cases, the OCIJ may obviously receive and investigate complaints about a judge from any source without any ethical violation. But once a complaint about a specific case is either communicated to the IJ in charge of the "pending or impending case" or the OCIJ itself takes action in such a case, without giving the opposing party an opportunity to be heard, Canon 3.B.7 is apparently violated. * * *

* * * OCIJ's intervention has undermined the court's efforts by protecting the INS from having to defend its position legally before the BIA. This gives a procedural tactical advantage to the INS by demonstrating to respondent, rightly or wrongly, that an INS call to the Office of the Chief Immigration Judge may be enough to undo what the immigration judge does in open court, while encouraging the INS to continue to seek results from the OCIJ privately that it might not be able to get from the BIA publicly.

* * * If permitted to exercise his independent legal judgment now or on the day the OCIJ has rescheduled this case, and all else being equal, this IJ would ignore the OCIJ's intervention and would administratively close the case again. * * * If the court were permitted to so rule, the INS would have the opportunity to argue before the BIA that the OCIJ's order is correct and should take precedence over the IJ's order, if it should wish to do so.

Lacking, however, the authority to make that decision (and the OCIJ's recalendaring of this case over the judge's objection demonstrates he does lack that authority), and in the absence of a withdrawal by OCIJ of its order, this judge can do nothing to remove the appearance of impropriety with which district counsel's ex parte communication and OCIJ's intervention have tainted this case. Only the OCIJ, which went beyond mere administrative generalities to direct a particular course of action in this case, is in a position to cure the appearance of impropriety its intervention has produced.

* * *

Unable to “establish” or “enforce” the standards of conduct that he believes must apply to these circumstances, this judge will recuse himself from further consideration of this case. The court will refer the case back to the Chief Immigration Judge for whatever action he may deem fit and appropriate.

Matter of R.M. (Immigration Court, York County Prison, PA, May 21, 2001).

Somewhat different threats to the independence of the administrative appellate tribunals have emerged in the United States with the selective dismissals of BIA members, and in Australia with the threats (carried out) to nonrenew the appointments of members of the Refugee Review Tribunal. See the discussion of those developments in section B.4 below.

Do any of these actions implicate either independence or the appearance of independence? Should administrative tribunals that decide immigration cases be independent?

4. After much publicity, a recent report by the Justice Department’s Office of Professional Responsibility and its Office of the Inspector General found that, during the Bush II Administration, the Attorney General’s White House liaison and the Attorney General’s Chief of Staff had been selecting immigration judges (as well as BIA members, Assistant U.S. Attorneys, and various temporary detail officers) on the basis of their political affiliations, in violation of civil service laws. The discoveries led to changes in the hiring procedures, which now lie largely with EOIR, the umbrella agency that houses both the immigration judge corps and the BIA. See U.S. Dept. of Justice, An Investigation of Allegations of Politicized Hiring by Monica Goodling and Other Staff in the Office of the Attorney General (July 28, 2008). Additional questions concerning the quality of EOIR decisions and the professional conduct of selected immigration judges led the Attorney General to grant new supervisory authority to the EOIR Director, as well as to planned performance evaluations of both immigration judges and the BIA. See 84 IR 2269 (Oct. 1, 2007).

5. This would be a good point at which to review current removal hearing procedures in section A.3 above.

2. REPRESENTATION

Several empirical studies and other statistical compilations now make clear that representation by counsel is one of the key correlates of success for noncitizens in removal proceedings. A recent CLINIC (Catholic Legal Immigration Network, Inc.) compilation of figures released by EOIR for fiscal year 2003 breaks down the success rates of represented and unrepresented respondents in removal proceedings by type of case (for example, asylum, adjustment of status, cancellation of removal, etc.) and by whether the person was detained. Respondents who were represented (either by attorneys or by qualified non-attorneys, as discussed below) fared substantially better in almost all categories. Most striking were the figures for EOIR asylum cases. Among non-detained applicants in fiscal year 2003

(and considering only cases decided on the merits, not those dismissed for procedural reasons), the approval rates were 39% and 14% for represented and unrepresented applicants, respectively. Among detained applicants, the corresponding approval rates were 18% and 3%.¹²

Correlations, of course, do not prove causation. Those individuals who were able to obtain counsel—especially pro bono counsel—might well have succeeded in doing so precisely because their cases were stronger on the merits. The higher approval rates in those cases therefore do not necessarily confirm the effects of representation. Still, few involved in the removal process would seriously doubt the value of competent counsel, particularly in asylum cases, where success frequently requires meticulous documentation of the applicant's personal history and the conditions in his or her country of origin.

So how hard is it to get counsel? As the following materials will show, it can be extremely hard for those noncitizens who are indigent, and many of those who need counsel the most go lacking. See Kerwin, note 12 above. EOIR reported in 2008 that approximately 58% of the individuals in EOIR proceedings go unrepresented. 85 IR 2445 (Sept. 8, 2008).

In part because the number of people in need of qualified counsel so vastly exceeds the supply, noncitizens can be highly vulnerable to the predatory practices of unqualified immigration “consultants” who often describe themselves as “notarios.” Some notarios pose as immigration attorneys and target Latino communities, where confusion can arise because in some Latin American countries a “notario” is a type of lawyer. The American Immigration Lawyers Association [AILA] has long campaigned for federal legislation that would effectively shut down the notarios, but there have been practical obstacles. Professor Andrew Moore has written a hard-hitting exposé of the damage that notarios do and the states' responses, which have taken the forms of either banning the provision of immigration services by nonlawyers or regulating the practice. He also analyzes both the constitutional and policy questions these practices raise and traces the practices to the huge unmet need for legal assistance in immigration cases. See Andrew F. Moore, Fraud, The Unauthorized Practice of Law and Unmet Needs: A Look at State Laws Regulating Immigration Assistants, 19 Georgetown Immigration L.J. 1 (2004).

In removal proceedings one has “the privilege of being represented at no expense to the Government, by counsel of the alien's choosing who is authorized to practice in [removal] proceedings.” INA § 240(b)(4)(A), repeated in INA § 292. The discussion that follows will explore four related problems: Who is authorized to practice in removal proceedings? What

12. See Donald Kerwin, Charitable Legal Programs for Immigrants: What They Do, Why They Matter and How They Can Be Expanded, June 2004 Immigration Briefings. Over the years, other studies have consistently shown similar results. For some impressive data, see Andrew I. Schoenholtz & Jonathan practical options are available to the indigent? What are the special ethical criteria for immigration practitioners and what procedures are in place for those charged with violating them? Finally, what are the elements of, and the remedies for, ineffective assistance of counsel?

Jacobs, The State of Asylum Representation: Ideas for Change, 16 Georgetown Immigration L.J. 739, especially at 741–46 and 765–72 (2002); see also United States General Accounting Office, Asylum Approval Rates for Selected Applicants (1987).

a. AUTHORIZATION TO PRACTICE

8 CFR §§ 1292.1, 1292.2 (2008)

§ 1292.1 Representation of others.

(a) A person entitled to representation may be represented by any of the following:

(1) Attorneys in the United States. * * *

(2) Law students and law graduates not yet admitted to the bar. A law student who is enrolled in an accredited U.S. law school, or a graduate of an accredited U.S. law school, who is not yet admitted to the bar, provided that:

(i) He or she is appearing at the request of the person entitled to representation;

(ii) In the case of a law student, he or she has filed a statement that he or she is participating, under the direct supervision of a faculty member, licensed attorney, or accredited representative, in a legal aid program or clinic conducted by a law school or non-profit organization, and that he or she is appearing without direct or indirect remuneration from the alien he or she represents;

(iii) In the case of a law graduate, he or she has filed a statement that he or she is appearing under the supervision of a licensed attorney or accredited representative and that he or she is appearing without direct or indirect remuneration from the alien he or she represents; and

(iv) The law student's or law graduate's appearance is permitted by the official before whom he or she wishes to appear * * *. The official or officials may require that a law student be accompanied by the supervising faculty member, attorney, or accredited representative.

(3) Reputable individuals. Any reputable individual of good moral character, provided that:

(i) He is appearing on an individual case basis, at the request of the person entitled to representation;

(ii) He is appearing without direct or indirect remuneration and files a written declaration to that effect;

(iii) He has a pre-existing relationship or connection with the person entitled to representation (e.g., as a relative, neighbor, clergyman, business associate or personal friend), provided that such requirement may be waived, as a matter of administrative discretion, in cases where adequate representation would not otherwise be available; and

(iv) His appearance is permitted by the official before whom he wished to appear * * *, provided that such permission shall not be granted with respect to any individual who regularly engages in immigration and naturalization practice or preparation, or holds himself out to the public as qualified to do so.

(4) Accredited representatives. A person representing an organization described in § 292.2 of this chapter who has been accredited by the [BIA]. [Paragraphs 5 and 6 cover foreign officials and foreign attorneys.—Eds.]

* * *

(e) Except as set forth in this section, no other person or persons shall represent others in any case.

§ 1292.2 Organizations qualified for recognition; requests for recognition; withdrawal of recognition; accreditation of representatives; roster.

(a) Qualifications of organizations. A non-profit religious, charitable, social service, or similar organization established in the United States and recognized as such by the Board may designate a representative or representatives to practice before the Service [now USCIS] alone or the Service and the Board (including practice before the Immigration Court). Such organization must establish to the satisfaction of the Board that:

(1) It makes only nominal charges and assesses no excessive membership dues for persons given assistance; and

(2) It has at its disposal adequate knowledge, information and experience.

* * *

(d) Accreditation of representatives. An organization recognized by the Board under paragraph (b) of this section may apply for accreditation of persons of good moral character as its representatives. An organization may apply to have a representative accredited to practice before the Service alone or the Service and the Board (including practice before immigration judges). An application for accreditation shall fully set forth the nature and extent of the proposed representative's experience and knowledge of immigration and naturalization law and procedure and the category of accreditation sought. * * *

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. Should the categories of eligible representatives be broadened? Should they be narrowed?

2. Until 1975 there was no provision specifically authorizing law students or law school graduates not yet admitted to the bar to provide representation in Justice Department proceedings. To appear, they had to qualify under either the "reputable individuals" or "accredited representatives” categories. See 8 CFR § 292.1(b, c) (1975). In that year, however, the Department created a new category for final-year law students and law graduates. 40 Fed. Reg. 23271 (May 29, 1975). In 1990 the final-year limitation was removed. 55 Fed. Reg. 49250 (Nov. 27, 1990). What would be the pros and cons of limiting law student representation to either (a) those in their final year or (b) upperclass students?

3. Section 1292.1(a)(2) of the regulations that you just read reflects some changes that were finalized in 1997. See 62 Fed. Reg. 23634 (May 1, 1997). Those amendments relaxed the requirements for law student and law graduate representation. One change was to eliminate the requirement that a law student be working in a law school program; now, any nonprofit organization may provide the required supervision. A second change added accredited representatives to the list of people who could supervise law students.

A third change concerned remuneration. Before the amendments, neither law students nor law school graduates not yet admitted to the Bar could receive any direct or indirect remuneration. The amendments permit both categories to receive remuneration as long as it doesn’t come from the person represented; the employer, for example, may pay the student’s, or law graduate’s, salary (provided, presumably, that the employer does not then charge the noncitizen for it).

First, why should remuneration play any role in determining whether law students and law graduates not yet admitted to the Bar may represent noncitizens in immigration cases? Second, why should it matter whether the remuneration comes from the represented person or the organization?

4. The accredited individuals mentioned in section 1292.1(a)(4) must represent recognized organizations. For general guidance as to the requirements for recognition of an organization, see Matter of Lutheran Ministries of Florida, 20 I. & N.Dec. 185 (BIA 1990). One requirement is that the organization make “only nominal charges” to persons receiving assistance. 8 CFR § 1292.2(a)(1) (2008) (reproduced above). The current funding crisis faced by charitable organizations has prompted recent efforts to persuade the Justice Department to delete the prohibition of more than nominal charges. As of this writing, the movement has not met with success. See Donald M. Kerwin, Don’t Give Me Your Tired, Your Poor or Your Huddled Masses: The Impact of Pending Legislation, 73 IR 181, 186–87 (Feb. 12, 1996); Donald M. Kerwin, Charitable Legal Immigration Programs: Can They Survive?, 74 IR 813 (May 19, 1997).

b. FINDING LAWYERS FOR THE INDIGENT

As others have observed, indigent noncitizens have long had serious problems obtaining representation in deportation cases. See, e.g., Note, INS Transfer Policy: Interference with Detained Aliens’ Due Process Right to Retain Counsel, 100 Harvard L. Rev. 2001, 2005–06 (1987). The Erlenborn Commission, created for the purpose of studying the restrictions on representation by offices that receive Legal Services Corporation funds (more on that in section B.2.b.ii below), summed up the problem as follows:

Private attorneys are unlikely to undertake the representation of alien agricultural worker clients. Four chief reasons are: (i) the mobility of the client population, (ii) language barriers involved in serving a non-English speaking population, (iii) the high costs incurred in cases involving aliens, and (iv) the lack of any potential for large fee awards.

Legal Services Corporation, The Erlenborn Commission Report, 15 Georgetown Immigration L.J. 99, 131 (2001). The Commission found these barriers particularly formidable for migrant farmworkers. Id. at 132-34.

You probably noticed earlier that the statutory provisions creating the privilege of counsel in removal proceedings emphasize that such counsel will be "at no expense to the Government." INA §§ 240(b)(4)(A), 292. One option, of course, is for the indigent person to go unrepresented. Another frequently available option is to secure the services of a knowledgeable nonlawyer. As you have seen, the regulations authorize representation by various categories of law students, law school graduates, accredited representatives, and other reputable individuals.

But what about those people whose cases are complex enough and meritorious enough to require a lawyer? The material that follows explores the main options.

i. A Constitutional Right to Counsel?

Aguilera-Enriquez v. INS

United States Court of Appeals, Sixth Circuit, 1975.
516 F.2d 565.

■ CELEBREZZE, CIRCUIT JUDGE.

* * *

A thirty-nine-year-old native and citizen of Mexico, Petitioner has resided in the United States since December 18, 1967, when he was admitted for permanent residence. He is a married farm worker, living with his wife and three daughters in Saginaw, Michigan.

In December 1971, Petitioner traveled to Mexico for a vacation. An officer of the Saginaw, Michigan Police Department notified federal customs officers at the Mexican border that he had reason to believe that Petitioner would be returning with a quantity of heroin. When Petitioner crossed the border on his return, he was subjected to a search which produced no heroin but did reveal two grams of cocaine.

On April 12, 1972, Petitioner pleaded guilty in the United States District Court for the Western District of Texas, on one count of knowingly possessing a quantity of cocaine, a Schedule II controlled substance, in violation of 21 USC § 844(a) (1970). Petitioner received a suspended one-year sentence, was placed on probation for five years, and was fined $3,000, to be paid in fifty-dollar monthly installments over the five-year probationary period. Neither Petitioner's appointed counsel nor the District Court informed him that a narcotics conviction would almost certainly lead to his deportation.

On December 7, 1972, the Immigration and Naturalization Service issued an Order to Show Cause and Notice of Hearing, charging that because of his narcotics conviction, Petitioner should be deported under section 241(a)(11)¹³ of the Immigration and Nationality Act.

On February 6, 1973 Petitioner appeared before the Immigration Judge and requested appointed counsel. The Immigration Judge refused this request. After a hearing Petitioner was ordered deported and was not afforded the option of voluntary departure.

Shortly after the Immigration Judge's ruling, Petitioner engaged as counsel a Michigan legal assistance attorney, who in turn secured the services of a Texas attorney.

On February 14, 1973, Petitioner filed an appeal to the Board of Immigration Appeals, stating that the validity of the Texas conviction was being challenged.

On May 23, 1973, Petitioner's Texas counsel filed a motion to withdraw his guilty plea under Rule 32(d), F.R.Crim.P. The motion asserted that the District Court had not followed Rule 11 in accepting the plea because it had not properly determined that there was a factual basis for the plea and that the plea was made with a full understanding of the probable consequences.

On February 1, 1974, after full briefing and oral argument by counsel for Petitioner and the Government, the Board of Immigration Appeals dismissed Petitioner's appeal. A petition for review was timely filed in this Court.

The issue Petitioner raises here is whether an indigent alien has the right to appointed counsel in a deportation proceeding. He attacks the constitutional validity of INA § 242(b)(2),¹⁴ which gives an alien facing deportation proceedings "the privilege of being represented (at no expense to the Government) by such counsel, authorized to practice in such proceedings, as he shall choose." The Immigration Judge held that this section prevented appointment of counsel at Government expense. Since he could not afford to hire a lawyer, he did not have one before the Immigration Judge.

* * *

[The court here observes that noncitizens in deportation proceedings are protected by procedural due process—Eds.]

The test for whether due process requires the appointment of counsel for an indigent alien is whether, in a given case, the assistance of counsel

13. Now INA § 237(a)(2)(B)(i).—Eds.

14. Now INA § 240(b)(4)(A)—Eds.

would be necessary to provide “fundamental fairness—the touchstone of due process.” Gagnon v. Scarpelli, 411 U.S. 778, 790, 93 S.Ct. 1756, 1763, 36 L.Ed.2d 656 (1973).¹⁵

In Petitioner’s case the absence of counsel at his hearing before the Immigration Judge did not deprive his deportation proceeding of fundamental fairness.

Petitioner was held to be deportable under section 241(a)(11) of the Immigration and Nationality Act, which states in relevant part:

(a) Any alien in the United States . . . shall, upon the order of the Attorney General, be deported who— . . .

(11) . . . at any time has been convicted of a violation of . . . any law or regulation relating to the illicit possession of or traffic in narcotic drugs . . .

Before the Immigration Judge, Petitioner raised no defense to the charge that he had been convicted in April 1972 of a violation of 21 USC § 844(a). Thus, he was clearly within the purview of section 241(a)(11) of the Act, and no defense for which a lawyer would have helped the argument was presented to the Immigration Judge for consideration. After the decision of the Immigration Judge, Petitioner moved to withdraw his guilty plea in the Texas District Court under Rule 32(d), F.R.Crim.P. He then urged before the Board of Immigration Appeals that this motion took him outside the reach of section 241(a)(11), because the likelihood of success on that motion meant that he had not been “convicted” of a narcotics offense. He was effectively represented by counsel before the Board, and his argument was considered upon briefing and oral argument. The lack of counsel before the Immigration Judge did not prevent full administrative consideration of his argument. Counsel could have obtained no different administrative result. “Fundamental fairness,” therefore, was not abridged during the administrative proceedings, and the order of deportation is not subject to constitutional attack for a lack of due process. * * *

* * *

The petition for review is denied.

■ DEMASCIO, DISTRICT JUDGE (dissenting).

A deportation proceeding so jeopardizes a resident alien’s basic and fundamental right to personal liberty that I cannot agree due process is

15. [Footnote 3 in original] The Supreme Court’s holdings in Gagnon, Morrissey v. Brewer, 408 U.S. 471, 92 S.Ct. 2593, 33 L.Ed.2d 484 (1972), and In re Gault, 387 U.S. 1, 87 S.Ct. 1428, 18 L.Ed.2d 527 (1967), have undermined the position that counsel must be provided to indigents only in criminal proceedings. Decisions * * * which contain dictum appearing to set forth a per se rule against providing counsel to indigent aliens facing deportation rested largely on the outmoded distinction between criminal cases (where the Sixth Amendment guarantees indigents appointed counsel) and civil proceedings (where the Fifth Amendment applies). Where an unrepresented indigent alien would require counsel to present his position adequately to an immigration judge, he must be provided with a lawyer at the Government’s expense. Otherwise, “fundamental fairness” would be violated.

guaranteed by a "fundamental fairness" analysis on a case-by-case basis. Gagnon v. Scarpelli, 411 U.S. 778, 93 S.Ct. 1756, 36 L.Ed.2d 656 (1973). I think a resident alien has an unqualified right to the appointment of counsel. When the government, with plenary power to exclude, agrees to allow an alien lawful residence, it is unconscionable for the government to unilaterally terminate that agreement without affording an indigent resident alien assistance of appointed counsel. Expulsion is such lasting punishment that meaningful due process can require no less. Assuredly, it inflicts punishment as grave as the institutionalization which may follow an In re Gault finding of delinquency. A resident alien's right to due process should not be tempered by a classification of the deportation proceeding as "civil," "criminal," or "administrative." No matter the classification, deportation is punishment, pure and simple.

In Gagnon, the Supreme Court acknowledged that it was affording parolees and probationers less due process than it afforded juveniles in In re Gault. It reached this result because a parolee or probationer is in that position solely because he was previously convicted of a crime. The court reasoned that parolees and probationers should be required to demonstrate that an attorney would serve a useful purpose prior to compelling the government to provide counsel at government expense. But, in a deportation proceeding, the respondent need not necessarily be before the immigration judge because of a prior conviction.¹⁶ The fact of conviction is only one of numerous grounds for deportation outlined in the statute. Similar to the juvenile, an alien may only stand accused of an offense.

As noted in Gagnon, the function of the probation or parole officer is not to "compel conformance to a strict code of behavior" but to "supervise a course of rehabilitation." Insertion of counsel into such a "predictive and discretionary" proceeding could inadvertently circumscribe the officer's flexibility. However, no such justification for the exclusion of counsel exists in deportation proceedings where the sole duty of the immigration law judge is to determine whether a deportable offense has occurred.

Further, a probation revocation hearing is a non-adversary proceeding. The government is not represented by a prosecutor. There are no procedural rights which may be lost as in a criminal trial. A deportation hearing on the other hand is always an adversary proceeding. Gagnon does not go so far as to hold that in adversary proceedings due process may be afforded on a case-by-case basis by retrospective determination that the hearing was characterized by "fundamental fairness."

The court today has fashioned a test to resolve whether a resident alien's due-process right requires appointment of counsel. That test is whether "... in a given case, the assistance of counsel would be necessary to provide 'fundamental fairness—the touchstone of due process.'" Gag-

16. [Footnote 1 in original] If the court wishes to extend Gagnon, perhaps a better approach is to limit the case-by-case appointment of counsel to proceedings where respondent is being deported because he has a previous conviction and is, therefore, entitled to less due process. In all other instances, counsel should be appointed as a matter of right under the due process clause. * * *

non. The majority concludes that lack of counsel before the immigration judge did not prevent full consideration of petitioner's sole argument and no different result would have been obtained had counsel been appointed. Accordingly, the court holds the hearing was fundamentally fair. These conclusions are reached by second guessing the record—a record made without petitioner's meaningful participation.

In my view, the absence of counsel at respondent's hearing before the immigration judge inherently denied him fundamental fairness. Moreover, I do not believe that we should make the initial determination that counsel is unnecessary; or that lack of counsel did not prevent full administrative consideration of petitioner's argument; or that counsel could not have obtained a different administrative result. We should not speculate at this stage what contentions appointed counsel could have raised before the immigration judge. For example, a lawyer may well have contended that § 241(a)(11) is an unconstitutional deprivation of the equal protection of the laws by arguing that alienage was the sole basis for the infliction of punishment, additional to that imposed by criminal law; that since the government elected to rely upon the criminal law sanctions, it may not now additionally exile petitioner without demonstrating a compelling governmental interest.

I do not intend to imply such a contention has validity. I cite this only to emphasize the danger of attempting to speculate at this stage whether counsel could have obtained a different result and to show that it is possible that the immigration judge did not fully consider all of petitioner's arguments.

Because the consequences of a deportation proceeding parallel punishment for crime, only a per se rule requiring appointment of counsel will assure a resident alien due process of law. In this case, the respondent, a resident alien for seven years, committed a criminal offense. Our laws require that he be punished and he was. Now, he must face additional punishment in the form of banishment. He will be deprived of the life, liberty, and pursuit of happiness he enjoyed by governmental consent.¹⁷ It may be proper that he be compelled to face the consequences of such a proceeding. But, when he does, he should have a lawyer at his side and one at government expense, if necessary. When the government consents to grant an alien residency, it cannot constitutionally expel unless and until it affords that alien due process. Our country's constitutional dedication to freedom is thwarted by a watered-down version of due process on a case-by-case basis.

I would reverse and remand for the appointment of counsel before the immigration judge.

17. [Footnote 6 in original] Of course, what I have said applies only to a resident alien. * * *

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. In the landmark case of Gideon v. Wainwright, 372 U.S. 335, 83 S.Ct. 792, 9 L.Ed.2d 799 (1963), the Supreme Court held that the Constitution requires the states to provide counsel to indigent defendants in all criminal cases (not just capital cases, as had previously been held). The Sixth Amendment right to counsel had earlier been interpreted to require appointed counsel for all indigent federal criminal defendants, but in Gideon the Court, overruling a prior decision, extended this obligation to the states by incorporating the Sixth Amendment right to counsel into Fourteenth Amendment due process.

Since the Sixth Amendment right to counsel covers only criminal proceedings, however, it has no applicability to removal, which as you have seen is classified as a “civil” proceeding. See, e.g., United States v. Campos-Asencio, 822 F.2d 506, 509 (5th Cir.1987). On the other hand, all noncitizens whom the government seeks to expel—even those who have not been lawfully admitted—are protected by fifth amendment due process. See generally Developments in the Law, Immigration Policy and the Rights of Aliens, 96 Harvard L.Rev. 1286, 1384–95 (1983). The question on which the majority and dissent in Aguilera-Enriquez differ concerns the content of due process. In deportation (now removal) cases, does due process always require the provision of assigned counsel to indigent noncitizens (or at least those who are LPRs), or does the need for assigned counsel depend on the facts of the individual case? On that issue, the majority opinion in Aguilera-Enriquez accords with the decisions of other courts.¹⁸

2. You earlier encountered Mathews v. Eldridge, 424 U.S. 319, 96 S.Ct. 893, 47 L.Ed.2d 18 (1976), in which the Supreme Court identified three factors to be weighed in determining whether due process requires a given procedural element—the private interest at stake, the probable value of the particular procedural element in reducing the risk of an erroneous deprivation of the private interest, and the government’s interest in dispensing with the procedural element in question. Id. at 335. See page 144 above. The nature and magnitude of the private interests at stake in removal proceedings range widely. What variables do you think a court that adopts either a case-by-case approach or a categorical approach should take into account when evaluating the importance of the private interests in the removal context?

3. The government’s interest in not providing assigned counsel is also difficult to quantify. The principal benefit is obviously the economic savings, and that amount is not easy to gauge. In his dissent, Judge DeMascio observes that the Supreme Court in Gagnon had focused on an additional concern: “Insertion of counsel into * * * a ‘predictive and discretionary’ [probation or parole revocation] proceeding could inadvertently circumscribe the officer’s flexibility.” Judge DeMascio then concludes that no analogous justification for excluding counsel exists in deportation proceedings, "where the sole duty of the immigration law judge [sic] is to determine whether a deportable offense has occurred." First, do you agree with the Supreme Court in Gagnon that introducing counsel into a "predictive and discretionary" proceeding could circumscribe the flexibility of the decisionmaker? Second, now that you have studied chapters 7 and 8, do you accept Judge DeMascio's characterization of the IJ's function in removal proceedings? Can probation revocation proceedings really be distinguished from removal proceedings on the basis of their discretionary components?

18. See, e.g., Magallanes-Damian v. United States ex rel. Castro-Louzan v. Zimmerman, 783 F.2d 931, 933 (9th Cir.1986); United States ex rel. Castro-Louzan v. Zimmerman, 94 F.Supp. 22, 25–26 (E.D.Pa.1950).

4. The Eldridge factor that seems to provoke the greatest difference of opinion in Aguilera-Enriquez is the value of counsel in helping to avoid erroneous results. What, precisely, can counsel accomplish in removal cases?

5. As is evident from the two opinions in this case, the Supreme Court has held that in certain types of civil proceedings due process automatically requires the provision of assigned counsel to indigent parties, e.g., Gault (juvenile delinquency proceedings), whereas in certain other types of civil proceedings the constitutional necessity to assign counsel is ascertained on a case-by-case basis, e.g., Gagnon (revocation of probation); Morrissey v. Brewer (revocation of parole). What factors should determine on which side of the line a given type of civil proceeding belongs?

6. Commentators have generally supported a requirement of assigned counsel in at least certain deportation cases, though they have differed as to where and how the line should be drawn.¹⁹

7. Judge DeMascio, objecting to the majority's case-by-case approach, questions whether a reviewing court can ever accurately determine what the record would have contained had there been counsel. Note, however, that Aguilera-Enriquez in fact had counsel at the BIA stage and the judicial review stage. By the time of the court's decision, couldn't counsel have done whatever factual investigation and legal research he or she would have done before or during the original hearing? If counsel even now has neither unearthed relevant evidence nor discovered legal authority that might have altered the decision below, then what would be the point of reversing for lack of counsel? To put the question another way, what is wrong with a prejudice requirement? (In answering this question, think also about the dual function of an appellate opinion—correcting errors of law that affect the parties to the litigation, and providing guidance for the future.)

8. Apart from the question of appointed counsel, courts have invalidated deportation orders when noncitizens' waivers of their statutory right to counsel (not at government expense) were not knowing and voluntary.²⁰

19. The most exhaustive treatment of the subject is Robert N. Black, Due Process and Deportation—Is there a Right to Assigned Counsel?, 8 U.C. Davis L.Rev. 289 (1975); see also Irving A. Appleman, Right to Counsel in Deportation Proceedings, 14 San Diego L.Rev. 130 (1976) (former BIA member makes effective argument for case-by-case approach).

20. See, e.g., Castro-O'Ryan v. United States INS, 847 F.2d 1307 (9th Cir.1987) (reversing on statutory grounds); Reyes-Pa-

ii. Legal Aid

As noted earlier, the immigration judge must “advise the respondent of the availability of free legal services * * *.” 8 CFR § 1240.10(a)(2) (2008). The usefulness of that advice was curtailed in 1982. In that year Congress included in the Legal Services Corporation (LSC) appropriations bill a provision that prohibited LSC grantees (legal aid organizations) from using LSC funds to provide legal assistance to most categories of noncitizens. The only noncitizens eligible for legal assistance under that 1982 legislation (assuming they met the financial guidelines) were (a) LPRs; (b) those who possess specified relationships to United States citizens, have already applied for adjustment of status, and have not yet been rejected; (c) those who have already been granted refugee or asylum status; Pub.L. 97-377, 96 Stat. 1830, 1874-75 (Dec. 21, 1982); and, now, certain battered spouses and children, 45 CFR § 1626.4 (2007). See generally Robert L. Bach, Building Community among Diversity: Legal Services for Impoverished Immigrants, 27 Univ. Michigan J. Law Reform 639, 641-45 (1994) (describing immigrants’ access to legal services). Exceptionally, since 1986, LSC funds have been available to H-2A nonimmigrants (see chapter 4, § A.3.b above), but only for certain housing, transportation, and employment matters, not for immigration matters.²¹

Until 1996, organizations that received LSC funds could at least represent otherwise ineligible noncitizens as long as “all costs of such representation, including staff time, are funded from non-Corporation [i.e. non-LSC] sources.” 45 CFR § 1626.3(b)(iii) (1996). In 1996, Congress eliminated even that possibility. The Omnibus Consolidated Rescissions and Appropriations Act of 1996, Pub.L. 104-134, 110 Stat. 1321, § 504(a), prohibited the grant of LSC funds “to any person or entity . . . (11) that provides legal assistance for or on behalf of any alien, unless the alien is present in the United States” and is within one of the eligible categories described above (LPR, etc.). See generally 45 CFR § 1626 (2007). The practical effect is to prevent LSC grantees from representing almost all noncitizens in removal proceedings, even if they use funding that private donors specifically earmarked for that purpose.

Because the overwhelming majority of noncitizens in removal hearings are within the ineligible categories, the combined impact of the various statutory restrictions is huge. There are, however, some outs. At least some noncitizens in removal proceedings are within the exempted categories. Some of those who are not might be able to secure assistance from community service organizations that receive no LSC funding. And some agencies that formerly used independent funds to represent indigent noncitizens have split off their immigration units into separate legal entities that do not receive LSC funds.

lacios v. United States INS, 836 F.2d 1154 (9th Cir.1988) (reversing on due process grounds).

21. Pub.L. 99-603 (IRCA), § 305, 100 Stat. 3359, 3434 (Nov. 6, 1986); 45 CFR § 1626.11 (2004). See generally Legal Services Corporation, The Erlenborn Commission Report, 15 Georgetown Immigration L.J. 99 (2001).

iii. Pro Bono Legal Services

Bar Associations often maintain referral services that provide the names of attorneys who have volunteered to take removal cases pro bono. One of the most impressive pro bono projects has been ProBAR, a joint effort of the American Bar Association, the State Bar of Texas, and the American Immigration Lawyers Association. ProBAR relies on lawyers and law students who donate time to represent indigent noncitizens in South Texas. See also Irene Scharf, Nourishing Justice and the Continuum: Implementing a Blended Model in an Immigration Law Clinic, 12 Clinical L. Rev. 243 (2005) (describing an innovative immigration law clinic).

In recent years, however, pro bono representation has become more elusive for noncitizens in removal proceedings. DHS now relies more heavily on large detention centers generally located in remote areas where local attorneys are few in number. In theory attorneys from other locations could travel to the detention centers to assist pro bono, and in fact some do. Realistically, however, the time costs are prohibitive for even the most public-spirited members of the Bar.²²

The Anti-Drug Abuse Act of 1988 mandated special procedures to expedite the removal of noncitizens who have been convicted of “aggravated felonies.” These procedures have since been extended to other crime-related deportability grounds. See section D.2 below. One method for speeding removal in these cases is to hold removal hearings at prison facilities, while the subjects are still serving their criminal sentences. The Office of the Chief Immigration Judge has encouraged immigration lawyers to assist the prisoners on a pro bono basis, but the prisons at which the hearings are held lie in such remote areas that, again, the costs to the best intentioned lawyers are often prohibitive. Professor Dina Francesca Haynes elaborates:

1. Representing detained clients can be extremely difficult. ICE and the detention center (or prison) wardens with whom they contract often operate according to their own set of rules about visitation, etc., making it almost prohibitively difficult for attorneys to interact with clients and prepare cases.

(a) For instance, often the detainees are not only far away, but detention center captains sometimes change their minds after attorneys or other potential (and pro bono) experts witnesses have driven hours to get to the detention facility, about when it is appropriate to visit, and under what terms students can be admitted (in the case of clinical pro bono representation).

22. See Won Kidane, The Challenges of Representing Detained Noncitizens in Expedited Removal Proceedings from the Perspective of the Dickinson School of Law Immigration Clinic, 17 Widener L.J. 391 (2008). The problems are particularly acute in asylum cases and are well described in Margaret H. Taylor, Promoting Legal Representation for Detained Aliens: Litigation and Administrative Reform, 29 Connecticut L. Rev. 1647 (1997). EOIR is trying to encourage broader pro bono representation of detainees. See Christina DeConcini & Molly McKenna, BIA Pro Bono Project: Representing Detained Migrants Before the BIA and Uncovering Government Obstacles to Pro Se Detainees Appealing their Cases, 6 BIB 809 (Aug. 15, 2001).

(b) Other times ICE moves the client while attorneys and representatives are en route on long drives to the detention centers. (I thought this might be a fluke, but it has happened more than once, even though we were required to give notice in advance to the captain of the detention center that we were coming and seek his prior approval for the visit).

2. In court, IJ's have demanded to know why the applicant did not present, for instance, a medical evaluation as evidence of torture or FGM, and do not appear to understand, even upon explanation, the nature of pro bono representation of detainees. It is virtually impossible to find, for instance, a medical professional willing and able to drive a total of 8 hours to request (and then possibly be denied) permission to enter the detention facility, in order to do a pro bono examination of a client being detained in a prison, not to mention doing it for free and while canceling all other clients for that day.

3. Finally, and I sincerely hope this has not happened elsewhere, but my students and I have twice been threatened by ICE counsel with charges of "obstruction of justice," for straightforward competent lawyering—once for refusing to drive our client back to the detention center at the request of the ICE attorney, when the ICE attorney stated that ICE had "mistakenly released" the client (because even though he had been granted asylum, the ICE attorney wanted to appeal that grant); and once when my student asked the ICE detention officer (who entered the courtroom, armed, to arrest the client) where he was taking our client who was scheduled for a merits hearing.

These sorts of practices, at the very least, make even the most energetic pro bono attorney feel worn down, and do nothing at all to encourage law students to take up immigration law practice, let alone do it pro bono. They certainly would not motivate pro bono lawyers to represent detained clients.

Dina Francesca Haynes, E-mail to Stephen H. Legomsky (Feb. 25, 2009).

There have been some innovative responses. The Florence Immigrant Rights Project in Arizona, with the cooperation of both the former INS and the EOIR, has gone into the prisons and given group presentations in advance of removal hearings. See Christopher Nugent, Strengthening Access to Justice: Prehearing Rights Presentations for Detained Respondents, 76 IR 1077 (July 19, 1999). Programs in which lawyers and clients collaborate to effect more systemic change through a combination of legal and political channels have also been successful. See, e.g., Bill Ong Hing, Legal Services Support Centers and Rebellious Advocacy: A Case Study of the Immigrant Legal Resource Center, 28 Washington Univ. J. L. & Policy 265 (2008).

iv. Equal Access to Justice Act

The Equal Access to Justice Act (EAJA), 5 USC § 504 and 28 USC § 2412, allows the prevailing parties in certain adversarial proceedings to recover attorney fees from the Government. The relevant statutory language reads as follows: “[A]n agency that conducts an adversary adjudication shall award, to a prevailing party other than the United States, fees and other expenses incurred by that party in connection with that proceeding, unless the adjudicative officer of the agency finds that the position of the agency was substantially justified or that special circumstances make an award unjust.” 5 USC § 504(a)(1).

In Ardestani v. INS, 502 U.S. 129, 112 S.Ct. 515, 116 L.Ed.2d 496 (1991), however, the Supreme Court held that this definition does not apply to removal (then deportation) proceedings. The statutory analysis is intricate. (For excerpts of the opinion and detailed analysis of the various statutory interpretation arguments, see the 3rd edition of this book, at 667–81.)

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. Statutory interpretation aside, is it good policy to award attorney fees to noncitizens who prevail in removal proceedings, assuming the government’s position was not “substantially justified?” Argue both sides.

2. The provision interpreted in Ardestani provided attorney fees in connection with the administrative agency phase of the adversary adjudication. A separate part of EAJA provides:

Except as otherwise specifically provided by statute, a court shall award to a prevailing party other than the United States fees and other expenses . . . incurred by that party in any civil action (other than cases sounding in tort), including proceedings for judicial review of agency action . . . unless the court finds that the position of the United States was substantially justified or that special circumstances make an award unjust.

28 USC § 2412(d)(1)(A). Under this provision, it is the judicial review phase for which attorney fees are awarded, and the limiting language “adversary adjudication” is absent.

The Court in Ardestani did not decide whether attorney fees may be awarded in connection with the judicial review phase of deportation (now removal) proceedings. The Ninth Circuit had answered that question in the affirmative, in Escobar Ruiz v. INS, 838 F.2d 1020 (9th Cir. en banc 1988), which, as the Supreme Court noted in Ardestani, was the one lower court case that had also held EAJA applicable to the administrative phase of deportation proceedings.²³

23. See generally Kevin R. Johnson, over Immigration, 71 North Carolina L. Rev. 413, 479–87 (1993).
Responding to the Litigation Explosion: The Plain Meaning of Executive Branch Primacy

c. DISCIPLINE OF IMMIGRATION PRACTITIONERS

Attorneys who practice in immigration proceedings are of course subject to all the usual ethical and disciplinary rules established by the jurisdictions in which they are licensed to practice. In addition, all who practice before either DHS or EOIR are subject to special rules, many of which overlap with the ABA Model Rules. These rules apply to all “practitioners,” 8 CFR § 1003.101(b) (2008), defined in id. § 1001.1(f, j) to encompass all of the categories of private individuals authorized by section 1292.1 to practice in immigration proceedings—not just attorneys, but also representatives.

The sanctions for violating the disciplinary rules include permanent expulsion from practice before EOIR, DHS, or both; temporary suspension; public or private censure; or “such other disciplinary sanctions as the adjudicating official or the Board deems appropriate.” Id. § 1003.101(a).

The procedures for disciplining the practitioners who represent the noncitizens are laid out in 8 CFR §§ 1003.101–108 (2008). Any person may file a complaint against a practitioner who is believed to have violated the disciplinary rules. The complaint is filed with the Office of General Counsel of either EOIR or DHS. The Office of General Counsel will conduct the necessary investigation and, if it thinks there is a prima facie case, will issue a “Notice of Intent to Discipline” containing specific allegations. The practitioner has the opportunity to file an answer admitting or denying each allegation and providing any additional information or argument. There will then be a hearing before an immigration judge. Either the government or the practitioner may appeal the decision to the BIA. For further details, see 8 CFR §§ 1003.101–108 (2008).

Note that this procedure applies only to complaints that are filed against private practitioners. Complaints against Justice Department attorneys (including immigration judges and BIA members) are filed with the Department’s Office of Professional Responsibility and processed under an entirely separate procedure. See id. § 1003.109.

The grounds for the discipline of immigration practitioners were expanded in 2008, in some instances by adding language that tracks that of the ABA Model Rules. See 73 Fed. Reg. 76914 (Dec. 18, 2008). At this writing, they read as follows:

8 CFR § 1003.102 (2008)

It is deemed to be in the public interest for an adjudicating official or the Board to impose disciplinary sanctions against any practitioner who falls within one or more of the categories enumerated in this section, but these categories do not constitute the exclusive grounds for which the disciplinary sanctions may be imposed in the public interest. Nothing in this regulation should be read to denigrate the practitioners’s duty to represent zealously his or her client within the bounds of the law. A practitioner who falls within one of the following categories shall be subject to disciplinary sanctions in the public interest if he or she:

(a) Charges or receives, either directly or indirectly:

(1) In the case of an attorney, any fee or compensation for specific services rendered for any person that shall be deemed to be grossly excessive. * * *

(2) In the case of an accredited representative * * *, any fee or compensation for specific services rendered for any person, except that an accredited representative may be regularly compensated by the organization of which he or she is an accredited representative, or

(3) In the case of a law student or law graduate * * *, any fee or compensation for specific services rendered for any person, except that a law student or law graduate may be regularly compensated by the organization or firm with which he or she is associated as long as he or she is appearing without direct or indirect remuneration from the client he or she represents;

(b) Bribes, attempts to bribe, coerces, or attempts to coerce, by any means whatsoever, any person * * * to commit an act or to refrain from performing any act in connection with any case;

(c) Knowingly or with reckless disregard makes a false statement of material fact or law, or willfully misleads, misinforms, threatens, or deceives any person * * * concerning any material and relevant matter relating to a case * * *;

(d) Solicits professional employment through in-person or live telephone contact or through the use of runners, from a prospective client with whom the practitioner has no family or prior professional relationship, when a significant motive for the practitioner's doing so is the practitioner's pecuniary gain * * *;

(e) Is subject to a final order of disbarment or suspension, or has resigned while a disciplinary investigation or proceeding is pending; * * *.

(f) Knowingly or with reckless disregard makes a false or misleading communication about his or her qualifications or services. * * * A practitioner shall not state or imply that he or she has been recognized or certified as a specialist in immigration and/or nationality law unless such certification is granted by the appropriate state regulatory authority or by an organization that has been approved by the appropriate state regulatory authority to grant such certification;

(g) Engages in contumelious or otherwise obnoxious conduct, in regard to a case in which he or she acts in a representative capacity, which would constitute contempt of court in a judicial proceeding;

(h) Has been found guilty of, or pleaded guilty or nolo contendere to, a serious crime [defined];

(i) Knowingly or with reckless disregard falsely certifies a copy of a document as being a true and complete copy of an original;

(j) Engages in frivolous behavior in a proceeding before an Immigration Court, the Board, or any other administrative appellate body under title II of the Immigration and Nationality Act, provided:

(1) A practitioner engages in frivolous behavior when he or she knows or reasonably should have known that his or her actions lack an arguable basis in law or in fact, or are taken for an improper purpose, such as to harass or to cause unnecessary delay. Actions that, if taken improperly, may be subject to disciplinary sanctions include, but are not limited to, the making of an argument on any factual or legal question, the submission of an application for discretionary relief, the filing of a motion, or the filing of an appeal. The signature of a practitioner on any filing, application, motion, appeal, brief, or other document constitutes certification by the signer that the signer has read the filing, application, motion, appeal, brief, or other document and that, to the best of the signer's knowledge, information, and belief, formed after inquiry reasonable under the circumstances, the document is well grounded in fact, is warranted by existing law or by a good faith argument for the extension, modification, or reversal of existing law or the establishment of new law, and is not interposed for any improper purpose. * * *.

(k) Engages in conduct that constitutes ineffective assistance of counsel, as previously determined in a finding by the Board, an immigration judge in an immigration proceeding, or a Federal court judge or panel, and a disciplinary complaint is filed within one year of the finding;

(l) Repeatedly fails to appear for pre-hearing conferences, scheduled hearings, or case-related meetings in a timely manner without good cause; or

(m) Assists any person, other than a practitioner * * *, in the performance of activity that constitutes the unauthorized practice of law. * * *

(n) Engages in conduct that is prejudicial to the administration of justice or undermines the integrity of the adjudicative process. [This includes] any action or inaction that seriously impairs or interferes with the adjudicative process when the practitioner should have reasonably known to avoid such conduct;

(o) Fails to provide competent representation to a client. Competent representation requires the legal knowledge, skill, thoroughness, and preparation reasonably necessary for the representation. * * *;

(p) Fails to abide by a client's decisions concerning the objectives of representation and fails to consult with the client as to the means by which they are to be pursued * * *. A practitioner may take such action on behalf of the client as is impliedly authorized to carry out the representation;

(q) Fails to act with reasonable diligence and promptness in representing a client.

(1) A practitioner's workload must be controlled and managed so that each matter can be handled competently.

(2) A practitioner has the duty to act with reasonable promptness. This duty includes, but shall not be limited to, complying with all time and filing limitations. * * *

(3) A practitioner should carry through to conclusion all matters undertaken for a client, consistent with the scope of representation as previously determined by the client and practitioner, unless the client terminates the relationship or the practitioner obtains permission to withdraw * * *. If a practitioner has handled a proceeding that produced a result adverse to the client and the practitioner and the client have not agreed that the practitioner will handle the matter on appeal, the practitioner must consult with the client about the client's appeal rights and the terms and conditions of possible representation on appeal;

(r) Fails to maintain communication with the client throughout the duration of the client-practitioner relationship. It is the obligation of the practitioner to take reasonable steps to communicate with the client in a language that the client understands. * * *;

(s) Fails to disclose to the adjudicator legal authority in the controlling jurisdiction known to the practitioner to be directly adverse to the position of the client and not disclosed by opposing counsel;

(t) Fails to submit a signed and completed Notice of Entry of Appearance as Attorney or Representative * * * when the practitioner:

(1) Has engaged in practice or preparation * * *, and

(2) Has been deemed to have engaged in a pattern or practice of failing to submit such forms * * * or;

(u) Repeatedly files notices, motions, briefs, or claims that reflect little or no attention to the specific factual or legal issues applicable to a client's case, but rather rely on boilerplate language indicative of a substantial failure to competently and diligently represent the client.

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. Paragraph (j) defines "frivolous behavior" and makes it a ground for discipline. Would you change this provision?

2. Although paragraph (j) penalizes the making of frivolous arguments, until 2000 no provision addressed the opposite problem—the practitioner who failed to provide zealous representation. What if the practitioner fails to show up at the removal hearing, or never gets around to filing the appropriate applications for discretionary relief or files them late, or neglects to file a notice of appeal to the BIA on time? What if the practitioner doesn't take the time to do reasonable research, or to raise reasonable issues, or to make reasonable arguments? Should those failings similarly be grounds for discipline?

Paragraphs k, o, q, r, and u now address this issue. Paragraph k disciplines any practitioner who “[e]ngages in conduct that constitutes ineffective assistance of counsel, as previously determined in a finding by the Board, an immigration judge in an immigration proceeding, or a Federal court judge or panel,” provided the complaint is filed within one year of the finding of ineffective assistance. The Department’s expressed concern about the prior absence of such a disciplinary ground was that a noncitizen could move to reopen removal proceedings on the basis of ineffective assistance of counsel, and the counsel in question could then admit having been ineffective without incurring any consequences. 63 Fed. Reg. 2901, 2902 (Jan. 20, 1998) (proposed rules). The objective of the amendment was to discourage the filing of motions to reopen based on alleged ineffective assistance—not simply to deter or sanction ineffective representation. First, why do you suppose that until 2000 the Justice Department punished frivolous arguments but not ineffective assistance? Second, do you see any dangers in disciplining immigration practitioners for ineffective assistance?

3. As you will see in the next subsection, ineffective assistance of counsel will not usually be a basis for withdrawing a guilty plea in criminal proceedings or for reopening a removal proceeding unless the ineffectiveness prejudiced the client. In a disciplinary proceeding against a practitioner for alleged ineffective assistance of counsel, should the government similarly be required to prove prejudice?

4. During the notice and comment period for a previous revision, the ABA objected to the entire structure of the proposed rules. As you will recall, it is the ABA whose Model Code or Model Rules are in place in the 50 states. The ABA position was that, since lawyers are already subject to state ethical rules, additional Justice Department rules are unnecessary, except for nonlawyer representatives. Instead, the ABA argued, complaints about lawyer misconduct in immigration cases should simply be referred to the appropriate state authorities. In particular, the ABA objected that the same federal agency that is lodging the complaint would be investigating the lawyer who is opposing it—a recipe for unfair prosecution. At any rate, the ABA felt, the procedures for government lawyers should be the same as those for private lawyers. See letter from then ABA President Robert D. Evans to Ms. Margaret M. Philbin, then EOIR General Counsel (Mar. 23, 1998).

What is your reaction to the whole concept of adding a separate set of disciplinary rules just for immigration practitioners? Do you agree with the Justice Department that the additional rules are useful, or do you agree with the ABA that they are unnecessary and even undesirable?²⁴

24. For more thorough descriptions of the various sources of ethical duties owed by lawyers in immigration cases, see David Weissbrodt & Laura Danielson, Immigration Law and Procedure in a Nutshell, ch. 15 (5th

ed. 2005) (concerned principally with ABA Model Code and Model Rules); Bruce A. Hake, “Attorney Misconduct”—A Rebuttal, 4 Georgetown Immigration L.J. 727 (1990).

d. INEFFECTIVE ASSISTANCE OF COUNSEL

You now have a sense of who is allowed to represent noncitizens in removal proceedings, the special challenges for the indigent in obtaining the services of eligible practitioners, and the relevant ethical constraints. Access to authorized counsel is of little use, however, when counsel is ineffective. Ineffectiveness of counsel is a ground for discipline, as you have seen, and hopefully the disciplinary rules have a beneficial deterrent effect, but they don't help the client once he or she has already been harmed. Other law is necessary to do that. In immigration, as in other fields, a body of rules has developed to define what constitutes ineffective assistance of counsel and to formulate remedies and procedures.

There are two common ways in which the ineffectiveness issue arises in removal cases. In one setting, the removal charge hinges on the person's criminal conviction and the person seeks to vacate the underlying conviction on the ground that his or her counsel was ineffective during those criminal proceedings. In the other common setting, the claim is that counsel was ineffective in the removal proceeding itself.

People v. Pozo

Supreme Court of Colorado, 1987.
746 P.2d 523.

■ KIRSHBAUM, JUSTICE.

* * *

I

Pozo, an alien legally residing in the United States, came to this country from Cuba in April 1980. In October 1982, pursuant to a plea agreement, Pozo entered pleas of guilty to second degree sexual assault and to escape. Pozo received a sentence to the Department of Corrections of two years for the escape conviction and a consecutive sentence of two years and six months for the sexual assault conviction. In May 1983, after a detainer was filed against him by the Immigration and Naturalization Service, Pozo filed motions to vacate the judgments of conviction under Crim.P. 35(c). He asserted * * * that he did not receive effective assistance of counsel because his trial counsel did not advise him of the possible deportation consequences of his guilty pleas.

A hearing on these motions was held in June 1983. Pozo testified through an interpreter that in October 1982 he had not been aware of any possible deportation consequences of his guilty pleas and that he would not have entered such pleas had he been aware of those consequences. An affidavit signed by Pozo's trial counsel, stating that he had not discussed the possible deportation consequences of the guilty pleas with Pozo, was introduced into evidence. The trial court found that prior to entering the guilty pleas Pozo had not discussed deportation consequences with his trial counsel or any other counsel and was not aware of such consequences.

However, the trial court concluded that Pozo had been represented by competent and effective counsel. The Court of Appeals concluded that Pozo had been denied effective assistance of counsel, reversed the trial court's ruling and remanded the case to the trial court with directions to reinstate the original charges and allow Pozo to plead anew.

II

* * *

In Hill v. Lockhart, the Supreme Court applied the two-part test of Strickland v. Washington to a sixth amendment claim of ineffective assistance of counsel in connection with the entry of a guilty plea. Under Strickland, a defendant claiming a violation of the constitutional right to representation by competent counsel must show that his attorney's performance fell below an objective standard of reasonableness and that the deficient performance resulted in prejudice to the defendant. * * *

It is well settled that a trial court is not required to advise a defendant sua sponte of potential federal deportation consequences of a plea of guilty to a felony charge when accepting such plea. This rule is grounded in the notion that in accepting a plea of guilty a trial court is not required to ascertain the defendant's knowledge or understanding of collateral consequences of the conviction. The trial court is required to advise the defendant only of the direct consequences of the conviction to satisfy the due process concerns that a plea be made knowingly and with full understanding of the consequences thereof.

Sixth amendment constitutional standards requiring effective assistance of counsel involve examination of quite different considerations, however. One who relies on the advice of a legally trained representative when answering criminal charges is entitled to assume that the attorney will provide sufficiently accurate advice to enable the defendant to fully understand and assess the serious legal proceedings in which he is involved. * * * The duty of counsel is, in essence, the duty to act as any reasonable attorney would act in the same circumstances. Thus, questions regarding the type of conduct or communication required of an attorney representing a client can rarely be answered by abstract concepts. From this perspective, it is not surprising that courts considering the issue of whether defense counsel has a duty to advise alien clients of potential deportation consequences have reached conflicting results. * * *

We are not prepared to state in absolute terms, as did the Court of Appeals, that an attorney has a duty to advise an alien client of the possible deportation consequences of a guilty plea. Nor can we conclude, as the trial court did, that an attorney has no such duty. The general issue framed by Pozo's Crim.P. 35(c) motions was whether he was denied effective assistance of counsel. Whether counsel adequately represented Pozo in view of the lack of advice concerning possible deportation consequences depends initially on whether counsel had a duty to apprise himself of this aspect of immigration law. If no such duty existed, counsel of course had no responsibility to discuss deportation consequences with Pozo. In essence, then, this case presents the question of whether an attorney's failure to research and investigate a particular body of law while representing a client rendered the attorney's assistance constitutionally ineffective. In cases alleging ineffective assistance of counsel, the trial court must judge the reasonableness of the attorney's conduct on the basis of all of the factual circumstances of the particular case, viewed in light of the prevailing standards of minimally acceptable professional conduct as of the time of the challenged conduct. Such inquiry must include an initial determination of whether the body of law was relevant to the circumstances of the client and the matters for which the attorney was retained. The inquiry must also include a determination of whether the attorney had reason to believe that the area of law in question was relevant to the client and the client's legal problems.

[The court here discusses various ways in which the strategy of the criminal defense lawyer can affect the immigration status of the noncitizen client.—Eds.]

* * *

In view of these factors, we conclude that the potential deportation consequences of guilty pleas in criminal proceedings brought against alien defendants are material to critical phases of such proceedings. The determination of whether the failure to investigate those consequences constitutes ineffective assistance of counsel turns to a significant degree upon whether the attorney had sufficient information to form a reasonable belief that the client was in fact an alien. When defense counsel in a criminal case is aware that his client is an alien, he may reasonably be required to investigate relevant immigration law. This duty stems not from a duty to advise specifically of deportation consequences, but rather from the more fundamental principle that attorneys must inform themselves of material legal principles that may significantly impact the particular circumstances of their clients. In cases involving alien criminal defendants, for example, thorough knowledge of fundamental principles of deportation law may have significant impact on a client's decisions concerning plea negotiations and defense strategies.

The record in this case does not establish whether Pozo's counsel had reason to know before the plea was entered that Pozo was an alien. * * * Furthermore, as Strickland indicates, a finding that defense counsel had reason to know of Pozo's alien status and failed to conduct appropriate research would not render the attorney's performance inadequate in the absence of a finding that such conduct resulted in prejudice to Pozo. The trial court made no specific findings concerning the question of prejudice—and again, the trial court is in the best position to evaluate the evidence and the credibility of witnesses with regard to this portion of the Strickland test.²⁵

25. [Footnote 8 in original] In considering whether a defendant who challenges a previously entered guilty plea on the basis of ineffective assistance of counsel has suffered prejudice, trial courts must focus upon whether counsel's conduct affected the out-

Because critical determinations remain to be made before a conclusion concerning Pozo's claim of ineffective assistance of counsel can be made, the judgment of the Court of Appeals must be reversed and the case must be returned to the trial court for further proceedings.

* * *

■ ROVIRA, JUSTICE, dissenting:

I respectfully dissent.

The majority holds today that an attorney's failure to inform his client of the possible deportation consequences of a guilty plea may constitute ineffective assistance of counsel and thus render the plea involuntary. By casting its analysis in terms of the effectiveness of counsel and focusing on the severity of a collateral consequence of a guilty plea, the majority loses sight of the nature of the right at issue. I believe that the defendant's guilty pleas are not constitutionally infirm and would reverse the holding of the court of appeals and affirm the trial court's order.

* * *

There is no contention by Pozo that he did not understand the direct consequences of his plea or that his plea was invalid because of any threat, misrepresentation, or other impropriety. Therefore, he is left with his "but/for argument," i.e., but/for the failure of my lawyer in not advising me that I might be deported if I pleaded guilty, I would not have pleaded guilty.

* * *

Our inquiry should be directed, then, solely to determine whether he understood the direct consequences of his plea. Clearly, as the majority acknowledges, deportation is a collateral consequence of conviction and not a direct consequence.

I agree with the substantial majority of courts that have utilized the collateral/direct consequence distinction to reject the claim that a defendant's ignorance of deportation consequences reflects ineffective assistance of counsel and renders his plea involuntary.

The collateral/direct consequence distinction reflects the nature of the rights a defendant has in pleading guilty. The Supreme Court identified the bases for those rights in the following words:

A defendant who enters such a [guilty] plea simultaneously waives several constitutional rights, including his privilege against compulsory self-incrimination, his right to trial by jury, and his right to confront his accusers. For this waiver to be valid under the Due come of the plea process. Hill v. Lockhart, 474 U.S. 52, 106 S.Ct. 366, 88 L.Ed.2d 203 (1985). In Hill the Supreme Court observed that, "in order to satisfy the [Strickland] prejudice requirement, the defendant must show that there is some reasonable probability that but for counsel's errors, he would not have pleaded guilty and would have insisted on going to trial."

Process Clause, it must be "an intentional relinquishment of a known right or privilege." Consequently, if a defendant's guilty plea is not equally voluntary and knowing, it has been obtained in violation of due process and is therefore void. Moreover, because a guilty plea is an admission of all the elements of a formal criminal charge, it cannot be truly voluntary unless the defendant possesses an understanding of the law in relation to the facts.

In addition, a defendant must understand the penalty the legislature has fixed for the criminal conduct to which he is pleading guilty. Absent such an understanding, the defendant may plead guilty under a misguided expectation—however induced—that his plea will result in some measure of sentencing leniency.

None of those reasons supports the rule the majority adopts today. It cannot be disputed that a defendant may attach substantial importance to some collateral consequences of a guilty plea. We have never before held, however, that the potential importance of a particular collateral consequence may give rise to a constitutional right to be apprised of that consequence by defense counsel. The loss of one's right to vote, exclusion from military service, or other disabilities attached to a felony conviction may be just as harsh a consequence to a citizen defendant as deportation may be to an alien, yet courts have consistently denied that defendants have a constitutional right to be informed of the former collateral consequences.²⁶ The majority opinion focuses on the potential deportation consequences of guilty pleas in criminal proceedings, and thereby opens the door to innumerable challenges to pleas based on the defendant's ignorance of other serious collateral consequences.

* * *

The defendant has never claimed that he did not commit the crimes that he pleaded guilty to. Nothing has been brought to my attention which

26. [Footnote 1 in original] Although deportation has an undeniable impact on a defendant's life, so do other collateral consequences which often flow from a guilty plea. Failure to inform the defendant of the following consequences of his guilty plea has been held not to render the plea invalid. Wright v. United States, 624 F.2d 557, 561 (5th Cir. 1980) (a plea's possible enhancing effects on a subsequent sentence); Moore v. Hinton, 513 F.2d 781 (5th Cir.1975) (suspension of auto license); United States v. Crowley, 529 F.2d 1066, 1072 (3d Cir.), cert. denied, 425 U.S. 995, 96 S.Ct. 2209, 48 L.Ed.2d 820 (1976) (loss of civil service job as result of felony conviction); Cuthrell v. Director, 475 F.2d 1364, 1366 (4th Cir.), cert. denied, 414 U.S. 1005, 94 S.Ct. 362, 38 L.Ed.2d 241 (1973) (institution of separate civil proceedings against defendant for commitment to a mental health facility); Hutchison v. United States, 450 F.2d 930, 931 (10th Cir.1971) (loss of good time credit); Waddy v. Davis, 445 F.2d 1 (5th Cir.1971) (disenfranchisement); United States v. Vermeulen, 436 F.2d 72, 75 (2d Cir.1970), cert. denied, 402 U.S. 911, 91 S.Ct. 1390, 28 L.Ed.2d 653 (1971) (possibility of imposition of consecutive sentences); Meaton v. United States, 328 F.2d 379 (5th Cir.1964), cert. denied, 380 U.S. 916, 85 S.Ct. 902, 13 L.Ed.2d 801 (1965) (deprivation of rights to vote and to travel abroad); United States v. Cariola, 323 F.2d 180 (3d Cir.1963) (deprivation of right to vote in some jurisdictions); Redwine v. Zuckert, 317 F.2d 336 (D.C.Cir.1963) (possibility of undesirable discharge from the armed forces); State v. Riggins, 466 A.2d 981 (N.J.Super.Ct.App.Div.1983) (loss of employment).

gives me reason to question the reliability of defendant's guilty plea as establishing his actual commission of the crimes charged.

An additional problem with the majority opinion is the burden it places on the trial courts to determine whether an attorney whose client is an alien has reasonably investigated relevant immigration law. The majority opinion states that "an examination of the relevant statutes and governing law" is necessary to determine "whether the performance of Pozo's counsel fell below an objective standard of reasonable conduct." * * *

A cursory review of the United States immigration law and the applicable regulations suggests that the trial court will be required to hold an extensive evidentiary hearing in order to determine whether an attorney's performance was "reasonable."

United States immigration law is complex and the regulations and judicial decisions interpreting the law represent a body of knowledge to which some attorneys devote their full time and attention. A public defender or attorney in private practice who represents defendants in criminal cases should not be found to be "ineffective" for failing to advise his client about a body of civil law which is not directly related to the issues involved in a Crim.P. 11 hearing. The majority, by opening the Pandora's box of collateral consequences, has further burdened an overtaxed judicial system. It has also provided defendants who have knowingly, intelligently, and voluntarily entered pleas of guilty an opportunity to withdraw those pleas, sometimes years after witnesses and evidence have been lost, on the ground that "but/for" their attorney's failure to advise of collateral consequences they would not have entered such a plea.

Finally, although the majority acknowledges the unanimous rule that the trial court need not advise the defendant sua sponte of his possible deportation following conviction, that rule is shorn of meaning by the majority's decision today. The majority holds, in effect, that an alien defendant has a constitutional right to know the possible deportation consequences of his guilty plea. To say that it is the duty of defendant's counsel—and not of the trial court—to inform the defendant of those consequences is of little practical effect; a judge who diligently follows the requirements of Crim.P. 11 but does not inquire into the defendant's alienage and knowledge of deportation consequences no longer ensures that the guilty plea he accepts is being made voluntarily. * * *

* * *

I am authorized to say that ERICKSON and VOLLACK, JJ., join in this dissent.

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. Recall United States v. Parrino, excerpted and discussed on pages 553–57 above. There, an LPR pleaded guilty to conspiracy to kidnap. Before entering the plea, he had asked his criminal defense attorney, a former INS commissioner(!), whether a conviction might lead to deportation. Without researching the issue, the attorney had told him it would not—an answer that was clearly wrong. After the conviction, deportation proceedings were instituted and Parrino moved to withdraw his guilty plea. Despite the seemingly glaring incompetence of counsel at the plea stage, Parrino did not ground his motion in a constitutional claim of ineffective assistance of counsel; rather, he argued that the trial judge should have advised him of the deportation consequences before accepting his guilty plea. The court denied his motion, reasoning that deportation (unlike the criminal sentence itself) is merely a collateral consequence of his plea, not a direct one, and that the trial judge need inform the defendant only of the direct consequences. As you also saw, several states now have statutes that expressly require sentencing judges to advise noncitizen defendants of the potential deportation consequences of their guilty pleas.

2. The court in Pozo follows the lead of Hill v. Lockhart. There the Supreme Court applied to guilty pleas the two-part test more generally prescribed by Strickland v. Washington for claims based on ineffective assistance of counsel: The attorney's performance must fall below an objective reasonableness standard, and the defendant must be prejudiced as a result. Consider first the reasonableness requirement. Should it matter whether the facts are (a) the attorney and the defendant simply did not discuss the possible deportation consequences, or (b) the attorney affirmatively misinformed the defendant that a guilty plea would not lead to deportation? The latter cases, sometimes inelegantly called the "misadvice" cases, have historically generated greater judicial sympathy. A well argued student Note has observed that, with the dramatically expanded aggravated felony definition ushered in by IIRIRA and AEDPA, courts are much more frequently finding ineffective assistance of counsel in the misadvice cases. The same Note argues that that development, while welcome, does not go far enough; the Note urges the courts to hold that the failure to advise the noncitizen defendant of the removal consequences of a guilty plea is ineffective assistance of counsel whether the defendant initiated the inquiry or not.²⁷ The Supreme Court has now granted certiorari to decide whether mandatory deportation is a "collateral" consequence of a guilty plea and whether "gross misadvice" of counsel is a ground for withdrawing a guilty plea. See Padilla v. Kentucky, 129 S.Ct. 1317 (2009). What significance, if any, do you think the law should attach to this distinction?

3. What extra ethical obligations, if any, do you think a criminal defense lawyer has when his or her client is a noncitizen? In particular, do you feel that a criminal defense attorney should be expected to know about or discover applicable removal grounds? In answering that question, imagine yourself as a criminal defense lawyer who has never taken a course in immigration law. (Most attorneys have not). Assume you have reason to believe your client is a noncitizen. (The client says so, or the client has difficulty with English or has a foreign accent, etc.) Do you think it would occur to you that a criminal conviction might adversely affect your client's immigration status? Once that thought crossed your mind, what would you do? Forget the whole thing? Refer your client to an immigration specialist? Consult one yourself? Do preliminary immigration research of your own? If you decided to plunge into it yourself, where would you start? Would the research steps you have just identified be likely to lead you to the applicable deportation grounds?²⁸

²⁷. See Rob A. Justman, The Effects of Pleading Guilty to an Aggravated Felony, AEDPA and IIRIRA on Ineffective Assistance of Counsel Claims for Failure to Advise Alien Defendants of Deportation Consequences of 2004 Utah L. Rev. 701, reprinted, 10 BIB 73 (Feb. 1, 2005).

This problem raises a broader question. At one time immigration law was regarded as an esoteric specialty area of legal practice. Today both general practitioners and attorneys who specialize in areas other than immigration—criminal law, family law, labor law, corporate planning, tax—are becoming increasingly conscious that immigration law will often affect their clients' cases.

Does this mean that general practitioners, as well as practitioners in some of the specialty areas other than immigration, have an ethical obligation to familiarize themselves with at least the basic principles of immigration law? Conversely, are immigration specialists ethically bound to learn the fundamentals of related subject areas? On the one hand, when a specialized body of law is extended to new contexts, it is likely to affect previously unaffected individuals. The attendant justification for expecting those individuals' attorneys to inform themselves about that specialty strengthens. On the other hand, that is more easily said than done. It is precisely when a body of law expands that the heightened complexity makes it more difficult and more time-consuming for outsiders to develop the necessary knowledge. In this age of increasing specialization the problem clearly is not limited to immigration. In thinking about this, review Rule 1.3 of the ABA Model Rules of Professional Conduct and the accompanying Comment, on pages 416–17 above. See also Stephen H. Legomsky, Specialized Justice—Courts, Administrative Tribunals, and a Cross-National Theory of Specialization (1990).

4. Suppose you are a criminal defense lawyer representing client X, a noncitizen, in a drug case. You advise X to plead guilty. You don't think about, and therefore don't mention to X, the likelihood that a drug conviction would lead to removal. Relying on your advice, X pleads guilty, is convicted, and fully serves his sentence. Two years later, X phones to tell you that DHS is now seeking to remove him on the basis of the conviction. Regardless what you should have done earlier, what do you think are your ethical duties now (a) if X wants you to represent him in some capacity and (b) if X, understandably, wants to hire a different attorney?

28. See Franco Capriotti, Linda Friedman Ramirez, Leslie Norikay & Rachel Unger, Small-Time Crime, Big-Time Trouble: The New Immigration Laws, 13 Crim. Justice #2 (1998) (cautioning criminal defense lawyers that, if the client is a noncitizen, even a seemingly minor crime can jeopardize his or her immigration status); Susan L. Pilcher, Justice without a Blindfold: Criminal Proceedings and the Alien Defendant, 50 Arkansas L. Rev. 269, 328–32 (1997) (taking a broad view of the responsibilities of both defense counsel and prosecutor).

5. The second element of the Strickland test for an ineffective assistance of counsel claim is a showing of prejudice. How, exactly, would that requirement be applied in the context of a guilty plea that led to removal? Complete this sentence: The defendant has been prejudiced if, but for the attorney's deficient advice, _____.

6. As the court in Pozo points out, modern cases go both ways on the question whether an attorney's failure to advise his or her client that a guilty plea might lead to removal constitutes ineffective assistance of counsel and, therefore, a basis for withdrawing the guilty plea. The courts are more likely to find ineffective assistance in cases of affirmative misinformation than in cases where the attorney and the client did not discuss the issue at all. See, e.g., United States v. Del Rosario, 902 F.2d 55, 59 n. 2 (D.C.Cir.1990). In Matter of Resendiz, 25 Cal.4th 230, 19 P.3d 1171, 105 Cal.Rptr.2d 431 (2001), where the trial judge had read to the defendant the statutorily required warning that a conviction could lead to deportation, the California Supreme Court in a 4-3 decision nonetheless found ineffective assistance of counsel for wrongly advising the defendant that a guilty plea would not lead to removal. Withdrawal of the guilty plea was denied, however, because the evidence showed that knowledge of that possibility would not have altered the defendant's plea.

7. Apart from both the criminal and the immigration consequences for the client, and apart from the ethical and disciplinary ramifications for the attorney, do you think either Parrino or Pozo would have a civil cause of action against his attorney for negligence? If so, what would be the remedy?

8. Just as the criminal defense attorneys in these and other cases can be faulted for having failed to take important immigration consequences into account, an immigration lawyer would be derelict if he or she moved to withdraw a noncitizen client's guilty plea without considering and disclosing to the client the possible criminal consequences. Withdrawing a plea can be risky. If the court permits withdrawal, the plea bargain is rescinded and, unless a new agreement is struck, a trial might result. The person might be convicted of the same or even a more serious crime and in either event might receive a more severe sentence. As noted in the dissent, Parrino would have faced a possible death sentence had the court allowed him to withdraw his guilty plea. He was apparently willing to take that chance rather than accept deportation.

9. In both Parrino and Pozo, the defense attorneys failed to advise their clients about the potential deportation consequences of pleading guilty. But what about the opposite problem? Suppose, as part of the plea agreement, the federal prosecutor promises the noncitizen defendant that the government will not initiate removal proceedings. Is DHS bound by that agreement?

On that issue too, the courts are divided. In several cases, federal prosecutors are alleged to have promised not to remove noncitizen defendants, in exchange for the defendants pleading guilty to specified charges (and in some cases agreeing also to aid the government's prosecution of other defendants). In San Pedro v. United States, 79 F.3d 1065 (11th Cir. 1996), the noncitizen defendant sought specific performance of the plea agreement (not rescission of the agreement, which would presumably have led to withdrawal of the guilty plea). Assuming arguendo that the government had made the disputed promise, the court held that prosecutors are bound only by those promises that they have the actual authority, express or implied, to make. In private agency law, apparent authority is generally enough, but in the case of government promises, the court held, actual authority is required. The court went on to hold that neither the statute nor any administrative actions of the executive branch had given prosecutors the power to promise non-deportation. Some other courts, in contrast, have held the prosecutors had such an implied power and, consequently, that such promises are binding.²⁹

After these decisions, the Justice Department issued a regulation specifying that the INS (then still in existence) would not be bound by plea agreements unless the government agent who made the promise had first secured a written authorization from the INS. 28 CFR § 0.197 (2001). Despite the transfer of INS functions to DHS, that regulation remains on the books as of this writing. Presumably, if even the former INS was not bound by the promises of attorneys operating within the same Department of government, DHS similarly will be found not to be bound. So, suppose a federal prosecutor, contrary to the regulation, enters into a plea agreement promising a noncitizen defendant that the government will not bring deportation or other removal proceedings, and the defendant doesn't know that the prosecutor lacks the authority to make that promise. If you were the judge, would you enforce the promise?

Matter of Compean

Attorney General, 2009.

24 I. & N. Dec. 710.

[vacated, 25 I. & N. Dec. 1 (AG 2009)—see Postscript following case]

* * *

The Supreme Court has recognized constitutional claims for ineffective assistance of counsel only where a person has a constitutional right to a Government-appointed lawyer. In contrast to a defendant in a criminal case, an alien has no right—constitutional or statutory—to Government-appointed counsel in an administrative removal proceeding. * * * The question before me is whether, notwithstanding the absence of a constitutional right to a Government-appointed lawyer, there is nevertheless a constitutional right to effective assistance of counsel in removal proceedings. More specifically, the question is whether the Constitution entitles an

29. See Margalli-Olvera v. INS, 43 F.3d 345 (8th Cir. 1994); Thomas v. INS, 35 F.3d 1332 (9th Cir. 1994). For a strong defense of the latter view, see Victor C. Romero, Expanding the Circle of Membership by Re- constructing the "Alien": Lessons from Social Psychology and the "Promise Enforcement" Cases, 32 Univ. Mich. Journal of Law Reform 1, 20-34 (1998).

alien who has been harmed by his lawyer's deficient performance in removal proceedings to redo those proceedings.

In Matter of Lozada, 19 I. & N. Dec. 637 (BIA 1988) ("Lozada"), the Board of Immigration Appeals ("Board") responded to an alien's constitutional claim of ineffective assistance of counsel by assuming, consistent with the earlier rulings of two Federal courts of appeals, that an alien "may" have a constitutional right to effective assistance of counsel under the Due Process Clause of the Fifth Amendment. Having thus accepted the potential existence of such a right, the Board's decision established three threshold requirements—commonly known as the "Lozada factors"—that an alien must satisfy to reopen his removal proceedings on the basis of lawyer error. The Board revisited these issues 15 years later in Matter of Assaad, 23 I. & N. Dec. 553 (BIA 2003) ("Assaad"), in response to a claim from the Immigration and Naturalization Service ("INS") that Supreme Court precedent in criminal and habeas cases undermined the notion of a constitutional right to effective assistance of counsel in removal proceedings. The Board acknowledged "some ambiguity in the basis set forth in [Lozada] for [aliens] to assert ineffective assistance claims," but declined to overrule its prior decision. Among the reasons cited by the Board, one loomed large: "[S]ince Matter of Lozada was decided 15 years ago, the circuit courts have consistently continued to recognize that . . . [an alien] has a Fifth Amendment due process right to a fair immigration hearing and may be denied that right if counsel prevents the respondent from meaningfully presenting his or her case."

Five years later, that condition no longer holds, as several courts of appeals, relying on the same Supreme Court precedent that the INS had cited in Assaad, have rejected the proposition that there is a constitutional right to the effective assistance of counsel in removal proceedings. See, e.g., Rafiyev v. Mukasey, 536 F.3d 853, 861 (8th Cir. 2008); Afanwi v. Mukasey, 526 F.3d 788, 798–99 (4th Cir. 2008); Magala v. Gonzales, 434 F.3d 523, 525 (7th Cir. 2005); see also Mai v. Gonzales, 473 F.3d 162, 165 (5th Cir. 2006) (suggesting the same in dictum). In addition, the courts of appeals that continue to recognize the constitutional right have diverged with respect to the standards and requirements for a successful ineffective assistance claim. Some courts, for example, have applied a strict standard of prejudice while others have not; some have treated the Lozada factors as mandatory while others have not.

Because of the circuit splits on these important issues, and the resulting patchwork of rules governing motions to reopen removal proceedings in different parts of the country, I ordered the Board to refer these matters to me so that I could review the Board's position on both the constitutional question and the question of how best to resolve an alien's claim that his removal proceeding was prejudiced by his lawyer's errors. To aid my review, I invited the parties and any interested amici curiae to submit briefs addressing the constitutional question. I invited them to address also whether, if there is no constitutional right to effective assistance of counsel, an alien nevertheless should be permitted, as a matter of administrative discretion, to reopen removal proceedings based on his lawyer's deficient performance.

I conclude, as have a growing number of Federal courts, that the Constitution does not confer a constitutional right to effective assistance of counsel in removal proceedings. The reason is simple: Under Supreme Court precedent, there is no constitutional right to effective assistance of counsel under the Due Process Clause or any other provision where—as here and as in most civil proceedings—there is no constitutional right to counsel, including Government-appointed counsel, in the first place. Therefore, although the Fifth Amendment's Due Process Clause applies in removal proceedings, as it does in any civil lawsuit or in any administrative proceeding, that Clause does not entitle an alien to effective assistance of counsel, much less the specific remedy of a second bite at the apple based on the mistakes of his own lawyer.

However, the foregoing conclusion does not foreclose a remedy for aliens prejudiced by their lawyers' errors, because the Department of Justice is not limited to the very least that the Constitution demands. Although the Constitution does not entitle an alien to relief for his lawyer's mistakes, I conclude that the Department may, in its discretion, allow an alien to reopen removal proceedings based on the deficient performance of his lawyer. Balancing the strong public interest in the fairness and accuracy of removal proceedings with the strong public interest in the finality of completed proceedings, I establish in this opinion an administrative framework for the exercise of that discretion. In extraordinary cases, where a lawyer's deficient performance likely changed the outcome of an alien's removal proceedings, the Board may reopen those proceedings notwithstanding the absence of a constitutional right to such relief. Applying this administrative framework to the three cases before me, I affirm the Board's orders.

I.

I begin with a brief summary of the certified matters. In Matter of Compean, respondent, a native and citizen of Mexico, unlawfully entered the United States in 1989. In 2004, he was placed in removal proceedings and sought cancellation of removal. The Immigration Judge denied respondent's request on the ground that he had failed to establish the "exceptional and extremely unusual hardship" required by section 240A(b)(1)(D) of the Act, and ordered him removed from the United States. After the Board affirmed on the merits, respondent filed a motion to reopen on the grounds of ineffective assistance of counsel. Respondent's self-described "most important" claim was that his former lawyer had failed to present evidence of a pending Form I-130 visa petition, although in point of fact that form had been part of the record before the Immigration Judge. In May 2008, the Board denied the motion on two grounds. First, the Board found that respondent had not filed a complaint with disciplinary authorities regarding his lawyer's deficient representation or explained his failure to do so, as required by Lozada. Second, noting that respondent had not produced any evidence that his lawyer's conduct precluded him from presenting before the Immigration Judge, the Board concluded that respondent had failed to establish that he had suffered prejudice from his lawyer's actions. [The other two applicants similarly had moved to reopen on grounds that their lawyers had been ineffective in their requests for affirmative relief from removal—Eds.]

* * *

II.

Several uncontroversial propositions inform whether there is a constitutional right to effective assistance of counsel in removal proceedings. A removal proceeding is a civil action, not a criminal proceeding. * * * Therefore, the Sixth Amendment's guarantee that, in all "criminal prosecutions," an "accused shall . . . have the Assistance of counsel for his defence" does not apply. * * * The corresponding Sixth Amendment right to effective assistance of counsel does not apply either.

Unlike the Sixth Amendment, the Due Process Clause of the Fifth Amendment, which provides that "[n]o person shall . . . be deprived of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law," applies to civil and criminal proceedings alike. Moreover, that Clause applies to "all 'persons' within the United States, including aliens, whether their presence here is lawful, unlawful, temporary, or permanent." Therefore, it is well established that the Fifth Amendment entitles all aliens who have entered the United States to due process of law in removal proceedings. * * *

The Fifth Amendment's due process guarantee, however, applies only against the Government. * * * Thus, the actions of a private party, including a privately retained lawyer, can give rise to a due process claim only if those actions can be attributed to the Government for constitutional purposes [citing cases]; cf. Shelley v. Kraemer, 334 U.S. 1, 13 (1948) (stating that the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment "erects no shield against merely private conduct, however discriminatory or wrongful"). The question presented in these cases, therefore, is whether the conduct of a privately retained lawyer can be attributed to the Government for Due Process Clause purposes such that a litigant's general right to due process with respect to state action would include a specific right to effective representation by that private lawyer.

In the usual civil case, the answer to this question is a resounding no. It is well established that, as a general matter, there is no constitutional right to counsel, and thus no constitutional right to effective assistance of counsel, in civil cases. Instead, the rule is that counsel's errors are imputed to the client who chose his counsel, and that the client's sole remedy is a suit for malpractice against counsel and not a litigation do-over. That is true even when the case is complex or the stakes are especially high. Indeed, "[t]he non-right to effective assistance of counsel in civil cases is the rule even when the proceeding though nominally civil involves liberty or even life, as in a capital habeas corpus case, where the Supreme Court has held that there is no right to effective assistance of counsel.”

Despite the foregoing uncontroversial principles, several courts of appeals have suggested or held that the Due Process Clause creates a right to effective assistance of counsel in removal proceedings. See, e.g., Nehad v. Mukasey, 535 F.3d 962, 967 (9th Cir. 2008); Aris v. Mukasey, 517 F.3d 595, 600–01 (2d Cir. 2008); Zeru v. Gonzales, 503 F.3d 59, 72 (1st Cir. 2007); Fadiga v. AG of the United States, 488 F.3d 142, 155 (3d Cir. 2007); Sene v. Gonzales, 453 F.3d 383, 386 (6th Cir. 2006); Dakane v. United States Attorney General, 399 F.3d 1269, 1274 (11th Cir. 2005); Tang, 354 F.3d at 1196. * * * As noted, the Board has accepted these decisions as well.

In doing so, however, the Board did not consider several critical points.
* * *

* * *

For private action to trigger scrutiny under the Due Process Clause, there must be a “sufficiently close nexus” between the Federal Government and the conduct of the private party “so that the action of the latter may be fairly treated as that of” the Government itself. * * * That may be the case where the private actor “has exercised powers that are traditionally the exclusive prerogative of the [Government],” or where the Government “has exercised coercive power or has provided such significant encouragement, either overt or covert, that the choice must in law be deemed to be that of the [Government].” But “[t]he mere fact that a [private party] is subject to state regulation does not by itself convert its action into that of the [Government]” for purposes of the Due Process Clause. And “[m]ere approval of or acquiescence in the initiatives of a private party is not sufficient” either.

Applying these standards here, I agree with the courts that have concluded that the Government is not responsible for the conduct of a privately retained lawyer in removal proceedings. A private lawyer plainly does not exercise “powers that are traditionally the exclusive prerogative” of the Government because the lawyer is an adversary of the Government. Nor, in the ordinary case, can it be said that a private lawyer’s deficient performance in representing an alien in removal proceedings is the product either of Government “coerci[on]” or “encouragement.”

It is true that, as respondents and their amici assert, the Federal Government has taken affirmative steps to notify aliens of the availability of counsel and to regulate the private immigration bar. But as noted, the “mere fact that a [private party] is subject to state regulation does not by itself convert its action into that of the [Government]” for purposes of the Due Process Clause. Moreover, for the constitutional standards to apply, the Government must be responsible for “the specific conduct of which the plaintiff complains.” It cannot accurately be said that the Government’s steps to encourage competent representation and to improve the quality of counsel as a general matter are “responsible” for a specific lawyer’s incompetent performance. * * *

* * *

In the final analysis, respondents’ and their amici’s arguments boil down to an assertion that, notwithstanding all of the foregoing Supreme Court precedent and settled constitutional law, an alien’s general due process right to a full and fair hearing on the merits of his immigration claims must include a specific right to effective assistance of counsel because without such a specific right removal proceedings would be fundamentally unfair. In particular, respondents and their amici contend that because the stakes in removal proceedings are so high, the immigration laws are so complex, and aliens are so often ill equipped—due to cultural, educational, financial, or language barriers—successfully to handle them alone, due process requires the guiding hand of competent counsel. * * * This argument is insufficient to override the relevant constitutional holdings of [the Supreme Court], which had nothing to do with the complexity of the issues involved or the wealth and sophistication of the litigants. Nor can the arguments convert otherwise private actors into state actors, which, as discussed, is the prerequisite for a Due Process Clause claim.

* * *

In addition, if correct, respondents’ and their amici’s Fifth Amendment argument would apply with equal, if not greater, force to many other forms of civil proceedings. Yet courts have repeatedly and expressly held that there is no constitutional right to effective assistance of counsel in other civil contexts where the stakes are as high (or higher) than in removal proceedings and where litigants suffer from the same alleged disadvantages as aliens. * * *

In sum, and as a number of courts have now recognized, there is no valid basis for finding a constitutional right to counsel in removal proceedings, and thus no valid basis for recognizing a constitutional right to effective assistance of privately retained lawyers in such proceedings. The Sixth Amendment right to effective assistance of counsel in criminal cases does not apply because removal proceedings are civil. And the Fifth Amendment does not confer an equivalent right because the Due Process Clause applies only against the Government, aliens have no constitutional right to Government-appointed lawyers in removal proceedings, and there is no other ground for treating private lawyers as state actors. Accordingly, the Government is not “responsible” for the denial of effective representation in removal proceedings “as a constitutional matter.” * * *

The fact that aliens in removal proceedings have a statutory privilege to retain counsel of their choosing at no expense to the Government, see sections 240(b)(4) and 292 of the Act, does not change the constitutional analysis, because a statutory privilege is not the same as a right to assistance of counsel, including Government-appointed counsel, under the Constitution. * * * I conclude, as have a growing number of Federal courts of appeals, that there is no constitutional right to effective assistance of counsel in such proceedings. To the extent they are inconsistent with this conclusion, Lozada and Assaad (and any other Board precedent decisions on point) are overruled.

III.

Having concluded that there is no constitutional right to effective assistance of counsel in removal proceedings, I consider whether a non-constitutional source of law—either the immigration statutes or departmental regulations—entitle an alien to reopen his removal proceedings based on his lawyer’s deficient performance. They do not. The Act and its implementing regulations merely permit an alien to hire “such counsel” as “he shall choose,” section 292 of the Act. * * * Accordingly, neither the Constitution nor any statutory or regulatory provision entitles an alien to a do-over if his initial removal proceeding is prejudiced by the mistakes of a privately retained lawyer.

That said, the Department of Justice is “not limited to the very least that the Constitution”—or the Act—“demands.” Although the law does not require the Department to provide an alien with the right to reopen his removal proceedings based on lawyer error, the law allows the Department to do so “as a matter of sound discretion.” The source for this authority is the Department’s broad authority to reopen removal proceedings. * * * The Act and its implementing regulations place a few limits on the Board’s discretion in determining whether reopening is warranted, * * * but the Board generally enjoys “broad discretion” in ruling on motions to reopen. * * *³⁰

Reopening removal proceedings on the basis of a lawyer’s deficient performance is a permissible exercise of this broad discretion. It is also a proper exercise of that discretion in appropriate circumstances—namely, if certain prerequisites, explained below, are met—because the stakes in removal proceedings are sometimes high, the immigration laws can be complex, and many aliens would be better equipped to navigate them with counsel. Moreover, and regrettably, “[t]he deficiencies of the immigration bar are well known.” Stroe, 256 F.3d at 504; see also, e.g., Aris, 517 F.3d at 596, 600–01 (“With disturbing frequency, this Court encounters evidence of ineffective representation by attorneys retained by immigrants seeking legal status in this country.”). There is a strong public interest in ensuring that these deficiencies do not affirmatively undermine the fairness and accuracy of removal proceedings. * * * That interest justifies allowing the Board to mitigate the consequences of a lawyer’s deficient performance by allowing an alien to relitigate his removal in the extraordinary case where

³⁰. Although this opinion discusses the Board’s power to reopen, immigration judges also have the power to reopen removal proceedings based on a lawyer’s deficient performance and shall be guided by the same standards and procedures set forth herein when adjudicating such a motion. Likewise, the framework in this opinion applies to claims of deficient performance raised before the Board on direct review.

his lawyer's deficient performance likely changed the outcome of his initial removal proceedings.³¹

At the same time, it is important to recognize that there is a strong public interest in the expeditiousness and finality of removal proceedings, an interest that Congress has repeatedly emphasized through legislation imposing time limits and curbing discretionary relief. * * * This concern is especially strong when an alien seeks reopening on the basis of a lawyer's alleged deficient performance, because even a meritless motion can succeed in tying up the system and postponing an alien's removal for months or even years based on the difficulties inherent in assessing and adjudicating a lawyer's performance after the fact. * * *

The balancing of these competing considerations in addressing motions to reopen under the Act is committed to the discretion of the Attorney General. I exercise that discretion in this opinion by identifying the general criteria to be used by the Board and immigration judges in addressing motions to reopen based on claims of deficient performance by counsel. At the same time, the Board and immigration judges retain considerable discretion in addressing such motions. Whether an alien has made a sufficient showing to warrant relief based on counsel's allegedly deficient performance is, in each case, committed to the discretion of the Board or the immigration judge. And the Board and immigration judges retain discretion to deny relief in appropriate circumstances even if the prerequisites described below are satisfied, especially where the ultimate relief sought is discretionary.

IV.

With these competing interests in mind, I turn to the general framework that the Board and immigration judges should apply henceforth when aliens seek to reopen removal proceedings based on a lawyer's deficient performance. To avoid confusion with what has heretofore been treated as a constitutional claim of ineffective assistance of counsel, I will refer to the claim recognized in this opinion as a "deficient performance of counsel" claim.³²

31. [T]he deficient performance claim established in this opinion extends only to the conduct of a lawyer, an accredited representative, or a non-lawyer the alien reasonably but erroneously believed to be a lawyer and who was retained to represent the alien in the proceedings; it does not extend any further or to the conduct of an alien representing himself.

32. In the interest of national uniformity, the Board and immigration judges should apply the framework set forth below in toto, even in circuits that have previously held that there is a constitutional right to effective assistance of counsel. That will allow those circuits to reconsider the question (en banc if necessary) more efficiently and easily, without the weight of the Board's 1988 Lozada precedent, which predated the majority of the relevant judicial decisions. If, notwithstanding my decision today, a court of appeals subsequently reaffirms (or decides in the first instance) that there is a constitutional right to effective assistance of counsel in removal proceedings, and that court's decision has become final and unreviewable, the Board and immigration judges will need to determine what elements of the framework may be implemented in that circuit consistent with the court's decision.

In establishing a framework for consideration of deficient performance claims, I do not write on a blank slate. * * * [Here the Attorney General summarizes the requirements that the BIA had laid down in Lozada—Eds.]

The Lozada standards and requirements have largely stood the test of time, but 20 years of experience has also revealed ways in which they can and should be improved. The administrative framework established today supersedes that set forth in Lozada, but draws on its approach. Significantly, it is designed, as the framework in Lozada was, to enable the Board to resolve most deficient performance claims on the basis of the written record presented by the parties in connection with the motion without having to remand to an immigration judge for fact-finding. * * *

A.

To prevail on a deficient performance of counsel claim, an alien bears the burden of establishing three elements.

1.

First, the alien must show that his lawyer's failings were "egregious," a requirement the Board recognized in Lozada. In light of the strong public interest in finality and the rule that "litigants are generally bound by the conduct of their attorneys," it is not enough merely to demonstrate that one's lawyer made an ordinary mistake or could have presented a more compelling case. Moreover, given the danger of second guessing a lawyer's performance with "the distorting effects of hindsight," it is appropriate in making this assessment to apply a "strong presumption that counsel's conduct falls within the wide range of reasonable professional assistance." Requiring that the error be "egregious," and viewing the matter from counsel's perspective at the time, will help ensure that reopening is reserved for those extraordinary cases that truly warrant relief, and that relief is not granted simply because an alien shows after the fact that he received less than flawless representation.

2.

Second, in cases where the alien moves to reopen beyond the applicable time limit—typically 90 days from the date the removal order was entered—the Board may exercise its discretion to allow tolling of the 90-day period, but only if the alien affirmatively shows that he exercised due diligence in discovering and seeking to cure his lawyer's alleged deficient performance. * * * In deficient performance cases, this will typically require that the alien prove he made timely inquiries about his immigration status and the progress of his case. It will also typically require that the alien promptly file a motion to reopen within a reasonable period after discovering his lawyer's deficient performance.

There is no bright line for determining when a particular delay is too long. Instead, the Board should evaluate due diligence on a case-by-case basis, taking into account the circumstances of the case and the reasons offered for any delay. The Board should perform this evaluation by determining objectively when a reasonable person should have discovered the possibility that he had been victimized by the lawyer's deficient performance, and when a reasonable person would have taken steps to cure it following discovery. * * *

3.

Third, as the Board and courts of appeals uniformly have held, an alien must establish prejudice arising from the lawyer's errors. * * *

The proper standard of prejudice to apply, however, is a crucial question on which even the courts of appeals that have recognized a constitutionally based claim of ineffective assistance have not spoken consistently. * * *

I conclude that to establish prejudice arising from a lawyer's deficient performance sufficient to permit reopening, an alien must show that but for the deficient performance, it is more likely than not that the alien would have been entitled to the ultimate relief he was seeking. In doing so, I borrow from the standard commonly applied by the Federal courts, in both civil and criminal proceedings, to motions for a new trial based on newly discovered evidence. * * *

In my judgment, the "more likely than not" standard is more appropriate than Strickland's "reasonable probability" standard. * * * The Strickland standard, after all, was intended to vindicate a criminal defendant's constitutional right to effective assistance of counsel. Here, as discussed, there is no constitutional right to effective assistance of counsel, so the alien's interests relative to the public interest in finality are correspondingly weaker. It follows that the "more likely than not" standard is also more appropriate than the Ninth Circuit's "plausible grounds for relief" standard. * * *

* * * In most cases, this will require a showing that, but for the lawyer's error, the alien likely would have been entitled to continue residing in the United States. Hence, an alien cannot prevail on a claim that, for example, his lawyer was wrong in failing to request a continuance simply by showing that he likely would have been granted a continuance. Instead, he must show that, but for the lawyer's failing, he likely would have succeeded on the merits of his underlying claim to remain in the United States. And in cases where discretionary relief is at issue, an alien must present evidence that not only establishes he was eligible for relief, but also that he believes would have led to a favorable exercise of discretion.

* * *

B.

To enable the Board to determine if these standards have been met, an alien who seeks reopening of removal proceedings based on his lawyer's deficient performance also must submit certain documents in support of his motion. In particular, he must submit a detailed affidavit setting forth the facts that form the basis of the deficient performance of counsel claim. The affidavit must explain with specificity what his lawyer did or did not do, and why he, the alien, was harmed as a result. * * *

In addition to the alien's affidavit, the alien must attach five documents or sets of documents to his motion. If any of these documents is unavailable, the alien must explain why. If any of these documents is missing rather than nonexistent, the alien must summarize the document's contents in his affidavit.

1.

First, the alien must attach a copy of his agreement, if any, with the lawyer whose performance he alleges was deficient. Where there was no written agreement, the alien must specify in his affidavit what the lawyer had agreed to do, including whether it included the particular step in the proceedings in which the deficient performance is alleged to have occurred. This requirement will enable the Board to determine whether the alleged error was actually within the scope of the lawyer's representation. After all, the mere fact that a lawyer failed to do something—for example, file a petition for review—does not, by itself, establish that the lawyer's conduct was deficient, because the alien may not have retained the lawyer for that purpose. See Lozada, 19 I. & N. Dec. at 639 (noting that the alien "has not alleged, let alone established, that former counsel ever agreed to prepare a brief on appeal or was engaged to undertake the task"). * * *

2.

Second, the alien must attach both a copy of a letter to his former lawyer setting forth the lawyer's deficient performance and a copy of the lawyer's response, if any. (If the alien never received a response from his former lawyer, his affidavit must note the date on which he mailed his letter and state whether he made any other efforts to notify the lawyer.) The letter from the alien must suffice to put the lawyer on notice that the alien intends to file a deficient performance claim and to inform the lawyer of the facts that the alien alleges in support of the claim. This requirement gives the former lawyer—whose professional competence is being questioned—an opportunity to present his side of the story, and helps to ensure that the Board has the facts necessary to render an informed judgment. As the Board recognized in Lozada, this requirement also has the effect of "discouraging baseless accusations" because "the potential for abuse is apparent where no mechanism exists for allowing former counsel, whose integrity or competence is being impugned, to present his version of events if he so chooses."

3.

Third, the alien must attach a completed and signed complaint addressed to the appropriate State bar or disciplinary authorities. This requirement, like the preceding one, discourages baseless accusations and collusion, because it is one thing to file a motion that, even if denied, has the effect of delaying removal and another thing altogether to back that motion with the weight of a disciplinary complaint.

It should be noted that, under this requirement, the alien need not actually file the complaint with the appropriate State bar or disciplinary authorities, as Lozada had required. By making the actual filing of a bar complaint a prerequisite for obtaining (or even seeking) relief, it appears that Lozada may inadvertently have contributed to the filing of many unfounded or even frivolous complaints. * * * [I am] requiring only that the alien submit to the Board a completed and signed but unfiled complaint, and leaving it to the Board whether to refer the complaint to the State bar or to the Executive Office for Immigration Review disciplinary counsel for further action.

4.

Fourth, if the alien's claim is that his former lawyer failed to submit something to the immigration judge or to the Board, he must attach the allegedly omitted item to his motion. For example, if the alien's claim is that his former lawyer failed to submit a brief to the Board, he must submit, in substance and detail if not in form, a copy of the brief that he alleges should have been filed. If the alien's claim is that his former lawyer failed to introduce certain evidence or testimony, he must submit that evidence (directly in the case of physical or documentary evidence and through a witness's affidavit in the case of testimony) to the Board. Moreover, the alien must explain in his affidavit whether he told his former lawyer about the evidence or testimony in question, and if not, why not.

Requiring aliens to submit such material to the Board will reduce delays and promote finality by ensuring that the Board can resolve most deficient performance claims without remanding for evidentiary hearings. In addition, requiring proof that an alien told his lawyer about evidence or testimony—or had a good reason for failing to do so—is common sense. After all, if an alien never shared the existence of certain evidence or testimony with his lawyer, it is difficult to fault the lawyer for failing to submit that evidence or testimony to the immigration judge.

5.

Fifth and finally, where an alien is represented by counsel in seeking reopening, the motion for reopening shall contain the following signed statement of the new attorney: "Having reviewed the record, I express a belief, based on a reasoned and studied professional judgment, that the performance of my client's former counsel fell below minimal standards of professional competence."³³ * * *

C.

The legal standards set forth in Part IV.A and the evidentiary requirements set forth in Part IV.B are mandatory. That is, to be eligible for a

33. A lawyer may not bypass this requirement by preparing a motion to reopen for the alien and then having the alien file the motion pro se. * * * I also note that this requirement to acknowledge the deficient performance of counsel in the prior proceedings is applicable even where the same attorney continues to represent the alien in seeking to reopen the proceedings based on his own prior deficient performance.

favorable exercise of discretion based on a deficient performance claim, an alien must comply with all requirements that apply. Excusing an alien from compliance with a particular requirement, or deeming “substantial compliance” adequate (as several courts of appeals have done with respect to the Lozada factors) would hinder the development of a complete record, making it more difficult for the Government to respond and more difficult for the Board to adjudicate the case. It also would undermine the Board’s (and the bar’s) efforts to monitor the quality of representation before the immigration courts. Finally, excusing compliance in some cases would create uncertainty as to when a requirement will be enforced and when it will be waived. Of course, even if an alien complies with all applicable requirements, the Board is not compelled to reopen proceedings, as reopening ultimately is discretionary.

D.

Finally, it bears noting that the Board’s discretion to reopen on the basis of a lawyer’s deficient performance is not limited to conduct that occurred during the agency proceedings. The Board may reopen on the basis of deficient performance that occurred subsequent to the entry of a final order of removal [for example, failure to file a timely petition for review in the court of appeals—Eds.].

* * *

* * * [T]he Board and immigration judges should apply the substantive standards set forth in Part IV.A above to motions to reopen based on a lawyer’s deficient performance, regardless of when such motions were filed. It would be unfair, however, to apply the new filing requirements set forth in Part IV.B to such motions, since aliens may have filed them in good faith reliance on Lozada. * * * Accordingly, I hold that the Board and immigration judges should apply the new filing requirements only with respect to motions filed after today; with respect to motions filed prior to this opinion, they should continue to apply the Lozada factors.

* * *

[The Attorney General affirms the Board’s denials of all the respondents’ motions to reopen, finding one or more of the requirements unmet in each case—Eds.]

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

POSTSCRIPT: As this book was going to press, Attorney General Holder vacated this decision by his predecessor on the ground that the rulemaking process would be a more suitable vehicle for reevaluating the Lozada framework. Accordingly, he ordered EOIR to revisit Lozada and to propose a new rule if advisable. He reinstated Lozada in the interim and found the constitutional issue unnecessary to address. Applying the Lozada criteria, however, he concurred in the Board’s refusals to reopen the proceedings of the three petitioners in Compean. We have retained Attorney General Mukasey’s now vacated opinion because both the constitutional and the policy issues that it discusses remain relevant.—Eds.

1. As the Attorney General acknowledges, the courts of appeals are divided over the existence of a due process right to the effective assistance of counsel in removal proceedings. Denying such a right, the Attorney General invokes two broad, related rationales—(a) that there can be no constitutional right to the effective assistance of counsel when, as in removal proceedings, there is no constitutional right to government-appointed counsel; and (b) that for due process purposes the actions of private counsel are not government action. As to the latter rationale, the Attorney General makes the interesting decision to cite Shelley v. Kraemer, 334 U.S. 1, 68 S.Ct. 836, 92 L.Ed. 1161 (1948), for its dictum that due process does not apply to private conduct, but not for its holding that the use of the courts to enforce a racially discriminatory land covenant would have been state action. If you were representing the noncitizens in Compean, what arguments would you offer in response to each of the Attorney General's rationales?

2. In Aguilera-Enriquez v. INS, 516 F.2d 565 (6th Cir. 1975), reproduced on pages 673–78 above, one court accepted the principle that due process requires the government to appoint counsel in any deportation proceeding in which the absence of counsel would render the proceeding fundamentally unfair. The dissent would have gone further, requiring the government to appoint counsel in all deportation cases involving lawful permanent residents. In the Sixth Circuit, where Aguilera-Enriquez was decided, suppose in a given case a court finds that fundamental fairness requires the appointment of counsel. Suppose further that counsel is then appointed but that counsel's ineffectiveness causes cognizable prejudice to the noncitizen, who later enlists competent counsel and files a timely motion to reopen. After Compean, should an immigration judge or the BIA recognize a constitutional right to the effective assistance of counsel in that case? Argue both ways.

3. The Attorney General suggests that the noncitizen whose removal is the result of counsel's ineffectiveness has an alternate remedy—a malpractice action against the attorney. Do you see any practical problems with that alternative?

4. After rejecting both constitutional and statutory entitlements to the effective assistance of counsel, the Attorney General in Compean recognizes a discretionary authority to reopen removal proceedings when counsel's ineffectiveness prejudiced the outcome—but only when various substantive and procedural prerequisites have been satisfied. One of the substantive requirements is a showing that counsel's conduct was "egregious." Elsewhere, the Attorney General remarks that reopening on grounds of ineffective assistance is reserved for "extraordinary" situations. The bar, in other words, is set high. In contrast, in legal malpractice actions based on attorney negligence, the plaintiff need only show that the attorney's conduct was "unreasonable," a requirement interpreted to mean that the attorney's performance fell below the standards of the profession. Which standard do you think is more appropriate when noncitizens move to reopen removal proceedings based on ineffective assistance of counsel? What are the competing interests?

5. When a noncitizen moves to reopen removal proceedings on ineffective assistance grounds, another substantive requirement is prejudice. Here there are two sub-issues: First, what, exactly, do you think the person should have to show would have happened had counsel been effective? That the person would have been able to retain or obtain permanent residence? That the person would ultimately have received the particular form of relief that he or she alleges counsel was deficient in seeking? That the result would have been more favorable in some respect? Second, what standard of proof should be imposed? That the different result might have occurred? That the different result was plausible? That the different result would have been more likely than not? Highly likely? Almost certain?

6. Retaining a requirement imposed in Lozada, the Attorney General in Compean requires a copy of the attorney-client agreement (if there is one), so that it can determine “what the lawyer had agreed to do.” In Lozada, the BIA had applied that requirement very strictly. Lozada had argued that the attorney had said in the notice of appeal that he planned to file a brief and never did. In denying the motion to reopen, the BIA faulted the noncitizen because he “has not alleged, let alone established, that former counsel ever agreed to prepare a brief on appeal or was engaged to undertake the task.” What is your reaction? If the issues are such that competent counsel would have filed a brief, should counsel be forgiven because he or she had not “agreed” to submit one? Is that the kind of matter a lay client should be expected to initiate?

7. After the BIA decided Lozada and then Assaad, several courts of appeals ordered reopening based on ineffective assistance of counsel even when not all the Lozada requirements had been met.³⁴ Should the courts exercise a similar power after Compean? Should they be bound by the Attorney General’s more general conclusion that there is no constitutional right to the effective assistance of counsel in removal proceedings?

3. EVIDENCE AND PROOF

a. ADMISSIBILITY OF EVIDENCE

There are few specific rules to guide immigration judges in deciding what evidence is admissible in removal hearings. See generally Won Kidane, Revisiting the Rules of Procedure and Evidence Applicable in Adversarial Administrative Deportation Proceedings: Lessons from the Department of Labor Rules of Evidence, 57 Catholic Univ. L. Rev. 93 (2007). The formal rules of evidence do not apply. See, e.g., Felzcerek v. INS, 75 F.3d 112, 116 (2d Cir. 1996); Baliza v. INS, 709 F.2d 1231, 1233 (9th Cir.1983). All testimony is under oath or affirmation, 8 CFR §§ 1003.34, 1240.7(b) (2008), and by statute the noncitizen has the right to cross-examine the government’s witnesses, INA § 240(b)(4)(B). As for document authentication, see the helpful analysis of Professor Virgil O. Wiebe, Maybe You Should, Yes You Must, No You Can’t: Shifting Standards and Practices for Assuring Document Reliability in Asylum and Withholding of Removal Cases, Nov. 2006 Immigration Briefings (geared specifically toward asylum cases but useful in other removal hearings as well). Under 8 CFR 34. See, e.g., Apolinar v. Mukasey, 514 F.3d 893 (9th Cir. 2008), and the cases cited in Lory Diana Rosenberg, It’s Alive: A Non-citizen’s Right to Competent Counsel Before the EOIR and BCIS After Matter of Assaad, 8 BIB 943 (June 1, 2003).

§ 1240.7(a) (2008), any relevant statements, written or oral, are perfectly admissible in removal proceedings, even though hearsay evidence would be generally inadmissible under Rule 802 of the Federal Rules of Evidence. Court decisions have subjected hearsay evidence to the additional requirement that its admission be fundamentally fair.³⁵

Can the government, by introducing hearsay statements rather than live testimony, effectively deprive the person of his or her right to cross-examine? To prevent this, the courts have held that fundamental fairness requires the government to make a reasonable effort to produce the witness at the hearing before resorting to hearsay. Courts have found the government's unsuccessful efforts adequate in some cases, e.g., Trias-Hernandez v. INS, 528 F.2d 366, 369 (9th Cir.1975), and inadequate in others, e.g., Hernandez-Guadarrama v. Ashcroft, 394 F.3d 674, 679-83 (9th Cir. 2005); Cunanan v. INS, 856 F.2d 1373, 1375 (9th Cir.1988). In Hernandez-Guadarrama, the sole probative evidence against the noncitizen was a hearsay statement that he had smuggled other noncitizens into the United States. Since the declarant had avoided a felony prosecution by providing the statement, and since the government had made no reasonable effort to produce the declarant to testify, the court held the admission of the evidence fundamentally unfair. In Cunanan, the INS sought to introduce an affidavit executed by the noncitizen's wife. The affidavit asserted that the marriage had been a sham, a fact the noncitizen adamantly denied. The INS made no effort to produce the wife as a witness, and until the hearing date the noncitizen was unaware of his wife's statement. On those facts the court held the admission of the evidence fundamentally unfair.

One particular evidentiary problem is worth considering in some detail: If the government obtains evidence illegally, may that evidence nonetheless be introduced in removal hearings?

INS v. Lopez-Mendoza

Supreme Court of the United States, 1984.
468 U.S. 1032, 104 S.Ct. 3479, 82 L.Ed.2d 778.

■ JUSTICE O'CONNOR announced the judgment of the Court and delivered the opinion of the Court with respect to Parts I, II, III, and IV, and an opinion with respect to Part V, in which JUSTICE BLACKMUN, JUSTICE POWELL, and JUSTICE REHNQUIST joined.³⁶

This litigation requires us to decide whether an admission of unlawful presence in this country made subsequent to an allegedly unlawful arrest must be excluded as evidence in a civil deportation hearing. We hold that the exclusionary rule need not be applied in such a proceeding.

³⁵. Abreu-Reyes v. INS, 292 F.3d 1029, 1032 (9th Cir. 2002); Felzcerek, 75 F.3d at 115; Bustos-Torres v. INS, 898 F.2d 1053, 1055 (5th Cir.1990).

³⁶. THE CHIEF JUSTICE joins all but Part V of this opinion.

I

Respondents Adan Lopez-Mendoza and Elias Sandoval-Sanchez, both citizens of Mexico, were summoned to separate deportation proceedings in California and Washington, and both were ordered deported. They challenged the regularity of those proceedings on grounds related to the lawfulness of their respective arrests by officials of the Immigration and Naturalization Service (INS). On administrative appeal the Board of Immigration Appeals (BIA), an agency of the Department of Justice, affirmed the deportation orders.

The Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit, sitting en banc, reversed Sandoval-Sanchez' deportation order and vacated and remanded Lopez-Mendoza's deportation order. It ruled that Sandoval-Sanchez' admission of his illegal presence in this country was the fruit of an unlawful arrest, and that the exclusionary rule applied in a deportation proceeding. Lopez-Mendoza's deportation order was vacated and his case remanded to the BIA to determine whether the Fourth Amendment had been violated in the course of his arrest. We granted certiorari.

A

Respondent Lopez-Mendoza was arrested in 1976 by INS agents at his place of employment, a transmission repair shop in San Mateo, Cal. Responding to a tip, INS investigators arrived at the shop shortly before 8 a.m. The agents had not sought a warrant to search the premises or to arrest any of its occupants. The proprietor of the shop firmly refused to allow the agents to interview his employees during working hours. Nevertheless, while one agent engaged the proprietor in conversation another entered the shop and approached Lopez-Mendoza. In response to the agent's questioning, Lopez-Mendoza gave his name and indicated that he was from Mexico with no close family ties in the United States. The agent then placed him under arrest. Lopez-Mendoza underwent further questioning at INS offices, where he admitted he was born in Mexico, was still a citizen of Mexico, and had entered this country without inspection by immigration authorities. Based on his answers, the agents prepared a "Record of Deportable Alien" (Form I-213), and an affidavit which Lopez-Mendoza executed, admitting his Mexican nationality and his illegal entry into this country.

A hearing was held before an Immigration Judge. Lopez-Mendoza's counsel moved to terminate the proceeding on the ground that Lopez-Mendoza had been arrested illegally. The judge ruled that the legality of the arrest was not relevant to the deportation proceeding and therefore declined to rule on the legality of Lopez-Mendoza's arrest. The Form I-213 and the affidavit executed by Lopez-Mendoza were received into evidence without objection from Lopez-Mendoza. On the basis of this evidence the Immigration Judge found Lopez-Mendoza deportable. Lopez-Mendoza was granted the option of voluntary departure.

The BIA dismissed Lopez-Mendoza's appeal. It noted that "[t]he mere fact of an illegal arrest has no bearing on a subsequent deportation proceeding," and observed that Lopez-Mendoza had not objected to the admission into evidence of Form I-213 and the affidavit he had executed. The BIA also noted that the exclusionary rule is not applied to redress the injury to the privacy of the search victim, and that the BIA had previously concluded that application of the rule in deportation proceedings to deter unlawful INS conduct was inappropriate. Matter of Sandoval, 17 I. & N. Dec. 70 (BIA 1979).

The Court of Appeals vacated the order of deportation and remanded for a determination whether Lopez-Mendoza's Fourth Amendment rights had been violated when he was arrested.

B

Respondent Sandoval-Sanchez (who is not the same individual who was involved in Matter of Sandoval, supra) was arrested in 1977 at his place of employment, a potato processing plant in Pasco, Wash. INS Agent Bower and other officers went to the plant, with the permission of its personnel manager, to check for illegal aliens. During a change in shift, officers stationed themselves at the exits while Bower and a uniformed Border Patrol agent entered the plant. They went to the lunchroom and identified themselves as immigration officers. Many people in the room rose and headed for the exits or milled around; others in the plant left their equipment and started running; still others who were entering the plant turned around and started walking back out. The two officers eventually stationed themselves at the main entrance to the plant and looked for passing employees who averted their heads, avoided eye contact, or tried to hide themselves in a group. Those individuals were addressed with innocuous questions in English. Any who could not respond in English and who otherwise aroused Agent Bower's suspicions were questioned in Spanish as to their right to be in the United States.

Respondent Sandoval-Sanchez was in a line of workers entering the plant. Sandoval-Sanchez testified that he did not realize that immigration officers were checking people entering the plant, but that he did see standing at the plant entrance a man in uniform who appeared to be a police officer. Agent Bower testified that it was probable that he, not his partner, had questioned Sandoval-Sanchez at the plant, but that he could not be absolutely positive. The employee he thought he remembered as Sandoval-Sanchez had been "very evasive," had averted his head, turned around, and walked away when he saw Agent Bower. Bower was certain that no one was questioned about his status unless his actions had given the agents reason to believe that he was an undocumented alien.

Thirty-seven employees, including Sandoval-Sanchez, were briefly detained at the plant and then taken to the county jail. About one-third immediately availed themselves of the option of voluntary departure and were put on a bus to Mexico. Sandoval-Sanchez exercised his right to a deportation hearing. Sandoval-Sanchez was then questioned further, and Agent Bower recorded Sandoval-Sanchez' admission of unlawful entry.

Sandoval-Sanchez contends he was not aware that he had a right to remain silent.

At his deportation hearing Sandoval-Sanchez contended that the evidence offered by the INS should be suppressed as the fruit of an unlawful arrest. The Immigration Judge considered and rejected Sandoval-Sanchez' claim that he had been illegally arrested, but ruled in the alternative that the legality of the arrest was not relevant to the deportation hearing. Based on the written record of Sandoval-Sanchez' admissions the Immigration Judge found him deportable and granted him voluntary departure. The BIA dismissed Sandoval-Sanchez' appeal. It concluded that the circumstances of the arrest had not affected the voluntariness of his recorded admission, and again declined to invoke the exclusionary rule, relying on its earlier decision in Matter of Sandoval.

On appeal the Court of Appeals concluded that Sandoval-Sanchez' detention by the immigration officers violated the Fourth Amendment, that the statements he made were a product of that detention, and that the exclusionary rule barred their use in a deportation hearing. The deportation order against Sandoval-Sanchez was accordingly reversed.

II

A deportation proceeding is a purely civil action to determine eligibility to remain in this country, not to punish an unlawful entry, though entering or remaining unlawfully in this country is itself a crime. INA §§ 262, 266, 275.³⁷ The deportation hearing looks prospectively to the respondent's right to remain in this country in the future. Past conduct is relevant only insofar as it may shed light on the respondent's right to remain.

* * * Consistent with the civil nature of the proceeding, various protections that apply in the context of a criminal trial do not apply in a deportation hearing. The respondent must be given "a reasonable opportunity to be present at [the] proceeding," but if the respondent fails to avail himself of that opportunity the hearing may proceed in his absence. INA § 242(b).³⁸ In many deportation cases the INS must show only identity and alienage; the burden then shifts to the respondent to prove the time, place, and manner of his entry. See INA § 291. A decision of deportability need be based only on "reasonable, substantial, and probative evidence." INA § 242(b)(4).³⁹ The BIA for its part has required only "clear, unequivocal and convincing" evidence of the respondent's deportability, not proof beyond a reasonable doubt. The Courts of Appeals have held, for example that the absence of Miranda warnings does not render an otherwise 37. The Court's reference to "remaining unlawfully" is too broad. Remaining without obeying certain registration requirements, see INA §§ 262, 266, is a crime, but no provision makes overstaying a nonimmigrant visa (the most common type of prohibited stay) a criminal offense.—Eds.

38. The consequences of failing to appear at a removal hearing are now described in INA § 240(b)(5).—Eds.

39. Now INA § 240(c)(3).—Eds.

voluntary statement by the respondent inadmissible in a deportation case.

* * *

III

The "body" or identity of a defendant or respondent in a criminal or civil proceeding is never itself suppressible as a fruit of an unlawful arrest, even if it is conceded that an unlawful arrest, search, or interrogation occurred. * * *

On this basis alone the Court of Appeals' decision as to respondent Lopez-Mendoza must be reversed. At his deportation hearing Lopez-Mendoza objected only to the fact that he had been summoned to a deportation hearing following an unlawful arrest; he entered no objection to the evidence offered against him. The BIA correctly ruled that "[t]he mere fact of an illegal arrest has no bearing on a subsequent deportation proceeding."

IV

Respondent Sandoval-Sanchez has a more substantial claim. He objected not to his compelled presence at a deportation proceeding, but to evidence offered at that proceeding. The general rule in a criminal proceeding is that statements and other evidence obtained as a result of an unlawful, warrantless arrest are suppressible if the link between the evidence and the unlawful conduct is not too attenuated. The reach of the exclusionary rule beyond the context of a criminal prosecution, however, is less clear. Although this Court has once stated in dictum that "[i]t may be assumed that evidence obtained by the [Labor] Department through an illegal search and seizure cannot be made the basis of a finding in deportation proceedings," the Court has never squarely addressed the question before. Lower court decisions dealing with this question are sparse.

In United States v. Janis, 428 U.S. 433, 96 S.Ct. 3021, 49 L.Ed.2d 1046 (1976), this Court set forth a framework for deciding in what types of proceeding application of the exclusionary rule is appropriate. Imprecise as the exercise may be, the Court recognized in Janis that there is no choice but to weigh the likely social benefits of excluding unlawfully seized evidence against the likely costs. On the benefit side of the balance "the 'prime purpose' of the [exclusionary] rule, if not the sole one, 'is to deter future unlawful police conduct.'" On the cost side there is the loss of often probative evidence and all of the secondary costs that flow from the less accurate or more cumbersome adjudication that therefore occurs.

At stake in Janis was application of the exclusionary rule in a federal civil tax assessment proceeding following the unlawful seizure of evidence by state, not federal, officials. The Court noted at the outset that "[i]n the complex and turbulent history of the rule, the Court never has applied it to exclude evidence from a civil proceeding, federal or state." Two factors in Janis suggested that the deterrence value of the exclusionary rule in the context of that case was slight. First, the state law enforcement officials were already “punished” by the exclusion of the evidence in the state criminal trial as a result of the same conduct. Second, the evidence was also excludable in any federal criminal trial that might be held. Both factors suggested that further application of the exclusionary rule in the federal civil proceeding would contribute little more to the deterrence of unlawful conduct by state officials. On the cost side of the balance, Janis focused simply on the loss of “concededly relevant and reliable evidence.” The Court concluded that, on balance, this cost outweighed the likely social benefits achievable through application of the exclusionary rule in the federal civil proceeding.

While it seems likely that the deterrence value of applying the exclusionary rule in deportation proceedings would be higher than it was in Janis, it is also quite clear that the social costs would be very much greater as well. Applying the Janis balancing test to the benefits and costs of excluding concededly reliable evidence from a deportation proceeding, we therefore reach the same conclusion as in Janis.

The likely deterrence value of the exclusionary rule in deportation proceedings is difficult to assess. On the one hand, a civil deportation proceeding is a civil complement to a possible criminal prosecution, and to this extent it resembles the civil proceeding under review in Janis. The INS does not suggest that the exclusionary rule should not continue to apply in criminal proceedings against an alien who unlawfully enters or remains in this country, and the prospect of losing evidence that might otherwise be used in a criminal prosecution undoubtedly supplies some residual deterrent to unlawful conduct by INS officials. But it must be acknowledged that only a very small percentage of arrests of aliens are intended or expected to lead to criminal prosecutions. Thus the arresting officer’s primary objective, in practice, will be to use evidence in the civil deportation proceeding. Moreover, here, in contrast to Janis, the agency officials who effect the unlawful arrest are the same officials who subsequently bring the deportation action. As recognized in Janis, the exclusionary rule is likely to be most effective when applied to such “intrasovereign” violations.

Nonetheless, several other factors significantly reduce the likely deterrent value of the exclusionary rule in a civil deportation proceeding. First, regardless of how the arrest is effected, deportation will still be possible when evidence not derived directly from the arrest is sufficient to support deportation. As the BIA has recognized, in many deportation proceedings “the sole matters necessary for the Government to establish are the respondent’s identity and alienage—at which point the burden shifts to the respondent to prove the time, place and manner of entry.” Since the person and identity of the respondent are not themselves suppressible, the INS must prove only alienage, and that will sometimes be possible using evidence gathered independently of, or sufficiently attenuated from, the original arrest. The INS’s task is simplified in this regard by the civil nature of the proceeding. As Justice Brandeis stated: “Silence is often evidence of the most persuasive character. . . . [T]here is no rule of law which prohibits officers charged with the administration of the immigration law from drawing an inference from the silence of one who is called upon to speak. . . . A person arrested on the preliminary warrant is not protected by a presumption of citizenship comparable to the presumption of innocence in a criminal case. There is no provision which forbids drawing an adverse inference from the fact of standing mute.”

The second factor is a practical one. In the course of a year the average INS agent arrests almost 500 illegal aliens. Over 97.5% apparently agree to voluntary deportation [sic] without a formal hearing. Among the remainder who do request a formal hearing (apparently a dozen or so in all, per officer, per year) very few challenge the circumstances of their arrests. As noted by the Court of Appeals, “the BIA was able to find only two reported immigration cases since 1899 in which the [exclusionary] rule was applied to bar unlawfully seized evidence, only one other case in which the rule’s application was specifically addressed, and fewer than fifty BIA proceedings since 1952 in which a Fourth Amendment challenge to the introduction of evidence was even raised.” Every INS agent knows, therefore, that it is highly unlikely that any particular arrestee will end up challenging the lawfulness of his arrest in a formal deportation proceeding. When an occasional challenge is brought, the consequences from the point of view of the officer’s overall arrest and deportation record will be trivial. In these circumstances, the arresting officer is most unlikely to shape his conduct in anticipation of the exclusion of evidence at a formal deportation hearing.

Third, and perhaps most important, the INS has its own comprehensive scheme for deterring Fourth Amendment violations by its officers. Most arrests of illegal aliens away from the border occur during farm, factory, or other workplace surveys. Large numbers of illegal aliens are often arrested at one time, and conditions are understandably chaotic. To safeguard the rights of those who are lawfully present at inspected workplaces the INS has developed rules restricting stop, interrogation, and arrest practices. These regulations require that no one be detained without reasonable suspicion of illegal alienage, and that no one be arrested unless there is an admission of illegal alienage or other strong evidence thereof. New immigration officers receive instruction and examination in Fourth Amendment law, and others receive periodic refresher courses in law. Evidence seized through intentionally unlawful conduct is excluded by Department of Justice policy from the proceeding for which it was obtained. The INS also has in place a procedure for investigating and punishing immigration officers who commit Fourth Amendment violations. The INS’s attention to Fourth Amendment interests cannot guarantee that constitutional violations will not occur, but it does reduce the likely deterrent value of the exclusionary rule. Deterrence must be measured at the margin.

Finally, the deterrent value of the exclusionary rule in deportation proceedings is undermined by the availability of alternative remedies for institutional practices by the INS that might violate Fourth Amendment rights. The INS is a single agency, under central federal control, and engaged in operations of broad scope but highly repetitive character. The possibility of declaratory relief against the agency thus offers a means for challenging the validity of INS practices, when standing requirements for bringing such an action can be met.

Respondents contend that retention of the exclusionary rule is necessary to safeguard the Fourth Amendment rights of ethnic Americans, particularly the Hispanic-Americans lawfully in this country. We recognize that respondents raise here legitimate and important concerns. But application of the exclusionary rule to civil deportation proceedings can be justified only if the rule is likely to add significant protection to these Fourth Amendment rights. The exclusionary rule provides no remedy for completed wrongs; those lawfully in this country can be interested in its application only insofar as it may serve as an effective deterrent to future INS misconduct. For the reasons we have discussed we conclude that application of the rule in INS civil deportation proceedings, as in the circumstances discussed in Janis, "is unlikely to provide significant, much less substantial, additional deterrence." Important as it is to protect the Fourth Amendment rights of all persons, there is no convincing indication that application of the exclusionary rule in civil deportation proceedings will contribute materially to that end.

On the other side of the scale, the social costs of applying the exclusionary rule in deportation proceedings are both unusual and significant. The first cost is one that is unique to continuing violations of the law. Applying the exclusionary rule in proceedings that are intended not to punish past transgressions but to prevent their continuance or renewal would require the courts to close their eyes to ongoing violations of the law. This Court has never before accepted costs of this character in applying the exclusionary rule.

Presumably no one would argue that the exclusionary rule should be invoked to prevent an agency from ordering corrective action at a leaking hazardous waste dump if the evidence underlying the order had been improperly obtained, or to compel police to return contraband explosives or drugs to their owner if the contraband had been unlawfully seized. On the rare occasions that it has considered costs of this type the Court has firmly indicated that the exclusionary rule does not extend this far. * * * Precisely the same can be said here. Sandoval-Sanchez is a person whose unregistered presence in this country, without more, constitutes a crime.⁴⁰ His

40. [Footnote 8 in original] Sandoval-Sanchez was arrested on June 23, 1977. His deportation hearing was held on October 7, 1977. By that time he was under a duty to apply for registration as an alien. A failure to do so plainly constituted a continuing crime. INA §§ 262, 266. Sandoval-Sanchez was not, of course, prosecuted for this crime, and we do not know whether or not he did make the required application. But it is safe to assume that the exclusionary rule would never be at issue in a deportation proceeding brought against an alien who entered the country unlawfully and then voluntarily admitted to his unlawful presence in an application for registration.

Sandoval-Sanchez was also not prosecuted for his initial illegal entry into this country, an independent crime under INA § 275. We need not decide whether or not remaining in this country following an illegal entry is a continuing or a completed crime under § 275. The question is academic, of course, since in either event the unlawful entry remains both punishable and continuing grounds for deportation.

release within our borders would immediately subject him to criminal penalties. His release would clearly frustrate the express public policy against an alien's unregistered presence in this country. Even the objective of deterring Fourth Amendment violations should not require such a result. The constable's blunder may allow the criminal to go free, but we have never suggested that it allows the criminal to continue in the commission of an ongoing crime. When the crime in question involves unlawful presence in this country, the criminal may go free, but he should not go free within our borders.

Other factors also weigh against applying the exclusionary rule in deportation proceedings. The INS currently operates a deliberately simple deportation hearing system, streamlined to permit the quick resolution of very large numbers of deportation actions, and it is against this backdrop that the costs of the exclusionary rule must be assessed. The costs of applying the exclusionary rule, like the benefits, must be measured at the margin.

The average immigration judge handles about six deportation hearings per day. Neither the hearing officers nor the attorneys participating in those hearings are likely to be well versed in the intricacies of Fourth Amendment law. The prospect of even occasional invocation of the exclusionary rule might significantly change and complicate the character of these proceedings. The BIA has described the practical problems as follows:

"Absent the applicability of the exclusionary rule, questions relating to deportability routinely involve simple factual allegations and matters of proof. When Fourth Amendment issues are raised at deportation hearings, the result is a diversion of attention from the main issues which those proceedings were created to resolve, both in terms of the expertise of the administrative decision makers and of the structure of the forum to accommodate inquiries into search and seizure questions. The result frequently seems to be a long, confused record in which the issues are not clearly defined and in which there is voluminous testimony. . . . The ensuing delays and inordinate amount of time spent on such cases at all levels has an adverse impact on the effective administration of the immigration laws. . . . This is particularly true in a proceeding where delay may be the only 'defense' available and where problems already exist with the use of dilatory tactics."

This sober assessment of the exclusionary rule's likely costs, by the agency that would have to administer the rule in at least the administrative tiers of its application, cannot be brushed off lightly.

The BIA's concerns are reinforced by the staggering dimension of the problem that the INS confronts. Immigration officers apprehend over one million deportable aliens in this country every year. A single agent may arrest many illegal aliens every day. Although the investigatory burden does not justify the commission of constitutional violations, the officers cannot be expected to compile elaborate, contemporaneous, written reports detailing the circumstances of every arrest. At present an officer simply completes a "Record of Deportable Alien" that is introduced to prove the INS's case at the deportation hearing; the officer rarely must attend the hearing. Fourth Amendment suppression hearings would undoubtedly require considerably more, and the likely burden on the administration of the immigration laws would be correspondingly severe.

Finally, the INS advances the credible argument that applying the exclusionary rule to deportation proceedings might well result in the suppression of large amounts of information that had been obtained entirely lawfully. INS arrests occur in crowded and confused circumstances. Though the INS agents are instructed to follow procedures that adequately protect Fourth Amendment interests, agents will usually be able to testify only to the fact that they followed INS rules. The demand for a precise account of exactly what happened in each particular arrest would plainly preclude mass arrests, even when the INS is confronted, as it often is, with massed numbers of ascertainably illegal aliens, and even when the arrests can be and are conducted in full compliance with all Fourth Amendment requirements.

In these circumstances we are persuaded that the Janis balance between costs and benefits comes out against applying the exclusionary rule in civil deportation hearings held by the INS. By all appearances the INS has already taken sensible and reasonable steps to deter Fourth Amendment violations by its officers, and this makes the likely additional deterrent value of the exclusionary rule small. The costs of applying the exclusionary rule in the context of civil deportation hearings are high.

* * *

V

We do not condone any violations of the Fourth Amendment that may have occurred in the arrests of respondents Lopez-Mendoza or Sandoval-Sanchez. Moreover, no challenge is raised here to the INS's own internal regulations. Our conclusions concerning the exclusionary rule's value might change, if there developed good reason to believe that Fourth Amendment violations by INS officers were widespread. Finally, we do not deal here with egregious violations of Fourth Amendment or other liberties that might transgress notions of fundamental fairness and undermine the probative value of the evidence obtained.⁴¹ At issue here is the exclusion of credible evidence gathered in connection with peaceful arrests by INS officers. We hold that evidence derived from such arrests need not be suppressed in an INS civil deportation hearing.

The judgment of the Court of Appeals is therefore Reversed.

41. [Footnote 5 in original] We note that subsequent to its decision in Matter of Sandoval, 17 I. & N. Dec. 70 (1979), the BIA held that evidence will be excluded if the circumstances surrounding a particular arrest and interrogation would render use of the evidence obtained thereby "fundamentally unfair" and in violation of due process requirements of the Fifth Amendment. Matter of Toro, 17 I. & N. Dec. 340, 343 (1980). See also Matter of Garcia, 17 I. & N. Dec. 319, 321 (BIA 1980) (suppression of admission of alienage obtained after request for counsel had been repeatedly refused) * * *.

■ JUSTICE BRENNAN, dissenting.

I fully agree with JUSTICE WHITE that under the analysis developed by the Court in such cases as United States v. Janis, the exclusionary rule must apply in civil deportation proceedings. However, * * * I believe the basis for the exclusionary rule does not derive from its effectiveness as a deterrent, but is instead found in the requirements of the Fourth Amendment itself. My view of the exclusionary rule would, of course, require affirmance of the Court of Appeals. In this case, federal law enforcement officers arrested respondents Sandoval-Sanchez and Lopez-Mendoza in violation of their Fourth Amendment rights. The subsequent admission of any evidence secured pursuant to these unlawful arrests in civil deportation proceedings would, in my view, also infringe those rights. The Government of the United States bears an obligation to obey the Fourth Amendment; that obligation is not lifted simply because the law enforcement officers were agents of the Immigration and Naturalization Service, nor because the evidence obtained by those officers was to be used in civil deportation proceedings.

■ JUSTICE WHITE, dissenting.

The Court today holds that the exclusionary rule does not apply in civil deportation proceedings. Because I believe that the conclusion of the majority is based upon an incorrect assessment of the costs and benefits of applying the rule in such proceedings, I respectfully dissent.

The paradigmatic case in which the exclusionary rule is applied is when the prosecutor seeks to use evidence illegally obtained by law enforcement officials in his case-in-chief in a criminal trial. In other classes of cases, the rule is applicable only when the likelihood of deterring the unwanted conduct outweighs the societal costs imposed by exclusion of relevant evidence. United States v. Janis. Thus, the Court has, in a number of situations, refused to extend the exclusionary rule to proceedings other than the criminal trial itself. For example, in Stone v. Powell, the Court held that the deterrent effect of the rule would not be reduced by refusing to allow a state prisoner to litigate a Fourth Amendment claim in federal habeas corpus proceedings if he was afforded a full and fair opportunity to litigate it in state court. Similarly, in United States v. Calandra, we concluded that “[a]ny incremental deterrent effect which might be achieved by extending the rule to grand jury proceedings is uncertain at best.” And in United States v. Janis, we declined to extend the exclusionary rule to bar the introduction in a federal civil proceeding of evidence unconstitutionally seized by a state law enforcement officer. In all of these cases it was unquestioned that the illegally seized evidence would not be admissible in the case-in-chief of the proceeding for which the evidence was gathered; only its collateral use was permitted.

Civil deportation proceedings are in no sense “collateral.” The majority correctly acknowledges that the “primary objective” of the INS agent is “to use evidence in the civil deportation proceeding” and that “the agency officials who effect the unlawful arrest are the same officials who subsequently bring the deportation action.” The Immigration and Naturalization Service likewise concedes that INS agents are “in the business of conducting searches for and seizures of illegal aliens for the purpose of bringing about their deportation.” Thus, unlike the situation in Janis, the conduct challenged here falls within “the offending officer’s zone of primary interest.” The majority nonetheless concludes that application of the rule in such proceedings is unlikely to provide significant deterrence. Because INS agents are law enforcement officials whose mission is closely analogous to that of police officers and because civil deportation proceedings are to INS agents what criminal trials are to police officers, I cannot agree with that assessment.

The exclusionary rule rests on the Court’s belief that exclusion has a sufficient deterrent effect to justify its imposition, and the Court has not abandoned the rule. As long as that is the case, there is no principled basis for distinguishing between the deterrent effect of the rule in criminal cases and in civil deportation proceedings. The majority attempts to justify the distinction by asserting that deportation will still be possible when evidence not derived from the illegal search or seizure is independently sufficient. However, that is no less true in criminal cases. The suppression of some evidence does not bar prosecution for the crime, and in many cases even though some evidence is suppressed a conviction will nonetheless be obtained.

The majority also suggests that the fact that most aliens elect voluntary departure dilutes the deterrent effect of the exclusionary rule, because the infrequency of challenges to admission of evidence will mean that “the consequences from the point of view of the officer’s overall arrest and deportation record will be trivial.” It is true that a majority of apprehended aliens elect voluntary departure, while a lesser number go through civil deportation proceedings and a still smaller number are criminally prosecuted. However, that fact no more diminishes the importance of the exclusionary sanction than the fact that many criminal defendants plead guilty dilutes the rule’s deterrent effect in criminal cases. The possibility of exclusion of evidence quite obviously plays a part in the decision whether to contest either civil deportation or criminal prosecution. Moreover, in concentrating on the incentives under which the individual agent operates to the exclusion of the incentives under which the agency as a whole operates neglects the “systemic” deterrent effect that may lead the agency to adopt policies and procedures that conform to Fourth Amendment standards.

The majority believes “perhaps most important” the fact that the INS has a “comprehensive scheme” in place for deterring Fourth Amendment violations by punishing agents who commit such violations, but it points to not a single instance in which that scheme has been invoked.⁴² Also,

42. [Footnote 2 in original] The INS suggests that its disciplinary rules are “not mere paper procedures” and that over a period of four years 20 officers were suspended or terminated for misconduct toward aliens. The INS does not assert, however, that any of immigration officers are instructed and examined in Fourth Amendment law, and it is suggested that this education is another reason why the exclusionary rule is unnecessary. A contrary lesson could be discerned from the existence of these programs, however, when it is recalled that they were instituted during "a legal regime in which the cases and commentators uniformly sanctioned the invocation of the rule in deportation proceedings." Thus, rather than supporting a conclusion that the exclusionary rule is unnecessary, the existence of these programs instead suggests that the exclusionary rule has created incentives for the agency to ensure that its officers follow the dictates of the Constitution. Since the deterrent function of the rule is furthered if it alters either "the behavior of individual law enforcement officers or the policies of their departments," it seems likely that it was the rule's deterrent effect that led to the programs to which the Court now points for its assertion that the rule would have no deterrent effect.

The suggestion that alternative remedies, such as civil suits, provide adequate protection is unrealistic. Contrary to the situation in criminal cases, once the Government has improperly obtained evidence against an illegal alien, he is removed from the country and is therefore in no position to file civil actions in federal courts. Moreover, those who are legally in the country but are nonetheless subjected to illegal searches and seizures are likely to be poor and uneducated, and many will not speak English. It is doubtful that the threat of civil suits by these persons will strike fear into the hearts of those who enforce the Nation's immigration laws.

It is also my belief that the majority exaggerates the costs associated with applying the exclusionary rule in this context. Evidence obtained through violation of the Fourth Amendment is not automatically suppressed, and any inquiry into the burdens associated with application of the exclusionary rule must take that fact into account. In United States v. Leon, we have held that the exclusionary rule is not applicable when officers are acting in objective good faith. Thus, if the agents neither knew nor should have known that they were acting contrary to the dictates of the Fourth Amendment, evidence will not be suppressed even if it is held that their conduct was illegal.

As is noted, the BIA has already held that evidence will be suppressed if it results from egregious violations of constitutional standards. Thus, the mechanism for dealing with suppression motions exists and is utilized, significantly decreasing the force of the majority's predictions of dire consequences flowing from "even occasional invocation of the exclusionary rule." Although the standard currently utilized by the BIA may not be precisely coextensive with the good-faith exception, any incremental increase in the amount of evidence that is suppressed through application of Leon is unlikely to be significant. Likewise, any difference that may exist between the two standards is unlikely to increase significantly the number of suppression motions filed.

these officers were disciplined for Fourth Amendment violations, and it appears that the 11 officers who were terminated were terminated for rape or assault.

Contrary to the view of the majority, it is not the case that Sandoval-Sanchez' "unregistered presence in this country, without more, constitutes a crime." Section 275 of the Immigration and Nationality Act makes it a crime to enter the United States illegally. The first offense constitutes a misdemeanor, and subsequent offenses constitute felonies. Those few cases that have construed this statute have held that a violation takes place at the time of entry and that the statute does not describe a continuing offense. Although this Court has not construed the statute, it has suggested in dictum that this interpretation is correct, and it is relatively clear that such an interpretation is most consistent with the statutory language. Therefore, it is simply not the case that suppressing evidence in deportation proceedings will "allo[w] the criminal to continue in the commission of an ongoing crime." It is true that some courts have construed § 276 of the Act, which applies to aliens previously deported who enter or are found in the United States, to describe a continuing offense. In such cases, however, the Government will have a record of the prior deportation and will have little need for any evidence that might be suppressed through application of the exclusionary rule. * * *

Although the majority relies on the registration provisions of INA §§ 262 and 266 for its "continuing crime" argument, those provisions provide little support for the general rule laid down that the exclusionary rule does not apply in civil deportation proceedings. First, § 262 requires that aliens register within 30 days of entry into the country. Thus, for the first 30 days failure to register is not a crime. Second, § 266 provides that only willful failure to register is a misdemeanor. Therefore, "unregistered presence in this country, without more," does not constitute a crime; rather, unregistered presence plus willfulness must be shown. There is no finding that Sandoval-Sanchez willfully failed to register, which is a necessary predicate to the conclusion that he is engaged in a continuing crime. Third, only aliens 14 years of age or older are required to register; those under 14 years of age are to be registered by their parents or guardian. By the majority's reasoning, therefore, perhaps the exclusionary rule should apply in proceedings to deport children under 14, since their failure to register does not constitute a crime.

Application of the rule, we are told, will also seriously interfere with the "streamlined" nature of deportation hearings because "[n]either the hearing officers nor the attorneys participating in those hearings are likely to be well versed in the intricacies of Fourth Amendment law." Yet the majority deprecates the deterrent benefit of the exclusionary rule in part on the ground that immigration officers receive a thorough education in Fourth Amendment law. The implication that hearing officers should defer to law enforcement officers' superior understanding of constitutional principles is startling indeed.

Prior to the decision of the Board of Immigration Appeals in Matter of Sandoval, neither the Board nor any court had held that the exclusionary rule did not apply in civil deportation proceedings. The Board in Sandoval noted that there were "fewer than fifty" BIA proceedings since 1952 in which motions had been made to suppress evidence on Fourth Amendment grounds. This is so despite the fact that "immigration law practitioners have been informed by the major treatise in their field that the exclusionary rule was available to clients facing deportation. See 1A C. Gordon and H. Rosenfield, Immigration Law and Procedure § 5.2c at 5-31 (rev. ed. 1980)." The suggestion that "[t]he prospect of even occasional invocation of the exclusionary rule might significantly change and complicate the character of these proceedings," is thus difficult to credit. The simple fact is that prior to 1979 the exclusionary rule was available in civil deportation proceedings, and there is no indication that it significantly interfered with the ability of the INS to function.

Finally, the majority suggests that application of the exclusionary rule might well result in the suppression of large amounts of information legally obtained because of the "crowded and confused circumstances" surrounding mass arrests. The result would be that INS agents would have to keep a "precise account of exactly what happened in each particular arrest," which would be impractical considering the "massed numbers of ascertainably illegal aliens." Rather than constituting a rejection of the application of the exclusionary rule in civil deportation proceedings, however, this argument amounts to a rejection of the application of the Fourth Amendment to the activities of INS agents. If the pandemonium attending immigration arrests is so great that violations of the Fourth Amendment cannot be ascertained for the purpose of applying the exclusionary rule, there is no reason to think that such violations can be ascertained for purposes of civil suits or internal disciplinary proceedings, both of which are proceedings that the majority suggests provide adequate deterrence against Fourth Amendment violations. The Court may be willing to throw up its hands in dismay because it is administratively inconvenient to determine whether constitutional rights have been violated, but we neglect our duty when we subordinate constitutional rights to expediency in such a manner. Particularly is this so when, as here, there is but a weak showing that administrative efficiency will be seriously compromised.

In sum, I believe that the costs and benefits of applying the exclusionary rule in civil deportation proceedings do not differ in any significant way from the costs and benefits of applying the rule in ordinary criminal proceedings. Unless the exclusionary rule is to be wholly done away with and the Court's belief that it has deterrent effects abandoned, it should be applied in deportation proceedings when evidence has been obtained by deliberate violations of the Fourth Amendment or by conduct a reasonably competent officer would know is contrary to the Constitution. Accordingly, I dissent.

■ JUSTICE MARSHALL, dissenting.

I agree with Justice WHITE that application to this case of the mode of analysis embodied in the decisions of the Court in United States v. Janis and United States v. Calandra compels the conclusion that the exclusionary rule should apply in civil deportation proceedings. However, I continue to believe that that mode of analysis fails to reflect the constitutionally mandated character of the exclusionary rule. In my view, a sufficient reason for excluding from civil deportation proceedings evidence obtained in violation of the Fourth Amendment is that there is no other way to achieve “the twin goals of enabling the judiciary to avoid the taint of partnership in official lawlessness and of assuring the people—all potential victims of unlawful government conduct—that the government would not profit from its lawless behavior, thus minimizing the risk of seriously undermining popular trust in government.”

■ JUSTICE STEVENS, dissenting.

Because the Court has not yet held that the rule of United States v. Leon has any application to warrantless searches, I do not join the portion of JUSTICE WHITE’s opinion that relies on that case. I do, however, agree with the remainder of his dissenting opinion.

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. Compare the constitutional objections raised by the two individuals in Lopez–Mendoza. Why was the Court able to reject Lopez–Mendoza’s objection more easily than that of Sandoval–Sanchez?

2. The question whether to extend the exclusionary rule to deportation proceedings arose partly because of the courts’ uniform depiction of deportation as “civil” rather than “criminal.” As you saw in Fong Yue Ting, pages 136–55 above, this characterization has colored the courts’ analyses of various procedural issues in deportation cases. Now that you have studied the subject in greater depth, you should reevaluate the extent, if any, to which the goals of deportation really deviate from those of criminal punishment.

3. Unlike the approaches of Justices Brennan and Marshall, those of the majority and Justice White require the balancing of competing interests. Yet the latter two opinions differ from each other not merely in the weights they assign the various benefits and costs, but also in the starting points of their analyses. In order to determine whether the exclusionary rule should apply in deportation proceedings, what fundamentally different questions do the majority and Justice White attempt to answer?

4. To the extent possible, match up each of the majority’s arguments with the corresponding responses of Justice White. Which do you find more persuasive? Are there any other arguments you would add?

5. Section V of the Court’s opinion sets out some important qualifiers. The Court says, for example: “[W]e do not deal here with egregious violations of Fourth Amendment or other liberties that might transgress notions of fundamental fairness and undermine the probative value of the evidence obtained” (emphasis added).

That dictum is especially relevant in the context of the modern debate over racial profiling. What if an immigration officer stops only those cars whose drivers “look Latino” (or Arabic, or Muslim)? In United States v. Brignoni–Ponce, 422 U.S. 873, 885–87, 95 S.Ct. 2574, 2582–83, 45 L.Ed.2d 607, 619–20 (1975), the Supreme Court held that ethnic appearance alone cannot support a finding of reasonable suspicion for a Border Patrol stop. In dictum, however, the Court suggested that Border Patrol officers could legally consider Latino appearance as one factor that, combined with others, could give rise to reasonable suspicion. In United States v. Montero-Camargo, 208 F.3d 1122 (9th Cir. 2000) (en banc), the Ninth Circuit rejected that dictum. The court reasoned that (a) the much higher Latino percentage of the local population now makes demographic links between Latino ethnicity and unlawful status unreliable; and (b) racial profiling unfairly stigmatizes.

Suppose, then, a vehicle is stopped either solely or partly because the driver was of Latino appearance. On the assumption that the stop was unlawful, is the resulting evidence suppressible in a removal proceeding? The Ninth Circuit in Arguelles-Vasquez v. INS, 786 F.2d 1433 (9th Cir. 1986), held such conduct “egregious” for Lopez-Mendoza purposes and ordered the evidence suppressed.⁴³ And in Orhorhaghe v. INS, 38 F.3d 488 (9th Cir. 1994), the same court held that the INS’s investigation of an individual based solely on his or her “foreign-sounding” name is also egregious, and that the resulting evidence would be suppressed even though it was probative. At a time of alleged selective investigation of Arab-Americans and Muslims, these issues command ever greater significance. See the ethnic profiling discussion in chapter 10, section G.

Is the Ninth Circuit right? Do the cases described in footnote 5 of Lopez-Mendoza (accompanying the text quoted above) shed any light on whether the Supreme Court thinks probative evidence is ever suppressible on egregiousness grounds in removal proceedings? If it is, would the Supreme Court regard racial profiling as “egregious”?

6. In Lopez-Rodriguez v. Mukasey, 536 F.3d 1012 (9th Cir. 2008), the court held that a search is egregious when the officers either deliberately violate the Fourth Amendment or reasonably should know the search is unconstitutional. In that case, a home search conducted “without a warrant, consent, or exigent circumstances” was held to be egregious. Accordingly, the fruits of that search were ordered suppressed in removal proceedings.

7. There have been some thoughtful discussions of the privacy implications of the fourth amendment in immigration cases.⁴⁴

8. See also M. Isabel Medina, Exploring the Use of the Word “Citizen” in Writings on the Fourth Amendment, 83 Indiana L.J. 1557 (2008) (criti-

43. Accord, Gonzalez-Rivera v. INS, 22 F.3d 1441 (9th Cir. 1994) (concluding that violations can be “egregious” for Lopez-Mendoza purposes even when the evidence is probative).

44. See, e.g., Raquel Aldana, Of Katz and “Aliens”: Privacy Expectations and the Immigration Raids, 41 Univ. Calif. Davis L. Rev. 1081 (2008); cf. Anil Kalhan, The Fourth Amendment and Privacy Implications of Interior Immigration Enforcement, 41 U.C. Davis L. Rev. 1137 (2008) (urging recognition of an immigration status privacy interest and arguing that demanding verification of immigration status in an ever wider variety of daily transactions has underappreciated social costs).

cizing the erroneous use of the word “citizen” to describe the class of individuals protected by the fourth amendment).

OTHER ILLEGALLY OBTAINED STATEMENTS

In Lopez-Mendoza the constitutional provision that the INS officers had been accused of violating was the Fourth Amendment ban on unreasonable searches and seizures. The Court leaves open whether “egregious violations of Fourth Amendment or other liberties” (emphasis added) might compel contrary results.

The type of illegally obtained statement in which the argument for suppression is strongest is the statement that has been illegally coerced. The law is clear that fifth amendment due process makes such a statement suppressible in deportation proceedings.⁴⁵ In such a case, quite apart from the benefit of deterring official lawlessness, the statement will be suppressed simply because its probative value is dubious.

The fifth amendment privilege against self-incrimination can be asserted in any type of proceeding to refuse disclosure of “incriminating” information—i.e., that which either could be used in a subsequent criminal proceeding or could lead to other evidence that might be used in a criminal proceeding. In re Gault, 387 U.S. 1, 47–48, 87 S.Ct. 1428, 1454, 18 L.Ed.2d 527, 557 (1967). The privilege applies in removal cases, therefore, as long as the particular statement would be incriminating. See, e.g., United States v. Alderete-Deras, 743 F.2d 645 (9th Cir.1984); Wall v. INS, 722 F.2d 1442, 1443 (9th Cir.1984). Most removal cases involving deportability entail conduct that constitutes a crime or at least some of the essential elements of a crime, e.g., INA §§ 266(a), 266(b), 275, 276 (registration and entry-related crimes), although one common deportability ground—overstaying a nonimmigrant visa—does not. See Matter of Santos, 19 I. & N. Dec. 105, 109–10 n. 2 (BIA 1984).

Suppose one who admits to being (or who has been proved to be) a noncitizen validly asserts his or her privilege against self-incrimination, and the government nonetheless requires the person to answer. In such a case the resulting statement will be suppressible in removal proceedings. Tashnizi v. INS, 585 F.2d 781, 782 (5th Cir.1978); Matter of Carillo, 17 I. & N. Dec. 30, 32–33 (BIA 1979).

The converse question arises when the person remains silent. In contrast to criminal proceedings, where the law clearly prohibits the government from compelling the defendant to testify, it is unclear whether an immigration judge in deportability proceedings may compel the respondent to testify. Professor Daniel Kanstroom makes a strong argument that the IJ lacks the power to compel the person to answer even non-incriminating questions. See Daniel Kanstroom, Hello Darkness: Involuntary Testimony and Silence as Evidence in Deportation Proceedings, 4 Georgetown 45. E.g., Bustos-Torres v. INS, 898 F.2d 1053, 1057 (5th Cir.1990); Matter of Garcia, 17 I. & N. Dec. 319, 321 (BIA 1980).

Immigration L.J. 599, 611-18 (1990). We shall return to that problem, and to the related question of whether silence will support adverse inferences, on pages 715-17 below.

Things change when the problematic government conduct occurs overseas. In United States v. Verdugo-Urquidez, 494 U.S. 259, 110 S.Ct. 1056, 108 L.Ed.2d 222 (1990), the Supreme Court held that the Fourth Amendment does not apply to overseas searches and seizures, by United States officials, of the property of noncitizens who reside outside the United States. Professor Victor Romero sees a common thread in this case and Lopez-Mendoza. See Victor C. Romero, Whatever Happened to the Fourth Amendment? Undocumented Immigrants' Rights after INS v. Lopez-Mendoza and United States v. Verdugo-Urquidez, 65 Southern California L. Rev. 999 (1992). In United States v. Alvarez-Machain, 504 U.S. 655, 112 S.Ct. 2188, 119 L.Ed.2d 441 (1992), the Court went a step further. It held that the U.S. government's forcible abduction of a Mexican national from Mexico did not violate the United States-Mexico extradition treaty and did not destroy the criminal jurisdiction of the United States court. The Supreme Court has also ruled that the Fifth Amendment privilege against self-incrimination does not protect against the threat of foreign prosecution.⁴⁶

Finally, article 36 of the Vienna Convention on Consular Relations, 21 U.S.T. 77 (Apr. 24, 1963), requires law enforcement officials to advise any arrested foreign nationals of their right to communicate with their consulates. At least two courts have held, however, that the government's violation of this rule does not make the arrestee's subsequent statement suppressible. United States v. Lombera-Camorlinga, 206 F.3d 882 (9th Cir. 2000) (en banc); United States v. Li, 206 F.3d 56 (1st Cir. 2000).

NOTE ON JUDICIAL POLITICS

INS v. Lopez-Mendoza is an excellent illustration of the political dynamics that sometimes characterize the relationship between courts. In the early 1980's the Ninth Circuit and the Supreme Court tangled hard and often. A greater ideological gulf between two federal courts would be difficult to imagine. The 1978 enactment of the Omnibus Judge Act, Pub.L. 95-486, 92 Stat. 1629, combined with natural attrition, had enabled President Carter to appoint 15 of the 26 Ninth Circuit judges. In the space of a few years a Republican-dominated court had been transformed into a court dominated by Democrats.⁴⁷ The Supreme Court had a far more conservative membership than the Ninth Circuit even then.

During those years, the Supreme Court reversed the Ninth Circuit again and again. The battles encompassed a wide range of subject matter, see Hager, 9th Circuit is "0 for 22" in High Court Reviews, Los Angeles

46. See United States v. Balsys, 524 U.S. 666, 118 S.Ct. 2218, 141 L.Ed.2d 575 (1998); Irene Scharf, Commentary on United States v. Balsys, 3 BIB 886 (Sept. 1, 1998).

47. Successive presidents have further transformed both courts.

Times (June 25, 1984), at 1, 16, but nowhere was the ideological rift wider than in immigration. [Since the Ninth Circuit generally handles approximately one-half of the nation's immigration cases, see, e.g., Cathy Catterson, Changes in Appellate Caseload and its Processing, 48 Arizona L. Rev. 287, 297 (2006)], those skirmishes took on more than the usual importance.

You have already seen many of the clashes. In Jong Ha Wang, pages 608–18 above, decided in 1981, the Supreme Court ordered a summary reversal (no briefs, no oral argument) of the Ninth Circuit's en banc decision on the subjects of motions to reopen and extreme hardship. In 1982 the Supreme Court in INS v. Miranda, 459 U.S. 14, 103 S.Ct. 281, 74 L.Ed.2d 12 (1982), again by summary reversal, overturned a Ninth Circuit decision applying the doctrine of equitable estoppel against the INS. A week later, in Landon v. Plasencia, 459 U.S. 21, 103 S.Ct. 321, 74 L.Ed.2d 21 (1982), the Supreme Court reversed a Ninth Circuit decision requiring that Fleuti determinations be made in deportation proceedings (rather than exclusion proceedings). The Court's decision in INS v. Phinpathya, noted on pages 583–84 above, rendered in 1984, reversed the Ninth Circuit and, in the process, disapproved a twenty-year-old line of Ninth Circuit decisions that had flexibly interpreted the continuous physical presence requirement for suspension of deportation (the predecessor to cancellation of removal, part B). The 1984 Lopez-Mendoza decision that you just read was also a reversal of the Ninth Circuit.⁴⁸

Immigration, as you no doubt have discovered by now, is intensely ideological. Strongly held views about sovereignty, law enforcement, and national security inevitably collide with equally strong views on human rights, civil liberties, and compassion. Apart from those and a wide range of other naturally conflicting substantive values, the immigration cases frequently raise questions that implicate the role of the courts vis-a-vis both a democratically elected Congress and an administrative bureaucracy to which Congress has delegated important policymaking authority.

b. BURDEN OF PROOF AND SUFFICIENCY OF THE EVIDENCE

Woodby v. INS

Supreme Court of the United States, 1966.
385 U.S. 276, 87 S.Ct. 483, 17 L.Ed.2d 362.

■ MR. JUSTICE STEWART delivered the opinion of the Court.

The question presented by these cases is what burden of proof the Government must sustain in deportation proceedings. We have concluded that it is incumbent upon the Government in such proceedings to establish

48. See also INS v. Abudu, page 755 below (reversing Ninth Circuit decision liberalizing standard of review of refusals to reopen). See generally Sana Loue, Alien Rights and Government Authority: An Exam- ination of the Conflicting Views of the Ninth Circuit Court of Appeals and the United States Supreme Court, 22 San Diego L.Rev. 1021 (1985).

the facts supporting deportability by clear, unequivocal, and convincing evidence.

In Sherman (No. 80), the petitioner is a resident alien who entered this country from Poland in 1920 as a 14-year-old boy. In 1963 the Immigration and Naturalization Service instituted proceedings to deport him upon the ground that he had re-entered the United States in 1938, following a trip abroad, without inspection as an alien. After a hearing before a special inquiry officer, the petitioner was ordered to be deported, and the Board of Immigration Appeals dismissed his appeal.

The Government's evidence showed that the petitioner had obtained a passport in 1937 under the name of Samuel Levine, representing himself as a United States citizen. Someone using this passport sailed to France in June 1937, proceeded to Spain, returned to the United States in December 1938, aboard the S.S. Ausonia, and was admitted without being examined as an alien. To establish that it was the petitioner who had traveled under this passport, the Government introduced the testimony of Edward Morrow, an American citizen who had fought in the Spanish Civil War. Morrow was at first unable to remember the name Samuel Levine or identify the petitioner, but eventually stated that he thought he had known the petitioner as "Sam Levine," had seen him while fighting for the Loyalists in Spain during 1937 and 1938, and had returned with him to the United States aboard the S.S. Ausonia in December 1938. Morrow conceded that his recollection of events occurring 27 years earlier was imperfect, and admitted that his identification of the petitioner might be mistaken.

It is not clear what standard of proof the special inquiry officer and the Board of Immigration Appeals on de novo review applied in determining that it was the petitioner who had traveled to Spain and re-entered the United States under the Samuel Levine passport. * * *

Upon petition for review, the Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit originally set aside the deportation order, upon the ground that the Government has the burden of proving the facts supporting deportability beyond a reasonable doubt. The court reversed itself, however, upon a rehearing en banc, holding that the Government need only prove its case with "reasonable, substantial, and probative evidence." We granted certiorari.

* * *

[Sherman was consolidated with Woodby v. INS, where the immigration judge and the BIA had found an LPR deportable on grounds stemming from prostitution. There had been questions of fact concerning whether the prostitution had been the product of duress. The Sixth Circuit affirmed. Neither the administrative authorities nor the court of appeals specified the governing standard of proof.—Eds.]

In the prevailing opinion in the Sherman case, the Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit stated that "[i]f the slate were clean," it "might well agree that the standard of persuasion for deportation should be similar to that in denaturalization, where the Supreme Court has insisted that the evidence must be 'clear, unequivocal, and convincing' and that the Government needs 'more than a bare preponderance of the evidence' to prevail. * * * But here," the court thought, "Congress has spoken * * *." This view was based upon two provisions of the Immigration and Nationality Act which use the language "reasonable, substantial, and probative evidence" in connection with deportation orders. The provisions in question are § 106(a)(4) of the Act which states that a deportation order, "if supported by reasonable, substantial, and probative evidence on the record considered as a whole, shall be conclusive," and § 242(b)(4) of the Act which provides inter alia that "no decision of deportability shall be valid unless it is based upon reasonable, substantial, and probative evidence."⁴⁹

It seems clear, however, that these two statutory provisions are addressed not to the degree of proof required at the administrative level in deportation proceedings, but to quite a different subject—the scope of judicial review. The elementary but crucial difference between burden of proof and scope of review is, of course, a commonplace in the law. The difference is most graphically illustrated in a criminal case. There the prosecution is generally required to prove the elements of the offense beyond a reasonable doubt. But if the correct burden of proof was imposed at the trial, judicial review is generally limited to ascertaining whether the evidence relied upon by the trier of fact was of sufficient quality and substantiality to support the rationality of the judgment. In other words, an appellate court in a criminal case ordinarily does not ask itself whether it believes that the evidence at the trial established guilt beyond a reasonable doubt, but whether the judgment is supported by substantial evidence.

That § 106(a)(4) relates exclusively to judicial review is made abundantly clear by its language, its context, and its legislative history. Section 106 was added to the Act in 1961 in order "to create a single, separate, statutory form of judicial review of administrative orders for the deportation and exclusion of aliens from the United States." The section is entitled "Judicial Review of Orders of Deportation and Exclusion," and by its terms provides "the sole and exclusive procedure for" the "judicial review of all final orders of deportation." Subsection 106(a)(4) is a specific directive to the courts in which petitions for review are filed.

It is hardly less clear that the other provision upon which the Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit relied, § 242(b)(4) of the Act, is also addressed to reviewing courts, and, insofar as it represents a yardstick for the administrative factfinder, goes, not to the burden of proof, but rather to the quality and nature of the evidence upon which a deportation order must be based. The provision declares that "reasonable, substantial, and probative evidence" shall be the measure of whether a deportability decision is "valid"—a word that implies scrutiny by a reviewing tribunal of a decision already reached by the trier of the facts. The location of this provision in a section containing provisions dealing with procedures before the special inquiry officer has little significance when it is remembered that the original 1952 Act did not itself contain a framework for judicial review—although such review was, of course, available by habeas corpus or otherwise. And whatever ambiguity might be thought to lie in the location of this section is resolved by its legislative history. The Senate Report explained § 242(b)(4) as follows: “The requirement that the decision of the special inquiry officer shall be based on reasonable, substantial and probative evidence means that, where the decision rests upon evidence of such a nature that it cannot be said that a reasonable person might not have reached the conclusion which was reached, the case may not be reversed because the judgment of the appellate body differs from that of the administrative body.”

49. Former INA § 106(a)(4) has been replaced by section 242(b)(4)(B), which makes the administrative findings of fact "conclusive unless any reasonable adjudica-tor would be compelled to conclude to the contrary." Former INA § 242(b)(4) now appears, word for word, in INA § 240(c)(3).—Eds.

We conclude, therefore, that Congress has not addressed itself to the question of what degree of proof is required in deportation proceedings. It is the kind of question which has traditionally been left to the judiciary to resolve, and its resolution is necessary in the interest of the evenhanded administration of the Immigration and Nationality Act.

The petitioners urge that the appropriate burden of proof in deportation proceedings should be that which the law imposes in criminal cases—the duty of proving the essential facts beyond a reasonable doubt. The Government, on the other hand, points out that a deportation proceeding is not a criminal case, and that the appropriate burden of proof should consequently be the one generally imposed in civil cases and administrative proceedings—the duty of prevailing by a mere preponderance of the evidence.

To be sure, a deportation proceeding is not a criminal prosecution. But it does not syllogistically follow that a person may be banished from this country upon no higher degree of proof than applies in a negligence case. This Court has not closed its eyes to the drastic deprivations that may follow when a resident of this country is compelled by our Government to forsake all the bonds formed here and go to a foreign land where he often has no contemporary identification. * * *

In denaturalization cases the Court has required the Government to establish its allegations by clear, unequivocal, and convincing evidence. The same burden has been imposed in expatriation cases.⁵⁰ That standard of proof is no stranger to the civil law.

No less a burden of proof is appropriate in deportation proceedings. The immediate hardship of deportation is often greater than that inflicted by denaturalization, which does not, immediately at least, result in expulsion from our shores. And many resident aliens have lived in this country

50. Expatriation cases are those in which the government seeks to prove that a person has voluntarily relinquished his or her citizenship. Since Woodby, the standard of proof in these cases has been reduced from longer and established stronger family, social, and economic ties here than some who have become naturalized citizens.

“clear, unequivocal, and convincing evidence” to the preponderance of the evidence standard familiar in other civil cases. See pp. 1357-73 below.—Eds.

We hold that no deportation order may be entered unless it is found by clear, unequivocal, and convincing evidence that the facts alleged as grounds for deportation are true. Accordingly, in each of the cases before us, the judgment of the Court of Appeals is set aside, and the case is remanded with directions to remand to the Immigration and Naturalization Service for such further proceedings as, consistent with this opinion, may be deemed appropriate.

* * *

■ MR. JUSTICE CLARK, whom MR. JUSTICE HARLAN joins, dissenting.

The Court, by placing a higher standard of proof on the Government, in deportation cases, has usurped the legislative function of the Congress and has in one fell swoop repealed the long-established “reasonable, substantial, and probative” burden of proof placed on the Government by specific Act of the Congress, and substituted its own “clear, unequivocal, and convincing” standard. This is but another case in a long line in which the Court has tightened the noose around the Government’s neck in immigration cases.

I.

I agree that § 106(a)(4), the 1961 amendment to the Immigration and Nationality Act of 1952, relates to judicial review of administrative orders of the Immigration Service but, with due deference, I cannot see how “It is hardly less clear” that § 242(b)(4) of the Act, as the Court says, likewise applies exclusively to judicial review. Indeed, on the contrary, the latter section was specifically enacted as the only standard of proof to be applied in deportation cases.

* * *

In essence that section, § 242(b), provides for notice and a hearing before a “special inquiry officer” of the Immigration Service; * * * The section also specifically provides that the regulations shall include requirements that “no decision of deportability shall be valid unless it is based upon reasonable, substantial, and probative evidence” and that this standard shall be the “sole and exclusive procedure for determining the deportability of an alien under this section.” This was the first time in our history that Congress had expressly placed a specific standard of proof on the Government in deportation cases. And the language Congress used made it clear that this standard related to the “burden of proof” as well as “the quality and nature of the evidence.” The requirement of “reasonable” evidence cannot be meant merely to exclude “unreasonable” or “irrational” evidence but carries the obvious connotation from history and tradition of sufficiency to sustain a conclusion by a preponderance of the evidence.⁵¹

51. [Footnote 1 in original] Thus the judicial review provision of the Administrative Procedure Act, 5 USC § 1009(e)(5), limits the scope of review to a determination of Congress in overruling Wong Yang Sung, supra, carved deportation proceedings from the judicial overtones of the Administrative Procedure Act and established a built-in administrative procedure.

This is made crystal clear by the reports of both Houses of Congress on § 242(b). The Committee Reports state in simple understandable language that:

“The requirement that the decision of the special inquiry officer shall be based on reasonable, substantial, and probative evidence means that, where the decision rests upon evidence of such a nature that it cannot be said that a reasonable person might not have reached the conclusion which was reached, the case may not be reversed because the judgment of the appellate body differs from that below.” * * *

The Court, however, in Shaughnessy v. Pedreiro, once again extended the Administrative Procedure Act’s provision respecting judicial review to deportation cases. The reaction of the Congress was identical to that of 1952 when it overruled Wong Yang Sung, supra. It enacted, in 1961, § 106(a)(4) of the Act. Just as § 242(b) was the first statutory standard of proof, § 106(a)(4) was the first express statutory standard of judicial review. It provided:

“* * * the petition [for review] shall be determined solely upon the administrative record upon which the deportation order is based and the Attorney General’s findings of fact, if supported by reasonable, substantial, and probative evidence on the record considered as a whole, shall be conclusive.”

Why Congress passed § 106(a)(4) if judicial review, as the Court holds, was already exclusively covered by § 242(b) is beyond my comprehension—unless it was engaged in shadow boxing. I cannot believe that it was.

* * *

The Court now extends the standard of Schneiderman v. United States, in denaturalization cases, i.e., “clear, unequivocal, and convincing evidence,” to deportation cases. But denaturalization and expatriation are much more oppressive cases than deportation. They deprive one of citizenship which the United States had previously conferred. The Schneiderman rule only follows the principle that vested rights can be canceled only upon clear, unequivocal, and convincing proof; it gives stability and finality to a most precious right—citizenship. An alien, however, does not enjoy citizenship but only a conditional privilege extended to him by the Congress as a matter of grace. Both petitioners, the record shows, knew this, yet they support by “substantial evidence,” and 5 USC § 1006 limits the agencies to acting on “reliable, probative, and substantial evidence.” This pattern has traditionally been held satisfied when the agency decides on the preponderance of the evidence.

remained in this country for years—46 in the case of Sherman and 10 in that of Woodby. Still, neither made any effort to obtain citizenship.

* * *

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. In interpreting former INA § 106(a)(4), the Court in Woodby employs what is sometimes called a “contextual” approach to statutory interpretation: It looks to the overall context of a statutory scheme to gain insight into the meaning of a particular provision. Section 106, of which section 106(a)(4) is a part, was enacted to provide a comprehensive set of rules governing judicial review of deportation and exclusion orders. Both the title of that section and its introductory words made clear that the focus was on judicial review. In contrast, section 242(b), of which section 242(b)(4) was a part, dealt generally with the conduct of the deportation hearing itself. Why, then, did the Court not employ an analogous contextual approach to section 242(b)(4) and hold that that provision sets forth the standard of proof at the deportation hearing, rather than the standard of judicial review? In answering this question, keep in mind that section 242 was part of the original INA enacted in 1952 and that section 106 was added in 1961.

2. Even if the placement of section 242(b)(4) provides no clue as to its meaning, Justice Clark in dissent asks a fair question: Why would Congress have added section 106(a)(4) in 1961 if, as the majority concludes, section 242(b)(4) already specified the standard of judicial review? (You will study the successor to section 106 in more detail later. See section B.6 below.) For now, you should note that former section 242 had many subsections that laid out not only the standard of review, but also various other features, including the proper court, the geographic venue, the timing, the parties, the procedure, and the requirement of prior exhaustion of administrative remedies.

3. Section 242(b)(4) required the Attorney General to issue regulations specifying that a finding of deportability will not be valid unless based on reasonable, substantial, and probative evidence. (Its successor provision, present INA § 240(c)(3), imposes this standard directly rather than require the Attorney General to announce it by regulation.) If you had been the INS counsel at the time, what inference might you have asked the court to draw from the fact that Congress, rather than simply stating the standard directly, instructed the Attorney General to embody it in the administrative regulations?

4. It is generally assumed that “reasonable, substantial, and probative evidence” is no different from the familiar “substantial evidence” standard normally used to review administrative agency factfinding in formal adjudication. The adjective “reasonable” presumably adds nothing, since even “substantial evidence” has been held to incorporate a reasonableness requirement. See, e.g., Consolo v. Federal Maritime Com’n, 383 U.S. 607, 619–20, 86 S.Ct. 1018, 1026, 16 L.Ed.2d 131, 140 (1966). The word "probative" seems equally superfluous, since it is difficult to imagine non-probative evidence that would meet the substantiality requirement of either test.⁵²

Is it even conceivable, then, that Congress would declare "reasonable, substantial, and probative evidence" to be the standard of proof in deportation cases? Would Congress really require the immigration judge to find the noncitizen deportable whenever, on the record as a whole, there is evidence from which a reasonable person could find deportability? Such a rule would be tantamount to a reverse "beyond a reasonable doubt" standard: the noncitizen would be deportable unless no reasonable person could find otherwise. How does Justice Clark handle this problem in his dissent? Do you find his explanation convincing?

5. The dissent accepts that section 106(a)(4) makes "reasonable, substantial, and probative evidence" the standard of judicial review. It concludes, however, that section 242(b)(4) makes "reasonable, substantial, and probative evidence" the standard of proof at the original deportation hearing. If the dissent is right, has Congress required the administrative authorities and the reviewing court to apply the same standard?

6. Both the majority and dissenting opinions quote approvingly from the Senate committee report's explanation of section 242(b)(4) and the identically worded passage in the House report. Whose position do you think the quoted passage supports?

7. The preceding notes raised questions as to the interpretation of section 242(b). From this point on, let us assume the majority was right to interpret sections 106(a)(4) and 242(b)(4) as prescribing only standards of review. On that assumption, the INA does not specify the standard of proof and the Court is free to adopt whatever course seems wisest. As a policy matter, how should it decide? The classic formulation of the consequences of selecting the standard of proof is this perceptive statement by Justice Harlan:

* * * [T]he trier of fact will sometimes, despite his best efforts, be wrong in his factual conclusions. In a lawsuit between two parties, a factual error can make a difference in one of two ways. First, it can result in a judgment in favor of the plaintiff when the true facts warrant a judgment for the defendant. The analogue in a criminal case would be the conviction of an innocent man. On the other hand, an erroneous factual determination can result in a judgment for the defendant when the true facts justify a judgment in plaintiff's favor. The criminal analogue would be the acquittal of a guilty man.

52. Professor Gerald Neuman has demonstrated that the "substantial evidence" test is more expansive than the "some evidence" test. Gerald L. Neuman, The Constitutional Requirement of "Some Evidence," 25

San Diego L. Rev. 631, 661-63 (1988). The latter test was used during the early stages of immigration law (and in other contexts) to review findings of fact in exclusion cases. Id. at 637-41.

The standard of proof influences the relative frequency of these two types of erroneous outcomes. If, for example, the standard of proof for a criminal trial were a preponderance of the evidence rather than proof beyond a reasonable doubt, there would be a smaller risk of factual errors that result in freeing guilty persons, but a far greater risk of factual errors that result in convicting the innocent. Because the standard of proof affects the comparative frequency of these two types of erroneous outcomes, the choice of the standard to be applied in a particular kind of litigation should, in a rational world, reflect an assessment of the comparative social disutility of each.

In re Winship, 397 U.S. 358, 370–71, 90 S.Ct. 1068, 1076, 25 L.Ed.2d 368, 379 (1970) (Harlan, J., concurring).

The majority opinion in Woodby considers the enormous potential stakes for the noncitizen. Given the observations of Justice Harlan in Winship, what else should the majority opinion have taken into account, and how should it have completed its analysis?

8. After Woodby, the Justice Department regulations codified the “clear, unequivocal, and convincing evidence” standard of proof for deportation proceedings. Cf. the present version, 8 CFR § 1240.8(a) (2008) (“clear and convincing”). What does this standard mean? From the analysis in Woodby it is clear that the standard falls somewhere between “preponderance of the evidence” and “beyond a reasonable doubt.” The BIA explicitly confirmed that assumption in Matter of Patel, 19 I. & N. Dec. 774, 783 (BIA 1988). The Board in Patel had to apply the “clear and convincing evidence” standard set out in INA § 204(a)(2) (remarriage of immigrant who had attained her LPR status by marriage). The Board said: “The clear and convincing standard imposes a lower burden than the clear, unequivocal, and convincing standard applied in deportation and denaturalization proceedings because it does not require that the evidence be unequivocal or of such a quality as to dispel all doubt.” Id. (emphasis added). Was the Board assuming that the “clear, unequivocal, and convincing evidence” standard, in contrast, does require that the evidence “dispel all doubt?” Would even the “beyond a reasonable doubt” standard require that?

9. In 1996, Congress codified Woodby, but with some modifications. If a noncitizen has previously been admitted to the United States, ICE must now prove deportability by “clear and convincing evidence.” INA § 240(c)(3)(A). The word “unequivocal” has been dropped.

●bserve also, however, that this rule operates only in the case of noncitizens who have previously been admitted. As noted in subsection A.3 above, in every removal proceeding ICE first has the burden of proving that the subject of the proceeding is a noncitizen. ●nce it does so, the burden is on the noncitizen to prove either “(A) if the alien is an applicant for admission, that the alien is clearly and beyond doubt entitled to be admitted and is not inadmissible under section 212; or (B) by clear and convincing evidence, that the alien is lawfully present in the United States pursuant to a prior admission.” INA § 240(c)(2). For purposes of prong (A), a noncitizen who is present without admission is “deemed . . . an applicant for admission,” INA § 235(a)(1), and moreover is inadmissible under INA § 212(a)(6)(A)(i). Under prong (B), once the noncitizen proves lawful presence pursuant to a prior admission, ICE will then have the burden of proving an alleged deportability ground by clear and convincing evidence. INA § 240(c)(3)(A). (If ICE does so, the noncitizen will then have the opportunity to apply for discretionary relief; if any such applications are filed, the noncitizen will have the burden of establishing his or her statutory eligibility and deservedness. See INA § 240(c)(4)).

As you try to digest these provisions, be sure to distinguish burden of proof (which party must persuade the finder of fact) from standard of proof (how convinced the factfinder must be in order for the burden to be considered discharged). With that distinction in mind, consider the following questions:

(a) What general criteria should legislatures (and courts, when legislatures have not spoken) use in deciding which of two opposing parties should have the burden of proof on a given issue? In particular, although the Harlan formulation was crafted with an eye on standard of proof, would it be helpful also with respect to burden of proof? What other criteria would make sense?

(b) Using the general criteria you have just identified, who ought to bear the burden of proof when the issue is whether a given noncitizen is present without admission?

(c) The majority opinion in Woodby points out that the government has the burden of proof in denaturalization proceedings (just as in deportation). In contrast, the noncitizen has the burden of proof in what were formerly called exclusion cases (now, determinations of inadmissibility), INA § 240(c)(2), and also in naturalization cases, INA §§ 312, 316(e), 318. What patterns can you distill?

10. INA § 291 creates an exception to the government’s burden of proof in deportability cases: A person against whom proceedings are brought has the burden of proving “the time, place, and manner” of his or her entry into the United States. If that burden is not sustained, the person is (rebuttably) presumed to be in the United States in violation of law, id., and thus deportable under INA § 237(a)(1)(B). Although section 291 refers to any “person,” courts have assumed that the government must establish “alienage” before the burden of proving time, place and manner of entry will shift. See e.g., Iran v. INS, 656 F.2d 469, 471 (9th Cir.1981). In discharging that burden, ICE is aided by a judicially created rebuttable presumption that a person born abroad is a noncitizen. E.g., Corona-Palomera v. INS, 661 F.2d 814, 818 (9th Cir. 1981); Matter of Benitez, 19 I. & N. Dec. 173, 176 (BIA 1984).

Before IIRIRA, the former INS had ample occasion to use section 291. If a noncitizen was believed to have entered without inspection or to have overstayed a temporary visa, but the noncitizen chose to remain mute, he or she would be found to have failed to discharge the burden of proving the time, place, and manner of entry. Accordingly, he or she would be presumed to be in the United States in violation of law. By continuing to remain mute, the person would have failed to rebut that presumption and therefore would have been deportable under what is now section 237(a)(1)(B).

IIRIRA did not repeal section 291, but it made other changes that have rendered section 291 largely superfluous. As noted earlier, every noncitizen in removal proceedings has the burden of proving either admissibility or lawful presence pursuant to a prior admission. A noncitizen who chooses to remain mute or otherwise fails to sustain that burden of proof will thus be found to be either present without admission, which is now an inadmissibility ground, INA § 212(a)(6)(A)(i), or otherwise inadmissible.

11. But there is one rub. The preceding analysis assumes that the person is a noncitizen. As noted, the pre-IIRIRA courts held that the INS had the burden of proving “alienage.” Nothing in IIRIRA expressly superseded these holdings.⁵³

How can ICE prove that somebody is not a citizen? Usually the apprehending officer asks the suspect about his or her citizenship, and the person reflexively provides that information or discloses his or her country of birth. The officer then records the person’s statement on a standardized form that the ICE trial attorney will later be able to introduce into evidence at the removal hearing. If properly authenticated, those forms are admissible and can constitute “clear and convincing evidence” that the person is not a citizen. Lopez-Chavez v. INS, 259 F.3d 1176, 1181 (9th Cir. 2001).

But what if the person refuses to disclose his or her citizenship to the apprehending officer and continues to remain mute at the removal hearing? In 1985, Immigration Judge Henry Watkins proposed a new strategy: The Justice Department could grant a limited immunity that would prevent the use, in subsequent criminal proceedings, of statements the person makes during the deportation hearing. The conferral of the immunity would make his or her testimony non-incriminating. Thus, Judge Watkins reasoned, the individual could either answer or suffer the drawing of adverse inferences from his or her silence. Henry G. Watkins, Streamlining Deportation Proceedings: Self-Incrimination, Immunity from Prosecution, and the Duty to Testify in a Deportation Context, 22 San Diego L.Rev. 1075 (1985).

The former INS took up that suggestion a few years later. In 1988, in “Operation Homestretch,” 40 INS agents combined forces with 46 Massachusetts state troopers to raid the Suffolk Downs race track. A number of suspects were arrested and placed in deportation proceedings on charges of entry without inspection. See generally Daniel Kanstroom, Hello Darkness: Involuntary Testimony and Silence as Evidence in Deportation Proceedings, 53. Accord, 8 CFR § 1240.8(c) (2008) (for those present without having been admitted); Lopez-Chavez v. INS, 259 F.3d 1176 (9th Cir. 2001) (applying “clear and convincing evidence” standard of proof); Murphy v. INS, 54 F.3d 605 (9th Cir. 1995).

4 Georgetown Immigration L.J. 599, at 599–600 (1990).⁵⁴ To defeat the suspects' strategy of remaining mute, the INS then issued "agency orders" purporting to immunize the suspects from the future use, in criminal proceedings, of any testimony they give in their deportation hearings.

One of those cases was Matter of Guevara, 20 I. & N.Dec. 238 (BIA 1990, reconsideration denied 1991). Although given such an "agency order," Guevara refused to testify. He maintained that the INS attempt to grant immunity was invalid (as to that, see Kanstroom, above, at 606–11) and that, even if it were valid, the immigration judge could not force him to testify. The immigration judge disagreed and inferred from Guevara's silence that he was not a United States citizen. The effect was to trigger INA § 291, thus requiring Guevara to prove the time, place, and manner of his entry. Since Guevara did not do so, the IJ found him deportable.

The Supreme Court has held that in a criminal case it is impermissible to draw adverse inferences from the defendant's decision to remain silent. Griffin v. California, 380 U.S. 609, 614–15, 85 S.Ct. 1229, 14 L.Ed.2d 106 (1965). Such inferences are permissible, however, in deportation (removal) cases. United States v. Solano-Godines, 120 F.3d 957, 962 (9th Cir. 1997); Cabral-Avila v. INS, 589 F.2d 957, 959 (9th Cir. 1978). Still, do such inferences standing alone satisfy the then applicable Woodby standard of "clear, unequivocal, and convincing evidence?" Professor Kanstroom, above, at 623–33,⁵⁵ argued strenuously that they do not, even if the silence is unprivileged. The BIA ultimately agreed. It acknowledged that an IJ may draw negative inferences from unprivileged silence and that those inferences, when combined with other evidence, could meet the Woodby standard. But silence alone, the Board held, would not be enough. Accord, Matter of Perez-Gonzales, A73 128 867 (BIA, April 28, 2000) (unpublished decision).

PROBLEM 1

Immigration officers in Boston raid a restaurant at which undocumented immigrants are known to be employed. Officer Gehler spots a dishwasher and asks him whether he is a United States citizen. The dishwasher answers no. Gehler then asks him to produce his immigration papers. The dishwasher refuses to speak another word. Gehler places him under arrest. Assume that neither Officer Gehler nor any other government employee has done anything unlawful. ICE wishes to institute removal proceedings. First, what inadmissibility or deportability grounds should 54. A similar grant of immunity had met with at least temporary success in a Texas case discussed in Kanstroom, at 601 n.12, 607–08. Operation Homestretch, however, raised some additional issues concerning the legality of the searches and seizures. Id. at 599–600.

55. One alternative that Kanstroom offered, at 621–23, was for the government to seek a court order holding the person in contempt for refusing to testify. That technique, Kanstroom argued, would not only have produced a federal court decision on whether the IJ had the power to compel testimony, but also have permitted a full hearing on the circumstances of the arrest.

it allege? Second, will ICE be able to meet the statutory standard of proof? Third, suppose the dishwasher had refused to answer the question about citizenship. Would ICE still be able to prove its case?

4. ADMINISTRATIVE REVIEW: THE BOARD OF IMMIGRATION APPEALS

Either the noncitizen or ICE may appeal the decision of the IJ, as of right, to the Board of Immigration Appeals (BIA). 8 CFR § 1003.1(b)(3) (2008). Created by the Attorney General in 1940, 5 Fed. Reg. 3503 (Sept. 4, 1940), the BIA, like the immigration judges, is now part of EOIR. Unlike the IJ's, who are spread throughout the United States, the BIA sits in a fixed location (Falls Church, Virginia). The Attorney General appoints its members, 8 CFR § 1003.1(a)(1) (2008), of whom there were originally five. See Anna Gallagher, Practice and Procedure Before the Board of Immigration Appeals: An Update, Feb. 2003 Immigration Briefings at 3. Various attorneys general gradually expanded its membership to 23 to keep pace with a caseload that has multiplied dramatically. 66 Fed. Reg. 47379 (Sept. 12, 2001). There are now only 15 permanent members, as discussed below. The Director of EOIR may designate IJ's to serve as temporary additional members. Id. A sizeable legal support staff assists the BIA members in their work.

Because the BIA is a creature of the Attorney General, it lacks the power to declare any of the Attorney General's regulations ultra vires the INA (i.e., exceeding the power conferred by the INA).⁵⁶ It similarly lacks the power to consider the constitutionality of the INA.⁵⁷

At one time, all of the then five members would participate in every decision. After extensive study, the Administrative Conference of the United States recommended in 1985 that the BIA decide cases by three-member panels. 1 CFR § 305.85-4, Rec. B.1 (1985). The arguments for a panel system are set out in the consultant's report, which appears in revised form as Stephen H. Legomsky, Forum Choices for the Review of Agency Adjudication: A Study of the Immigration Process, 71 Iowa L. Rev. 1297, 1370-74 (1986). Throughout the study, the Justice Department vigorously resisted the proposed change. Id. at 1373-74. Three years later, however, persuaded by the increased BIA caseload and the inefficiency in deciding all cases en banc, the Department adopted a panel system. 53 Fed. Reg. 15660 (May 3, 1988).

From then until 1999, almost all cases were decided by three-member panels (except for some en banc decisions). In that year, a mounting backlog prompted Attorney General Reno to issue regulations that authorized the Chair of the BIA to designate particular categories of cases for one-member review. See 64 Fed. Reg. 56135 (Oct. 18, 1999). From 1999 to 2001, 56. E.g., Matter of Bilbao-Bastida, 11 I. & N. Dec. 615, 616, 617 (BIA 1966); Matter of Tzimas, 10 I. & N. Dec. 101, 102 (BIA 1962).

57. E.g., Dastmalchi v. INS, 660 F.2d 880, 886 (3d Cir. 1981); Matter of Cortez, 16 I. & N. Dec. 289, 291 n.2 (BIA 1977).

several such categories were designated. See Dorsey & Whitney LLP, Study Conducted for the American Bar Association Commission on Immigration Policy, Practice and Pro Bono, Re Board of Immigration Appeals: Procedural Reforms to Improve Case Management (July 22, 2003) [Dorsey & Whitney], § III. These developments reflected the Justice Department's concern that the often long duration of the BIA process, combined with the automatic stay of removal while the appeal is pending (see below), can create incentives for some noncitizens to file frivolous appeals solely to delay their removal. Whatever the impact on the accuracy of the decisions, there was no doubt that the new procedures noticeably improved the Board's productivity. Id.

Despite the success of these procedures in reducing the backlog, Attorney General Ashcroft in 2002 issued a controversial rule similarly aimed at the backlog. 67 Fed. Reg. 54878 (Aug. 26, 2002). The 2002 revisions have fundamentally altered the size, the character, the day-to-day operations, and the ultimate decisions of the BIA. The rule had several components. It introduced a new "case management screening system." 67 Fed. Reg. at 54903-04, amending 8 CFR § 1003.1(e). The new system substantially expanded the use of both single-member decisions and affirmances without reasoned opinions. The rule also narrowed the scope of BIA review of IJ findings of fact, sped up the timetable for briefing and transcript preparation, and (notwithstanding the Department's stated concerns about the backlog) reduced the membership of the Board from 23 authorized positions to 11 (since increased to 15). Each of these elements is discussed below.⁵⁸

The process now works like this: The appellant (who is usually the noncitizen but could be ICE) files a notice of appeal with the BIA no later than thirty days after issuance of the IJ's decision. 8 CFR § 1003.38(b)

58. For data compilation and commentary concerning the 2002 reforms, see generally ABA Commission on Immigration Policy, Practice & Pro Bono, Seeking Meaningful Review: Findings and Recommendations in Response to Dorsey & Whitney Study of Board of Immigration Appeals Procedural Reforms (Oct. 2003); Dorsey & Whitney, above; Gallagher, above; Peter J. Levinson, The Facade of Quasi-Judicial Independence in Immigration Appellate Adjudications, 9 BIB 1154 (Oct. 1, 2004); Stephen H. Legomsky, Testimony Before U.S. House of Representatives Subcommittee on Immigration, Citizenship, Refugees, Border Security, and International Law (Sept. 23, 2008), <http://judiciary.house.gov/hearings/pdf/Legomsky080923.pdf>; Carlos Ortiz Miranda, Administrative Appeals and Judicial Review in Immigration Law: Where Matters Stand at the Beginning of the 21st Century, 55 Catholic Univ. L. Rev. 917 (2006); Shruti

Rana, "Streamlining" the Rule of Law: How the Department of Justice is Undermining Judicial Review of Agency Action, 2009 Univ. Illinois L. Rev. 101; Stephen Yale-Loehr, AILA, Statement on the Operations of the Executive Office for Immigration Review (EOIR) Before the House Committee on the Judiciary Subcommittee on Immigration and Claims (Feb. 6, 2002); cf. Philip G. Schrag, The Summary Affirmance Proposal of the Board of Immigration Appeals, 12 Georgetown Immigration L.J. 531 (1998) (strenuously objecting to affirmances without opinion). This commentary has been highly critical of the BIA reforms. For a spirited defense by a BIA member, see Edward R. Grant, Laws of Intended Consequences: IIRIRA and Other Unsung Contributors to the Current State of Immigration Litigation, 55 Catholic Univ. L. Rev. 923 (2006).

(2008). The filing of that notice automatically stays execution of the IJ's decision. Id. § 1003.6(a). Under the new system every appeal is initially referred to one of the Board members whom the Chair of the Board has designated for that purpose. Id. § 1003.1(e)(1). The Board member who screens the case has the power to enter a "summary dismissal" if he or she concludes that any of several conditions are met. Among the bases for summary dismissal are (1) the notice of appeal fails to specify the reasons for appeal; (2) the appeal was "filed for an improper purpose, such as to cause unnecessary delay, or . . . the appeal lacks an arguable basis in fact or in law;" (3) the appellant indicates an intention to file a brief but fails to do so or to explain why; (4) "the appeal does not fall within the Board's jurisdiction;" (5) the appeal is untimely; and other miscellaneous reasons. Id. § 1003.1(d)(2). In those instances, that member dismisses the appeal, normally even before briefs have been filed or a transcript of the removal hearing has been prepared.

Absent summary dismissal, arrangements are made to prepare a transcript of the removal hearing and a briefing schedule is set up. Once that record has been compiled and received, the single member then decides whether to act alone or to forward the case to a three-member panel. In contrast to the 1999 reforms, under which single member decisions were confined to certain cases that were believed not to raise significant factual or legal issues, 64 Fed. Reg. 46135-42 (Oct. 18, 1999), the 2002 reforms made single-member decisions the norm. The single member must act alone unless he or she finds that the case falls within one of six enumerated situations—inconsistent rulings among immigration judges, a need for a precedential decision, a decision "not in conformity with the law," a "major national impact," a finding of fact that was "clearly erroneous," or the need to reverse the decision. 8 CFR § 1003.1(e)(6) (2008). A proposed rule would add a seventh category ("complex, novel, or unusual issue of law or fact"). 73 Fed. Reg. 34654, 34663 (June 18, 2008), adding 8 CFR § 1003.1(e)(vii). If the single member decides that the case falls within one of those exceptions, he or she refers the case to a three-member panel.

Until 2002, the norm was to write an opinion, similar to that of a court, explaining the reasons for the decision. Under the 2002 revisions, whenever a single member acts alone (now the norm), he or she must affirm the appealed decision and is prohibited from writing an opinion, if the member believes that the result is correct, that any errors are either harmless or non-material, and that either (A) the issues are squarely controlled by existing precedent; or (B) the issues are "not so substantial" as to warrant a written opinion. 8 CFR § 1003.1(e)(4)(i) (2008). Each of these so-called single-member "AWOs" (affirmances without opinion) culminates in an order that must read, in its entirety, as follows: "The Board affirms, without opinion, the result of the decision below. The decision below is, therefore, the final agency determination. See 8 CFR [100]3.1(e)(4)." Id. § 1003.1(e)(4)(ii). The regulation goes on to say that such an order "shall not include further explanation or reasoning." Id. In certain narrowly defined situations, the single member is authorized instead to "issue a brief order affirming, modifying, or remanding the decision under review.” Id. § 1003.1(e)(5). A proposed rule pending at this writing would convert the single member’s obligation to issue an AWO into a discretionary authority to do so, 73 Fed. Reg. 34654, 34663 (June 18, 2008), amending 8 CFR § 1003.1(e)(4)(i), although the commentary to the proposed rule leaves unclear whether the discretionary authority to give reasons is limited to cases involving inappropriate immigration judge conduct or comments or non-prejudicial errors or omissions, id. at 34656–57.

In those cases that do go to 3-member panels, a panel may still opt for summary dismissal if it finds one of the relevant criteria has been met. 8 CFR § 1003.1(d)(2) (2008). Otherwise the panel has the discretion to hold oral argument, id. § 1003.1(e)(7), though in practice oral argument today is the exception rather than the norm.

In unusually important cases, the Board still occasionally proceeds en banc. For that purpose a majority of the permanent members of the Board constitute a quorum. 8 CFR § 1003.1(a)(5) (2008).

The Attorney General has reserved the power to review the decisions of the BIA. 8 CFR § 1003.1(h) (2008). This power is typically exercised only when a case raises exceptionally important questions of law or policy. The power survives the transfer of most immigration functions from the INS to the DHS. See HSA § 1102(3), adding INA § 103(g)(1).

The BIA process culminates in a written decision (with or without reasons) that is served on the parties. 8 CFR § 1003.1(f) (2008). The BIA decision (or that of the Attorney General if he or she exercises the review power noted above) is binding on all IJ’s and on all DHS officers and employees in the particular case. Id. § 1003.1(g). If designated as precedential, it is binding in similar cases as well. Id. At this writing, only the Attorney General or a majority of the permanent members of the BIA may designate decisions as precedents, id., but a proposed regulation would also authorize a majority of the permanent members of a panel to designate their panel decisions as precedential. 73 Fed. Reg. 34654, 34663 (June 18, 2008), creating new 8 CFR § 1003.1(g)(3). The same proposed regulation would spell out the criteria for designating precedents. Id.

The single-member AWOs have been the target of particular attack. A Los Angeles Times investigation reported that some BIA members acknowledge deciding up to 50 cases in a day. See Lisa Getter & Jonathan Peterson, L.A. Times (Jan. 5, 2003).

For that and other reasons, some have expressed serious doubts about the quality of the resulting appellate decisionmaking. In one case, the Ninth Circuit excoriated the IJ for writing an “indecipherable” and “literally incomprehensible” opinion, one that was “extreme in its lack of a coherent explanation” (a deficiency that it acknowledged might have reflected the unrealistic caseloads of the IJs). The court then implicitly faulted the BIA for affirming such a decision without opinion. The Court said “When the agency’s only explanation of its final action is incoherent, we may not substantively review it without violating basic principles of judicial review.”⁵⁹ The Seventh Circuit, a longstanding critic of the quality of BIA opinions, fired this recent volley:

We close by noting six disturbing features of the handling of this case that bulk large in the immigration cases that we are seeing:
* * * [a]ffirmances by the Board of Immigration Appeals either with no opinion or with a very short, unhelpful, boilerplate opinion, even when, as in this case, the immigration judge’s opinion contains manifest errors of fact and logic.

Zhen Li Iao v. Gonzales, 400 F.3d 530, 533–35 (7th Cir. 2005). The court speculated that the problems might reflect “caseload pressures” and “resource constraints,” lamenting that “it is possible that nothing better can realistically be expected than what we are seeing in this and like cases.” Id. at 535. The more recent cases convey similar tones, citing accumulated examples of both sloppy decisions and verbal abuse of asylum applicants.⁶⁰

A growing number of circuits, in addition to reversing the Board’s AWO decisions, are now hinting at administrative bias and, as a result, recommending reassignment of cases to different immigration judges upon remand. See, e.g., the cases cited in 84 IR at 896 (Apr. 16, 2007). In one unpublished decision the Second Circuit went a step further. In addition to reversing the Board’s summary affirmance of an immigration judge’s removal order, and requesting remand to a different immigration judge, the court cited its own “history with IJ Chase” and urged the BIA to “closely re-examine all of his cases that are still on appeal” (emphasis added). See Ba v. Gonzales, 228 Fed. Appx. 7, 11 (2d Cir. 2007) (unpublished decision). Professor Linda Kelly Hill has argued that the intemperance or the bias of an immigration judge can be a violation of procedural due process. See Linda Kelly Hill, Holding the Due Process Line for Asylum, 36 Hofstra L. Rev. 85 (2007).

In response to the mounting judicial criticisms, Attorney General Gonzales in January 2006 ordered a comprehensive review of the immigration courts and sent a strongly worded memo to immigration judges and the BIA concerning the expected quality of their work and the need to respect the people who appear before them. See 83 IR 122 (Jan. 17, 2006). Later that year, the review team briefed the Attorney General on its findings. The Attorney General declined to release the findings to the public but announced 22 measures aimed at addressing the problems that the team found. See 83 IR 1725–28 (Aug. 14, 2006). The reforms consisted 59. Recinos de Leon v. Gonzales, 400 F.3d 1185, 1187 (9th Cir. 2005); see also Estelle McKee & Stephen Yale-Loehr, Federal Court Review of Summary Dismissal and Streamlined BIA Decisions, 12 BIB 769 (June 15, 2007) (illustrating how both summary dismissals and streamlining procedures can narrow judicial review).

60. See, e.g., Pramatarov v. Gonzales, 454 F.3d 764, 765, 766 (7th Cir. 2006) (finding “factual error, bootless speculation, and errors of logic” to be “common failings in recent decisions by immigration judges and the Board”). For an innovative alternative take, see Adam B. Cox, Deference, Delegation, and Immigration Law, 74 Univ. Chicago L. Rev. 1671 (2007) (attributing much of the judicial reaction to a combination of excessive congressional delegation and simple executive branch incompetence).

mainly of enhanced procedures for assessing the performances of immigration judges and BIA members, new complaint procedures, budget increases, a commitment to draft a new code of conduct, new procedures for screening and training immigration judges, BIA members, and their staffs, more written resources, tinkering with the 2002 “streamlining” reforms, updated technologies, improved interpreter selection, and expansion of EOIR’s pro bono program. See Press Release, Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales Outlines Reforms for Immigration Courts and Board of Immigration Appeals (Aug. 9, 2006), digested in 83 IR at 1725–28 (Aug. 14, 2006). The retiring director of EOIR announced in 2007 that many of the 22 measures had been substantially achieved or were in process. 84 IR at 885–86 (Apr. 16, 2007). At the same time, the use of AWO’s has now diminished—from 36% of all BIA decisions in fiscal year 2003 to 10% in fiscal year 2007. See 73 Fed. Reg. 34654, 34656 (June 18, 2008).

The L.A. Times study also noted that the increase in single-member decisions has coincided with an increase in the rate at which the Board ultimately rejects appeals on the merits. In October 2002 (after the Ashcroft reforms had gone into effect), the Board rejected 86% of the appeals, compared with 59% the previous October (before the reforms). An even more dramatic dropoff in the percentage of cases in which the noncitizen prevailed was empirically confirmed in Dorsey & Whitney, above.

At any rate, the federal courts of appeals have experienced spectacular increases in the number of petitions for review of BIA decisions. See pages 758–60 below. Whether the sharp increase in judicial filings reflects increased dissatisfaction with the BIA appellate process, or whether it can be ascribed entirely to other factors, is not known with certainty, but a sophisticated empirical study strongly suggests the former. See pages 759–60 & note 67 below.

The 2002 revisions also restricted the scope of the Board’s review. Under the prior regulations, the Board reviewed de novo, substituting its collective judgment for that of the immigration judges on all components of the decision—findings of fact, conclusions of law, and the exercise of discretion. The 2002 revisions retained de novo review of legal and discretionary determinations but prohibited the Board from reversing an IJ’s findings of fact unless they are “clearly erroneous.” 8 CFR § 1003.1(d)(3)(i) (2008). Among such findings of fact are the IJ’s credibility determinations (particularly crucial in asylum cases).⁶¹

But two different panels of the BIA (on the same day) held (1) that even though the BIA could review findings of fact only under the “clearly erroneous” standard, it could review de novo the IJ’s application of law to fact; (2) that when it does the latter, it may weigh the various facts differently from the IJ; and (3) that for this purpose a prediction of future

61. Id.; see generally Lory Rosenberg, Credibility Determinations in Asylum Cases: Evidentiary Factors and Regulatory Limits Under the Clearly Erroneous Standard, 8 BIB 573 (Apr. 1, 2003); see also Yale-Loehr Statement, above, at 7–8 (arguing that the reduced BIA scope of review will increase both the use of judicial review and the number of judicial remands to the BIA).

events is considered the application of law to fact. Thus, the BIA said it would review de novo immigration judges' predictions of future hardship for purposes of cancellation of removal, persecution for purposes of asylum, or torture for purposes of claims under the Convention Against Torture. See Matter of A-S-B-, 24 I. & N. Dec. 493 (2008); Matter of V-K-, 24 I. & N. Dec. 500 (2008). In both cases, notably, the BIA used this power to reverse grants of relief by immigration judges.

The 2002 revisions also sped the process by setting deadlines for some of the specific steps. The deadlines for filing briefs, for example, are now somewhat more rigorous for cases in which the noncitizens are detained than for other cases. There are also strict deadlines for preparing the hearing transcript, for IJ review of the hearing transcript, and for the BIA to decide the case. The details are in 8 CFR §§ 1003.1(e)(8), 1003.3(c), 1003.5 (2008).

Finally, the 2002 revisions provided that, within six months of the implementation of the "case management" system, the authorized size of the Board would be reduced from 23 members to 11. See 67 Fed. Reg. at 54901, amending 8 CFR § 1003.1(a)(1). The contraction of the Board has also been controversial. First, many have questioned whether such a small number of people will have the time to provide meaningful review in the thousands of cases, many of them highly complex, that the Board decides each year.

Second, both the process and the result have raised serious doubts about the continued independence of the BIA. Neither the rule itself nor any other announcement specified concrete criteria for determining which Board members would be removed. That omission was problematic for two reasons. For one thing, when the axe finally fell, it fell almost entirely on those Board members whose decisions had most frequently favored the noncitizens; credentials and seniority clearly played little if any role, as former House Judiciary Committee attorney Peter Levinson has demonstrated empirically. See Levinson, note 58 above; accord, ABA Commission, above at 4 ("It is undisputed that the Board members ultimately reassigned to other positions within the government were those with a history of being more favorable to noncitizens' claims than those who remain on the Board.")

In 2006, Attorney General Gonzales restored 4 of the BIA member positions that had been eliminated, thus increasing the size of the Board from 11 to its current size of 15. See 71 Fed. Reg. 70855 (Dec. 7, 2006); 73 Fed. Reg. 33875 (June 16, 2008) (final rule), 8 CFR § 1003.1(a)(1) (2008). The reasons given included the increased BIA caseload, an expected increase in the number of immigration judges and therefore future appeals to the BIA, and some expansion of the case categories in which written opinions would be permitted. Query: If an Attorney General wishes to replace BIA members who too often rule against the government with individuals who would be more compliant, but understands that doing this directly would be unseemly, would it now be good strategy to reduce the size of the Board, reassign the troublemakers, and then, after a respectable interval, increase the size of the Board and appoint individuals of his or her own choosing?

Moreover, since the Attorney General announced many months in advance that the Board membership would be cut, and since he provided no criteria for selecting the fired members (such as credentials or seniority), there followed a long period in which Board members could not avoid wondering how the outcomes of the cases they were about to decide might affect their job security. As Levinson confirmed by studying outcomes in en banc cases, several Board members' percentages of rulings in favor of noncitizens dropped sharply in the months that followed the Attorney General's announcement. Several other Board members who had formerly tended to rule in favor of noncitizens continued to do so after the announcement. When the purge came, only one of the latter survived. Id.

The independence issue is a serious one. Since the creation of the BIA in 1940, the United States attorneys general have been an ideologically diverse group with widely divergent views on immigration. Yet no attorney general had ever dismissed a member of the BIA. Although Board members have never enjoyed the formal job security of article III judges, the assumption had always been that they were free to render the decisions they felt were required by the evidence presented and their interpretations of the applicable law, without fear of losing their jobs if they displeased the Attorney General. Obviously that can no longer be safely assumed.

Unprecedented as the Attorney General's "purge of the liberals" was in the United States, somewhat analogous (and, at the time, equally unprecedented) developments had taken place in Australia in 1996-97. After a pair of decisions by Australia's Refugee Review Tribunal had reversed asylum denials by the government, the Minister of Immigration, Mr. Philip Ruddock, made a series of public statements denouncing the individuals who had handed down the decisions. The same statements threatened not to renew the appointments of members who ruled in similar ways. He carried out that threat as soon as the appointments came up for renewal several months later, non-renewing 16 out of 35 and substituting new members of his own choosing. During the month in which the Minister's department interviewed the members in connection with their possible reappointments, the proportion of appeals in which the tribunal set aside the Minister's decisions plummeted from more than 15% to under 3%. See Stephen H. Legomsky, Refugees, Administrative Tribunals, and Real Independence: Dangers Ahead for Australia, 76 Washington Univ. L.Q. 243, 248-54 (1998). As the cited article asks, "Would any readers of this article want their cases to be decided by people who had been told in no uncertain terms that they could lose their jobs by ruling in your favor?" Id. at 251.

Concern over threats to the independence of the immigration adjudicators are not new. For many years, respected commentators have advocated replacing the BIA (and, under some proposals, the immigration judges) with a specialized article I immigration court.⁶²

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. Given the dramatically increased BIA caseloads, backlogs, and delays, one would be hard pressed to fault the Justice Department for seeking ways to enhance the Board's efficiency. The challenge is to reconcile the efficiency goals with the sometimes competing justice interests of fairness, accuracy, consistency, and public acceptability. In that vein, compare two of the BIA efficiency measures described in these materials—summary dismissals and single-member affirmances without opinion (AWOs). First, review the criteria for both. Note especially that one of the most common reasons for summary dismissal is that the notice of appeal failed to identify the alleged errors with enough specificity. With that in mind, and remembering that summary dismissal usually occurs before transcripts are prepared or briefs are filed, how do you suppose its policy objectives differ from those of single-member AWOs? Are there any policy objectives that the two provisions share? (Countervailing policy problems are considered below.)

2. As just noted, one of the most common reasons for summary dismissal is the appellant's failure to meaningfully specify the grounds for appeal. First, exactly what does the appellant lose when the BIA orders summary dismissal on that ground (as opposed to letting the case progress through the normal process)? That is, if the BIA orders summary dismissal, can't one safely assume that the BIA would have affirmed anyway? (In addressing this question, consider that the BIA reviews the IJ's legal and discretionary determinations de novo, though findings of fact are now reviewed only under the "clearly erroneous" standard. 8 CFR § 1003.1(d)(3)(i) (2008)). Second, when the BIA receives notices of appeal that fail to meaningfully identify the grounds for appeal, might there have been policy alternatives to summary dismissal?

3. If the faulty notice of appeal was filed by a lawyer, it is sometimes possible to argue ineffective assistance of counsel, a subject taken up in section B.2.d above. Until the Attorney General's decision in Compean,

62. See, e.g., Peter J. Levinson, A Specialized Court for Immigration Hearings and Appeals, 56 Notre Dame Lawyer 644 (1981) (former counsel to Senate Judiciary committee); Maurice A. Roberts, Proposed: A Specialized Statutory Immigration Court, 18 San Diego L. Rev. 1 (1980) (former Chair of BIA). In the wake of the BIA reforms, there is now a new wave of calls for restoring independence to the process, including the article I immigration court proposal of the President of the National Association of Immigration Judges, Dana Marks, An Urgent Priority: Why Congress Should Establish an Article I reproduced on pages 698-710 above, the leading case was Lozada v. INS, 857 F.2d 10 (1st Cir. 1988). The lawyer filed a notice of appeal that simply said the decision of the IJ was “against the weight of the evidence,” “against the law controlling the case,” and “arbitrary and capricious.” The court of appeals upheld the use of summary dismissal (and ultimately rejected the ineffective assistance of counsel claim). But how specific, exactly, does the appellant really have to be at the notice of appeal stage? The current regulations read:

Immigration Court, 13 BIB 3 (Jan. 1, 2008). See also ABA Commission, above, at 6; American Immigration Lawyers Association, Press Release, AILA Renews Call for an Independent Immigration Court (May 27, 2003); Dorsey & Whitney, above; Stephen H. Legomsky, Deportation and the War on Independence, 91 Cornell L. Rev. 369 (2006); Stephen H. Legomsky, Testimony Before U.S. House of Representatives Subcommittee on Immigration, Citizenship, Refugees, Border Security, and International Law (Sept. 23, 2008), http://judiciary.house.gov/hearings/pdf/Legomsky_080923.pdf; Levinson, above; Yale-Loehr Statement, above.

The statement [in the Notice of Appeal] must specifically identify the findings of fact, the conclusions of law, or both, that are being challenged. If a question of law is presented, supporting authority must be cited. If the dispute is over the findings of fact, the specific facts contested must be identified. Where the appeal concerns discretionary relief, the appellant must state whether the alleged error relates to statutory grounds of eligibility or to the exercise of discretion and must identify the specific factual and legal finding or findings that are being challenged.

8 CFR § 1003.3(b) (2008).

This regulation makes clear that the notice of appeal must meaningfully identify the claimed errors; clarifying the issues in a subsequent brief is not enough. First, consider the logistics. The notice of appeal must be filed within thirty days of the IJ’s decision, 8 CFR § 1003.38(b) (2008), well before the hearing transcript is available. The brief, in contrast, will not be due until some time after the hearing transcript. Id. § 1003.3(c)(1). Given that reality, do you think the degree of specificity required for the notice of appeal is reasonable? Second, what is gained by insisting on specificity at the notice of appeal stage, rather than letting it wait until the briefing stage?

4. In Padilla-Agustin v. INS, 21 F.3d 970 (9th Cir. 1994), overruled on other grounds, Stone v. INS, 514 U.S. 386, 115 S.Ct. 1537, 131 L.Ed.2d 465 (1995), the Ninth Circuit observed that the standardized notice of appeal form provided only a small space in which to state the reasons for the appeal (though the form specifies that the appellant is permitted to attach additional sheets). Concerned that the small space allowed on the form could mislead an appellant as to the expected degree of detail, and noting that the government could easily furnish clearer explanations, the court applied the Eldridge factors discussed on page 144 above and found a violation of procedural due process. Eight years after Padilla-Agustin, the same court found the same dissonance between the standardized notice of appeal form that the noncitizen had to fill out and the actual requirements for avoiding summary dismissal. Vargas-Garcia v. INS, 287 F.3d 882 (9th Cir. 2002).

5. What do you see as the down sides of (a) single-member BIA decisions rather than decisions by three-member panels; and (b) decisions not accompanied by opinions? (The hoped-for benefits were considered in question 1 above.)

6. The legality of AWOs has been challenged on due process grounds (and occasionally on separation of powers grounds, the theory being that the Attorney General, who is part of the executive branch, is dictating the procedure to adjudicators). The courts have uniformly rejected these arguments; it is sufficient, they have said, that the IJ opinion that the BIA was reviewing was specific enough to permit meaningful review.⁶³

7. The courts have divided, however, over whether they may reverse an AWO on the ground that the particular case did not fall within the AWO criteria laid out in the regulations.⁶⁴

8. As you have read, many commentators and organizations have decried the practical impact of the 2002 BIA reforms on the independence of the Board members. First, why, exactly, is it important for those who adjudicate cases to enjoy decisional independence? Second, does decisional independence have policy costs? See generally Stephen H. Legomsky, Deportation and the War on Independence, 91 Cornell L. Rev. 369 (2006).

5. MOTIONS TO REOPEN OR RECONSIDER

Under various circumstances either ICE or the noncitizen may file a motion either to reopen or to reconsider a removal proceeding. The motion is filed with the BIA if it has already rendered a decision in the case; otherwise the motion is filed with the immigration judge. 8 CFR §§ 1003.2(a), 1003.23(b) (2008). A motion to reopen is the vehicle used to present material new facts that were “not available and could not have been discovered or presented at the former hearing.” Id. § 1003.2(c)(1). In contrast, a motion to reconsider is filed for the purpose of calling attention to “errors of fact or law in the prior Board decision” and, therefore, must “be supported by pertinent authority.” Id. § 1003.2(b)(1).

Earlier you encountered motions to reopen in the specific context of the predecessor to cancellation of removal. See pages 607–17 above. As you will recall from that discussion, these motions have stirred controversies: Are they a legitimate vehicle for presenting new evidence, or a ruse to delay removal, or both? How should the power to decide them be allocated between courts and administrative tribunals? This is a good time to review those pages. Here, with the focus on deportation procedure generally, a few additional comments are necessary.

^{63.} See, e.g., Reyes-Vasquez v. Ashcroft, 395 F.3d 903, 905–06 (8th Cir. 2005); Disu v. Ashcroft, 338 F.3d 13 (1st Cir. 2003); Falcon-Carriche v. Ashcroft, 335 F.3d 1009 (9th Cir. 2003).

^{64.} Courts reviewed such decisions in Smriko v. Ashcroft, 387 F.3d 279 (3d Cir. 2004), and Chong Shin Chen v. Ashcroft, 378 F.3d 1081 (9th Cir. 2004). Contra, Tsegay v. Ashcroft, 386 F.3d 1347 (10th Cir. 2004); Ngure v. Ashcroft, 367 F.3d 975, 981–88 (8th Cir. 2004) (holding decision “committed to agency discretion by law,” for purposes of the Administrative Procedure Act, 5 USC § 701(a)(2)). The Justice Department position is that its decision whether to issue an AWO is an “internal” matter not subject to judicial review. See 73 Fed. Reg. 34654, 34663 (June 18, 2008), proposing to amend 8 CFR § 1003.1(e).

With the substantial restrictions that Congress placed on judicial review of removal orders in 1996, it is not clear whether administratively final orders denying motions to reopen removal proceedings are still judicially reviewable. See section B.6 below. When courts have reviewed them, the scope of the court's review is the narrow "abuse of discretion" standard. See INS v. Jong Ha Wang, 450 U.S. 139, 101 S.Ct. 1027, 67 L.Ed.2d 123 (1981).

In INS v. Abudu, 485 U.S. 94, 108 S.Ct. 904, 99 L.Ed.2d 90 (1988), the Supreme Court provided additional general guidance. The Court summarized three of the grounds on which the BIA may deny motions to reopen: "that the movant has not established a prima facie case for the underlying substantive relief sought; * * * that the movant has not introduced previously unavailable, material evidence; * * * [and] in cases in which the ultimate grant of relief is discretionary * * *, [that] the movant would not be entitled to the discretionary grant of relief." 485 U.S. at 104-05. The Court concluded that denials on the latter two grounds are reviewable only for abuse of discretion. It did not have occasion to address the standard of review for denials based on the first ground (lack of prima facie case), but at least one court has held that those denials too are reviewable only for abuse of discretion. See M.A. v. United States INS, 899 F.2d 304, 307-10 (4th Cir. en banc, 1990) (6-5 vote).

But there are now additional grounds for denying both motions to reopen and motions to reconsider. In recent years a series of measures—the Immigration Act of 1990, IIRIRA, and administrative regulations—have imposed major procedural restrictions on the filing of motions to reopen or reconsider. The noncitizen may file only one motion to reconsider a removal order, and it must be filed within 30 days of the final administrative decision. The noncitizen may also file one (and only one) motion to reopen a removal order, and it must be filed within 90 days of the final administrative decision. See INA §§ 240(c)(6)(A, B), 240(c)(7)(A), 240(c)(7)(C)(i). Certain asylum cases are exempt from the 90-day time limit. INA § 240(c)(7)(C)(ii). One court has held that ineffective assistance of counsel can equitably toll the 90-day time limit if the person has exercised due diligence. Iavorski v. INS, 232 F.3d 124 (2d Cir. 2000). There are also special provisions for entering removal orders in absentia, subject to reopening within 180 days. See section E.3 below. A Justice Department regulation bars the filing of motions of reopen once the person has left the United States and deems pending motions withdrawn once a person leaves, 8 CFR § 1003.2(d) (2008), but in at least one circuit (the Fourth), that regulation has been invalidated as conflicting with the statutory language that governs motions to reopen. See William v. Gonzales, 499 F.3d 329 (4th Cir. 2007).

Even apart from those exceptions, there is some flexibility. The BIA can always choose to reopen or reconsider on its own motion. 8 CFR § 1003.2(a) (2008). In addition, any motion to reopen that is jointly filed by all the parties is exempt from both the one-motion rule and the time limit. Id. § 1003.23(b)(4)(iv). The practical consequence is that, if the noncitizen can persuade either ICE or the BIA that the special facts of the case warrant another look, a mechanism to reopen is available. In practice, neither ICE nor the BIA has been inclined to exercise that authority in the absence of unusual circumstances.

QUESTION

What do you think is driving Congress and the Justice Department to limit the time and number of motions to reopen or reconsider? Are such limitations a good idea?

6. JUDICIAL REVIEW OF REMOVAL ORDERS

In chapter 2, you met up with the principle of plenary congressional power. Harsh as that doctrine might be, it has for the most part been reserved for challenges to the constitutionality of congressional action; only occasionally—until recently—have courts held the immigration decisions of administrative officials immune from judicial review. The one glaring exception has been the longstanding refusal of the courts to review the decisions of consular officers denying visas. And that one exception—the doctrine of consular absolutism—seems so striking precisely because it is so exceptional. When administrative officials make decisions that have great impact on the lives of individuals—even in the field of immigration—one has come to expect that the legality of those decisions will be subject to judicial review.

For the most part, until 1996, they were. But the subject of judicial review has always aroused political passions, especially in the field of immigration. In 1996 those passions erupted into all-out war. That year, with the enactment of AEDPA and IIRIRA, Congress attempted to strip the courts of jurisdiction over a broad range of important cases related to the removal of noncitizens. Since then, the law of judicial review—always complex and always controversial—has become both a technical and an ideological minefield.⁶⁵ On one side are those who perceive the judiciary as an obstructive, anti-democratic institution that delays the removal of deportable noncitizens and displays undue sympathy toward undeserving violators of our laws.⁶⁶ On the other side are those who perceive the judiciary as a principled and dispassionate dispenser of justice and a bulwark against unlawful government action, particularly important when the litigants (noncitizens) are distinctively exposed to volatile and often hostile political sentiments. There is middle ground, of course, but the loud clash of opposing forces continues to leave this subject mired in controversy

65. See generally Jill E. Family, A Broader View of the Immigration Adjudication Problem, 23 Georgetown Immigration L.J. ___ (2009).

66. Actually, from 1990 to 2000, the government prevailed in approximately 83% of all immigration cases filed in the courts of appeals. U.S. Dept. of Justice, 4 Immigration Litigation Bulletin 2 (Sept. 29, 2000). (The reported figures are for cases argued by the Department's Office of Immigration Litigation. They do not include Second Circuit cases, which are argued by U.S. attorneys.)

and uncertainty. The next set of materials will describe the key developments, piece together the current picture, and explore the remaining uncertainties.

The longstanding general rule, now subject to gaping exceptions that you will study in this section, remains easy to state: Once all the relevant administrative authorities have passed on a case, the noncitizen has a right to judicial review of an order of removal. At first, absent any explicit statutory provision for judicial review, the district courts reviewed deportation cases by way of habeas corpus. See generally Henry Hart, The Power of Congress to Limit the Jurisdiction of the Federal Courts: An Exercise in Dialectic, 66 Harvard L.Rev. 1362, 1389-96 (1953). But habeas carried some baggage, the most significant being that the person could not seek habeas until he or she was in "custody." And custody was initially assumed to require physical restraint, which often did not occur until the very end of the process. The INA was enacted in 1952, however, and in 1955 the Supreme Court construed the INA to mean that noncitizens ordered deported could obtain judicial review by seeking declaratory judgments or injunctions under the Administrative Procedure Act, 5 USC § 703. See Shaughnessy v. Pedreiro, 349 U.S. 48, 75 S.Ct. 591, 99 L.Ed. 868 (1955).

Tales of long delays in executing administratively final deportation orders began to circulate. The most famous and most frequently invoked example was the extraordinary story of alleged mobster Carlos Marcello, whose deportation case literally dragged on for decades. See Daniel Kanstroom, The Long, Complex, and Futile Deportation Saga of Carlos Marcello, in David A. Martin & Peter H. Schuck (eds.), Immigration Stories (2005), chap. 5. The magnitude of the delay in his case was hardly typical, and at any rate the bulk of that delay resulted from other countries' refusals to receive him rather than from defects in the United States review system. Id. Nonetheless, his and other cases led Congress in 1961 to create a specific statutory provision for judicial review, former INA § 106(a). Under that procedure, which is similar to the procedure used in a variety of other administrative agency settings, the noncitizen bypasses the district court and files a "petition for review" in the court of appeals.

In 1996, IIRIRA repealed INA § 106 and substituted a new provision, INA § 242. Under the new law, the petition for review in the court of appeals is still, generally, the exclusive vehicle for obtaining judicial review of an administratively final removal order—more explicitly so in the light of the REAL ID Act, as discussed below. Review is available as of right; proposals to subject judicial review to the discretion of the courts have not succeeded. See Jill E. Family, Stripping Judicial Review During Immigration Reform: The Certificate of Reviewability, 8 Nevada L.J. 499 (2008). As just noted, however, IIRIRA carved out several broad exceptions to that right. These provisions purport to bar judicial review of whole categories of removal orders, prohibit review of most denials of discretionary relief, make several forms of action and other judicial remedies unavailable, and erect several other barriers to judicial review of administrative decisions in removal cases. As you will see, not all of Congress's attempts have succeeded. Some of the statutory language has been subjected to a combination of non-literal statutory construction and constitutional scrutiny.

Ironically, despite all the statutory restrictions on judicial review, the past few years have witnessed a stunning rise in the number of immigration cases filed in federal court. For that reason, at this writing judicial review of BIA removal orders is a hotter issue than ever. Since 2002, when Attorney General Ashcroft implemented the BIA reforms discussed in section B.4 above, appeals from BIA removal orders to the federal courts have skyrocketed, peaking in 2006 and decreasing somewhat in 2007 and again in 2008. See Admin. Office of the United States Courts, Judicial Business of the U.S. Courts, 2007 Ann. Rpt. of the Director, Table B-3 (2008) [AO Report]. As noted below, no one disputes the causal connection between the BIA reforms and the surge in federal filings, but there are differing views about why that causal link has occurred and what it tells us. Nor does the phenomenon appear to be short-term.

The numbers are dramatic. During the first twelve months following implementation of the BIA reforms (i.e. the year ending March 2003), the number of BIA removal orders for which review was sought in federal court increased by 379% from the prior year, to 8,446 filings. Administrative Office of the U.S. Courts, 35 Newsletter of the Federal Courts No. 9 (Sept. 2003) [hereafter AO Newsletter]. In 2002, just before the BIA reforms, only 5% of the BIA decisions were being appealed to the federal courts. By November 2004 that figure was 25%, Tom Perrotta, Immigration Appeals Surge in Second Circuit, New York L.J., Nov. 4, 2004, and by 2006 it had risen to 30%. See Lenni B. Benson, You Can't Get There from Here: Managing Judicial Review of Immigration Cases, 2007 Univ. of Chicago Legal Forum 405, 423 n.52. Conversely, in 2001 immigration cases accounted for approximately 3% of the combined dockets of the U.S. courts of appeals; by 2003, that figure had leaped to 15%. Stanley Mailman & Stephen Yale-Loehr, Immigration Appeals Overwhelm Federal Courts, 10 BIB 45, at 45 (Jan. 15, 2005). Moreover, the crush of petitions for review has prevented the BIA from promptly preparing and transmitting to the courts the usually bulky certified records of proceedings that the courts need just to start the briefing process, thus exacerbating the judicial backlogs. AO Newsletter, above.

Two circuits—the Ninth (based in San Francisco) and the Second (based in New York)—have borne the brunt of the impact. In the Ninth Circuit, in calendar year 2001 (just before the BIA reforms), 896 immigration cases were filed. In 2002, with the BIA reforms in place, the number of filings soared to 3578. In 2003, they increased again, to 4206. AO Newsletter, above, Table B-3, peaking in 2005 at 6583 before dropping back to the still formidable number of 4280 in 2007. Id. In 2006, immigration cases made up an astounding 40% of the entire Ninth Circuit docket. Benson, above, at 413, Fig. 3B.

In the Second Circuit, the change has been even more stunning. From February 2002 to February 2003 (the first year of the BIA reforms), Second Circuit immigration filings increased by 781%. AO Newsletter, above. In the twelve-month period that ended in June 2004, immigration cases comprised 44% of the Second Circuit's total docket, compared to 9% in 2002. Perrotta, above; see also Comm. on Federal Courts, The Surge of Immigration Appeals and Its Impact on the Second Circuit Court of Appeals (2004). In 2006, the figure was 37.5%. See Benson, above, at 413, Fig. 3B. As was true elsewhere, filings did drop off somewhat in 2007 (from 2640 to the still extreme level of 2177). AO Newsletter, above, Table B-3.

Because most asylum denials are specifically exempted from the bar on judicial review, they tend to constitute a large share of the current petitions for review. INA § 242(a)(2)(B)(ii). In the Second Circuit, it turns out that "most of the court's asylum cases turn on the applicants' credibility." John R.B. Palmer, The Second Circuit's "New Asylum Seekers": Responses to an Expanded Immigration Docket, 55 Catholic Univ. L. Rev. 965, 977 (2006). From July 14, 2006 to the time of publication of Palmer's article, there were 41 published Second Circuit opinions reviewing adverse credibility determinations and the need for corroboration of testimony—a huge increase over the preceding years. Id. at 977-78. The same article describes some of the procedural shortcuts adopted by the Second Circuit to handle its vastly increased immigration caseload. They include dispensing with oral argument and channeling immigration cases to specialists for initial screening.

The vastly increased caseloads are overtaxing the resources of both the judiciary and the executive branch. For one thing, since so many noncitizens are now detained while their federal cases are pending, the increase in federal filings has driven up the total detention costs. For another, someone has to represent the government in each of these cases. The Justice Department has redeployed several hundred additional lawyers from other fields for this purpose. Mailman & Yale-Loehr, above. Government attorneys in the Second Circuit are unusually affected, because the Second Circuit is the only one in which attorneys from the U.S. Attorney's Office (the Southern District of New York) represent the government in immigration cases; in all other circuits, the Justice Department's Office of Immigration Litigation (OIL) provides the representation. Perrotta, above. Before the BIA reforms, 9 attorneys from the local U.S. Attorney's Office did the work in the Second Circuit; now the Office has had to enlist all 53 attorneys in its Civil Division, plus some in its Criminal Division, plus some from other judicial districts. Id.

So the situation is serious. Part of the increase in court filings reflects the fact that the BIA reforms have boosted the number of total BIA dispositions per year. Thus, even a constant rate of appeal to the federal courts would have increased the absolute number of filings. But even the Justice Department acknowledges that that factor accounts for no more than 20% of the increase in court filings. The other 80% results from the huge increase (from 5% to 25%, noted above) in the rate of appeal. EOIR, Fact Sheet (Sept. 15, 2004).

Why, exactly, would the BIA reforms cause the rate of appeal from its decisions to increase? That is the question on which views tend to differ.

Most analysts attribute the surge to the sharply reduced quality of the BIA opinions. The combination of deciding so many more cases per day and not having to justify the affirmances with written explanation are thought to have produced more poorly reasoned decisions and to have left noncitizens and their attorneys with the feeling that review has been inadequate.⁶⁷

The Justice Department disagrees. It says, “There is no evidence that the affirmance and reversal/remand rates of BIA decisions [by the reviewing courts] has [sic] changed significantly in the wake of the restructuring regulation. This indicates that the quality of the Board’s jurisprudence has remained consistent and unaffected by” the BIA reforms. EOIR Fact Sheet, above. (That statement is misleading. EOIR does not claim to have evidence that the reversal rates have not changed; it simply does not cite evidence in either direction.)

If EOIR is right to claim that the BIA reforms have not diminished the quality of its decisions, then why has the rate of appeal from its decisions surged? EOIR offers the following hypothesis:

A factor which may be contributing to the rise in the rate of appeals is the reduced time involved in completing cases appealed to the Board. Thus, for those aliens who wish to postpone deportation, filing an appeal to the circuit courts may be a much more attractive option than in the past. To the extent that the courts are routinely granting stays of deportation pending their review, the incentive to file an appeal and to request a stay will be high.

Id. Does that sound right? Certainly many noncitizens have a real incentive to buy additional time in the United States by seeking judicial review in federal court. But was that incentive really lower for people in the past because they had already been in the U.S. for the longer period that BIA appeals were then taking? If anything, wouldn’t one expect that, all else equal, a person who had spent a lengthy period in the United States would have deeper roots and therefore a greater incentive to further prolong his or her future stay?

Before proceeding further, skim INA § 242 to get a general sense of its layout, its content, and its scope.

a. PETITIONS FOR REVIEW

INA § 242(a)(1) says that “[j]udicial review of a final order of removal . . . is governed only by chapter 158 of title 28 of the United States Code.” The reference is to a law known as the Hobbs Act, which applies to a wide range of administrative contexts, not just immigration. Under the Hobbs Act, one files a "petition for review" in the court of appeals.

67. A sophisticated empirical study is John R.B. Palmer, Stephen W. Yale-Loehr & Elizabeth Cronin, Why Are So Many People Challenging Board of Immigration Appeals Decisions in Federal Court? An Empirical Analysis of the Recent Surge in Petitions for Review, 20 Georgetown Immigration L.J. 1 (2005); see also John R.B. Palmer, The Nature and Causes of the Immigration Surge in the Federal Courts of Appeals: A Preliminary Analysis, 51 New York L. School L. Rev. 13 (2006–07). For an added twist, see Lenni B. Benson, Making Paper Dolls: How Restrictive Process Increase Immigration Cases in the Federal Courts, 51 New York Law School L. Rev. 37 (2006–07).

Direct review in the court of appeals avoids the duplication that arises when a district court reviews an agency action and the district court decision is then appealed to the court of appeals. Why, then, do you suppose Congress doesn't simply channel all judicial review of agency action directly to the courts of appeals? As a matter of judicial efficiency, consider (a) court of appeals decisions normally require three-judge panels; (b) not all district court judgments are appealed; and (c) district courts and courts of appeals are generally expert at different things. With those and any other relevant factors in mind, how would you analyze when it is better to assign a given class of reviewable administrative agency decisions to the district courts (with a right of appeal to the courts of appeals), and when it is better to assign cases directly to the courts of appeals?⁶⁸

The petition for review is filed in the circuit in which the removal hearing was held. INA § 242(b)(2). The petition itself must be filed no later than 30 days after the (administratively) final removal order. INA § 242(b)(1). A motion to reopen or reconsider does not toll the clock. Stone v. INS, 514 U.S. 386, 115 S.Ct. 1537, 131 L.Ed.2d 465 (1995). The statute requires the noncitizen to file a brief within 40 days after the administrative record "is available;" otherwise, the court must dismiss the case "unless a manifest injustice would result." INA § 242(b)(3)(C). In contrast, there is no statutory time limit on the filing of the government brief. Id. The latter would be governed by any relevant nonstatutory rules of court.

Until 1996, service of the petition for review automatically stayed the person's deportation pending the court's decision, unless the court directed otherwise (a rare event) or the person had been convicted of an aggravated felony. If, nonetheless, the person departed from the United States while the petition for review was pending, the petition would be dismissed and the deportation order would become final. Former INA § 106(c). IIRIRA changed both rules. There is no longer any automatic stay of removal; the person must move the court to grant it. INA § 242(b)(3)(B). Conversely, however, the person's departure no longer bars judicial review; the case proceeds in the person's absence. Under the version of the REAL ID Act passed by the House of Representatives, courts of appeals would have been prohibited from staying removal pending their decisions! That provision was not passed by the Senate, however, and it was not included in the conference committee bill that finally became law.

As a result, it is now routine practice for noncitizens to couple their petitions for review with motions for stays of removal pending decision. These motions pose difficult questions of judicial administration. Should the court invest time studying the merits before deciding the motion for a stay, and then, if the stay is granted, pick up the case later and study the merits again? Or, to save time, should the court either (a) deny the stay without examining the merits, thus allowing DHS to remove the petitioner from the country before the court can decide whether the petition is meritorious; or (b) grant the stay without examining the merits, thus permitting the person to buy time in the United States by filing a nonmeritorious petition? Which of these options do you think will be the most popular with busy appellate judges?

68. See generally David P. Currie & Frank I. Goodman, Judicial Review of Federal Administrative Action: Quest for the Optimum Forum, 75 Columbia L.Rev. 1 (1975);

Stephen H. Legomsky, Forum Choices for the Review of Agency Adjudication: A Study of the Immigration Process, 71 Iowa L.Rev. 1297, 1312-34 (1986).

The Ninth Circuit has taken the position that a motion to stay removal will automatically stay removal until the court rules on the motion. DHS has 84 days in which to respond to the motion for the stay. If DHS says it will not oppose the motion, or if DHS does not respond within 84 days, the stay continues and a briefing schedule is set up. If DHS files a timely opposition to the motion, or if at any time DHS moves to lift the stay, then a motions panel will decide whether to continue the stay. See U.S. Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit, Gen. Order 6.4 (amended Sept. 28, 2005); De Leon v. INS, 115 F.3d 643 (9th Cir. 1997).

By what standard should a court decide whether to stay removal pending its decision on a petition for review? Under the traditional rule for staying the enforcement of an order pending appellate review, the court weighs four factors—“(1) whether the stay applicant has made a strong showing that he is likely to succeed on the merits; (2) whether the applicant will be irreparably injured absent a stay; (3) whether issuance of the stay will substantially injure the other parties interested in the proceeding; and (4) where the public interest lies.” Hilton v. Braunskill, 481 U.S. 770, 776, 107 S.Ct. 2113, 95 L.Ed. 2d 724 (1987). But INA § 242(f)(2), added by IIRIRA and captioned “Limits on injunctive relief,” provides that “no court shall enjoin” [emphasis added] a removal order absent “clear and convincing evidence” that the order is “prohibited as a matter of law.” The latter standard, which is more demanding, clearly applies to actions for injunctive relief, but does it also supplant the traditional test for temporarily staying enforcement of a removal order pending decision on a petition for review? In Nken v. Holder, 556 U.S. ___, 129 S.Ct. 1749, 173 L.Ed.2d 550 (2009), the Supreme Court held by a 7–2 vote that the traditional test still governs requests for such stays. The Court also concluded, however, that for purposes of the traditional test “the burden of removal alone cannot constitute the requisite irreparable injury.” 173 L.Ed.2d at 566. Some additional injury is required.

Several other limitations on petitions for review are carryovers from prior law. One must first exhaust all administrative remedies that are available as of right. INA § 242(d)(1). In particular, exhaustion entails raising the particular issue before the BIA. Un v. Gonzales, 415 F.3d 205, 210 (1st Cir. 2005). Res judicata and collateral estoppel are fully applicable; thus, with limited exceptions, another court cannot have previously decided the validity of the removal order. INA § 242(d)(2).

Some courts have started to apply a “fugitive disentitlement” doctrine, under which people who fail to appear for their removal orders will have their petitions for review dismissed. See, e.g., Giri v. Keisler, 507 F.3d 833 (5th Cir. 2007), and cases cited therein. The doctrine has its origins in the criminal context. Does this doctrine turn judicial review into a game, in which two wrongs make a right? I.e., are the courts saying “If you have done something unlawful, then we shall affirm a government decision that might also be unlawful?” On the other hand, now that petitions for review can be filed from overseas, can the government argue that there is no longer any excuse for going underground? Or should the petitioner be able to argue “I should not have to leave the country for months or years while review is pending if, as I allege, the administrative removal order is unlawful and I have the right to remain?” See generally Paul Zoltan et al., Fugitive Disentitlement, 13 BIB 681 (June 1, 2008).

If the petition for review survives all the barriers discussed above and all those to be discussed below, the reviewing court decides the merits solely on the basis of the administrative record. INA § 242(b)(4)(A). Normally, that record will contain the charging document, the transcript of the removal hearing, any documentary evidence that was submitted, the decision of the immigration judge, and the papers connected with the BIA proceeding (including the opposing briefs to, and the decision by, the BIA).

The statute contains an odd provision concerning the scope of the court’s review. According to INA § 242(b)(4)(B), “the administrative findings of fact are conclusive unless any reasonable adjudicator would be compelled to conclude to the contrary.” Earlier, however, you encountered INA § 240(c)(3), which says, among other things: “No decision on deportability shall be valid unless it is based upon reasonable, substantial, and probative evidence.”

Do those two provisions conflict?⁶⁹ The “reasonable, substantial, and probative evidence” test is probably indistinguishable from the simpler-sounding “substantial evidence” test more commonly used to review formal agency factfinding. And the latter, in turn, has generally been construed to require only that the evidence in the record enable a reasonable adjudicator to make the challenged finding. See item 4 of the Notes and Questions following the Woodby case, above. Perhaps, then, section 242(b)(4)(B), which makes the findings of fact conclusive “unless any reasonable adjudicator would be compelled to conclude to the contrary,” is merely the functional equivalent of the traditional “substantial evidence” test. Under that interpretation, sections 242(b)(4)(B) and 240(c)(3) are reconcilable.

Those are the general parameters. As the introduction to this subsection noted, Congress has carved out some large exceptions to the availability of petitions for review. Here are the major ones:

i. Crime-Related Removal Orders

Under INA § 242(a)(2)(C), “no court shall have jurisdiction to review” a removal order if the person “is removable” on almost any of the crime-

69. It is clear that the phrase “reasonable, substantial, and probative evidence,” even though included in a section dealing generally with the conduct of the removal hearing rather than with judicial review, describes the standard of review, not the standard of proof. The standard of proof, “clear and convincing evidence,” is laid out in the immediately preceding sentence.

related grounds. The deportability grounds that fall within that bar cover aggravated felonies, controlled substance offenses, firearms offenses, other miscellaneous crimes, and two moral turpitude crimes punishable by sentences of at least one year each. Id. In St. Cyr, below, the Supreme Court interpreted this language as not barring review by district courts under the general federal habeas corpus statute, 28 USC § 2241. In the REAL ID Act of 2005, Congress responded to St. Cyr by amending section 242(a)(2)(C) (and all of the other similarly worded court-stripping provisions in the INA) to state, explicitly, that the bar on judicial review supersedes all other provisions of law, statutory or nonstatutory, including specifically 28 USC § 2241 and other habeas corpus provisions.

Still, this preclusion remains narrower than might first appear. As a compromise, Congress added new INA § 242(a)(2)(D). This provision specifies that the major limitations on judicial review do not preclude “review of constitutional claims or questions of law raised upon a petition for review . . .” Rather, as the conference committee report explains, Congress’s goal was simply to channel all judicial review into a uniform process that avoids the delays occasioned by the sequence of district court review followed by appeal to the court of appeals. Report 109–72 (109th Cong., 1st Sess.) (May 3, 2005), at 172–75.

Before the REAL ID Act, the courts had effectively recognized at least two situations in which noncitizens who had been ordered removed on crime-related grounds might nonetheless obtain judicial review of their removal orders on questions of law.

First, the literal language bars judicial review only when the person “is removable.” Because courts always have jurisdiction to determine their own jurisdiction, they have consistently interpreted section 242(a)(2)(C) as not barring review of whether the person is, in fact, removable. Thus, for example, if the deportability ground is conviction of an aggravated felony, the determination of whether the crime in question constitutes an aggravated felony remains reviewable.⁷⁰ In the face of what was becoming a judicial consensus, the government conceded the point, see Calcano-Martinez v. INS, 533 U.S. 348, 350 n.2, 121 S.Ct. 2268, 150 L.Ed.2d 392 (2001), and the Supreme Court in Leocal v. Ashcroft, 543 U.S. 1, 125 S.Ct. 377, 160 L.Ed.2d 271 (2004), seems to have agreed sub silentio. The same principle is applied for crimes involving moral turpitude. See, e.g., Carty v. Ashcroft, 395 F.3d 1081, 1082–83 (9th Cir. 2005). Both before and after the REAL ID Act, therefore, the main practical impact of section 242(a)(2)(C) has been in the many cases in which noncitizens conceded deportability, applied for discretionary relief, and were denied. (In those situations, judicial review is additionally constrained by the separate bar on review of most exercises of discretion, as discussed below.)

⁷⁰ See, e.g., Dalton v. Ashcroft, 257 F.3d 200, 203 (2d Cir. 2001); Drakes v. Zimski, 240 F.3d 246 (3d Cir. 2001); Lewis v. INS, 194 F.3d 539 (4th Cir. 1999); Nehme v. INS, 252 F.3d 415 (5th Cir. 2001); Guerrero-Perez v. INS, 242 F.3d 727 (7th Cir. 2001); Penuliar v. Ashcroft, 395 F.3d 1037, 1040 (9th Cir. 2005); contra, Berehe v. INS, 114 F.3d 159 (10th Cir. 1997).

Second, apart from their roles in interpreting and applying the statutory limitations on jurisdiction, pre-REAL ID Act court decisions suggested that section 242(a)(2)(C) did not prevent courts from reviewing claims that raised “substantial constitutional questions.”⁷¹

Since both these exemptions from the limitations on petitions for review (interpretation of statutory jurisdictional limitations and substantial constitutional questions) are questions of law, new section 241(a)(2)(D) effectively codifies both exceptions. Indeed, it extends the exceptions to cover all “constitutional claims or questions of law.” (Since constitutional questions are questions of law, the former reference is probably superfluous anyway.) As for questions of law, therefore, the main effects of these changes would seem to be (1) to expand judicial review in crime-related removal cases to cover all questions of law; and (2) to assure they are reviewed only by courts of appeals rather than allow some cases to originate in the district courts.

Still not entirely clear is the meaning of “questions of law.” Does this phrase cover the question whether the administrative authorities correctly applied the law to the facts, or whether as a matter of law the evidence sufficiently supports the findings of fact, or whether as a matter of law the administrative authorities either failed to exercise, or abused, their discretion? Determining whether such claims are now reviewable will entail both interpretation of INA § 242 and, to the extent section 242 is construed to bar their review, determinations of the constitutional constraints on Congress’s power to bar habeas review. This subject will be taken up in the Notes and Questions that follow St. Cyr below.

ii. Denials of Discretionary Relief

Regardless of the ground for deportability, INA § 242(a)(2)(B) strips the courts of jurisdiction to review two groups of discretionary decisions. Like section 242(a)(2)(C) above, this provision does not preclude judicial review of “constitutional claims or questions of law.” INA § 242(a)(2)(D), added by REAL ID Act, § 106(a)(1). But deciding what is a question of law can be tricky. At least one court has held that whether cruelty is “extreme” for purposes of section 240A(b)(2)(A)(I) (the special cancellation of removal provision for spouses and children who have been “battered or subjected to extreme cruelty”) is discretionary and therefore unreviewable. The court reasoned that there is no algorithmic formula for invoking the provision.⁷²

71. See, e.g., Calcano-Martinez v. INS, 533 U.S. 348, 350 n.2, 121 S.Ct. 2268, 150 L.Ed.2d 392 (2001) (noting government’s concession that “the courts of appeals retain jurisdiction to review ‘substantial constitutional challenges’ raised by aliens who come within the strictures of” section 242(a)(2)(C)); James Feroli, Habeas Corpus Subject Matter Jurisdiction over Final Orders of Removal Pursuant to 28 USCA. § 2241, Sept. 2004 Immigration Briefings.

72. Perales-Cumpean v. Gonzales, 429 F.3d 977 (10th Cir. 2005). See generally Daniel Kanstroom, Surrounding the Hole in the Doughnut: Discretion and Deference in U.S. Immigration Law, 71 Tulane L. Rev. 703 (1997). Professor Kanstroom’s more recent article considers both the difficulties of distinguishing law from discretion and the constitutionality of barring judicial review of the latter. Daniel Kanstroom, The Better Part of Valor: The REAL ID Act, Discretion, and the

The first prong [section 242(a)(2)(B)(i)] bars review of “any judgment regarding the granting of relief under” any of several specifically enumerated provisions of the INA. The list includes most of the major affirmative relief provisions available in removal proceedings—cancellation of removal (both part A and part B), voluntary departure, adjustment of status, and waivers of inadmissibility under sections 212(h) (relief from certain crime-related grounds) and 212(i) (relief from inadmissibility based on fraud).⁷³

The second prong, INA § 242(a)(2)(B)(ii), covers “any other decision or action of the Attorney General the authority for which is specified under this title to be in the discretion of the Attorney General” [except asylum]. This provision has sweeping consequences, but it too is probably less absolute than it first appears.

First, the provision does not make all the Attorney General’s discretionary decisions unreviewable—only those that are authorized by “this title,” which is Title II of the INA. Not covered, therefore, are Attorney General (now Secretary of Homeland Security) decisions under other titles of the INA (for example, those relating to citizenship, in title III) and Attorney General decisions under other statutes (including any immigration-related decisions contained in statutes or statutory provisions that did not amend the INA).

Thus, this provision appears to bar judicial review of discretionary decisions under INA §§ 205 (revocation of visa petition); 207 (refugee admissions); 209 (adjustment of status of refugees); 236 (detention pending removal of arriving noncitizens); 248 (change of nonimmigrant status); and 249 (registry). In each of those cases, title II of the INA expressly bestows a discretionary power on the Attorney General (or the Secretary of Homeland Security).

Other provisions of title II, in contrast, are worded in mandatory terms. See, e.g., INA §§ 204(b) (denial of visa petition); 241(b) (removal to country designated by noncitizen); 241(b)(3) (no removal to country of persecution); 245A (legalization); and 246 (rescission of adjustment of status). In those cases, the courts retain the power to reverse administrative decisions in which the evidence does not sufficiently support the findings of fact.

Second, it is not clear whether B(ii) reaches those Attorney General decisions that are authorized by regulation rather than by statute. A few courts have now weighed in on that issue, and they have split. Several courts have expressly invoked the statute/regulation distinction to conclude that denials of motions to reopen, which are authorized by administrative regulation, are reviewable for abuse of discretion.⁷⁴ Noncitizens have ar-⁷³ “Rule” of Immigration Law, 51 New York Law School L. Rev. 161 (2006-07), reprinted, 12 BIB 530 (May 1, 2007).

⁷³ A separate provision, INA § 212(a)(9)(B)(v), allows discretionary waivers of inadmissibility for certain immigrants who were unlawfully present in the United States but whose citizen or LPR family members would suffer extreme hardship. It then goes on to bar judicial review of denials of such waivers.

⁷⁴ See, e.g., Yu Zhao v. Gonzales, 404 F.3d 295 (5th Cir. 2005); Medina-Morales v. Ashcroft, 362 F.3d 1263 (9th Cir. 2004);

gued that INA § 242(b)(6), which requires courts to consolidate judicial review of denials of motions to reopen with judicial review of the underlying removal orders, would make no sense if denials of motions to reopen were not reviewable. In Kucana v. Mukasey, 533 F.3d 534 (7th Cir. 2008), however, the court reasoned that section 242(b)(6) would be meaningful even if denials of motions to reopen were held to be generally unreviewable, because the enactment of the “question of law” exception in 2005 makes such denials reviewable when the error is one of law. [The Supreme Court has granted certiorari in Kucana to decide whether BIA denials of motions to reopen removal proceedings are subject to judicial review. Kucana v. Holder, No. 08–911 (S.Ct. Apr. 27, 2009).]

In one other context in which the discretion is the product of regulation rather than statute—the immigration judge’s decision whether to grant continuances—the circuits are also divided, with a majority holding the decision reviewable. For a circuit breakdown, see Ali v. Gonzales, 502 F.3d 659, 664 (7th Cir. 2007) (holding that immigration judges’ power to grant continuances “derived” from their statutory authority to conduct removal hearings and thus are unreviewable).

Both prongs of the bar on review of discretion raise a further issue. Until recently, it seemed to be settled law that the bar was limited to the discretionary components of the named remedies. Recall that the typical affirmative relief provision is in the form “If A, B, and C, then the Attorney General has the discretion to do X.” Legal issues concerning the applicant’s statutory eligibility for discretionary relief are now expressly reviewable. INA § 242(a)(2)(D). But may courts review claims that the evidence does not support the administrative findings of fact concerning eligibility for affirmative relief?

Before the REAL ID Act, the answer was yes.⁷⁵ Although nothing in the REAL ID Act expressly supersedes those decisions, post-REAL ID Act courts have divided on this issue.⁷⁶

Barker v. Ashcroft, 382 F.3d 313, 315 (3d Cir. 2003).

75. See, e.g. Reyes-Vasquez v. Ashcroft, 395 F.3d 903, 907–09 (8th Cir. 2005) (holding BIA finding of no “continuous physical presence” for cancellation of removal purposes non-discretionary and therefore reviewable); Morales-Morales v. Ashcroft, 384 F.3d 418, 421–23 (7th Cir. 2004) (same); Mireles-Valdez v. Ashcroft, 349 F.3d 213 (5th Cir. 2003) (same); Gomez-Lopez v. Ashcroft, 391 F.3d 1109, 1111 (9th Cir. 2004) (holding finding of no “good moral character,” for cancellation of removal purposes, non-discretionary and therefore reviewable). Cf. Romero-Torres v. Ashcroft, 327 F.3d 887, 889–92 (9th Cir. 2003) (holding that determination concerning “exceptional and extremely unusual hardship,” for cancellation of removal purposes, is discretionary and therefore unreviewable, but that legal definition of “child” for purposes of same hardship requirement is non-discretionary and therefore reviewable).

76. Compare, e.g., Gutierrez v. Mukasey, 521 F.3d 1114, 1116 (9th Cir. 2008) (holding that court of appeals may review, under substantial evidence standard, BIA finding of no continuous physical presence) with Cevilla v. Gonzales, 446 F.3d 658 (7th Cir. 2006) (upholding even an “inexplicable” finding of lack of continuous physical presence, where finding was not “wacky” enough to violate due process); cf. Saintha v. Mukasey, 516 F.3d 243, 248 (4th Cir. 2008) (holding INA § 242(a)(2)(D) creates no exception for questions of fact, for purpose of the crime-related bar on judicial review).

Until Congress passed the REAL ID Act, a related question was whether the limitations imposed by section 242(a)(2)(B)(ii) were confined to removal orders, or whether Congress meant to bar judicial review of INS (now USCIS) decisions even outside the context of removal proceedings. The question is important, because USCIS makes a host of discretionary decisions either before removal proceedings or in contexts unrelated to removal—for example, denials of change of nonimmigrant status, extensions of stay, requests to transfer schools, etc. The REAL ID Act, § 101(f)(2), amended INA § 242(a)(2)(B) to clarify that the jurisdictional bar extends to all the discretionary decisions otherwise covered, regardless of whether they were made in removal proceedings.

Whichever decisions INA § 242(a)(2)(B) insulates from petitions for review, the REAL ID Act reveals Congress's intent to insulate those same claims from habeas corpus. We return to that subject in section B.6.b below.

iii. Expedited Removal Orders

On another front, recall INA § 235(b)(1), which authorizes “expedited removal” of arriving noncitizens whom immigration inspectors believe to be inadmissible on documentary or fraud grounds. The Attorney General has the discretion to extend the expedited removal procedure to those who are present in the United States, have not been admitted or paroled, and are unable to prove two years continuous physical presence, INA § 235(b)(1)(A)(iii), and has exercised that authority on several occasions, see section D.1 below. Under INA § 242(a)(2)(A), courts lack the jurisdiction to review, on the merits, either kind of expedited removal order. (A court may use habeas corpus to review a claim that the person is a citizen, or that the person was not in fact the subject of an expedited removal order, or that the expedited removal procedure should not have been used because the person was a returning LPR. See INA § 242(e)(2). But review of the merits is otherwise barred.)

Also with respect to expedited removal, IIRIRA introduced statutory limitations on the power of courts to entertain challenges to the legality of administrative policies and even the constitutionality of the statute itself. Under INA § 242(e)(3)(A), the District Court for the District of Columbia has jurisdiction to decide whether section 235(b)(1) or any implementing regulations are constitutional, as well as jurisdiction to decide whether the Attorney General's regulations or other written policy statements comply with the statute and other laws. But INA § 242(e)(3)(B) says that “[a]ny action instituted under this paragraph must be filed no later than 60 days after [implementation of the challenged rule]”.

The REAL ID Act made clear that these provisions too are meant to be habeas-proof. See, e.g., REAL ID Act § 106(a), amending INA §§ 242(a)(2)(A), 242(a)(5). Can Congress constitutionally preclude judicial review of constitutional challenges? (Note that the new exception that allows judicial review for “constitutional claims and questions of law,” INA § 242(a)(2)(D), applies only to subsections B and C of section 242(a)(2)— not to the bar on judicial review of expedited removal orders.) For that matter, are there even some nonconstitutional challenges that Congress cannot constitutionally insulate from judicial review? See the habeas corpus discussion below; see generally Gerald L. Neuman, On the Adequacy of Direct Review after the REAL ID Act of 2005, 51 New York Law School L. Rev. 133 (2006-07).

iv. Voluntary Departure Regulations

Somewhat analogous problems arise out of INA § 240B(e). Under that subsection, the Attorney General “may by regulation limit eligibility for voluntary departure . . .” There are no express statutory constraints on what extra conditions the Attorney General may add. Consequently, as you saw on page 621 above, unless statutory constraints are read in, possible nondelegation questions arise. More pertinent here, the same provision goes on to bar judicial review of any such regulation. If the courts sanction such an open-ended delegation of power to the executive branch, how are they likely to treat the provision barring judicial review of the executive decision? Will the combination of congressional and judicial absence from the process trouble the courts? Or will the breadth of the executive power, if anything, counsel in favor of judicial abstention, on the ground that, within the meaning of the Administrative Procedure Act, Congress has “committed” the question to agency discretion? Recall the analogous discussion of visa denials, on pages 499–500 above.

v. Prosecutorial Discretion

Yet another court-stripping provision is INA § 242(g). It bars judicial review of such decisions as whether to commence removal proceedings (a matter of generally unreviewable prosecutorial discretion) and whether to execute a removal order (rather than temporarily stay removal).⁷⁷

vi. Detention Decisions

Another court-stripping provision relates to detention. While removal proceedings are pending, various administrative officials have the discretion whether to detain the noncitizen, release him or her on bond, or grant parole without requiring bond. INA § 236(a). By way of exception, detention is mandatory for people who are deportable under most of the criminal provisions or the terrorist provisions. INA § 236(c). As you saw earlier (pages 226–39 above), the Supreme Court upheld the constitutionality of this mandatory detention provision in Demore v. Kim, 538 U.S. 510, 123 S.Ct. 1708, 155 L.Ed.2d 724 (2003).

⁷⁷. See Reno v. American-Arab Anti-Discrimination Committee, 525 U.S. 471, 119 S.Ct. 936, 142 L.Ed.2d 940 (1999); Botezatu v. INS, 195 F.3d 311, 313 (7th Cir. 1999); Nancy Morawetz, Predicting the Meaning of INA § 242(b)(9), 14 Georgetown Immigration L.J. 453 (2000); Hiroshi Motomura, Judicial Re- view in Immigration Cases after AADC: Lessons from Civil Procedure, 14 Georgetown Immigration L.J. 385 (2000); Leti Volpp, Court-Stripping and Class-Wide Relief: A Response to Judicial Review in Immigration Cases after AADC, 14 Georgetown Immigration L.J. 463 (2000).

Under INA § 236(e), “[n]o court may set aside any action or decision of the Attorney General under this section regarding the detention or release of any alien or the grant, revocation, or denial of bond or parole.” While section 236(e) literally bars review of the Attorney General’s decisions implementing section 236, the Court in Demore read the provision as not barring the use of habeas corpus to challenge the constitutionality of section 236 itself. Does this mean a court may also review the Attorney General’s future decision to apply section 236 in a particular case? On the one hand, the Court in Demore emphasized that the challenge before it was to the constitutionality of the statute, rather than to the Attorney General’s application of it to the facts of the case. On the other hand, the Court also relied heavily on the fact that Congress had not expressly precluded habeas corpus, a rationale equally applicable to challenges to the application of the statute. The REAL ID Act did not change INA § 236(e), and the conference committee report stated that the Act “would not preclude habeas review over challenges to detention that are independent of challenges to removal orders.” Report 109–72 accompanying H.R. 1268 (109th Cong., 1st Sess.) (May 3, 2005), at 175.

b. HABEAS CORPUS⁷⁸

As noted in the introduction to this subsection, habeas corpus was the usual method for obtaining judicial review of deportation orders, long before Congress in 1961 expressly authorized petitions for review of deportation orders in the courts of appeals. Even after 1961, when the general rule was that petitions for review were the exclusive means for reviewing deportation orders, Congress carved out an express exception for habeas corpus. Former INA § 106(a)(10) (pre-1996) read: “Any alien held in custody pursuant to an order of deportation may obtain judicial review thereof by habeas corpus proceedings.”

In 1996, in AEDPA § 401(e)(3), Congress repealed INA § 106(a)(10). With one minor exception the INA no longer recognizes habeas as an alternative to the petition for review. Under 28 USC § 2241, the general federal habeas statute, “[w]rits of habeas corpus may be granted by the Supreme Court, any justice thereof, the district courts and any circuit judge

78. There has been some fine recent commentary on the use of habeas corpus in removal cases after AEDPA and IIRIRA (but before the REAL ID Act of 2005). For a sampling, see Lenni Benson, The New World of Judicial Review of Removal Orders, 12 Georgetown Immigration L.J. 233 (1998); Lenni Benson, Back to the Future: Congress Attacks the Right to Judicial Review of Immigration Proceedings, 29 Connecticut L. Rev. 1411 (1997); David Cole, Jurisdiction and Liberty: Habeas Corpus and Due Process as Limits on Congress’s Control of Federal Jurisdiction, 86 Georgetown L.J. 2481 (1998);

M. Isabel Medina, Judicial Review—A Nice Thing? Article III, Separation of Powers and the Illegal Immigration Reform and Immigrant Responsibility Act of 1996, 29 Connecticut L. Rev. 1525 (1997); Gerald L. Neuman, The Habeas Corpus Suspension Clause After INS v. St. Cyr, 33 Columbia Human Rights L. Rev. 555 (2002); Gerald L. Neuman, Habeas Corpus, Executive Detention, and the Removal of Aliens, 98 Columbia L. Rev. 961 (1998); Kathleen M. Sullivan, Commentary on Reno v. American-Arab Anti-Discrimination Committee, 4 BIB 249 (Mar. 15, 1999).

within their respective jurisdictions.” As you have seen, the REAL ID Act now expressly forecloses the use of 28 USC § 2241 in removal proceedings.

Keep in mind, however, that habeas corpus is grounded in the United States Constitution. Article I, § 9, clause 2 says: “The Privilege of the Writ of Habeas Corpus shall not be suspended, unless when in Cases of Rebellion or Invasion the public Safety may require it.” This provision not only directly constrains Congress’s power to suspend the writ of habeas corpus, but also influences courts’ interpretations of statutory provisions that might otherwise be read to suspend the writ. The suspension clause aside, the constitutionality of the 1996 court-stripping provisions has been questioned on both procedural due process grounds (fundamental fairness requires an opportunity for judicial review of administrative or even congressional decisions) and separation of powers grounds (it is the job of the judiciary to interpret the law).

As you will discover presently, the Supreme Court in 2001 interpreted the pre-REAL ID Act version of one of the 1996 provisions as not foreclosing habeas corpus. It did so in order to avoid “serious constitutional questions” concerning the suspension clause. That opinion (St. Cyr) is reproduced below. But first, read the following excerpt from one of the classic discussions of this subject. The author focuses specifically on habeas corpus, but elements of his reasoning apply to court-stripping provisions generally.

Henry M. Hart, Jr., The Power of Congress to Limit the Jurisdiction of Federal Courts: An Exercise in Dialectic

66 Harvard L.Rev. 1362, 1386–96 (1953).

Q: * * * What happens if the Government is hurting people and not simply refusing to help them? Suppose Congress authorizes a program of direct action by government officials against private persons or private property. Suppose, further, that it not only dispenses with judicial enforcement but either limits the jurisdiction of the federal courts to inquire into what the officials do or denies it altogether.

A. Relief Under General Jurisdiction

A. * * * Obviously, the answer is that the validity of the jurisdictional limitation depends on the validity of the program itself, or the particular part of it in question. If the court finds that what is being done is invalid, its duty is simply to declare the jurisdictional limitation invalid also, and then proceed under the general grant of jurisdiction.

Q. That can’t be as easy as you make it sound. Is that what the federal courts actually do?

A. That’s what they’ve often done.

Take the clearest case—an attempt by Congress to authorize the administrative imposition of infamous punishment. That, substantially, is Wong Wing v. United States, one of the bulwarks of the Constitution. There Congress had directed that any Chinese person adjudged in a summary proceeding by any judge or United States commissioner to be in the country unlawfully should first be imprisoned at hard labor for not more than a year and then deported. In the exercise of its general jurisdiction in habeas corpus, the Court ordered the prisoners discharged from such imprisonment—without prejudice of course to their detention according to law for deportation.

In Lipke v. Lederer, the Court found that a payment required by the tax laws was actually a penalty enforceable only by the process of the criminal law. It exercised general federal question jurisdiction to enjoin summary collection, in spite of the statute prohibiting injunctions against federal taxes.

Q. In those cases the whole extra-judicial procedure was found unconstitutional. That's an unusual situation. What if the party simply says that the executive officers are proceeding erroneously in his particular case?

A. If he has a constitutional right to have that question examined in court, and the court has general jurisdiction, it can disregard any special jurisdictional limitation and go ahead and examine it.

That's what the Court did, for example, in Ng Fung Ho v. White. That case involved an administrative order to deport an asserted alien who claimed to be a citizen. On habeas corpus the court held that the Due Process Clause entitled the claimant to a trial de novo and an independent judicial judgment on the issue of citizenship; and it directed the district court to give it to him. * * *

* * *

Q. But even admitted⁷⁹ aliens have access to the courts on habeas corpus on the question of their right to enter or remain in the country, don't they?

A. Yes, although the scope of review, of course, falls short of trial de novo. Indeed, judicial review in exclusion and deportation cases is one of the most impressive examples of the general point I am making, and currently provides a testing crucible of basic principle.

The structure of review has been developed by the courts in the face of a statutory plan of administrative control which looked neither to their help nor interference. For years the statutes have provided that orders of the Secretary of Labor (now of the Attorney General) in these matters shall be "final."

Q. How then can aliens have any rights to assert in habeas corpus? I thought they came and stayed only at the pleasure of Congress.

A. The Supreme Court seemed to think so, too, at first. In its earliest decisions the Court started with the premise of plenary legislative power and on that basis seemed to be prepared to take the word "final" in the statutes literally and to decline any review whatever, even in deportation cases.

79. By "admitted aliens," Professor Hart did not mean those who have been admitted into the United States. He was referring to people who admit they are "aliens," as distinguished from people like Ng Fung Ho who claim to be citizens.—Eds.

Before long, however, it began to see that the premise needed to be qualified—that a power to lay down general rules, even if it were plenary, did not necessarily include a power to be arbitrary or to authorize administrative officials to be arbitrary. It saw that, on the contrary, the very existence of a jurisdiction in habeas corpus, coupled with the constitutional guarantee of due process, implied a regime of law. It saw that in such a regime the courts had a responsibility to see that statutory authority was not transgressed, that a reasonable procedure was used in exercising the authority, and—seemingly also—that human beings were not unreasonably subjected, even by direction of Congress, to an uncontrolled official discretion.

Under the benign influence of these ideas, the law grew and flourished, like Egypt under the rule of Joseph. Thousands of cases were decided whose presence in the courts cannot be explained on any other basis. But what the status of many of these cases is now is not altogether clear.

Q. Why?

A. There arose up new justices in Washington which knew not Joseph. Citing only the harsh precepts of the very earliest decisions, they began to decide cases accordingly, as if nothing had happened in the years between.

In the Knauff case, Justice Minton said that, "Whatever the rule may be concerning deportation of persons who have gained entry into the United States, it is not within the province of any court, unless expressly authorized by law, to review the determination of the political branch of the Government to exclude a given alien." Since Congress has never expressly authorized any court to review an exclusion order, this statement either ignores or renders obsolete every habeas corpus case in the books involving an exclusion proceeding.

On the procedural side, Justice Minton went so far as to say that, "Whatever the procedure authorized by Congress is, it is due process as far as an alien denied entry is concerned," a patently preposterous proposition.

Justice Clark repeated and applied both statements in the Mezei case.

Q. Then we're back where we started half a century ago?

A. Oh no. The aberrations have been largely confined to admission cases. In deportations, for the most part, the Court has adhered to the sound and humane philosophy of the middle period. In some respects it has even extended its applications.

What is happening is what so often happens when there has been a development in the law of which the judges are incompletely aware. Some decisions follow the earlier precedents and some the later, until the conflict of principle becomes intolerable, and it gets ironed out.

Q. Do you mean to say that you don't think there are any material differences between the case of an alien trying to get into the country and the case of one whom the Government is trying to put out?

A. No. Of course there are differences in these alien cases—not only those simple ones but many others. But such differences are material only in determining the content of due process in the particular situation. What process is due always depends upon the circumstances, and the Due Process Clause is always flexible enough to take the circumstances into account.

The distinctions the Court has been drawing recently, however, are of a different order. They are distinctions between when the Constitution applies and when it does not apply at all. Any such distinction as that produces a conflict of basic principle, and is inadmissible.

Q. What basic principle?

A. The great and generating principle of this whole body of law—that the Constitution always applies when a court is sitting with jurisdiction in habeas corpus. For then the court has always to inquire, not only whether the statutes have been observed, but whether the petitioner before it has been “deprived of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law,” or injured in any other way in violation of the fundamental law.

That is the premise of the deportation cases,⁸⁰ and it applies in exactly the same way in admission cases. The harsh early decisions announcing a contrary premise applied such a contrary premise without distinction in both deportations and admissions. Indeed, Justice Minton cited early admission and deportation precedents indiscriminately in Knauff, without noticing that the principle which had compelled repudiation of the deportation precedents required repudiation also of the others.

That principle forbids a constitutional court with jurisdiction in habeas corpus from ever accepting as an adequate return to the writ the mere statement that what has been done is authorized by act of Congress. The inquiry remains, if Marbury v. Madison still stands, whether the act of Congress is consistent with the fundamental law. Only upon such a principle could the court reject, as it surely would, a return to the writ which informed it that the applicant for admission lay stretched upon a rack with pins driven in behind his finger nails pursuant to authority duly conferred by statute in order to secure the information necessary to determine his admissibility. The same principle which would justify rejec-

80. [Footnote 93 in original] See * * * Heikkila v. Barber, 345 U.S. 229 (1953). Speaking for the Court, Justice Clark there held squarely that judicial review in deportation cases is “required by the Constitution.” He said that “regardless of whether or not the scope of inquiry on habeas corpus has been expanded, the function of the courts has always been limited to the enforcement of due process requirements.” Id. at 236.

It is to be observed that since the courts in habeas corpus have always enforced statutory requirements, too, Justice Clark must here be understood as saying that the Constitution gives the alien a right, among others, to have the statutes observed. The statement seems to apply equally to admission cases.
* * *

tion of this return imposes responsibility to inquire into the adequacy of other returns.

Granting that the requirements of due process must vary with the circumstances, and allowing them all the flexibility that can conceivably be claimed, it still remains true that the court is obliged, by the presuppositions of its whole jurisdiction in this area, to decide whether what has been done is consistent with due process—and not simply pass back the buck to an assertedly all-powerful and unimpeachable Congress.

* * *

Q. But that is what the Court has held. And so I guess that's that.

A. No, it isn't.

The deepest assumptions of the legal order require that the decisions of the highest court in the land be accepted as settling the rights and wrongs of the particular matter immediately in controversy. But the judges who sit for the time being on the court have no authority to remake by fiat alone the fabric of principle by which future cases are to be decided. They are only the custodians of the law and not the owners of it. The law belongs to the people of the country, and to the hundreds of thousands of lawyers and judges who through the years have struggled, in their behalf, to make it coherent and intelligible and responsive to the people's sense of justice.

And so, when justices of the Supreme Court sit down and write opinions in behalf of the Court which ignore the painful forward steps of a whole half century of adjudication, making no effort to relate what then is being done to what the Court has done before, they write without authority for the future. The appeal to principle is still open and, so long as courts of the United States sit with general jurisdiction in habeas corpus, that means an appeal to them and their successors.

* * *

QUESTION

Based on what you saw in chapter 2 concerning the plenary congressional power over immigration, and after reading the excerpts from Professor Hart's dialogue, do you think the Constitution requires judicial review of administratively final orders removing deportable noncitizens? You should revisit this question after reading the case that follows.

INS v. St. Cyr

Supreme Court of the United States, 2001.
533 U.S. 289, 121 S.Ct. 2271, 150 L.Ed.2d 347.

■ STEVENS, J., delivered the opinion of the Court, in which KENNEDY, SOUTER, GINSBURG, and BREYER, JJ., joined. O'CONNOR, J., filed a dissenting opinion. SCALIA, J., filed a dissenting opinion, in which REHNQUIST, C. J., and THOMAS, J., joined, and in which O'CONNOR, J., joined, as to Parts I and III.

■ JUSTICE STEVENS delivered the opinion of the Court.

Both the Antiterrorism and Effective Death Penalty Act of 1996 (AEDPA), enacted on April 24, 1996, and the Illegal Immigration Reform and Immigrant Responsibility Act of 1996 (IIRIRA), enacted on September 30, 1996, contain comprehensive amendments to the Immigration and Nationality Act (INA). This case raises two important questions about the impact of those amendments. The first question is a procedural one, concerning the effect of those amendments on the availability of habeas corpus jurisdiction under 28 USC § 2241. The second question is a substantive one, concerning the impact of the amendments on conduct that occurred before their enactment and on the availability of discretionary relief from deportation.

Respondent, Enrico St. Cyr, is a citizen of Haiti who was admitted to the United States as a lawful permanent resident in 1986. Ten years later, on March 8, 1996 [just before both AEDPA and IIRIRA—Eds.], he pled guilty in a state court to a charge of selling a controlled substance in violation of Connecticut law. That conviction made him deportable. * * *

[Before AEDPA, the relief for which St. Cyr would have been eligible was former INA § 212(c). AEDPA and IIRIRA together replaced section 212(c) with cancellation of removal, part A, for which “aggravated felons” (a category that covers St. Cyr) are ineligible. See pages 595–602 above.—Eds.]

In his habeas corpus petition, respondent has alleged that the restrictions on discretionary relief from deportation contained in the 1996 statutes do not apply to removal proceedings brought against an alien who pled guilty to a deportable crime before their enactment. The District Court accepted jurisdiction of his application and agreed with his submission. In accord with the decisions of four other Circuits, the Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit affirmed. The importance of both questions warranted our grant of certiorari.

* * *

In the Attorney General’s opinion, these amendments have entirely withdrawn his § 212(c) authority to waive deportation for aliens previously convicted of aggravated felonies. Moreover, as a result of other amendments adopted in AEDPA and IIRIRA, the Attorney General also maintains that there is no judicial forum available to decide whether these statutes did, in fact, deprive him of the power to grant such relief. As we shall explain below, we disagree on both points. In our view, a federal court does have jurisdiction to decide the merits of the legal question, and the District Court and the Court of Appeals decided that question correctly in this case.

II

The first question we must consider is whether the District Court retains jurisdiction under the general habeas corpus statute, 28 USC § 2241, to entertain St. Cyr’s challenge. His application for a writ raises a pure question of law. He does not dispute any of the facts that establish his deportability or the conclusion that he is deportable. Nor does he contend that he would have any right to have an unfavorable exercise of the Attorney General's discretion reviewed in a judicial forum. Rather, he contests the Attorney General's conclusion that, as a matter of statutory interpretation, he is not eligible for discretionary relief.

The District Court held, and the Court of Appeals agreed, that it had jurisdiction to answer that question in a habeas corpus proceeding. The INS argues, however, that four sections of the 1996 statutes—specifically, § 401(e) of AEDPA and three sections of IIRIRA (INA §§ 242(a)(1), 242(a)(2)(C), and 242(b)(9))—stripped the courts of jurisdiction to decide the question of law presented by respondent's habeas corpus application.

For the INS to prevail it must overcome both the strong presumption in favor of judicial review of administrative action and the longstanding rule requiring a clear statement of congressional intent to repeal habeas jurisdiction. * * * Implications from statutory text or legislative history are not sufficient to repeal habeas jurisdiction; instead, Congress must articulate specific and unambiguous statutory directives to effect a repeal. * * *

In this case, the plain statement rule draws additional reinforcement from other canons of statutory construction. First, as a general matter, when a particular interpretation of a statute invokes the outer limits of Congress' power, we expect a clear indication that Congress intended that result. * * * Second, if an otherwise acceptable construction of a statute would raise serious constitutional problems, and where an alternative interpretation of the statute is "fairly possible," we are obligated to construe the statute to avoid such problems.

A construction of the amendments at issue that would entirely preclude review of a pure question of law by any court would give rise to substantial constitutional questions. Article I, § 9, cl. 2, of the Constitution provides: "The Privilege of the Writ of Habeas Corpus shall not be suspended, unless when in Cases of Rebellion or Invasion the public Safety may require it." Because of that Clause, some "judicial intervention in deportation cases" is unquestionably "required by the Constitution."

Unlike the provisions of AEDPA that we construed in Felker v. Turpin (1996), this case involves an alien subject to a federal removal order rather than a person confined pursuant to a state-court conviction. Accordingly, regardless of whether the protection of the Suspension Clause encompasses all cases covered by the 1867 Amendment extending the protection of the writ to state prisoners, or by subsequent legal developments, at the absolute minimum, the Suspension Clause protects the writ "as it existed in 1789."

At its historical core, the writ of habeas corpus has served as a means of reviewing the legality of executive detention, and it is in that context that its protections have been strongest. * * *

Notwithstanding the historical use of habeas corpus to remedy unlawful executive action, the INS argues that this case falls outside the traditional scope of the writ at common law. It acknowledges that the writ protected an individual who was held without legal authority, but argues that the writ would not issue where “an official had statutory authorization to detain the individual but . . . the official was not properly exercising his discretionary power to determine whether the individual should be released.” In this case, the INS points out, there is no dispute that the INS had authority in law to hold St. Cyr, as he is eligible for removal. St. Cyr counters that there is historical evidence of the writ issuing to redress the improper exercise of official discretion.

St. Cyr’s constitutional position also finds some support in our prior immigration cases. In Heikkila v. Barber, the Court observed that the then-existing statutory immigration scheme “had the effect of precluding judicial intervention in deportation cases except insofar as it was required by the Constitution”—and that scheme, as discussed below, did allow for review on habeas of questions of law concerning an alien’s eligibility for discretionary relief. Therefore, while the INS’ historical arguments are not insubstantial, the ambiguities in the scope of the exercise of the writ at common law identified by St. Cyr, and the suggestions in this Court’s prior decisions as to the extent to which habeas review could be limited consistent with the Constitution, convince us that the Suspension Clause questions that would be presented by the INS’ reading of the immigration statutes before us are difficult and significant.

In sum, even assuming that the Suspension Clause protects only the writ as it existed in 1789, there is substantial evidence to support the proposition that pure questions of law like the one raised by the respondent in this case could have been answered in 1789 by a common law judge with power to issue the writ of habeas corpus. It necessarily follows that a serious Suspension Clause issue would be presented if we were to accept the INS’s submission that the 1996 statutes have withdrawn that power from federal judges and provided no adequate substitute for its exercise. The necessity of resolving such a serious and difficult constitutional issue—and the desirability of avoiding that necessity—simply reinforce the reasons for requiring a clear and unambiguous statement of constitutional intent.

Moreover, to conclude that the writ is no longer available in this context would represent a departure from historical practice in immigration law. The writ of habeas corpus has always been available to review the legality of executive detention. Federal courts have been authorized to issue writs of habeas corpus since the enactment of the Judiciary Act of 1789, and § 2241 of the Judicial Code provides that federal judges may grant the writ of habeas corpus on the application of a prisoner held “in custody in violation of the Constitution or laws or treaties of the United States.” 28 USC § 2241. Before and after the enactment in 1875 of the first statute regulating immigration, that jurisdiction was regularly invoked on behalf of noncitizens, particularly in the immigration context.

Until the enactment of the 1952 Immigration and Nationality Act, the sole means by which an alien could test the legality of his or her deportation order was by bringing a habeas corpus action in district court. In such cases, other than the question whether there was some evidence to support the order,⁸¹ the courts generally did not review factual determinations made by the Executive. However, they did review the Executive's legal determinations. * * * In case after case, courts answered questions of law in habeas corpus proceedings brought by aliens challenging Executive interpretations of the immigration laws.

Habeas courts also regularly answered questions of law that arose in the context of discretionary relief.⁸² Traditionally, courts recognized a distinction between eligibility for discretionary relief, on the one hand, and the favorable exercise of discretion, on the other hand. See Neuman, 113 Harv. L. Rev., at 1991 (noting the "strong tradition in habeas corpus law . . . that subjects the legally erroneous failure to exercise discretion, unlike a substantively unwise exercise of discretion, to inquiry on the writ"). Eligibility that was "governed by specific statutory standards" provided "a right to a ruling on an applicant's eligibility," even though the actual granting of relief was "not a matter of right under any circumstances, but rather is in all cases a matter of grace." Thus, even though the actual suspension of deportation authorized by § 19(c) of the Immigration Act of 1917 was a matter of grace, in United States ex rel. Accardi v. Shaughnessy (1954), we held that a deportable alien had a right to challenge the Executive's failure to exercise the discretion authorized by the law. The exercise of the District Court's habeas corpus jurisdiction to answer a pure question of law in this case is entirely consistent with the exercise of such jurisdiction in Accardi.

Thus, under the pre-1996 statutory scheme—and consistent with its common-law antecedents—it is clear that St. Cyr could have brought his challenge to the Board of Immigration Appeals' legal determination in a habeas corpus petition under 28 USC § 2241. The INS argues, however, that AEDPA and IIRIRA contain four provisions that express a clear and unambiguous statement of Congress' intent to bar petitions brought under § 2241, despite the fact that none of them mention that section. * * * [Here the Court concludes that none of the cited provisions clearly eliminated habeas review under section 2241—Eds.]

* * *

If it were clear that the question of law could be answered in another judicial forum, it might be permissible to accept the INS' reading of § 242. But the absence of such a forum, coupled with the lack of a clear, unambiguous, and express statement of congressional intent to preclude

81. [Footnote 27 in original] See, e.g., United States ex rel. Vajtauer v. Commissioner of Immigration (Supreme Court, 1927) (holding that deportation "on charges unsupported by any evidence is a denial of due process which may be corrected on habeas corpus").

82. [Footnote 30 in original] Indeed, under the pre-1952 regime which provided only what Heikkila termed the constitutional minimum of review, on habeas lower federal courts routinely reviewed decisions under the Seventh Proviso, the statutory predecessor to § 212(c), to ensure the lawful exercise of discretion. During the same period, habeas was also used to review legal questions that arose in the context of the Government's exercise of other forms of discretionary relief under the 1917 Act.

judicial consideration on habeas of such an important question of law, strongly counsels against adopting a construction that would raise serious constitutional questions.⁸³ Accordingly, we conclude that habeas jurisdiction under § 2241 was not repealed by AEDPA and IIRIRA.

III

[Having found jurisdiction, the Court in this section of the opinion addresses the merits.—Eds.]

* * *

* * * We therefore hold that § 212(c) relief remains available for aliens, like respondent, whose convictions were obtained through plea agreements and who, notwithstanding those convictions, would have been eligible for § 212(c) relief at the time of their plea under the law then in effect.

* * *

■ JUSTICE O'CONNOR, dissenting.

I join Parts I and III of JUSTICE SCALIA's dissenting opinion in this case. I do not join Part II because I believe that, assuming, arguendo, that the Suspension Clause guarantees some minimum extent of habeas review, the right asserted by the alien in this case falls outside the scope of that review for the reasons explained by JUSTICE SCALIA in Part II-B of his dissenting opinion. The question whether the Suspension Clause assures habeas jurisdiction in this particular case properly is resolved on this ground alone, and there is no need to say more.

■ JUSTICE SCALIA, with whom THE CHIEF JUSTICE and JUSTICE THOMAS join, and with whom JUSTICE O'CONNOR joins as to Parts I and III, dissenting.

The Court today finds ambiguity in the utterly clear language of a statute that forbids the district court (and all other courts) to entertain the claims of aliens such as respondent St. Cyr, who have been found deportable by reason of their criminal acts. It fabricates a superclear statement, "magic words" requirement for the congressional expression of such an intent, unjustified in law and unparalleled in any other area of our jurisprudence. And as the fruit of its labors, it brings forth a version of the statute that affords criminal aliens more opportunities for delay-inducing judicial review than are afforded to non-criminal aliens, or even than were afforded to criminal aliens prior to this legislation concededly designed to

83. [Footnote 38 in original] The dissent argues that our decision will afford more rights to criminal aliens than to noncriminal aliens. However, as we have noted, the scope of review on habeas is considerably more limited than on APA-style review. Moreover, this case raises only a pure question of law as to respondent's statutory eligibility for discretionary relief, not, as the dissent suggests, an objection to the manner in which discretion was exercised. As to the question of timing and congruent means of review, we note that Congress could, without raising any constitutional questions, provide an adequate substitute through the courts of appeals.

* * *

expedite their removal. Because it is clear that the law deprives us of jurisdiction to entertain this suit, I respectfully dissent.

I

In categorical terms that admit of no exception, [IIRIRA] unambiguously repeals the application of 28 USC § 2241 (the general habeas corpus provision), and of all other provisions for judicial review, to deportation challenges brought by certain kinds of criminal aliens. [Here Justice Scalia explains why he feels the then existing statute clearly prohibited habeas review even though it did not refer specifically to habeas corpus or to 28 USC § 2241—Eds.]

* * *

It has happened before—too frequently, alas—that courts have distorted plain statutory text in order to produce a “more sensible” result. The unique accomplishment of today’s opinion is that the result it produces is as far removed from what is sensible as its statutory construction is from the language of the text. One would have to study our statute books for a long time to come up with a more unlikely disposition. By authorizing § 2241 habeas review in the district court but foreclosing review in the court of appeals, the Court’s interpretation routes all legal challenges to removal orders brought by criminal aliens to the district court, to be adjudicated under that court’s § 2241 habeas authority, which specifies no time limits. After review by that court, criminal aliens will presumably have an appeal as of right to the court of appeals, and can then petition this Court for a writ of certiorari. In contrast, noncriminal aliens seeking to challenge their removal orders—for example, those charged with having been inadmissible at the time of entry, with having failed to maintain their nonimmigrant status, with having procured a visa through a marriage that was not bona fide, or with having become, within five years after the date of entry, a public charge—will still presumably be required to proceed directly to the court of appeals by way of petition for review, under the restrictive modified Hobbs Act review provisions set forth in § 242(a)(1), including the 30-day filing deadline, see § 242(b)(1). In fact, prior to the enactment of IIRIRA, criminal aliens also had to follow this procedure for immediate modified Hobbs Act review in the court of appeals. The Court has therefore succeeded in perverting a statutory scheme designed to expedite the removal of criminal aliens into one that now affords them more opportunities for (and layers of) judicial review (and hence more opportunities for delay) than are afforded non-criminal aliens—and more than were afforded criminal aliens prior to the enactment of IIRIRA. This outcome speaks for itself; no Congress ever imagined it.

To excuse the violence it does to the statutory text, the Court invokes the doctrine of constitutional doubt, which it asserts is raised by the Suspension Clause, U.S. Const., Art. I, § 9, cl. 2. This uses one distortion to justify another, transmogrifying a doctrine designed to maintain “a just respect for the legislature,” into a means of thwarting the clearly expressed intent of the legislature. The doctrine of constitutional doubt is * * * a device for interpreting what the statute says—not for ignoring what the statute says in order to avoid the trouble of determining whether what it says is unconstitutional. * * *

In the remainder of this opinion I address the question the Court should have addressed: Whether these provisions of IIRIRA are unconstitutional.

II

A. The Suspension Clause of the Constitution, Art. I, § 9, cl. 2, provides as follows:

“The Privilege of the Writ of Habeas Corpus shall not be suspended, unless when in Cases of Rebellion or Invasion the public Safety may require it.”

A straightforward reading of this text discloses that it does not guarantee any content to (or even the existence of) the writ of habeas corpus, but merely provides that the writ shall not (except in case of rebellion or invasion) be suspended. * * *

To “suspend” the writ was not to fail to enact it, much less to refuse to accord it particular content. * * * This was a distinct abuse of majority power, and one that had manifested itself often in the Framers’ experience: temporarily but entirely eliminating the “Privilege of the Writ” for a certain geographic area or areas, or for a certain class or classes of individuals. * * *

In the present case, of course, Congress has not temporarily withheld operation of the writ, but has permanently altered its content. That is, to be sure, an act subject to majoritarian abuse, as is Congress’s framing (or its determination not to frame) a habeas statute in the first place. But that is not the majoritarian abuse against which the Suspension Clause was directed. It is no more irrational to guard against the common and well known “suspension” abuse, without guaranteeing any particular habeas right that enjoys immunity from suspension, than it is, in the Equal Protection Clause, to guard against unequal application of the laws, without guaranteeing any particular law which enjoys that protection. * * *

The Court cites many cases which it says establish that it is a “serious and difficult constitutional issue” whether the Suspension Clause prohibits the elimination of habeas jurisdiction effected by IIRIRA. Every one of those cases, however, pertains not to the meaning of the Suspension Clause, but to the content of the habeas corpus provision of the United States Code, which is quite a different matter. * * *

* * *

B. Even if one were to assume that the Suspension Clause, despite its text and the Marshall Court’s understanding, guarantees some constitutional minimum of habeas relief, that minimum would assuredly not embrace the rarified right asserted here: the right to judicial compulsion of the exercise of Executive discretion (which may be exercised favorably or unfavorably) regarding a prisoner's release. If one reads the Suspension Clause as a guarantee of habeas relief, the obvious question presented is: What habeas relief? There are only two alternatives, the first of which is too absurd to be seriously entertained. It could be contended that Congress "suspends" the writ whenever it eliminates any prior ground for the writ that it adopted. Thus, if Congress should ever (in the view of this Court) have authorized immediate habeas corpus—without the need to exhaust administrative remedies—for a person arrested as an illegal alien, Congress would never be able (in the light of sad experience) to revise that disposition. The Suspension Clause, in other words, would be a one-way ratchet that enshrines in the Constitution every grant of habeas jurisdiction. This is, as I say, too absurd to be contemplated, and I shall contemplate it no further.

The other alternative is that the Suspension Clause guarantees the common-law right of habeas corpus, as it was understood when the Constitution was ratified. There is no doubt whatever that this did not include the right to obtain discretionary release. The Court notes with apparent credulity respondent's contention "that there is historical evidence of the writ issuing to redress the improper exercise of official discretion". The only Framing-era or earlier cases it alludes to in support of that contention establish no such thing. * * *

* * *

III

Given the insubstantiality of the due process and Article III arguments against barring judicial review of respondent's claim (the Court does not even bother to mention them, and the Court of Appeals barely acknowledges them), I will address them only briefly.

The Due Process Clause does not "requir[e] judicial determination of" respondent's claim. Respondent has no legal entitlement to suspension of deportation, no matter how appealing his case. "The Attorney General's suspension of deportation [is] 'an act of grace' which is accorded pursuant to her 'unfettered discretion,' and [can be likened, as Judge Learned Hand observed] to 'a judge's power to suspend the execution of a sentence, or the President's to pardon a convict.'" * * *

Article III, § 1's investment of the "judicial Power of the United States" in the federal courts does not prevent Congress from committing the adjudication of respondent's legal claim wholly to "non-Article III federal adjudicative bodies". The notion that Article III requires every Executive determination, on a question of law or of fact, to be subject to judicial review has no support in our jurisprudence. * * *

The Court has created a version of IIRIRA that is not only unrecognizable to its framers (or to anyone who can read) but gives the statutory scheme precisely the opposite of its intended effect, affording criminal aliens more opportunities for delay-inducing judicial review than others have, or even than criminal aliens had prior to the enactment of this legislation. Because § 2241's exclusion of judicial review is unmistakably clear, and unquestionably constitutional, both this Court and the courts below were without power to entertain respondent's claims. I would set aside the judgment of the court below and remand with instructions to have the District Court dismiss for want of jurisdiction. I respectfully dissent from the judgment of the Court.

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. As you have seen, the specific statutory language that the Supreme Court interpreted in St. Cyr has now been amended. The REAL ID Act makes clear that statutory habeas corpus is no longer available to review final administrative orders of removal. But the opinion in St. Cyr remains essential reading. First, the case illustrates the time-honored judicial technique of reading deportation (and other) statutes in such a way as to avoid serious constitutional problems. See Zadvydas, discussed on pages 206–23 above. Second, and of more direct relevance here, the amendments made by the REAL ID Act might now require the courts to confront directly the constitutional questions discussed by both the majority and the dissent in St. Cyr. As to that, see Brian G. Slocum, Courts vs. the Political Branches: Immigration "Reform" and the Battle for the Future of Immigration Law, 5 Georgetown J. L. & Public Policy 509 (2007).

2. Consider the statutory strategy first. Why, exactly, are implied repeals of habeas corpus disfavored? Justice Scalia assumes that the underlying premise for this principle of statutory construction is that it helps the court divine the congressional intent. Does the principle do so? And is that its only rationale?

3. At several points in its opinion the Court stresses that the question raised on the merits (whether the amendments to former INA § 212(c) were meant to be retroactive) was one of "pure law." Suppose, instead, that a noncitizen challenges a crime-related removal order on the ground that the BIA had erred in its application of broad statutory language like "exceptional and extremely unusual hardship" or "good moral character" to specific facts. Given the current version of INA § 242, do you think the Supreme Court would permit a federal court to review the BIA decision? First, would it interpret the statute itself as allowing judicial review by way of either (a) a petition for review in the court of appeals; or (b) a habeas application under 28 USC § 2241 in the district court? Second, if the Court were to interpret the statute as barring all judicial review of that claim, would it recognize constitutional habeas under the suspension clause?

4. Now that St. Cyr has been decided and the REAL ID Act has been passed, may a court reverse a crime-related removal order on the ground that the agency findings of fact are not supported by substantial evidence? Suppose, for example, that a noncitizen is ordered removed under INA § 237(a)(2)(A)(i)(I) (crime involving moral turpitude committed within five years after admission). Suppose further that the noncitizen admits the crime but argues there was insufficient evidence that the crime was committed within five years after admission. May a court review that claim? See the Court's brief reference to the Vajtauer case, in original footnote 27 and the accompanying text.⁸⁴

5. Justice Scalia makes the interesting argument that the majority's interpretation leaves those noncitizens who are deportable on criminal grounds better off than other deportable noncitizens. The former, he observes, are freed from the 30-day filing deadline for petitions for review and, moreover, can obtain two layers of review—in district court and, if unsuccessful there, in the court of appeals. Since Congress especially wanted to expedite the removal of noncitizen criminal offenders, and since Congress regarded the crime-related deportability grounds as being among the most serious, treating them more favorably than other deportable noncitizens is anomalous. First, is it clear, as Justice Scalia assumes, that the holding in St. Cyr reaches only those noncitizens who are deportable on criminal grounds? Second, if that is indeed the result, are there any special reasons to make habeas available to noncitizens deportable for crimes but not for other deportable noncitizens? (Consider especially any role that detention should play.) Third, is two-tiered review necessarily an advantage for the noncitizen in terms of either (a) a longer stay in the United States; or (b) a second bite at the apple? Argue both ways.

6. Is Justice Scalia right to say that the majority is taking a “magic words” approach?

7. Apart from the use of habeas corpus to challenge the legality of removal orders, the Supreme Court has also recognized the use of habeas by noncitizens to challenge the legality of their detentions. See the discussions of Zadvydas and Clark v. Martinez in chapter 2 (detention in connection with removal proceedings). As noted earlier, the conference committee report on the REAL ID Act, Rpt. 109-172 (May 3, 2005), at 175, assumes the continued availability of habeas to review the lawfulness of detention, independently of challenges to the associated removal orders. See also Demore v. Hyung Joon Kim, 538 U.S. 510, 123 S.Ct. 1708, 155 L.Ed.2d 724 (2003) (asserting habeas jurisdiction to hear constitutional challenge to mandatory detention provision).

8. The third edition of this book asked what would happen if Congress were to amend each of the relevant provisions by adding language like “Notwithstanding 28 USC § 2241 or any other grant of habeas corpus . . .” By the time of the fourth edition, the REAL ID Act had made that hypothetical a reality, but with the important addition of INA § 242(a)(2)(D), which exempts questions of law from the bar on judicial review. Given that exemption, do you think the present statute satisfies the constitutional concerns discussed in St. Cyr?

84. For some enlightening discussion, see Gerald L. Neuman, The Constitutional Requirement of “Some Evidence,” 25 San Diego L. Rev. 631 (1988) (pre-St. Cyr); Gerald

L. Neuman, On the Adequacy of Direct Review after the REAL ID Act of 2005, 51 New York Law School L. Rev. 133 (2006-07) (post-St. Cyr).

9. Justice Scalia sees no reason that Congress could not constitutionally abolish the writ of habeas corpus entirely. All the Constitution says, he argues, is that the writ cannot be temporarily suspended. Does that sound right? Argue both ways.

10. What lesson do you derive from the Henry Hart dialogue that preceded this case? How do you think Justice Scalia would respond? Can Hart's and Scalia's constitutional positions be reconciled?⁸⁵

11. Can St. Cyr coexist peacefully with the plenary power doctrine? The cases you read in chapter 2 suggest that in the field of immigration Congress has especially wide power (literally unreviewable power, according to some of the cases) to do things that would be constitutionally unacceptable in other spheres. Yet the Court in St. Cyr finds at least a serious question whether Congress can constitutionally bar judicial review of deportation orders. Where, then, does this case leave the plenary power doctrine?

c. OTHER STRATEGIES

Beyond petitions for review and applications for habeas corpus, are there other sources of jurisdiction, forms of action, or remedies for noncitizens who wish to gain access to court to challenge administrative decisions that relate to removal?

i. General Federal Question Jurisdiction

28 USC § 1331 grants the district courts subject matter jurisdiction over cases that present issues of federal law. In INA § 279, Congress had once granted a more specific jurisdiction over causes arising under Title II of the INA (which covers almost everything related to removal). IIRIRA limited section 279 to actions brought by the government. Whether that amendment had any effect on general federal question jurisdiction was not clear. See page 499 above. The sweeping language now added by the REAL ID Act to each of the provisions of INA § 242(a)(2) most likely ends that debate; it seems clear that Congress meant to eliminate all statutory review (and even nonstatutory review, whatever that phrase is meant to encompass) other than via petitions for review.

As you have seen, however, in addition to amending INA § 279, Congress added several other court-stripping provisions. Even before the REAL ID Act, at least one court held that section 242(a)(2)(C) (which eliminates "jurisdiction to review" most crime-related removal orders) forecloses not only petitions for review but also general federal question jurisdiction. Miranda v. Reno, 238 F.3d 1156 (9th Cir. 2001).

85. For an excellent historical account of habeas corpus as it relates to the issues in St. Cyr, see James Oldham & Michael J.

Wishnie, The Historical Scope of Habeas Corpus and INS v. St. Cyr, 16 Georgetown Immigration L.J. 485 (2002).

ii. Injunctions and Class Actions

In most instances the petition for review works well as a device for judicial review of final removal orders. For that reason, the exclusivity of section 242 is innocuous in the ordinary case. Sometimes, however, there are tactical or logistical advantages to using an alternative vehicle. Suppose, for example, a large class of noncitizens objects to a widespread DHS practice. Is it necessary for each affected individual to submit to that practice, and, if unsuccessful, wait for removal proceedings and then challenge the underlying procedures by filing in the court of appeals a petition for review of the resulting removal order? Or may plaintiffs band together and bring a class action seeking injunctive or declaratory relief? See generally Leti Volpp, Court-Stripping and Class-Wide Relief: A Response to Judicial Review in Immigration Cases after AADC, 14 Georgetown Immigration L.J. 463 (2000).

The Supreme Court has not addressed directly whether the exclusivity of the petition for review would bar that procedure. In a landmark 1991 decision, however, the Court interpreted an analogous exclusivity provision concerned with the legalization of agricultural workers. McNary v. Haitian Refugee Center, 498 U.S. 479, 111 S.Ct. 888, 112 L.Ed.2d 1005 (1991). By a 7-2 vote, the Supreme Court held that the district court had jurisdiction to hear the case as a class action. The Court emphasized that postponing adjudication until individual deportation orders were entered and reviewed "would foster the very delay and procedural redundancy that Congress sought to eliminate in passing [the petition for review provision]." 498 U.S. at 490, 111 S.Ct. at 895, 112 L.Ed.2d at 1016 (quoting court of appeals). Importantly, the majority opinion also observed that relegating the plaintiffs to petitions for review would be functionally equivalent to withholding judicial review entirely, since a person would have to submit voluntarily to removal proceedings in order to receive review of the legalization denial. Professor Daniel Kanstroom offered a powerful analogy:

You can play outside today if you do all your chores. Your older brother will decide if you've done them properly. If you think your brother has decided unfairly, and you want me to decide, you must confess something serious that you did wrong that I do not know about. If I decide your brother was wrong, I will let you play outside and forgive the other thing. But if I decide your brother was right, you cannot play outside and you will be punished further for the other thing.

There is something fundamentally troubling about conditioning justice upon risk.

Daniel Kanstroom, Judicial Review of Amnesty Denials: Must Aliens Bet Their Lives to Get into Court?, 25 Harvard Civil Rights—Civil Liberties L.Rev. 53, 97 (1990).

Since McNary v. Haitian Refugee Center, there have been further Supreme Court and lower court opinions refining the scope of the pattern and practice exception to the exclusivity of petitions for review. See generally Robert Pauw, Judicial Review of "Pattern and Practice" Cases: What to Do When the INS Acts Unlawfully, 70 Washington L.Rev. 779 (1995); 72 IR 1453 (Oct. 23, 1995). Nothing in the REAL ID Act appears to amend the law on "pattern and practice" litigation.

While declaratory and injunctive relief are still available remedies, and class actions remain viable in immigration, IIRIRA narrowed their use considerably, at least in the context of arriving noncitizens. INA § 235(b) governs the inspection, examination, and removal of arriving noncitizens and of those who are present without admission. INA § 242(e)(3) prohibits actions to challenge the legality (including the constitutionality) of INA section 235(b) or of any regulations or other written policies issued to implement section 235(b), more than 60 days after the challenged section is implemented. During the 60-day period in which such challenges could be brought, only the District Court for the District of Columbia had jurisdiction, id., and no such challenge could be brought by class action. INA § 242(e)(1)(B).

Under INA § 242(f)(1), no court (other than the Supreme Court) may enjoin the operation of any provision of chapter 4 of title II (which deals generally with removal), except with respect to an individual noncitizen (i.e., not a class). In such a case, the court may not enjoin removal unless the person proves by clear and convincing evidence that the challenged order is "prohibited as a matter of law."⁸⁶

An emerging issue is the availability of mandamus actions to compel USCIS to process adjustment of status applications after long delays. The courts are divided, a majority finding jurisdiction. For a summary of the cases, see H. Raymond Fasano & Donald F. Madeo, Why Are You Here? Jurisdiction in District Court for Mandamus Actions over Delayed Adjudications, 85 IR 1181 (Apr. 14, 2008).

iii. Collateral Attack in Criminal Proceedings

INA § 276 makes it a felony for any noncitizen who has previously been excluded, deported, or removed, to enter, attempt to enter, or be found in, the United States without permission from the Attorney General. In the past, individuals charged under that provision frequently defended by asserting defects in their prior removal orders. Faced with a conflict among the circuits, the Supreme Court in United States v. Mendoza-Lopez, 481 U.S. 828, 107 S.Ct. 2148, 95 L.Ed.2d 772 (1987), held that the validity of the underlying removal order may not be collaterally attacked in subsequent criminal proceedings unless the defendant had not earlier been given a meaningful opportunity to seek direct judicial review of the deportation order. On the facts of Mendoza-Lopez, the Court concluded that the lack of

86. INA § 242(f)(2). For a saving construction of section 242(f)(1), see Jill E. Family, Another Limit on Federal Court Jurisdiction? Immigrant Access to Class-Wide Injunctive Relief, 53 Cleveland State L. Rev. 11 (2005-06). But see Jill E. Family, Threats to the Future of the Immigration Class Action, 27 Washington Univ. J. L. & Policy 71 (2008) (describing the endangered future of the class action as a litigative strategy in immigration law).

advice as to the possibility of judicial review had effectively deprived the defendants of such an opportunity. The Court therefore permitted collateral attack.

AEDPA codified (and perhaps toughened) the holding of Mendoza-Lopez. It added new language to the end of INA § 276 barring collateral attack unless the person had exhausted all administrative remedies with respect to the underlying removal order, he or she had been improperly deprived of the opportunity for judicial review, and the removal order had been “fundamentally unfair.” IIRIRA § 302(a) also prohibited collateral attacks on orders of “expedited removal.”

iv. Claims of United States Nationality

In Ng Fung Ho v. White, 259 U.S. 276, 42 S.Ct. 492, 66 L.Ed. 938 (1922), the Supreme Court held (at least) that a person who makes a nonfrivolous claim of United States citizenship has a due process right not to be deported without a judicial trial on the issue of citizenship. INA § 242(b)(5), which you can consult for further detail, codifies that principle with some modifications.

d. CONSOLIDATING REVIEWABLE CLAIMS

DHS, the immigration judges, and the BIA all issue a variety of orders related in one way or another to removal. You have seen many of them—decisions on the various forms of discretionary relief; destination of removal; motions to reopen or reconsider; requests by nonimmigrants for extensions of stay, change of status, permission to work, or permission to transfer schools; etc. A question that occasionally arises is which of these orders the courts of appeals have exclusive jurisdiction to review under INA § 242.

In a series of cases decided before 1996, the Supreme Court and the lower courts developed some general criteria for answering that question.⁸⁷ In those judicial decisions, however, the courts were interpreting the then applicable statutory language. IIRIRA §§ 306(a)(2) and 306(b) replaced the prior judicial review provision with INA § 242, the provision that you have been studying here. How much of the pre-IIRIRA case law can still be salvaged is not clear.

Since IIRIRA, the key provision on this subject is INA § 242(b)(9), which provides: “Judicial review of all questions of law and fact . . . arising from any action taken or proceeding brought to remove an alien from the United States under this title shall be available only in judicial review of a final order under this section” [emphasis added]. This provision has two potential consequences. First, it appears to define certain decisions, other than the removal order itself, that can be reviewed only by way of petition for review. Second, as to those decisions, all must be heard together, not brought piecemeal. Congress's intention was to require consolidation of various removal-related decisions in the same forum, rather than have them strung out one at a time in various fora.

⁸⁷. See especially INS v. Chadha, 462 U.S. 919, 103 S.Ct. 2764, 77 L.Ed.2d 317 (1983); Cheng Fan Kwok v. INS, 392 U.S. 206, 88 S.Ct. 1970, 20 L.Ed.2d 1037 (1968) (and cases cited therein).

But precisely which ancillary orders fall within the consolidation mandate? The answer is far from clear, mainly because the meaning of "arising from" is unclear. Is Congress requiring consolidation of all decisions that are made during, and incident to, removal proceedings—for example, decisions as to destination of removal, or decisions denying discretionary relief from removal (to the extent reviewable)? Or is Congress perhaps referring to all decisions upon which removal is contingent—for example a USCIS decision to deny an extension of stay that would have avoided deportability in the first place?

INA § 242(b)(6) is more specific. It requires that any judicial review of an order denying a motion to reopen or reconsider a removal order be consolidated with any judicial review of the original removal order.

e. THE THEORY AND THE CONSEQUENCES OF JUDICIAL REVIEW

Two highly useful empirical studies have examined the actual impact of judicial review of administrative agency decisions. The first one analyzed judicial decisions in a wide range of administrative contexts (including immigration). Peter H. Schuck & E. Donald Elliott, Studying Administrative Law: A Methodology for, and Report on, New Empirical Research, 42 Administrative L.Rev. 519 (1990). The other focused specifically on immigration. See Peter H. Schuck & Theodore H. Wang, Continuity and Change: Patterns of Immigration Litigation in the Courts, 1979-1990, 45 Stanford L.Rev. 115 (1992). One portion of the latter article studied the actual outcomes of judicial review of immigration-related agency decisions (mostly deportation cases). The study showed differences in outcomes by year, by court, and by type of substantive claim.

QUESTION

What are the benefits of judicial review of immigration decisions? What are the costs? For more detail, see Stephen H. Legomsky, Political Asylum and the Theory of Judicial Review, 73 Minnesota L.Rev. 1205, 1209-16 (1989).

C. A SIMULATED REMOVAL HEARING⁸⁸

You are about to begin a mock removal hearing. The subject of the hearing is a fictional character named Arnaud Godasse, a Swiss citizen. Your instructor will assign one or more students to be Godasse's counsel and one or more students to be ICE trial attorneys. The exercise will involve other players as well, including two additional witnesses, the immigration judge, and possibly an interpreter.

⁸⁸. Thanks are due to Locky Nimick for his exceptional assistance with this exercise.

You will need to glean the relevant facts from a few documents that follow this introduction. The next few paragraphs describe those documents. To familiarize yourself with the facts, please proceed in the following order: Read the paragraphs that describe Document A, then Document A itself, then the paragraph that describes Document B, then Document B itself, etc. After you have finished the last document, read the "Ground Rules and Suggestions" that follow it.

The first document in the file, Document A, is Godasse's written signed statement taken by the ICE arresting officer. Normally the officer fills out a standardized form entitled "Record of Deportable/Inadmissible Alien," based on his or her own observations and the noncitizen's statements. In the present case, because Godasse provided so much detail, the officer typed up a separate sheet of paper embodying Godasse's story. Godasse voluntarily signed the statement, and the officer attached it to the standardized form. For this exercise you will not need a copy of the standardized form; the attached signed statement by Godasse is sufficient. Assume that all of Godasse's statements were uncoerced.

Godasse's statement contains some information about the terms of his admission to the United States. It will be easier to understand his story if you first review the following information about student visas. This passage appeared earlier on page 397 above:

Foreign students are admitted for "duration of status." A "designated school official" estimates a reasonable "completion date" for the particular program. The student may remain in the United States until that date, assuming he or she remains a full-time student in good standing. If unable to complete his or her studies by this time, the student applies to the university (not to USCIS) for an extension. It will be granted only upon a showing of "compelling academic or medical reasons, such as changes of major or research topics, unexpected research problems, or documented illnesses." The university must then inform USCIS of the extension. 8 CFR § 214.2(f)(7)(iii) (2008). For an extension of an F-1 stay, one must "agree to depart the United States at the expiration of his or her authorized period of . . . extension . . ." 8 CFR § 214.1(a)(3)(ii) (2008).

Now you can read Document A.

Document B is the "Notice to Appear." ICE serves this document on the noncitizen and files a copy with the immigration court. Service of the Notice to Appear formally initiates the removal proceeding. The Notice to Appear contains the allegations that establish deportability. In this case Godasse will contest deportability and, in the alternative, apply for discretionary relief.

Document C is a copy of Godasse's completed application for his student visa. This was the application that he originally submitted to the visa section of the United States embassy in Berne, Switzerland. (The form, OF-156, is the one that was in use in 1996, when Godasse applied. In September 2001 the State Department substituted a slightly different form, DS-156.)

Documents D and E together constitute Godasse's application for cancellation of removal, part B, under INA § 240A(b). Document D is the required standardized form for requesting cancellation; it refers to certain supporting documents that for purposes of this exercise have been omitted. Document E, which Godasse will attach to the application form, is an affidavit that he executed for the purpose of establishing the "exceptional and extremely unusual hardship" required for cancellation. This affidavit is signed by Godasse, but in real life his lawyer would have drafted it before the removal hearing.

Here, then, are Documents A through E:

DOCUMENT A STATEMENT OF ARNAUD GODASSE
ATTACHMENT TO RECORD OF DEPORTABLE/INADMISSIBLE
ALIEN

My name is Arnaud Marie Godasse. I am a citizen of Switzerland, born August 6, 1970 in Geneva. I am a doctoral candidate at the University of Texas. My address is 1402 Paseo Drive, Austin, Texas 78705.

I entered the United States on August 4, 2000 with an F-1 student visa. I didn't apply for an immigrant visa when I first came here from Switzerland, because urgent personal problems required me to leave Switzerland immediately and I was aware that I would have had to wait much longer for an immigrant visa than for an F-1 visa. I had also heard that I could keep renewing my F-1 visa for as long as I was a full-time student. Also, I had a bachelor's degree from the University of Geneva in history and was interested in going back to university to study American literature.

I first came here to do a bachelor's degree in American history at the University of Texas. The former INS told me I could remain here until I was finished. I received my degree on May 30, 2004 and later that month was accepted into the University's Ph.D program. The people at the university estimated that it would take me 4 more years to complete the Ph.D, so they extended my F-1 status until May 30, 2008.

I finished the required coursework in three years, but my dissertation was taking me a little longer than expected, mostly because I was hitting unexpected conceptual problems and needed to modify my research topic. So on May 15, 2008, I asked the school officials for another two years, which they granted. That extended my authorized stay to May 30, 2010.

By early 2010, I had made a lot of progress on my dissertation, but it was becoming clear that I would never be able to finish by May 30. So on May 15, 2010, I applied to the school for one more two-year extension, which they granted. That made my expected completion date May 30, 2012.

A few weeks before I requested that last extension, a cultural organization called the Alliance Francaise approached me and said they might be interested in hiring me for a permanent position as a teacher of French language and culture. French is my native language. I said I might consider it but made no commitments. On May 19, 2010, Alliance Francaise applied for labor certification on my behalf. Their application apparently is still pending.

This evening I was celebrating my 40th birthday at Jason's Bar and Grill with friends. After a few drinks, while making a toast, I got a little careless with my words. I said, "I've managed to keep my F-1 alive for 10 years so far, and I'll keep extending it until they throw me out! Hooray for the USA! Here's to the geniuses at ICE!" Of course I hadn't realized there was an ICE agent at the next table taking a coffee break.

The ICE agent started questioning me. I explained that I was just being boisterous and having some fun on my birthday. All I had meant was that I was happy to be in the U.S. because it's a great country and because my son and I would encounter terrible personal problems if we had to go back to Switzerland. The ICE agent apparently thought I was saying that my plan was to stay forever and that I was mocking ICE by sarcastically calling them geniuses. But I was completely serious about that. There are some highly intelligent people at ICE. That was all I meant by that comment.

/s/ Arnaud Godasse

August 6, 2010

DOCUMENT B

Form I-862 Notice to appear

U.S. Department of Homeland Security

Notice to Appear

In removal proceedings under section 240 of the Immigration and Nationality Act

File No. A45 365 902

In the Matter of:

Respondent: Arnaud Marie Godasse

currently residing at:

1402 Paseo Drive, Austin, TX 78705(512) 475-2663

(Number, street, city, state and ZIP code)

(Area code and phone number)

1. You are an arriving alien.
 2. You are an alien present in the United States who has not been admitted or paroled.
 3. You have been admitted to the United States, but are removable for the reasons stated below.

The Department of Homeland Security alleges that you:

1. Are not a citizen or national of the United States.
2. Are a native of Switzerland and a citizen of Switzerland.
3. Entered the United States at Dallas, Texas on or about August 4, 2000.
4. On August 2, 2000, obtained an F-1 student visa by fraudulently concealing your intent to remain in the U.S. permanently.
5. On August 4, 2000, gained admission to the U.S. by fraudulently concealing your intent to remain in the U.S. permanently.
6. On May 21, 2010, obtained an extension of stay as an F-1 student.
7. Were ineligible for said extension because, at the time you received it, you intended to remain in the U.S. permanently.
8. Your last valid extension of stay expired May 30, 2010.

On the basis of the foregoing, it is charged that you are subject to removal from the United States pursuant to the following provision(s) of law:

Section 237(a)(1)(A) of the Immigration and Nationality Act (the Act) in that, at the time of your entry on or about August 4, 2000, you were inadmissible under section 212(a)(6)(C)(i) of the Act as an alien who, by fraudulently concealing your intent, had procured a visa, and as an alien who, by fraudulently concealing your intent, procured admission into the United States;

Section 237(a)(1)(B) of the Act, in that your last valid extension of stay expired May 30, 2010, and you are therefore in the United States in violation of law.

- This notice is being issued after an asylum officer has found that the respondent has demonstrated a credible fear of persecution or torture.
 Section 235(b)(1) order was vacated pursuant to 8 CFR 208.34(d)(2) 8 CFR 208.36(b)(3)(iv)

YOU ARE ORDERED to appear before an immigration judge of the United States Department of Justice at:

2800 South I-35, Room 209, Austin, Texas

(Complete Address of Immigration Court, Including Room Number, if any)

On September 15, 2010 at 10:00 a.m. to show why you should not be removed from the United States based on the charge(s) set forth above,/s/Roger R. Sax, Officer in Charge

(Signature and Title of Issuing Officer)

Date: August 7, 2010Austin, Texas

(City and State)

Form I-862 (Rev. 08-01-07)

DOCUMENT C

NONIMMIGRANT VISA APPLICATION

PLEASE TYPE OR PRINT YOUR ANSWERS IN THE SPACE PROVIDED BELOW EACH ITEM

1. SURNAMES OR FAMILY NAMES (Exactly as in Passport) GODASSE			DO NOT WRITE IN THIS SPACE B-1/8-2 MAX B-1 MAX 8-2 MAX OTHER _____ F-1 _____ MAX Visa Classification MULT OR _____ Number Applications
2. FIRST NAME AND MIDDLE NAME (Exactly as in Passport) ARNAUD MARIE
3. OTHER NAMES (Maiden, Religious, Professional, Aliases)			MONTHS _____ Validity
4. DATE OF BIRTH (mm-dd-yy) August 6, 1970		8. PASSPORT NUMBER F2359H	I.O. CHECKED ON _____ BY _____
5. PLACE OF BIRTH City, Province Geneva	Country Switzerland	DATE PASSPORT ISSUED (mm-dd-yy) March 11, 1998	ISSUED/REFUSED ISSUED ON 8-2-00 BY RHL
6. NATIONALITY Switzerland	7. SEX <input checked="" type="checkbox"/> Male <input type="checkbox"/> Female	DATE PASSPORT EXPIRES (mm-dd-yy) March 11, 2013	UNDER SEC. 214(b) 221(g) OTHER: _____ DNA
9. HOME ADDRESS (Include apartment no., street, city, province, and postal code) 31 Route des Morillons CH-1211 Geneva, Switzerland			REFUSAL REVIEWED BY _____
10. NAME AND STREET ADDRESS OF PRESENT EMPLOYER OR SCHOOL (Postal box number unacceptable) Self employed			19. PRESENT OCCUPATION (If retired, state past occupation) Author
11. HOME TELEPHONE NO. 41-22-367-9111	12. BUSINESS TELEPHONE NO. Same		20. WHO WILL FURNISH FINANCIAL SUPPORT, INCLUDING TICKETS? Myself
13. MARITAL STATUS <input type="checkbox"/> Married <input checked="" type="checkbox"/> Single <input type="checkbox"/> Divorced <input type="checkbox"/> Separated If married, give name and nationality of spouse			21. AT WHAT ADDRESS WILL YOU STAY IN THE U.S.A? Austin, TX
14. NAMES AND RELATIONSHIPS OF PERSONS TRAVELING WITH YOU (NOTE: A separate application must be made for a visa for each traveler, regardless of age.) None			22. WHAT IS THE PURPOSE OF YOUR TRIP? To study
15. HAVE YOU EVER APPLIED FOR A U.S. NONIMMIGRANT VISA? <input checked="" type="checkbox"/> NO <input type="checkbox"/> YES HAVE YOU EVER APPLIED FOR A U.S. IMMIGRANT VISA? <input type="checkbox"/> NO <input type="checkbox"/> YES WHERE? _____ WHEN? _____ VISA WAS ISSUED <input type="checkbox"/> VISA WAS REFUSED <input type="checkbox"/>			23. WHEN DO YOU INTEND TO ARRIVE IN THE U.S. ? 8.4.00
16. HAS YOUR U.S. VISA EVER BEEN CANCELED? <input type="checkbox"/> NO <input type="checkbox"/> YES WHERE? _____ WHEN? _____ BY WHOM? _____			24. HOW LONG DO YOU PLAN TO STAY IN THE U.S.A. ? 4 Years
17. Bearers of visitor visas may generally not work or study in the U.S. DO YOU INTEND TO WORK IN THE U.S.? <input type="checkbox"/> NO <input type="checkbox"/> YES If YES, explain			25. HAVE YOU EVER BEEN IN THE U.S.A. ? <input type="checkbox"/> NO <input type="checkbox"/> YES WHEN? _____ FOR HOW LONG? _____
18. DO YOU INTEND TO STUDY IN THE U.S.? <input type="checkbox"/> NO <input checked="" type="checkbox"/> YES If YES, write name and address of school as it appears on Form I-20. University of Texas, Austin			COMPLETE ALL QUESTIONS ON REVERSE OF FORM

26. HAVE YOU OR ANYONE ACTING FOR YOU EVER INDICATED TO A U.S. CONSULAR OR IMMIGRATION EMPLOYEE A DESIRE TO IMMIGRATE TO THE U.S. OR HAVE YOU EVER ENTERED A U.S. VISA LOTTERY?

YES NO YES NO

HAS ANYONE EVER FILED AN IMMIGRANT VISA PETITION ON YOUR BEHALF? YES NO YES NO

HAS A LABOR CERTIFICATION FOR EMPLOYMENT IN THE U.S. EVER BEEN REQUESTED BY YOU OR ON YOUR BEHALF? YES NO YES NO

27. ARE ANY OF THE FOLLOWING IN THE U.S., RESIDE IN THE U.S. OR HAVE U.S. LEGAL PERMANENT RESIDENCE? (Circle YES or NO and indicate that person's status in the U.S., i.e., studying, working, permanent resident, U.S. citizen, etc.)

YES NO Husband/ Wife NO YES NO Finances/ Finances NO YES NO Brother/ Sister NO YES NO Father/ Mother NO YES NO Son/ Daughter NO

28. WHERE HAVE YOU LIVED FOR THE PAST FIVE YEARS? DO NOT INCLUDE PLACES YOU HAVE VISITED FOR PERIODS OF SIX MONTHS OR LESS. Country: Switzerland City: Geneva Approximate Dates: 5-5-89 to present

29. IMPORTANT: ALL APPLICANTS MUST READ AND CHECK THE APPROPRIATE BOX FOR EACH ITEM. A visa may not be issued to persons who are within specific categories defined by law as inadmissible to the United States (except when a waiver is obtained in advance). Are any of the following applicable to you?

- Have you ever been afflicted with a communicable disease of public health significance, a dangerous physical or mental disorder, or been a drug abuser or addict? (212)(a)(1) YES NO YES NO
Have you ever been arrested or convicted for any offense or crime, even though subject of a pardon, amnesty or other similar legal action? Have you ever unlawfully distributed or sold a controlled substance (drug), or been a prostitute or procurer for prostitution? (212)(a)(2) YES NO YES NO
Do you seek to enter the United States to engage in export control violations, subversive or terrorist activities, or any other unlawful purpose? Are you a member or representative of a terrorist organization as currently designated by the U.S. Secretary of State? Have you ever participated in persecutions directed by the Nazi government of Germany, or have you ever participated in genocide? (212)(a)(3) YES NO YES NO
Have you ever been refused admission to the U.S., or the subject of a deportation hearing, or sought to obtain or assist others to obtain a visa, entry into the U.S., or sought to obtain a visa or any U.S. immigration benefit by fraud or willful misrepresentation? Have you attended a U.S. public elementary school on student (F) status, or a public secondary school without reimbursing the school after November 30, 1986? (212)(a)(4) YES NO YES NO
Have you ever departed or remained outside the United States to avoid military service? (212)(a)(5) YES NO YES NO
Have you ever violated the terms of a U.S. visa, or been unlawfully present in, or departed from, the United States? (212)(a)(9) YES NO YES NO
Have you ever withheld custody of a U.S. citizen child outside the United States from a person granted legal custody by a U.S. court, voted in the United States in violation of any law or regulation, or renounced U.S. citizenship for the purpose of avoiding taxation? (212)(a)(10) YES NO YES NO

A YES answer does not automatically signify inadmissibility for a visa, but if you answered YES to any of the above, or if you have any questions in this regard, a personal appearance at this office is recommended. If an appearance is not possible at this time, attach a statement of facts in your case to this application.

30. I certify that I have read and understood all the questions set forth in this application and the answers I have furnished on this form are true and correct to the best of my knowledge and belief. I understand that any false or misleading statements may result in the permanent refusal of a visa or denial of entry into the United States. I understand that possession of a visa does not entitle the bearer to enter the United States of America upon arrival at port of entry if he or she is found inadmissible.

DATE OF APPLICATION (mm-dd-yy) August 1, 2000

APPLICANT'S SIGNATURE /s/ Arnaud Marie Godasse

If this application has been prepared by a travel agency or another person on your behalf, the agent should indicate name and address of agency or person with appropriate signature of individual preparing form.

SIGNATURE OF PERSON PREPARING FORM (if other than applicant)

DO NOT WRITE IN THIS SPACE

DOCUMENT D

U.S. Department of Justice
Executive Office for Immigration Review

OMB #1125-0001
Application for Cancellation of Removal and Adjustment of Status for Certain Nonpermanent Residents

PLEASE READ ADVICE AND INSTRUCTIONS
BEFORE FILLING IN FORM

Fee Stamp (Official Use Only)

PLEASE TYPE OR PRINT

PART 1 INFORMATION ABOUT YOURSELF

1) My present true name is: (Last, First, Middle) Godasse, Arnaud Marie		2) Alien Registration (or "A") Number(s): A45 365 902
3) My name given at birth was: (Last, First, Middle) Godasse, Arnaud Marie		4) Birth Place: (City and Country) Geneva, Switzerland
5) Date of Birth: (Month, Day, Year) August 6, 1970	6) Gender: <input checked="" type="checkbox"/> Male <input type="checkbox"/> Female	7) Height: 5' 10"	8) Hair Color: Brown
10) Current Nationality & Citizenship: Switzerland		11) Social Security Number:	9) Eye Color: Green
14) I currently reside at: Apt. number and/or in care of _____ Number and Street: 1402 Paseo Drive City or Town: Austin State: Texas ZIP Code: 78705		12) Home Phone Number: (512) 475-2663
		13) Work Phone Number: () None
		15) I have been known by these additional name(s): None
16) I have resided in the following locations in the United States: (List PRESENT ADDRESS FIRST, and work back in time for at least 10 years).
Street and Number - Apt. or Room # - City or Town - State - ZIP Code	Resided From: (Month, Day, Year)	Resided To: (Month, Day, Year)
1402 Paseo Drive Austin Texas 78705	Aug. 4, 2000	Present

PART 2 - INFORMATION ABOUT THIS APPLICATION

17) I, the undersigned, hereby request that my removal be cancelled under the provisions of section 240A(b) of the Immigration and Nationality Act (INA). I believe that I am eligible for cancellation of removal because: (check all that apply)

My removal would result in exceptional and extremely unusual hardship to my: (Place a USC in the space if the family member is a citizen of the United States, an L if the family member is a lawful permanent resident of the United States, an X if the family member is neither and leave BLANK if not applicable.)

_____ Husband _____ Wife _____ Father _____ Mother USC Child or Children

With the exception of absences described in question #23, I have resided in the United States since:
(Month, Day, Year) August 4, 2000

I, or my child, have been battered or subjected to extreme cruelty by a United States citizen or lawful permanent resident spouse or parent.

With the exception of absences described in question #23, I have resided in the United States since:
(Month, Day, Year) _____

40) My assets (and if married, my spouse's assets) in the United States and other countries, not including clothing and household necessities, are:

Self		Jointly Owned with Spouse
Cash, Stocks, and Bonds	$ 43,000	Cash, Stocks, and Bonds	$
Real Estate	$	Real Estate	$
Auto (dollar value minus amount owed)	$	Auto (dollar value minus amount owed)	$
Other (describe on line below)	$	Other (describe on line below)	$
TOTAL	$ 43,000	TOTAL	$

41) I have have not received public or private relief or assistance (e.g., Welfare, Unemployment Benefits, Medicaid, TANF, AFDC, etc.). If you have, please give full details including the type of relief or assistance received, date for which relief or assistance was received, place, and total amount received during this time: _____

42) Please list each of the years in which you have filed an income tax return with the Internal Revenue Service: _____

PART 6 - INFORMATION ABOUT YOUR FAMILY

43) I have 1 (Number of) children. Please list information for each child below, include assets and earnings information for children over the age of sixteen who have separate incomes:

Name of Child: (Last, First, Middle) Child's Alien Registration Number:	Citizen of What Country: Birth Date: (Month, Day, Year)	Now Residing At: (City and Country) Birth Place: (City and Country)	Immigration Status of Child
Paul Geelasse A#:	USA October 12, 2008	Austin, Texas Austin, Texas	USC
Estimated Total of Assets: $ _____	Estimated Average Weekly Earnings: $ _____
A#:
Estimated Total of Assets: $ _____	Estimated Average Weekly Earnings: $ _____
A#:
Estimated Total of Assets: $ _____	Estimated Average Weekly Earnings: $ _____

44) If your application is denied, would your spouse and all of your children accompany you to your:

Country of Birth -	<input checked="" type="checkbox"/> Yes <input type="checkbox"/> No	If you answered "NO" to any of the responses, please explain: _____ _____ _____
Country of Nationality -	<input checked="" type="checkbox"/> Yes <input type="checkbox"/> No
Country of Last Residence -	<input checked="" type="checkbox"/> Yes <input type="checkbox"/> No

45) Members of my family, including my spouse and/or child(ren) - have - have not received public or private relief or assistance (e.g., Welfare, Unemployment Benefits, Medicaid, TANF, AFDC, etc.). If any member of your immediate family has received such relief or assistance, please give full details including identity of person(s) receiving relief or assistance, dates for which relief or assistance was received, place, and amount received during this time: _____

60) Please list your present or past membership in or affiliation with every political organization, association, fund, foundation, party, club, society, or similar group in the United States or any other place since your 16th birthday. Include any foreign military service in this part. If none, write "NONE." Include the name of the organization, location, nature of the organization, and the dates of membership.

Name of Organization	Location of Organization	Nature of Organization	Member From: (Month, Day, Year)	Member to: (Month, Day, Year)
Alliance Francaise	Austin, Texas	Cultural organization	September 2002	Present

61) Have you ever:

- Yes No been ordered deported, excluded, or removed?
- Yes No oversaw a grant of voluntary departure from an Immigration Judge or the Department of Homeland Security (DHS), formerly the Immigration and Naturalization Service (INS)?
- Yes No failed to appear for removal or deportation?

62) Have you ever been:

- Yes No a habitual drunkard?
- Yes No one whose income is derived principally from illegal gambling?
- Yes No one who has given false testimony for the purpose of obtaining immigration benefits?
- Yes No one who has engaged in prostitution or unlawful commercialized vice?
- Yes No involved in a serious criminal offense and asserted immunity from prosecution?
- Yes No a polygamist?
- Yes No one who aided and/or abetted another to enter the United States illegally?
- Yes No a trafficker of a controlled substance, or a knowing assister, abettor, conspirator, or colluder with others in any such controlled substance offense (not including a single offense of simple possession of 30 grams or less of marijuana)?
- Yes No inadmissible or deportable on security-related grounds under section 212(a)(3) or 237(a)(4) of the INA?
- Yes No one who has ordered, incited, assisted, or otherwise participated in the persecution of an individual on account of his or her race, religion, nationality, membership in a particular social group, or political opinion?
- Yes No a person previously granted relief under sections 212(c) or 244(a) of the INA or whose removal has previously been cancelled under section 240A of the INA?

63) The following certificates or other supporting documents are attached hereto as part of this application: (Refer to the Instructions for documents which should be attached).

Re physical presence:	_____
Letter from landlord	_____
Re physical presence and moral character:	_____
Letter from University of Texas	_____
Re moral character	_____
Police records	_____
Affidavits from 2 witnesses	_____
Re hardship:	_____
My own affidavit	_____
_____	_____
_____	_____
_____	_____
_____	_____

APPLICATION NOT TO BE SIGNED BELOW UNTIL APPLICANT APPEARS BEFORE AN IMMIGRATION JUDGE

I swear or affirm that I know the contents of this application that I am signing, including the attached document and supplements, and they are all true to the best of my knowledge, taking into account the correction(s) numbered ___ to ___, if any, that were made by me or at my request.

(Signature of applicant or parent or guardian)

Subscribed and sworn to before me by the above-named applicant at _____

Immigration Judge

Date: (Month, Day Year)

CERTIFICATE OF SERVICE

I hereby certify that a copy of the foregoing was: - delivered in person, - mailed first class, postage prepaid on

_____ (Month, Day, Year) to _____ (INS District Counsel and Address)

Signature of Applicant (or attorney or representative)

DOCUMENT E

In re: ARNAUD MARIE GODASSE

File No.: A45 365 902

AFFIDAVIT

COMES NOW Arnaud Marie Godasse, who deposes and says:

I am a national and citizen of Switzerland. I have been in the United States since August 4, 2000. In February 2000, I began dating a woman named Monique DesChamps, who lives in Geneva and is also a Swiss citizen. Some time in April 2000, she became pregnant. I do not know the identity of the father, but I know it was not I, because Monique and I have never had sexual intercourse.

Though she never accused me or attempted to force me to acknowledge the child, I became the scapegoat in everyone else's eyes. A rumor that I was responsible for Monique's condition reached her father in July 2000. He "went ballistic", as you Americans say, and looked for me at my apartment. I strenuously maintained my innocence, but he refused to listen and insisted that I marry her. When I refused, he flew into a rage and tried to kill me. I bear a scar on my right arm that required 25 stitches as a result of his assault, and I narrowly escaped with my life. Shortly after this incident, Monique telephoned to warn me that her father had enlisted several of his friends to help him murder me.

About three years ago, I started dating a wonderful American woman and fell in love. We conceived a child together, and he was born here in Austin in October 2008. The mother died during childbirth. We had planned to get married but never did. My son's name is Paul. I have raised him myself.

If I were sent back to Switzerland, my life would be in jeopardy, my peace of mind would be shattered, and so would Paul's. We could not possibly be safe in Geneva and so would be forced to hide in a strange city, barred from contact with any of my friends for fear of news of my return spreading. Even then, we would be constantly fearful of being recognized. Switzerland is a small country, so even outside Geneva I would never be safe. Nor would I have any automatic right to resettle in any of the EU member states, because Switzerland is not a member of the EU. If I were killed or severely injured, there would be no one to take care of Paul.

Signed this 10th day of October, 2010.

/s/ Arnaud Marie Godasse

GROUND RULES AND SUGGESTIONS

Before attacking this exercise, review section A.3 above; it describes the sequence of events at a removal hearing, including the order in which the two sides present their cases. Remember that the formal rules of evidence do not apply in removal proceedings. When offering evidence, be guided by common sense: Make sure the documents you offer and the questions you ask of the witnesses are relevant to facts that the substantive law makes material. Keep your questions clear, simple, and precise. Do not lead the witnesses unnecessarily. Remain civil, even if you find a witness evasive, opposing counsel unreasonable, or an adverse ruling of the immigration judge disagreeable. You should not object solely on the ground that your opponents' offers of evidence do not meet the requirements of the Federal Rules of Evidence. In particular, since this is not a jury proceeding, you should not argue that the prejudicial impact of the evidence outweighs its probative value, unless the prejudice is extreme.

At the beginning of the hearing, the immigration judge will ask Godasse's counsel either to admit or to deny each of the 8 allegations in the Notice to Appear. In this exercise, counsel is required to admit allegations 1, 2, 3, and 6. Counsel should deny all the other allegations. After asking about each individual allegation, the immigration judge will ask Godasse's counsel either to concede or to deny deportability. In this exercise, counsel is required to deny deportability.

A suggestion on organizing your case and preparing for the hearing: After familiarizing yourself with the materials, make a systematic list of all the facts your side will have the burden of proving. If you are the ICE trial attorney, your list will include all the facts that establish deportability under the various charges. If you are Godasse's counsel, you will need to (a) decide which forms of discretionary relief to apply for (for this exercise you must include cancellation of removal); and (b) identify all the facts that establish your client's statutory eligibility for each of those remedies and the reasons your client deserves the favorable exercise of discretion. For each side, the next step is to go through your lists, item by item, and figure out precisely what evidence (testimony or documents) you will offer to prove each essential fact.

You will also need to anticipate your opponent's case. Think about the list of essential facts he or she will prepare and the evidence he or she will offer. Consider whether there are any objections you might raise to the introduction of particular evidence and whether there is contrary evidence you might introduce even though your opponent has the burden of proof.

In this exercise, the ICE trial attorney is required to offer Documents A and C into evidence during the deportability phase. (The immigration judge will already have received Document B, the Notice to Appear.) In the affirmative relief phase, Godasse's counsel is required to submit Godasse's application for cancellation of removal (Documents D and E). Both sides must come to the hearing with photocopies of the documents they plan to introduce. For present purposes, assume that photocopies of all the documents that appear in the file are as admissible as the originals.

As for witnesses: In the deportability phase, ICE must call immigration officer Leslie Kinney. ICE may additionally call Godasse, who must testify if called. Godasse's counsel must call Godasse if ICE doesn't. If ICE calls Godasse, then Godasse's counsel may call him back.

In the affirmative relief phase, Godasse's counsel must call Godasse, and must also call Elizabeth DesChamps, the sister of Monique DesChamps. Elizabeth lives in Austin and will be willing to testify. She will confirm Godasse's story about the ferocity of her and Monique's father and will further testify that the situation has not improved in the ensuing years. She will also testify, however, that she does not believe Godasse's denial that he is the father of Monique's child. She is angry with Godasse for not sending Monique any child support payments, which Godasse will say Monique at any rate has never requested.

Your instructor will decide whether Elizabeth DesChamps is to testify in English or in French. If the latter, then your instructor will arrange for an interpreter to appear at the hearing.

Since this is a classroom exercise rather than a real case, certain liberties have been taken. In a real case, Godasse and his lawyer would have conversed at length before the hearing. So, too, would Godasse's lawyer and the witness, Elizabeth DesChamps. The opposing lawyers might have performed further factual investigation and possibly legal research. (You should not do either unless your instructor asks you to.) The opposing lawyers would not usually have had access to the same information, as they do here. Noncitizens in removal proceedings are rarely able to recite their immigration histories with the precision present in Godasse's statement. The noncitizen or his or her counsel or both would have appeared already at a "master calendar" hearing, where the noncitizen would have pleaded to the allegations in the Notice to Appear, the IJ would have developed the issues, and the date and time of the removal hearing would have been scheduled. A bond for Godasse's release pending the hearing might have been set. Limited discovery and/or informal negotiation might have taken place. There might even have been a pre-hearing conference. The record in a real case would contain certain documents beyond those reproduced here, including the ones mentioned in the application for cancellation of removal, the employer's labor certification application, and a standardized form on which counsel formally enters an appearance. Finally, in a real case Document E (respondent's affidavit) would not ordinarily have to be introduced into evidence, since the respondent can testify directly to all the stated facts.

The Notice to Appear (Document B) originally ordered Godasse to appear for a master calendar hearing on September 15, 2010. Assume that the date of the actual removal hearing is October 10, 2010. Assume also that the Labor Department denied labor certification on September 24, 2010.

END OF EXERCISE

D. EXCEPTIONS TO USUAL REMOVAL PROCEDURES

1. EXPEDITED REMOVAL

As you saw in chapter 6, Congress in 1996 created a new, abbreviated procedure officially known as "expedited removal." INA § 235(b)(1). The procedure entails various procedural short-cuts, which you have already seen, whenever an immigration inspector believes that an arriving noncitizen is inadmissible on either documentary or fraud grounds. You will encounter this procedure again in chapter 11 because it has special significance and special features in the context of asylum.

Expedited removal is primarily a border procedure for arriving noncitizens. But the Attorney General has the unreviewable discretion to extend it to noncitizens who are present in the United States without having been admitted, provided they are unable to prove continuous physical presence in the United States for the immediately preceding two years. INA § 235(b)(1)(A)(iii). For that group, the 1996 legislation made a double procedural change—subjecting them to grounds of inadmissibility rather than to grounds of deportability, and allowing the Attorney General to use the special summary procedure to adjudicate inadmissibility.

In 1999 the Attorney General announced a pilot program for extending expedited removal to noncitizens who had been convicted of the criminal offense of entry without inspection, INA § 275, were serving their sentences in any of three correctional facilities in Texas, and had been present in the United States for less than two years. See 64 Fed. Reg. 51338 (Sept. 22, 1999), discussed in 76 IR at 1416–17 (Sept. 27, 1999).

In 2002 the Attorney General extended expedited removal to another group of noncitizens who were physically present in the United States—those who had arrived by sea without having been admitted or paroled, and who have not been physically present in the United States for at least two continuous years. See 67 Fed. Reg. 68924 (Nov. 13, 2002). Individuals who are processed under this policy are detained automatically throughout the removal proceedings. With Haitian boat people principally in mind, the government's stated justifications were to deter illegal migration by sea and thereby to prevent loss of life. Id. For a strong argument that this extension violates the 1951 UN Refugee Convention, see Lory Diana Rosenberg, The Courts and Interception: The United States' Interdiction Experience and Its Impact on Refugees and Asylum Seekers, 17 Georgetown Immigration L.J. 199 (2003).

A third extension came in 2004. It authorized DHS to use the expedited removal procedure whenever a noncitizen who is present without admission is encountered by an immigration officer in any of certain designated border sectors, within 100 air miles of a land border, unless the person can establish that he or she has been continuously physically present in the United States for the past 14 days. DHS says it plans not to use this authority against Cuban nationals “because removals to Cuba cannot presently be assured and for other [unspecified] U.S. policy reasons.” 69 Fed. Reg. 48877, 48879 (Aug. 11, 2004).

2. CRIMINAL CASES

a. PRISON HEARINGS

In the mid 1980's, Congress began to prioritize the removal of noncitizen criminal offenders. IRCA, enacted in 1986, contained a provision, section 701, requiring that deportation proceedings based on criminal convictions be started “as expeditiously as possible after the date of the conviction.” To implement that requirement, EOIR established an “institutional hearing program” in which deportation (now removal) hearings for incarcerated noncitizens are held in designated state or federal prison facilities. See United States General Accounting Office, Criminal Aliens—Prison Deportation Hearings Include Opportunities to Contest Deportation, Report No. GAO/GGD-90-79 at 5 (1990).

Two years later Congress passed the Anti-Drug Abuse Act of 1988, Pub.L. 100-690, 102 Stat. 4181 (Nov. 18, 1988). That statute created the concept of the “aggravated felony.” Id. § 7342, adding INA § 101(a)(43). Earlier chapters considered the recent expansions of that definition and the substantive significance of a conviction of an aggravated felony. The procedural effects are at least equally critical. Since 1988, the law has instructed the Attorney General to hold deportation (now removal) hearings for aggravated felons before they complete their criminal sentences. INA § 242A(a) (pre-1996). In 1996, Congress expanded the list of crime-related deportability grounds that are subject to that requirement. AEDPA § 440(g)(1)(A); IIRIRA § 306(d). The list now includes drug and firearm offenses, two crimes of moral turpitude (under certain circumstances), and other miscellaneous crimes. For more detail, see INA § 238(a)(1).

The goal is to complete all the administrative steps, including any BIA appeal, before the person’s release from incarceration. INA §§ 238(a)(1), 238(b)(3)(A). If everything goes according to plan, then upon completion of the sentence DHS can take the individual directly from the prison and remove him or her from the United States without additional detention.

Sometimes, however, things don’t go as planned, and the removal proceedings have not been completed by the time of the prisoner’s scheduled release. INA § 241(a)(2) requires the Secretary of Homeland Security to detain most noncitizen criminal offenders as soon as they are released from criminal incarceration. As you saw earlier, the Supreme Court in Demore upheld the constitutionality of mandatory detention.

Conducting removal hearings at correctional facilities might well get the person out of the country sooner, but there are large costs. The physical remoteness of those federal and state penitentiaries that have been designated for removal hearings makes it exceedingly difficult for the noncitizen to obtain witnesses and, more important, counsel. This is particularly so when, as is often the case, the prisoner is indigent and therefore dependent on pro bono or other free representation. Congress has acknowledged the problem. INA § 242A(b) requires the Secretary, when selecting those prison sites at which removal hearings will be held, to “make reasonable efforts to ensure that the alien’s access to counsel and right to counsel * * * are not impaired.” Does this provision go far enough? If a given prisoner has no realistic opportunity to obtain counsel, does the fact that the government made a “reasonable” effort to ensure access to counsel when it chose the sites satisfy the demands of due process?

A congressionally mandated GAO report, see INA § 238(a)(4)(B), studied the extent to which holding removal hearings at prison facilities “may adversely affect the ability of such aliens to contest deportation effectively.” United States General Accounting Office, Criminal Aliens—Prison Deportation Hearings Include Opportunities to Contest Deportation, Report No. GAO/GGD-90-79 (1990). Investigators attended 171 prison deportation hearings. The results were inconclusive. On the one hand, the investigators found the immigration judges had informed the prisoners of their procedural rights, including their rights to counsel. Id. at 3. On the other hand, the drafters of the report acknowledged they had made no attempt to find out how many of the prisoners eventually succeeded in obtaining representation. In the 171 hearings attended, 72 individuals were represented (five of them by telephone) and 36 others received continuances to obtain counsel. Id. at 6. As required by regulations, the immigration judges distributed lists of individuals and organizations that provide free or low-cost representation, but four of the five lists that the GAO investigators inspected were either “inaccurate or outdated.” Id. at 7.

As noted earlier, the purpose of completing the removal hearings of imprisoned noncitizens before their release is to permit DHS to remove them from the United States at the moment of release. A related procedure sets a more ambitious goal—removing the person even before the prison term would otherwise have expired. Normally, early release for purposes of removal is not permitted. INA § 241(a)(4)(A). As a result of 1996 legislation, however, the Secretary now has the discretion to remove many categories of nonviolent offenders before completion of their federal sentences (or state sentences, upon the request of the state authorities). INA § 241(a)(4)(B).

b. ADMINISTRATIVE REMOVAL

In 1994, Congress further expedited the removal of aggravated felons. As part of a comprehensive crime bill, see Pub. L. 103-322, § 130004, 108 Stat. 1796, 2026-28 (Sept. 13, 1994), amended by Pub. L. 103-416, § 223(a)(1), 108 Stat. 4305, 4322 (Oct. 25, 1994), Congress established what came to be called “administrative deportation” and now “administrative removal.” With the recent expansions in the definition of “aggravated felony,” see page 554 above, administrative removal is in the process of becoming commonplace.

Most of the statutory framework now appears in INA § 238(b). The original statute required the Attorney General to issue regulations establishing abbreviated procedures for removing non-LPR aggravated felons. AEDPA § 442(a)(1) extended administrative removal to aggravated felons who were conditional permanent residents. See INA § 238(b)(2)(B).

The statute puts few constraints on the procedures that the regulations may prescribe. The noncitizen must receive reasonable notice of the charges and of the opportunity to be heard, may be represented by counsel (not at government expense), and must have a reasonable opportunity to inspect and to rebut the evidence; a record must be maintained; and the adjudicator may not be the person who issued the charges. INA § 238(b)(4). The removal order must be stayed for at least 14 days to give the person time to seek (extremely limited) judicial review. INA § 238(b)(3).

The regulations appear in 8 CFR §§ 238, 1238 (2008). The procedure they require replaces the usual removal procedure (an evidentiary hearing before an immigration judge and a right of appeal to the BIA), with an administratively final decision by a DHS enforcement official. Id. Normally the entire proceeding is done on paper, without opportunity for an evidentiary hearing or even an informal interview. Id. For a good description of the procedure and a critical policy analysis, see Lory D. Rosenberg, Administrative Deportation Proceedings: Accomplishment or Abomination?, 72 IR 721 (May 25, 1996).

c. JUDICIAL REMOVAL

In section B.6 above, you studied the principal judicial function in removal cases—reviewing decisions reached by an administrative agency. When noncitizens are deportable because of criminal convictions, however, the sentencing courts can play a more direct role—deciding on their own whether the defendants ought to be removed from the United States.

There are now several different ways in which courts may do the latter. The pattern that these various mechanisms reveal is that sentencing judges have ample power to require removal but almost no power to prohibit it.

Thus, while courts once had the power to issue binding “judicial recommendations against deportation” (JRAD’s) in certain criminal cases, that power disappeared with the Immigration Act of 1990. See pages 550–52 above. Today, therefore, sentencing judges have no power to enter nonremoval orders in contested cases.

In contrast, federal sentencing judges may enter removal orders as part of the criminal sentences when noncitizen defendants are deportable on at least the most common crime-related grounds. See INA § 238(c)(2)(B).⁸⁹ The power exists only if the prosecutor requests a removal order and DHS concurs in that request; then the sentencing judge has the discretion whether to exercise this jurisdiction. INA § 238(c)(1). Before deciding whether to order removal, the judge must hold what amounts to a mini-removal hearing on the issues of both deportability and affirmative relief. INA § 238(c)(2).

Either the defendant or DHS may appeal the district court’s decision to the court of appeals. INA § 238(c)(3)(A). If the sentencing judge holds a hearing and decides against ordering removal (because the judge either finds the person not deportable or is willing to grant affirmative relief), DHS gets a second shot; it may initiate conventional removal proceedings de novo. There is no analogous provision giving the defendant a second shot in conventional removal proceedings after the sentencing court has ordered him or her removed.

⁸⁹. A technical glitch in IIRIRA § 671(b)(13) left the INA with two provisions denominated as § 238(c). The cited provision is the one entitled “Judicial Removal.”

The powers just described enable courts to order removal against the will of the defendant. Removal may also be ordered pursuant to negotiated plea bargains. INA § 238(c)(5) specifically authorizes United States Attorneys, with the concurrence of DHS, to enter into plea bargains with noncitizen criminal defendants stipulating to removal from the United States. The same provision empowers sentencing judges to enter judgments enforcing those stipulations.

What about a plea bargain in which the federal prosecutor agrees that the defendant will not be removed? As you saw on pages 680–81 above, U.S. Attorneys normally are not empowered to promise nonremoval; if they do so anyway, some courts are willing to enforce the promise while other courts are not. As you also saw, however, a Justice Department regulation now provides that DHS will not be bound by federal prosecutors' promises of nonremoval unless the prosecutor has first secured written authorization from DHS. See 28 CFR § 0.197 (2008). The “unless” clause makes the analysis parallel to that in the 238(c)(5) cases above: Plea bargains may stipulate to either removal or nonremoval, but either way, the stipulation will be ineffective unless DHS concurs.

Professors Margaret Taylor and Ronald Wright have floated an intriguing proposal for more fully merging the criminal justice system with the removal system. They would entrust sentencing judges with nearly exclusive jurisdiction to determine whether noncitizens convicted of crimes are to be ordered removed. See Margaret H. Taylor & Ronald F. Wright, The Sentencing Judge as Immigration Judge, 51 Emory L.J. 1131 (2002).

3. IN ABSENTIA REMOVAL HEARINGS

The Notice to Appear, which is the document that officially marks the commencement of removal proceedings, advises the respondent of his or her duties and of the consequences of failing to discharge those duties. Among other things, it instructs the person to provide his or her address and telephone number and to inform DHS of any changes of address or telephone number. INA § 239(a)(1)(F)(i, ii). It also spells out the consequences of failing to do so. See INA § 239(a)(1)(F)(iii).

What are those consequences? If the required notice has been provided, or the notice was mailed to the person's most recent known address but he or she had failed to notify DHS of an address or telephone change and as a result did not receive the notice, and the person does not appear, a removal hearing will be held in absentia. INA § 240(b)(5)(A, B). Non-receipt has posed more difficult problems since 1996, when Congress allowed the notices to be sent by regular mail rather than by certified mail as previously required. INA § 239(a)(1). See Lopes v. Mukasey, 517 F.3d 156 (2d Cir. 2008) (holding that the change in mailing procedures lessens the strength of the presumption of receipt). ICE's heightened priority on tracking down “fugitive absconders” who have been ordered removed but have not left the country, combined with the increased number of in absentia removal orders, has posed challenges for those individuals who were ordered removed in absentia after notices to appear had been lost in the mail.

At in absentia hearings, ICE must prove by clear, unequivocal, and convincing evidence that the required notice was provided (or couldn't be provided because the respondent had not notified DHS of an address or telephone change) and that the person is deportable. Id. To get the removal order rescinded, the person must either (a) move to reopen within 180 days, showing "exceptional circumstances;" or (b) move to reopen at any time, showing he or she either did not receive the required notice, or was in custody and was not at fault in failing to appear. INA § 240(b)(4)(C). "Exceptional circumstances" means "serious illness of the alien or death of an immediate relative of the alien" or something else no "less compelling," and must be beyond the person's control. INA § 240(e)(1). One court has held that the 180-day deadline for moving to reopen will be equitably tolled for individuals who were defrauded by their own lawyers. Lopez v. INS, 184 F.3d 1097 (9th Cir. 1999).

Judicial review of an in absentia removal order is available but is very limited in scope. The only issues the court has the jurisdiction to address are the adequacy of the notice, the reasons for the person's absence, and deportability. INA § 240(b)(5)(D). Not subject to litigation, for example, is eligibility for discretionary relief, which is the most common issue presented in petitions for review.

Noncitizens who are ordered removed in absentia suffer adverse consequences beyond the removal order itself. A person who receives oral notice of the hearing and still fails to appear (and doesn't demonstrate "exceptional circumstances") becomes ineligible for various discretionary remedies until ten years after the removal order. See INA § 240(b)(7). In addition, the failure to appear renders the person inadmissible to the United States for five years following his or her eventual departure. INA § 212(a)(6)(B).

What is your reaction to this procedure? Is it fair? If so, is it appropriately harsh or unduly so? See generally Iris Gomez, The Consequences of Nonappearance: Interpreting New Section 242B of the Immigration and Nationality Act, 30 San Diego L.Rev. 75 (1993).

4. NONCITIZENS REENTERING AFTER PRIOR REMOVALS

INA § 241(a)(5) expedites the removal of noncitizens who were previously removed or who voluntarily departed, but who then reentered unlawfully. ICE could of course institute new removal proceedings, typically on the ground that the person entered while inadmissible, INA § 237(a)(1)(A), or is "present in the United States in violation of [the INA]." INA § 237(a)(1)(B). As you now know, that process can be time-consuming. In such cases, therefore, once it is found that the individual has reentered unlawfully after a prior removal order, the prior order is reinstated and the person may be removed without further proceedings.

But questions as to the procedural machinery remain. The administrative regulations purport to entrust the decisionmaking authority to DHS immigration officers rather than to immigration judges. See 8 CFR §§ 241.8, 1241.8 (2008). In Morales-Izquierdo v. Ashcroft, 388 F.3d 1299 (9th Cir. 2004), a unanimous panel struck down the regulations on the ground that they violate INA § 240(a)(1), which says that “an immigration judge shall conduct all proceedings for deciding the inadmissibility or deportability of an alien.” The court noted that the previous regulations had allowed the noncitizen a hearing before an immigration judge on the issues of identity, the existence of a prior removal order, and a subsequent illegal reentry, as well as the opportunity to apply for discretionary relief and to appeal to the BIA. Whether other courts will follow the Ninth Circuit and whether DHS will change the regulations are not known as of this writing.

5. CREW MEMBERS

A noncitizen who serves on board a vessel or aircraft is typically allowed to remain in the United States for a specified period of up to 29 days. See INA §§ 101(a)(10), 101(a)(15)(D), 252(a). The entry document is called a “conditional permit.” INA § 252(a). Any immigration officer, upon determining that the noncitizen “is not a bona fide crewman, or does not intend to depart on the vessel or aircraft which brought him,” has the discretion to revoke the conditional permit, take the person into custody, and require the captain to detain him or her on board the vessel or aircraft if practicable. INA § 252(b). DHS then removes the person at the expense of the carrier, and no removal proceedings ever take place. Id.

6. TERRORIST REMOVAL PROCEEDINGS

Soon after (domestic) terrorists carried out the devastating 1995 bombing of the federal building in Oklahoma City, Congress enacted AEDPA. One provision, section 401, established a special new removal court for noncitizen terrorists. The procedure is laid out in INA §§ 501–507 and summarized in chapter 10, § D.2 below. At this writing the Court has yet to be convened; the government has preferred to deploy other, generally less formal alternatives that are also discussed in chapter 10 below.

7. RESCISSION OF ADJUSTMENT OF STATUS

Under INA § 246, a grant of adjustment of status may be rescinded within five years if the person was in fact ineligible for adjustment at the time it was granted. The advantage of rescission to ICE is that, with the person’s LPR status having terminated, ICE may be able to initiate removal proceedings on the ground that the person has now overstayed his or her original nonimmigrant visa.

In 1990, Congress expanded the deportability ground for noncitizens who were inadmissible at the time of entry to include also those who were inadmissible at the time of adjustment of status. Imm. Act 1990, § 602(d), amending INA § 237(a)(1)(A). That change sucked much of the significance from the rescission provision. Now, when the government believes that a person obtained adjustment of status while inadmissible, it can simply charge deportability based on inadmissibility at the time of adjustment of status; it doesn't have to bring proceedings to rescind status on that ground and then charge deportability based on the person now having overstayed his or her original nonimmigrant visa. Can you figure out why rescission remains useful nonetheless in some situations?

ICE must initiate rescission proceedings within five years of adjustment; the proceedings need not be concluded within that period. Matter of Onal, 18 I. & N. Dec. 147, 149 (BIA 1981). The mechanics are laid out in 8 CFR § 246 (2008). The procedure resembles that of a removal hearing. ICE serves on the LPR a Notice of Intent to Rescind. Id. § 246.1. The LPR has the right to an evidentiary hearing before an immigration judge. Id. § 246.5. ICE must prove its case by "clear, unequivocal, and convincing evidence," Waziri v. INS, 392 F.2d 55, 57–58 (9th Cir.1968), just as in removal cases. Either party may appeal to the BIA, 8 CFR §§ 246.7, 1003.1(b)(8) (2008), and the noncitizen presumably can obtain judicial review in federal district court under 28 USC § 1331 (general federal question jurisdiction) or in the court of appeals as part of a petition for review of the ensuing removal order.

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. As noted, rescission under section 246 requires only a finding that "the person was not in fact eligible for such adjustment of status." There is no requirement of fraud or deliberate concealment. Should there be? Argue both ways. In analyzing this issue, consider that, despite the mandatory-sounding wording of section 246 (Attorney General shall rescind adjustment), the provision has been interpreted as conferring merely a discretion to rescind when the terms of the provision are otherwise met. Matter of Quan, 12 I. & N. Dec. 487, 488 (Deputy Assoc. Comm'r 1967) (no authority cited). In Quan, the former INS had brought rescission proceedings against an individual who had adjusted her status on the basis of her marriage to a man who had falsely claimed to be a United States citizen. She had been unaware of the falsity and in the meantime had had two United States citizen children. The Deputy Associate Commissioner (who then heard appeals from rescission orders) made the discretionary decision not to rescind.⁹⁰

2. Suppose A adjusts her status to permanent residence and then marries B. B then adjusts status to permanent residence under the family-sponsored second preference on the basis of the marriage. A's adjustment of status is then rescinded. Should that lead to rescission of B's adjustment? In Matter of Valiyee, 14 I. & N. Dec. 710 (IJ and BIA, 1974), the answer given was yes. Based on the language of section 246, would you have reached the same result?

⁹⁰. See also Matter of Saunders, 16 I. & N. Dec. 326, 332 (BIA 1977) (Board Member Appleman, concurring, suggests possibility of reading in a requirement of fraud). But see

Matter of Tayabji, 19 I. & N. Dec. 264 (BIA 1985) (affirming rescission even though person had been unaware of fact making him ineligible for adjustment).

3. Does the statutory five-year limitation on rescission also limit the initiation of removal proceedings against adjusted LPR's? The courts are divided.⁹¹

91. Compare, e.g., Bamidele v. INS, 99 F.3d 557 (3d Cir. 1996) (yes, at least when deportation is based solely on defects in the adjustment of status) with Oloteo v. INS, 643 F.2d 679 (9th Cir. 1981); Matter of Belenzo, 17 I. & N. Dec. 374 (BIA & AG 1980-81) (no).

IMMIGRATION AND NATIONAL SECURITY

Let us be clear: Immigration law does not revolve around national security or terrorism. As you will see, national security is merely one of many policy ingredients in the mix. Moreover, only the most minute proportion of actual immigration cases present any national security issues at all. Conversely, while many of the policy responses to September 11 have been immigration-specific, most have not.

A full chapter devoted solely to immigration and national security runs the risk, therefore, of lending that subject undue prominence. This must be acknowledged. For two reasons, separate treatment of this material is useful nonetheless. First, in the aftermath of September 11, the inevitable preoccupation with terrorism and war has utterly dominated the public discourse on immigration. See, e.g., Kevin R. Johnson & Bernard Trujillo, Immigration Reform, National Security After September 11, and the Future of North American Integration, 91 Minnesota L. Rev. 1369 (2007). Welcome or not, that reality cannot be ignored. Second, Congress and the executive branch have responded with an array of counter-terrorism initiatives. Many of them specifically target either noncitizens or particular classes of noncitizens. Synthesizing these measures makes it easier to describe, digest, and evaluate them in context.

A few organizational notes: Some of the programs discussed in this chapter—for example, those that deal with students, asylum seekers, detention, visa issuance, and border enforcement—relate fundamentally to the subjects of other chapters. These will be included here but at least cross-referenced elsewhere. Further, although the events of September 11 have affected areas of immigration law beyond those that relate to national security—for example, the diminished enthusiasm for guest worker, legalization, and other immigration reforms that had been on the Bush-Fox agenda¹—this chapter will be confined to issues of national security. Finally, while the transfer of immigration functions from the INS to the DHS was clearly driven by national security objectives, the details of that reorganization appeared in the Overview chapter of this book and need not be repeated here.²

1. See, e.g., Kevin R. Johnson, September 11 and Mexican Immigrants: Collateral Damage Comes Home, 52 DePaul L. Rev. 849, 866–67 (2003).

2. For a thoughtful critique, see Dara Kay Cohen, Mariano-Florentino Cuéllar & Barry R. Weingast, Crisis Bureaucracy, Homeland Security and the Political Design

Since the founding of the Republic, anxieties about national security have frequently found their way into United States immigration law. The Alien Act of 1798 authorized the President to deport any noncitizen he deemed "dangerous." Act of June 25, 1798, 1 Stat. 570. This unpopular statute was not renewed when it lapsed after two years, see Frank F. Chuman, The Bamboo People 53 (1976), but more than a century later, following the assassination of President McKinley, Congress passed a law that excluded noncitizen anarchists and certain others whose views were deemed subversive. Act of March 3, 1903, ch. 1012, §§ 2, 38, 32 Stat. 1213, 1214, 1221. These exclusions were broadened over the years and extended to deportation, as you saw in chapters 5 and 7. On April 15, 1995, a powerful blast gutted the Murrah Federal Building in Oklahoma City and killed 168 people. See Jo Thomas, Starting Date Set for Trial on Oklahoma Bombing, New York Times, Nov. 16, 1996, at 9. Coming on the heels of the bombing of the World Trade Center and other highly visible terrorist acts, the destruction in Oklahoma City brought home to Americans that they are as vulnerable to terrorism as anyone else is. In 1996, mainly in response to the Oklahoma City bombing, Congress passed AEDPA, a comprehensive statute that added several anti-terrorism (and other immigration-related) programs.

But there is no question that the most devastating terrorist acts in the United States, and those that have prompted the most sweeping responses both generally and with specific respect to immigration, were the September 11, 2001 attacks on the World Trade Center and the Pentagon. Among the congressional responses have been the USA PATRIOT Act, EBSVERA, the HSA, the Intelligence Reform and Terrorism Prevention Act of 2004, Pub. L. 108-458, 118 Stat. 3638 (Dec. 17, 2004), and the REAL ID Act of 2005. A number of important executive branch actions have followed. These developments, together with relevant pre-September 11 programs, are highlighted here and throughout the book.

Generally, the national security strategies that are targeted specifically at noncitizens fall into the following seven areas: detention, intelligence-gathering, expansion of the grounds for removing noncitizens from the country, contracting noncitizens' procedural rights, visa and other overseas policies, enhanced border enforcement, and profiling.

A. THE DETENTION OF NONCITIZENS³

One of the most publicized components of the post-September 11 national security strategy in the United States has been the vastly inof Legal Mandates, 59 Stanford L. Rev. 673 (2006).

3. See generally Raquel Aldana, The September 11 Immigration Detentions and Unconstitutional Executive Legislation, 29 Southern Illinois Univ. L.J. 5 (2004); David

Cole, Enemy Aliens—Double Standards and Constitutional Freedoms in the War on Terrorism (2003); David Cole, Enemy Aliens, 54 Stanford L. Rev. 953 (2002); Stephen H. Legomsky, The Detention of Aliens: Theories, Rules, and Discretion, 30 Univ. of Miami

creased resort to preventive detention. Several detention programs should be distinguished:

1. DETENTION IN CONNECTION WITH REMOVAL PROCEEDINGS

Removal proceedings can take months or even years. As a general rule, various governmental officials have the discretion whether to detain or release noncitizens while removal proceedings are pending. INA § 236(a). Release requires a finding that the noncitizen will not endanger persons or property and is likely to appear for the removal proceeding. 8 CFR § 236.1(c)(8) (2008).

By way of exception, however, detention has been made mandatory in certain categories of cases. Because mandatory detention gives rise to difficult constitutional issues, the subject was covered more comprehensively in chapter 2 (Demore v. Kim). At least two categories of mandatory detention relate specifically to national security and thus require brief mention here.⁴

First, Congress in 1996 mandated the detention, pending removal proceedings, of any noncitizen who is alleged to be inadmissible or deportable on the basis of terrorist activities. INA § 236(c)(1)(D). The relevant inadmissibility and deportability grounds were described in chapters 5 and 7, respectively. See also INA § 236A (certification program, discussed below).

A second form of mandatory detention can result from appeals in bond cases. When an immigration judge finds that a noncitizen in removal proceedings is not a threat to abscond or to endanger the public and therefore grants release on bond, ICE may appeal the decision to the BIA. The appeal, however, can take several months or longer. Until shortly after September 11, the rule was that the prosecuting agency (then the INS) could request the BIA to stay the person's release during this period, but the INS had to show that its appeal was likely to succeed and that the person's release would cause irreparable harm—roughly the same standard as for preliminary injunctions. A regulation issued by Attorney General Ashcroft in late 2001 eliminated those requirements. Whenever the prosecuting agency (now ICE) has determined that the person should not be released, the immigration judge's decision ordering release now must be stayed, and the noncitizen detained, for up to 90 days, until the BIA decides the custody issue. 8 CFR §§ 1003.6(c)(4), 1003.19(i)(2) (2008). ICE need not

Inter-American L. Rev. 531 (1999); Natsu Taylor Saito, Will Force Trump Legality After September 11? American Jurisprudence Confronts the Rule of Law, 17 Georgetown Immigration L.J. 1 (2002); Peter H. Schuck, INS Detention and Removal: A "White Paper," 11 Georgetown Immigration L.J. 667 (1997); Charles D. Weisselberg, The Detention and Treatment of Aliens Three Years After Sep- tember 11: A New New World?, 38 U.C. Davis L. Rev. 815 (2005).

4. In 2003, DHS announced a mandatory detention program (called "Operation Liberty Shield") for asylum seekers from designated countries, but that program was both legally and politically controversial and was terminated after one month. See David Cole, Enemy Aliens 51, 249 n.23 (2003).

demonstrate, or even allege, any reasons for doubting the immigration judge's decision to release. As a result, simply by filing an appeal to the BIA, ICE can unilaterally effect the person's continued confinement. See generally David Cole, In Aid of Removal: Due Process Limits on Immigration Detention, 51 Emory L.J. 1003, 1030-31 (2002).

Apart from these examples of formally mandatory detention, national security considerations have recently influenced discretionary detention decisions as well. They have done so in at least two ways.

First, in the Pentagon/Twin Towers Bombing Investigation (PENTTBOM), the FBI arrested and interviewed hundreds of noncitizens in the months following the September 11 attacks. The vast majority of those arrested were individuals who were not suspected of terrorism but were encountered fortuitously during the terrorism investigations and suspected of having violated the immigration laws. In those cases, the former INS instituted removal proceedings, and the FBI routinely sent memoranda to EOIR opposing discretionary release on bond pending the removal decisions. The memoranda contained the following boilerplate language: "The FBI is gathering and culling information that may corroborate or diminish our current suspicions of the individuals who have been detained. * * * [T]he FBI has been unable to rule out the possibility that respondent is somehow linked to, or possesses knowledge of, the terrorist attacks." See AILA, Boiling the Frog Slowly: Executive Branch Actions Since September 11, 2001, 7 BIB 1236, at 1236 (Oct. 15, 2002); U.S. Dept. of Justice, Office of the Inspector General, The September 11 Detainees: A Review of the Treatment of Aliens Held on Immigration Charges in Connection with the Investigation of the September 11 Attacks (April 2003) [hereafter cited as the OIG Report], at 69-70. The overwhelming majority were males, between ages 26 and 40, from Muslim countries. About one-third were Pakistani.

The 198-page OIG report acknowledged the vital national security interests at stake and the difficulties under which the law enforcement agencies were operating but, even in the light of those circumstances, ultimately expressed a number of serious criticisms. It chastised the FBI for making little attempt "to distinguish between aliens who it actually suspected of having a connection to terrorism from those aliens, who, while possibly guilty of violating federal immigration law, had no connection to terrorism but simply were encountered in connection with a PENTTBOM lead." OIG Report at 70, 196. The OIG Report also criticized the needlessly long duration of the detention; the practice of the former INS to oppose bond automatically in removal proceedings, without regard to the facts of the cases; the conditions of confinement; and, even after removal orders had been entered, the INS practice of keeping the noncitizens in detention while awaiting FBI "clearance" for far longer than the 90-day statutory maximum.

Increasingly troubled by the threat of litigation, the Justice Department rescinded the "hold until cleared" policy in February 2002. Under the new policy, ICE keeps the FBI apprised of the results of removal proceedings so that the FBI can prioritize the investigations of those in whom it has interest, but ICE is now free to execute removal orders without waiting for FBI clearance. OIG Report at 104.

A second and more specific national security constraint on the discretion to release has arisen in the context of Haitian boat people. As you will see in chapter 11, for many years Haitians fleeing horrific conditions at home have attempted to reach United States shores by boat. In Matter of D-J-, 23 I. & N. Dec. 572 (A.G. 2003), a boat carrying 216 undocumented Haitians and Dominicans sailed into Biscayne Bay, Florida. One of the passengers, D-J-, was apprehended onshore and placed in removal proceedings. He applied for asylum and, while the claim was pending, for release on bond. Over the objections of the former INS, the immigration judge granted bond and the BIA affirmed. They found that D-J- was not likely to abscond or to endanger the community. Attorney General Ashcroft reversed the decision of the BIA. He reasoned that, in exercising their discretion whether to release or detain a noncitizen pending removal proceedings, the immigration authorities are additionally required to weigh any national security considerations that executive branch sources with relevant expertise bring to their attention.

That holding might seem innocuous on its face. After all, if a person is found to be a threat to national security, who could deny that that danger is relevant to the discretionary decision whether to release on bond? The impact of the Attorney General's decision lies, rather, in the way he applied that principle to the facts of the case. First, in response to the argument that due process requires individualized consideration of the particular applicant, the Attorney General held that the national security considerations may be applied categorically—in this case, to (at least) all the undocumented Haitians who were apprehended onshore, without regard to the circumstances of individual applicants. Second, to conclude that national security was at stake, the Attorney General had to define national security in broad terms. He credited two separate arguments advanced by the INS. One argument was that the release of undocumented Haitian boat people would encourage other Haitians to follow suit. This in turn would require the Coast Guard and others to respond, thereby straining “national and homeland security resources.” 23 I. & N. Dec. at 577, 578–79. Second, and more generally, the INS argued, and the Attorney General agreed, that the September 11 terrorist attacks made it increasingly important to prevent undocumented migrants from avoiding the immigration inspections process. Id. at 577. This concern was heightened here, the argument ran, because the State Department had observed “an increase in third country nationals (Pakistanis, Palestinians, etc.) using Haiti as a staging point for attempted migration to the United States.” Id. at 579. Since the same considerations will arise in virtually any case that involves Haitian vessels (and arguably in a range of other cases as well), the practical effect of the Attorney General's decision is to make detention mandatory in whole categories of cases.

Professor Lee Hall has written a series of innovative articles that link the post-9/11 mandatory detention policies to the commercial profits gained by the operators of state and private detention facilities. She suggests there can be political rewards for legislators and officials who facilitate government contracts with private detention centers.⁵

Also controversial are the government's policies on disclosing information about the detainees. Professor Natsu Taylor Saito describes the early practices:

In the weeks following September 11, 2001, the Justice Department * * * periodically announced a running total of the hundreds of people it was detaining in connection with the attacks. It did not, however, reveal who was in custody; what, if anything, they were charged with; or where they were being held. The media began reporting stories of the families of the "disappeared"—wives and children who came home to discover that their husbands or fathers had vanished; frantic inquiries to local and federal authorities which yielded no information; occasional phone calls from the men who reported that they were being moved from state to state, often held in maximum security prisons, questioned but not told why they were being held. Justice Department officials stated that the detainees had access to lawyers, but detainees have reported being denied access and lawyers that they were unable to find their clients.

On October 29 [2001] a coalition of civil liberties and human rights organizations filed a request under the Freedom of Information Act ("FOIA") demanding the names, citizenship status and location of those arrested, the charges on which they were being held, and the names of their lawyers. Shortly thereafter, on November 5, the Justice Department announced that it would no longer release even the numbers of those detained, which, by then, was 1,147. Eighteen organizations * * * then joined in a lawsuit demanding the release of basic information on the detainees.

Natsu Taylor Saito, Will Force Trump Legality After September 11? American Jurisprudence Confronts the Rule of Law, 17 Georgetown Immigration L.J. 1, 6-7 (2002).

The Justice Department then issued a regulation that prohibits non-federal detention facilities from releasing any information concerning their immigration detainees. DHS now exclusively controls the release of such information to the public. 8 CFR § 236.6 (2008). The Department also denied the FOIA request, invoking various FOIA exemptions for information that is "compiled for law enforcement purposes" and which would reasonably interfere with enforcement proceedings, invade personal privacy, or endanger someone's life or physical safety. 5 USC § 552(b)(7)(A, C, F). The government emphasized the "mosaic" nature of intelligence operations. Information on an individual detainee is but a piece of a larger puzzle; whoever has access to all the pieces can more easily distill patterns. In these cases the government asserted that, if the full list of names were revealed, Al Qaeda operatives would have a "roadmap about the course and progress of an investigation," would be able to learn which of their agents remained at large and which ones were in imminent danger of apprehension, might be able to figure out who the confidential informants were, and could intimidate or endanger detainees and their families to deter them from cooperating. Moreover, the government argued, withholding the information would protect the privacy of the detainees. They, and their lawyers and families, remained free to decide which information they wished to reveal to the public. See Center for National Security Studies v. United States DOJ, 331 F.3d 918, 923 (D.C. Cir.2003); 67 Fed. Reg. at 19509.

5. See Lee Hall, Nomads under the Tent of Blue: Migrants Fuel the U.S. Prison Industry, 6 Rutgers Race & L. Rev. 265 (2004); Lee Hall, Shackles and Shareholders: Developments in the Business of Immigration Detentions, 9 BIB 394 (Apr. 1, 2004); Lee Hall, Update to "Shackles and Shareholders: Developments in the Business of Immigration Detentions," 9 BIB 565 (May 1, 2004).

The DC Circuit agreed that the government had the right to withhold all of the information. The majority opinion emphasized the importance of judicial deference to the government in matters of national security. The dissent found the government's national security justifications vague and felt, at any rate, that the majority opinion had given insufficient weight to the competing interest of the public in having a way to assure itself that the government was respecting the detainees' constitutional rights. Id. at 937–52 (Tatel, J, dissenting).

Finally, since many of the noncitizens who are detained pending removal proceedings are in facilities operated by the federal Bureau of Prisons, a Bureau of Prisons regulation rooted in the PENTTBOM investigation is of particular interest. About seven weeks after the September 11 attacks, the Bureau authorized the monitoring of attorney-inmate conversations—in some cases with advance notice and in other cases without notice but with court approval. For the details, see 28 USC § 501.3(d) (2008). For opposing views, compare the ABA objections, 78 IR at 1743–44, with Jan C. Ting, Unobjectionable But Insufficient—Federal Initiatives in Response to the September 11 Terrorist Attacks, 34 Connecticut L. Rev. 1145, 1151–52 (2002).

2. THE CERTIFICATION PROGRAM

The USA PATRIOT ACT, enacted on October 26, 2001, established the authority for a potentially wide-ranging noncitizen detention program. Section 412 of the Act added a new section 236A to the INA. That section authorizes the Attorney General to "certify" any noncitizen whenever there are "reasonable grounds to believe" that the person is either inadmissible or deportable on certain national security-related grounds. INA § 236A(a)(3). Once the person is certified, detention becomes mandatory until he or she is removed from the country or removal proceedings are terminated. Id. § 236A(a)(1, 2, 6). Within seven days of the commencement of detention (as opposed to 48 hours in other cases), the government must decide whether to commence removal proceedings. Id. § 236A(a)(5).

Unlike the general detention powers discussed in the preceding subsections, this one expressly allows indefinite detention as long as the case is reviewed at least once every six months. Id. § 236A(a)(6). As discussed earlier, the Supreme Court in Zadvydas, just two months before the September 11 attacks, had casually noted that its decision prohibiting indefinite detention did not involve “particularly dangerous individuals, say suspected terrorists.” See pages 220–21 above. Whether the USA PATRIOT Act provision for indefinite detention comports with Zadvydas remains to be determined.

Professor David Cole has criticized the certification program on several grounds. If one condition for certifying someone in the first place is that the government has a reasonable basis for believing the person is inadmissible or deportable on specified grounds, then why, Cole asks, does the government need the power to hold the person for seven days without filing charges? The only practical consequence of the seven-day hold would be to prevent an immigration judge from reviewing the legality of the detention during that period. Moreover, Cole observes, the Supreme Court interprets the Fourth Amendment to require that arrested individuals be brought promptly, and presumptively within 48 hours, before a judge for a probable cause hearing. He doubts that the seven-day hold comports with that interpretation. Cole also raises difficult questions about the scope and the adequacy of the courts’ powers to review the certification decision by way of habeas corpus. David Cole, In Aid of Removal: Due Process Limits on Immigration Detention, 51 Emory L.J. 1003, 1026–28 (2002).

At this writing, the certification provision had yet to be invoked. Presumably, the Justice Department has found it easier simply to detain noncitizens suspected of terrorism through its ordinary power to detain noncitizens during the course of removal proceedings. As noted in chapter 9, section A.2 above, the regulations give DHS only 48 hours to make two decisions—whether to file a notice to appear and whether to detain or release the person on bond, 8 CFR § 287.3(d) (2008), but DHS has “an additional reasonable period of time” when there is an “emergency or other extraordinary circumstance,” id. The latter proviso gives DHS a good deal of flexibility when it asserts national security as a reason for prolonging a person’s detention.⁶

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. You have now read about several different detention programs directed at noncitizens. All have been established for the stated purpose of protecting the national security of the United States. What do you see as

6. See generally Shoba Sivaprasad Wadhia, Under Arrest: Immigrants’ Rights and the Rule of Law, 38 Univ. of Memphis L. Rev. 853, 873–78 (2008); Margaret H. Taylor, Dangerous by Decree: Detention Without Bond in Immigration Proceedings, 50 Loyola L. Rev. 149 (2004).

(a) the potential benefits and (b) the potential costs of the general strategy of detaining noncitizens on national security grounds? See generally Stephen H. Legomsky, The Detention of Aliens: Theories, Rules, and Discretion, 30 Univ. of Miami Inter-Amer. L. Rev. 531, 536-41 (1999).

2. One form of mandatory (i.e., automatic) detention, discussed in section A.1 above, occurs when an immigration judge orders the noncitizen released on bond during the removal proceedings but ICE appeals the release order to the BIA. As you saw, the appeal automatically stays the release order. What do you think of that strategy? Are there special arguments that can be made either pro or con, beyond those that can be made for or against mandatory detention generally?

3. What is your reaction to the Bureau of Prisons rule that permits the monitoring of conversations between inmates and their attorneys? See section A.1 above.

B. INTELLIGENCE-GATHERING

If nothing else, the events of September 11 exposed deep fault lines in the gathering, sharing, and use of intelligence data. But even some of the basic questions remain controversial. Precisely what information should the government have, and how should it get it?

Some of the intelligence-gathering—for example, the monitoring of inmate-attorney conversations—occurs in conjunction with the detention strategies that you have just read about. You have also seen that the government now performs elaborate security checks on applicants for some of the more common discretionary immigration benefits. See page 594 above. In chapter 12, you will see related material on the debates over national identity cards and the issuance of drivers' licenses to undocumented immigrants; these issues too have intelligence consequences.

But most of the intelligence-gathering that relates to noncitizens takes place in other settings. As these materials will illustrate, national security and public safety objectives often clash with less tangible individual interests such as privacy, autonomy, and equality, as well as with more mundane interests like practical convenience (how many of us like long airport security lines?) and minimizing government spending.

Three parallel initiatives—one driven chiefly by immigration enforcement concerns, one by national security objectives, and one by both—are now in the process of being folded into a comprehensive intelligence operation called US VISIT. The first three subsections of this section will describe them. The next subsection elaborates on the current status of the combined system. The remaining subsections discuss other miscellaneous national security-related intelligence operations that relate specifically to noncitizens.

1. THE AUTOMATED ENTRY-EXIT SYSTEM

For many years, numerous observers bemoaned the fact that the United States government did not keep systematic records of all entries and departures of noncitizens. The concerns were rarely based on national security; rather, the notion was that without such records it was impossible to effectively identify, apprehend, and remove overstayers.

In 1996, Congress gave the Attorney General two years to “develop an automated entry and exit control system” that would require the recording of every noncitizen’s entry into the United States, the recording of every noncitizen’s departure, and a matching of the two in order to identify all cases of overstay. IIRIRA § 110(a). There were strong and immediate objections that recording the hundreds of millions of annual border crossings would entail horrific congestion at border points and would jeopardize trade.⁷ After several delays and modifications, the urgency levels picked up again with the September 11 attacks, see, e.g., USA PATRIOT Act, § 414; EBSVERA §§ 302, 303, and the system is now partly up and running.

2. NSEERS

For decades, United States law has required almost all noncitizens who are ages 14 or over and who remain in the country 30 days or more to register with designated authorities and to be fingerprinted. INA § 262. Wilful violation is punishable by a fine and by imprisonment of up to six months. INA § 266(a). The same individuals are also required to report any change of address to the immigration authorities within ten days. INA § 265(a). Failure to do so is punishable by a fine and up to 30 days imprisonment, INA § 266(b), and, unless “reasonably excusable” and “not wilful,” is also a basis for removal. INA § 237(a)(3)(A).

Before September 11, 2001, however, the registration requirements were rarely enforced. Few noncitizens were aware of the requirements, and the government made little attempt to publicize or enforce them. It was widely felt that the practical benefits of the information were outweighed by the administrative burdens and costs.

After September 11, 2001, of course, the government’s desire to keep tabs on foreign nationals intensified. In 2002, Attorney General Ashcroft announced the National Security Entry-Exit Registration System (NSEERS). See 67 Fed. Reg. 52584 (Aug. 12, 2002) (final rule), amending 8 CFR § 264.1(f). Unlike at least the original version of the entry-exit system, which was (a) aimed mainly at overstays; (b) meant to record only arrival and departure information; and (c) applicable to nationals of all foreign countries, NSEERS was (a) aimed at national security objectives, especially counter-terrorism; (b) designed to record a whole range of information concerning the individuals' activities in the United States, not just arrivals and departures; and (c) limited to nationals of selected countries that were suspected of harboring terrorists (and other individuals of whom the government was independently suspicious).

7. See Stanley Mailman & Stephen Yale-Loehr, The Price of Tracking Overstays, 3 BIB 179 (Mar. 1, 1998); Omnibus Consolidated and Emergency Supplemental Appropriations Act of 1999, Pub. L. 105-277, 112 Stat. 2681, § 101(b), Title 1, § 116 (Oct. 21, 1998); Immigration and Naturalization Service Data Management Improvement Act of 2000, Pub. L. 106-215, 114 Stat. 337 (June 15, 2000).

NSEERS has two components, one operating at ports of entry and the other operating domestically. Nearly all male nonimmigrants who are at least sixteen years of age and who are nationals of any of (at one time) 25 countries (24 Arab or predominantly Muslim countries plus North Korea) are fingerprinted and photographed upon their arrivals at ports of entry. If they remain longer than 30 days, they are further required to report periodically to DHS (the domestic component). Upon departure, they have to appear at one of several specially designated ports so that their departures can be recorded.⁸

As of June 7, 2003, approximately 13,000 of the 82,000 males required to register (16 per cent) had been subjected to removal proceedings, in almost all cases because of immigration status violations. Many of the latter were individuals awaiting priority dates for family reunification; often they had mistakenly assumed that their cooperation in appearing for registration would not precipitate removal proceedings. See Rachel L. Swarns, The New York Times, More than 13,000 May Face Deportation (June 7, 2003). The annual registration component of the system was suspended in December 2003. See Shaun Waterman, Special screening at ports will end, UPI (June 14, 2004).

At this writing, DHS is in the process of folding NSEERS into the more generic U.S. VISIT program described below. Apart from addressing the issue of discrimination, the expansion responds to al Qaeda's strategy of recruiting terrorists from the countries of nationality that were not on the NSEERS list. Waterman, above.

3. SEVIS AND OTHER STUDENT-RELATED PROGRAMS⁹

In chapter 4, § B above, you read about the special attention that foreign students have received in the United States, even before September 11, 2001. Since September 11, that scrutiny has intensified. Upon learning that some of the nineteen hijackers had attended flight schools in the United States, Senator Diane Feinstein proposed a six-month moratorium on the admission of all foreign students (not just those attending flight schools). Cooler heads prevailed, but a concern that the student visa program was capable of being abused by terrorists led to tighter regulation of foreign students. Probably the most significant of the responses is the 8. See generally 8 CFR § 264.1(f) (2008); Howard W. Gordon & Nancy H. Morowitz, Special Registration: A Nightmare for Foreign Visitors, Immigration Law Today (Mar./Apr. 2003), at 42, 44.

9. See generally Susan N. Burgess, SEVIS: Is It Academic?, Feb. 2004 Immigra- tion Briefings; Michael A. Olivas, The War on Terrorism Touches the Ivory Tower—Colleges and Universities After September 11, 30 J. Colleges & Universities L. 233 (2004); Victor C. Romero, Noncitizen Students and Immigration Policy Post-9/11, 17 Georgetown Immigration L.J. 357 (2003).

“Student and Exchange Visitor Information System” (SEVIS) and its post September 11 expansion.

SEVIS had its roots in IIRIRA, enacted in 1996. Section 641 of IIRIRA required the Attorney General, in consultation with the Secretary of State, to collect individualized information from colleges and universities on every foreign student they enroll. An institution that failed to provide the required information would be barred from enrolling foreign students.

Originally, the required information included identity, address, dates of any changes in immigration status, whether the student is maintaining full-time student status, and any disciplinary action the institution has taken as a result of a criminal conviction. The student’s privacy rights under the Family Educational Rights and Privacy Act of 1974 [FERPA] were expressly eliminated to the extent necessary to comply with IIRIRA. Ultimately, the Attorney General was to analyze the information and file a report with Congress.

The strong concerns of universities and colleges had left full implementation of this project uncertain, but the terrorist attacks of September 11, 2001 prompted renewed calls for close monitoring of foreign students. Section 416 of the USA PATRIOT Act of 2001 required full implementation of IIRIRA § 641 and expanded its reach from institutions of higher education to all approved educational institutions (defined to include flight training schools, language schools, and vocational schools).

At the same time, section 507 of the USA PATRIOT Act of 2001 created an exception to FERPA by allowing schools to disclose individual student records to designated government officials pursuant to an ex parte court order issued on suspicion of terrorism. Schools complying with such requests are insulated from the FERPA liability they would otherwise incur. Immediately after September 11, the FBI began asking schools for information on their foreign students. The schools typically complied, even without the court orders required by section 507. Professor Victor Romero suggests that in those circumstances the schools might well face liability under FERPA for the disclosure of protected information. Romero, note 9 above. Time will tell. In the meantime, Congress in 2002 mandated the electronic storage of noncitizens’ applications and other key documents and events. EBSVERA § 501.

Two of the September 11 hijackers had entered on student visas but had failed to show up at school to register. Especially embarrassing for the former INS, it was not until several months after September 11 that the INS sent notices to the relevant schools that the two students had been admitted to the United States. After this, Congress wanted to be sure that a noncitizen student’s failure to show up at school would be flagged. Section 501 also provided, therefore, that within 30 days after the school registration deadline, the school must notify the immigration authorities if the person has not enrolled. The same section of EBSVERA also required schools to input additional data.

Section 502 of EBSVERA requires periodic review of the performance of institutions authorized to enroll foreign students. An institution's "material failure" to comply with its recordkeeping and reporting obligations will lead to suspension for at least one year, or termination, of its authority to enroll foreign students.

SEVIS is the name of the electronic system designed by the government to meet these various statutory requirements. Internet-based, it stores the statutorily required student data and permits the transmission of those data, both among the relevant government agencies and between the agencies and the schools. After several transition phases, SEVIS became fully operational in 2003. See 68 Fed. Reg. 28129 (May 23, 2003) (interim rule); 70 Fed. Reg. 7853 (Feb. 16, 2005) (final rule). At least in its early stages, SEVIS has been plagued by technical glitches; users have identified major errors in the operation of the new system and have lamented the rush to implement the new system before it could be properly debugged. 8 BIB 696-701, 718-19 (Apr. 15, 2003).

4. U.S. VISIT

In 2003, DHS announced a new initiative called the U.S. Visitor and Immigration Status Indication Technology System (U.S. VISIT). When complete, the program will integrate entry-exit, NSEERS, and SEVIS into a single comprehensive electronic data system designed to keep track of noncitizens as they enter and leave the United States and as they interact with USCIS and other government agencies.

U.S. VISIT has been implemented in phases. As of January 18, 2009, the system was fully operational for arrivals at all U.S. ports of entry. 73 Fed. Reg. 77473 (Dec. 19, 2008) (specifying effective date of Jan. 18, 2009) [U.S. VISIT Final Rule].¹⁰

The program applies to all noncitizens, both immigrants and nonimmigrants, who are between the ages of 14 and 79. There are a few exemptions, including one for Canadians with business visitor or visitor for pleasure visas. U.S. VISIT Final Rule, above, at 77473. Under U.S. VISIT, both consular officers when processing visas and immigration inspectors at ports of entry obtain and electronically record finger-scans, digital photographs, and possibly other biometric identifiers. The goal is to create an electronic database that can be used for multiple purposes. Immigration inspectors at ports of entry use the data in the system to verify the match between the person described in the entry document and the person presenting it, and they also use it to flag any potential criminal, security, or other issues that require additional screening. U.S. VISIT Final Rule, above.

Information is also collected (again, in phases) when noncitizens leave the United States. It is hoped that, by tracking both entries and exits, the system will also aid in identifying visa overstayers. In addition the system is used when nonimmigrants apply to USCIS to extend their stays or change their status.

10. For a list of the various statutes authorizing U.S. VISIT and its predecessors, see U.S. VISIT Final Rule, 73 Fed. Reg. at 77473-74 (Dec. 19, 2008).

As with some of the other immigration-related national security programs, U.S. VISIT has generated mixed reactions. Proponents hope it will help to identify potential terrorists, other criminals, and past or would-be immigration violators. Critics question its likely effectiveness and worry that it will merely encourage increased resort to smugglers and other methods of surreptitious entry, thus exacerbating the already high rates of border death. Tyche Hendricks, U.S. Border Posts to Use New Entry-Exit System, San Francisco Chronicle (May 30, 2003). (You will see more on the latter subject in chapter 12.) The American Immigration Lawyers Association (AILA) fears that, especially if implementation is rushed, there will be mistakes that cause problems for innocent noncitizens. AILA asks, for example, whether the system will be reliable enough to pick up visa extensions granted by USCIS, so that a person whose visa has been legally extended will not be erroneously detained or excluded on a subsequent visit because the immigration inspector thinks the person previously overstayed. There are additional concerns about airport congestion and delays of incoming international flights. See AILA, Press Release, AILA Enumerates Concerns with the New "U.S. VISIT" Entry-Exit System (May 21, 2003).

US VISIT is still in its early stages; only time will tell whether the long-term benefits outweigh the costs and the risks.

5. VOLUNTARY INTERVIEWS OF NONCITIZENS

One other response to the events of September 11, 2001 was a massive Justice Department project to interview thousands of noncitizens who might have information on potential terrorist activities. The idea was to talk with people whose demographics and immigration statuses resembled those of the nineteen hijackers. The interviews were to be voluntary, and the interviewees were to be regarded as potential sources of information, not as suspects. The project was coordinated by the Justice Department's Executive Office for United States Attorneys (EOUSA).

There were two rounds of interviews. The interviewees were a cross-section of male nonimmigrants, generally between ages 17 and 47, who had entered the United States between January 1, 2000 and February 27, 2002 and were nationals of any of 26 countries where Al Qaeda was thought to have a strong presence. Approximately 3200 were interviewed. See U.S. General Accounting Office, Report to Congressional Committees, Homeland Security--Justice Department's Project to Interview Aliens after September 11, 2001, No. GAO-03-459 (April 2003) [hereafter cited as GAO Report], at 7-8, 13; 7 BIB at 1240 (Oct. 15, 2002); 79 IR at 1360 (Nov. 9, 2002). The questions were preformulated and are reproduced in the GAO Report as Appendix I, at 21-27. Some of the questions elicited personal information about the interviewee (e.g., employment, education level, whether the person has ever visited Afghanistan, etc.), while others focused on whether the interviewee had knowledge of suspicious persons or activities. Id. There seems to be consensus that the interviews were conducted respectfully and professionally. Id. at 8.

Still, the interview program was controversial. Views about its effectiveness differ. As of March 2003, senior EOUSA officials had not analyzed the aggregate data and had no plans to do so. Nonetheless, Justice Department officials say publicly that the program “netted intelligence information and had a disruptive effect on terrorists,” adding that the program “led to meaningful investigative leads.” Id. at 15–16. Of the 3200 interviewees, 20 were arrested, mainly on immigration violations. Three others were criminally charged, none in connection with terrorism. Id. at 13.

While there is no indication that anyone was coerced to participate, the interviewees did not always perceive the conversations to be truly voluntary. They “feared there could be [immigration-related] repercussions to them for declining to participate.” Id. at 8–9. The Department did not report the number of people who declined. Id. at 13 n.10.

Finally, there were mixed reports on the impact of the program on government relations with the Arab–American community. Since the overwhelming majority of the interviewees were Muslim or of Arab origin or both, interviewees “felt they were being singled out and investigated because of their ethnicity or religious beliefs,” according to immigration advocates or attorneys who sat in on interviews. That perception, combined with the interviewees’ doubts that participation was genuinely voluntary, had what many saw as a chilling effect on relations between law enforcement officials and the Arab community. Id. at 16–17. On the other hand, some law enforcement officials perceived beneficial effects on community relations. They say it gave them a chance “to present a friendly law enforcement presence, obtain information (including on potential hate crimes directed against the interviewees), and leave a business card so the interviewee could contact them.” Some interviewees volunteered to interpret or to help out in other ways. Id. at 16.

A separate interviewing program occurred a year later. In March 2003, in connection with the then impending Iraq War, the FBI interviewed approximately 2000 Iraqi nationals living in the United States. Some of the same issues arose. For a discussion of that program, see 80 IR at 693–94 (May 12, 2003).

6. “SNITCH” VISAS AND THE “RESPONSIBLE COOPERATOR” PROGRAM

INA § 101(a)(15)(S) authorizes nonimmigrant visas for certain individuals who are willing to share or have shared “critical reliable information” about either a general criminal organization (so-called S–5s) or a “terrorist organization” (so-called S–6s). Certain family members accompanying or following to join may be included. The maximum duration of stay is three years. INA § 214(k)(2). No more than 200 persons per year may receive S–5 visas, and no more than 50 per year may receive S–6 visas. INA § 214(k)(1). Although the S-category had been a temporary program and had expired just two days after the September 11 attacks, Congress soon thereafter passed legislation to make the program permanent. Pub. L. 107-45, 115 Stat. 258 (Oct. 1, 2001).

On November 29, 2001, Attorney General Ashcroft wrote a memo launching the “Responsible Cooperators Program,” in which he officially encouraged various Justice Department personnel to make liberal use of S-visas in “appropriate cases.” In those instances in which a person who is willing to share important terrorism-related information is ineligible for an S-visa, the Attorney General urged the officials to consider parole or deferred action as an incentive for cooperation. See 78 IR at 1816-17 (Dec. 3, 2001).

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. The NSEERS program discussed in section B.2 above remains controversial. A major complaint, as you read, was that thousands of the nonimmigrants who cooperated by appearing for registration were arrested, detained, and processed for removal on the ground that they were never admitted or had overstayed their visas. As a policy matter, what is your reaction to that practice? Argue both ways.

2. You might have sensed, as you were reading the material on SEVIS and other student-related programs, that Congress and government officials seem more worried about terrorists posing as students than about terrorists posing as other nonimmigrants. The commercial categories of nonimmigrants—the B-1 business visitors, the E-1 treaty traders, the E-2 treaty investors, the H-1 and H-2 temporary workers, the L-1 intracompany transferees, for example—are not subjected to the ambitious monitoring that foreign students endure. For that matter, even B-2 tourists, who may remain in the United States for months at a time, are not monitored to anywhere near the same degree as students. Why? Are there special reasons, or special evidence, to link students with terrorism?

C. EXPANSION OF REMOVAL GROUNDS

As you saw in chapter 5, the INA now devotes several pages to describing the categories of noncitizens who are inadmissible for reasons that relate to terrorism, specific terrorist activities, or associations with terrorist organizations. INA §§ 212(a)(3)(B), 219. See those INA sections and the discussion in chapter 5, section B above. The analogous deportability grounds, noted in chapter 7, incorporate most of those inadmissibility grounds by reference. The same materials also pointed out that in various ways both the 1996 legislation and some of the post-September 11, 2001 enactments have expanded the range of terrorism-related activities that trigger inadmissibility or deportability.

Recall that certain of these removal grounds require a connection to a “terrorist organization.” Most of the relevant grounds also prescribe some kind of knowledge requirement that makes it fair to hold the person accountable for the actions of the group. But some of the grounds dispense with a knowledge requirement if the particular organization has been officially “designated” by the Secretary of State as a “foreign terrorist organization” under INA § 219. The point to add here is that, in the aftermath of September 11, many new organizations have been officially so designated. See generally 8 BIB 1237 (Oct. 15, 2002).

D. SHRINKING PROCEDURAL RIGHTS

Several provisions of United States law, some of them predating September 11, permit executive officials to bypass the usual procedural safeguards in certain cases involving national security. In some of those instances the stated justification has been the need to protect confidential government evidence. Those instances reflect the flip side of the government’s information management strategies. Unlike the devices you saw in section B above by which the government has sought to acquire information, these strategies typically entail government attempts to suppress information.

1. ARRIVING NONCITIZENS

In the Knauff and Mezei decisions that you encountered in chapter 2, the Attorney General had invoked an administrative regulation that allowed him to withhold a hearing when, based on confidential information, he regarded an arriving noncitizen as a security threat. A similar provision now appears in the statute. Under INA § 235(c), an immigration officer or immigration judge who suspects that an arriving noncitizen is inadmissible on any of several specified national security-related grounds (including terrorism) is required to order the person removed and report the removal to the Secretary of Homeland Security. If the Secretary concludes from confidential information that the person is inadmissible on any of the designated grounds, and that disclosure of that information “would be prejudicial to the public interest, safety, or security,” then the noncitizen may be removed without a hearing.

2. THE TERRORIST REMOVAL COURT

AEDPA § 401 created an elaborate new procedure for adjudicating either the inadmissibility or the deportability of suspected terrorists. See INA §§ 501–07. For a thoughtful analysis praising this new procedure as a reasonable compromise, see Michael Scaperlanda, Are We That Far Gone?: Due Process and Secret Deportation Proceedings, 7 Stanford L. & Policy Rev. 23 (1996). Later the same year, IIRIRA § 354 refined several of these provisions.

The statute defines “alien terrorist” through a series of cross-references. INA § 501(1) refers the reader to section 237(a)(4)(B), which in turn refers to section 212(a)(3)(B)(iii), which in turn uses the phrase “terrorist activity,” which in turn is defined in section 212(a)(3)(B)(ii). The upshot is that an “alien terrorist” is a noncitizen who is linked in any of several specified ways to terrorist organizations or any of several designated unlawful acts. The list of acts includes hijacking, sabotage, hostage taking, assassination, other miscellaneous crimes, and a “threat, attempt, or conspiracy” to commit any of the enumerated acts.

INA § 502(a) requires the Chief Justice of the United States to appoint five federal district judges to a “removal court.” Each judge serves a five-year renewable term. INA § 502(b). The removal court then designates a panel of “special attorneys” whose security clearance affords them access to classified information. INA § 502(e)(1). Their role will be noted presently.

If the Secretary of Homeland Security does not need to rely on classified information, then this special removal court will not be used. In theory—but not always in practice, as noted in a moment—ICE would then proceed in the usual way, with a removal hearing before an immigration judge, followed by a BIA appeal and the usual opportunity for judicial review. The special procedure kicks in only if “the [Secretary] has classified information that an alien is an alien terrorist.” In those cases the statutory procedure is as follows:

First, the Secretary may file an application with the removal court, stating the relevant facts. INA § 503(a). The application is ex parte (i.e. the noncitizen is not involved) and in camera (in chambers rather than in open court). INA § 503(a)(2). A single judge considers the information provided by the Secretary and any other available relevant information. INA § 503(c)(1).

If the judge finds probable cause to believe that the person is an “alien terrorist,” that the person is present in the United States, and that a removal hearing under the general INA procedures would pose a risk to the national security, then the judge grants the application. INA § 503(c)(2). Otherwise the judge denies it, stating the reasons in writing but without disclosing any classified information. INA § 503(c)(3).

Granting an application does not mean the person is removed. It means only that the court will conduct a removal hearing, which will be open to the public. INA § 504(a). The noncitizen is entitled to reasonable notice of the charges, “including a general account of the basis for the charges.” INA § 504(b)(1). He or she has the right to be present at the hearing, to be represented by counsel, and, if indigent, to have counsel appointed. INA § 504(c)(1). The person may introduce evidence and may examine any nonclassified evidence. INA §§ 504(c)(2, 3), 504(e). Constraints on the government’s use of evidence that would be suppressible in other contexts are greatly relaxed. INA § 504(e)(1).

If the Secretary believes that publicly divulging a given piece of evidence would pose a risk to the national security because it is classified, the judge examines the evidence ex parte and in camera. INA § 504(e)(3)(A). The government must submit an unclassified summary of that evidence. If the court concludes that the summary is adequate to permit the person to prepare a defense, the judge gives the person a copy. Otherwise the court disapproves the summary and orders the Secretary to correct the deficiencies and submit a revised version.

The problem occurs if the judge concludes that even the revised summary is not adequate to permit a defense. The statute provides that in that case the judge must terminate the proceedings (thus allowing the individual to go free) unless the judge finds that both the person's continued presence and the alternative of releasing the summary "would likely cause serious and irreparable harm to the national security or death or serious bodily injury to any person." INA § 504(e)(3)(B, C, D). If the judge makes the latter findings, the court will hold a removal hearing in which the individual will have to proceed without the benefit of the summary. INA § 504(e)(3)(D)(i, ii). The Federal Rules of Evidence do not apply, and the government has the burden of proving by a preponderance of the evidence (not the clear and convincing evidence test that usually governs deportability determinations) that the person is an "alien terrorist." INA § 504(g, h). The judge may not grant asylum, nonrefoulement (discussed in chapter 11), cancellation of removal, voluntary departure, adjustment of status, or registry. INA § 504(k).

If an LPR is required to proceed without a summary of the classified evidence, a limited safeguard is provided. The judge designates one of the special attorneys to represent him or her. The special attorney (who, you will recall, has obtained security clearance) reviews the classified information and may challenge its veracity in camera. The special attorney is subject to lengthy imprisonment if he or she discloses the information to the noncitizen or the noncitizen's attorney. INA § 504(e)(3)(F).

The government may appeal most of the preliminary decisions described above, and either side may appeal the final order of the removal court. Appeals are to be decided expeditiously by the United States Court of Appeals for the D.C. Circuit. Classified information remains sealed. If the person is an LPR and was denied a written summary, the special attorney continues to provide representation with respect to any issue concerning classified information. See INA § 505. There are broad provisions for detaining noncitizens while proceedings before either the removal court or the court of appeals are pending, as well as during the interval between final court review and actual removal. INA §§ 506, 507.

Now that you have slogged through this statutory procedure, here is the kicker: To date, the special terrorist court procedure just described has never been used. Instead, in cases where ICE suspects terrorism, the strategy has been to institute removal proceedings in the usual way (when there is an independent deportability ground) and invoke various secret evidence provisions to defeat otherwise applicable defenses. INA § 240(b)(4)(B), for example, gives the noncitizen in removal proceedings “a reasonable opportunity” to examine the adverse evidence, but adds that “these rights shall not entitle the alien to examine such national security information as the government may proffer in opposition to the alien’s admission to the United States or to an application by the alien for discretionary relief under this Act” (emphasis added). Thus, although ICE must divulge the evidence needed to establish deportability, it can use this provision to offer evidence in camera to eliminate either statutory eligibility for discretionary relief or the favorable exercise of discretion. See also INA § 235(c) (special national security provisions in cases of inadmissibility). In the wake of September 11, the government stepped up its use of secret evidence proceedings and supplemented them with removal hearings that are closed to the public and the press. Those procedures are examined in sections D.3 and D.4 below.

Professor (and former INS General Counsel) David Martin perceptively traces the non-use of the special terrorist removal court procedure to one of its jurisdictional limitations. Under INA § 503(a)(1)(D)(iii), a requirement for invoking the court’s jurisdiction is a statement by the Secretary that “removal under title II would pose a risk to the national security of the United States.” (Title II encompasses the regular removal procedures and the modifications described in the preceding paragraph.) In the case of a person arriving at a port of entry, those procedures include section 235(c), the special national security provision discussed above; in those cases, therefore, the special terrorist court procedure is not necessary. In the case of someone who either entered without inspection or entered as a nonimmigrant, it is usually easier for the government to charge presence without admission or overstay. And even in the case of an LPR, a secret evidence procedure will be available for purposes of any application for discretionary relief. Thus, the only cases in which the government could honestly claim that a title II proceeding would pose a national security risk are those in which the subject is either an LPR or a nonimmigrant with substantial time remaining, and the alleged terrorist activity is the only deportability ground available. Martin suggests those cases are simply very rare. E-mail from David A. Martin to IMMPROF, Nov. 14, 2004.

SIMULATION

The dilemma that Congress faces is real: What should happen when the government asserts that the disclosure of evidence vital to its removal case would jeopardize public safety? You are an associate counsel to the Senate immigration subcommittee. The subcommittee chair has asked you to draft a bill creating the ideal procedure for adjudicating those removal cases that involve suspected terrorists. Keeping in mind the inherent tension between personal freedom and public safety, draft the requested bill.

3. CLOSED REMOVAL HEARINGS

In the days following the September 11 attacks, the Justice Department identified a number of noncitizens who, it believed, either were connected to terrorist activities or had information useful to the government investigation of terrorism. These were designated “special interest” cases. On September 21, 2001, Chief Immigration Judge Michael Creppy sent a memorandum to all the immigration judges concerning those special interest cases in which removal hearings were to be held. The immigration judges were instructed to close the hearings to the public—“no visitors, no family, and no press.” The directive also ordered the immigration judges not to discuss the cases or disclose any information about them to anyone outside the immigration courts. It barred the IJs even from “confirming or denying whether such a case is on the docket or scheduled for a hearing.” North Jersey Media Group v. Ashcroft, 308 F.3d 198, 202–03 (3d Cir. 2002). As of May 8, 2003, closed removal hearings had been conducted in 641 cases; future closed hearings were not planned.¹¹

Questions about the constitutionality of closed removal hearings quickly surfaced. As Professor Jan Ting points out, not all the constitutional procedural safeguards that apply in criminal proceedings apply to noncitizens in removal proceedings. See Jan C. Ting, Unobjectionable But Insufficient—Federal Initiatives in Response to the September 11 Terrorist Attacks, 34 Connecticut L. Rev. 1145, 1156 (2002). In this context, however, the constitutional challenges have been rooted in the right of the public and the press to have access to the proceeding, not in the procedural rights of the noncitizen. For that reason, attention has centered on the Supreme Court’s decision in Richmond Newspapers v. Virginia, 448 U.S. 555, 100 S.Ct. 2814, 65 L.Ed.2d 973 (1980). There the Court had held that the First Amendment freedom of the press prohibits the closure of a criminal proceeding. It relied both on the history of openness of criminal proceedings and on the benefits that openness brings. The question presented is whether the same result is required in an administrative proceeding to remove a noncitizen from the United States, when national security concerns have been raised.

To date, two courts of appeals have addressed that issue. In each case, the government asserted two different interests to justify the closures. First, the government argued, closure prevents sophisticated terrorist organizations like Al Qaeda from learning about the government’s ongoing terrorism investigation, including, in particular, what information the government has and what information it lacks on specific terrorist cells. Otherwise, the organization would know which cells to activate. Second, the government asserted, closure was necessary to protect the identities and the privacy of the individual noncitizens; they could voluntarily disclose their identities to others, but the government would not make that decision for them. The ACLU, which argued both cases, emphasized the interest of the public and the press in knowing how (and how fairly) the government is proceeding when it deports people. It also stressed the tradition against secret proceedings in cases in which individual liberties are at issue.

11. Testimony of Kevin Rooney, Director of EOIR, before Subcomm. on Immigration, Border Security, and Claims, Comm.

on the Judiciary, U.S. House of Reps. (May 8, 2003), summarized in 80 IR at 692–93 (May 12, 2003).

The two courts of appeals divided. In Detroit Free Press v. Ashcroft, 303 F.3d 681 (6th Cir. 2002), the court held the Creppy directive violated freedom of the press. The court saw no reason for the government to impose a blanket rule. In the court's view, case-by-case determinations of the need for closure would have sufficed and would have been more narrowly tailored to the government's security objectives. In North Jersey Media Group v. Ashcroft, 308 F.3d 198 (3d Cir. 2002), by a vote of 2-1, the court rejected Detroit Free Press. It held that the Richmond Newspapers rule does not apply in removal proceedings, at least when the government asserts significant national security concerns.¹²

4. SECRET EVIDENCE HEARINGS

As Professor Niels Frenzen has noted, secret evidence has been used for more than fifty years in proceedings to exclude or deport noncitizens. Niels W. Frenzen, National Security and Procedural Fairness: Secret Evidence and the Immigration Laws, 76 IR 1677, at 1677 (Nov. 22, 1999). In subsection 1 above, you read about INA § 235(c), which permits secret evidence under certain circumstances in proceedings to remove arriving noncitizens. INA § 240(b)(4)(B) goes further, allowing the government to use secret "national security" information either in opposition to the person's admission to the United States (thus overlapping with section 235(b)) or, more importantly, in opposition to the person's application for discretionary relief (even in the deportation setting).

Professor David Martin nicely illustrates some of the problems that secret evidence can pose for the noncitizen:

* * * Although the government typically provides an unclassified summary of the evidence in [secret evidence] cases, often such a summary is as brief and unhelpful as a one-sentence statement that the evidence concerns the respondent's "association . . . with the Palestinian Islamic Jihad." It is logical to assume that the hidden evidence would contain dates and places of the individual's alleged contacts with persons believed to be associated with the terrorist organization. With such details, the individual could mount a focused defense, perhaps demonstrating presence elsewhere at the times indicated, or offering an innocent explanation for the contacts. Lacking such details, the defendant may be reduced to providing general character witnesses, completely failing to engage what might prove to be the crucial factual allegations underlying the government's case.

* * * There is also the wholly legitimate concern that secrecy permits government abuse and sloppiness—allowing the government to rely too much on unfounded conjecture or on information that might derive only from deliberate falsehood planted by someone with a personal grudge [for example an estranged ex-spouse in two cited cases].

12. For some cogent criticisms of closed removal hearings, see Lauren Gilbert, When Democracy Dies Behind Closed Doors: The First Amendment and "Special Interest" Hearings, 55 Rutgers L. Rev. 741 (2003);

Mary-Rose Papandrea, Under Attack: The Public's Right to Know and the War on Terror, 25 Boston College Third World L. Rev. 35 (2005).

David A. Martin, Graduated Application of Constitutional Protections for Aliens: The Real Meaning of Zadvydas v. Davis, 2002 Supreme Ct. Rev. 47, 127–28.

Professor Frenzen identifies some additional problems:

Lacking an unclassified summary, the affected individual is forced blindly to guess the contents of the secret evidence. There may be a circumstance where one has a suspicion or a hunch as to the contents of the secret evidence. This then presents a tactical question of whether one wants to present a rebuttal case based purely on guesswork; what if the guess is wrong? Will the presentation of such a blind rebuttal case simply make matters worse? Or will not making any effort to present a rebuttal case be worse? If forced to present a truly blind rebuttal case, does the individual affirmatively bare his or her soul and present a comprehensive case detailing each and every conceivable incident in the past that could somehow have been misconstrued or misunderstood? Ironically, in the case of the individual who truly has done nothing wrong, in presenting an aggressive rebuttal case he or she may simply make unfounded allegations seem more plausible to the fact-finder through the act of responding to rumors of which he or she may also be aware.

Frenzen, above, at 1683. In addition, Professor Frenzen observes, secret evidence creates hearsay problems. The individual against whom the evidence is offered is prevented from learning not only the content of the accusation, but also its source. There is no way, therefore, to expose problems with the credibility of the source. Moreover, he notes, secret evidence might be the product of simple error, a point he illustrates with a real-life example involving an interpreter's mistake. Finally, he argues, the secret evidence procedure is capable of, and in fact has been, applied discriminatorily to Muslims and to individuals of Arab descent or appearance. Id. at 1683–85; see also Susan M. Akram, Scheherezade Meets Kafka: Two Dozen Sordid Tales of Ideological Exclusion, 14 Georgetown Immigration L.J. 51 (1999).

Again, the government's concerns are not trivial. As Professor Martin explains, above at 128–29:

* * * Much of such classified information comes from confidential informants, and such sources are likely to become more important in the future. A prominent theme of the reaction to the September 11 bombings, even from civil liberties groups, has been the need to rely more fully on human intelligence—that is, on operatives who can work their way into a terrorist organization and provide information on its operations. This is an extremely dangerous business, and those who undertake it need the strongest possible assurance that their identities will be shielded. * * * [E]ven the minor detail of the date of an alleged meeting could reveal that a government informant was present at that moment. Associates still at large could work back from that information to root out or kill the informant.

Before September 11 several courts had struck down, on due process grounds, the use of secret evidence in removal cases involving alleged terrorists. See Frenzen, above, at 1682–83; Martin, above, at 127 n.202. In a post-September 11 decision, Harpal Singh v. INS, 328 F.3d 1205 (9th Cir. 2003), an immigration judge had denied a noncitizen’s applications for asylum and related remedies and had ordered the person removed, all on the basis of what the IJ herself had described as “factual inferences from the classified evidence.” In judging the credibility of the noncitizen, the IJ had similarly relied on classified information. The BIA affirmed, and the noncitizen petitioned for review. The Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit ordered the former INS to produce “unexpurgated copies of the Immigration Judge’s classified decision and all classified materials presented to the Immigration Judge.” Without those materials, the court reasoned, it could not discharge its statutory duty to review the petition. The court did not require the administrative authorities to share the classified information with the noncitizen, at either the administrative stage or the judicial stage. But the court’s order does insist that the government turn over the classified evidence to the judges, at least in camera. Since the court rested its decision on an interpretation of the statutory provision that authorizes judicial review, it had no occasion to decide what the Constitution demands. Nor did it consider the international human rights law constraints on the use of secret evidence. See Jaya Ramji–Nogales, A Global Approach to Secret Evidence: How Human Rights Law Can Reform Our Immigration System, 39 Columbia Human Rights L. Rev. 287 (2008).

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. The government has offered two justifications for closing “special interest” removal hearings to the public and the press. First, it has argued, information revealed at the hearing would otherwise help terrorist organizations learn about the course of the government’s investigation. Since the alleged terrorist who is the subject of that hearing will be present to hear the evidence, and since after the hearing that individual will still be able to communicate with the outside world, does closure really advance the government’s asserted objective?
2. The government’s second justification for closing removal hearings in special interest cases is protection of the respondent’s privacy. Why might the privacy interest be greater in special interest cases than in other removal cases?
3. Compare closed hearings (section D.3 above) with secret evidence hearings (sections D.1 and D.4 above). In each procedure the government has had to balance national security needs against other important interests. Which type of procedure do you think entails greater sacrifice of individual liberties?

E. VISAS AND OTHER OVERSEAS POLICIES

Every year nonimmigrants make hundreds of millions of entries into the United States, most with visas but many as either business visitors or tourists under the visa waiver program. After the events of September 11, many Americans heaped partial blame on the visa system. There were holes in the system, to be sure. But how can the United States square its critical national security requirements with the need for openness to tourists, students, exchange visitors, business visitors, intracompany transferees, temporary workers, journalists, diplomats, athletes, entertainers, treaty traders, treaty investors, and other visitors who apply for visas and enter U.S. territory in such staggering numbers each year?

In the post-September 11 political climate, tradeoffs have been made and compromises reached. Some of the solutions target the visa system. Old-fashioned strategies like increased funding and more intense scrutiny per case have been combined with newer ones like greater use of electronic storage and transmission of data, greater insistence on inter-agency cooperation, and expedited development and installation of biometric identifiers. Like the strategies explored earlier in this chapter, the visa-oriented strategies additionally make heavy use of profiling, in ways noted below.

1. COUNTRY-SPECIFIC STRATEGIES

Section 306(a) of EBSVERA, enacted in 2002, prohibited the issuance of any nonimmigrant visa to any noncitizen who is “from a country that is a state sponsor of international terrorism unless the Secretary of State determines, in consultation with the Attorney General and the heads of other appropriate United States agencies, that such alien does not pose a threat to the safety or national security of the United States.” For purposes of this requirement, “state sponsor of international terrorism” refers to any country whose government has already been so classified for other purposes under any of several existing laws. Id. § 306(b).

As of May 2003, the State Department had designated seven countries as state sponsors of international terrorism—North Korea, Cuba, Syria, Sudan, Iran, Iraq, and Libya.¹³ Applicants from the designated countries must complete substantial additional paperwork and must receive a “Visas Condor” clearance before the consular officer is permitted to issue the visa.

13. See Victor C. Romero, Decoupling “Terrorist” from “Immigrant.” An Enhanced Role for the Federal Courts Post 9/11, 7 Univ. of Iowa J. of Gender, Race & Justice 201, 202

n.3 (2003); Liam Schwartz & Michelle L. Lazerow, The Consul and the Visas Condor—Closely Scrutinizing, Immigration Law Today (May/June 2003) 24, at 24.

That phrase refers to an intense security check performed by federal intelligence agencies. Id.

2. INJECTING DHS INTO THE VISA PROCESS

Until 2002, the visa process was entirely under the control of the State Department. The State Department's consular officers still normally decide individual visa applications, but section 428 of the HSA, passed in 2002, gives DHS a major role in the issuance of visas. Under that section, codified in 6 USC § 236(b)(1), the Secretary of Homeland Security now has the authority to administer, and to issue regulations governing, the visa work of the consular officers. The Secretary of Homeland Security may also prevent a visa issuance but may not reverse a consular officer's refusal to issue a visa. Id. In addition, the Secretary may station DHS employees at the consulates to review individual visa applications, to perform investigations, and to advise and train consular officers on issues of national security. Id. § 236(e). DHS has been criticized by its Inspector General for failing to meet its statutory obligation to consolidate the terrorist watch lists compiled by the various federal agencies. See United States DHS, Office of the Inspector General, DHS Challenges in Consolidating Terrorist Watch List Information, No. OIG-04-31 (Aug. 2004).

3. HEIGHTENED SCRUTINY AND DELAY

The delays from the elevated security precautions have been controversial. Worldwide (i.e. aside from the special scrutiny reserved for visitors from selected countries), one of the most heavily affected nonimmigrant categories has been students and other educational visitors. They are required to gather and furnish additional information when applying for visas. See EBSVERA § 501(b). More significantly, more cases are now "referred to the State Department and other federal agencies for additional screening and security approval, and the increased case load has resulted in prolonged processing time for nearly all student visa applications." Testimony of Shirley M. Tilghman, President, Princeton University, before Comm. on Science, U.S. House of Reps. (Mar. 26, 2003), digested in 8 BIB at 715 (Apr. 15, 2003). Moreover, foreign students and faculty who are already at their universities in the United States, but who leave the country for a few days to attend international conferences, often experience long delays in receiving the visas necessary to return to the United States to resume their classwork, teaching, or research. Id. at 717. The problems became significant enough that a group of 32 members of Congress wrote a letter to the Secretary of State to request that the problem be prioritized. See Letter of Mar. 24, 2003, reproduced id. at 741. Similar problems have arisen with respect to H-1B temporary workers, particularly those involved in the sciences. Id. at 717.

INA § 222(e) gives the State Department the discretion whether to require a nonimmigrant visa applicant to appear personally before the consular officer. Until August 1, 2003, B-2 tourist visa applicants and certain other nonimmigrant visas applicants were liberally excused from having to appear personally. Effective on that date, however, a State Department regulation began requiring such interviews for all nonimmigrants except those who fall within any of six narrowly defined categories. At present, those categories include (1) children under age 14; (2) persons age 79 or older; (3) applicants for specified visa categories (transit visitors and certain representatives of other countries or of international organizations); (4) certain other diplomats; (5) anyone who previously received a nonimmigrant biometric visa and who is now applying, at the consular post of the person's usual residence, for re-issuance of the same visa less than a year after the previous visa expired, provided there is no indication of visa ineligibility or noncompliance with U.S. immigration laws; and (6) any case where the national interest or "unusual circumstances" warrant a waiver of personal appearance. For those six categories, waiver of personal appearance remains discretionary. 22 CFR § 41.102 (2008).

4. TECHNOLOGICAL INNOVATION

Other parts of this chapter have noted instances in which post-September 11 legislation has mandated the use of new technologies for safeguarding the immigration process, including specifically the visa process. One such feature relevant here appears in EBSVERA § 303(b)(1). Since October 26, 2004, this provision has required that all visas issued by the United States be machine-readable, tamper-resistant, and coded with biometric identifiers. As you will see in section F below, EBSVERA § 303(b)(2) then requires that all U.S. ports of entry be equipped to read biometric data and to authenticate all U.S. visas and passports.

5. RESTRICTIONS ON THE VISA WAIVER PROGRAM

INA § 217 permits the Secretary of Homeland Security, in consultation with the Secretary of State, to designate certain countries whose nationals may enter the United States for up to 90 days, as either B-1 business visitors or B-2 visitors for pleasure, without first having to obtain visas. There are several prerequisites to designation. The country has to have had low visa refusal rates and low rates of abuse of the visa waiver program during the preceding one or two years. (There are statutory formulas for this purpose.) INA §§ 217(c)(2)(A), 217(c)(3). The country must also be one that extends reciprocal privileges to nationals of the United States. INA § 217(a)(2)(A).

In addition to these country qualifications, the particular individual must not be a safety threat, must not have violated the terms of the visa waiver program in the past, and must have a return ticket. INA § 217(a)(6, 7, 8). The person's identity and possible inadmissibility must also have been checked against an electronic database. INA § 217(a)(9). Finally, the individual must waive the right to contest inadmissibility and, except for asylum, subsequent deportability. INA § 217(b).

Even before September 11, 2001, some had questioned the national security implications of the visa waiver program. The Justice Department's Inspector General, Michael R. Bromwich, addressed that subject in U.S. Dept. of Justice, Office of the Inspector General, Inspection Report, The Potential for Fraud and INS's Efforts to Reduce the Risks of the Visa Waiver Pilot Program, Rpt. No. I-99-10 (Mar. 1999), digested in 76 IR 1117 (July 26, 1999). Soon after that, Congress made the visa waiver program permanent. (It had originally been only a pilot program.) Visa Waiver Permanent Program Act, Pub. L. 106-396, 114 Stat. 1637 (Oct. 30, 2000).

After the September 11 attacks, calls to reexamine the visa waiver program intensified. Congress responded with a series of security measures. Today, all new passports issued by visa waiver countries (in addition to being machine-readable) must be "tamper-resistant and incorporate biometric and document authentication identifiers that comply with" specified modern standards. EBSVERA § 303(c). In addition, effective Jan. 12, 2009, visa waiver travelers require advance approval, which they obtain via the "Electronic System for Travel Authorization" [ESTA]. See U.S. Dept. of Homeland Security, DHS Reminds Visa Waiver Program Travelers of ESTA Requirements Effective Today (Jan. 12, 2009), http://www.dhs.gov/xnews/releases/pr_1231771555521.shtm [ESTA Announcement]. Finally, Congress in 2007 passed the Implementing Recommendations of the 9/11 Commission Act, Pub. L. 110-53, 110-53, 121 Stat. 338 (Aug. 3, 2007), § 711, amending INA § 217(c). Under this statute, once the Secretary of DHS certifies that certain departure control mechanisms are in place, the Secretary has the discretion to relax some of the requirements for becoming a visa waiver country for countries that cooperate with U.S. counterterrorism efforts. Some additional security requirements were also added. Id. § 711(d), amending INA § 217.

As of this writing, 35 countries participate in the visa waiver program—29 European countries plus Australia, Brunei, Japan, New Zealand, Singapore, and South Korea. See ESTA Announcement, above; see also 8 CFR § 217.2(a) (2008). In fiscal year 2007, more than 13 million B-2 visitors for pleasure and more than 2 million B-1 business visitors—almost 16 million in all—entered the United States under the visa waiver program. These accounted for about half the total admissions of B-1 and B-2 visitors that year. See page 356 above.

In the light of ongoing national security concerns, some continue to call for repealing the visa waiver program entirely. One of the most prominent advocates of repeal is Professor Jan Ting. He argues that repeal would help block the entry into the United States of foreign terrorists, especially those who enter from western Europe on false passports.¹⁴

14. See Jan C. Ting, Unobjectionable but Insufficient—Federal Initiatives in Response to the September 11 Terrorist Attacks, 34 Conn. L. Rev. 1145, 1157-60 (2002). But see A. James Vazquez-Aspiri & Daniel C. Horne, The Doorkeeper of Homeland Security: Proposals for the Visa Waiver Program, 16 Stanford L. & Policy Rev. 513 (2005).

In 2002, however, the General Accounting Office studied the visa waiver program and examined the implications of repeal. Its conclusions are summarized in the following excerpt:

* * * The U.S. government has not systematically collected data on how frequently potential terrorists and other criminals have entered the United States under the program. Anecdotal information indicates that such persons have entered the United States under the Visa Waiver Program as well as with valid U.S. visas. As a result, U.S. government officials expressed different opinions about the effect of the program on U.S. national security. They agreed that the visa screening process could serve as an additional tool to screen out terrorists but only to the extent that State had the necessary overseas resources, including relevant timely information on potential terrorists and sufficient staff and facilities to interview all or most visa applicants. They said that if current visa waiver travelers were required to apply for visas and States's current resource levels were not increased, consular officers would be inundated with paperwork for routine and low-risk cases and would become less effective and alert in dealing with cases needing additional scrutiny. The decision to eliminate the program could negatively affect U.S. relations with participating countries, could discourage some business and tourism in the United States, and would increase the need for State Department resources.

United States General Accounting Office, Border Security—Implications of Eliminating the Visa Waiver Program, No. GAO-03-38, at 3-4 (Nov. 2002); see also id. at 16-28 (detailed analysis). The Report added: "If the United States decides to eliminate visa waiver status for participating countries, those countries' governments could begin requiring Americans to obtain visas before visiting their countries." Id. at 20 (discussing the European Union countries as the leading example).

6. SLOWDOWNS IN THE ADMISSION OF OVERSEAS REFUGEES

As you will see in more detail in the next chapter, INA § 207 authorizes the President to announce, each year, the maximum number of overseas refugees who will be admitted to the United States that year. After September 11, 2001, the number of overseas refugee applications actually processed and approved plummeted, though in recent years the numbers have started to rebound. That subject is taken up in chapter 11, section A below. The official explanation for the huge drop was that the extra time required by special security checks had caused a backlog.¹⁵

15. 79 IR at 1467; see also Ricardo Alonso-Zaldivar, Refugees on Hold and at Risk, L.A. Times (July 7, 2003). September 11 has also adversely affected the onshore asylum process in various ways. See Andrew I. Schoenholtz, Refugee Protection in the United States Post-September 11, 36 Columbia Human Rights L. Rev. 323 (2005).

F. ENHANCED BORDER ENFORCEMENT

The preceding subsection focused on overseas enforcement initiatives prompted by national security concerns. Those measures complement various programs instituted at the ports of entry—the land borders, airports, and seaports through which noncitizens enter the United States. As a practical matter, most of the border enforcement strategies are designed not around the specific danger of terrorism, but around more general law enforcement issues, including illegal immigration. They are therefore discussed in more detail in chapter 12, which deals with undocumented migrants and immigration law enforcement. Nonetheless, September 11 lent added impetus and urgency to those efforts. A few of the newer resulting measures are thus worth noting here.

Part of the post-September 11 response has simply involved increased funding for additional immigration inspectors and investigators and their support staffs, for improved training, and for new technologies. See, e.g., USA PATRIOT Act §§ 402, 403 (tripling border patrol deployment along Canadian border); EBSVERA § 101. In addition, commercial airlines and sea transport companies must furnish immigration inspectors with “passenger manifests” that contain certain prescribed details about each arriving passenger and crew member (electronically as of January 1, 2003). EBSVERA § 402. As noted earlier, all United States ports of entry must now be equipped to read biometric identifiers. Id. § 303(b)(2). To make sure immigration inspectors have enough time to perform thorough searches, EBSVERA § 403(a) repeals the requirement that border inspections be completed within 45 minutes. Under section 403(b), however, DHS staffing levels at ports of entry must reflect the goal of performing inspections in less than 45 minutes. EBSVERA § 404 authorizes joint United States—Canadian inspection operations along the common border. Finally, the REAL ID Act, §§ 301–03, requires various studies and pilot programs to take maximum advantage of border security technology.

G. PROFILING

Many of the programs you have read about in this chapter involve “profiling.” Broadly defined, that term is used here to encompass a range of law enforcement strategies that focus special attention on individuals who have particular attributes believed to correlate positively with the targeted misconduct. Customs officials, for example, have long used profiles to identify travelers whose appearances and habits might give reason to suspect drug smuggling. Profiles of serial killers and serial rapists have been used by police in the course of their investigations. So defined, there is nothing inherently objectionable about profiling. As long as law enforcement resources are finite and police experts have reason to believe that certain appearances and behaviors tend to be disproportionately present in a given class of suspects, then profiling seems rational. It is simply a matter of relying on credible statistics and probabilities so that scarce law enforcement resources can be deployed as effectively as possible.

Issues arise, however, when the particular attributes of the profile are the person's race, religion, gender, or other commonly proscribed bases of discrimination. The issues arise for at least two reasons. First, there can be questions whether the profiles are truly accurate predictors of criminal conduct or merely the product of irrational prejudice. Those questions go to the very premise for profiling—its rationality. Second, even if the assumed correlation between the attributes and the criminal conduct is based on solid empirical evidence, the government's interest in thorough and efficient enforcement has to be balanced against the harms associated with government-sponsored discrimination. "Rational," in other words, does not necessarily mean "justified." See Stephen H. Legomsky, The Ethnic and Religious Profiling of Noncitizens: National Security and International Human Rights, 25 Boston College Third World L.J. 161 (2005).

In recent years, racial profiling became a major public issue as exposés uncovered systematic practices of local police stopping African-American motorists with unusual frequency. The term "driving while black" made its way into our vocabulary. Some have written revealing essays on analogous practices directed at Latino/as.¹⁶

Since September 11, the issue has reemerged, as police agencies that are engaged in both terrorism investigations and immigration enforcement target individuals who are "from" Arab or Muslim countries, or who are of Arab descent, or who are Muslims, or who are thought to be any of the above. We have gone from "driving while black" to "flying while Arab."¹⁷

Professor Muneer Ahmad has synthesized some data that illustrate how dramatic some of the targeting has been. In the year that followed September 11, 2001, the numbers of deportable noncitizens apprehended rose 228% for Pakistanis, 239% for Saudis, 224% for Algerians, 83% for Egyptians, and 76% for Moroccans. The increases in actual removals for 16. See, e.g., Kevin R. Johnson, The Case Against Race Profiling in Immigration Enforcement, 78 Washington Univ. L.Q. 675 (2000); Victor C. Romero, Racial Profiling: "Driving While Mexican" and Affirmative Action, 6 Michigan J. Race & Law 195 (2000).

17. See David Cole, Enemy Aliens—Double Standards and Constitutional Freedoms in the War on Terrorism (2003); Susan Akram & Kevin Johnson, Race, Civil Rights, and Immigration Law After September 11, 2001: The Targeting of Arabs and Muslims, 58 NYU Ann. Survey Amer. L. 295 (2003); Susan M. Akram & Maritza Karmely, Immigration and Constitutional Consequences of Post-9/11 Policies Involving Arabs and Muslims in the United States: Is Alienage a Dis- inction Without a Difference?, 38 U.C. Davis L. Rev. 609 (2005); David Cole, Enemy Aliens, 54 Stanford L. Rev. 953 (2002); Kevin R. Johnson, September 11 and Mexican Immigrants: Collateral Damage Comes Home, 52 DePaul L. Rev. 849, 867-70 (2003); Victor C. Romero, Critical Race Theory in Three Acts: Racial Profiling, Affirmative Action, and the Diversity Visa Lottery, 66 Albany L. Rev. 375 (2003); Victor C. Romero, Proxies for Loyalty in Constitutional Immigration Law: Citizenship and Race After September 11, 52 DePaul L. Rev. 871 (2003); Jan C. Ting, Unobjectionable But Insufficient—Federal Initiatives in Response to the September 11 Terrorist Attacks, 34 Connecticut L. Rev. 1145, 1152-54 (2002).

these same countries were similarly striking: 129% for Pakistanis, 113% for Saudis, 111% for Algerians, 199% for Egyptians, and 229% for Moroccans. Muneer I. Ahmad, A Rage Shared by Law: Post-September 11 Racial Violence as Crimes of Passion, 92 California L. Rev. 1259, 1276 (2004).

There are several kinds of profiling to distinguish here. The two that come most quickly to mind are ethnic profiling and religious profiling. These can be conscious and explicit, as where officials deliberately target people who appear to be of Arab descent or Muslim. Or the same results can occur indirectly, as the by-products of profiling on the basis of a third attribute—for example, policies that target individuals who are nationals, or possibly natives, of countries that the government designates as harboring terrorists. In addition, some of the programs that you just read about entail two other profiling attributes—gender and age. The program might, for example, target only those who are nationals of any of several enumerated countries and who are males within a specified age range. Almost all the post-September 11 strategies discussed in the preceding sections of this chapter involve profiling on the basis of one or more of these attributes.

Peter H. Schuck, A Case for Profiling

The American Lawyer, January 2002, pages 59-61.

The furor about racial profiling is easy to understand. “Driving while black” and “flying while Arab” are emblems of the indignities that law enforcement officials are said to inflict on minorities on the basis of demeaning stereotypes and racial prejudice. This is no laughing matter. Respect for the rule of law means that people must not be singled out for enforcement scrutiny simply because of their race or ethnicity.

Or does it? Much turns on the meaning of “simply” in the last sentence. Profiling is not only inevitable but sensible public policy under certain conditions and with appropriate safeguards against abuse. * * *

A fruitful debate on profiling properly begins with our values as a society. The most important of these, of course, is self-defense, without which no other values can be realized. But we should be wary of claims that we must sacrifice our ideals in the name of national security; this means that other ideals remain central to the inquiry. The one most threatened by profiling is the principle that all individuals are equal before the law by reason of their membership in a political community committed to formal equality. * * * Differential treatment must meet a burden of justification—in the case of racial classifications, a very high one.

This ideal has a corollary: Government may not treat individuals arbitrarily. To put this principle another way, it must base its action on information that is reliable enough to justify its exercise of power over free individuals. How good must the information be? The law’s answer is that it depends. Criminal punishment requires proof beyond a reasonable doubt, while a tort judgment demands only the preponderance of the evidence. Health agencies can often act with little more than a rational suspicion that a substance might be dangerous. A consular official can deny a visa if in her "opinion" the applicant is likely to become a public charge and unlike the previous examples, courts may not review this decision. Information good enough for one kind of decision, then, is not nearly good enough for others. Context is everything.

This brings us to profiling by law enforcement officials. Consider the context in which an FBI agent must search for the September 11 terrorists, or a security officer at a railroad and airline terminal must screen for new ones. Vast numbers of individuals pass through the officer's line of vision, and they do so only fleetingly, for a few seconds at most. As a result, the official must make a decision about each of them within those few seconds, unless she is prepared to hold all of them up for the time it will take to interrogate each, one by one. She knows absolutely nothing about these individuals, other than the physical characteristics that she can immediately observe, and learning more about them through interrogation will take a lot of time. The time this would take is costly to her task; each question she stops to ask will either allow others to pass by unnoticed or prolong the wait of those in the already long, steadily lengthening line. The time is even more costly to those waiting in line; for them, more than for her, time is money and opportunity. Politicians know how their constituents hate lines and constantly press her along with customs, immigration, and toll officials to shorten them.

At the same time, her risks of being wrong are dramatically asymmetrical. If she stops everyone, she will cause all of the problems just described and all of the people (except one, perhaps) will turn out to be perfectly innocent. On the other hand, if she fails to stop the one person among them who is in fact a terrorist, she causes a social calamity of incalculable proportions (not to mention losing her job). In choosing, as she must, between these competing risks, her self-interest and the social interest will drive her in the direction of avoiding calamity. The fact that society also tells her to be evenhanded only adds to her dilemma, while providing no useful guidance as to what to do, given these incentives.

So what should she do? We can get at this question by asking what we would do were we in her place. To answer this question, we need not engage in moral speculation but can look to our own daily experiences. Each day, we all face choices that are very similar in structure, albeit far less consequential. We must make decisions very rapidly about things that matter to us. We know that our information is inadequate to the choice, but we also know that we cannot in the time available get information that is sufficiently better to improve our decision significantly. We consider our risks of error, which are often asymmetrical. Because we must momentarily integrate all this uncertainty into a concrete choice, we resort to shortcuts to decision-making. (Psychologists call these "heuristics.")

The most important and universal of these tactical shortcuts is the stereotype. The advantage of stereotypes is that they economize on information, enabling us to choose quickly when our information is inadequate. This is a great, indeed indispensable virtue, precisely because this problem is ubiquitous in daily life, so ubiquitous that we scarcely notice it; nor do we notice how often we use stereotypes to solve it. Indeed, we could not live without stereotypes. We use them * * * when we offer help to disabled people (though some of them find this presumptuous). We use them when we take safety precautions when a large, unkempt, angry-looking man approaches us on a dark street (though he may simply be asking directions). * * *

Stereotypes, of course, have an obvious downside: They are sometimes wrong, almost by definition. After all, if they were wrong all the time, no rational person would use them, and if they were never wrong, they would be indisputable facts, not stereotypes. Stereotypes fall somewhere in between these extremes, but it is hard to know precisely where, because we seldom know precisely how accurate they are. Although all stereotypes are over-broad, most are probably correct much more often than they are wrong; that is why they are useful. But when a stereotype is wrong, those who are exceptions to it naturally feel that they have not been treated equally as individuals, and they are right. Their uniqueness is being overlooked so that others can use stereotypes for the much larger universe of cases where the stereotypes are true and valuable. In this way, the palpable claims of discrete individuals are sacrificed to a disembodied social interest. * * *

This is where the law comes in. When we view these stereotype-based injustices as sufficiently grave, we prohibit them. Even then, however, we do so only in a qualified way that expresses our ambivalence. Civil rights law, for example, proscribes racial, gender, disability, and age stereotyping. At the same time, it allows government, employers, and others to adduce a public interest or business reason strong enough to justify using them. * * *

* * *

* * * A wise policy will insist that the justice of profiling depends on a number of variables. How serious is the crime risk? How do we feel about the relative costs of false positives and false negatives? How accurate is the stereotype? How practicable is it to pursue the facts through an individualized inquiry rather than through stereotypes? If stereotypes must be used, are there some that rely on less incendiary and objectionable factors?

A sensible profiling policy will also recognize that safeguards become more essential as the enforcement process progresses. Stereotypes that are reasonable at the stage of deciding whom to screen for questioning may be unacceptable at the later stages of arrest and prosecution, when official decisions should be based on more individualized information and when lawyers and other procedural safeguards can be made available. Screening officials can be taught about the many exceptions to even serviceable stereotypes, to recognize them when they appear, and to behave in ways that encourage those being screened not to take it personally.

* * *

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. Many of the themes in the excerpts from Peter Schuck's essay will be explored in the questions below. First, though, consider the question of scope. Almost all the examples he gives take place in settings where rapid, spontaneous decisions are required and more nuanced data are not reasonably accessible. Many of the government programs that you read about in this chapter, in contrast, involve conscious, deliberate policymaking at the management level. Do you think Professor Schuck's analysis of racial profiling is limited to the former kinds of settings, or would his logic, if not his specific examples, apply to the latter as well?

2. One of the leading critics of government programs that target the Arab and Muslim communities (and the leading litigator in challenging some of those practices) is Professor David Cole. Putting aside for the moment the question of the harms associated with discrimination, some commentators have questioned whether the recent spate of profile-based counterterrorism initiatives are even effective. Professor Cole argues that effective law enforcement requires the cooperation of local communities. Better to work constructively with those communities, he submits, than to alienate them by treating their members as suspect solely because of their ethnicity. The same principle holds, he maintains, at the international level; the United States sorely needs the cooperation of the very nations whom the ethnic profiling policies are antagonizing. See Cole, above, 54 Stanford L. Rev. at 958-59.

But Professor Cole goes on to question the effectiveness of ethnic profiling in another way. Arguing that the profiling programs are not sufficiently tailored to their national security objectives to withstand constitutional scrutiny, he says this:

First, the vast majority of persons who appear Arab and Muslim—probably well over 99.9 percent—have no involvement with terrorism. Arab and Muslim appearance, in other words, is a terribly inaccurate proxy. * * *

Second, the use of ethnic stereotypes, far from being “necessary” for effective law enforcement, is likely to be ineffective. When one treats a whole group of people as presumptively suspicious, it means that agents are more likely to miss dangerous persons who do not fit the profile, such as Richard Reid, the British citizen who boarded a plane in Paris headed for Miami with a bomb in his shoe. In addition, the fact that the vast majority of those targeted on the basis of their Arab or Muslim appearance will prove to be innocent will inevitably cause agents to let their guard down. Overbroad ethnic generalizations, in other words, are not only not narrowly tailored to furthering effective law enforcement, but may actually undermine effectiveness.

Id. at 976-77. As a government attorney, what counterarguments might you offer?

3. The preceding question focuses on the perceived benefits of profiling. In the context of the programs discussed in this chapter, what, exactly, are the costs of profiling? What harms result from government-sponsored discrimination?

4. As many writers have pointed out, public attitudes toward racial profiling shifted markedly after September 11, 2001. Before that fateful day, opinion polls made clear that the American public strongly disapproved of police practices that singled out African-American motorists. After September 11, the public was far more accepting of racial profiling as an instrument for preventing terrorism.¹⁸ Is it inconsistent for a person to oppose the racial profiling of African-American motorists but approve the racial profiling of Arabs and Arab-Americans in the present national security context? Or can the two positions be reconciled?

5. Forget about immigration law for a moment (and only for a moment). Suppose there were credible empirical evidence that 2/3 of the members of a particular ethnic subcategory of United States citizens were involved in terrorist activities. And suppose further that members of that ethnic group could be easily and conclusively identified (i.e. there were no ambiguities as to who was a member of the group and who was not). As a policy matter—not as a constitutional matter—would you favor having the police subject each of them to involuntary questioning based solely on their ethnicity? Would your answer change if the percentage were much lower than 2/3—say, 2 per cent—but if the corresponding percentage for the entire U.S. population were much lower still—say, only 0.01 per cent?

6. Assume the same facts as in the preceding question, except this time assume the involuntary questioning is confined to noncitizens of the same ethnic group. Does your answer change?

7. Suppose now that the targeted group of noncitizens is defined not by ethnicity, but by country of nationality, as indeed is the case with many of the actual profiling strategies considered in this chapter. More specifically, suppose the government targets those noncitizens whose countries of nationality have been designated by the President as harboring terrorists. Is that appropriate? Is it any different from other country-specific immigration programs (for example the visa waiver program, the special border-crossing privileges for certain Canadian and Mexican nationals, the special treatment of Cuban nationals, the per-country ceilings on the admission of LPRs, etc.)? Does the fact that almost all the designated countries are predominantly Arab or Muslim affect your answer?

8. What if the profiling is based on appearances rather than on more objective criteria? Suppose, for example, that the government decides to question all those who “appear” to be either Muslim or of Arab descent, on the assumption that in each of those subgroups the number of terrorists is higher than in the general population. For this purpose the police are instructed to take into account individuals' physical features, clothing, accent, name (if known), neighborhood, place of worship, and any other correlates of ethnicity or religion that they can observe. Is that practice any more or less objectionable than any of the others already discussed?

18. See, e.g., Cole, above, 54 Stanford Law: Citizenship and Race After September 11, 52 DePaul L. Rev. 871, 874-76 (2003).
L. Rev. at 974-75; Victor C. Romero, Proxies for Loyalty in Constitutional Immigration

9. Does your answer to the preceding question change if, instead of basing the selection of interviewees solely on ethnic or religious appearance, the police were instructed to consider such appearance only as one factor, to be weighed along with any other factors that give reason to be suspicious? (Again, assume some demonstrated correlation between the targeted group and terrorist activities.)

10. A different variable is what is actually done to the targeted group. Do your answers change if, instead of the government merely interviewing members of the targeted group (voluntarily or involuntarily), the government were to detain them, or deport them, or require them to register, or keep permanent information on them, or put more stringent visa or other immigration limitations on them?

11. On February 27, 2001, President Bush told Congress that racial profiling is "wrong and we will end it in America." Following up two years later, the Civil Rights Division of the Department of Justice issued a memo entitled "Guidance Regarding the Use of Race by Federal Law Enforcement Agencies" (June 2003). The memo condemned racial profiling as "not merely wrong, but also ineffective" and as having "a terrible cost." Id. at 1. It prohibits consideration of race and ethnicity by federal law enforcement officers (with some exceptions, such as descriptions of specific suspects), "even where the use of race or ethnicity might otherwise be lawful" (emphasis added). Id. at 1-2.

But the memo then adds a sweeping caveat:

The above standards do not affect current Federal policy with respect to law enforcement activities and other efforts to defend and safeguard against threats to national security or the integrity of the Nation's borders. * * * In investigating or preventing threats to national security or other catastrophic events (including the performance of duties related to air transportation security), or in enforcing laws protecting the integrity of the Nation's borders, Federal law enforcement officers may not consider race or ethnicity except to the extent permitted by the Constitution and laws of the United States" (emphasis added).

Id. at 2, 8. Note the contrast. Generally, federal law enforcement officers are instructed to avoid even legal racial profiling (except in describing specific suspects), but in the national security context legal racial profiling is expressly approved. The memo offers the example of U.S. intelligence reports that members of a particular ethnic group plan to hijack commercial jets next week, at an airport in California, and use them as weapons. The memo says, "[b]efore allowing men of that ethnic group to board commercial airplanes in California airports during the next week, [security personnel] may subject them to heightened scrutiny.”¹⁹

12. The United States is a party to the International Convention on the Elimination of all Forms of Racial Discrimination, 660 U.N.T.S. 195 (done at New York, Mar. 7, 1966, entered into force, Jan. 4, 1969), usually known as the “Race Convention.” It was ratified by the United States Senate on Oct. 21, 1994, albeit with several reservations, understandings, and declarations, and it entered into force for the United States on Nov. 20, 1994. Are the profiling features in the various U.S. national security strategies that you studied in this chapter compatible with U.S. obligations under the Race Convention?

Several provisions of the Convention prohibit “racial discrimination,” a term defined in article 1 as any distinction, exclusion, restriction or preference based on race, colour, descent, or national or ethnic origin which has the purpose or effect of nullifying or impairing the recognition, enjoyment or exercise, on an equal footing, of human rights and fundamental freedoms in the political, economic, social, cultural or any other field of public life. [Emphasis added.]

Whether any of the U.S. programs amount to “racial discrimination” under that definition turns out to be a complicated question. Several theories are arguable, and the case law of the Committee Against Racial Discrimination, the supervisory body established by the Convention, is instructive. The issues are examined in Stephen H. Legomsky, The Ethnic and Religious Profiling of Noncitizens: National Security and International Human Rights, 25 Boston College Third World L.J. 161, 186–96 (2005). The cited pages analyze two broad sets of issues: “First, do the actions of the United States truly embody distinctions based on ‘national or ethnic origin?’ Second, do they—and, to be covered by the Convention, must they—implicate ‘human rights and fundamental freedoms?’ ” Id. at 188.

SIMULATION EXERCISE

As the above discussion suggests, profiling—broadly defined for present purposes—is not inherently offensive. There are, however, many variables that might affect one’s view as to whether a given instance of profiling is offensive. They include the rationality or effectiveness of profiling the particular group, as well as the magnitude of the harm that the profiling seeks to prevent. Another variable is the classification used for the profile—is it race, religion, country of nationality, age, gender? Arguably relevant also is the degree of intrusion involved. Is it voluntary questioning? Involuntary questioning? Detention? If detention, for how long and under what conditions? Registration? Keeping information on the person? Removal from the country? Criminal prosecution? Another variable is whether the policy operates on both citizens and noncitizens, or only on the latter. Still another might be whether the attributes are objectively identifiable or, instead, inferrable only from rough indicators like physical appearance, accent, name, etc. Perhaps some would find relevant whether the profiling is based solely on a disfavored attribute or whether that attribute is but one of many factors that the profiler is allowed to weigh and balance.

19. Id. at 9. For some thoughtful commentary on the Civil Rights Division guidelines, see Kevin R. Johnson, Racial Profiling After September 11: The Department of Justice’s 2003 Guidelines, 50 Loyola L. Rev. 67 (2004).

Again, some might find all of these variables relevant, some might find none of them relevant, and some might find some of the factors relevant and others not. After thinking about them, assume the following (hypothetical) bill has been introduced in Congress:

No law enforcement officer of the United States or of any state or territory of the United States shall make any decision to allocate law enforcement resources toward a particular individual or group, or direct any question or investigation toward a particular individual or group, if the individual or group was selected, wholly or partly, on the basis of race, ethnicity, religion, country of citizenship or of nationality or of birth, gender, or age.

You are a member of the United States House of Representatives. The above bill has cleared the relevant committees and is about to be debated on the House floor. Your choices are to vote yes, vote no, or move to amend the bill. Decide which option you prefer, and prepare a speech to defend your position.

H. IMMIGRATION AND NATIONAL SECURITY IN PERSPECTIVE

Mark Krikorian, Keeping Terror Out—Immigration Policy and Asymmetric Warfare

The National Interest, Spring 2004.

Supporters of open immigration have tried to de-link 9/11 from security concerns. “There’s no relationship between immigration and terrorism,” said a spokeswoman for the National Council of the advocacy group La Raza. “I don’t think [9/11] can be attributed to the failure of our immigration laws,” claimed the head of the immigration lawyers’ guild a week after the attacks.

President Bush has not gone that far, but in his January 7 speech proposing an illegal alien amnesty and guest worker program, he claimed the federal government is now fulfilling its responsibility to control immigration, thus justifying a vast increase in the flow of newcomers to America. * * *

* * *

* * * As Deputy Secretary of Defense Paul Wolfowitz said in October 2002,

Fifty years ago, when we said, “home front,” we were referring to citizens back home doing their part to support the war front. Since last September, however, the home front has become a battlefield every bit as real as any we've known before.

Nor is this an aberration, unique to Al-Qaeda or to Islamists generally. No enemy has any hope of defeating our armies in the field and must therefore resort to asymmetric means. And though there are many facets to asymmetric or "Fourth-Generation" warfare * * * [t]he Holy Grail of such a strategy is mass-casualty attacks on America.

* * *

Because of the asymmetric nature of the threat, the burden of homeland defense is not borne mainly by our armed forces but by agencies formerly seen as civilian entities—mainly the Department of Homeland Security (DHS). And of DHS's expansive portfolio, immigration control is central. The reason is elementary: no matter the weapon or delivery system—hijacked airliners, shipping containers, suitcase nukes, anthrax spores—operatives are required to carry out the attacks. Those operatives have to enter and work in the United States. In a very real sense, the primary weapons of our enemies are not inanimate objects at all, but rather the terrorists themselves—especially in the case of suicide attackers. Thus keeping the terrorists out or apprehending them after they get in is indispensable to victory. As President Bush said recently, "Our country is a battlefield in the first war of the 21st century."

* * *

Our enemies have repeatedly exercised this option of inserting terrorists by exploiting weaknesses in our immigration system. A Center for Immigration Studies analysis of the immigration histories of the 48 foreign-born Al-Qaeda operatives who committed crimes in the United States from 1993 to 2001 (including the 9/11 hijackers) found that nearly every element of the immigration system has been penetrated by the enemy. Of the 48, one-third were here on various temporary visas, another third were legal residents or naturalized citizens, one-fourth were illegal aliens, and the remainder had pending asylum applications. Nearly half of the total had, at some point or another, violated existing immigration laws.

Supporters of loose borders deny that inadequate immigration control is a problem, usually pointing to flawed intelligence as the most important shortcoming that needs to be addressed. Mary Ryan, for example, former head of the State Department's Bureau of Consular Affairs (which issues visas), testified in January 2004 before the 9/11 Commission that Even under the best immigration controls, most of the September 11 terrorists would still be admitted to the United States today . . . because they had no criminal records, or known terrorist connections, and had not been identified by intelligence methods for special scrutiny.

But this turns out to be untrue, both for the hijackers and for earlier Al-Qaeda operatives in the United States. A normal level of visa scrutiny, for instance, would have excluded almost all the hijackers. Investigative reporter Joel Mowbray acquired copies of 15 of the 19 hijackers' visa applications (the other four were destroyed—yes, destroyed—by the State Department), and every one of the half-dozen current and former consular officers he consulted said every application should have been rejected on its face. Every application was incomplete or contained patently inadequate or absurd answers.

Even if the applications had been properly prepared, many of the hijackers, including Mohammed Atta and several others, were young, single, and had little income—precisely the kind of person likely to overstay his visa and become an illegal alien, and thus the kind of applicant who should be rejected. And, conveniently, those least likely to overstay their visas—older people with close family, property, and other commitments in their home countries—are also the very people least likely to commit suicide attacks.

9/11 was not the only terrorist plot to benefit from lax enforcement of ordinary immigration controls—every major Al-Qaeda attack or conspiracy in the United States has involved at least one terrorist who violated immigration law. Gazi Ibrahim Abu Mezer, for example, who was part of the plot to bomb the Brooklyn subway, was actually caught three times by the Border Patrol trying to sneak in from Canada. The third time the Canadians would not take him back. What did we do? Because of a lack of detention space, he was simply released into the country and told to show up for his deportation hearing. After all, with so many millions of illegal aliens here already, how much harm could one more do?

Another example is Mohammed Salameh, who rented the truck in the first World Trade Center bombing. He should never have been granted a visa in the first place. When he applied for a tourist visa he was young, single, and had no income and, in the event, did indeed end up remaining illegally. And when his application for a green card under the 1986 illegal-alien amnesty was rejected, there was (and remains today) no way to detain and remove rejected green-card applicants, so he simply remained living and working in the United States, none the worse for wear. The same was true of Hesham Mohamed Hadayet, who murdered two people at the El Al counter at Los Angeles International Airport on July 4, 2002—he was a visa overstayer whose asylum claim was rejected. Yet with no mechanism to remove him, he remained and, with his wife, continued to apply for the visa lottery until she won and procured green cards for both of them.

Ordinary immigration enforcement actually has kept out several terrorists that we know of. A vigilant inspector in Washington State stopped Ahmed Ressam because of nervous behavior, and a search of his car uncovered a trunk full of explosives, apparently intended for an attack on Los Angeles International Airport. Ramzi Binalshibh, one of the candidates for the label of “20th hijacker,” was rejected four times for a visa, not because of concerns about terrorism but rather, according to a U.S. embassy source, “for the most ordinary of reasons, the same reasons most people are refused.” That is, he was thought likely to overstay his visa and become an illegal alien. And Mohamed Al-Qahtani, another one of the “20th hijacker” candidates, was turned away by an airport inspector in Orlando because he had no return ticket and no hotel reservations, and he refused to identify the friend who was supposed to help him on his trip.

Prior to the growth of militant Islam, the only foreign threat to our population and territory in recent history has been the specter of nuclear attack by the Soviet Union. To continue that analogy, since the terrorists are themselves the weapons, immigration control is to asymmetric warfare what missile defense is to strategic warfare. There are other weapons we must use against an enemy employing asymmetric means—more effective international coordination, improved intelligence gathering and distribution, special military operations—but in the end, the lack of effective immigration control leaves us naked in the face of the enemy. This lack of defensive capability may have made sense with regard to the strategic nuclear threat under the doctrine of Mutually Assured Destruction, but it makes no sense with regard to the asymmetric threats we face today and in the future.

Unfortunately, our immigration response to the wake-up call delivered by the 9/11 attacks has been piecemeal and poorly coordinated. Specific initiatives that should have been set in motion years ago have finally begun to be enacted, but there is an ad hoc feel to our response, a sense that bureaucrats in the Justice and Homeland Security departments are searching for ways to tighten up immigration controls that will not alienate one or another of a bevy of special interest groups.

Rather than having federal employees cast about for whatever enforcement measures they feel they can get away with politically, we need a strategic assessment of what an effective immigration-control system would look like.

Homeland Security Begins Abroad

To extend the missile defense analogy, there are three layers of immigration control, comparable to the three phases of a ballistic missile's flight: boost, midcourse, and terminal. In immigration the layers are overseas, at the borders, and inside the country. But unlike existing missile defense systems, the redundancy built into our immigration control system permits us repeated opportunities to exclude or apprehend enemy operatives.

Entry to America by foreigners is not a right but a privilege, granted exclusively at the discretion of the American people. The first agency that exercises that discretion is the State Department's Bureau of Consular Affairs, whose officers make the all-important decisions about who gets a visa. Consular Affairs is, in effect, America's other Border Patrol. * * *

The visa filter is especially important because the closer an alien comes to the United States the more difficult it is to exclude him. There is relatively little problem, practically or politically, in rejecting a foreign visa applicant living abroad. Once a person presents himself at a port of entry, it becomes more difficult to turn him back, although the immigration inspector theoretically has a free hand to do so. Most difficult of all is finding and removing people who have actually been admitted; not only is there no specific chokepoint in which aliens can be controlled, but even the most superficial connections with American citizens or institutions can lead to vocal protests against enforcement of the law.

Even before 9/11, some improvements had been made to the first layer of immigration security: visas were made machine-readable and more difficult to forge than in the past, and the “watch list” of people who should not be granted visas was computerized, replacing the old microfiche-based system in place until just a few years ago.

Since the attacks, further improvements have taken place. The State Department has instituted the Biometric Visa Program at several consular posts and is preparing to meet a statutory deadline later this year for all visas to have biometric data, in the form of fingerprints and photographs. What’s more, under a memorandum of understanding signed last fall, DHS assumed oversight and veto authority over the issuance of visas, and now has personnel overseeing visa officers in a number of consular posts overseas, including in Saudi Arabia, Egypt, Indonesia, Morocco, Pakistan, and the UAE.

Despite improvements, the most important flaw in the visa filter still exists: the State Department remains in charge of issuing visas. State has a corporate culture of diplomacy, geared toward currying favor with foreign governments. In the context of visa issuance, this has fostered a “customer-service” approach, which sees the foreign visa applicant as the customer who needs to be satisfied. The attitude in management is summed up by the catchphrase of the former U.S. consul general in Saudi Arabia: “People gotta have their visas!” Such an approach views high visa-refusal rates as a political problem, rather than an indicator of proper vigilance.

Nor will oversight of visa officers by DHS officials be an adequate antidote. As long as the decisions about raises, promotions, and future assignments for visa officers are made by the State Department, the culture of diplomacy will win out over the culture of law enforcement. In the end, the only remedy may be to remove the visa function from the State Department altogether.

Order at the Border

The next layer of immigration security is the border, which has two elements: “ports of entry,” which are the points where people traveling by land, sea, or air enter the United States; and the stretches between those entry points. The first are staffed by inspectors working for DHS’s Bureau of Customs and Border Protection, the second monitored by the Border Patrol and the Coast Guard, both now also part of DHS.

This is another important chokepoint, as almost all of the 48 Al-Qaeda operatives who committed terrorist acts through 2001 had had contact with immigration inspectors. But here, too, the system failed to do its job. For instance, Mohammed Atta was permitted to re-enter the country in January 2001 even though he had overstayed his visa the last time. Also, before 9/11 hijacker Khalid Al-Midhar’s second trip to the United States, the CIA learned that he had been involved in the bombing of the U.S.S. Cole—but it took months for his name to be placed on the watch list used by airport inspectors, and by then he had already entered the country. * * *

Political considerations fostered a dangerous culture of permissiveness in airport inspections. Bowing to complaints from airlines and the travel industry, Congress in 1990 required that incoming planes be cleared within 45 minutes, reinforcing the notion that the border was a nuisance to be evaded rather than a vital security tool. And the Orlando immigration inspector who turned back a Saudi national—Al-Qahtani, now believed to have been a part of the 9/11 plot—was well aware that he was taking a career risk, since Saudis were supposed to be treated even more permissively than other foreign nationals seeking entry.

There were also failures between the ports of entry. Abdelghani Meskini and Abdel Hakim Tizegha, both part of the Millennium Plot that included Ahmed Ressam, first entered the country as stowaways on ships that docked at U.S. ports. * * *

And finally, perhaps the biggest defect in this layer of security is the lack of effective tracking of departures. Without exit controls, there is no way to know who has overstayed his visa. This is especially important because most illegal alien terrorists have been overstayers. The opportunities for failure are numerous and the system is so dysfunctional that the INS's own statistics division declared that it was no longer possible to estimate the number of people who have overstayed their visas.

Certainly, there have been real improvements since 9/11. The US-VISIT system has begun to be implemented, with arriving visa-holders being digitally photographed and having their index fingerprints scanned; this will eventually grow into a "check in/check out" system to track them and other foreign visitors. Also, the 45-minute maximum for clearing foreign travelers has been repealed. Lastly, all foreign carriers are now required to forward their passenger manifests to immigration before the plane arrives.

But despite these and other improvements in the mechanics of border management, the same underlying problem exists here as in the visa process: lack of political seriousness about the security importance of immigration control. The Coast Guard, for instance, still considers the interdiction of illegal aliens a "nonsecurity" mission. More importantly, pressure to expedite entry at the expense of security persists; a DHS memo leaked in January outlined how the US-VISIT system would be suspended if lines at airports grew too long. And, to avoid complaints from businesses in Detroit, Buffalo, and elsewhere, most Canadian visitors have been exempted from the requirements of the US-VISIT system.

Also, there is continued resistance to using the military to back up the Border Patrol—resistance that predates the concern for overstretch caused by the occupation of Iraq. But controlling the Mexican border, apart from the other benefits it would produce, is an important security objective; at least two major rings have been uncovered which smuggled Middle Easterners into the United States via Mexico, with help from corrupt Mexican government employees. * * *

Safety Through Redundancy

The third layer of immigration security—the terminal phase, in missile defense jargon—is interior enforcement. Here, again, ordinary immigration control can be a powerful security tool. Of the 48 Al-Qaeda operatives, nearly half were either illegal aliens at the time of their crimes or had violated immigration laws at some point prior to their terrorist acts.

Many of these terrorists lived, worked, opened bank accounts, and received driver's licenses with little or no difficulty. Because such a large percentage of terrorists violated immigration laws, enforcing the law would be extremely helpful in disrupting and preventing terrorist attacks.

But interior enforcement is also the most politically difficult part of immigration control. While there is at least nominal agreement on the need for improvements to the mechanics of visas and border monitoring, there is no elite consensus regarding interior enforcement. This is especially dangerous given that interior enforcement is the last fallback for immigration control, the final link in a chain of redundancy that starts with the visa application overseas.

There are two elements to interior enforcement: first, conventional measures such as arrest, detention, and deportation; and second, verification of legal status when conducting important activities. The latter element is important because its goal is to disrupt the lives of illegal aliens so that many will return home on their own (and, in a security context, to disrupt the planning and execution of terrorist attacks).

Inadequacies in the first element of interior enforcement have clearly helped terrorists in the past. Because there is no way of determining which visitors have overstayed their visas, much less a mechanism for apprehending them, this has been a common means of remaining in the United States—of the 12 (out of 48) Al-Qaeda operatives who were illegal aliens when they took part in terrorism, seven were visa overstayers.

Among terrorists who were actually detained for one reason or another, several were released to go about their business inside America because of inadequate detention space. This lack of space means that most aliens in deportation proceedings are not detained, so that when ordered deported, they receive what is commonly known as a "run letter" instructing them to appear for deportation—and 94 percent of aliens from terrorist-sponsoring states disappear instead.

Lack of coordination between state and local police and federal immigration authorities is another major shortcoming. * * *

Perhaps the most outrageous phenomenon in this area of conventional immigration enforcement is the adoption of "sanctuary" policies by cities across the country. Such policies prohibit city employees—including police—from reporting immigration violations to federal authorities or even inquiring as to a suspect's immigration status. * * *

The second element of interior enforcement has been, if anything, even more neglected. The creation of "virtual chokepoints," where an alien's legal status would be verified, is an important tool of immigration control, making it difficult for illegals to engage in the activities necessary for modern life.

The most important chokepoint is employment. Unfortunately, enforcement of the prohibition against hiring illegal aliens, passed in 1986, has all but stopped. This might seem to be of little importance to security, but in fact holding a job can be important to terrorists for a number of reasons. By giving them a means of support, it helps them blend into society. Neighbors might well become suspicious of young men who do not work, but seem able to pay their bills. Moreover, supporting themselves by working would enable terrorists to avoid the scrutiny that might attend the transfer of money from abroad. Of course, terrorists who do not work can still arrive with large sums of cash, but this too creates risks of detection.

That said, the ban on employment by illegal aliens is one of the most widely violated immigration laws by terrorists. * * *

Other chokepoints include obtaining a driver's license and opening a bank account, two things that most of the 9/11 hijackers had done. * * *

As for bank accounts, the trend is toward making it easier for illegal aliens to open them. The governments of Mexico and several other countries have joined with several major banks to promote the use of consular identification cards (for illegals who can't get other ID) as a valid form of identification, something the U.S. Department of the Treasury explicitly sanctioned in an October 2002 report.

* * *

Former INS Commissioner James Ziglar expressed the general resistance to linking immigration law with homeland security when he said a month after the 9/11 attacks that "We're not talking about immigration, we're talking about evil." It is as if the terrorists were summoned from a magic lamp, rather than moving through our extensive but neglected immigration control system, by applying for visas, being admitted by inspectors, and violating laws with impunity inside America.

* * *

Mark Krikorian is executive director of the Center for Immigration Studies. [CIS is a research organization that lobbies against immigration.—Eds.]

Muzaffar A. Chishti, Doris Meissner, Demetrios G. Papademetriou, Jay Peterzell, Michael J. Wishnie & Stephen W. Yale-Loehr, Migration Policy Institute, America's Challenge: Domestic Security, Civil Liberties, and National Unity After September 11 (2003)

Pages 5-7.

On September 11, 2001, al Qaeda dealt the United States a catastrophic blow. The possibility of similar attacks with more lethal weapons poses an existential threat to the nation.

* * *

Since all 19 terrorists were foreign visitors who entered the country on valid visas, the government also responded with new immigration measures. Many of these measures single out for special scrutiny visitors and immigrants from Muslim countries.

Under the circumstances, a renewed focus on immigration controls was inevitable. But investigation and enforcement based on nationality discomfort America's sense of justice. September 11 challenged our country in many ways. None is more fundamental than the need to improve security while protecting civil liberties.

For most Americans, the new security measures are at most an inconvenience. Catching a flight may no longer be as simple as catching a bus, but that is a small price to pay for preventing future attacks.

Other individuals and communities in the United States are paying a far higher price. Indeed, the U.S. government has imposed some immigration measures that are more commonly associated with totalitarian regimes, measures that violate the fundamental freedoms defining America's identity. As this report details, there have been too many instances of long-time U.S. residents being detained by the government and held without charge, denied effective access to legal counsel, or having their immigration hearings held in secret.

Are these measures necessary to prevent another September 11?

It is too easy to say that if we abandon our civil liberties the terrorists win. It is just as easy to say that without security there will be little room for liberty. What is hard is to take both arguments with equal seriousness and to integrate them within a single framework.

As we worked on this report, we became convinced that it is not just security and civil liberties—that is, the rights of individuals—that are at stake. There is a third element: the character of the nation. On our humblest coin, the penny, are the words e pluribus unum, or “from many, one.” The phrase goes to the heart of our identity as a nation and to the strength we derive from diversity. We believe that an effort to include Muslim communities in a more positive way in the fight against terrorism would not only serve this American value but help break the impasse between security and liberty, strengthening both.

* * *

Al Qaeda's hijackers were chosen to avoid detection: all but two were educated young men from middle-class families with no criminal record and no known connection to terrorism. Despite improvements in security, operatives of this sort would get into the country again today.

That does not mean that immigration controls are not useful. It means they are only as useful as the information provided by intelligence and law enforcement agencies. What immigration measures are able to do is bar terrorists about whom the government already has information from entering the country, and set up gateways and tracking systems so that someone already here can be found if intelligence agencies identify him as a suspect.

* * *

Chapter Two examines the recent national security measures in terms of their constitutionality and accordance with fundamental American legal tenets. We find that many of these measures violate core constitutional principles, including the right to due process, protection from detention without charge, the right to legal counsel, and the public's right to be informed about the actions of their government.

More than 1,200 people—the government refuses to say how many, who they are, or what has happened to all of them—have been detained. Many of them have suffered civil rights violations. Despite the government's determined efforts to shroud these actions in secrecy, as part of our research we were able to obtain information about 406 noncitizens detained after September 11. The appendix to this report contains these summaries, as well as a statistical analysis.

We found that the majority of the detainees had significant ties to the United States and roots in their communities. Of those for whom relevant information was available, over 46 percent had been in the United States at least six years, and almost half had spouses, children, or other family ties in the United States.

Most important, we found that the government's major successes in apprehending terrorists have not come from post-September 11 detentions but from other efforts such as international intelligence initiatives, law enforcement cooperation, and information provided by arrests made abroad. A few noncitizens detained through immigration initiatives after September 11 have been characterized as terrorists, but the charges brought against them were actually for routine immigration violations or unrelated crimes.

The negative impact of the government's actions and policies discussed in this report have principally affected recently arrived Arab and/or Muslim immigrants. Rather than concentrating its efforts on investigation, surveillance and law enforcement based on individualized suspicion, the government has essentially used national origin as a proxy for evidence of dangerousness. By the discriminatory action of targeting specific ethnic groups with its new measures, the government has violated a core principle of American justice.

* * *

We found that the new government security programs have put these communities under siege. Arabs and Muslims in America feel isolated and stigmatized. They feel they have been victimized twice: once by the terrorists and once by the reaction to terrorism. As one Arab-American community leader put it, "We, as Americans, were attacked. And at the same time, our fellow Americans are blaming us for something we didn't do."

But community leaders also point out a paradoxical effect: this period of trauma has spurred Muslim communities to begin to assert their rights and engage in the political process in ways that are classically American.

September 11 and its aftermath have ushered in what could be called the “Muslim moment”: a period of rising Muslim self-consciousness, new alliances outside their own communities, and generational change. The sense of siege has strengthened some Muslim- and Arab-American political organizations and has led them to a greater focus on civil rights, social services, and economic development. The notion of a distinct “American Muslim” identity has gained new currency. It is an identity that seeks to assert its independence from forces abroad, one that combines the essential elements of Islam and the values of American constitutional democracy.

Meanwhile, applications for naturalization in Muslim and Arab-American communities—driven in part by the increasing civil liberties risks faced by non-citizens—increased by 61 percent in the first three months after September 11. The image of newly minted Americans of Arab and Muslim descent waving flags at naturalization ceremonies is not what bin Laden had in mind when he ordered the September 11 attacks.

David Cole, The Priority of Morality: The Emergency Constitution’s Blind Spot

113 Yale L.J. 1753, 1753–55 (2004).

In the wake of the terrorist attacks of September 11, Attorney General John Ashcroft announced a campaign of aggressive preventive detention. Invoking Robert Kennedy, the Attorney General announced that just as Kennedy would arrest a mobster for “spitting on the sidewalk,” so he, Ashcroft, would use every law in his power, including the immigration laws, to apprehend “suspected terrorists,” lock them up, and prevent the next terrorist attack. As of January 2004, the government had detained more than 5000 foreign nationals through its antiterrorism efforts.²⁰ By any measure, the program has been spectacularly unsuccessful. None of these detainees has been determined to be involved with al Qaeda or the September 11 conspiracy. Only three have been charged with any terrorism-related crime, and two of those three were acquitted of the terrorism charges. The lone conviction—for conspiring to support some unspecified terrorist activity in the unspecified future—has been called into question by

20. [Footnote 2 in original] In the first seven weeks of the campaign, the government admitted to detaining 1182 suspected terrorists, and virtually every time Ashcroft made a public statement he would give an update on the number of “suspected terrorists” detained. When people began to question why none of the 1182 persons had been charged with a terrorism-related crime, the Justice Department shifted gears and announced that it was too difficult to maintain a running total of detainees, so it would offer no further cumulative totals. Since then, however, the government has admitted to subjecting another 3900 people, virtually all foreign nationals, to preventive detention in antiterrorism initiatives in the United States, totaling more than 5000 in all.

the revelation that the prosecution failed to disclose evidence that its principal witness had lied on the stand.

In June 2003, the Justice Department's own Inspector General issued a sharply critical report on the preventive detention campaign, finding, among other things, that people were detained and treated as "of interest" to the September 11 investigation on such information as an anonymous tip that there were "too many" Middle Eastern men working in a convenience store. Many were initially arrested without charges at all; over seven hundred of the arrests remain secret to this day; and more than six hundred detainees charged with immigration violations were tried in secret, without any showing that any information involved in their immigration hearings was classified. The vast majority were not only not charged with a terrorist crime, but were affirmatively cleared of any connection to terrorism by the FBI. Virtually all of the detainees were from predominantly Arab countries.

Prior mass preventive detention campaigns have been similarly unsuccessful and constitutionally suspect. In 1919, after terrorist bombs exploded virtually simultaneously in eight different cities across the United States, the Justice Department rounded up several thousand foreign nationals in what are now known as the Palmer Raids. They were herded into bullpens, interrogated without lawyers, and charged with technical immigration violations and association with various communist parties. Hundreds were eventually deported. Not one was found to have been involved with the bombings. And in the most infamous preventive detention campaign in American history, 110,000 persons—U.S. citizens and foreign nationals alike—were rounded up and interned during World War II simply because of their Japanese ancestry. None was found to have engaged in sabotage or espionage, the stated justifications for the internment.

Thus, the three principal preventive detention experiences in the United States over the last century all resulted in the mass incarceration of people who turned out not to pose the national security threat that purportedly justified their detention in the first place. Moreover, each campaign was characterized by widespread constitutional abuse. Freed of the ordinary requirement that they demonstrate objective, individualized evidence of dangerousness or flight risk in order to detain suspects, law enforcement officials resorted instead to political association, racial and ethnic identity, and religion as proxies for suspicion. The Palmer Raids and the Japanese internment are widely acknowledged as two of the most shameful moments in American history; the detention of thousands of Arabs and Muslims after September 11 deserves a place in that dubious pantheon.

These examples are not selectively chosen; there are no mass preventive detention success stories in our history. * * * While individual instances of preventive detention, predicated on objective showings of danger or flight risk, undoubtedly serve an important security function, there is no reason to believe that suspicionless preventive detention serves any legitimate purpose. * * *

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. Former Assistant Secretary of State for Consular Affairs Mary Ryan is quoted in Mark Krikorian's article as saying that even the best immigration controls would not have kept out most of the September 11 hijackers. Mr. Krikorian disagrees. Re-read Ryan's explanation and Krikorian's response. Which do you find more persuasive?

2. Krikorian calls the State Department "the most important flaw in the visa filter." He paints a picture of consular officers feeling pressures to grant visas to marginal applicants to avoid offending their countries of nationality. Having studied the visa process (and particularly the episode of the U.S. consulate in Brazil, which had employed racial stereotypes and recommended minimum refusal rates to keep down the number of visa approvals, see chapter 6, section D above), does Krikorian's premise seem realistic? In the wake of September 11, when a consular officer has even a nagging concern about the possibility of a given visa applicant being a terrorist, do you think the officer has a greater incentive to grant the visa or to deny it?

3. A recurring theme in many of Krikorian's positions is that several suspected terrorists had violated the terms of their immigration status. He reasons that measures to combat illegal immigration, apart from serving other goals, are therefore essential to fighting terrorism. The assumption is that violation of one's immigration status is a useful proxy for identifying which foreign nationals are likely to be terrorists. Absent empirical data (which Krikorian does not claim to have), does such a correlation seem instinctive? Would you expect an intelligent terrorist to be more likely, or less likely, to violate the terms of his or her visa?

4. Let us assume, for the sake of discussion, that the premise in item 3 above is true—i.e., that, among foreign nationals present in the United States, those who have violated their immigration status are statistically the most likely to be terrorists. Still, what policy prescriptions would logically follow? Should everyone who is ever found to have overstayed a visa be detained during removal proceedings, in case he or she is a terrorist? Should anyone who has ever violated the terms of his or her admission be removed and, after removal, barred permanently from the United States, regardless whether the violation was a year or a day and regardless of the family or other equities, in case he or she turns out to be a terrorist? More generally, what specific immigration control mechanisms would put a serious dent in terrorist capabilities at acceptable social and economic costs?

5. Continuing to assume arguendo that visa violators and other noncitizens who are out of status are disproportionately likely to be terrorists, Krikorian advocates laws that would require verification of immigration status during certain everyday transactions such as opening bank accounts, getting drivers' licenses, applying for jobs, and so forth. Now that you are well into this immigration law course, how easy do you think it would be for bank employees, Department of Motor Vehicles employees, and others to ascertain (a) which customers are U.S. citizens and which are not; and (b) which of the latter are out of status? Is that something that could be done reliably with a reasonable amount of training?

6. If all the measures Krikorian advocates for detecting, apprehending, and removing out-of-status noncitizens were actually adopted, what would you expect terrorists in the United States to do?

7. In the end, what do you think is going on here? Do proponents of restrictive immigration policies (with respect to legal immigration, illegal immigration, or both) truly see those restrictions as a way to combat terrorism? Or do they see terrorism as a way to mobilize public support for restrictive immigration policies?

8. The next two writings—one by the Migration Policy Institute and one by Professor Cole—both emphasize that some individuals in the United States are paying a disproportionate share of the civil liberties price for U.S. national security. They suggest that Arab-Americans and Muslims, whether citizens or noncitizens, have been specially targeted, and they also suggest that noncitizens have borne the bulk of the cost. The former assertion is taken up in item 9 below. What is your reaction to the latter assertion?

9. The MPI publication argues that, while national security and civil liberties both represent vital national interests, there is a third interest that sometimes gets lost in the shuffle—the character of the nation, as exemplified by the motto “E pluribus unum.” In making that point, the authors have in mind the set of national security strategies that have involved targeting ethnic and religious groups. Philosophy aside, they make an instrumental argument—that in the long run it would be more effective to enlist the Muslim and Arab communities as partners in the battle against terrorism than to alienate them through ethnic and religious profiling practices. Do you agree? See also the discussion of this subject in section G above.

10. Take one last glance at all three of the preceding writings. To what extent does each of them meaningfully acknowledge and take into account countervailing interests?

11. There has been some fine general writing on the relationship between immigration control and national security.²¹

21. In addition to the writings excerpted above, see, e.g., United States Congressional Research Service, 9/11 Commission: Implications for U.S. Immigration Law and Policy (Sept. 30, 2004); David Cole, Enemy Aliens—Double Standards and Constitutional Freedoms in the War on Terrorism (2003); Raquel Aldana-Pindell, The 9/11 “National Security” Cases: Three Principles Guiding Judges’ Decision-Making, 81 Oregon L. Rev. 985 (2002); Berta E. Hernández-Truyol, Glo- calizing Terror, 81 Oreg. L. Rev. 941 (2002); Kevin R. Johnson, Protecting National Security through More Liberal Admission of Immigrants, 2007 Univ. of Chicago Legal Forum 157; Peter Margulies, Uncertain Arrivals: Immigration, Terror, and Democracy After September 11, 2002 Utah L. Rev. 481 (2002) (offering thoughtful suggestions for integrating demands of democracy and security). Professor Natsu Taylor Saito has prepared a detailed and highly critical historical account that roots the post-9/11 counter-terrorism measures in the practices and desires of the FBI and other law enforcement agencies over the past several decades. See Natsu Taylor Saito, Whose Liberty? Whose Security? The USA PATRIOT Act in the Context of COINTELPRO and the Unlawful Suppression of Political Dissent, 81 Oregon L. Rev. 1051 (2002).

12. Although the EU and its member states have similarly taken serious steps to combat terrorism since 9/11 (including many steps that specifically target noncitizens), those measures have generally entailed less drastic human rights sacrifices than in the United States.²² In contrast, the harsh anti-terror measures adopted in India are described by Chris Gagné, POTA: Lessons Learned from India's Anti-Terror Act, 25 Boston College Third World L. Rev. 261 (2005).

22. For two informative analyses, see Sophie Robin-Olivier, Citizens and Nonciti- zens in Europe: European Union Measures Against Terrorism After September 11, 25 Boston College Third World L. Rev. 197 (2005); Kim Lane Scheppelle, Other People's PATRIOT Acts: Europe's Response to September 11, 50 Loyola L. Rev. 67 (2004).

REFUGEES

You saw earlier some of the debate over the social and economic impact of immigrants. The prodigious contributions of immigrants to the American economy and culture have generally enabled policymakers to serve humanitarian ideals and national self-interest simultaneously. But many discount the link between compassion and self-interest, and in no area of migration law is the perceived clash more dramatic than in refugee and asylum policy. The problems have become the subject of a sprawling international¹ and interdisciplinary literature. The pages that follow provide a small sampling of the debate.

A few basic themes recur. On the one hand, it is difficult to imagine a class of people who deserve a humanitarian response more so than genuine refugees. Persecuted, generally homeless, and by definition unable to turn to their own governments for protection, refugees are utterly dependent on the good will of the people and the governments of foreign lands.

Much good will clearly exists, but it collides with several economic and political realities that you will encounter often in this chapter. One is the sheer scale of the world refugee crisis. As of the end of calendar year 2007, there were approximately 16 million “refugees” in the world.² There are, in addition, approximately 26 million “internally displaced persons,” or

1. The leading treatises on international refugee law are Guy S. Goodwin-Gill & Jane McAdam, The Refugee in International Law (3d ed. 2007); Atle Grahl-Madsen, The Status of Refugees in International Law (2 vols., 1966 and 1972); James C. Hathaway, The Law of Refugee Status (1991); James C. Hathaway, The Rights of Refugees under International Law (2005); and Kees Wouters, International Legal Standards for the Protection from Refoulement (2009). Two excellent law school coursebooks on the subject are David A. Martin, T. Alexander Aleinikoff, Hiroshi Motomura & Maryellen Fullerton, Forced Migration Law and Policy (2007); and Karen Musalo, Jennifer Moore & Richard A. Boswell, Refugee Law and Policy: A Comparative and International Approach (2d ed. 2002); see also the web site of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees, <http://www.unhcr.ch>; Edward Newman & Joanne van Selm (eds.), Refugees and Forced Displacement (2003); Dirk Vanheule, A Comparison of the Judicial Interpretations of the Notion of Refugee, in Jean-Yves Carlier & Dirk Vanheule (eds.), Europe and Refugees: A Challenge?, chap. 5 (1997) (a comparison of the refugee definitions in 15 countries).

Authoritative treatments of United States asylum law include Deborah E. Anker, Law of Asylum in the United States (3d ed. 1999) [hereafter Anker] and 3 Gordon, Mailman & Yale-Loehr, chs. 33, 34; see also Ira J. Kurzban, Kurzban's Immigration Law Sourcebook—A Comprehensive Outline and Reference Tool, ch. 4 (9th ed. 2004); David A. Martin, Asylum Case Law Sourcebook (4th ed. 2003); Daniel J. Steinbock, Interpreting the Refugee Definition, 45 UCLA L. Rev. 733 (1998).

2. That figure includes the 4.6 million Palestinians who are the responsibility of a separate UN agency. UNHCR, 2007 UNHCR Statistical Yearbook, chap. 2, <http://www.unhcr.org/cgi-bin/texis/vtx/home/opendoc.pdf?id=4981c3252&tbl=STATISTICS>, at 1.

“IDPs,” who have been driven from their homes but are still within their countries of origin. 2007 UNHCR Statistical Yearbook, note 2 above, at 7. The political will to accept either the ethnic diversity or the economic costs of resettlement often withers even as the need for greater compassion increases. Indeed, the international authorities typically have great difficulty raising the funds needed merely to sustain the refugees in temporary overseas camps pending resettlement.

A second prominent theme is the proper function of refugee policy. Should it be a humanitarian project, designed to relieve the suffering of those who have been forced to leave their home countries? Should refugee policies rest on human rights considerations, aiming to deter human rights violations or at least to repair some of the damage after the fact? Should refugee policy simply reflect national self-interest, pursued in the name of sovereignty?³

One specific aspect of the tension between national self-interest and either a humanitarian or a human rights-based vision of refugee policy is selection criteria. Since not all refugees can be absorbed by any one country, policymakers need criteria for deciding which ones to take. In the United States, that subject has long produced intense debate. As the readings in this chapter will demonstrate, the overwhelming majority of those people whose refugee status the United States recognized in the past were people fleeing Communist regimes. Historically, those who have fled countries friendly to the United States—El Salvador, Guatemala, Haiti, and others—have had strikingly little success, as noted in more detail below. Critics of American refugee and asylum policy charge foreign policy bias. Defenders argue that those from countries allied to the United States tend to be “economic migrants” fleeing poverty, not true refugees fleeing persecution.⁴

Especially volatile—not only in the United States but throughout the refugee-receiving world—is the debate over whether asylum programs are being abused. Some believe that large numbers of individuals who do not meet the applicable definition of “refugee” are filing unfounded asylum claims, partly to buy time in the host countries while their claims are being processed. The large volumes noted earlier mean that the adjudication periods can be lengthy. Proponents of that view generally urge either abbreviated adjudication procedures or other deterrents to false claims, such as detention or refusal of work authorization. Others dispute that a

3. For a cynical view of the interests that have historically driven international refugee policy, see James C. Hathaway, A Reconsideration of the Underlying Premise of Refugee Law, 31 Harvard Internat'l L.J. 129 (1990); see also Arthur C. Helton, The Price of Indifference—Refugees and Humanitarian Action in the New Century (2002).

4. Professor Daniel Steinbock carefully examines the sometimes competing missions of refugee policy and ultimately urges selection priorities that reflect a combination of national interest, the interests of the refugees themselves, and the interests of their countries of origin. See Daniel J. Steinbock, The Qualities of Mercy: Maximizing the Impact of U.S. Refugee Resettlement, 36 Univ. Michigan J. L. Reform 951 (2003).

high proportion of asylum claims are without foundation and add that some of the “cures” cause genuine refugees to be turned back.

Refugees are often distinguished from immigrants. The former are said to be forcibly displaced, while the latter are thought of as willing migrants. The line that separates voluntary and involuntary is not always easy to draw, however, and in fact the two groups of migrants have several common attributes. Among other things, both groups are at the epicenter of tumultuous arguments about economic, social, and cultural contributions and costs.

Under United States law, those and other recurring themes are played out in two different theaters. In one category are those refugees who are outside United States territory. In some receiving states, such individuals are called “offshore” refugees. Some within this group have fled their countries of origin and made their way to temporary refugee camps in countries of “first asylum;” others are still within their home countries. Either way, they are overseas and in need of transportation to, and usually permanent resettlement in, the United States or other refugee-receiving nations.

In the other category are those who have already managed to reach United States shores on their own. They are sometimes called “onshore” refugees. They seek to remain in the United States or at least to avoid being sent back to the country in which they fear persecution. Within this group, some are at ports of entry while others have already effected entry, legally or illegally. Of those who have already entered, some seek relief during removal proceedings while others affirmatively apply to USCIS for relief before removal proceedings are brought. The substantive criteria for relief for these various groups differ somewhat, but the most important differences are procedural.

The organization of this chapter reflects the fundamental distinction between overseas applicants and those who have arrived in the United States. Analytically, the admission of overseas refugees can be thought of as simply one element of legal (albeit involuntary) migration—analogueous to immigration based on family, or employment, or diversity. This subject matter could logically have been covered in chapter 3. In contrast, when people reach United States territory and seek relief at the frontier or in the interior, the requested remedies resemble waivers of inadmissibility or deportability, respectively. Those remedies could logically have been included in chapters 5 and 8. Because these two refugee contexts generate so many common issues, however, and because those common issues differ in many respects from those encountered in the more general materials, it is convenient to treat refugees in a single chapter.

The terminology is often inconsistent. Probably the most common approach is to describe the first group as “refugees” or “overseas refugees,” and the second group as “asylum-seekers.” Those usages, however, produce at least two sources of confusion. First, the United States statutory definition of “refugee,” INA § 101(a)(42), does not require that the person be outside the United States; in fact, one of the statutory requirements for asylum under United States law is that the person satisfy the statutory definition of “refugee.” See INA § 208. Thus, even though many people use the word “refugee” to mean “overseas refugee” (as distinguished from those who have already reached United States territory), the legal terminology in the United States is different; under the statutory definition, every asylee is also a refugee. Second, just as the common usage of “refugee” differs from its statutory meaning, so too is there an ambiguity in the word “asylum.” As noted above, some use this term to describe any persecution-related relief sought by any noncitizen who reaches United States shores. Under United States law, however, asylum actually refers only to one particular remedy for persecution—permission to remain at least temporarily, and usually permanently, in the United States, see INA §§ 208, 209(b), as distinguished from the narrower remedy of not being removed to the country of persecution, see INA § 241(b)(3).

So clear definitions are crucial. In this book, as in most, noncitizens who have not yet reached United States shores and who qualify for refugee status will be called “overseas refugees.” They are the subject of section A. Those who have reached United States territory and who request relief from persecution will be discussed in section B. The relief available to the latter group under INA § 208 (permission to remain at least temporarily, and usually permanently, in the United States) will be called “asylum.” The more limited form of relief—avoiding removal to the country of persecution but not necessarily to other countries—will be called either “nonrefoulement” (the French term used by international lawyers) or “withholding of removal” (the United States statutory term). In the United States, withholding of removal is authorized by INA § 241(b)(3).

In addition to protection from persecution, these various remedies also provide a means to subsist. Anyone granted overseas refugee status, asylum, or withholding of removal is eligible for work authorization, 8 CFR § 274a.12(a)(3, 5, 10) (2008), and is also a “qualified alien,” thus eligible for most federal welfare benefits for the first seven years and again (subject to certain conditions) after ten years, INA §§ 402, 431(b)(2, 3, 5).

As you will also see, the “refugee” definition used for both overseas refugee admissions and asylum is a narrow one. It covers only “persecution,” and then only in certain prescribed situations. Many other individuals require refuge as well, and they are considered in section C. Among the protection mechanisms explored in section C are the Convention Against Torture, United States and international devices for temporary protection, and subsidiary protection under regional or global human rights conventions.

A. OVERSEAS REFUGEES

As long as there have been governments, there have been refugees. The excerpt that follows discusses some of the root causes of past refugee flows and the likelihood of their future recurrence.

Astri Suhrke, Global Refugee Movements and Strategies of Response in Mary M. Kritz (Ed.), U.S.
Immigration and Refugee Policy

Pages 163-65 (1983).

* * *

A * * * meaningful approach would be to examine the causes of major refugee flows in the past, and ask whether or not these are structurally embedded in contemporary societies. Three preliminary attempts in this direction have all concluded on a pessimistic note. One study notes a series of tension-building factors: "population growth continues . . . ; stakes in the worldwide competition for land and resources continue to escalate . . . ; unequal distribution of wealth is a source of increasing friction . . . ; mechanisms to resolve [international] disputes . . . are still too weak to keep the peace." Hence, it is claimed, "the underlying forces that contribute to the formation of refugee crises are, if anything, gathering strength." Another study is slightly less pessimistic about likely future trends in the Third World, but includes the possibility of huge numbers of refugees resulting from nuclear war and a high probability of large outflows from Eastern Europe. A third study postulates that structural weaknesses of many Third World nations will give rise to substantial refugee flows.

A more optimistic scenario can also be sketched. Considering only the Third World, it is evident that wars of independence have been a major cause of refugee movements in the past. This era is now drawing to a close; only southern Africa remains. Internal ethnic rivalries have caused some major outflows, but certainly not as frequently as the pervasive pattern of ethnic tension in African and Asian states might lead one to believe. Separatist conflicts stemming from artificial state boundaries have produced some notable refugee flows in Africa, but these conflicts typically were connected with the struggle for power in the immediate postindependence period. Moreover, African states seek to contain and moderate such conflicts. Internal conflict associated with the gap between elites and masses and an inequitable distribution of wealth is another common feature of many Third World countries. However, only in a few cases has this led to protracted violence or revolutionary wars, which in turn have caused major outflows. Some observers predict a future pattern of continued alienation but powerlessness on the part of the masses, rather than explosive class conflicts.

The main difference between a pessimistic and an optimistic scenario is that the former looks at sources of instability, while the latter focuses on actual conflicts and consequent refugee flows. Both agree that there are severe and widespread sources of instability, but the optimist notes that only in some cases have these led to conflicts that caused refugee flows. Obviously, some key intervening variables account for this variation. These have yet to be identified and systematically studied.

It is also important to note differences in outflows. Some types of conflicts (protracted warfare, international wars, and certain kinds of ethnic tension) seem to produce major outflows; other conflicts (typically elite rivalry, coups d'état, governmental suppression of critics) tend to produce a trickle of a few, highly politicized individuals. Each movement presents different problems for receiving countries in terms of relief assistance or final settlement.

The impact of outflows on the sending country rarely has been included in studies of refugee movements; yet, this is a major factor that determines whether the government will facilitate or discourage outflows. Various considerations may be relevant: fears that refugees will spearhead revanchist movements, concern that skilled people are leaving, a desire to be rid of troublesome or undesirable groups, and more.

An analysis of causes of refugee movements also should include pull factors, that is, the prospect for assistance and conditions in recipient countries. Previous studies of refugee movements have generally excluded pull factors because it was assumed that refugees moved in response to push factors. If not, they were migrants. The issue was settled by definitional fiat, but this is not very satisfactory.

A refugee program may, in itself, be a significant pull factor. Refugee programs, once established, probably tend to attract a variety of people who seek to benefit. Two recent major flows—the Cubans and the Indochinese—are cases in point. Let us assume that for some persons the expectation of benefiting from a refugee program is a major factor in the decision to leave, as well as where and when to go, and call them quasi refugees. We can then approach the question are quasi refugees becoming an increasingly common phenomenon, growing pari passu with the international relief apparatus? The quasi refugees may not necessarily be less needy than other refugees. To accommodate them may be a recognition and not the creation of demand. The point here is, rather, the need to consider how existing programs can influence flows.

* * *

Although refugees have existed since ancient times, a body of international refugee law did not really begin to form until 1921. In that year the League of Nations appointed Norway's Arctic explorer Dr. Fridtjof Nansen to serve as High Commissioner for Russian Refugees. The so-called "Nansen passport" was the first travel document specially designed to facilitate the migration of refugees. See Paul Weis, The Development of Refugee Law, 1982 Mich. Yearbook Int'l Legal Studies 27, 28.

In October 1932, during a Presidential campaign speech, Herbert Hoover displayed his prophetic powers:

With the growth of democracy in foreign countries political persecution has largely ceased. There is no longer a necessity for the United States to provide an asylum for those persecuted because of conscience.

9 IR 260, 261 (1932). Several months later, the rise of Adolph Hitler and the grisly persecution of Jews and others triggered the beginnings of what would become a mass exodus. The immediate question in the United States and other nations was whether to provide a safe haven to some of these refugees.

American public opinion was strongly opposed to doing so. Even by the summer of 1938, five years into the exodus from Germany, 67% of the Americans polled were opposed to the admission of refugees. See Robert A. Divine, American Immigration Policy, 1924–1952, at 96 (1957). By April 1939, after the gravity of the Nazi persecutions had become public knowledge, the proportion of Americans opposed to the admission of the Jewish refugees had risen to 83%. Id. at 98–99. Despite a hard-fought campaign by various humanitarian groups, Congress was unwilling even to enact legislation that would have enabled 20,000 refugee children to enter the United States. Id. at 99–102.

One of the most infamous episodes was that of the SS St. Louis. Professor Bill Ong Hing relates the details:

The plight of European Jews fleeing Nazi Germany aboard the ship SS St. Louis in 1939 is a horrific example of how restrictionist views were manifested toward refugees at the time. In a diabolical propaganda ploy in the spring of 1939, the Nazis had allowed this ship carrying destitute European Jewish refugees to leave Hamburg bound for Cuba but had arranged for corrupt Cuban officials to deny them entry even after they had been granted visas. The German propaganda machine sought to demonstrate that no country wanted the Jews, and the world obliged. The St. Louis was not allowed to discharge its passengers and was ordered out of Havana harbor. As it sailed north, it neared U.S. territorial waters, yet the U.S. Coast Guard warned it away. President Franklin D. Roosevelt had said that the United States could not accept any more European refugees because of immigration quotas, as untold thousands had already fled Nazi terror in Central Europe, and many had come to the Depression-racked United States.

Nearly two months after leaving Hamburg and due to the efforts of U.S. Jewish refugee assistance groups, the ship was allowed to land in Holland. Four nations agreed to accept the refugees—Great Britain, Holland, Belgium, and France. Two months later, the Nazis invaded Poland, and the Second World War began. Over 600 of the 937 passengers on the St. Louis were killed by the Nazis before the war was over. When the United States refused the St. Louis permission to land, many Americans were embarrassed; when the country discovered after the war what happened to the refugees, there was shame.

Bill Ong Hing, No Place for Angels: In Reaction to Kevin Johnson, 2000 Univ. Illinois L. Rev. 559, 590–91.

The reasons for the relentless restrictionism of the 1930's were varied and not always easy to decipher. A clear contributor was the Depression.

With millions of Americans out of work, many were unwilling to admit those who with whom they would be competing for jobs. Other Americans feared that the refugee population contained subversive elements who would poison the United States with their radical views and their activities. Anti-semitism was clearly an additional factor, though historians differ as to its magnitude and its impact. See Divine, above, ch. 5.

From a legal standpoint, the major obstacle to the admission of refugees was that the law contained no special provision exempting them from the restrictions generally applicable to immigrants. Restrictionists often argued that the existing laws were adequate and that refugees could come in, just like anyone else, whenever they met United States immigration standards. As a practical matter, of course, refugees ordinarily could not satisfy the general requirements. Most were destitute and thus inadmissible as likely to become public charges. Even those who could somehow clear that hurdle were subject to backlogged quotas that kept out all but a tiny proportion. The Roosevelt administration bowed to public opinion and refrained from asking Congress to liberalize the immigration laws, but the Administration did take some limited executive measures to admit a few thousand refugees during the pre-war period. Divine, above, at 102-03. Those measures were greatly expanded once the United States entered World War II. From 1941 to 1945, various administrative acts resulted in the admission of approximately 250,000 European refugees. Id. at 104.

The war itself produced millions of additional refugees, as the following excerpt explains:

Robert A. Divine, American Immigration Policy, 1924-1952

Pages 110-12 (1957).

* * *

The displaced persons problem was a direct outgrowth of the war. When the Allies surveyed the population of the liberated enemy territory in the summer of 1945, they found eight million people in Germany, Austria, and Italy who had been displaced from their homes in other parts of Europe. The Nazi policy of importing vast numbers of forced laborers from conquered territory to fill the manpower needs of the German industrial system accounted for the great bulk of these uprooted peoples. The Germans had drawn upon all areas of Europe for involuntary workers, but the majority had come from central Europe, particularly Poland and the Baltic states. A second source of displaced persons was the large number of people who had fled before the Russian advance across Poland and into Germany in 1944 and 1945. Some had retreated into Germany out of fear or hatred of Communism, others simply to escape the zone of combat between the opposing armies. The Jewish victims of Nazi persecution who survived the mass exterminations in the concentration camps formed a third and much smaller category of displaced persons. In addition to these people who were in the occupied zones in 1945, there was a continuing stream of refugees which flowed into Germany and Austria from eastern Europe after the war's end. At first largely composed of Jews fleeing from anti-Semitic outbursts in Poland, the movement developed into an exodus by people of all faiths from the Communist nations of eastern and central Europe.

The first attempt to cope with the problem came at the Yalta Conference, where the Allied governments agreed on procedures for the repatriation of displaced persons. In the summer and fall of 1948 seven million people returned to their native countries under this agreement. However, the establishment of Communist regimes in the countries of eastern Europe prevented the easy consummation of the repatriation process. Approximately one million displaced natives of eastern Europe refused to go back to their countries of origin because they feared persecution by the newly instituted Communist governments. The Russians demanded their forcible repatriation, but the American, British, and French governments took a firm stand against involuntary return. This decision in effect committed the three governments to the custodianship of the one million displaced persons in their zones of Germany, Austria, and Italy. Having made the commitment, the democratic nations were faced with the difficult problem of how to dispose of the refugees, and while they groped for a final answer, they supported the homeless in temporary camps, with 600,000 under American care.

The presence of more than four million Volksdeutsche or German expellees in Western Germany further complicated the problem. At the Potsdam conference the democratic nations agreed to a Russian proposal for the transfer of all people of German ethnic origin from Czechoslovakia, Poland, and Hungary to Germany. This entailed not only the movement of Germans living in territory ceded to Poland and Czechoslovakia at the end of the war, but also the transfer of people of German descent who had lived in eastern Europe for centuries. A total of about twelve million people was involved in this gigantic transfer, which resulted in a critical population surplus in Germany. In view of this situation, the American, British, and French governments could not solve the displaced persons problem by disbanding the camps and forcing the displaced persons onto the already overburdened German economy.

By 1947 it had become apparent that the only feasible solution to the problem was to resettle the displaced persons outside of Germany. In order to carry out a resettlement program, the United Nations established the International Refugee Organization (IRO) supported by the United States, Canada, Australia, and the free countries of western Europe. The IRO provided the vehicle for resettlement, but it could be successful only if each of the member nations agreed to accept a portion of the group for permanent residence. * * *

* * *

As the preceding excerpt notes, the success of the international effort hinged ultimately on the responses of individual nations. In the United States, the path to ameliorative legislation was a tortured one. All the objections that had surfaced during the 1930's resurfaced after the war: Refugees would compete with Americans for jobs. Refugees might harbor subversive sympathies. Refugees should remain in Europe to help out with reconstruction. The admission of refugees would upset the national origins quota system then in place.

In 1948 the United States finally enacted displaced persons legislation. See Act of June 25, 1948, ch. 647, 62 Stat. 1009. Some members of Congress cited moral and compassionate reasons. Others felt that relieving the population pressures on the western European nations would make those countries stronger bulwarks against Communism. See Divine, above, ch. 6.

To gain the votes of the restrictionists, however, the refugee advocates had to make significant concessions:

First, the bill limited the number to 100,000 over a two-year period, only one-fourth the total in the Stratton bill, on the grounds that a greater number would be harmful to the American economy. In the second place, the subcommittee limited the program to those people who were registered as displaced persons on December 22, 1945, the date of President Truman's directive. This early cut-off date excluded some 100,000 people, mainly Jews, who had entered the camps in 1946 and early 1947. The subcommittee justified this provision on the grounds that help should be extended only to those people who had been directly displaced by the war.

Divine, above, at 120. President Truman and others denounced those restrictions as numerically insufficient and reflective of anti-semitism and, to a lesser extent, anti-Catholicism. After protracted battles, and despite the staunch opposition of Senate Judiciary Committee chair Pat McCarran (co-author of the 1952 Immigration and Nationality Act now in force) to any liberalization of the refugee laws, public opinion gradually softened. In 1950 Congress amended the 1948 Act. The 1950 legislation paved the way for the admission of more than 400,000 refugees and extended eligibility to those who had been displaced before January 1, 1949. The Act thus ended the exclusion of those Jewish refugees who had fled anti-semitism at the end of the war. See Divine, above, ch. 7.

At about the same time, the international community recognized the need for a permanent successor to the now defunct International Refugee Organization. The United Nations responded in 1950 by establishing the Office of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees (UNHCR).

Guy S. Goodwin-Gill & Jane McAdam, The Refugee in International Law

Pages 426–27 (3d ed. 2007).

At its 1950 session, the General Assembly formally adopted the Statute of UNHCR as an annexe to Resolution 428(V), in which it also called upon governments to co-operate with the Office. The functions of UNHCR encompass "providing international protection" and "seeking permanent solutions" to the problems of refugees by way of voluntary repatriation or assimilation in new national communities. The Statute expressly provides that "the work of the High Commissioner shall be of an entirely non-political character; it shall be humanitarian and social and shall relate, as a rule, to groups and categories of refugees." Of the two functions, the provision of international protection is of primary importance, for without protection, such as intervention by the Office to secure admission and non-refoulement of refugees, there can be no possibility of finding lasting solutions.

Besides defining refugees, the UNHCR Statute prescribes the relationship of the High Commissioner with the General Assembly and the Economic and Social Council (ECOSOC), makes provision for organization and finance, and identifies ways in which the High Commissioner is to provide for protection. These develop the functions engaged in by predecessor organizations and include: (1) promoting the conclusion of international conventions for the protection of refugees, supervising their application and proposing amendments thereto; (2) promoting through special agreements with governments the execution of any measures calculated to improve the situation of refugees and to reduce the number requiring protection; and (3) promoting the admission of refugees.

Notwithstanding the statutory injunction that the work of the Office shall relate, as a rule, to groups and categories of refugees, a major part of UNHCR's protection work has long been concerned with individual cases, as was that of its predecessor organizations. No state has objected to UNHCR taking up individual cases as such, although states may, and do, question whether an individual is indeed a refugee. Nevertheless, the individual dimension to the protection function is a natural corollary to the declared task of supervising the application of international conventions. Such instruments define refugees in essentially individualistic terms and provide rights on behalf of refugees which can only be understood in the sense of the particular. The acquiescence of states in the individual protection function of UNHCR, however, significantly delineates both the competence of the Office and the status of the individual refugee in international law.

The UNHCR cooperates with private agencies, national authorities, other U.N. organizations, and the International Organization for Migration (IOM), an important association of refugee-receiving nations that coordinates much of the resettlement work. See generally Marjoleine Zieck, UNHCR's Worldwide Presence in the Field (2006).

A year after the creation of UNHCR, the United Nations took another major step. It adopted the 1951 Convention Relating to the Status of Refugees, 189 U.N.T.S. 137, accepted by United Nations Conference of Plenipotentiaries on the Status of Refugees and Stateless Persons, signed at Geneva, July 28, 1951 [hereafter cited as 1951 Convention]. Most members of the United Nations, including most of the western European nations and Canada, signed the Convention, but the United States held off until 1968, when it became a party indirectly by acceding to the 1967 Protocol discussed below. As of January 23, 2007, some 141 nations had signed both the 1951 Convention and the 1967 Protocol, and another 6 had signed one but not the other. 26 Refugee Survey Quarterly #1 at 190 (2007).

Article I of the 1951 Convention defines the term “refugee” (more on that in a moment), and articles 3 through 34 require each signatory to accord certain protections to those refugees physically within its territory. With some qualifications, the protections include non-discrimination, religious freedom, access to court, work permits, education, welfare, labor laws, and free movement within the country. See arts. 3, 4, 16, 17, 22–24, 26–28. As you will see in the next section, article 33 of the Convention codifies the principle of nonrefoulement. Importantly, however, nothing in the 1951 Convention (or in the 1967 Protocol discussed below) requires any nation to admit overseas refugees in the first place. Moreover, the Convention and Protocol allow parties to exclude certain categories of people from protection—mainly those firmly resettled elsewhere, those guilty of certain major international crimes, and certain other criminal offenders. Some exclusions nullify only the protection against refoulement, while others render the entire Convention (and therefore all the protections afforded refugees) inoperative. See subsection B.5 below.

UNHCR is charged with supervising the implementation of the 1951 Convention, and the states parties have explicitly agreed to cooperate with UNHCR in the performance of that function. 1951 Convention, art. 35.1; see generally Volker Türk, UNHCR’S Supervisory Responsibility, 14 Revue Québécoise de Droit International 135 (2001). In practice, its protection role also incorporates assistance to refugees and delivery of services. One scholar argues that UNHCR has placed undue emphasis on assistance at the expense of its protection mandate, particularly in the context of the extraordinary physical violence that afflicts many of the refugee camps. He offers thoughtful explanations, grounded in organizational theory, for UNHCR’s priorities. See Mariano–Florentino Cuellar, Refugee Security and the Organizational Logic of Legal Mandates, 37 Georgetown J. Internat’l L. 583 (2006). Note also that neither the Convention nor any other source of international law gives UNHCR powers to issue binding interpretations of the Convention or otherwise compel compliance. Professor James Hathaway has advocated the creation of an international entity that would play a broader oversight role.⁵

5. See James C. Hathaway, Who Should Watch Over Refugee Law?, 14 Forced Migration Rev. 23 (2002); see also Susan F. Martin, Forced Migration and Professionalism, 35 Internat’l Migration Rev. 226 (2001)

(urging greater professionalization in training of international refugee workers); Anthony M. North & Joyce Chia, Towards Convergence in the Interpretation of the Refugee Convention: A Proposal for the Establishment

In the United States, meanwhile, no statute generally authorized the admission of refugees. During the 1950's and 1960's, Congress occasionally passed ad hoc legislation to deal with specific crises. See United States Congressional Research Service, Review of U.S. Refugee Resettlement Programs and Policies 7-11 (Comm. Print, Senate Comm. on the Judiciary, 1980). In addition, various Attorneys General often used their powers under INA § 212(d)(5) to parole groups of refugees into the United States. Notable examples include Hungarians who fled their country after the Soviet Union had crushed the 1956 revolution and Cubans who left their country after Castro had seized power. Id.; see also James L. Carlin, Significant Refugee Crises Since World War II and the Response of the International Community, 1982 Michigan Yearbook Internat'l Legal Studies 3.

In retrospect, it seems extraordinary that the parole power, which had been intended principally as a device for according temporary relief to individuals, would become a numerically significant component of the nation's legal immigration system. Relying on parole for that purpose proved unsatisfying. From the standpoint of the parolee, there were no meaningful criteria for qualifying and virtually no procedural protection when a request for parole was turned down. Moreover, since even a person who receives parole has not technically been "admitted" (see chapter 7, section A), a parolee can be removed from the country at any time and for almost any reason. From Congress's viewpoint, the executive practice of mass parole precluded legislative input into national policy decisions that had sweeping domestic and international effects.

In 1965 Congress revamped the entire system of quotas and preferences. The change most pertinent here was the creation of a "seventh preference" for those who feared persecution and were fleeing either a "Communist-dominated" country or a country "within the general area of the Middle East." Pub.L. 89-236, § 3, 79 Stat. 911, 913 (Oct. 3, 1965), amending INA § 203(a)(7). The same preference category covered anyone who had been "uprooted by catastrophic natural calamity." Id.

This solution was, however, very limited. Apart from its ideological and geographic limitations, the new law reserved for the seventh preference only 6% of the total numerically restricted immigrant visas. Moreover, the seventh preference resulted only in "conditional" status, though one could then apply for adjustment of status to permanent residence after two years. Id., adding INA § 203(g) (now repealed).

In 1967 the United Nations adopted the Protocol Relating to the Status of Refugees, 606 U.N.T.S. 267, 19 U.S.T. 6223, T.I.A.S. No. 6577, done at New York, January 31, 1967 [hereafter cited as the 1967 Protocol]. The 1951 Convention had limited the definition of "refugee" to those who had fled as a result of the specific events occurring in Europe before January 1, 1951. See 1951 Convention, art. 1. The 1967 Protocol removed that limitation, thus leaving the international community with a more generic refugee agreement. In 1968 the United States acceded to the 1967 Protocol; by that action it accepted the 1951 Convention as modified. 19 U.S.T. 6223, 6257 (1968).

The 1960's and 1970's saw further refugee flows. Czechs fled the Soviet invasion of 1968. Various events in Ethiopia induced well over a million people to flee to Somalia and the Sudan during the late 1960's and 1970's. The Indian-Pakistani war of 1971 resulted in a migration of millions from Pakistan to India. President Idi Amin of Uganda in 1972 expelled thousands of Asians. Several hundred thousand fled former Portuguese colonies in Africa in the mid-1970's. Soviet Jews began receiving exit permits that enabled many of them to escape anti-Semitic persecution. About 250,000 people fled Rhodesia (now Zimbabwe) in the late 1970's, at the peak of the military actions that preceded independence. After the end of the Vietnam War in 1975, hundreds of thousands fled that country, by boat and by land. See generally Carlin, above, at 5-21. Professor Susan Akram has examined the unique legal status of the Palestinian refugees and the corresponding protection gaps in the present international framework. See Susan M. Akram, Palestinian Refugees and Their Legal Status: Rights, Politics, and Implications for a Just Solution, 31/3 J. Palestine Studies No. 123, at 36 et seq. (2002).

In the United States, the seventh preference conditional entry program had become painfully inadequate. For one thing, the annual ceiling (17,400) was unrealistically low relative to the staggering size of the world refugee population. Of particular concern were the huge numbers of refugees from Indochina during the 1970's. Not surprisingly, Presidents largely bypassed the seventh preference conditional entry program and continued instead to use the parole power to admit large groups of refugees. Hundreds of thousands of Cubans, hundreds of thousands from Indochina, and several thousand Soviet and Eastern European refugees were paroled into the United States after 1965; other groups benefitted from ad hoc legislation.⁶ The central objective of the 1965 refugee reforms—to replace the use of the parole power with a more structured regime for admitting refugees—simply had not been attained.

The 1965 conditional entry program was inadequate for other, more fundamental reasons: It covered only those who were fleeing Communist-dominated countries or Middle East countries. Those who were fleeing repressive non-Communist governments (outside the Middle East) received no protection. Moreover, the continued use of the parole program left Congress with the same frustrations that had prompted it to enact the seventh preference in the first place—the unlimited executive discretion, 6. See United States Cong. Research Service, Report to Comm. on the Judiciary, United States Senate, Comm. Print, 96th Cong., 2d Sess. (1980) at 12-15; Deborah E.

Anker & Michael H. Posner, The Forty Year Crisis: A Legislative History of the Refugee Act of 1980, 19 San Diego L.Rev. 9, 12-20 (1981).

the absence of a meaningful congressional role, and the uncertain consequences of parole for the individual.

These and other problems that will be discussed later led Congress to enact the first comprehensive refugee legislation in U.S. history. The Refugee Act of 1980, Pub.L. 96-212, 94 Stat. 102 (March 17, 1980), added several new provisions to the Immigration and Nationality Act and amended many others. It is now the principal domestic statutory law governing both overseas refugees and, as you will see in section B, noncitizens who have reached United States territory and seek either asylum or nonrefoulement.

The 1980 Act provided the first United States statutory definition of "refugee." The definition, which appears in INA § 101(a)(42), is modeled upon that of the 1951 Convention, as amended by the 1967 Protocol.⁷ The statutory definition requires "persecution or a well-founded fear of persecution on account of race, religion, nationality, membership in a particular social group, or political opinion." By deleting all ideological and geographic limitations, the new definition addressed a crucial failing of the old seventh preference program. Because the refugee definition is also relevant to asylees, the various interpretation problems raised by section 101(a)(42) will be deferred to section B.

Under INA § 207(a), also added by the Refugee Act of 1980, the President makes an annual determination of how many refugees may be admitted in the upcoming fiscal year. The same Presidential Determination specifies how that total is to be allocated among refugees fleeing various countries and regions of the world. There are no upper or lower limits on the numbers the President may choose. Recognizing the sudden and unpredictable nature of refugee flows, Congress also authorized the President to provide additional slots if an "unforeseen emergency refugee situation" arises that cannot be accommodated by the originally announced quota. INA § 207(b). Not until 1999, when the world responded to the bloodshed in Kosovo, was the latter power ever exercised.

Before making any of those determinations the President must engage in "appropriate consultation" with Congress. INA §§ 207(a)(1, 2, 3), 207(b). The consultation requirement reflects Congress's dissatisfaction with its negligible role in many of the previous refugee admission programs and is spelled out in detail in INA § 207(d, e).

Subject to the Presidential Determinations of total worldwide ceilings and geographic distribution, the Secretary of Homeland Security may admit any refugee who is not "firmly resettled in any foreign country," is of "special humanitarian concern to the United States," and is "admissible" (with some exemptions from the admissibility requirement). INA § 207(c)(1). You will see more in section B on the meaning of "firmly resettled." As for admissibility, refugees are automatically exempted from

7. The Convention definition, however, extends only to those who are outside their countries of nationality. See 1951 Convention, art. I. The United States statutory definition, INA § 101(a)(42), omits that limitation.

any refugee who is not “firmly resettled in any foreign country,” is of “special humanitarian concern to the United States,” and is “admissible” (with some exemptions from the admissibility requirement). INA § 207(c)(1). You will see more in section B on the meaning of “firmly resettled.” As for admissibility, refugees are automatically exempted from certain exclusion grounds (labor certification, public charge, and required documents), and the Secretary has the discretion to waive most others. INA § 207(c)(3). Spouses and children accompanying or following to join qualifying refugees are admitted under the same criteria. INA § 207(c)(2). The Secretary may later terminate the refugee status of either the principal refugee or the spouse or child upon a determination that the principal refugee did not in fact meet the refugee definition at the time of admission. INA § 207(c)(4). Under INA § 209(a), a refugee whose status has not been terminated, and who is still admissible (with the help of the exemptions and waivers noted earlier) becomes eligible for LPR status after one year. INA § 209(a).

Given the comprehensive nature of the process you have just read about, Congress wanted to make sure that process would actually be used. Consequently, it prohibited the Attorney General (now the Secretary of DHS) from paroling a refugee into the United States, absent “compelling reasons in the public interest with respect to that particular alien.” INA § 212(d)(5)(B). Since the refugee definition does not encompass anyone fleeing only war or natural catastrophe, the prohibition does not affect the use of the parole power on behalf of those groups. But see section C below (temporary protected status).

The 1980 Act also established the Office of Refugee Resettlement, within the Department of HHS, and charged it with funding and administering various federal programs relating to resettlement. INA § 411. Within the State Department, the unit responsible for coordinating refugee policy is the Bureau of Population, Refugees, and Migration (PRM). The efforts of the federal government are supplemented by those of state and local governments and private voluntary agencies. See generally INA § 412.

You should now read INA §§ 101(a)(42), 207, 209(a, c), and 212(d)(5)(B).

The preceding passages outline the critical overseas refugee provisions of the 1980 Act. How has this program worked in practice? The chart below shows the Presidential authorizations for total refugee admissions for each fiscal year under the Refugee Act of 1980:

Fiscal Year	Presidential Authorizations⁸
1980	231,700
1981	217,000
1982	140,000
1983	90,000
1984	72,000
1985	70,000
1986	67,000
1987	70,000
1988	87,500
1989	116,500
1990	125,000
1991	131,000
1992	142,000
1993	132,000
1994	121,500
1995	112,000
1996	90,000
1997	78,000
1998	83,000
1999	91,000
2000	90,000
2001	80,000
2002	70,000
2003	70,000
2004	70,000
2005	70,000
2006	70,000
2007	70,000
2008	80,000
2009	80,000

In scanning these figures, keep in mind that they are the maximum admissions authorized by the President. The Secretary of Homeland Security may approve any number up to those ceilings. Until September 11, 2001, the vast majority of the authorized numbers were actually assigned. But after the events of that day, the Bush Administration slowed the admission of overseas refugees to a trickle. As a result, only 18,652 of the 70,000 authorized for fiscal year 2002 were processed and approved for admission. 2003 Yearbook of Immigration Statistics, Table 14 at 53. In the following year, refugee advocates urged the President to ease the resulting backlog of refugee applicants by increasing the authorization for fiscal year 2003.

8. For the 1980 and 1981 Presidential authorizations, see INS 1987 Statistical Yearbook, Table 25. For years 1982-87, see INS 1989 Statistical Yearbook, Table 26. For years 1988 through 1998, see U.S. Comm. for Refugees, Dec. 2000 Refugee Reports at 9. For fiscal years 1999 through 2003, see 2003 Yearbook of Immigration Statistics, Table 14 at 53. For fiscal year 2004, see 68 Fed. Reg. 63979 (Nov. 10, 2003). For fiscal year 2005, see 69 Fed. Reg. 60943 (Oct. 14, 2004). For fiscal year 2006, see 70 Fed. Reg. 65825 (Nov.

1, 2005). For fiscal year 2007, see 83 IR 2299, 2352 (Oct. 30, 2006). For fiscal year 2008, see 72 Fed. Reg. 58991 (Oct. 18, 2007). For fiscal year 2009, see 73 Fed. Reg. 58865 (Oct. 7, 2008). 85 IR 2646 (Oct. 6, 2008). All figures represent the combined authorizations under INA §§ 207(a) (initial) with any mid-year adjustments, plus 207(b) (unforeseen emergencies). But NB: In fiscal years 2004 through 2007, the 70,000 authorizations each included an "unallocated reserve" of 20,000 (except 10,000 in fiscal year 2006). In fiscal years

Rejecting those pleas, the President authorized an even smaller number—50,000—for fiscal year 2003 (not counting unallocated reserve, for which there is no federal funding), and of that number only 25,329 were approved for admission. Id. As the above chart shows, the Presidential authorizations remained at 70,000 through fiscal year 2007 (again, including the 20,000 unallocated reserve), but even by 2006 and 2007 the actual admissions were only 41,150 and 48,217, respectively. U.S. Dept. of Homeland Security, Refugees and Asylees: 2007, Annual Flow Report (2008), http://www.dhs.gov.xlibrary/assets/statistics/publications/ois_rfa_fr_2007.pdf, at 3. In 2007, the leading countries of overseas refugee admissions, in order, were Burma, Somalia, Iran, Burundi, and Cuba. Id.

To the extent that the Refugee Act of 1980 was meant to be the exclusive vehicle for admitting refugees, it has achieved only partial success. The Act was signed into law on March 17, 1980. Within weeks, the Mariel boatlift (see pages 167–68 above) was under way and more than 100,000 Cubans arrived at United States shores. During roughly the same time period, Haitians were fleeing to the United States in large numbers. Despite the express prohibition on paroling refugees, President Carter (after consulting with Congress) paroled the Cubans and the Haitians into the country. See 3 Gordon, Mailman & Yale-Loehr, § 33.01[4]. Special legislation eventually enabled them to become LPRs. IRCA § 202. The consultation with Congress in some ways might have made the President's action functionally equivalent to invoking the “unforeseen emergency” procedure of section 207(b), but the grant of parole rather than refugee status seems contrary to both the language and the spirit of the 1980 Act.

The so-called Lautenberg amendment to a 1990 foreign assistance appropriations bill eased the refugee status requirements for Soviet Jews, Soviet Evangelical Christians, most Indochinese, and selected others, including now people fleeing religious persecution in Iran. Those individuals, if claiming persecution, need show only a “credible basis for concern about the possibility of such persecution.” Pub. L. 101–167, §§ 599D, 599E, 103 Stat. 1195, 1261–64 (Nov. 21, 1989). That provision, now called the Specter–Lautenberg amendment, has been renewed annually, most recently in Pub. L. 111–8, 123 Stat. 524 Div. H, § 7034(g)(1) (Mar. 11, 2009) (extending program through Sept. 30, 2009).

The larger goal of the 1980 Act—the elimination of foreign policy bias—is another story. In 1985, former United States Senator (and former U.S. Coordinator for Refugee Affairs) Dick Clark estimated that “[n]o doubt close to 99 per cent of all the refugees who settled in the United States since World War II were persons fleeing communist governments.” Foreword to Elizabeth Hull, Without Justice For All—The Constitutional Rights of Aliens ix (1985) (contrasting the admission of 40,000 Hungarians and, by that time, 750,000 Indochinese and 700,000 Cubans, with the refusal to allocate refugee slots to Chileans fleeing General Pinochet, or refugees from Haiti, El Salvador, or Guatemala). Many scholars have catalogued the vivid contrast between the generous admission of those fleeing Communism and the steadfast refusal to admit significant numbers of any other refugees. See, e.g., Hull, above, ch. 5; Gil Loescher & John A.

2008 and 2009, the 80,000 authorizations included unallocated reserves of 10,000 and 5,000, respectively. The unallocated reserve is an unfunded authorization not allocated to any specific country or region.

Scanlan, Calculated Kindness—Refugees and America's Half-Open Door 1945–Present (1986). As you will see in section B, similar patterns dominated the adjudication of asylum claims during that period.

The Refugee Act of 1980 did not immediately alter these patterns. In every year from its adoption until the end of the Cold War, Presidents allocated almost the entire refugee quota to those who were fleeing communist countries (or occasionally other United States adversaries, such as Iran). The authorization for fiscal year 1991 was representative:

Africa	4,900
East Asia	52,000
Soviet Union	50,000
Eastern Europe	5,000
Near East/South Asia	6,000
Latin America/Caribbean	3,100
Not Designated (privately funded)	10,000
TOTAL	131,000
(including 15,000 Amerasians)

55 Fed.Reg. 41979–80 (Oct. 17, 1991). The pattern might not be obvious on its face, but in 1989 the clear focus was on refugees from Communist or Communist-allied regimes. Virtually all the African refugees selected were from Ethiopia; almost all the East Asians were from Vietnam, Laos, and Cambodia; “Near East/South Asia” was reserved principally for Afghanistan and Iran; and the “Latin America/Caribbean” category was allotted almost entirely to Cuba and, until the recent change of government, Nicaragua. See INS 1989 Statistical Yearbook, Table 26. The stated legal basis for that pattern has been INA § 207(a)(3), which dictates that the admission of overseas refugees “be allocated among refugees of special humanitarian concern to the United States” (emphasis added).

After the almost complete collapse of Communism in 1989 and 1990, the numbers began to change, but not immediately. For several years the above patterns persisted. Gradually, however, the improved relations between the United States and both Communist and formerly Communist nations began to produce far lower allocations for the former Communist countries. But because United States refugee policy has been driven so strongly by Cold War politics, the net effect of the geopolitical changes was a decline in total United States refugee admissions, rather than a redistribution. As the chart above illustrates, total overseas refugee authorizations steadily dropped from 142,000 in 1992 to 78,000 in 1997. They have remained just below or just above that level ever since. Many commentators have criticized the heavy influence of foreign policy on United States refugee selections.⁹

9. See, e.g., Joan Fitzpatrick & Robert Pauw, Foreign Policy, Asylum, and Discretion, 28 Willamette L.Rev. 751 (1992); Joyce A. Hughes, Flight from Cuba, 36 Calif. Western L. Rev. 39 (1999) (calling for foreign-policy-neutral refugee laws and an end to favoritism for Cubans); Hull, above; Stephen H. Legomsky, The Making of United States Refugee Policy: Separation of Powers in the Post-Cold War Era, 70 Washington L. Rev. 675 (1995); Loescher & Scanlan, above; see also Maryellen Fullerton, Hungary, Refugees, and the Law of Return, 8 Internat'l J. Refugee L. 499 (1996) (criticizing Hungary for using refugee program mainly as “law of return”).

Once the President announces the total refugee quota and the regional or country breakdowns, the processing of individual applications takes place overseas. For this purpose the State Department and USCIS have developed, and periodically revise, a system of refugee priorities. For fiscal year 2009, priority 1 includes refugees who are referred to the program by UNHCR, a U.S. embassy, or a designated NGO because of their especially strong individual needs. Priority 2, assessed on a group basis, is for refugees of “special humanitarian concern” to the United States. These currently include certain groups of refugees processed in their countries of origin (the former Soviet Union, Cuba, Vietnam, and, more recently, Iraq), as well as miscellaneous other groups, including certain Burmese ethnic minorities in Thailand and Malaysia, Burundians in Tanzania, Bhutanese in Nepal, Iranian religious minorities, Sudanese Darfurians in Iraq, Iraqis associated with the U.S. government, and Eritreans in one refugee camp in Ethiopia. And priority 3 is for nationals of designated countries who possess specified family relationships to previously admitted refugees or asylees. U.S. Dept. of State et al., Proposed Refugee Admissions for Fiscal Year 2009, Report to the Congress, at 6–14.

The processing is performed by specialized USCIS refugee adjudicators, see INA § 207(f), with help from UNHCR, the International Organization for Migration, various NGOs, the State Department, and the Dept. of Health and Human Services.¹⁰

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. Professor Suhrke thought wars of independence were essentially a thing of the past. Writing in 1983, she did not anticipate the upheavals in the former Soviet Union or Yugoslavia (or, perhaps, the ethnic bloodshed in Rwanda or the Sudan, or the independence movements in Kosovo, Chechnya, or East Timor). At this point, however, based on Professor Suhrke’s analysis of the events that tend to stimulate refugee flows, would you predict an increase or a decrease in the world’s refugee population in the coming years?

2. Are there practical mechanisms available to the world community or to individual nations to attack the root causes of refugee flows, so as to prevent or at least diminish the need for people to become refugees?

3. After-the-fact responses to the problem of refugees in overseas camps have tended to fall into three categories: encouraging voluntary repatriation to the countries from which the refugees fled; permanent stay in the refugee camp or elsewhere within the country in which that camp is located—i.e., “local integration” in the country of “first asylum;” and permanent resettlement in a third country. See also James C. Hathaway, The Right of States to Repatriate Former Refugees, 20 Ohio State J. Dispute

10. For details on both the substantive priorities and the procedures for screening, admitting, and resettling overseas refugees in the United States, see United States Dept. of State, Dept. of Homeland Security, and Dept. of Health & Human Services, Proposed Refugee Admissions for Fiscal Year 2005, Report to the Congress (2004).

Resolution 175 (2005) (criticizing UNHCR for failing to consider mandatory repatriation upon cessation of refugee status). Once a large refugee flow occurs, what practical considerations might influence the selection among those options?

4. Several leading commentators, finding the existing world refugee system inadequate on multiple fronts, have advocated multinational forms of protection, commonly known as “burden-sharing” or “responsibility-sharing.” Peter Schuck, for example, argues for regional arrangements whereby states agree on refugee allocation criteria, delegate to an international agency the task of assigning quotas to the various signatories based on those criteria, try to recruit additional signatories, and freely trade quotas for money or other concessions. See Peter H. Schuck, Refugee Burden-Sharing: A Modest Proposal, 22 Yale J. Internat’l L. 243 (1997). James Hathaway and R. Alexander Neve argue that the leading causes of nations’ increasing reluctance to admit refugees have been the perception that refugee programs can become back doors for voluntary migrants and a belief that the burdens have been unequal. Their blueprint calls not only for regional agreements, but also for other “interest-convergence group” initiatives.¹¹

Other prominent commentators agree that national procedures have impeded protection but reject both the premise that individualized adjudication is the culprit and the proffered solutions. See Deborah Anker, Joan Fitzpatrick & Andrew Shacknove, Crisis and Cure: A Reply to Hathaway/Neve and Schuck, 11 Harvard Human Rights J. 295 (1998). The U.S. Commission on Immigration Reform and many others have also urged the formation of regional “burden-sharing” schemes in which nations collectively provide temporary protection for non-Convention refugees.¹² The subject is important enough that the Executive Committee of UNHCR (EXCOM) made it the 1998 annual theme.¹³

11. James C. Hathaway & R. Alexander Neve, Making International Refugee Law Relevant Again: A Proposal for Collectivized and Solution-Oriented Protection, 10 Harvard Human Rights J. 115 (1997). Both approaches are summarized, and then criticized for accepting cultural discrimination by states, in Satvinder Juss, Toward a Morally Legitimate Form of Refugee Law: The Uses of Cultural Jurisprudence, 11 Harvard Human Rights J. 311 (1998). See also Mariano-Florentino Cuéllar, The Limits of the Limits of Idealism: Rethinking American Refugee Policy in an Insecure World, 1 Harvard L. & Policy Rev. 401 (2007) (advocating a “strategic humanitarianism” model, of which one central component would be a priority on addressing mass influx emergencies consistently with political realities and the U.S. national interest).

12. See U.S. Commission on Immigration Reform, U.S. Refugee Policy: Taking Leadership 20–25 (June 1997); Susan Martin, Andy Schoenholtz & Deborah Waller Meyers, Temporary Protection: Towards a New Regional and Domestic Framework, 12 Georgetown Immigration L.J. 543, 559–66 (1998).

13. See 17 Refugee Survey Quarterly No. 4 at 1–221 (1998). The UNHCR Director of International Protection laid out her three-pronged vision of the future shape of refugee protection in Erika Feller, The Evolution of the International Refugee Protection Regime, 5 Washington Univ. J. of L. & Policy 129 (2001). She urged reaffirmation of the 1951 Convention; a revisiting of some of the more restrictive interpretations that states have placed on it; and affirmative efforts to fill critical gaps that the Convention, even when liberally interpreted, leaves for the protection of highly endangered individuals and groups.

5. The readings in this section reveal the powerful influence of ideology and foreign relations in United States refugee policy. Is there actually anything wrong with allowing such considerations to play a significant role? Argue both sides.

6. Along similar lines, you have seen examples of ad hoc, country-specific refugee legislation (and executive parole) in response to particular refugee flows. What are the relative merits of generic and country-specific policies?

7. How do you feel about the basic process of annual executive/legislative consultation followed by a Presidential determination of the numbers and categories of refugees to be admitted? Should the President's decision be subject to either one-house or two-house confirmation? Should the proportions of executive and legislative say in the final decision be altered in any other way? For an argument that an independent agency should make refugee selection policy decisions, see Stephen H. Legomsky, The Making of United States Refugee Policy: Separation of Powers in the Post-Cold War Era, 70 Wash.L.Rev. 675 (1995).

8. The whole subject of refugee policy raises a fundamental question that, while worth noting now, will be deferred to section C of this chapter: Why confine the refugee definition to those who flee persecution when there are many other events—famine, natural catastrophe, and armed conflict—that also spur massive flights across national boundaries?

9. One of the most wrenching of the world's refugee problems is the plight of unaccompanied refugee children. These are children who are fleeing either persecution or some danger that does not qualify them for refugee status, and who are either orphaned or otherwise separated from their parents. The problem arises with respect to both overseas refugee admissions and asylum and is taken up on pages 1035-37.

10. Refugees are generally eligible for adjustment of status to permanent residence after one year. Adjustment is an important rite of passage; it signifies an acceptance by both the refugee and the United States that resettlement here is now assumed to be permanent, not just a temporary haven pending improvement of conditions in the country of origin. How do you feel about the one-year waiting period? Would it be better simply to admit refugees as permanent residents right from the start? Or, if anything, should the waiting period be longer?¹⁴

11. The converse question is when refugee status should end. See Joan Fitzpatrick, The End of Protection: Legal Standards for Cessation of Refugee Status, 13 Georgetown Immigration L.J. 343 (1999); Maria O'Sulli-

14. See U.S. Commission on Immigration Reform, U.S. Refugee Policy: Taking Leadership 35-37 (June 1997) (urging elimination of one-year waiting period and immediate grant of permanent resident status); accord, David A. Martin, The United States Refugee Admission Program: Reforms for a New Era of Refugee Resettlement, § VII.E (2003) (report to DOS).

van, Withdrawing Protection under Article 1C(5) of the 1951 Convention: Lessons from Australia, 20 Internat'l J. Refugee L. 586 (2008).

12. As noted earlier, the United States statutory definition of "refugee," unlike the definition in the 1951 Convention, extends to those who are still within their countries of origin. INA § 101(a)(42). In international law, those who otherwise meet the U.N. Convention definition of refugee except that they have not yet crossed an international border are usually called "internally displaced persons," or IDPs. Today, there are approximately 26 million IDPs in the world. See 2007 UNHCR Statistical Yearbook, note 2 above, at 7; Catherine Phuong, The International Protection of Internally Displaced Persons (2004). Their problems can be just as serious as those faced by Convention refugees.¹⁵

13. An excellent history of United States laws and policies governing Vietnamese refugees can be found in Bill Ong Hing, Making and Remaking Asian America Through Immigration Policy, 1850–1990, at 121–38 (1993). Professor Hing also describes the deportation, on criminal grounds, of Cambodian refugees who had been brought to the United States as young children. See Bill Ong Hing, Detention to Deportation—Rethinking the Removal of Cambodian Refugees, 38 U.C. Davis L. Rev. 891 (2005).

14. A modern problem of epic proportions is that of "secondary" refugee movements. Refugees today rarely proceed directly from their countries of origin to the countries where they seek permanent resettlement. When in danger, they are far more prone to seek the first port in a storm—typically a nearby developing country—and then, when circumstances permit, move on in search of more durable protection. The latter migrations are usually called secondary movements, and permanent resettlement countries frequently look for ways to return the refugees to the "third countries" in which they enjoyed temporary refuge. The problem has become a prime subject of international debate. See generally Stephen H. Legomsky, Secondary Refugee Movements and the Return of Asylum Seekers to Third Countries: The Meaning of Effective Protection, 15 Internat'l J. Refugee L. 567 (2003) (consultant's report to UNHCR).

15. Another modern problem—exacerbated by September 11—is how to reconcile refugee admission and processing with national security (and the security of the refugees themselves). See generally Volker Türk, Forced Migration and Security, 15 Internat'l J. Refugee L. 113 (2003).

15. For a lucid account by the Representative of the U.N. Secretary General for Internally Displaced Persons, see Francis Mading Deng, The Global Challenge of Internal Displacement, 5 Washington Univ. J. of L. & Policy 141 (2001). For additional helpful commentary, see Maryellen Fullerton & James A.R. Nafziger, Draft Declaration on Internally Displaced Persons, in Immigration Law Conference, Scholarship Panels Works in Progress 187–95 (1996) (members of, and reporting on, proposed declaration drafted by International Law Association's Committee on Internally Displaced Persons); International Law Association, Report of the Sixty-Ninth Conference at 791–832 (2000); Arthur C. Helton, The CIS Migration Conference: A Chance to Prevent and Ameliorate Forced Movements of People in the Former Soviet Union, 8 Internat'l J. Refugee L. 169 (1996); UNHCR Centre for Documentation & Research, Internal Displacement in Africa, 18 Refugee Survey Q., issue #1 (entire issue) (1999).

B. ASYLUM AND NONREFOULEMENT

You have now read about refugees who are physically outside the United States. Here we consider those who have already reached United States territory—either the border area or the interior—and who seek protection from persecution.

As pointed out at the beginning of this chapter, two entirely different remedies are potentially available to members of this latter group— asylum under INA § 208, which permits the person to remain in the United States at least temporarily and in most cases permanently, and nonrefoulement, a narrower remedy that prohibits forcible return to the country of persecution but not to third countries. In the United States, the statutory term for nonrefoulement is “withholding of removal.” INA § 241(b)(3). The legal terminology is often inconsistent, however. The Justice Department regulations expressly use the word “asylum” in a generic sense to encompass both remedies (as well as a third remedy under the Convention Against Torture, discussed separately in section C.1 below). 8 CFR § 208.1(a) (2008). The subsections that follow will contain detailed coverage of the substantive requirements and adjudication procedures for both asylum and withholding. Note now, however, that the application procedures for the two remedies are exactly the same. In fact, an application for asylum under section 208 is automatically treated as an application for withholding of removal under section 241(b)(3) in the event relief under section 208 is denied. Id. § 208.3(b).

Some basic background information: It is easiest to start with withholding of removal.¹⁶ The concept first appeared in United States immigration law in 1950, when Congress prohibited deportation “to any country in which the Attorney General shall find that such alien would be subjected to physical persecution.” Internal Security Act of 1950, ch. 1024, § 23, 64 Stat. 987, 1010 (Sept. 23, 1950) (amending 1917 Act). When the Immigration and Nationality Act was passed in 1952, that provision was made discretionary rather than mandatory. Pub.L. 414, chap. 477, § 243(h), 66 Stat. 163, 214 (June 27, 1952). In 1965 Congress replaced the requirement of physical persecution, which had been interpreted by at least one court to require “confinement, torture, or death,” see Blazina v. Bouchard, 286 F.2d 507, 511 (3d Cir.1961), with a requirement that the person “would be subject to persecution on account of race, religion, or political opinion.” Pub.L. 89-236, § 11(f), 79 Stat. 911, 918 (Oct. 3, 1965).

In 1968 the United States acceded to the 1967 U.N. Protocol Relating to the Status of Refugees. By doing so, it became bound by the 1951 Convention. See 1967 Protocol, art. 1. Article 33.1 of the 1951 Convention, which is subject to certain exceptions, provides:

¹⁶ For a succinct historical account of withholding of removal, see Elwin Griffith, Deportation and the Refugee, 1982 Michigan Yearbook Internat'l Legal Studies 125, 126-31.

1. No Contracting State shall expel or return ("refouler") a refugee in any manner whatsoever to the frontiers of territories where his life or freedom would be threatened on account of his race, religion, nationality, membership of a particular social group or political opinion * * *.

The United States provision, former INA § 243(h), was then less protective than the Convention. For one thing, former section 243(h) applied only in deportation proceedings, not in exclusion proceedings.¹⁷ In addition, the list of persecution grounds omitted nationality and social group. Moreover, even when an applicant met the eligibility requirements, the Attorney General retained the discretion to deny relief.

These and other gaps led eventually to some important amendments. Twelve years after the United States agreed to follow the Convention provision on nonfoulement, the Refugee Act of 1980 brought United States statutory law into conformity with the Convention. IIRIRA § 305(a) changed the wording of the withholding provision slightly and moved it to INA § 241(b)(3). Subject to some important exceptions that will be considered in section B.5 of this chapter, the withholding provision now reads:

[The Secretary of Homeland Security] may not remove an alien to a country if the [Secretary] decides that the alien's life or freedom would be threatened in that country because of the alien's race, religion, nationality, membership in a particular social group, or political opinion.

INA § 241(b)(3).

Asylum, as noted previously, is further-reaching than withholding; it results in permission to remain, not just non-return to the country of persecution. Nothing in the 1951 Convention or 1967 Protocol obligates any nation to grant asylum, and until 1974 no United States statute or regulation expressly authorized it. The Attorney General sometimes used the parole power to accomplish what is now thought of as asylum.¹⁸ In 1974 the Justice Department issued regulations providing asylum criteria and procedures, 39 Fed. Reg. 41832 (Dec. 3, 1974), but not until 1980 did asylum receive statutory recognition. INA § 208, added by the Refugee Act of 1980, Pub. L. 96-212, § 201(b), 94 Stat. 102, 103, 105 (Mar. 17, 1980), now authorizes the Secretary of Homeland Security, in his or her discretion, to grant asylum to any "refugee" who is "physically present in the United States or arrives in the United States," with some exceptions.

17. See Leng May Ma v. Barber, 357 U.S. 185, 78 S.Ct. 1072, 2 L.Ed.2d 1246 (1958); see also Ian Mackler & James K. Weeks, The Fleeing Political Refugee's Final Hurdle—The Immigration and Nationality Act, 5 No. Kentucky L. Rev. 9 (1978) (criticizing limitation to deportation proceedings).

18. See Deborah E. Anker, Discretionary Asylum: A Protection Remedy for Refugees Under the Refugee Act of 1980, 28 Virginia J. Internat'l L. 1, 33 n.163 (1987); see also Elwin Griffith, Asylum and Withholding of Deportation—Challenges to the Alien After the Refugee Act of 1980, 12 Loyola L.A. Internat'l & Comp. L.J. 515, 518-19 (1990).

At this time you should read INA §§ 208(a, b, c), 209(b, c), and 241(b)(3). You might wish also to review the refugee definition in INA § 101(a)(42).

Subject again to some exceptions, the statute does not specify the procedure by which the Secretary is to adjudicate claims of asylum or withholding. The DHS and DOJ regulations perform that function. They provide two different procedures, depending on the timing of the application.

If DHS has already initiated removal proceedings, the application is filed with the immigration judge. 8 CFR § 208.4(b)(3) (2008). The resulting decision whether to order removal is appealable to the BIA, id. § 1003.1(b)(3), and, if the applicant wishes, reviewable in court, INA § 242.

If removal proceedings have not yet been instituted, one may take the initiative and apply to USCIS (not to EOIR). 8 CFR § 208.4(b)(1) (2008). These claims are commonly called “affirmative” applications, or “walk-ins.” They are adjudicated by geographically dispersed USCIS “asylum officers,” who have received specialized training in international law, country conditions, and interviewing techniques. Id. § 208.1(b).

Except in “expedited removal” cases (discussed below), the asylum officer conducts a “nonadversarial” interview. The applicant has the right to counsel and may submit affidavits of witnesses and other documents. 8 CFR § 208.9(b) (2008). The asylum officer either grants asylum or refers the case to an immigration judge for removal proceedings (with some exceptions). Id. § 208.14(b, c). In the latter event, the person may renew the application de novo before the immigration judge. Id. § 208.14(a). The decision of the immigration judge is subject to both a BIA appeal and judicial review under the usual rules.

As earlier readings noted, the 1951 Convention recognized more than the right not to be refouled to one’s persecutors. The states parties also promised to respect a whole range of other refugee rights. You should skim the Convention now to get a sense of the subjects they cover.

When the United States ratified the 1967 Protocol, it became derivatively bound by the 1951 Convention. Thus, international law obligates the United States to respect all the refugee rights that the Convention recognizes. But how the United States internally allocates the responsibility for implementing those international legal obligations is a matter of domestic United States law. Domestic United States law, in turn, distinguishes those international agreements that are “self-executing” from those that are not. A self-executing agreement is one that creates binding internal law without the need for any subsequent implementing legislation. A treaty that is not self-executing still creates binding international legal obligations for all the states parties, but those obligations will not be enforceable in United States courts until Congress enacts the necessary implementing legislation. Even then, the resulting legal obligations normally flow from that statute, not from the treaty. To determine whether a treaty is self-executing, United States courts have considered the intentions of the states parties, executive branch statements made in connection with the United States treaty ratification process, and other factors. See generally Thomas Buergethal & Sean D. Murphy, Public International Law in a Nutshell 198–99 (4th ed. 2007).

The United States courts have typically viewed the 1967 Protocol as being non-self-executing. See generally Stanley Mailman & Stephen Yale-Loehr, Detaining and Criminalizing Asylum Seekers, 8 BIB 764, 765–66 (May 1, 2003). And in Matter of D-J-, 23 I. & N. Dec. 572 (A.G. 2003), a case involving the selective detention of Haitian asylum seekers, the Attorney General fended off arguments rooted in the 1967 Protocol by declaring the Protocol non-self-executing (and refraining from discussion of whether U.S. policy comported with the Protocol). Id. at 584–85 n.8. Although a non-self-executing treaty cannot be enforced in a U.S. domestic court, it is not clear why the executive branch would not feel bound by U.S. treaty obligations on the international plane (and, therefore, why it would think that calling the treaty non-self-executing ends the inquiry).

This issue—the extent to which obligations created by the 1951 Convention and 1967 Protocol are enforceable in United States courts—has taken on new importance in recent years. While the Refugee Act of 1980 addresses the nonrefoulement obligation embodied in article 33 of the Convention, it does not attempt to implement any of the other Convention rights. Arguments that U.S. policy falls short of various Convention obligations have been advanced in several contexts other than nonrefoulement. (Some would argue that even the U.S. domestic law on nonrefoulement is deficient. See especially the difficult issues on standards of proof, discussed in connection with the Stevic decision on page 999 below, and on the interpretations of the exceptions to eligibility, pages 1016–25 below.) Aside from nonrefoulement, issues have arisen concerning (a) whether United States practices on the detention of asylum seekers comport with article 26 (freedom of movement) and article 31 (which prohibits penalties for illegal entry under certain circumstances); and (b) whether the criminal prosecutions of asylum seekers for entering the United States with false documents comport with article 31. These issues are taken up on pages 1056–60 below.

The pages that follow explore in greater depth some of the many controversial issues that asylum and withholding have generated. This material is difficult to compartmentalize, both because the various requirements for asylum under INA § 208 overlap with each other, and also because some of these elements have counterparts in INA § 241(b)(3) (withholding). Nonetheless, to keep the discussion manageable, this section will be organized around certain key elements of asylum or withholding or both. You should use these elements to separate the issues while keeping in mind that the compartments are not airtight.

1. PERSECUTION OR FEAR OF PERSECUTION

Matter of Acosta

Board of Immigration Appeals, 1985.
19 I. & N. Dec. 211.

* * *

The respondent is a 36-year-old male native and citizen of El Salvador. In a deportation hearing held before an immigration judge over the course of 2 days in July and August 1983, the respondent conceded his deportability for entering the United States without inspection and accordingly was found deportable as charged. The respondent sought relief from deportation by applying for a discretionary grant of asylum pursuant to section 208 of the Act, and for mandatory withholding of deportation to El Salvador pursuant to section 243(h) of the Act.¹⁹ In an oral decision, the immigration judge denied the respondent's applications for these two forms of relief finding that he had failed to meet his burden of proof for such relief. It is this finding that the respondent has challenged on appeal.

* * *

In order to prove the facts underlying his applications for asylum and withholding of deportation, the respondent testified, and attested in an affidavit attached to his asylum application, to the following facts. In 1976 he, along with several other taxi drivers, founded COTAXI, a cooperative organization of taxi drivers of about 150 members. COTAXI was designed to enable its members to contribute the money they earned toward the purchase of their taxis. It was one of five taxi cooperatives in the city of San Salvador and one of many taxi cooperatives throughout the country of El Salvador. Between 1978 and 1981, the respondent held three management positions with COTAXI, the duties of which he described in detail, and his last position with the cooperative was that of general manager. He held that position from 1979 through February or March of 1981. During the time he was the general manager of COTAXI, the respondent continued on the weekends to work as a taxi driver.

Starting around 1978, COTAXI and its drivers began receiving phone calls and notes requesting them to participate in work stoppages. The requests were anonymous but the respondent and the other members of COTAXI believed them to be from anti-government guerrillas who had targeted small businesses in the transportation industry for work stoppages, in hopes of damaging El Salvador's economy. COTAXI's board of directors refused to comply with the requests because its members wished to keep working, and as a result COTAXI received threats of retaliation. Over the course of several years, COTAXI was threatened about 15 times. The other taxi cooperatives in the city also received similar threats.

Beginning in about 1979, taxis were seized and burned, or used as barricades, and COTAXI drivers were assaulted or killed. Ultimately, five members of COTAXI were killed in their taxis by unknown persons. Three of the COTAXI drivers who were killed were friends of the respondent and, like him, had been founders and officers of COTAXI. Each was killed after receiving an anonymous note threatening his life. One of these drivers, who died from injuries he sustained when he crashed his cab in order to avoid being shot by his passengers, told his friends before he died that three men identifying themselves as guerrillas had jumped into his taxi, demanded possession of his car, and announced they were going to kill him.

¹⁹. Now INA § 241(b)(3) and called "withholding of removal."—Eds.

During January and February 1981, the respondent received three anonymous notes threatening his life. The first note, which was slipped through the window of his taxi and was addressed to the manager of COTAXI, stated: "Your turn has come, because you are a traitor." The second note, which was also put on the respondent's car, was directed to "the driver of Taxi No. 95," which was the car owned by the respondent, and warned: "You are on the black list." The third note was placed on the respondent's car in front of his home, was addressed to the manager of COTAXI, and stated: "We are going to execute you as a traitor." In February 1981, the respondent was beaten in his cab by three men who then warned him not to call the police and took his taxi. The respondent is of the opinion that the men who threatened his life and assaulted him were guerrillas who were seeking to disrupt transportation services in the city of San Salvador. He also has the impression, however, that COTAXI was not favored by some government officials because they viewed the cooperative as being too socialistic.

After being assaulted and receiving the three threatening notes, the respondent left El Salvador because he feared for his life. He declared at the hearing that he would not work as a taxi driver if he returned to El Salvador because he understands that there is little work for taxi drivers now. He explained that the people are too poor to call taxis. Additionally, he stated that the terrorists are no longer active.

* * *

* * * [W]e find the respondent's testimony, which was corroborated by other objective evidence in the record, to be worthy of belief. It remains to be determined, however, whether the respondent's facts are sufficient to meet the statutory standards of eligibility for asylum and withholding of deportation.

THE STATUTORY STANDARD FOR ASYLUM

A grant of asylum is a matter of discretion. However, an alien is eligible for a favorable exercise of discretion only if he qualifies as a "refugee" under section 101(a)(42)(A) of the Act. * * * The pertinent portion of section 101(a)(42) provides as follows:

The term "refugee" means (A) any person who is outside any country of such person's nationality or, in the case of a person having no nationality, is outside any country in which such person last habitually resided, and who is unable or unwilling to return to, and is unable or unwilling to avail himself or herself of the protection of, that country because of persecution or a well-founded fear of persecution on account of race, religion, nationality, membership in a particular social group, or political opinion.

* * *

This section creates four separate elements that must be satisfied before an alien qualifies as a refugee: (1) the alien must have a “fear” of “persecution”; (2) the fear must be “well-founded”; (3) the persecution feared must be “on account of race, religion, nationality, membership in a particular social group, or political opinion”; and (4) the alien must be unable or unwilling to return to his country of nationality or to the country in which he last habitually resided because of persecution or his well-founded fear of persecution.

(1) The alien must have a “fear” of “persecution.”

Initially, we note that Congress added the elements in the definition of a refugee to our law by means of the Refugee Act of 1980. In so doing Congress intended to conform the Immigration and Nationality Act to the United Nations Protocol Relating to the Status of Refugees, Jan. 31, 1967 (“the Protocol”), to which the United States had acceded in 1968. Article 1.2 of the Protocol defines a refugee as one who:

owing to well-founded fear of being persecuted for reasons of race, religion, nationality, membership of a particular social group or political opinion, is outside the country of his nationality and is unable or, owing to such fear, is unwilling to avail himself of the protection of that country; or who, not having a nationality and being outside the country of his former habitual residence, is unable or, owing to such fear, is unwilling to return to it.

Since Congress intended the definition of a refugee in section 101(a)(42)(A) of the Act to conform to the Protocol, it is appropriate for us to consider various international interpretations of that agreement. However, these interpretations are not binding upon us in construing the elements created by section 101(a)(42)(A) of the Act, for the determination of who should be considered a refugee is ultimately left by the Protocol to each state in whose territory a refugee finds himself.

In adding the definition of a refugee to the Act, Congress did not identify what one must show in order to establish a “fear of persecution.” The phrase “fear of persecution” is not new to the Act. Prior to 1980, it appeared in former section 203(a)(7), which provided for the conditional admission to the United States of certain aliens if they fled a country because of persecution or “fear of persecution.” Former section 203(a)(7) was applied by Service officers in allocating visas to immigrants abroad and by district directors in determining eligibility for adjustment of status under section 245 of the Act. Immigration judges and the Board were without authority to decide applications brought under former section 203(a)(7) and accordingly the meaning of the phrase “fear of persecution” was never directly at issue, or construed, in proceedings before the Board.

“Fear” is a subjective condition, an emotion characterized by the anticipation or awareness of danger. Webster’s Third New International Dictionary 831 (16th ed. 1971). The Office of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees (UNHCR) has suggested in the Handbook that the definition of a refugee found in the Protocol requires fear to be a person's primary motivation for seeking refugee status. See Handbook, supra, at 11-12. While we do not consider the UNHCR's position in the Handbook to be controlling, the Handbook nevertheless is a useful tool to the extent that it provides us with one internationally recognized interpretation of the Protocol.

Given the prominence of the word "fear" in the definition of a refugee created by Congress, and given the Handbook's persuasive assessment in this instance that "fear" should be a refugee's primary motivation, we conclude that an alien seeking to qualify under section 101(a)(42)(A) of the Act must demonstrate that his primary motivation for requesting refuge in the United States is "fear," i.e., a genuine apprehension or awareness of danger in another country. No other motivation, such as dissent or disagreement with the conditions in another country or a desire to experience greater economic advantage or personal freedom in the United States, satisfies the definition of a refugee created in the Act.

Prior to 1980, "persecution" was construed to mean either a threat to the life or freedom of, or the infliction of suffering or harm upon, those who differ in a way regarded as offensive. The harm or suffering inflicted could consist of confinement or torture. It also could consist of economic deprivation or restrictions so severe that they constitute a threat to an individual's life or freedom. Generally harsh conditions shared by many other persons did not amount to persecution. Prosecution for violating travel restrictions and laws of general applicability did not constitute persecution, unless the punishment was imposed for invidious reasons.

* * * [H]arm or suffering had to be inflicted either by the government of a country or by persons or an organization that the government was unable or unwilling to control.

* * *

As was the case prior to enactment of the Refugee Act, "persecution" as used in section 101(a)(42)(A) clearly contemplates that harm or suffering must be inflicted upon an individual in order to punish him for possessing a belief or characteristic a persecutor seeks to overcome. The word does not embrace harm arising out of civil strife or anarchy. In fact, Congress specifically rejected a definition of a refugee that would have included "displaced persons," i.e., those who flee harm generated by military or civil disturbances. This construction is consistent with the international interpretation of "refugee" under the Protocol, for that term does not include persons who are displaced by civil or military strife in their countries of origin.

In the case before us, we find that the respondent has adequately established that his primary motivation for seeking asylum is fear of persecution. We must now consider whether it has been demonstrated that this fear is well founded and whether the other elements necessary to establish eligibility for asylum have been satisfied.

(2) The fear of persecution must be "well-founded."

[This subsection, which discusses the phrase "well-founded fear" and compares it to the showing required under former INA § 243(h), now 241(b)(3) (withholding of removal), is omitted because it has been superseded by the developments taken up on pages 999–1002 below.—Eds.]

* * *

In the case before us, the respondent claims he fears persecution at the hands of two groups: the government and the guerrillas. * * * This means that he must demonstrate that (1) he possesses characteristics the government or the guerrillas seek to overcome by means of punishment of some sort; (2) the government or the guerrillas are aware or could easily²⁰ become aware that he possesses these characteristics; (3) the government or the guerrillas have the capability of punishing him; and (4) the government and the guerrillas have the inclination to punish him.

The respondent's fear of persecution by the government has no basis whatsoever in either his personal experiences or in other external events. To the contrary, by the respondent's own admission, this fear is based solely on his impression that some officials in the government may have viewed COTAXI as being too socialistic. This purely subjective impression is not sufficient to show a well-founded fear of persecution by the government.

In addition, whatever the facts may have been prior to the respondent's departure from El Salvador, those facts have changed significantly since 1981. Most importantly, the respondent admitted that he does not intend to work as a taxi driver upon his return to El Salvador. The respondent's facts do not show that the persecution of taxi drivers continued even after they stopped working as drivers. Furthermore, the respondent testified that the guerrillas' strength has diminished significantly in El Salvador since 1981. For these reasons, the respondent has not shown that at the present time he possesses characteristics the guerrillas seek to overcome or that the guerrillas have the inclination to punish him. Thus, * * * his fear of persecution upon deportation has not been shown to be "well-founded."

(3) The persecution feared must be "on account of race, religion, nationality, membership in a particular social group, or political opinion."

[In this section of its opinion the BIA holds that, even if Acosta had a well-founded fear of persecution, it would not be on account of either political opinion or membership in a particular social group. This subject is taken up on pages 916–97 below.—Eds.]

* * *

(4) The alien must be unable or unwilling to return to his country of nationality or to the country in which he last habitually resided because of persecution or his well-founded fear of persecution.

20. In Matter of Mogharrabi, 19 I. & N. Dec. 439 (BIA 1987), the Board amended this description by deleting the word "easily."—Eds.

Traditionally, a refugee has been an individual in whose case the bonds of trust, loyalty, protection, and assistance existing between a citizen and his country have been broken and have been replaced by the relation of an oppressor to a victim. Thus, inherent in refugee status is the concept that an individual requires international protection because his country of origin or of habitual residence is no longer safe for him. We consider this concept to be expressed, in part, by the requirement in the Act and the Protocol that a refugee must be unable or unwilling to return to a particular "country." See section 101(a)(42)(A) of the Act. We construe this requirement to mean that an alien seeking to meet the definition of a refugee must do more than show a well-founded fear of persecution in a particular place or abode within a country—he must show that the threat of persecution exists for him country-wide.

In the respondent's case, the facts show that taxi drivers in the city of San Salvador were threatened with persecution by the leftist guerrillas. However, the facts do not show that this threat existed in other cities in El Salvador. It may be the respondent could have avoided persecution by moving to another city in that country.²¹ In any event, the respondent's facts did not demonstrate that the guerrillas' persecution of taxi drivers occurred throughout the country of El Salvador. Accordingly, the respondent did not meet this element of the standard for asylum.

In summary, the respondent's facts fail to show that (1) his present fear of persecution by the government and the guerrillas is "well-founded"; (2) the persecution he fears is on account of one of the five grounds specified in the Act; and (3) he is unable to return to the country of El Salvador, as opposed to a particular place in that country, because of persecution. Thus, he has not met three of the four elements in the statutory definition of a refugee created by section 101(a)(42)(A) of the Act. Accordingly, the respondent has not shown he is eligible for a grant of asylum.

[For similar reasons the Board holds Acosta ineligible for withholding.—Eds.]

* * *

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. The "refugee" definition contained in INA § 101(a)(42) requires "persecution or a well-founded fear of persecution" (emphasis added). There is one common situation in which the disjunctive takes on particular importance. A person who has already suffered persecution in a given country, and who as a result is unwilling to return to that country, qualifies as a refugee even if a change in conditions has eliminated any

21. [Footnote 14 in original] It is unfortunate when persons may be obliged to give up their jobs and leave their homes as a result of fear. But that is not the issue here.

The issue is, once that decision is made, does an individual have the right to come to the United States rather than to move elsewhere in his home country.

well-founded fear of future persecution.²² That does not mean relief will ultimately be granted; additional barriers to claims that are based solely on past persecution are considered on pages 1003–05 below.

More typical, though, is a claim like that in Acosta, based on a “fear” of future persecution. The BIA cites pages 11–12 of the UNHCR Handbook for the proposition that the fear must be “a person’s primary motivation for seeking refugee status.”

There actually is nothing relevant on page 11 of the Handbook, but paragraph 41, on page 12, deals with ways to assess the applicant’s credibility and requires the factfinder to consider “everything that may serve to indicate that the predominant motive * * * is fear.” Paragraph 39, at 12, however, states expressly that all reasons for escape other than persecution are simply “irrelevant” to the refugee definition. It adds that victims of other fates are ruled out “unless they also” fear persecution (emphasis in original). This language does not require that they fear persecution more than they fear anything else. The UNHCR Handbook, the sole source on which the BIA bases its conclusion, is thus ambiguous at best on this point.

In contrast to Acosta, see Osorio v. INS, 18 F.3d 1017 (2d Cir. 1994). There the court held that a person who has a well-founded fear of persecution on account of political opinion does not become ineligible for asylum just because the person additionally fears economic hardship.

As a matter of policy, why insist that the fear be the “primary” motivation? Is that interpretation dictated by (or consistent with) the literal statutory wording? What if an applicant is equally fearful of persecution and starvation? Or suppose an applicant believes that, if returned home, she would stand a 60% chance of being persecuted and a 90% chance of starving to death because of widespread famine. Could the “primary” motivation for this person’s fear be said to be persecution? If not, is she really less worthy of relief than, say, one who believes there would be a 60% chance of persecution and no significant chance of starvation?

2. A gathering of refugee experts at the University of Michigan Law School has concluded that the phrase “well-founded fear,” while clearly requiring an objective showing, does not require actual subjective fear. The applicant need not prove, in other words, that he or she actually fears persecution; it is enough that, based on objective evaluation of the risk, there is reason to expect persecution.²³

22. Matter of Chen, 20 I. & N.Dec. 16 (BIA 1989); accord, Desir v. Ilchert, 840 F.2d 723, 729 (9th Cir.1988). See also 1951 Convention, art. 1(C)(5), as interpreted by UNHCR Handbook, para. 136.

23. The analysis, based both on the text of the 1951 Convention and the policies underlying it, appears in Third Colloquium on Challenges in International Refugee Law, The Michigan Guidelines on Well-Founded Fear, 26 Michigan J. Internat’l L. 492 (2005) and James C. Hathaway & William S. Hicks, Is There a Subjective Element in the Refugee Convention’s Requirement of “Well-Founded Fear?”, 26 Michigan J. Internat’l L. 505 (2005).

3. A much more common problem is the meaning of the word “persecution.” The term is not defined in the 1951 Convention or in the United States statute. In the excerpt that you read, the Board in Acosta relies on an understanding expressed in the congressional committee reports that accompanied the Refugee Act of 1980. The committee assumed, as the Board does in Acosta, that “persecution” requires “either a threat to the life or freedom of, or the infliction of suffering or harm upon, those who differ in a way regarded as offensive.” The Board adds that the term “clearly contemplates that harm or suffering must be inflicted upon an individual in order to punish him for possessing a belief or characteristic a persecutor seeks to overcome.” (The punishment issue is discussed further in item 7 below.)

Other authorities have suggested different definitions. The Justice Department’s proposed asylum regulations would define “persecution” as “the infliction of objectively serious harm or suffering that is subjectively experienced as serious harm or suffering by the applicant, regardless of whether the persecutor intends to cause harm.” 65 Fed Reg. 76588, 76597 (Dec. 7, 2000). The proposed provision then adds that the home government must be either the party that is inflicting the harm or unwilling or unable to control a private actor who is inflicting it. The problem of the non-state actor has particular importance in the context of gender-based persecution and is explored more fully on pages 974–85 below. In contrast, Professors Ryan Goodman and James Hathaway were among the first to propose linking the substantive content of “persecution” to international human rights norms, albeit in slightly different ways.²⁴ You will see these formulations again as you consider some of the more specific issues raised by the “persecution” definition in the discussion below.

4. How individualized does an act have to be in order to constitute persecution? The BIA in Acosta says: “Generally harsh conditions shared by many other persons did not amount to persecution.” (The Board is speaking in the past tense, but it holds later that this pre-1980 interpretation still stands.) Many courts have similarly emphasized the need for some sort of individual targeting.²⁵

24. See Ryan Goodman, Note, The Incorporation of International Human Rights Standards into Sexual Orientation Asylum Claims: Cases of Involuntary “Medical” Intervention, 105 Yale L.J. 255, especially 263 n.47 (1995); James C. Hathaway, The Relationship Between Human Rights and Refugee Law: What Refugee Law Judges Can Contribute, 8 Human Rights & Refugee L. 80 (1998); see also James C. Hathaway, The Law of Refugee Status 104–05 (1991). Generally accepting a human rights-based definition, but inclined to confine the human rights core more narrowly than either Goodman or Hathaway does, is David A. Martin, Book Review, The Law of Refugee Status, 87 Amer.

J. Internat’l L. 348, 349–50 (1993). See also the thoughtful expositions of this issue by T. Alexander Aleinikoff, The Meaning of “Persecution” in United States Asylum Law, 3 Internat’l J. Refugee L. 5 (1991); and Michelle Foster, International Refugee Law and Socio-Economic Rights: Refuge from Deprivation (2007) (arguing that the Refugee Convention is broad enough to cover many economic, social, and cultural deprivations).

25. See, e.g., Sayaxing v. INS, 179 F.3d 515, 519, 520 (7th Cir. 1999); see also the cases discussed in Maureen Graves, From Definition to Exploration: Social Groups and Political Asylum Eligibility, 20 San Diego L.Rev. 740, 806–15 (1989).

Sometimes a court that expresses a singling-out requirement means nothing more than that exposure to the general dangers of war or other strife is not persecution. When that is all that is meant, the notion is probably innocuous as a statutory interpretation matter. If the only danger is that the person might get caught in the cross-fire, then he or she would be ineligible for asylum in any event because the consequence could not be said to occur on account of the victim's race, religion, etc. You will see more on that in section C.

Some courts, however, have made clear that they had in mind a more significant limitation. Some have denied asylum even to applicants who had received personalized threats, on the ground that the threatened harm was too commonplace in the particular country. See Graves, above, at 806–08 (citing several examples). In Bolanos-Hernandez v. INS, 767 F.2d 1277 (9th Cir.1985), a former Salvadoran soldier and police officer claimed asylum on the basis that the guerrillas had threatened to kill him if he did not join their forces or leave the country. The guerrillas had already killed five of the claimant's friends and had similarly threatened and possibly killed the claimant's brother. The BIA nonetheless denied asylum on the ground that the applicant had not adequately "distinguished his situation from that of other Salvadorans." Id. at 1280. The BIA found the threat merely "representative of the general conditions in El Salvador." Id. at 1284. The Ninth Circuit reversed, holding that general evidence of violence, while not in itself sufficient to establish persecution, does not negate persecution when the applicant has also received an individualized threat; if anything, the court pointed out, general violence makes the specific threat more credible. Id. at 1284–85. Accord, Hernandez-Ortiz v. INS, 777 F.2d 509, 515 (9th Cir.1985). The leading treatise on United States asylum law concludes that the approach of rejecting a claim solely because many others face similar threats has now been "firmly rejected." See Anker at 69–72.

Should "persecution" be interpreted to require a threat appreciably distinct from that faced by a large segment of the particular country's population? See Graves, above, at 806–15.

5. A different, albeit related, issue is how to prove a (well-founded) fear of persecution in cases where an entire identifiable group is persecuted in a given country. The Justice Department regulations provide:

In evaluating whether the applicant has sustained the burden of proving that he or she has a well-founded fear of persecution, the asylum officer or immigration judge shall not require the applicant to provide evidence that there is a real possibility he or she would be singled out individually for persecution if (A) The applicant establishes that there is a pattern or practice in his or her country of nationality or, if stateless, his or her last habitual residence, of persecution of a group of persons similarly situated to the applicant on account of race, religion, nationality, membership in a particular social group, or political opinion; and (B) The applicant establishes his or her own inclusion in, and identification with, such group of persons such that his or her fear of persecution upon return is reasonable.

8 CFR § 208.13(b)(2)(iii) (2008); see also id. § 208.16(b)(2) (analogous provision for withholding). Under these provisions, does it matter how broad a segment of the population the particular group comprises? Does it matter whether there are other classes, of which the applicant is not a member, who suffer similar persecution?

6. Sometimes a facially neutral law or policy has a disproportionate adverse impact on a particular group. A military draft that contains no exemption for conscientious objectors poses particular problems for members of certain religions, such as Quakers or Jehovah's Witnesses. Dress requirements for women in some Muslim countries, with severe penalties for violators, disproportionately affect those Muslim women whose religious beliefs do not require the prescribed dress. Should those practices be held to constitute persecution?²⁶

7. In defining "persecution," the BIA in Acosta says that the "harm or suffering must be inflicted upon an individual in order to punish him . . ." [emphasis added]. The Ninth Circuit expressly rejected that view in Pitcherskaia v. INS, 118 F.3d 641 (9th Cir.1997). There, the Russian government purportedly attempted to "cure" homosexuality by forcible institutionalization, electroshock treatments, and drug injections. The court held this to be persecution. The plaintiff was not required to prove that the Russian government wished to harm or punish her. See Goodman, item 3 above, and the further discussion of Pitcherskaia and Professor Goodman's approach, on page 994 below. The same holding can be inferred from Matter of Kasinga, 21 I. & N. Dec. 357 (BIA en banc 1996) (holding female genital mutilation to be persecution even though it is not meant to be "punishment"), discussed in the social group materials below. Because military conscription ordinarily is not designed to be punishment, a further illustration is the line of cases that regard conscription into a military force whose conduct is condemned by the international community as persecution. See the Izatula case, reproduced below. The persecution definition contained in the proposed regulations would make explicit that persecution does not require an intent to harm or punish. See 65 Fed. Reg. 76588, 76590 (commentary), 76597 (Dec. 7, 2000).

8. The word "persecution" usually conjures up images of execution, torture, confinement, threats, or perhaps a steady though less definable harassment. But do the consequences the applicant faces have to reach any particular level of severity in order to constitute persecution? One can hypothesize relatively minor deprivations aimed selectively at particular religious groups or nationalities. Suppose a government imposes on members of a particular religion a tax that is 1% higher than that applicable to the rest of the population, just to “make a point.” Should this otherwise minor discriminatory practice be viewed as persecution on the basis of religion? If members of a private organization that the government is unable to control (Acosta points out such organizations can be the source of persecution) are systematically rude to racial minorities in shops and other public places, should a member of a minority group in that country receive asylum in the United States? See, e.g., Sharif v. INS, 87 F.3d 932, 935 (7th Cir. 1996) (persecution requires “death, imprisonment, or the infliction of substantial harm or suffering”); Kovac v. INS, 407 F.2d 102, 107 (9th Cir. 1969) (“minor disadvantage or trivial inconvenience” not enough, but “substantial economic disadvantage” imposed on account of race, etc., can suffice). In Guinac v. INS, 179 F.3d 1156 (9th Cir. 1999), an indigenous Guatemalan man had been routinely beaten, and threatened with death, by his military superiors, because of his race. The BIA denied asylum, characterizing the beatings and threats as mere “discrimination” rather than “persecution.” The Ninth Circuit reversed.

26. See Martirosyan v. INS, 229 F.3d 903, 909 (9th Cir. 2000); Canas-Segovia v. INS, 970 F.2d 599 (9th Cir.1992), on remand from INS v. Canas-Segovia, 502 U.S. 1086, 112 S.Ct. 1152, 117 L.Ed.2d 401 (1992); Kar-en Musalo, Conscientious Objection as a Basis for Refugee Status: Protection for the Fundamental Right of Freedom of Thought, Conscience and Religion, 20 Refugee Survey Quarterly 69 (2007).

It is generally assumed that some threshold level of seriousness is needed for harm to constitute “persecution.” One issue, however, is “serious from whose standpoint?” The victim’s? The persecutor’s? Society’s? The proposed regulations would require “objectively serious harm or suffering that is subjectively experienced as serious harm or suffering by the applicant.” 65 Fed. Reg. 76588, 76597 (Dec. 7, 2000). The proposed rule therefore requires both that the applicant regard the harm as serious and that an objective observer would share that view.

Consider the following:

Palestinians in Saudi Arabia are relegated to officially sanctioned second-class status incorporated into the legal and social structure of Saudi Arabia. * * * [Although Ahmed’s] parents have lived in Saudi Arabia for 50 years and Ahmed was born in the country, neither he nor his parents have been able to obtain Saudi citizenship because Saudi Arabia reserves citizenship for people of Saudi descent. To remain in the country, Palestinians must renew their residence permits every two years for a fee of 2,000 Riyals (about $530). Palestinians must also be “sponsored” by a Saudi Arabian citizen to own real property, work, or own a business. To illustrate the harsh effects of this requirement, Ahmed related that his father had successfully operated and expanded a grocery store for 15 years, only to see his Saudi sponsor—the de jure owner of the store—take the business away once it became profitable. Each time a Palestinian wishes to change jobs, he must change sponsors for a fee of 6,000 Riyals (about $1,600).

Ahmed * * * was barred from certain activities during high school and initially was not allowed to attend a university because he was an alien. Although he was able to gain admission to King Saud University in Riyadh because of his talent for soccer and the connections of a family friend, he was forced to study political and administrative science at the university because aliens could not choose their own topic of study. After graduating from the university and searching for a job for more than a year, Ahmed was hired in 1993 to sell cars. He testified that he was paid one-third as much as his Saudi counterparts and had to work significantly longer hours.

Ahmed v. Ashcroft, 341 F.3d 214, 215–16 (3d Cir. 2003). The BIA acknowledged that Ahmed had experienced “discrimination” but held that neither statelessness nor this type of economic disadvantage rose to the level of “persecution.” The court affirmed.

9. Throughout this entire discussion, the assumption has been that “persecution” is legally relevant. When the relief sought is asylum under INA § 208, that assumption is clearly correct; asylum requires “refugee” status, and the refugee definition contained in INA § 101(a)(42) in turn expressly refers to “persecution.” For similar reasons, persecution is critical to determinations made in the overseas refugee program. See INA § 207. But the relevance of “persecution” to withholding under INA § 241(b)(3) is not as obvious from the statutory text. That provision does not mention the word “persecution.” It requires instead that the person’s “life or freedom would be threatened.” Despite that wording, both the BIA and the courts freely discuss the likelihood of “persecution” even when they are considering relief under section 241(b)(3). The assumption seems to be that the phrase “life or freedom,” for purposes of withholding, is broad enough to cover the same deprivations that would constitute “persecution” for purposes of the refugee definition and, therefore, section 208. Be careful, however: This issue is different from the standard of proof questions generated by the contrast between the phrases “well-founded fear” and “would be threatened.” Those latter questions are explored on pages 999–1002 below.

10. Now that you have studied the meaning of the “persecution” requirement, do you think, as a policy matter, that a well-founded fear of persecution should be enough to establish refugee status? Or is there good reason to impose the additional requirement that the persecution be linked to one of the five Convention (and U.S. statutory) grounds (race, religion, nationality, membership in a social group or political opinion)?

PERSECUTION VERSUS PROSECUTION

Matter of Izatula

Board of Immigration Appeals, 1990.
20 I. & N.Dec. 149.

* * *

The applicant is a 23-year-old native and citizen of Afghanistan. The applicant is married, but his wife and son are residing in Afghanistan. The applicant arrived in the United States on January 14, 1989. * * *

[In exclusion proceedings, the immigration judge denied asylum and withholding. The applicant appeals.—Eds.]

* * *

The applicant testified that he avoided the representatives of the Soviet-supported Afghan Army and the KHAD secret police when he was in Afghanistan, because he did not want to be conscripted and forced to fight against his own countrymen. The applicant testified further that between 1985 and 1988, he assisted the mujahedin [Afghan rebels—Eds.] by providing them with clothes, groceries, and other supplies. He stated that during this period he let his younger brother run the store. The applicant would obtain a list from the mujahedin indicating the items which they needed, and he would then obtain these supplies with the assistance of his brother. The applicant stated that his brother was able to travel freely around Kandahar because he was not old enough for the Army to be interested in conscripting him. The applicant also stated that he himself would deliver supplies to the mujahedin at night, so that he could avoid being seen by members of the Army or other security forces.

The applicant testified further that his brother was arrested by KHAD secret police in October 1988. He stated that someone informed the KHAD police that he and his brother were assisting the mujahedin. According to the applicant, the KHAD agents then came to the store and arrested his brother. The applicant learned from Ijim Mohammad, a man who lived next to the store, that the KHAD agents had asked for the applicant too when they arrested his brother. The applicant stated that he never saw or heard from his brother after the arrest, but he believed that his brother had been imprisoned.

The applicant stated that he hid at home for the 2 days following his brother's arrest. According to the applicant, on the second day that he was in hiding, a KHAD agent came to the house looking for him. The applicant's father told the KHAD agent that he did not know where the applicant was, and the agent "beat . . . up" the applicant's father. The applicant stated that after the KHAD agent had left his home, he went to a village named Arghandab which is approximately 2 kilometers from Kandahar. The applicant's father moved with him to Arghandab, which was an area under mujahedin control. The applicant also stated that his uncle informed him that KHAD agents continued to look for him at his house in Kandahar after he had fled to Arghandab.

The applicant remained in Arghandab for 1 and 1/2 months. He fled Arghandab because of the "constant bombardment" there, and because his father was injured during an air raid near the house where the applicant and his father were living. The applicant travelled to Pakistan along with nine or ten members of the mujahedin. After he had arrived in Pakistan, the applicant stayed in Chaman for 3 days. He subsequently travelled to Karachi, where he remained for 20 days. In Karachi, the applicant paid a fee to an agent who provided him with a passport and a boarding pass. The applicant testified that he made arrangements to leave Pakistan because he had no family ties there, and because he could not afford to continue to pay for the hotel where he was staying in Karachi.

* * *

The immigration judge based his denial of the applicant's asylum request on two separate grounds. He found first that the applicant's fear of being conscripted by the pro-Soviet Afghan Army was no longer a valid basis for a persecution claim, due to the Soviet forces having withdrawn from Afghanistan in February 1989. Concerning the applicant's active support of the mujahedin, the immigration judge found that the applicant's fear of harm from the Afghan Government relates to "an act of prosecution rather than act of persecution for aiding groups in opposition in an attempt to overthrow the defacto [sic] government of Afghanistan."

We concur with the immigration judge's reasoning that the applicant is not eligible for asylum based on an unwillingness to perform military service in Afghanistan. Since the Soviet forces have withdrawn from Afghanistan, an asylum claim based on a refusal to serve in the Afghan military is no different than any other alien's claim that he will be punished because he did not serve in his country's armed forces.

We do not agree, however, with the immigration judge's rationale that the applicant would be subject to prosecution in Afghanistan due to the assistance which he rendered on behalf of the mujahedin. The applicant established through his testimony that his brother was arrested, and not heard from again, because of his support for the mujahedin. He further established that the authorities sought him out too because he had assisted the mujahedin.

The * * * Department of State's 1988 Country Reports on Human Rights Practices [hereinafter "Country Reports"] * * * provide the following concerning the Afghan Government's treatment of suspected political opponents:

Regime authorities frequently employ torture to punish or to extract information or confessions. The policy is widespread, indicating that it has official sanction. Victims often claim that Soviet officials monitor and indirectly control the torture sessions. Torture techniques include both physical and psychological abuse. Use of electric shock to sensitive parts of the body, immersion in water, and beatings are common forms of physical abuse reported by victims and witnesses. Threats of abuse against family members and prolonged sleep deprivation are typical forms of psychological abuse. Persistent reports describe cases of mental disturbances induced by torture in regime prisons. Political prisoners are usually not segregated from criminal or mentally ill prisoners. Medical care is commonly described as minimal at Pol-e-Charkhi, where prisoners are generally required to wait at least a month before being allowed access to medical personnel. According to reliable reports, many prisoners died in 1988 as a result of inadequate diet, corporal punishment, and torture.

Furthermore, the Country Reports estimate that there are "at least several thousand" political prisoners being held in Afghanistan. The Immigration and Naturalization Service has submitted no evidence to rebut the information in the Country Reports concerning human rights conditions in Afghanistan. Thus, we find that the applicant has demonstrated that he is at risk of imprisonment, at a minimum, in Afghanistan because of his political activity there.

Moreover, we find no basis in the record to conclude, as the immigration judge did, that any punishment which the Afghan Government might impose on the applicant on account of his support for the mujahedin would be an example of a legitimate and internationally recognized government taking action to defend itself from an armed rebellion. The Country Reports explain that in Afghanistan, "[c]itizens have neither the right nor the ability peacefully to change their government. Afghanistan is a totalitarian state under the control of the [People's Democratic Party of Afghanistan], which is kept in power by the Soviet Union." We accordingly find the existing political situation in Afghanistan to be different from that of countries where citizens have an opportunity to seek change in the political structure of the government via peaceful processes. See Dwomoh v. Sava, 696 F.Supp. 970, 979 (S.D.N.Y.1988) ("general rule [that] prosecution for an attempt to overthrow a lawfully constituted government does not constitute persecution . . . [is not] applicable in countries where a coup is the only means through which a change in the political regime can be effected"). Therefore, because we find that the applicant has established that he is at risk of being punished for his political activities in Afghanistan, and because there is no basis in the record to conclude that any punishment imposed by the Afghan Government would be a legitimate exercise of sovereign authority, we conclude that the applicant has established a well-founded fear of persecution in Afghanistan. * * *

* * *

[Exercising its discretion favorably, the Board grants asylum.—Eds.]

CONCURRING OPINION: Fred W. Vacca, Board Member

* * *

[Mr. Vacca agrees with the majority that in view of the Soviet withdrawal the Afghan government's conscription policies do not constitute persecution.—Eds.]

Where I disagree pertains to the applicant's contention that he would be persecuted because of his assistance to mujahedin rebels when he resided in Afghanistan. Specifically, the majority takes issue with the immigration judge's finding that the applicant's assistance to the mujahedin may result in his prosecution for criminal violations if he were to be returned to Afghanistan. The majority reasons that the assistance in furnishing supplies to the mujahedin was a political activity, that the applicant's brother was imprisoned by the Government for the same activity, and that in view of the thousands of Afghans who are imprisoned for political activity, the applicant "is at risk of imprisonment at a minimum." The majority rationalizes that "there is no basis in the record to conclude that any punishment imposed by the Afghan Government would be a legitimate exercise of sovereign authority. . . ." In effect, the majority finds that the Afghan Government is illegitimate and therefore incapable of imposing a lawful punishment. This finding is based upon the notion that any government that does not provide for political change through democratic and peaceful processes cannot defend itself against armed rebellion, insurrection, and coup d'etat without engaging in persecution.

In its broadest ramifications, the majority wades in dangerous waters when it presumes to make judgments as to the legitimacy of sovereign nations by scrutinizing their political systems. Clearly, the President of the United States has constitutional authority to formulate and conduct foreign policy and does so through the Secretary of State and the Department of State. The Board, however, as a delegate of the Attorney General, has no authority to make pronouncements concerning the legitimacy of sovereign nations. Just as treason, insurrection, and providing aid and comfort to the enemy are punishable crimes under the political system of the United States, these acts are most probably punishable crimes in Ghana, El Salvador, Afghanistan, and almost all countries of the world. To hold that some governments may create laws affecting crimes, adjudicate criminal cases, and impose punishments upon offending citizens and other governments may not depending upon the nature of their political systems is patently absurd. The right of all nations to recruit soldiers and maintain armies to protect themselves from enemies within or without their borders is recognized as fundamental in international law. This sovereign right is not limited to countries whose internal political structures are democratic. If a totalitarian government prevents violent overthrow of its government, then the perpetrators of the failed coup are subject to the criminal laws of that government notwithstanding the fact that due process as we know it may not exist in that country.

* * *

* * * As pointed out in the [UNHCR Handbook], persons fleeing from prosecution are not normally refugees. However, prosecution for an offense may be a pretext for punishing an individual for his political opinion. Therefore such factors as the nature of the crime and the severity of the punishment vis-a-vis the crime committed should be considered. * * *

* * * In Afghanistan prisons and detention camps, political prisoners are routinely tortured, deprived of adequate food and medical care, and suffer corporal punishment. I find it reasonable to conclude that if the applicant were convicted for his crime and incarcerated he would suffer punishment disproportionate to his crime. Under these circumstances, his punishment would be in the nature of persecution. * * *

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. In Acosta, the BIA provided general guidance on the meaning of persecution. In Izatula, the BIA takes on a more specific issue: When does criminal punishment amount to persecution? See generally Anker at 199–209.

After rejecting the argument that the applicant would be persecuted for resisting the draft, both the majority opinion and that of Board Member Vacca address the applicant's fear of punishment for aiding the rebels. As Mr. Vacca points out, prosecuting a criminal violation is not ordinarily considered persecution, and intentionally assisting armed insurrection is surely a violation of the criminal law. The majority, however, recognizes an exception based on the totalitarian nature of the Afghan government. The majority seems to regard armed rebellion against a totalitarian government as serving a function akin to voting in a democracy—i.e., as the legitimate avenue for effecting change. Mr. Vacca disagrees. Who has the better of the argument? Would BIA and judicial evaluations of the legitimacy of foreign governments impinge on the President's authority to formulate foreign policy? Are adjudicative bodies competent to assess legitimacy? When the Third Reich executed members of the resistance during World War II, was it "persecuting" them?

2. Board Member Vacca also ends up finding a well-founded fear of persecution, but through a very different route. Paragraphs 85 and 86 of the UNHCR Handbook, which he cites, say:

85. Whether a political offender can also be considered a refugee will depend upon various other factors. Prosecution for an offence may, depending upon the circumstances, be a pretext for punishing the offender for his political opinions or the expression thereof. Again, there may be reason to believe that a political offender would be exposed to excessive or arbitrary punishment for the alleged offence. Such excessive or arbitrary punishment will amount to persecution.

86. In determining whether a political offender can be considered a refugee, regard should also be had to the following elements: personality of the applicant, his political opinion, the motive behind the act, the nature of the act committed, the nature of the prosecution and its motives; finally, also, the nature of the law on which the prosecution is based. * * *

Think especially about the second and third sentences of paragraph 85. Do you see any relationship between them? Do you find either of these two exceptions applicable to Izatula? How does Board Member Vacca apply them? How do you suppose he would have applied them if the punishment had simply been execution—after a fair trial and without torture?

3. The UNHCR Handbook, in paragraphs 167–74, speaks specifically to the issue of draft evasion. Its interpretation is that punishment for refusing to be drafted may constitute persecution if either (a) the international community condemns the acts of the particular country's military forces or (b) the punishment is disproportionately severe on account of one of the five Convention/statutory grounds.²⁷ Paragraphs 170–72 discuss the effect of conscientious objection but leave unclear whether “genuine political, religious or moral convictions” are an independent basis for a persecution claim or merely an essential element of a claim based on prong (a) above.

4. Both the majority and Mr. Vacca reject Izatula’s first argument. They hold that the Soviet troop withdrawal precludes classifying the government’s punishment of draft evaders as persecution. Yet both opinions accept his second argument—that punishing him for aiding the rebels is persecution (and based on political opinion). Are the dispositions of his two claims reconcilable? Does either the majority’s rationale (the government is totalitarian) or Mr. Vacca’s rationale (the punishment is excessive) apply with any less force to Izatula’s first claim? If anything, do not both rationales apply with even greater force to the first claim?

COERCIVE POPULATION CONTROLS AS PERSECUTION²⁸

In Matter of Chang, 20 I. & N. Dec. 38 (BIA 1989), a Chinese national objected to his country’s “one-couple, one-child” policy. Chinese law provides a package of economic carrots and sticks designed to discourage couples from having more than one child. The applicant alleged that, although the law does not authorize anyone to compel abortion or sterilization, it is not unusual for local officials to do so unlawfully. The BIA found as fact that Chang and his wife were unlikely to incur anything but economic sanctions if, as they desired, they were to have three children. The Board added, however, that in China even forcible sterilization would not constitute persecution. The Board saw such a measure as a reasonable response to China’s extraordinary population problems; in addition, the Board observed that the Changs were not being treated differently from any other Chinese couple and that there was no evidence the government’s policy was a pretext to accomplish any hidden goal. Do you agree with the Board’s decision? What if the Changs were Roman Catholics whose religious convictions precluded abortion, sterilization, and most other forms of birth control?

All this has since changed. One month after the decision in Chang, Chinese government troops massacred members of the pro-democracy movement in Tiananmen Square. A few months later the U.S. Attorney General responded with interim regulations that superseded the specific result in Chang. Under the interim regulations, a well-founded fear of 27. Accord, Islami v. Gonzales, 412 F.3d 391, 396–97 (2d Cir. 2005); Matter of A.G., 19 I. & N. Dec. 502, 506 (BIA 1987). For an unusually strict reading of the first prong, see M.A. v. United States I.N.S., 899 F.2d 304, 312–14 (4th Cir. en banc, 1990); see also id. at 321–24 (Winter, J., dissenting).

28. See generally Katherine L. Vaughns, Retooling the “Refugee” Definition: The New Immigration Reform Law’s Impact on United States Domestic Asylum Policy, 1

Rutgers Race & L. Rev. 41 (1998) (questioning wisdom of special legislation to benefit particular group for ideological reasons); Mary Crock, Apart from Us or a Part of Us? Immigrants’ Rights, Public Opinion and the Rule of Law, 10 Internat’l J. Refugee L. 49 (1998) (detailing responses of Australian courts to Chinese asylum claims based on fear of coerced sterilization and abortion).

coerced abortion or sterilization automatically made a person eligible for asylum and withholding. See 55 Fed.Reg. 2803-05 (Jan. 29, 1990). After seven years of further administrative developments, Congress in 1996 amended the definition of “refugee” to supersede the BIA decision in Chang. Under the amended definition, any forced abortion or sterilization, or persecution for failure or refusal to submit to abortion or sterilization, constitutes persecution on account of political opinion. INA § 101(a)(42), as amended by IIRIRA § 601. It is no longer necessary, therefore, to prove a singling out because of race, religion, political opinion, or other impermissible reasons. In Matter of X.P.T., 21 I. & N. Dec. 634 (BIA 1996), the Board interpreted the 1996 amendment as extending to withholding of removal.

While the 1996 amendment has helped certain asylum claimants qualify as refugees, establishing refugee status does not guarantee asylum. As you will see in more detail in subsection B.6 below, an asylum claimant also needs the favorable exercise of discretion. When refugee status is based only on past persecution, rather than on a well-founded fear of future persecution, the favorable exercise of discretion is more tenuous, whether the persecution relates to coercive population control or anything else.

In Matter of C-Y-Z-, 21 I. & N. Dec. 915 (BIA 1997), the Board granted withholding of removal under this provision to an applicant whom the Chinese authorities had forcibly sterilized, even though there obviously was no fear of future sterilization. As you will also see later, past persecution triggers a presumption of future persecution which, under the then existing regulations, the government could have rebutted only by showing changed country conditions. A 2000 amendment now allows ICE to rebut the presumption through any evidence of changed circumstances (not just changed country conditions) that shows the absence of the required well-founded fear. 8 CFR §§ 208.13(b)(1)(i)(A) (asylum), 208.16(b)(1)(A) (withholding) (2008). In addition, asylum is often denied on discretionary grounds when a “fundamental” change of circumstances eliminates the fear of future persecution. Id. § 208.13(b)(1)(i)(A). Nonetheless, the fact that forced sterilization cannot be repeated does not constitute the kind of changed circumstances that would dictate a discretionary denial. To the contrary, the BIA has said, forced sterilization is a “continuing” persecution.

The Board in C-Y-Z- went on to hold that the spouse of the individual who was subjected to the forced abortion or sterilization is also entitled to refugee status under the same provision. In Matter of S-L-L-, 24 I. & N. Dec. 1 (BIA 2006), the Board reaffirmed this holding, while clarifying that the rule applied only when the partners were legally married and the spouse objected to the forced abortion or sterilization. Several courts of appeals have deferred to that BIA interpretation. See the list of cases cited in Shi Liang Lin v. USDOJ, 494 F.3d 296, 300 n.4 (2d Cir. en banc 2007). But in Shi Liang Lin, a divided Second Circuit, sitting en banc, disapproved C-Y-Z- and S-L-L-. The court rejected per se refugee status for spouses in favor of an individualized inquiry into the spouse’s own persecution or well-founded fear of persecution. In 2008, the Attorney General followed suit, overruling C-Y-Z- and S-L-L- to that extent. Matter of J-S-, 24 I. & N. Dec. 520 (AG 2008).

Those courts that recognize per se refugee status for the spouses of victims of forced sterilization or abortion are divided over whether to extend the rule to unmarried partners. See the cases listed in Shi Liang Lin, 494 F.3d at 300. One recurring problem has been China's refusal to recognize marriages when the male partner is under age 22. Suppose a couple would have married but for that limitation. Will a person qualify for asylum based on the forced abortion or sterilization of his or her partner under those circumstances? On that issue, too, the courts are divided. Compare Kui Rong Ma v. Ashcroft, 361 F.3d 553 (9th Cir. 2004) (allowing asylum claim where "traditional" marriage ceremony was performed because China would not recognize legal marriages of males under age 22), with Cai Luan Chen v. Ashcroft, 381 F.3d 221 (3d Cir. 2004) (Judge Alito deferring to BIA interpretation denying asylum of unmarried partner, even when marriage was precluded only by Chinese age-22 rule).

Until 2005, the statute limited the use of the 1996 amendment to 1,000 persons per year. See former INA § 207(a)(5). To accommodate the excess demand, EOIR developed a practice of "conditional" grants of asylum based on coercive population controls. In chronological order, the conditional grants eventually became outright grants. But huge backlogs accumulated, reaching approximately 9000 by February 1, 2005. See 10 BIB 100 (Feb. 1, 2005). At a rate of 1000 per year, it would have taken nine years for those applicants to receive asylum. In 2005, the REAL ID Act, § 101(g)(2), repealed the annual 1,000 cap.

The special treatment of claims based on coercive population controls does not spell automatic success for Chinese couples who allege fear of compulsory sterilization or abortion. The major hurdle is demonstrating that the fear is well-founded. In Yong Hao Chen v. INS, 195 F.3d 198 (4th Cir. 1999), the court noted the State Department's opinion that forced sterilizations and abortions have become less frequent in China, that they occur mainly in the rural areas, and that they are especially unlikely to affect people (like the couple in question) who bear children while attending university in the United States and then return home. Id. at 200, 204. Consequently, the court held, the burden is on the applicant to demonstrate either that the State Department is wrong or that he or she has particular reason to fear coerced sterilization or abortion. Id. See also Matter of J-W-S-, 24 I. & N. Dec. 185 (BIA 2007) (finding no evidence that Chinese government would forcibly sterilize one who returns with second child born overseas). But see Xiao Kui Lin v. Mukasey, 553 F.3d 217, 221-24 (2d Cir. 2009) (requiring individualized inquiry into whether local government forcibly sterilizes those whose second children are born overseas and finding record evidence insufficient to support such a finding).

QUESTION

Which view is more in keeping with what you have learned so far about the difference between prosecution and persecution—the BIA's position in Chang or Congress's position in IIRIRA?

Once the Board in Izatula found a well-founded fear of persecution (rather than prosecution), it held Izatula eligible for asylum. In doing so, however, it skipped over an important question: Was the persecution he feared on account of political opinion? Had he been a mercenary, acting solely for economic reasons rather than political ones, do you think the government would have punished him any less severely? If the answer is no, is the government really persecuting him because of his political opinions, or simply because it wants to deter people, whatever their views, from attempting to overthrow the government? Hold off on your answer; the next subsection will examine what it means for persecution to be “on account of” one of the five Convention/statutory grounds.

2. “ON ACCOUNT OF RACE, RELIGION, NATIONALITY, MEMBERSHIP IN A PARTICULAR SOCIAL GROUP, OR POLITICAL OPINION”

a. RACE, RELIGION, NATIONALITY

The vast majority of the asylum claimants in the United States have alleged persecution based on political opinion or social group. But claims based on race, religion, and nationality have also been significant.

The UNHCR Handbook, para. 68, defines race “in its widest sense to include all kinds of ethnic groups that are referred to as ‘races’ in common usage.” With similar breadth, paragraph 74 defines “nationality” to include not only citizenship status, but also “membership of an ethnic or linguistic group.” Naturally, these bases frequently overlap—with each other and with the social group and political opinion prongs considered below.

Race and nationality asylum claims have been relatively infrequent. See, e.g., Matter of Tan, 12 I. & N. Dec. 564 (BIA 1967) (Indonesian citizen of Chinese descent failed to show he would be singled out); Matter of Rodríguez, 10 I. & N. Dec. 488 (BIA 1964) (evidence insufficient to show East Indian mobs in British Guiana would persecute black asylum claimant because of race). In recent years, however, they have begun to increase. See Anker at 407–13; Stephen Yale-Loehr & Brian Palmer, Asylum Law Update, 5 BIB 633, at 633 (July 15, 2000). There have been claims by Fijians of Indian descent, id., racially motivated rapes, e.g. Shoafra v. INS, 228 F.3d 1070 (9th Cir. 2000), and claims by Jews from the former Soviet Union, e.g. Matter of O.Z. & I.Z., 22 I. & N. Dec. 23 (BIA 1998) (nationality).

Religion has played an important role in the United States overseas admission program, particularly with respect to Soviet Jews, Soviet evangelical Christians, and persecuted religious minorities in Iran. See section A. Until recently, however, asylum claims based on religion had been few and far between. That seems to be changing. See generally Karen Musalo, Claims for Protection Based on Religion or Belief, 16 Internat’l J. Refugee L. 165 (2004). Asylum claims by secular Muslims and Soviet Jews have become more common. See Yale-Loehr & Palmer, above, at 633-35; see also Anker at 398-407. The UNHCR Handbook does not define "religion," though paragraphs 71-73 furnish some examples of forms of persecution often incurred by religious groups.

The courts have generally held that an asylum claim based on religious persecution may not be denied solely because the applicant has a weak knowledge of the relevant religious doctrine. See, e.g., Rizal v. Gonzales, 442 F.3d 84 (2d Cir. 2006); Zhen Li lao v. Gonzales, 400 F.3d 530 (7th Cir. 2005). Moreover, as you will see in more detail with respect to the "political opinion" prong of the refugee definition (pages 923-25 below), it appears to be sufficient that the persecutor rightly or wrongly "imputes" a particular religion to the applicant and persecutes him or her for that reason. See Rizal, above, at 90 n.7; see generally Amanfi v. Ashcroft, 328 F.3d 719, 727-30 (3d Cir. 2003), and sources cited therein.

Conscientious objector claims have also raised questions about religious persecution.²⁹ And the religion prong of the refugee definition can sometimes prove useful in gender-based claims. See, e.g., Matter of S-A-, 22 I. & N. Dec. 1328 (BIA 2000) (fundamentalist father abused daughter for failing to obey his religious dictates), discussed below in the context of gender-based claims.

The International Religious Freedom Act of 1998, Pub. L. 105-292, 112 Stat. 2787 (Oct. 27, 1998) [IRFA], has potential ramifications for religion-based asylum claims. The Act creates, in the State Department, a new Office on International Religious Freedom, charged with monitoring religious persecution around the world. The Office will also assist the Secretary of State in preparing its annual Human Rights Reports and a separate "Annual Report on International Religious Freedom." IRFA §§ 101, 102. The latter is to be used by all who adjudicate asylum cases. Id. § 601. The 2006 annual report singled out Burma, China, Eritrea, Iran, North Korea, Saudi Arabia, Sudan, and Vietnam as countries in which the violations of religious freedom were "particularly severe." See U.S. Dept. of State, 2006 Report on International Religious Freedom, <http://www.state.gov/g/drl/rls/irf/2006/>, digested in 83 IR 2112 (Oct. 2, 2006). IRFA also established the United States Commission on International Religious Freedom, which reported annually for four years on the state of religious freedom overseas. Id. §§ 201-06. In February 2005 the Commission also published a comprehensive study on asylum seekers in the expedited removal system, discussed in section B.7 below. In addition, the statute requires training for all Justice Department and State Department personnel involved in refugee adjudication. See id. §§ 602(a) (adding INA § 207(f) for Justice Department adjudicators) and 602(b) (for foreign service officers). Professor Craig Mousin, analyzing IRFA, urges greater importation of international human rights standards into asylum claims based on denial of religious freedom. See Craig B. Mousin, Standing with the Persecuted: Adjudicating Religious Asylum Claims after the Enactment of the International Religious Freedom Act of 1998, 2003 BYU L. Rev. 541. The Hebrew Immigrant Aid Society (HIAS) has published a report cataloguing instances in which individuals with seemingly valid religious-based asylum claims were denied by the BIA for reasons that courts ultimately found flawed. See HIAS, Faithful but Forsaken: Real ID Act Harms Victims of Religious Persecution (Jan. 24, 2005) (including examples of Armenian Pentecostals, Eastern Orthodox Serbs, Bulgarian Protestants, Chinese Falun Gong and Yi Guan Do practitioners, Chinese Christians, Egyptian Coptic Christians, Eritrean and Ethiopian Jehovah's Witnesses, Fijians of mixed religions, Indonesian Christians, Romanian Baptists, Russian Evangelicals, and Turkmenian Jews).

²⁹ See Canas-Segovia v. INS, 970 F.2d 599 (9th Cir.1992), on remand from INS v. Canas-Segovia, 502 U.S. 1086, 112 S.Ct. 1152, 117 L.Ed.2d 401 (1992), analyzed in Karen Musalo, Swords into Ploughshares: Why the United States Should Provide Refuge for Young Men Who Refuse to Bear Arms for Reasons of Conscience, 26 San Diego L.Rev.

849 (1989); see also Barraza Rivera v. INS, 913 F.2d 1443 (9th Cir.1990) (Salvadoran who deserted army because threatened with death if he did not betray own conscience by helping to murder two others had shown well-founded fear of persecution on account of "religion").

b. POLITICAL OPINION³⁰

INS v. Elias-Zacarias

Supreme Court of the United States, 1992.
502 U.S. 478, 112 S.Ct. 812, 117 L.Ed.2d 38.

■ JUSTICE SCALIA delivered the opinion of the Court.

The principal question presented by this case is whether a guerrilla organization's attempt to coerce a person into performing military service necessarily constitutes "persecution on account of . . . political opinion" under § 101(a)(42) of the Immigration and Nationality Act.

I

Respondent Elias-Zacarias, a native of Guatemala, was apprehended in July 1987 for entering the United States without inspection. In deportation proceedings brought by petitioner Immigration and Naturalization Service (INS), Elias-Zacarias conceded his deportability but requested asylum and withholding of deportation.

The Immigration Judge summarized Elias-Zacarias' testimony as follows:

"[A]round the end of January in 1987 [when Elias-Zacarias was 18], two armed, uniformed guerrillas with handkerchiefs covering part of their faces came to his home. Only he and his parents were there. . . . The guerrillas asked his parents and himself to join with them, but they all refused. The guerrillas asked them why and told them that they would be back, and that they should think it over about joining them.

"[Elias-Zacarias] did not want to join the guerrillas because the guerrillas are against the government and he was afraid that the government would retaliate against him and his family if he did join the guerril-

30. See generally Anker at 290-376.

las. He left Guatemala at the end of March [1987] . . . because he was afraid that the guerrillas would return.”

The Immigration Judge understood from this testimony that Elias-Zacarias' request for asylum and for withholding of deportation was “based on this one attempted recruitment by the guerrillas.” She concluded that Elias-Zacarias had failed to demonstrate persecution or a well-founded fear of persecution on account of race, religion, nationality, membership in a particular social group, or political opinion, and was not eligible for asylum. She further concluded that he did not qualify for withholding of deportation.

The Board of Immigration Appeals (BIA) summarily dismissed Elias-Zacarias' appeal on procedural grounds. Elias-Zacarias then moved the BIA to reopen his deportation hearing so that he could submit new evidence that, following his departure from Guatemala, the guerrillas had twice returned to his family's home in continued efforts to recruit him. The BIA denied reopening on the ground that even with this new evidence Elias-Zacarias had failed to make a prima facie showing of eligibility for asylum and had failed to show that the results of his deportation hearing would be changed.

The Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit, treating the BIA's denial of the motion to reopen as an affirmance on the merits of the Immigration Judge's ruling, reversed. The court ruled that acts of conscription by a nongovernmental group constitute persecution on account of political opinion, and determined that Elias-Zacarias had a “well-founded fear” of such conscription. We granted certiorari.

II

Section 208(a) of the Immigration and Nationality Act authorizes the Attorney General, in his discretion, to grant asylum to an alien who is a “refugee” as defined in the Act, i. e., an alien who is unable or unwilling to return to his home country “because of persecution or a well-founded fear of persecution on account of race, religion, nationality, membership in a particular social group, or political opinion.” INA § 101(a)(42)(A). The BIA's determination that Elias-Zacarias was not eligible for asylum must be upheld if “supported by reasonable, substantial, and probative evidence on the record considered as a whole.” INA § 106(a)(4). It can be reversed only if the evidence presented by Elias-Zacarias was such that a reasonable factfinder would have to conclude that the requisite fear of persecution existed.

The Court of Appeals found reversal warranted. In its view, a guerrilla organization's attempt to conscript a person into its military forces necessarily constitutes “persecution on account of . . . political opinion,” because “the person resisting forced recruitment is expressing a political opinion hostile to the persecutor and because the persecutors' motive in carrying out the kidnapping is political.” The first half of this seems to us untrue, and the second half irrelevant.

Even a person who supports a guerrilla movement might resist recruitment for a variety of reasons—fear of combat, a desire to remain with one's family and friends, a desire to earn a better living in civilian life, to mention only a few. The record in the present case not only failed to show a political motive on Elias-Zacarias' part; it showed the opposite. He testified that he refused to join the guerrillas because he was afraid that the government would retaliate against him and his family if he did so. Nor is there any indication (assuming, arguendo, it would suffice) that the guerrillas erroneously believed that Elias-Zacarias' refusal was politically based.

As for the Court of Appeals' conclusion that the guerrillas' "motive in carrying out the kidnapping is political": It apparently meant by this that the guerrillas seek to fill their ranks in order to carry on their war against the government and pursue their political goals. But that does not render the forced recruitment "persecution on account of . . . political opinion." * * * The ordinary meaning of the phrase "persecution on account of . . . political opinion" in § 101(a)(42) is persecution on account of the victim's political opinion, not the persecutor's. If a Nazi regime persecutes Jews, it is not, within the ordinary meaning of language, engaging in persecution on account of political opinion; and if a fundamentalist Moslem regime persecutes democrats, it is not engaging in persecution on account of religion. Thus, the mere existence of a generalized "political" motive underlying the guerrillas' forced recruitment is inadequate to establish (and, indeed, goes far to refute) the proposition that Elias-Zacarias fears persecution on account of political opinion, as § 101(a)(42) requires.

Elias-Zacarias appears to argue that not taking sides with any political faction is itself the affirmative expression of a political opinion. That seems to us not ordinarily so, since we do not agree with the dissent that only a "narrow, grudging construction of the concept of 'political opinion'" would distinguish it from such quite different concepts as indifference, indecisiveness and risk-averseness. But we need not decide whether the evidence compels the conclusion that Elias-Zacarias held a political opinion. Even if it does, Elias-Zacarias still has to establish that the record also compels the conclusion that he has a "well-founded fear" that the guerrillas will persecute him because of that political opinion, rather than because of his refusal to fight with them. He has not done so with the degree of clarity necessary to permit reversal of a BIA finding to the contrary; indeed, he has not done so at all.

Elias-Zacarias objects that he cannot be expected to provide direct proof of his persecutors' motives. We do not require that. But since the statute makes motive critical, he must provide some evidence of it, direct or circumstantial. And if he seeks to obtain judicial reversal of the BIA's determination, he must show that the evidence he presented was so compelling that no reasonable factfinder could fail to find the requisite fear of persecution. That he has not done.

The BIA's determination should therefore have been upheld in all respects, and we reverse the Court of Appeals' judgment to the contrary.

It is so ordered.

■ JUSTICE STEVENS, with whom JUSTICE BLACKMUN and JUSTICE O'CONNOR join, dissenting.

* * *

It is undisputed that respondent has a well-founded fear that he will be harmed, if not killed, if he returns to Guatemala. It is also undisputed that the cause of that harm, if it should occur, is the guerrilla organization's displeasure with his refusal to join them in their armed insurrection against the government. The question of law that the case presents is whether respondent's well-founded fear is a "fear of persecution on account of . . . political opinion" within the meaning of § 101(a)(42) of the Immigration and Naturalization [sic] Act.

* * *

Today the Court holds that respondent's fear of persecution is not "on account of . . . political opinion" for two reasons. First, he failed to prove that his refusal to join the guerrillas was politically motivated; indeed, he testified that he was at least in part motivated by a fear that government forces would retaliate against him or his family if he joined the guerrillas. Second, he failed to prove that his persecutors' motives were political. In particular, the Court holds that the persecutors' implicit threat to retaliate against respondent "because of his refusal to fight with them" is not persecution on account of political opinion. I disagree with both parts of the Court's reasoning.

I

A political opinion can be expressed negatively as well as affirmatively. A refusal to support a cause—by staying home on election day, by refusing to take an oath of allegiance, or by refusing to step forward at an induction center—can express a political opinion as effectively as an affirmative statement or affirmative conduct. Even if the refusal is motivated by nothing more than a simple desire to continue living an ordinary life with one's family, it is the kind of political expression that the asylum provisions of the statute were intended to protect.

As the Court of Appeals explained in Bolanos-Hernandez v. INS, 767 F. 2d 1277 (CA9 1985): "Choosing to remain neutral is no less a political decision than is choosing to affiliate with a particular political faction."
* * *

* * *

It follows as night follows day that the guerrillas' implied threat to "take" him or to "kill" him if he did not change his position constituted threatened persecution "on account of" that political opinion. As the Court of Appeals explained in Bolanos-Hernandez, supra:

"It does not matter to the persecutors what the individual's motivation is. The guerrillas in El Salvador do not inquire into the reasoning process of those who insist on remaining neutral and refuse to join their cause.

They are concerned only with an act that constitutes an overt manifestation of a political opinion. Persecution because of that overt manifestation is persecution because of a political opinion.”³¹

* * * Because respondent expressed a political opinion by refusing to join the guerrillas, and they responded by threatening to “take” or to “kill” him if he did not change his mind, his fear that the guerrillas will persecute him on account of his political opinion is well founded.³²

Accordingly, I would affirm the judgment of the Court of Appeals.

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. The majority opinion in Elias-Zacarias addresses two questions: whether the applicant has expressed a political opinion and, if so, whether the persecution he fears is on account of that political opinion. In discussing the first issue, the Court touches on several subissues: Can neutrality be political opinion? Can one express a political opinion through inaction? Should a person’s reason for refusing to join a guerrilla army—self-preservation versus opposition to the guerrillas’ goals—determine whether the refusal constitutes the expression of a political opinion? These questions are taken up below in a separate Note entitled “Neutrality as Political Opinion.”

2. From this point on, assume that Elias-Zacarias’s refusal to join the guerrillas was motivated by his political opinion. The question then becomes whether the feared persecution can be characterized as being on account of his political opinion. As to that, the Court makes clear that the persecution must be on account of the victim’s political opinion; it is not enough that the persecution promoted the political objectives of the persecutors. In 2000, the Justice Department made that principle a part of its proposed (and still pending) asylum regulations. 65 Fed. Reg. at 76592 (Dec. 7, 2000) (reaffirming political opinion portion of Matter of R.A., 22 I.

31. [Footnote 6 in original] The Government has argued that respondent’s statement is analogous to that of a person who leaves a country to avoid being drafted into military service. The INS has long recognized, however, that the normal enforcement of selective service laws is not “persecution” within the meaning of the statute even if the draftee’s motive is political. Thus, while holding that an Afghan soldier who refused to fight under Soviet command qualified as a political refugee, Matter of Salim, the INS has adhered “to the long-accepted position that it is not persecution for a country to require military service of its citizens.” Matter of A.G.; cf. United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees, Handbook on Procedures and Criteria for Determining Refugee Status, para. 167 (1979) (“Fear of prosecution and punishment for desertion or draft-evasion does not in itself constitute well-founded fear of persecution under the [1967 Protocol Relating to the Status of Refugees]”).

32. [Footnote 7 in original] In response to this dissent, the Court suggests that respondent and I have exaggerated the “well-foundedness” of his fear. The Court’s legal analysis, however, would produce precisely the same result no matter how unambiguous the guerrillas’ threatened retaliation might have been. Moreover, any doubts concerning the sinister character of a suggestion to “think it over” delivered by two uniformed masked men carrying machine guns should be resolved in respondent’s favor.

& N. Dec. 906 (BIA 1999, vacated by A.G. 2001)). Statutory interpretation aside, is such a rule good policy?

3. Put another way, the Court appears to say that the guerrillas will persecute Elias-Zacarias because he refuses to join them, not because they disapprove of his political opinions. The assumption is that the guerrillas won't care what political views, if any, motivated him to refuse their demands; all they will care about is that he refused. First, suppose a government persecutes union leaders in order to discourage strikes. If the government didn't care whether the union leaders were acting out of political conviction or self-aggrandizement, would an asylum claim fail for lack of a link between the persecution and the union leader's political opinion? Second, would Izatula have been decided differently had the Supreme Court already handed down its decision in Elias-Zacarias? Third, can you hypothesize any asylum case based on political opinion that would satisfy the requirements imposed in Elias-Zacarias?

4. The Court in Elias-Zacarias affirms a decision of the BIA. Why would the BIA hold Elias-Zacarias ineligible for asylum when it had previously granted asylum in Izatula? Could one argue that, if anything, Elias-Zacarias's claim was the stronger of the two?

5. The majority opinion in Elias-Zacarias makes only cursory reference to a doctrine known as imputed political opinion. Under that doctrine, as long as the persecutor believes the applicant holds a particular view and intends to persecute the person because of it, it does not matter that the belief is wrong. See, e.g., Ramirez Rivas v. INS, 899 F.2d 864, 867 (9th Cir.1990). Should imputed political opinion suffice? Argue both ways.

6. After suggesting that Elias-Zacarias's refusal to join the guerrillas was not politically based, the Court said: "Nor is there any indication (assuming, arguendo, it would suffice) that the guerrillas erroneously believed that Elias-Zacarias' refusal was politically based." [Emphasis in original.] For a while, that dictum left some uncertainty about the continued viability of imputed political opinion. See, e.g., Bruce J. Einhorn, Political Asylum in the Ninth Circuit and the Case of Elias-Zacarias, 29 San Diego L. Rev. 597 (1992). The doctrine now appears settled. It has been accepted by the General Counsel for the former INS, the BIA, the courts, and the proposed, still pending Justice Department regulations.³³ The imputation concept has been extended to the religion ground as well. See page 917 above.

33. See Legal Opinion of then INS General Counsel Grover Joseph Rees III (Jan. 19, 1993, amended Mar. 4, 1993), reproduced in 70 IR 498-512 (April 12, 1993); Matter of S.P., 21 I. & N. Dec. 486 (BIA en banc, 1996); Chavarria v. Gonzalez, 446 F.3d 508, 581 (3d Cir. 2006); Kumar v. Gonzales, 444 F.3d 1043, 1053-54 (9th Cir. 2006); Chun Gao v. Gonzales, 424 F.3d 122 (2d Cir. 2005); 65 Fed. Reg. at 76597-98 (Dec. 7, 2000) (proposed regulations) (enough that persecutor would act "on account of what the persecutor perceives to be the applicant's . . . political opinion") [emphasis added]. Canadian law similarly recognizes imputed political opinion. See Re Attorney-General of Canada and Ward, 103 D.L.R.4th 1 (Supreme Court of Canada, 1993); see generally Anker at 325-48.

7. In Lazo-Majano v. INS, 813 F.2d 1432 (9th Cir. 1987), one court of appeals took the imputed political opinion doctrine another step. A Salvadoran army sergeant had been holding Lazo-Majano in a state of virtual bondage, savagely and repeatedly beating and raping her. He threatened to falsely accuse her of subversion if she were to leave or tell the police. The court held she made out a claim of persecution based on imputed political opinion. Since the persecutor was well aware that the victim was not a subversive, the court's conclusion required a holding that even falsely, or cynically, imputed political opinion could suffice. Accord, Desir v. Ilchert, 840 F.2d 723 (9th Cir. 1988). The German Constitutional Court similarly has recognized cynically imputed political opinion. See 5 Internat'l J. Refugee L. 474-75 (1993).

In Matter of R.A., 22 I. & N. Dec. 906 (BIA 1999), the asylum applicant was a Guatemalan woman whose husband had subjected her to extreme, prolonged, physical and mental abuse. The police would not protect her. She argued, among other things, that her husband was harming her in order to overcome her resistance to his male domination. The claim was one of imputed political opinion.

The Board found her testimony credible and found she had a well-founded fear of persecution. But the Board also concluded that there was no nexus between the persecution she feared and any political opinion her husband might impute to her. There was no evidence, the Board said, that he cared what her political opinions were.

Because the case arose in the Ninth Circuit, the Board had to distinguish Lazo-Majano. To do so, it read Lazo-Majano as standing only for the proposition that cynically imputed political opinion can suffice. Here, the Board believed, the persecution could not be linked to any imputed political opinion, cynical or otherwise.

In Lazo-Majano, however, the court had provided two other, independent rationales for the result. The court had treated the persecutor as seeking to overcome Lazo-Majano's actual political opinion that men should not be permitted to dominate women. In addition, the court had reasoned, Lazo-Majano's flight from persecution was itself an expression of political opinion, for which her tormentor would now persecute her if she were to return. But the Board declined to recognize those holdings, on the theory that they were inconsistent with Elias-Zacarias. There were, the Board said, no post-Elias-Zacarias cases in the Ninth Circuit confirming that those aspects of Lazo-Majano were still good law.

On January 19, 2001, on her last full day in office, Attorney General Janet Reno vacated the decision in R.A. (for reasons related to the Board's analysis of a "social group" issue explored in the next section) and ordered the Board to stay reconsideration until the proposed Justice Department regulations are made final. Matter of R.A., 22 I. & N. Dec. at 906. These and subsequent developments in the case are discussed below in the context of R.A.'s social group claim.

Should cynically imputed political opinion qualify a person for asylum? Argue both ways.

8. The Elias-Zacarias decision has come under heavy fire.³⁴

NEUTRALITY AS POLITICAL OPINION

In international wars, few citizens of the warring nations feel neutral, and even fewer openly express neutrality. Today, however, the vast majority of the wars raging at any given time are civil conflicts, contained within national borders. During the period 1989–92, 79 of the 82 wars were civil wars. Michael S. Teitelbaum & Myron Weiner (eds.), Introduction, Threatened Peoples, Threatened Borders 32 (1995).

During any civil war—unlike most international wars—there will be many who sympathize with neither of the opposing factions. Those people often fear recrimination. Some manage to flee to refugee-receiving nations. Considerably important, therefore, is whether neutrality should be regarded as political opinion. Here are two opposing views:

The government concedes that Bolanos has consciously chosen not to join either of the contending forces in El Salvador because he wishes to remain neutral, yet it argues that any persecution Bolanos might suffer would not be because of his political opinion. We find it somewhat difficult to follow the government's argument. The government contends that Bolanos' decision to remain politically neutral is not a political choice. There is nothing in the record to support this contention. Presumably the government is suggesting either that neutrality is always apolitical or that an individual who chooses neutrality must establish that the choice was made for political reasons. We disagree with both of these contentions.

Choosing to remain neutral is no less a political decision than is choosing to affiliate with a particular political faction. Just as a nation's decision to remain neutral is a political one, so is an individual's. When a person is aware of contending political forces and affirmatively chooses not to join any faction, that choice is a political one. A rule that one must identify with one of two dominant warring political factions in order to possess a political opinion, when many persons may, in fact, be opposed to the views and policies of both, would frustrate one of the basic objectives of

34. See, e.g., Deborah E. Anker, Carolyn P. Blum, & Kevin R. Johnson, The Supreme Court's Decision in INS v. Elias-Zacarias: Is There any "There" There?, 69 IR 285 (Mar. 9, 1992); Arthur C. Helton, Resistance to Military Conscription or Forced Recruitment by Insurgents as a Basis for Refugee Protection: A Comparative Perspective, 29 San Diego L. Rev. 581 (1992). Several others have criticized the decision for failing to consider international interpretations of "persecution on account of political opinion." See Carolyn Patty Blum, A Question of Values: Continuing Divergences Between U.S. and International Refugee Norms, 15 Berkeley J. Internat'l L. 1, 38, 41–42 (1997); Jennifer Moore, Restoring the Humanitarian Character of U.S. Refugee Law Lessons from the International Community, 15 Berkeley J. Internat'l L. 51, 59–61 (1997).

the Refugee Act of 1980—to provide protection to all victims of persecution regardless of ideology. Moreover, construing “political opinion” in so short-sighted and grudging a manner could result in limiting the benefits under the ameliorative provisions of our immigration laws to those who join one political extreme or another; moderates who choose to sit out a battle would not qualify.

The government’s second suggestion is equally unconvincing. The motive underlying any political choice may, if examined closely, prove to be, in whole or in part, non-political. Certainly a political affiliation may be undertaken for non-political, as well as political, reasons. A decision to join a particular political party may, for example, be made to curry favor, gain social acceptability, advance one’s career, or obtain access to money or positions of power. Similarly, a decision to remain neutral may be made, in whole or in part, for non-political reasons. However, the reasons underlying an individual’s political choice are of no significance for purposes of sections 243(h) [now 241(b)(3)] and 208(a) and the government may not inquire into them. Whatever the motivation, an individual’s choice, once made, constitutes, for better or for worse, a manifestation of political opinion.

We have several reasons for reaching the conclusion that the government may not look behind the manifestation of an alien’s political opinion and seek to determine why he made a particular political choice. First, it is simply improper for the government to inquire into the motives underlying an individual’s political decisions. Second, the motives frequently will be both complex and difficult to ascertain; it may not be possible to separate the political from the non-political aspects. What standards would we use, for example, to determine whether a choice was sufficiently based on political principles or whether economic self-interest was the determinative factor? Third, and perhaps most important, it is irrelevant why the individual made his choice. It does not matter to the persecutors what the individual’s motivation is. The guerrillas in El Salvador do not inquire into the reasoning process of those who insist on remaining neutral and refuse to join their cause. They are concerned only with an act that constitutes an overt manifestation of a political opinion. Persecution because of that overt manifestation is persecution because of a political opinion.

Here, Bolanos was quite aware of the political situation. He had severed his ties to the right-wing organizations with which he had been affiliated. However, he subsequently refused to join the guerrillas despite their threats to his life. By choosing neutrality and refusing to join a particular political faction, Bolanos expressed his opinion and took a political stance. That conduct is as much an affirmative expression of a political opinion as is joining a side, or speaking out for or against a side.³⁵

Bolanos-Hernandez v. INS, 767 F.2d 1277, 1286-87 (9th Cir.1985) (opinion by Reinhardt J.).

We also differ from other circuits on the crucial question of what constitutes "persecution . . . on account of . . . political opinion." The Ninth Circuit has held that political neutrality is a political opinion for purposes of [withholding of removal]. See, e.g., Maldonado-Cruz v. INS, 883 F.2d 788, 791 (9th Cir.1989). This holding eviscerates the political opinion requirement of the statute. It means that a politically inactive alien, and perhaps most illegal aliens are, may now gain the protection of asylum. * * *

As a concept of international law, political asylum developed in response to the need to protect persons from persecution by their government because they had performed political acts or held political opinions in defiance of the state. Authorities interpreting the [1951] Convention * * *, for example, hold two different views regarding the nature of political opinion necessary to qualify for refugee status. Neither encompasses political neutrality. According to S. Prakash Sinha, an international authority on asylum:

Where the nature of the offense is mixed, one point of view maintains that the Convention applies only to those cases where the political opinion of the individual involved is decisive of the nature and severity of his punishment, while another viewpoint holds that it is sufficient that he has committed the offense because of his political opinion.

S. Prakash Sinha, Asylum and International Law 103 (1971).

This core idea of political activism underlies the concept of "refugee" status. As Sinha notes, the key element of political opinion involves the "ruptur[ing] of the refugee's normal relationship between him and his state." In turn, this rupture results from a political controversy, which "may arise from his non-submission to a new government for various political reasons, or from acts of political persecution by the government of his state, or from his own political offenses." We distort the meaning of an important requirement for refugee status when we permit political aloofness

35. [Footnote 18 in original] We recognize that, unlike the act of joining a side, a lack of political involvement may in some instances not represent a political choice. We need not decide, however, whether a mere failure to join any side, absent a conscious choice, represents a political decision. In this case it is clear that Bolanos has not simply failed to join either political side; he has made a deliberate and considered decision not to do so. Nor need we decide here whether the mere refusal to join a particular side, absent more, constitutes the expression of a political opinion. Here, Bolanos made a choice of an affirmative political stance—neutrality. We leave to another time the question whether a purely negative choice—a simple rejection of a particular political group—necessarily reflects a "political opinion."

to serve as an active “political opinion,” that endangers its holder. It also demeans the true martyr for whom asylum was intended.

It is not likely this concurring opinion will alter either the statutory or case law with which it is concerned. Nonetheless, from time-to-time sightings should be taken to establish one’s position. Our ship appears to be at some distance from the main fleet but no reefs or shoals appear dead ahead. As a passenger, I shall go below and hope for the best.

Mendoza Perez v. INS, 902 F.2d 760, 767–68 (9th Cir.1990) (Sneed J., concurring specially).

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. Judge Reinhardt in Bolanos–Hernandez notes the government’s view that “Bolanos’s decision to remain politically neutral is not a political choice.” Interpreting that argument, he says: “Presumably the government is suggesting either that neutrality is always apolitical or that an individual who chooses neutrality must establish that the choice was made for political reasons.” Now having read both this opinion and the concurring opinion of Judge Sneed in Mendoza Perez, can you come up with any other plausible interpretations of the government’s position?

2. Does Judge Reinhardt adequately come to grips with the government’s practical concern that, in a civil war setting, too broad a definition of political opinion could make the vast bulk of the populace refugees?

3. Do you agree with Judge Reinhardt that one’s motives for expressing neutrality are irrelevant? Suppose a person proclaims a neutral position not because she rejects the views of both sides, but because she fears recrimination from each side if she supports the other side. Suppose further that the strategy backfires, resulting in fear that both sides will now attempt to kill her for withholding support. Is she being persecuted for her political opinion or for her political strategy? Should it matter?

4. Judge Reinhardt argues that holding neutrality not to be political opinion “could result in limiting [asylum] to those who join one political extreme or another; moderates who choose to sit out a battle would not qualify.” Is he right?

5. Judge Sneed’s concurring opinion in Mendoza Perez rests on some assumptions that are worth questioning. He expresses understandable concern that, without limits, recognizing neutrality as political opinion could allow a “politically inactive alien” to receive asylum. He repeats this concern when he refers to “political aloofness.” Judge Sneed was perhaps unaware, however, that the Ninth Circuit had previously required, as a condition for recognizing neutrality as political opinion, that the person have “made a conscious and deliberate choice” to remain neutral; a mere “fail[ure] to take any position” does not suffice. Lopez v. INS, 775 F.2d 1015, 1016–17 (9th Cir.1985) (resolving the issue left open in original footnote 18 of Bolanos–Hernandez); accord, Diaz–Escobar v. INS, 782 F.2d 1488, 1494 (9th Cir.1986). In Lopez, the court denied relief to a Salvadoran national who had exhibited only "apathy, saying he does not oppose the government nor support the rebels and has no opinion on how the country should be governed." Lopez, 775 F.2d at 1017.

Do you think knowledge of that limitation would have eased Judge Sneed's reservations? Or is it practically infeasible for the BIA or a court to distinguish neutrality from apathy? How was Bolanos-Hernandez able to demonstrate that his neutrality reflected a "conscious and deliberate choice?"

6. Judge Sneed's opinion might have led you to view the Ninth Circuit as a renegade court. On some immigration issues that court is indeed in the minority, but on the issue of whether neutrality can be political opinion, there was actually almost no contrary case law. The BIA in Matter of Maldonado-Cruz, 19 I. & N. Dec. 509 (BIA 1988), rev'd on other grounds, 883 F.2d 788 (9th Cir.1989), declined to apply the Ninth Circuit view to a case arising in the Fifth Circuit because "no Fifth Circuit case * * * agrees with" the Ninth Circuit view. 19 I. & N. Dec. at 516. But there was also no Fifth Circuit case disagreeing; the issue simply had not arisen in that court. The BIA in any event did not decide the issue either; it held Bolanos-Hernandez inapplicable because it found that Maldonado-Cruz had not "establish[ed] a principled position of neutrality" and that the evidence suggested he would be persecuted for his desertion of the guerrillas rather than for his opinions. Id. Even Perlera-Escobar v. Executive Office for Immigration, 894 F.2d 1292 (11th Cir.1990), the one judicial decision that Judge Sneed cites as repudiating the Ninth Circuit view, see 902 F.2d at 767, said only that it found the BIA opinion in Maldonado-Cruz persuasive (the BIA opinion is consistent, on this issue, with the Ninth Circuit view expressed in Lopez); that the 11th Circuit has not adopted the Ninth Circuit view (actually it had not rejected it either); and that in any event the court would not consider the issue because there was no evidence that the person would be persecuted because of his neutrality. 894 F.2d at 1297 n.4, 1298.

7. Does the Supreme Court in Elias-Zacarias foreclose neutrality as political opinion? (At least the Ninth Circuit doesn't think so. See Sangha v. INS, 103 F.3d 1482, 1486-90 (9th Cir. 1997); see generally Anker at 316-25.)

REFUGEES SUR PLACE

Neither the refugee definition contained in article 1 of the 1951 Convention (as modified by article 1 of the 1967 Protocol) nor any of the relevant United States statutory provisions (INA §§ 101(a)(42), 208, 241(b)(3)) are restricted to refugees who fled persecution. All that is necessary is that the person now meet the various statutory requirements. Accord, UNHCR Handbook, para. 94. Applicants who were not refugees when they left home, but who become refugees while abroad, are called "refugees sur place." Id.

Some refugees sur place attained that status because conditions at home changed while they were away. There might have been a coup, a new political movement, or a suspension of civil liberties. The UNHCR Handbook, para. 95, recognizes such people as refugees if they otherwise qualify, and that view is generally noncontroversial. This type of claim need not be limited to persecution based on political opinion; persecution based on any of the other statutory bases is just as plausible.

More often, however, asylum claims by refugees sur place arise because of the refugee's own actions or words rather than because of changes in the country of origin. In theory this type of refugee sur place similarly could assert any of the five statutory bases of persecution, but in practice these claims tend almost always to be based on political opinion. Because the threat of persecution is in one sense self-induced, and because a person might be tempted to assert an unpopular opinion for the very purpose of creating eligibility for asylum, these claims are often received more skeptically. The UNHCR Handbook, para. 96, recognizes such refugee claims but urges "a careful examination of the circumstances," with particular regard to whether the authorities in the country of origin are likely to know of the person's activities and how they are likely to view them. In the United States the courts have been less inclined to find a well-founded fear of persecution based on political opinion when the fear arises because of post-departure activities, but reliable general principles are difficult to locate. See Note, Basing Asylum Claims on a Fear of Persecution Arising from a Prior Asylum Claim, 56 Notre Dame Lawyer 719, 724-29 (1981) [hereafter cited as Basing Asylum Claims].

Among those asylum claims based on persecution resulting from post-departure activities, several common fact situations stand out:

(1) The applicant's departure, or failure to return within a specified time, violated the emigration laws of the country of origin. This is a specific example of the persecution/prosecution problem that you saw earlier. See Basing Asylum Claims, above, at 727-30; see also UNHCR Handbook, para. 61. In Rodríguez-Roman v. INS, 98 F.3d 416 (9th Cir. 1996), an anti-Castro Cuban fled Cuba, in violation of Cuba's prohibition on unauthorized departures. If returned, he would have faced a 15-20 year prison term or possibly even death. The immigration judge and the BIA denied asylum on the ground that he faced only criminal prosecution, not persecution. The Ninth Circuit reversed. Citing the UNHCR Handbook, the court held that severe punishment for unauthorized emigration can be persecution if the departure was politically motivated. The court acknowledged Elias-Zacarias but held that the punishment was being meted out because of the political opinion that the government imputed to emigrés. See especially the impassioned concurrence of Judge Kozinski, in which the other panel members joined, stressing the fundamental importance of judicial review of asylum claims.

(2) After leaving the country of origin, the applicant began expressing political views or engaging in political associations that might lead to persecution upon his or her return. See Basing Asylum Claims, above, at 725-27.

(3) The applicant applied for asylum, was turned down, and now fears that the very act of having applied for asylum will prompt the government of the country of origin to brand him or her as a subversive or even a traitor. A New Zealand case illustrates the problem. An Iranian applied for asylum in New Zealand, claiming falsely that he had bought "The Satanic Verses" and that he would be persecuted in Iran as a result. After his claim was denied, he reapplied, arguing that he would now be persecuted for having applied for asylum and for having said he had bought the book. The New Zealand Refugee Status Appeals Authority again denied asylum, in part because of his prior deceit. See 7 Internat'l J. Refugee L. at 332-53 (1995).

During the Cold War, one especially common group of refugees sur place was defectors. Often these were celebrated athletes, entertainers, or artists who came to the United States as part of a cultural exchange. Cuban baseball players are the modern paradigm. Because of their prominence, their defections are particularly likely to attract the attention of their governments. They might fall within any of the above categories.

Which of these classes of refugees sur place do you feel should be held eligible for asylum? See generally Anker at 35-40.

c. "PARTICULAR SOCIAL GROUP"

Perhaps more so than any other categories of asylum claims, those based on social group raise the fundamental philosophical questions of why governments grant asylum and why they limit it. The term "particular social group" is vague enough that recourse to the basic objectives of asylum is essential to any serious discussion of its meaning and its applicability. The social group prong has also proved critical in most claims based on gender-related persecution, as you will see in subsection c(iii) below. See generally Anker at 376-98. The following materials present two different views of the term "particular social group"—those of the BIA and those of a now deceased human rights champion—and a few other variations.

i. General Definition of "Social Group"

Matter of Acosta

Board of Immigration Appeals, 1985.
19 I. & N. Dec. 211.

* * *

The respondent has argued that the persecution he fears at the hands of the guerrillas is on account of his membership in a particular social group comprised of COTAXI drivers and persons engaged in the transportation industry of El Salvador and is also on account of his political opinion.

* * *

We find the well-established doctrine of ejusdem generis, meaning literally, "of the same kind," to be most helpful in construing the phrase "membership in a particular social group." That doctrine holds that general words used in an enumeration with specific words should be construed in a manner consistent with the specific words. The other grounds of persecution in the Act and the Protocol listed in association with "membership in a particular social group" are persecution on account of "race," "religion," "nationality," and "political opinion." Each of these grounds describes persecution aimed at an immutable characteristic: a characteristic that either is beyond the power of an individual to change or is so fundamental to individual identity or conscience that it ought not be required to be changed. Thus, the other four grounds of persecution enumerated in the Act and the Protocol restrict refugee status to individuals who are either unable by their own actions, or as a matter of conscience should not be required, to avoid persecution.

Applying the doctrine of ejusdem generis, we interpret the phrase "persecution on account of membership in a particular social group" to mean persecution that is directed toward an individual who is a member of a group of persons all of whom share a common, immutable characteristic. The shared characteristic might be an innate one such as sex, color, or kinship ties, or in some circumstances it might be a shared past experience such as former military leadership or land ownership. The particular kind of group characteristic that will qualify under this construction remains to be determined on a case-by-case basis. However, whatever the common characteristic that defines the group, it must be one that the members of the group either cannot change, or should not be required to change because it is fundamental to their individual identities or consciences. * * *

In the respondent's case, the facts demonstrate that the guerrillas sought to harm the members of COTAXI, along with members of other taxi cooperatives in the city of San Salvador, because they refused to participate in work stoppages in that city. The characteristics defining the group of which the respondent was a member and subjecting that group to punishment were being a taxi driver in San Salvador and refusing to participate in guerrilla-sponsored work stoppages. Neither of these characteristics is immutable because the members of the group could avoid the threats of the guerrillas either by changing jobs or by cooperating in work stoppages. It may be unfortunate that the respondent either would have had to change his means of earning a living or cooperate with the guerrillas in order to avoid their threats. However, the internationally accepted concept of a refugee simply does not guarantee an individual a right to work in the job of his choice. * * *

* * *

Arthur C. Helton, Persecution on Account of Membership in a Social Group as a Basis for Refugee Status

15 Columbia Human Rights L. Rev. 39, 40-47, 51-52 (1983).

* * *

The term "social group" in the Refugee Act of 1980 is derived from the corresponding language in the United Nations Convention on refugees ("Refugee Convention"), from which the Protocol and Act were taken. The definition of "refugee" in the U.N. Convention was derived from the Constitution of the International Refugee Organization ("IRO"). * * *

Subsequent interpretations of the refugee definition in the IRO Constitution did not always comport with the framers' liberal intent. At the Conference of Plenipotentiaries, during which the United Nations Convention on refugees was written, several delegations pressed for "an ampler definition [of refugee] . . . than the one figuring in the IRO's Constitution. . . ." The Swedish representative introduced an amendment to include a catch-all "social group" category that had not been included in the IRO definition, because "experience had shown that certain refugees had been persecuted because they belonged to particular social groups." The delegates intended to guarantee security from persecution to all refugees, without invidious or unnecessary distinctions.³⁶ The "social group" category, designed to reaffirm this commitment, was adopted in the U.N. Convention without dissent, extending the protection of refugees far beyond what had previously been the norm.

* * *

[Here the author argues that the contrast between the phrase "social group" and narrower phrases used in other United Nations documents suggests a deliberate intention to define "social group" expansively.—Eds.]

C. Recognition of Social Groups by the United Nations

The United Nations has demonstrated a commitment to protecting many groups from persecution. This commitment takes two distinct forms. First, there are conventions and resolutions condemning and proscribing certain governmental activities. Second, there are provisions for the protection of those individuals persecuted. The Genocide Convention falls into the first category. The Refugee Convention falls into the second category. The two forms of protection are complementary. Presumably, where the U.N. sees fit to outlaw persecution aimed at a particular group, it would also wish to provide sanctuary for those who suffer at the hands of transgressor states.

36. [Footnote 16 in original] * * * [T]he enumerated categories—race, religion, nationality, membership in a particular social group, and political opinion—are more properly seen as illustrative of the meaning of "persecution" than as restrictions upon the right of asylum.

Examples of persecuted groups which are covered by implication in the “social group” category in the Refugee Convention are legion. The U.N. has addressed itself to persecution and discrimination against women, children, the elderly, the young, the adopted, the illegitimate, the disabled, the family, the worker, the unemployed, the trade unionist, the migrant worker, the slave, the illiterate, and many other groups.

* * * The “social group” category was meant to be a catch-all which could include all the bases for and types of persecution which an imaginative despot might conjure up. Thus, the framers’ general intent is illustrated by the subsequent recognition of the many types of invidious persecution prevalent in the world today.

However, it can hardly be argued that the U.N. has addressed every conceivable form of persecution in its resolutions. The long list noted above is merely indicative of the broad scope of the term “social group” as it has already been applied. One observation that can be made about the list is that each group has very little in common with the other groups, except for the fact that each is an aggregation of people who suffer from arbitrary and capricious persecution.

* * * Until otherwise shown, * * * the presumption must be that it was intended that all victims of capricious persecution (as opposed to justifiable prosecution or differentiation) be included in the “social group” category. This is the implication of the Swedish representative’s reference, noted above, to the lessons of “experience.”

* * *

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. The BIA in Acosta requires “immutable” characteristics, meaning not only traits that members cannot change, but also traits so fundamental to individual identity that members should not be required to change them. Statutory interpretation aside, what policy is served by making immutability the test for “social group?” What are the disadvantages of doing so?

2. Courts applying the Acosta immutability test have had little difficulty finding women to be a social group, since gender is obviously immutable in the Acosta sense. See, e.g., Mohammed v. Gonzales, 400 F.3d 785 (9th Cir. 2005) (female genital mutilation); Fatin v. INS, 12 F.3d 1233 (3d Cir. 1993) (religious dress code). The UNHCR Guidelines on Social Group, item 8 below, para. II.B.12, expressly recognize women as a social group; accord, UNHCR, Guidelines on International Protection: Gender-Related Persecution within the context of Article 1A(2) of the 1951 Convention and/or its 1967 Protocol relating to the Status of Refugees, U.N. Doc. HCR/GIP//02/01, para. 30 (May 7, 2002), reproduced, 81 IR 561 (Apr. 26, 2004). Gender-related asylum claims are specifically considered in section B.2.c.iii below.

3. Regulations proposed by the Justice Department in 2000 (and described more fully in item 7 below) adopt the Acosta immutability test.

They go on, however, to say that past experience cannot define a social group unless the past experience was one that “at the time it occurred, the member either could not have changed or was so fundamental to his or her identity or conscience that he or she should not have been required to change it [emphasis added].” Do you agree? Suppose the applicant is a convicted sex offender who has fully served his sentence and fears returning home because, in his country, the local population persecutes released sex offenders and the government willingly stands back. Assume the court concludes that the actor could have refrained from committing the sex offense without altering anything fundamental to his identity or conscience. Is this a case of persecution on account of social group?

4. The U.S. Courts of Appeals have generally embraced the Acosta immutability test.³⁷ So, too, have the highest courts of Canada and the United Kingdom.³⁸ Gradually, however, the BIA and the courts have superimposed additional hurdles. In Matter of C-A-, 23 I. & N. Dec. 951, 956-57 (BIA 2006), aff'd, Castillo-Arias v. Gonzales, 446 F.3d 1190 (11th Cir. 2006), the Board made clear that it viewed the Acosta immutability test as merely a “starting point.” 23 I. & N. Dec. at 955. Holding that the “social visibility” of the group is also an “important element,” id. at 960, the Board concluded that noncriminal drug informants against the Colombian drug cartels did not constitute a particular social group, because there was no evidence that the larger society perceived them as a group. Then, in Matter of A-M-E- & J-G-U-, 24 I. & N. Dec. 69 (BIA 2007) (amended opinion), the Board used stronger language. In A-M-E-, while initially referring to social visibility as “a factor in the social group determination,” id. at 74, the Board then referred to social visibility as a “requirement” and again as “requisite,” id. Ultimately the Board found that the group of “wealthy Guatemalans” are neither at greater risk of crime nor, importantly, perceived to be such, and that therefore the group “fails the ‘social visibility’ test.” Id. at 75.

In each case, the Board cited the UNHCR Guidelines quoted in item 8 below for the proposition that social visibility is an “important element,” C-A-, 23 I. & N. Dec. at 960, or an “important factor,” A-M-E-, 24 I. & N. Dec. at 74. But the UNHCR Guidelines explicitly make social visibility merely an alternative to immutability as a way to establish a particular social group, not an added requirement or even factor. Just six days before the decision in A-M-E-, UNHCR had filed an amicus brief in another BIA case in order to highlight that point. See Brief of the Office of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees as Amicus Curiae, BIA, in Matter of Thomas (filed Jan. 25, 2007). The BIA cited the UNHCR Guidelines for its interpretation of the social visibility language; it did not acknowledge the UNHCR brief to the contrary.

37. See, e.g., Negeya v. Gonzales, 417 F.3d 78, 83 (1st Cir. 2005); Fatin v. INS, 12 F.3d 1233 (3d Cir. 1993); Ontunez-Tursios v. Ashcroft, 303 F.3d 341, 352 (5th Cir. 2002); Castellano-Chacon v. INS, 341 F.3d 533, 546-47 (6th Cir. 2003); Lwin v. INS, 144 F.3d 505, 511-12 (7th Cir. 1998); Niang v. Gonzales, 422 F.3d 1187, 1199 (10th Cir. 2005).

38. See Matter of Attorney General and Ward, 103 D.L.R.4th 1, 24-38 (Canadian S.Ct., 1993); Islam (A.P.) v. Secretary of State for the Home Dept., [1999] 2 A.C. 629, [1999] 2 All E.R. 545, [1999] 2 W.L.R. 1015 (U.K. House of Lords 1999).

The Board in A-M-E- also added a “particularity requirement” to the social group definition. 24 I. & N. Dec. at 76. It held that defining the group as “wealthy” Guatemalans was too “amorphous,” since it was not clear how much wealth a person would have to possess to be a member of that group. Id.

These decisions were followed by Matter of S-E-G-, 24 I. & N. Dec. 579 (BIA 2008), where the BIA confirmed that a social group “requires” both social visibility and particularity. On those bases it held that youth who have rejected or resisted recruitment into gangs are not members of a particular social group; neither are their families. Although the alleged groups satisfied the immutability requirement, they failed the “social visibility” requirement because they were not “perceived as a group by society,” and they failed the “particularity” requirement because the definition of the group was too “nebulous” to permit determinations of which individuals were members. See also Matter of E-A-G-, 24 I. & N. Dec. 591 (BIA 2007) (holding that young persons who are perceived to be gang members are not a social group). According to Chevron deference to the BIA, some courts of appeals have begun to adopt these additional requirements as well. See, e.g., Ngengwe v. Mukasey, 543 F.3d 1029, 1034 (8th Cir. 2008) (requiring social visibility); Santos-Lemus v. Mukasey, 542 F.3d 738 (9th Cir. 2008) (holding that social visibility and particularity are both “factors” to weigh once a group is found immutable, and concluding that young males who resist gang violence are not a social group because the alleged group is neither socially visible nor particular enough).

What is your reaction? Once an alleged social group is found to be immutable, should (a) social visibility and (b) particularity be required (or a factor)?

5. Other variations have also emerged. In Sanchez-Trujillo v. INS, 801 F.2d 1571 (9th Cir. 1986), the court held that a particular social group requires “a voluntary associational relationship among the purported members, which imparts some common characteristic that is fundamental to their identity as a member of that discrete social group” [emphasis added]. It found, therefore, that “young, working class, urban males of military age” do not comprise a social group because they are not a “cohesive, homogeneous group.” But requiring a voluntary associational relationship never really caught on with the other courts, and in 2000 the Ninth Circuit itself effectively abandoned that requirement. In Hernandez-Montiel v. INS, 225 F.3d 1084 (9th Cir. 2000), the court held that a social group could be established by showing either a voluntary association or immutability. The BIA has explicitly rejected the “voluntary associational relationship” test. See Matter of C-A-, 23 I. & N. Dec. 951, 956–57 (BIA 2006), aff’d, Castillo-Arias v. Gonzales, 446 F.3d 1190 (11th Cir. 2006).

6. In its original decision in Matter of R.A., 22 I. & N. Dec. 906 (BIA 1999), the BIA rejected the asylum claim of a woman who had been subjected to extreme domestic violence. One of her arguments was based on the alleged social group of Guatemalan women intimately involved with Guatemalan men who believe in male domination. The BIA acknowledged the immutability of the group membership, but appeared to require an additional showing of social visibility and further lamented her failure to establish “that women are expected by society to be abused, or that there are any adverse societal consequences to women or their husbands if the women are not abused.” Id. at 918–19. That decision has since been vacated and remanded to the Board several times. Its tortured history and the issues the case raises are discussed in some detail on pages 974–75 below.

7. In 2000 the Department of Justice issued a proposed new asylum regulation that remains pending as of this writing. See 65 Fed. Reg. 76588 (Dec. 7, 2000). The proposed regulation begins with the Acosta immutability test but then provides “a non-exclusive list of [six] additional factors that may be considered.” It adds, cryptically, that “while these factors may be relevant in some cases, they are not requirements for the existence of a particular social groups.” The first three factors it lists are drawn from the Sanchez-Trujillo case noted in item 5 above (close affiliation of the group members, common motive or interest, and a “voluntary associational relationship”). The last three factors are taken from R-A-, discussed in item 6 above (social visibility, members viewing themselves as members of a group, and society according the group members differential treatment or status).

8. In 2002 UNHCR issued Guidelines on this subject. See UNHCR, Guidelines on International Protection: “Membership of a particular social group” within the context of article IA(2) of the 1951 Convention and/or its 1967 Protocol relating to the Status of Refugees, U.N. Doc. HCR/GIP/02/02 (May 7, 2002), reproduced, 81 IR 571 (Apr. 26, 2004) [hereafter UNCHR Guidelines on Social Group]. Drawing from several of the approaches that you have just read—particularly immutability and social visibility—UNHCR offered the following two-pronged formula:

[A] particular social group is a group of persons who share a common characteristic other than their risk of being persecuted, or who are perceived as a group by society. The characteristic will often be one which is innate, unchangeable, or which is otherwise fundamental to identity, conscience or the exercise of one’s human rights.

UNHCR Guidelines, para. II.B.11 (emphasis added).

The qualifier “other than their risk of being persecuted” reflects an emerging consensus that a social group cannot be defined by the persecution itself; otherwise, the courts have said, circular reasoning could permit an applicant to define any group as a social group. In a domestic violence case, for example, one is unlikely to prevail with the argument that the social group consists of victims of domestic violence. (Related theories that hold out greater promise are discussed in the materials on gender-related asylum claims, below.) The UNHCR Guidelines are in accord, id. paras.

II.B.11, 14, but they add that the persecution of a group might itself cause society to perceive the individuals as comprising a group, in which case the second prong of the UNHCR social group definition might well apply.

Apart from that, is there any group that would not satisfy the UNHCR definition in paragraph II.B.11 above? In answering this question, note that the “common characteristic” required by the first prong is not qualified by the word “immutable,” although this paragraph later observes that the common characteristic in fact will “often” be immutable in the Acosta sense.

9. Professor Maryellen Fullerton has uncovered some useful German cases interpreting the phrase “particular social group.” During the 1980’s the German courts handed down thirteen such decisions, which she summarizes in Maryellen Fullerton, Persecution Due to Membership in a Particular Social Group: Jurisprudence in the Federal Republic of Germany, 4 Georgetown Immigration L.J. 381 (1990). The claimed social groups and the courts’ responses included entrepreneurs in Poland (yes), homosexuals in Iran (yes), corrupt former government officials in Ghana (no), and tattooed people in Iran (no). Id. at 396–437. The Ghanain case adopted reasoning similar to that in Sanchez-Trujillo, suggesting that “social group” status requires “both a certain degree of homogeneity and some degree of inner structure.” Id. at 417. In the Iranian homosexual case, in contrast, a different German court held it “irrelevant if group members knew each other or are members of an organization.” Id. at 409. Instead, the court offered a test that differs from all of the viewpoints you have seen: “whether the general population views this collection of people as an unacceptable group.” Id. Along similar lines, Professor Michael Heyman makes a thoughtful argument for rooting the “social group” definition in the “social perception” of the group by the applicant’s home society. See Michael G. Heyman, Asylum, Social Group Membership and the Non-State Actor: The Challenge of Domestic Violence, 36 Univ. Michigan J. L. Reform 767 (2003). Fullerton agrees that such a group should qualify but argues that other groups, such as those that are “envied and resented,” should also qualify.³⁹

10. In the excerpt you read, the late Arthur Helton argued that “social group,” like the other four bases, was meant only to illustrate—not to restrict—the types of fact situations that could constitute persecution. If he was right, then (a) what was the point of adding the adjective “social,” and (b) how might the drafters have made their intentions clearer?

39. 4 Georgetown Immigration L.J. at 440. For some other foreign and comparative discussions of social group, see Maryellen Fullerton, A Comparative Look at Refugee Status Based on Persecution Due to Membership in a Particular Social Group, 26 Cornell Internat’l L.J. 505 (1993) (comparing German, Canadian, and United States approaches); Penelope Mathew, The High Court and “Particular Social Groups”: Lessons for the Future, 21 Melbourne Univ. L. Rev. 277 (1997) (Australian High Court’s approach to social groups); Meyers v. Canada, 97 D.L.R. 4th 729 (1992) (defining social group as sharing similar social status and similar interests not held by their governments).

Similarly, The UNHCR Guidelines on Social Group, discussed in item 8 above, say the social group prong “cannot be interpreted as a ‘catch all’ that applies to all persons fleeing persecution.” Otherwise, UNHCR implies, it would “render the other four Convention grounds superfluous.” Id. para. I.2. If the UNHCR definition of social group reproduced in item 8 above is interpreted literally, so that every group (except a group defined solely by reference to the persecution itself) qualifies as a social group, would the UNHCR definition render the other four Convention grounds superfluous, or would those grounds retain significance even then?

11. There are two lines of family-related social groups to consider. In one line of cases, the applicant alleges that his or her own family constitutes a social group. In Estrada-Posadas v. INS, 924 F.2d 916 (9th Cir.1991), the applicant alleged she would be persecuted because of a vendetta against her family, which she argued constituted a social group. The court’s entire response read:

* * * [S]he cites to no case that extends the concept of persecution of a social group to the persecution of a family, and we hold it does not. If Congress had intended to grant refugee status on account of “family membership,” it would have said so. Thus, Estrada has not shown that any persecution would be on account of her membership in any social group.

Id. at 919. First, does the second quoted sentence make any sense? Second, how should the case have been decided under (a) a pure Acosta test; and (b) if social visibility and particularity are superimposed as additional requirements? (In 2005, the Ninth Circuit en banc formally overruled Estrada-Posadas.)⁴⁰

A different question is whether the family members of similarly situated others can comprise a social group. In De Valle v. INS, 901 F.2d 787 (9th Cir.1990), the alleged social group consisted of family members of army deserters, whom the applicant had asserted were in danger in El Salvador. Quoting the “voluntary association” language of Sanchez-Trujillo (decided before the Ninth Circuit in Hernandez-Montiel, item 5 above, had modified Sanchez-Trujillo by holding that either immutability or a voluntary associational relationship would suffice for social group), the court held the class members were not “closely affiliated” and therefore not a social group. In contrast, the court in Lwin v. INS, 144 F.3d 505, 511–12 (7th Cir. 1998), applied the Acosta immutability test, concluding that the parents of Burmese dissidents constituted a social group. Would a court that requires social visibility and particularity consider the family members of similarly situated others a social group?

12. Applicants who claim persecution because of HIV have occasionally succeeded with social group claims. William Branigin, Gays’ Cases Help to Expand Immigration Rights, Wash. Post, Dec. 17, 1996, at 1. Immigration Judge John Gossart (Baltimore), applying Acosta, granted asylum to an HIV-positive woman who had established that in India she would be persecuted for her illness. The relevant social group was defined as “married women in India who have contracted HIV, who fear that their family or their in-laws will disown them or force them to obtain a divorce, and who wish to be, or need to be, employed.” Id. at 17. Matter of Rao, A77 249 526 (IJ, Dec. 20, 2000). What results do you think would be reached based (a) purely on an Acosta immutability test; and (b) on a test that additionally requires social visibility and particularity? Should U.S. law allow asylum in such cases?

40. See Thomas v. Gonzales, 409 F.3d 1613, 164 L.Ed.2d 358 (2006); accord, Gebremichael v. INS, 10 F.3d 28, 36 (1st Cir. 1993) (also applying Acosta test). Gonzales v. Thomas, 547 U.S. 183, 126 S.Ct.

13. What, if anything, do you think would be a sensible definition of “social group?”

ii. Sexual Orientation and “Social Group”

Matter of Toboso–Alfonso

Board of Immigration Appeals, 1990.
20 I. & N. Dec. 819.⁴¹

* * *

[In exclusion proceedings, Toboso–Alfonso applied for asylum and withholding. The immigration judge denied asylum in the exercise of discretion (because of a conviction of possession of cocaine) but granted withholding. The former INS appealed from the latter decision.]

In the instant case, the applicant asserts that he is a homosexual who has been persecuted in Cuba and would be persecuted again on account of that status should he return to his homeland. He submits that homosexuals form a particular social group in Cuba and suffer persecution by the government as a result of that status.

The applicant testified that there is a municipal office within the Cuban Government which registers and maintains files on all homosexuals. He stated that his file was opened in 1967, and every 2 or 3 months for 13 years he received a notice to appear for a hearing. The notice, the applicant explained, was a sheet of paper, “it says Fidel Armando Toboso, homosexual and the date I have to appear.” Each hearing consisted of a physical examination followed by questions concerning the applicant’s sex life and sexual partners. While he indicated the “examination” was “primarily a health examination,” he stated that on many occasions he would be detained in the police station for 3 or 4 days without being charged, and for no apparent reason. He testified that it was a criminal offense in Cuba simply to be a homosexual. The government’s actions against him were not in response to specific conduct on his part (e.g., for engaging in homosexual acts); rather, they resulted simply from his status as a homosexual. He further testified that on one occasion when he had missed work, he was sent to a forced labor camp for 60 days as punishment because he was a homosexual (i.e., had he not been a homosexual he would not have been so punished).

41. When the BIA decided this case in 1990, it issued an unpublished, nonprecedent opinion. In 1994 the Attorney General ordered the decision published as precedent. Attorney General Order No. 1895–94 (June 19, 1994).—Eds.

The applicant stated that at the time of the Mariel boat lift, the Union of Communist Youth received permission to hold a demonstration against homosexuals at the factory where he worked. Several of the members got on top of a table and screamed that all homosexuals should leave—should go to the United States. He testified that on that same day there was a sheet of paper tacked to the door of his home which stated that he should report to “the public order.” The applicant presented himself at the police station in the town of “Guines” where he was informed by the chief of police that he could spend 4 years in the penitentiary for being a homosexual, or leave Cuba for the United States. He was given a week to decide and decided to leave rather than be jailed.

The applicant further testified that the day he left his town, the neighbors threw eggs and tomatoes at him. He claims that the situation was so grave that the authorities were forced to reschedule his departure time from the afternoon to 2:00 a.m., in order to quell the protesting residents.

In addition to the applicant's testimony, he supplemented the record with the following information: several articles describing “Improper Conduct,” a film which centers on the testimony of 28 Cuban refugees and recounts the human rights violations, including incarceration in forced labor camps known as “Military Units to Aid Production,” suffered by Cubans whom the Government considers to be dissidents or “antisocial,” particularly male homosexuals; a newspaper article entitled, “Gay Cubans Survive Torture and Imprisonment,” in which Cuban homosexuals in the United States, most of whom were part of the Mariel boat lift, describe their treatment by the Cuban Government, including repeated detentions, incarcerations, and physical beatings; and, Amnesty International's Report for 1985 which describes the political situation in Cuba.

The immigration judge found the “applicant's testimony to be credible and worthy of belief, and, if anything, perceive[d] that he was restrained in his testimony as to the difficulty of his life during the years that he lived in Cuba.” The immigration judge further concluded that the applicant had been persecuted in Cuba and that he has a well-founded fear of continued persecution in that country. He found that this persecution resulted from the applicant's membership in a particular social group, namely homosexuals. The immigration judge denied the applicant's asylum application in the exercise of discretion because of the nature of the applicant's criminal record in the United States. However, as the immigration judge found that the applicant's crimes did not bring him within the scope of section 243(h)(2)(B), he granted his application for withholding of deportation to Cuba.

The Immigration and Naturalization Service appeals from the grant of withholding of deportation to Cuba to the applicant, arguing that homosexuals were not a particular social group contemplated under the Act, that the applicant has not presented adequate evidence to show either a well-founded fear or a clear probability of persecution, and that the applicant is ineligible for [withholding of removal] because of his conviction for possession of cocaine.

We do not find that the Service has presented persuasive arguments on which to reverse the immigration judge's finding that the applicant established his membership in a particular social group in Cuba. The Service argues that "socially deviated behavior, i.e. homosexual activity is not a basis for finding a social group within the contemplation of the Act" and that such a conclusion "would be tantamount to awarding discretionary relief to those involved in behavior that is not only socially deviant in nature, but in violation of the laws or regulations of the country as well." The applicant's testimony and evidence, however, do not reflect that it was specific activity that resulted in the governmental actions against him in Cuba, it was his having the status of being a homosexual. Further, the immigration judge's initial finding that a particular social group existed in Cuba was not "tantamount to awarding discretionary relief" to that group. Individuals in a particular social group are not eligible for relief based on that fact alone, among other showings they must establish facts demonstrating that members of the group are persecuted, have a well-founded fear of persecution, or that their life or freedom would be threatened because of that status.

We principally note regarding this issue, however, that the Service has not challenged the immigration judge's finding that homosexuality is an "immutable" characteristic. Nor is there any evidence or argument that, once registered by the Cuban government as a homosexual, that that characterization is subject to change. This being the case, we do not find the Service's challenge to the immigration judge's finding that this applicant was a member of a particular social group in Cuba adequately supported by the arguments set forth on appeal.

The next issue is whether the immigration judge erred in finding that the applicant had established that his life or freedom would be threatened in Cuba. The immigration judge not only found the applicant's testimony regarding the events in Cuba credible, but concluded that, if anything, he was "restrained in his testimony as to the difficulty of his life during the years that he lived in Cuba." In this regard, he noted that the applicant simply took as a matter of course that he "would be frequently detained for days [by government officials] while being subjected to verbal and physical abusive treatment." The applicant's testimony that simply because of his status as a homosexual he was advised by his government to leave the country or face incarceration for a period of 4 years is not contested. There is no evidence or allegation that this "choice" he was given resulted from any specific acts on his part or that the government did not intend to jail him if he failed to leave. The record indicates that rather than a penalty for misconduct, this action resulted from the government's desire that all homosexuals be forced to leave their homeland. This is not simply a case involving the enforcement of laws against particular homosexual acts, nor is this simply a case of assertion of "gay rights." Particularly in view of the final governmental threat that precipitated the applicant's departure from Cuba, we agree with the immigration judge's finding that the applicant's freedom was and is threatened within the contemplation of [withholding of removal].

* * *

ORDER: The Service's appeal is dismissed.

[Board member Vacca writes a dissenting opinion joined by Board member Morris. The dissent argues that the evidence does not show a high enough probability of serious harm to Toboso-Alfonso in Cuba. The dissenters do not question the finding that homosexuality is immutable or the holding that homosexuals constitute a social group.—Eds.]

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. The opinion in Toboso-Alfonso describes specific forms of persecution of gays and lesbians in Cuba. The persecutors include both government officials (periodic detention and interrogation and a threat to imprison Toboso for four years if he did not leave the country) and the private sector (the youth demonstration and the mob actions of the neighbors). The plight of gays and lesbians in several other countries is well described in the following excerpt:

Ciprian Cucu says he was jailed as a teenager in his native Romania and repeatedly raped. Jose Zambrano, by his account, was disowned by his parents, raped by a soldier at 13, assaulted by paramilitary thugs and threatened with death in El Salvador. Sergey Fedetov recounts being harassed, beaten and repeatedly interrogated by police in Russia.

* * *

* * * [A] Russian lesbian, Alla Pitcherskaia, 34, * * * says she faces forced psychiatric institutionalization, including electroshock therapy, to "cure" her of her sexual orientation if forced to return to her homeland. The Justice Department is contesting her [asylum] claim.

* * *

[Two gay partners] were arrested under a Romanian law that criminalizes all homosexual acts. Turned in by his own family and incriminated by his diary, Cucu was thrown into a cell with up to 16 other men. There he was immediately raped by a "supervising inmate," who also forced him to have sex with other prisoners during his two-month incarceration, the affidavit said. At one point, Cucu said, he was beaten by the warden for complaining about the rapes in court. He said his lover later told him that he also had been beaten and repeatedly raped. Last year, he said, his lover committed suicide.

* * *

In El Salvador, Zambrano suffered the first of a series of brutal sexual assaults when he was raped at the age of 13 by a soldier in his home town. "From an early age, I was effeminate," he wrote in an affidavit. The result was "a horrible childhood" filled with abuse by his parents, teachers and classmates.

Describing his experiences in graphic detail, Zambrano said his mother tried to "make me a man" by dispatching him to a local brothel when he was 15. In San Salvador, where his parents subsequently sent him, he was sexually assaulted by police, soldiers and members of a "death squad" on several occasions, he wrote.

* * *

"In El Salvador, being a homosexual is the lowest thing in society," Zambrano said.

William Branigan, Gays' Cases Help to Expand Immigrants' Rights, Washington Post, Dec. 17, 1996 at A1.

Pitcherskaia, the Russian lesbian described in the above excerpt, eventually overcame a major hurdle. The BIA had denied her claim on the basis that the Russian authorities did not seek to "harm" her; rather, they sought to "cure" her homosexuality through psychiatric means. The Ninth Circuit, holding that persecution does not require an intent to harm, reversed and remanded to the BIA for further consideration. Pitcherskaia v. INS, 118 F.3d 641 (9th Cir. 1997). Professor Ryan Goodman, in a 1995 student Note written after the BIA decision in Pitcherskaia but before the Ninth Circuit decision, argued strongly in favor of defining "persecution" by reference to international human rights norms. He specifically advocated such an approach for "medical" intervention cases like Pitcherskaia. See Ryan Goodman, Note, The Incorporation of International Human Rights Standards into Sexual Orientation Asylum Claims: Cases of Involuntary "Medical" Intervention, 105 Yale L.J. 255 (1995). Although the Ninth Circuit ultimately rested its reversal on a finding that prior cases imposed no requirement of a subjective intent to punish, the last sentence of its analysis would find a comfortable home in Goodman's model: "Human rights laws cannot be sidestepped by simply couching actions that torture mentally or physically in benevolent terms such as 'curing' or 'treating' the victims." 118 F.3d at 648.

2. Toboso established that he would be persecuted solely for being homosexual, as distinguished from engaging in homosexual acts. Now that this case has been decided, how do you think the BIA would come out in a case in which an asylum claimant established only that he or she would be persecuted because of homosexual acts? Does the distinction between status and acts affect either (a) whether the consequences will be termed “persecution” or (b) whether the persecution is on account of membership in a “particular social group?”⁴²

3. Did the BIA hold in this case that gays and lesbians constitute a “particular social group?” If so, what remaining barriers do gay and lesbian asylum claimants face? In Cornejo-Merida v. Ashcroft, 116 Fed. Appx. 900, 903 (9th Cir. 2004) (unpublished memorandum), the court acknowledged “overt discrimination against gays” in the country of origin (Peru) but affirmed the BIA’s denial of asylum because the applicant had not shown “that he would be targeted for persecution or that the persecution of gays in Peru is so rampant and severe that his mere membership in the group of homosexual men sufficed to establish an objective well-founded fear of future persecution.” In Karouni v. Gonzales, 399 F.3d 1163 (9th Cir. 2005), a Lebanese gay male presented detailed and corroborated evidence of threats directed personally to him and violence and executions of his gay friends. The immigration judge nonetheless found his fear of persecution not to be well-founded, and the BIA affirmed without opinion. The court held the evidence insufficient to support the BIA finding of no well-founded fear. Based on these decisions, can you generalize about the remaining challenges for asylum claims based on sexual orientation?

4. As a policy matter, do you believe that persecution on account of sexual orientation should suffice for asylum?

5. Under 8 CFR § 3.1(g) (2008), BIA decisions are binding on DHS and on the immigration judges. In response to concerns raised by Rep. Barney Frank, former INS General Counsel David Martin sent a memo to all INS attorneys reminding them that Toboso-Alfonso is binding precedent, that the INS regarded homosexuals as a social group, and that INS attorneys should not argue to the contrary. The memo, dated April 4, 1996, is reprinted in Lesbian and Gay Immigration Rights Task Force, Task Force Update 9 (Fall 1996). Tribunals in Canada and Germany have reached similar conclusions, see New York Times, Jan. 14, 1992, at A5, as has the United Kingdom’s Immigration Appeal Tribunal, 5 Joint Council for the Welfare of Immigrants Bulletin, #8, at 8 (spring 1995).

6. For additional discussion of the legal effects of sexual orientation on noncitizens, see chapter 3, § B.2.a above.

iii. Gender and “Social Group”⁴³

The treatment of gender-related refugee and asylum claims is one of the most pressing refugee issues in the world today, as the following excerpt illustrates:

42. On this point, see Michael A. Scaperlanda, Kulturkampf in the Backwaters: Homosexuality and Immigration Law, 11 Widener J. Pub. L. 475, 501–12 (2002) (arguing against asylum in cases where claimed persecution is based on conduct rather than status). See also Lawrence v. Texas, 539 U.S. 558, 123 S.Ct. 2472, 156 L.Ed.2d 508 (2003), where the Supreme Court struck down a Texas statute prohibiting consensual sodomy.

43. There has been a wealth of excellent literature on gender-related refugee and

In countries torn by war, armed conflict and political resistance, it is the women and children who frequently seek safety away from home. Their husbands and their fathers may be fighting or dead. * * *

* * *

Gradually women refugees are being counted. Ninety per cent of the Ethiopian refugees in Somalia are women and children under 15. Eighty per cent of the Kampuchean households along the Thai-Kampuchean borders are headed by women, as are over half of Palestinian households in Lebanon. Over 80 per cent of the Salvadorean refugees in Nicaragua are women and children. Most of the 11,000 people from Guatemala, who have sought asylum in Mexico, are women, children and old people. And while for centuries the warrior tribesmen of Afghanistan crossed the mountains of Central Asia to the plains of the Indian sub-continent, today the arduous trek is undertaken by refugee women and their children.

* * *

* * * [I]nternational law * * * ignores the persecution that girls and women endure, even die under, for stepping out of the closed circle of social norms; choosing a husband in place of accepting an arranged marriage; undergoing an abortion where it is illegal; becoming politically active in a woman's movement. Women are also abandoned or persecuted for being rape victims, bearing illegitimate children or marrying men of different races. It ignores women's specific needs; in policy terms it is gender-blind. There is no recognition that * * * they need legal protection and refugee status both as individuals in their own right and as women. * * *

Whose criteria define legitimate fear for purposes of recognising refugees? The decision that persecution on grounds of race or religion may lead to "a well-grounded fear" [sic] is recognised. Yet women who may be stoned or burnt to death for not bringing asylum claims. In addition to the writings excerpted below, see, e.g., Anker at 252-66; Deborah E. Anker, Women Refugees: Forgotten No Longer?, 32 San Diego L.Rev. 771 (1995) (applauding INS Gender Guidelines and other favorable developments for women refugees); Jacqueline Bhabha, Embodied Rights: Gender Persecution, State Sovereignty, and Refugees, 9 Public Culture 3 (1996); Heaven Crawley, Refugees and Gender-Law and Process (2001); Pamela Goldberg, Women and Refugee Status: A Review Essay, 7 Internat'l J. Refugee L. 756 (1995); Pamela Goldberg, Anyplace but Home: Asylum in the United States for Women Fleeing Intimate Violence, 26 Cornell Internat'l L.J. 565 enough dowry—itself an outlawed institution—or for choosing their own husband, which according to the Universal Declaration of Human Rights they may, have no rights or protection. Why is a girl who is threatened by violence and who attempts to escape by fleeing from her country, and from her family who may even be her persecutors, not part of UNHCR's responsibility? * * *

(1993); Nancy Kelly & Deborah E. Anker (directing eds.), Refugee Law Center, 1 Gender Asylum Law in Different Countries—Decisions and Guidelines (1999); Peter Margulies, Asylum, Intersectionality, and AIDS: Women with HIV as a Persecuted Social Group, 8 Georgetown Immigration L.J. 521 (1994); Susan Forbes Martin, Refugee Women (2d ed. 2004); Karen Musalo, Gender-Based Asylum: An Analysis of Recent Trends, 77 IR 1533 (Oct. 30, 2000). See also the literature concerned more specifically with female genital mutilation, and the readings on non-state actors, each discussed separately below.

Lucy Bonnerjea, Shaming the World—The Needs of Women Refugees 5–6 (1985). A later section of Bonnerjea's study details the gruesome deaths that await many young women who disgrace their families by becoming pregnant before marriage ("crimes of honor"), the killings of women whose families had provided insufficient dowries, and the practice of selling girls and women into prostitution. Id. at 19–20.

Reporting on an actual asylum case, two attorneys provided this account:

Extensive documentation [showed] the high number of honor killings ("Thaer") of Jordanian women from traditional tribal backgrounds suspected of pre-marital or extramarital relationships with "non-original" [in this case Palestinian] Jordanian men. (At least 25–30 of these killings are officially reported each year but the actual number is estimated to be much higher.) The documentary evidence further showed the on-going history of lenient government treatment of the perpetrators (jail sentences are usually less than a year without any sanction against family members who are accomplices to the killings.) * * * [I]t was also shown that "original" Jordanian men can buy protection for any "dishonor" caused by their relationship with "original" Jordanian women through payment to the offended families of a negotiated amount.

Michael D. Gragert & Kathleen Harvey, Asylum Granted in "Honor Killing" Case, 7 BIB 513, at 513 (May 1, 2002).

Despite, or perhaps because of, the potential volume of gender-related instances of persecution, neither the United Nations Convention nor United States statutory law includes gender in the list of persecution grounds that will make a person a refugee. Should gender be added to the list? Or are the social group category and the other existing categories adequate? Here is one view:

Jacqueline Greatbatch, The Gender Difference: Feminist Critiques of Refugee Discourse

1 Internat'l J. Refugee L. 518 (1989).

* * *

The Geneva Convention definition of refugee has recently come under fire from feminists for its "neglect of gender as a critical consideration" in refugee determination. By portraying as universal that which is in fact a male paradigm, it is argued, women refugees face rejection of their claims because their experiences of persecution go unrecognized. Doreen Indra cites the omission of "gender" from the enumerated grounds of persecution as an illustration of "the depth of gender delegitimation in refugee contexts."

The absence of gender as an enumerated basis for fear of persecution in the Convention definition is an omission which ideally requires amelioration. However, feminist complaints go far beyond the language of the definition, to the root of what gender-based claims to persecution would look like, were it possible to make them.

Indra and others call for a redefinition of persecution which acknowledges the feminist theory of social bifurcation: that society is divided into public and private spheres of activity; that the public sphere is male-dominated and women are relegated to the private sphere. Radical feminist theorists such as Catherine MacKinnon and Margaret Thornton propound a distinct "women's experience" of the private sphere which, it is claimed, is the site of gender oppression. Law, history and epistemology are dismissed as "phallogentrism masquerading as universalism." The experience of women's oppression is viewed as trans-historical and trans-cultural. Objectivity is rejected as a method of enquiry and theory is derived instead from "women's experiences."

This theory of women's oppression is reflected in the views of feminist critics of the refugee convention, as exemplified by Indra's thesis that women's experiences of persecution are ignored because, the key criteria for being a refugee are drawn primarily from the realm of public sphere activities dominated by men. With regard to private sphere activities where women's presence is more strongly felt, there is primarily silence—silence compounded by an unconscious calculus that assigns the critical quality "political" to many public activities but few private ones. Thus, state oppression of a religious minority is political, while gender oppression at home is not.

In Indra's view, the addition of "gender" as a basis upon which to found a claim to refugee status would do little to improve the position of refugee women without a redefinition of "persecution" to give credibility to women's private-sphere experiences. * * *

* * *

[Using Iran and Chile as examples, Greatbatch describes common ways in which women suffer political persecution even in the public sphere. She then argues that the word "persecution" is elastic enough to cover at least those kinds of gender-specific oppression that can be linked to the State. As for non-state actors, see the separate subsection below.]

Certainly many claims to Convention refugee status by women can be framed upon one of the existing grounds: race, religion, nationality, membership of a particular social group or political opinion. It must be acknowledged, however, that in many cases women face a barrier to protection, even though their claims to a well-founded fear of persecution are comparable in every other way to those of members of the delineated groups.

In response to feminist critics, the European Parliament, followed by the UNHCR, has urged the recognition as a particular social group of "women who face harsh and inhuman treatment because they are considered to have transgressed the social mores of their society." This formulation capitalizes on the elasticity of the definition of persecution by incorporating the phrase "harsh and inhuman treatment." Further, it imbues political qualities to individual acts of resistance. In short, it goes a considerable way to address the concerns of critics such as Indra and Meijer.

Innovative use of the under-utilized social group category promises some amelioration for the absence of gender as a specified ground, but there are at least two stumbling blocks to it providing a complete solution: the problematic nature of claims to persecution of an economic or social nature; and the trend in third-country resettlement States to restrict entry into their domestic determination systems.

* * *

As the cases of Iran and Chile illustrate, women are among the first victims of economic and social repression. However, the proclivity of States of all political stripes to the oppression of women, coupled with the vagueness with which economic and social rights are proclaimed in international law, suggests that successful use of the "particular social group" category for claims to persecution of an economic or social nature will be minimal.

Finally, as States which traditionally offer permanent resettlement to refugees tighten controls on entry into their domestic determination systems, bearing the additional burden of establishing the existence of a particular social group is an unenviable prospect. * * *

The answer to adequate protection for women refugees then lies not merely in creating a separate "female paradigm" for gender-based claims to persecution. A human rights based approach to defining persecution, the recognition of women as a particular social group, documentation of discriminatory and repressive measures aimed at or particularly affecting women, access to full and fair determination procedures, and a liberal reading of the Convention definition, would provide the basis for the development of a profile of gender-based refugee claims, and for recognition of the difference gender makes.

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. As of this writing, women in the United States have had only mixed success with gender-based asylum claims. The materials below will elaborate. As the previous subsection noted, UNHCR now explicitly regards women as a social group. Accord, David L. Neal, Women as a Social Group: Sex-Based Persecution as Grounds for Asylum, 20 Columbia Human Rights L.Rev. 203 (1988). Professor Susan Kneebone, however, has criticized the tendency to pigeonhole women's claims into the social group category rather than the political opinion category; she argues that doing so constructs women culturally as the objects or victims of a power imbalance. Susan Kneebone, Women Within the Refugee Construct: "Exclusionary Inclusion" in Policy and Practice—The Australian Experience, 17 Internat'l J. Refugee L. 7 (2005). The problems of women refugees are also sometimes lumped in with the problems of child refugees. As to the dangers of doing so, see Jacqueline Bhabha, Demography and Rights: Women, Children and Access to Asylum, 16 Internat'l J. Refugee L. 227 (2004).

2. Why do you suppose the States that have signed the 1951 Convention don't just amend it to add gender to the "on account of" list? Why do you suppose the United States Congress doesn't make analogous amendments to the asylum and withholding provisions? Are numbers a defensible objection? See Karen Musalo, Protecting Victims of Gendered Persecution: Fear of Floodgates or Call to (Principled) Action?, 14 Virginia J. Social Policy & the Law 119 (2007).

Fatin v. INS

United States Court of Appeals for the Third Circuit, 1993.
12 F.3d 1233.

■ ALITO, CIRCUIT JUDGE:

* * *

[An Iranian woman applied for asylum. The former INS denied her application, which she renewed in deportation proceedings.—Eds.]

When her attorney asked her why she feared going back to Iran, she responded: "Because of the government that is ruling the country. It is a strange government to me. It has different rules and regulations than I have been used to." She stated that "anybody who [had] been a Moslem" was required "to practice that religion" or "be punished in public or be jailed," and she added that she had been "raised in a way that you don't have to practice if you don't want to." Id. She subsequently stated that she would be required "to do things that [she] never had to do," such as wear a veil. When asked by her attorney whether she would wear a veil, she replied:

A. I would have to, sir.

Q. And if you didn't?

A. I would be jailed or punished in public. Public mean by whipped or thrown stones and I would be going back to barbaric years.

Later, when the immigration judge asked her whether she would wear a veil or submit to arrest and punishment, she stated:

If I go back, I would try personally to avoid it as much as I could do. . . . I will start trying to avoid it as much as I could.

The petitioner also testified that she considered herself a "feminist" and explained:

As a feminist I mean that I believe in equal rights for women. I believe a woman as a human being can do and should be able to do what they want to do. And over there in . . . Iran at the time being a woman is a second class citizen, doesn't have any right to herself.

After the hearing, the immigration judge denied the petitioner's applications for withholding of deportation, asylum, and suspension of deportation. Addressing her request for withholding of deportation, the immigration judge stated that, although she would be subject to the same discriminatory treatment as all other women in Iran, there was "no indication that there is a likelihood that the Iranian government would be particularly interested in this individual and that they would persecute her." Similarly with respect to her renewed request for asylum, the judge stated:

Respondent has offered no objective indicia which would lead the Court to believe that there is a possibility that she would be persecuted upon return to Iran. Respondent has not been politically active in the United States nor openly opposed to the Khomeini Government. It would appear that her fear of return to Iran while indeed understandable is based upon uncertainty and the unknown. In addition, it would appear that the respondent's fear upon return to Iran is her apparent dislike for the system and her belief that she as a woman would be subject to the severe restrictions presently imparted on Iranians in that country. Respondent therefore contends that her beliefs as a "feminist" would be compromised. While the Court is very much sympathetic to the respondent's desire not to return to Iran, nonetheless, in applying the law to include case law, the Court is compelled to find that the respondent has failed to sustain her burden of proof necessary to be accorded asylum in the United States. * * *

Petitioner then appealed to the Board of Immigration Appeals. In her brief, she argued that she feared persecution "on account of her membership of a particular social group, and on the basis of her political opinion." Her brief identified her "particular social group" as "the social group of the upper class of Iranian women who supported the Shah of Iran, a group of educated Westernized free-thinking individuals." Her brief also stated that she had a "deeply rooted belief in feminism" and in "equal rights for women, and the right to free choice of any expression and development of abilities, in the fields of education, work, home and family, and all other arenas of development." In addition, her brief observed that she would be forced upon return to Iran "to practice the Moslem religion." Her brief stated that "she would try to avoid practicing a religion as much as she could.” Her brief added that she had “the personal desire to avoid as much practice as she could,” but that she feared that “through religious ignorance and inexperience she would be unable to play the role of a religious Shi’ite woman.” Id. Her brief contained one passage concerning the requirement that women in Iran wear a veil in public:

In April 1983, the government adopted a law imposing one year’s imprisonment on any women caught in public without the traditional Islamic veil, the Chador. However, from reports, it is clear that in many instances the revolutionary guards . . . take the law into their own hands and abuse the transgressing women. . . .

Her brief did not discuss the question whether she would comply with the law regarding the wearing of a chador. Nor did her brief explain what effect submitting to that requirement would have upon her.

* * *

The Board of Immigration Appeals dismissed the petitioner’s appeal. The Board noted that she had argued that she was entitled to relief “as a member of the social group composed of upper-class Iranian women” and as a person who “was educated in the western tradition.” Rejecting this argument, the Board stated that there was no evidence that she would be “singled out” for persecution. Instead, the Board observed that she would be “subject to the same restrictions and requirements” as the rest of the population. * * *

* * *

B. Both courts and commentators have struggled to define “particular social group.” Read in its broadest literal sense, the phrase is almost completely open-ended. Virtually any set including more than one person could be described as a “particular social group.” Thus, the statutory language standing alone is not very instructive.

* * *

[Here the court adopts the immutability test from Acosta—Eds.]

With this understanding of the phrase “particular social group” in mind, we turn to the elements that an alien must establish in order to qualify for withholding of deportation or asylum based on membership in such a group. We believe that there are three such elements. The alien must (1) identify a group that constitutes a “particular social group” within the interpretation just discussed, (2) establish that he or she is a member of that group, and (3) show that he or she would be persecuted or has a well-founded fear of persecution based on that membership.

[In Acosta] the Board specifically mentioned “sex” as an innate characteristic that could link the members of a “particular social group.” Thus, to the extent that the petitioner in this case suggests that she would be persecuted or has a well-founded fear that she would be persecuted in Iran simply because she is a woman, she has satisfied the first of the three elements that we have noted. She has not, however, satisfied the third element; that is, she has not shown that she would suffer or that she has a well-founded fear of suffering "persecution" based solely on her gender.

In Acosta, the BIA discussed the meaning of the term "persecution," concluding that "the pre-Refugee Act construction" of that term should still be followed. Heeding this construction, the BIA interpreted "persecution" to include threats to life, confinement, torture, and economic restrictions so severe that they constitute a threat to life or freedom. By contrast, the BIA suggested that "generally harsh conditions shared by many other persons" do not amount to persecution. Among the pre-Refugee Act cases on which the BIA relied was Blazina v. Bouchard (1961), where our court noted that the mere "repugnance of . . . a governmental policy to our own concepts of . . . freedom" was not sufficient to justify labelling that policy as persecution. Thus, we interpret Acosta as recognizing that the concept of persecution does not encompass all treatment that our society regards as unfair, unjust, or even unlawful or unconstitutional. If persecution were defined that expansively, a significant percentage of the world's population would qualify for asylum in this country—and it seems most unlikely that Congress intended such a result.

In this case, the evidence in the administrative record regarding the way in which women in Iran are generally treated is quite sparse. We certainly cannot say that "a reasonable factfinder would have to conclude," based on that record, that the petitioner, if returned to Iran, would face treatment amounting to "persecution" simply because she is a woman. While the amici supporting the petitioner have called to our attention articles describing the harsh restrictions placed on all women in Iran, the facts asserted in these articles are not part of the administrative record.

* * *

The petitioner's primary argument, in any event, is not that she faces persecution simply because she is a woman. Rather, she maintains that she faces persecution because she is a member of "a very visible and specific subgroup: Iranian women who refuse to conform to the government's gender-specific laws and social norms." This definition merits close consideration. It does not include all Iranian women who hold feminist views. Nor does it include all Iranian women who find the Iranian government's "gender-specific laws and repressive social norms" objectionable or offensive. Instead, it is limited to those Iranian women who find those laws so abhorrent that they "refuse to conform"—even though, according to the petitioner's brief, "the routine penalty" for noncompliance is "74 lashes, a year's imprisonment, and in many cases brutal rapes and death."

Limited in this way, the "particular social group" identified by the petitioner may well satisfy the BIA's definition of that concept, for if a woman's opposition to the Iranian laws in question is so profound that she would choose to suffer the severe consequences of noncompliance, her beliefs may well be characterized as "so fundamental to [her] identity or conscience that [they] ought not be required to be changed." The petitioner's difficulty, however, is that the administrative record does not establish that she is a member of this tightly defined group, for there is no evidence in that record showing that her opposition to the Iranian laws at issue is of the depth and importance required.

The Iranian restriction discussed most prominently in the petitioner's testimony was the requirement that women wear the chador or traditional veil, but the most that the petitioner's testimony showed was that she would find that requirement objectionable and would seek to avoid compliance if possible. When asked whether she would prefer to comply with that law or suffer the consequences of noncompliance, she stated only that she "would try to avoid" wearing a chador as much as she could. Similarly, her brief to the BIA stated only that she would seek to avoid Islamic practices "as much as she could." She never testified that she would refuse to comply with the law regarding the chador or any of the other gender-specific laws or social norms. Nor did she testify that wearing the chador or complying with any of the other restrictions was so deeply abhorrent to her that it would be tantamount to persecution. Instead, the most that emerges from her testimony is that she would find these requirements objectionable and would not observe them if she could avoid doing so. This testimony does not bring her within the particular social group that she has defined—Iranian women who refuse to conform with those requirements even if the consequences may be severe.

The "particular social group" that her testimony places her within is, instead, the presumably larger group consisting of Iranian women who find their country's gender-specific laws offensive and do not wish to comply with them. But if the petitioner's "particular social group" is defined in this way, she cannot prevail because the administrative record does not satisfy the third element described above, i.e., it does not show that the consequences that would befall her as a member of that group would constitute "persecution." According to the petitioner, she would have two options if she returned to Iran: comply with the Iranian laws or suffer severe consequences. Thus, while we agree with the petitioner that the indicated consequences of noncompliance would constitute persecution, we must still inquire whether her other option—compliance—would also constitute persecution.

In considering whether the petitioner established that this option would constitute persecution, we will assume for the sake of argument that the concept of persecution is broad enough to include governmental measures that compel an individual to engage in conduct that is not physically painful or harmful but is abhorrent to that individual's deepest beliefs. An example of such conduct might be requiring a person to renounce his or her religious beliefs or to desecrate an object of religious importance. Such conduct might be regarded as a form of "torture" and thus as falling within the Board's description of persecution in Acosta. Such a requirement could constitute "torture" or persecution, however, only if directed against a person who actually possessed the religious beliefs or attached religious importance to the object in question. Requiring an adherent of an entirely different religion or a non-believer to engage in the same conduct would not constitute persecution.⁴⁴

Here, while we assume for the sake of argument that requiring some women to wear chadors may be so abhorrent to them that it would be tantamount to persecution, this requirement clearly does not constitute persecution for all women. Presumably, there are devout Shi'ite women in Iran who find this requirement entirely appropriate. Presumably, there are other women in Iran who find it either inconvenient, irritating, mildly objectionable, or highly offensive, but for whom it falls short of constituting persecution. As we have previously noted, the petitioner's testimony in this case simply does not show that for her the requirement of wearing the chador or complying with Iran's other gender-specific laws would be so profoundly abhorrent that it could aptly be called persecution. Accordingly, we cannot hold that she is entitled to withholding of deportation or asylum based on her membership in a "particular social group."

[The court next rejects a parallel argument based on political opinion.—Eds.]

* * *

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. The court considers three possible "social groups:" (a) all women; (b) women who find it offensive to be forced to wear the chador (also described at one point as women who are westernized and freethinking); and (c) women who find it so offensive to be forced to wear the chador that they would refuse to do so, despite the severe penalties. To each of these possible social groups, the court applies a three-part test. Before proceeding further, make sure you are clear how the court's three-part test is applied to each of the three possible social group claims.

2. Focus first on social group #1—all women. The good news for women seeking asylum is that with this decision the Third Circuit became the first United States court to hold explicitly that women are a social group. That conclusion became inevitable once the court decided to adopt Acosta, since gender is an immutable characteristic.⁴⁵

44. [Footnote 10 in original] We do not suggest that an alien could establish that he or she would be persecuted or has a well-founded fear of persecution based solely on his or her subjective reactions. Presumably, conduct could not constitute persecution or "torture" within Acosta unless an objective requirement is also satisfied.

45. Accord, Mohammed v. Gonzales, 400 F.3d 785 (9th Cir. 2005); UNHCR, Guidelines on International Protection: "Membership of a particular social group" within the context of article 1A(2) of the 1951 Convention and/or its 1967 Protocol relating to the Status of Refugees, U.N. Doc. HCR/GIP/02/02 (May 7, 2002), para. II.B.12, reproduced, 81 IR 571 (Apr. 26, 2004); UNHCR, Guidelines on International Protection: Gender-Related Persecution within the context of Article 1A(2) of the 1951 Convention and/or its 1967 Protocol relating to the Status of Refugees, U.N. Doc. HCR/GIP/02/01, para. 30 (May 7, 2002), reproduced, 81 IR 561 (Apr. 26, 2004).

But notice the way the court implicitly interprets the requirement that the persecution be “on account of” membership in a particular social group. In the court’s view, the problem here is that Fatin “has not shown she would suffer . . . ‘persecution’ based solely on her gender” (emphasis added). Does she really have to show that? The statutory definition of “refugee” doesn’t use the word “solely.” If, for example, a government persecutes a subcategory of one particular race (and no one else), is asylum really to be denied because the persecution is not “solely” on account of race? Or should “on account of” be read to mean “but for?” Under the latter interpretation, Fatin would prevail as long as she can show that the persecution of which she has a well founded fear would not occur but for her membership in the particular social group—in this case, but for her gender.

A but-for test would not have altered the result in this case, because Fatin’s problem was that the court simply did not regard forced adherence to the Iranian dress code as persecution (at least not for her). Therefore, although the court says that the problem is that Fatin failed to prove a well founded fear of persecution based solely on gender, the real problem, in the court’s eyes, is that Fatin hasn’t proved a well founded fear of persecution, period. Had the court concluded that her forced compliance with the dress code rose to the level of persecution, would there have been any reason to deny asylum?

The meaning of “on account of” is taken up separately in section B.2.d below.

3. Now focus on social group #2—women who find the dress code offensive. Here we have a difficult line-drawing problem. The court acknowledges that, if a woman’s convictions are so strong that she would defy the law and accept the consequences rather than wear the chador, then the practice rises to the level of persecution. In the last full paragraph of the opinion, the court also assumes “for the sake of argument that requiring some women to wear chadors may be so abhorrent to them that it would be tantamount to persecution” [emphasis added], even if they are not willing to defy the law. At least one other court has similarly distinguished “opposed” from “abhorrent.” See Yadegar-Sargis v. INS, 297 F.3d 596 (7th Cir. 2002). This question, which the court did not feel it needed to reach on its reading of the evidence, is a difficult one. What is your view? Should being forced to do something one finds abhorrent be held to constitute persecution, or should a court require a showing that the person finds the practice so abhorrent that she would defy the law and accept the consequences, whatever they might be? Should a woman have to risk being stoned to death for her convictions before a court will find that those convictions are fundamental to her personal identity? Or would most people sacrifice even things that are fundamental to their identities if they had to do so to save their lives? For that matter, should being merely “opposed” or finding the practice “offensive” be enough to make subsection to that practice persecution? (The authors thank Professors Muneer Ahmad and Leti Volpp for their insights on this issue.)

4. Along similar lines, suppose a gay person could avoid persecution by staying in the closet. Should he or she be expected to do so, rather than be granted asylum? Should a political dissident be denied asylum if he or she can avoid persecution by suppressing his or her views? Should a non-orthodox Muslim woman who objects to a forced dress code be denied asylum if she can avoid persecution simply by conforming? In these and similar contexts, does the law (and should it) hinge the availability of asylum on the intensity of one's convictions about the particular issue, as Judge Alito suggested in Fatin?

5. Focus, finally, on social group #3—women whose convictions are so intense that they would defy the dress code, even knowing how dangerous defiance would be. As just noted, the court acknowledges that such women might well meet the refugee definition. Are there arguments that the government could make against granting asylum even to this group? Should the test be subjective (this particular woman would disobey the law), or objective (a reasonable person similarly situated would disobey the law), or both?

6. Fatin was decided in 1993. In May 1995, the former INS released an important memorandum providing guidance to INS asylum officers on the handling of gender-related asylum claims. Memorandum from Phyllis Coven, INS Office of International Affairs, to All INS Asylum Office/rs and HQASM Coordinators, May 26, 1995, reproduced in 72 IR at 781-90 (June 5, 1995) [hereafter cited as INS Gender Guidelines].

The INS Gender Guidelines were inspired by UNHCR gender guidelines issued in 1991, by comprehensive guidelines issued by Canada's Immigration and Refugee Board in 1993, and by proposed guidelines prepared by Harvard Law School's Women Refugees Project in 1994. See INS Gender Guidelines at 1. In addition to the United States and Canada, Australia has issued Gender Guidelines. For a thoughtful comparison of the three sets of guidelines, see Audrey Macklin, Cross-Border Shopping for Ideas: A Critical Review of United States, Canadian, and Australian Approaches to Gender-Related Asylum Claims, 13 Georgetown Immigration L.J. 25 (1998).

The INS Gender Guidelines review various relevant international human rights instruments. They then admonish asylum officers to display sensitivity both in interviewing claimants who present gender-related claims and in assessing such claims. The Guidelines also analyze some of the legal issues that gender-based claims commonly generate. Most significantly, the Guidelines confirm that sexual violence can constitute persecution and that such persecution can be on account of political opinion (actual or imputed), social group, or possibly other protected grounds. The main goal was to emphasize to asylum adjudicators that gender-related asylum claims are to be taken seriously.⁴⁶

46. Deborah Anker and Nancy Kelly, both instrumental in helping to shape the Guidelines, have noted many positive consequences. See 72 IR at 771-72 (June 5, 1995); see also Deborah Anker, Nancy Kelly, & John Willshire-Carrera, Rape in the Community as UNHCR has also issued a set of gender guidelines designed to provide interpretive guidance to governments and others. See note 45 above.

7. In Fisher v. INS, 79 F.3d 955 (9th Cir. en banc 1996) (amended opinion), a divided court reached a result similar to that in Fatin (except that in Fisher the claimant had argued persecution only on the bases of religion and political opinion, not social group). Like the Third Circuit, the Ninth Circuit was unwilling to hold the dress code to be persecution. Since the alleged persecution consisted of punishment for violation of law, the court asked only whether the punishment was selective, disproportionate, or pretextual. Concluding it was none of those, the court rejected the claim. The majority used language that might have been interpreted to mean that a government does not persecute when it treats all women the same—even if it treats women less favorably than men. Judge Canby's separate concurring opinion forcefully disavowed that notion. He stressed that the court was not foreclosing the possibility of asylum in a case where the government persecuted women because of their gender.

8. Should forcing a person to practice a religion in which he or she does not believe be considered persecution? Is this different from denying a person the freedom to practice a religion in which he or she does believe?

9. In two noteworthy cases, Immigration Judge John Gossart (Baltimore) granted asylum to women who had asserted compelling gender-related persecution. In one case, the woman had been tortured and imprisoned by the Taliban in Afghanistan for working outside the home and for walking outside the home (to work). He found she had been persecuted solely for being a woman. See 77 IR 1166 (Aug. 14, 2000). In another case he granted asylum to an Indian woman who had been beaten and threatened with death if she failed to meet her mother-in-law's continuing dowry demands. In the latter case Judge Gossart found persecution on account of membership in a particular social group and defined the social group in very specific terms. See Matter of Patel, A74 974 011 at 10 (IJ Gossart, sitting at York, Pa., May 23, 1997).

10. At the heart of this issue is the tension between two competing philosophies—cultural relativism, which emphasizes respect for the cultural norms of the country of origin, and universalism, which stresses the universality of internationally recognized human rights. For a sensitive discussion of the dangers of cultural relativism in the context of gender, see Jacqueline Bhabha, Embodied Rights: Gender Persecution, State Sovereignty, and Refugees, 9 Public Culture 3 (1996). We shall return to the subject of cultural relativism in the context of female genital mutilation, discussed below. For now, try to decide on which side of the line you would place the Iranian dress code. Does it transgress a fundamental human right? Or is it a justifiable expression of another country's cultural and religious norms?

a Basis for Asylum: The Treatment of Women Refugees' Claims to Protection in Canada and the United States—Part 2, 2 BIB 608 (Aug. 1, 1997) (identifying numerous favorable concrete consequences, particularly in cases of ethnically motivated rape, but regretting inadequate implementation).

11. Domestic violence has become one of the more common contexts in which gender-related persecution issues arise. Domestic violence cases, in turn, often raise difficult issues concerning how to analyze persecution by private actors. Both subjects—non-state actors and domestic violence claims—are taken up in a separate section below.

12. The mass rapes in the former Yugoslavia focused renewed attention on how to treat asylum claims filed by rape victims. But the problem was soon exposed as a worldwide one. In Matter of D.V., 21 I. & N. Dec. 77 (BIA 1993), a politically active woman was gang-raped and severely beaten by Haitian soldiers in retaliation for her support of President Aristide. Finding a well founded fear of persecution on account of both political opinion and religion (she did not argue social group), the Board granted asylum. As the case illustrates, rape-related asylum claims do not have to be based on social group. They may constitute persecution based on any of the protected grounds. See generally Anker, Kelly & Willshire-Carrera, note 46 above.

Matter of Kasinga

Board of Immigration Appeals, June 13, 1996.
21 I. & N. Dec. 357.

■ SCHMIDT, CHAIRMAN:

This is a timely appeal by the applicant from a decision of an Immigration Judge dated August 25, 1995. The Immigration Judge found the applicant excludable as an intending immigrant, denied her applications for asylum and withholding of deportation, and ordered her excluded and deported from the United States. Upon reviewing the appellate record anew (“de novo review”), we will sustain the applicant’s appeal, grant asylum, and order her admitted to the United States as an asylee.

A fundamental issue before us is whether the practice of female genital mutilation (“FGM”) can be the basis for a grant of asylum under section 208 of the Immigration and Nationality Act. On appeal, the parties agree that FGM can be the basis for a grant of asylum. We find that FGM can be a basis for asylum.

Nevertheless, the parties disagree about 1) the parameters of FGM as a ground for asylum in future cases, and 2) whether the applicant is entitled to asylum on the basis of the record before us. In deciding this case, we decline to speculate on, or establish rules for, cases that are not before us.

We make seven major findings in the applicant’s case. Those findings are summarized below.

First, the record before us reflects that the applicant is a credible witness. Second, FGM, as practiced by the Tchamba-Kunsuntu Tribe of Togo and documented in the record, constitutes persecution. Third, the applicant is a member of a social group consisting of young women of the Tchamba-Kunsuntu Tribe who have not had FGM, as practiced by that tribe, and who oppose the practice. Fourth, the applicant has a well-founded fear of persecution. Fifth, the persecution the applicant fears is “on account of” her social group. Sixth, the applicant’s fear of persecution is country-wide. Seventh, and finally, the applicant is eligible for and should be granted asylum in the exercise of discretion. Each finding is explained below.

I. CREDIBILITY

A. The Applicant’s Testimony

The applicant is a 19-year-old native and citizen of Togo. She attended 2 years of high school. She is a member of the Tchamba-Kunsuntu Tribe of northern Togo. She testified that young women of her tribe normally undergo FGM at age 15. However, she did not because she initially was protected from FGM by her influential, but now deceased, father.

The applicant stated that upon her father’s death in 1993, under tribal custom her aunt, her father’s sister, became the primary authority figure in the family. The applicant’s mother was driven from the family home, left Togo, and went to live with her family in Benin. The applicant testified that she does not currently know her mother’s exact whereabouts.

The applicant further testified that her aunt forced her into a polygamous marriage in October 1994, when she was 17. The husband selected by her aunt was 45 years old and had three other wives at the time of marriage. The applicant testified that, under tribal custom, her aunt and her husband planned to force her to submit to FGM before the marriage was consummated.

The applicant testified that she feared imminent mutilation. With the help of her older sister, she fled Togo for Ghana. However, she was afraid that her aunt and her husband would locate her there. Consequently, using money from her mother, the applicant embarked for Germany by airplane.

Upon arrival in Germany, the applicant testified that she was somewhat disoriented and spent several hours wandering around the airport looking for fellow Africans who might help her. Finally, she struck up a conversation, in English, with a German woman.

After hearing the applicant’s story, the woman offered to give the applicant temporary shelter in her home until the applicant decided what to do next. For the next 2 months, the applicant slept in the woman’s living room, while performing cooking and cleaning duties.

The applicant further stated that in December 1994, while on her way to a shopping center, she met a young Nigerian man. He was the first person from Africa she had spoken to since arriving in Germany. They struck up a conversation, during which the applicant told the man about her situation. He offered to sell the applicant his sister’s British passport so that she could seek asylum in the United States, where she has an aunt, an uncle, and a cousin. The applicant followed the man’s suggestion, purchasing the passport and the ticket with money given to her by her sister.

The applicant did not attempt a fraudulent entry into the United States. Rather, upon arrival at Newark International Airport on December 17, 1994, she immediately requested asylum. She remained in detention by the Immigration and Naturalization Service ("INS") until April 1996.

The applicant testified that the Togolese police and the Government of Togo were aware of FGM and would take no steps to protect her from the practice. She further testified that her aunt had reported her to the Togolese police. Upon return, she would be taken back to her husband by the police and forced to undergo FGM. She testified at several points that there would be nobody to protect her from FGM in Togo.

* * *

The applicant testified that she could not find protection anywhere in Togo. She stated that Togo is a very small country and her husband and aunt, with the help of the police, could locate her anywhere she went. She also stated that her husband is well known in Togo and is a friend of the police. On cross-examination she stated that it would not be possible for her to live with another tribe in Togo.

The applicant also testified that the Togolese police could locate her in Ghana. She indicated that she did not seek asylum in Germany because she could not speak German and therefore could not continue her education there. She stated that she did not have relatives in Germany as she does in the United States.

[Here the Board summarizes the extensive testimony and documentary evidence establishing the preceding facts.—Eds.]

* * *

4. Description of FGM

According to the applicant's testimony, the FGM practiced by her tribe, the Tchamba-Kunsuntu, is of an extreme type involving cutting the genitalia with knives, extensive bleeding, and a 40-day recovery period. The background materials confirm that the FGM practiced in some African countries, such as Togo, is of an extreme nature causing permanent damage, and not just a minor form of genital ritual.

The record material establishes that FGM in its extreme forms is a practice in which portions of the female genitalia are cut away. In some cases, the vagina is sutured partially closed. This practice clearly inflicts harm or suffering upon the girl or woman who undergoes it.

FGM is extremely painful and at least temporarily incapacitating. It permanently disfigures the female genitalia. FGM exposes the girl or woman to the risk of serious, potentially life-threatening complications. These include, among others, bleeding, infection, urine retention, stress, shock, psychological trauma, and damage to the urethra and anus. It can result in permanent loss of genital sensation and can adversely affect sexual and erotic functions.

The FGM Alert, compiled and distributed by the INS Resource Information Center, notes that “few African countries have officially condemned female genital mutilation and still fewer have enacted legislation against the practice.” Further, according to the FGM Alert, even in those few African countries where legislative efforts have been made, they are usually ineffective to protect women against FGM. The FGM Alert notes that “it remains practically true that [African] women have little legal recourse and may face threats to their freedom, threats or acts of physical violence, or social ostracization for refusing to undergo this harmful traditional practice for attempting to protect their female children.” Id. at 6-7. Togo is not listed in the FGM Alert as among the African countries that have made even minimal efforts to protect women from FGM.

* * * [The INS Gender Guidelines] state that “rape . . . , sexual abuse and domestic violence, infanticide and genital mutilation are forms of mistreatment primarily directed at girls and women and they may serve as evidence of past persecution on account of one or more of the five grounds.”

* * *

* * * [O]n the basis of the record before us, we find the applicant to be a credible witness.

II. FGM AS PERSECUTION

For the purposes of this case, we adopt the [above] description of FGM * * *. We agree with the parties that this level of harm can constitute “persecution” within the meaning of section 101(a)(42)(A) of the Act.

While a number of descriptions of persecution have been formulated in our past decisions, we have recognized that persecution can consist of the infliction of harm or suffering by a government, or persons a government is unwilling or unable to control, to overcome a characteristic of the victim. The “seeking to overcome” formulation has its antecedents in concepts of persecution that predate the Refugee Act of 1980.

As observed by the INS, many of our past cases involved actors who had a subjective intent to punish their victims. However, this subjective “punitive” or “malignant” intent is not required for harm to constitute persecution.

Our characterization of FGM as persecution is consistent with our past definitions of that term. We therefore reach the conclusion that FGM can be persecution without passing on the INS’s proposed “shocks the conscience” test. * * *

III. SOCIAL GROUP

* * *

In the context of this case, we find the particular social group to be the following: young women of the Tchamba-Kunsuntu Tribe who have not had FGM, as practiced by that tribe, and who oppose the practice. This is very similar to the formulations suggested by the parties.

The defined social group meets the test we set forth in Matter of Acosta. It also is consistent with the law of the United States Court of Appeals for the Third Circuit, where this case arose. Fatin v. INS, 12 F.3d 1233, 1241 (3d Cir. 1993) (stating that Iranian women who refuse to conform to the Iranian Government's gender-specific laws and social norms may well satisfy the Acosta definition).

In accordance with Acosta, the particular social group is defined by common characteristics that members of the group either cannot change, or should not be required to change because such characteristics are fundamental to their individual identities. The characteristics of being a "young woman" and a "member of the Tchamba-Kunsuntu Tribe" cannot be changed. The characteristic of having intact genitalia is one that is so fundamental to the individual identity of a young woman that she should not be required to change it.

IV. WELL-FOUNDED FEAR

The burden of proof is upon an applicant for asylum to establish that a "reasonable person" in her circumstances would fear persecution upon return to Togo. The applicant has met this burden through a combination of her credible testimony and the introduction of documentary evidence and background information that supports her claim.

V. "ON ACCOUNT OF"

To be eligible for asylum, the applicant must establish that her well-founded fear of persecution is "on account of" one of the five grounds specified in the Act, here, her membership in a "particular social group." See, e.g., Matter of H—, supra (holding that harm or abuse because of clan membership constitutes persecution on account of social group).

Both parties have advanced, and the background materials support, the proposition that there is no legitimate reason for FGM. Group Exhibit 4 contains materials showing that the practice has been condemned by such groups as the United Nations, the International Federation of Gynecology and Obstetrics, the Council on Scientific Affairs, the World Health Organization, the International Medical Association, and the American Medical Association.

Record materials state that FGM "has been used to control woman's sexuality". It also is characterized as a form of "sexual oppression" that is "based on the manipulation of women's sexuality in order to assure male dominance and exploitation." During oral argument before us, the INS General Counsel agreed with the latter characterization. He also stated that the practice is a "severe bodily invasion" that should be regarded as meeting the asylum standard even if done with "subjectively benign intent".

We agree with the parties that, as described and documented in this record, FGM is practiced, at least in some significant part, to overcome sexual characteristics of young women of the tribe who have not been, and do not wish to be, subjected to FGM. We therefore find that the persecution the applicant fears in Togo is “on account of” her status as a member of the defined social group.

* * *

* * * [W]e find that this record adequately supports the applicant’s claim that she has a country-wide fear of persecution in Togo.

VII. DISCRETION

* * *

We have weighed the favorable and adverse factors and are satisfied that discretion should be exercised in favor of the applicant. Therefore, we will grant asylum to the applicant.

* * *

CONCURRING OPINION: Lauri Steven Filppu, Board Member, joined by Michael J. Heilman, Board Member.

I respectfully concur. I write separately in part to respond more completely to several arguments advanced by the Immigration and Naturalization Service.

* * *

B. The Persecution Issues

The parties offer different theories for why FGM can amount to persecution, with the Service offering a novel “shocks the conscience” theory as part of its analysis. For purposes of this case, it is sufficient to observe that the level of suffering associated with FGM, as practiced by the applicant’s tribe, would be more than enough to constitute persecution if inflicted exclusively on a religious or political minority.

The “on account of” and “particular social group” requirements of the statute are not in dispute here, except to the extent that the applicant’s proposed “social group” definition includes an element of personal opposition by the victim which is not included in the Service’s proposal. It is not essential to choose between these offerings. In view of the positions taken by the parties, the applicant would qualify for relief under either proffered social group.

* * *

III. THE SERVICE’S FRAMEWORK

Despite the absence of any major dispute between the parties in this case, the Service requests that we adopt its broad “framework of analysis” for claims of this type. Its suggestion candidly is aimed at addressing issues it sees arising in relation to claims that may be made by women from other "parts of the world where FGM is practiced" and by those "who have been subjected to it in the past."

The Board engages in case adjudication. It decides those issues that lead to the resolution of the cases before it. Our published rulings act as precedent under the regulations and can affect many related cases. But the Board is not well positioned, in the context of a single disposition of a novel issue, to establish comprehensive rules or guidelines for the adjudication of all cases presenting variations on the case at hand. Yet, it is the cases that are not before us that seem to draw much of the Service's attention in its brief.

The Service points out that it is "estimated that over eighty million females have been subjected to FGM." It further notes that there is "no indication" that "Congress considered application of [the asylum laws] to broad cultural practices of the type involved here." The Service proceeds to argue that "the underlying purposes of the asylum system . . . are unavoidably in tension" in both providing protection for those seriously in jeopardy and in maintaining broad overall governmental control over immigration. The Service further argues that "the Board's interpretation in this case must assure protection for those most at risk of the harms covered by the statute, but it cannot simply grant asylum to all who might be subjected to a practice deemed objectionable or a violation of a person's human rights." It is from these underpinnings that the Service argues that the class of FGM victims who may be eligible for asylum "does not consist of all women who come from the parts of the world where FGM is practiced, nor of all who have been subjected to it in the past."

The Service then offers its "framework of analysis." That framework includes a new "shocks the conscience" test for persecution.⁴⁷ The advantages seen by the Service of this test evidently include: 1) the ability to define FGM as "persecution" notwithstanding any lack of intent to "punish" FGM victims on the part of the victims' parents or tribe members who may well "believe that they are simply performing an important cultural rite that bonds the individual to the society"; 2) the ability to exclude other cultural practices, such as "body scarring," from the definition of persecution as these do not shock the conscience; and 3) the ability to exclude past victims of FGM from asylum eligibility if "they consented" to it or "at least acquiesced," as in the case of a woman who experienced FGM as "a small

47. The INS was actually suggesting a two-pronged test. It argued that, to constitute "persecution," the particular harm must be either inflicted with "malignant or punitive intent" or "so extreme as to shock the conscience of the society from which asylum is sought." The INS argued that FGM is rarely inflicted with evil intent and thus will normally qualify as persecution only if it shocks the conscience. For that to happen, the INS argued, the harm must be "extreme," it must be inflicted on an unconsenting individual, and the person must actually suffer that harm rather than the harm that accompanies refusal. For purposes of that test, acquiescence—even by a small child—would prevent a person from showing past persecution. See Karen Musalo, In re Kasin-ga: A Big Step Forward for Gender-Based Asylum Claims, 73 IR 853, 856 (July 1, 1996), quoting from the INS Brief.—Eds.

child," since FGM would not shock the conscience unless inflicted on "an unconsenting or resisting individual."

With respect to the past persecution question, the Service references 8 CFR § 208.13(b)(1) (1995), and notes "that a woman once circumcised cannot ordinarily be subjected to FGM a second time." The regulation cited by the Service provides in part for a presumption of future persecution that arises from past persecution, and allows only one way of overcoming the presumption, namely, a change in country conditions. As conditions in countries where FGM is practiced may not have changed, it may be anomalous to have a binding presumption of future persecution where the act of persecution will never again take place for the individual past victim.

The Service's broad framework of analysis also seems to have led it to offer a social group definition that in one respect fits the test set forth in Matter of Acosta, yet is also defined largely by the harm sought to be included in the concept of persecution. For example, we simply do not know from this record whether the similar social groups proposed by the parties are recognized as groupings for any other purposes within Togolese society aside from the serious personal harm at issue here. The record does not disclose whether this group is seen as a distinct body within Togo or within the tribe both before and after the infliction of FGM on its members, or whether it is a group that exists exclusively in relation to the particular offensive practice at issue here. Because the social group definition has not been a real source of dispute between the parties, we are also not well informed as to the degree of affiliation between or the homogeneity among its members. See Sanchez-Trujillo v. INS, 801 F.2d 1571 (9th Cir. 1986).⁴⁸

The Service does not offer its new framework of analysis for our consideration as part of an effort to harmonize a line of past rulings, or otherwise to put some order into a series of decisions that have addressed FGM questions in a variety of contexts. Instead, the Service offers its new analysis in the context of a case of first impression for the Board. * * *

* * *

The Board certainly is not oblivious to immigration policy considerations in the disposition of cases falling within our jurisdiction. But we are not fundamentally a policy-making body. There may be some unsettling or unsatisfying aspects to the slower and less predictable development of legal guidelines that inures in the Board's case adjudication system. But there are alternatives if resort to the Board's issuance of precedent is not satisfactory in a particular context. The Service can seek to have the Attorney General issue regulations that comprehensively address compet-

48. [Footnote 3 in original] But for the concession of the Service on this point, I would be inclined to remand this case for further development on the "social group" question. The meaning of the phrase "membership in a particular social group" has not been completely explained by our case law. Nevertheless, it is questionable whether the statute was meant to encompass groups that are defined principally in relation to the harm feared by the asylum applicant. The record here sheds little light on this question.

ing concerns, or it can work within the Administration for appropriate legislative action by Congress.

CONCURRING OPINION: Lory D. Rosenberg, Board Member

* * *

Unlike requests for asylum premised upon political opinion, social group claims, like those involving race, ethnicity, or religion, are status based and do not necessarily require a showing of the presence of an individual's opinions or activities which spurs the persecutor's wrath or otherwise motivates the harm or persecution. Rather, such requests involve a determination of whether the shared characteristics are those which motivate an agent of persecution to seek to overcome or otherwise harm the individual. Consequently, while not inaccurate, it is surplusage to define the social group in this case by including as an element the applicant's opposition to the practice of female genital mutilation.

* * * As I have stated, the applicant's political or social views—her attitude or intent—is not relevant to our definition of the social group to which she belongs, but rather to whether the harm or abuse she faces constitutes persecution.

* * *

* * * [I]n an endorsement of the viability of the present statutory structure, the Service itself saw fit to develop gender guidelines to assist in the adjudication of asylum claims brought by women. Curiously, the position of the Service in this case makes no reference to its published guidance in that regard. However, it is notable that the guidelines recognize the importance of considering gender-based claims in light of international human rights instruments and the framework they provide. Indeed, the Service itself recognizes that gender-based asylum claims are "developments in refugee protection" and that its guidelines are a natural and multifaceted outgrowth of a set of gender guidelines issued by the UNHCR in 1991, the 1993 Canadian gender guidelines and other sources of expertise including the Women's Refugee Project of the Harvard Immigration and Refugee Program.

* * *

DISSENTING OPINION: Fred W. Vacca, Board Member

I respectfully dissent without opinion.

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. The Kasinga case was a media event. Professor Karen Musalo, the lead counsel for Kasinga, understood at an early stage the strategic importance of bringing the issue of female genital mutilation to the attention of the public. Through a highly successful grassroots organizing campaign, the legal team was able to generate crucial publicity about Kasinga's case and about some immigration judge decisions in similar cases.⁴⁹

As the BIA notes with some concern, the former INS detained Kasinga for 16 months, despite repeated requests for parole pending the disposition of her case. Nine days after a front page New York Times article triggered widespread criticism of the INS, the agency released Kasinga from detention. In Musalo's words: "Although the INS denies that it paroled Ms. Kasinga due to media attention and public opinion, it appears more than coincidental that all previous efforts to secure Ms. Kasinga's release had been rebuffed, but the INS just happened to reconsider and release her nine days after the first New York Times article appeared." Musalo, note 49 above, at 861; see also Hope Lewis & Isabelle R. Gunning, Cleaning Our Own House: "Exotic" and Familial Human Rights Violations, 4 Buffalo Human Rights L. Rev. 123, 130-31 (1998) (describing the brutal conditions of Kasinga's detention).

By the time the case reached the BIA, the INS and Kasinga's counsel had reached agreement on what the BIA rightly called the "fundamental issue" in the case—whether FGM can be the basis for a grant of asylum. Both agreed that it could. With that stipulation, the real question was what the general principle would be for determining whether a given FGM claim qualifies. Immigration and refugee professionals waited anxiously for the answer to that question. Some even hoped that the BIA in Kasinga would clarify the meanings of the crucial phrases "persecution," "social group," and "on account of."

Asylum advocates cheered the positive outcome for Kasinga, but those who had hoped for greater guidance on future cases came away disappointed. The BIA declined to lay out general principles for determining when FGM will constitute persecution or when that persecution will be regarded as being on account of membership in a social group. Instead, the BIA held only that on these specific facts (this woman, this tribe, this particular surgical method) FGM is persecution on account of membership in a social group.⁵⁰ Still, the courts have had little difficulty recognizing FGM as persecution,⁵¹ and the various opinions in Kasinga do reveal some of the complexities. The discussion that follows examines some of the subissues.

49. For a sampling of the articles, see David A. Martin, Adelaide Abankwah, Fauziya Kasinga, and the Dilemmas of Political Asylum, in David A. Martin & Peter H. Schuck (eds.), Immigration Stories (2005), chap. 10; Karen Musalo, In re Kasinga: A Big Step Forward for Gender-Based Asylum Claims, 73 IR 853, 861 (July 1, 1996); see also Fauziya Kassindya & Layli Miller Bashir, Do They Hear You When You Cry? (1999).

50. See Jacqueline Bhabha, Embodied Rights: Gender Persecution, State Sovereignty, and Refugees, 9 Public Culture 3, 30 (1996) (describing BIA decision as "narrow ruling"); Arthur C. Helton & Alison Nicoll, Female Genital Mutilation as Ground for Asylum in the United States: The Recent Case of In re Fauziya Kasinga and Prospects for More Gender Sensitive Approaches, 28 Columbia Human Rights L. Rev. 375 (1997) (applauding specific result in Kasinga but lamenting lack of guidance for future cases). But see UNHCR, UNHCR Guidance Note on Refugee Claims Relating to Sexual Orientation and Gender Identity (21 Nov. 2008).

51. E.g., Hassan v. Gonzales, 484 F.3d 513 (8th Cir. 2007); Mohammed v. Gonzalez, 400 F.3d 785 (9th Cir. 2005); Abay v. Ashcroft, 368 F.3d 634 (6th Cir. 2004); Abankwah v. INS, 185 F.3d 18 (2d Cir. 1999).

2. The various opinions in Kasinga struggle with the definition of the applicant's social group. The majority opinion defines her social group as consisting of "young women of the Tchamba-Kunsuntu Tribe who have not had FGM, as practiced by that tribe, and who oppose the practice." The Board has little difficulty finding that this group satisfied the Acosta immutability test, since Kasinga could not change her gender or her tribe, and "having intact genitalia is [a characteristic] that is so fundamental to the individual identity of a young woman that she should not be required to change it."

But several questions arise. First, why does the Board need to add the qualifiers concerning her membership in this particular tribe and the particular way in which this tribe practices FGM? If the idea is that having intact genitalia is fundamental to the identities of all young women, then wouldn't that rationale hold regardless of which tribe it is or which type of mutilation that tribe practices? Perhaps the method of FGM affects whether the practice constitutes persecution (a point taken up below), but if so, isn't it redundant to make it part of the social group definition?

Second, because this case arises in the Third Circuit, the Board is bound by Fatin, which it cites in support of its application of the social group definition. In that case, however, the court held that merely being opposed to the practice (in that case, requiring women to wear the chador) was not enough; only if a woman is so opposed that she will defy the law and suffer the consequences (or, possibly, so opposed that she would find the practice "abhorrent"), the court held, will persecution be found. Is the Board's reasoning in Kasinga consistent with Fatin?

Third, the court in Fatin had also made clear that women—without any qualifiers—constitute a social group. Once the Board holds that the FGM that was practiced in Kasinga was persecution, could it not have holds that the particular social group was simply all women (or all women and girls)?

3. The concurring opinion of Board Member Filppu questions the propriety of defining the particular social group "principally in relation to the harm feared by the particular applicant." Presumably he has in mind the reference to those "who oppose the practice." Read carefully original footnote 3 of the Filppu concurrence and the accompanying text. First, is Member Filppu attacking a straw person, or has the majority really defined the social group "principally in relation to the harm feared?" Second, does Member Filppu accept Acosta?

4. Board Member Rosenberg is the only one who seems to notice that it is "surplusage" to include the applicant's opposition to FGM in the social group definition. As she points out, Kasinga's opposition to the practice is already taken into account in deciding whether the harm constitutes persecution. (Board Member Filppu questions the same qualification, see above, but on the ground that it is insufficient, not on the ground that it is duplicative.) Yet even Board Member Rosenberg does not question some of the other qualifiers that the majority opinion adds, such as membership in the particular tribe and the particular method by which this tribe performs FGM. To the extent those factors are thought relevant at all, don't they go merely to whether the feared harm constitutes persecution and to whether Kasinga has a well-founded fear that that harm will occur?

5. The common thread in the approaches that the various Board members in this case take to the definition of social group is that every one of the formulations contains one or more elements that duplicate other requirements of a prima facie case of asylum. As a result, the determination of whether the hypothesized group meets the definition of a social group becomes much more complicated than it needs to be.

Wouldn't it have been a lot cleaner for the Board simply to hold that women are a social group, period? And isn't that what the Board's own decision in Acosta (social group is defined by immutable characteristics) and the court decision in Fatin (binding authority in this case) require? Had the Board done that, the main legal issue would have been whether the harm that Kasinga fears constitutes persecution, and the main fact question would have been whether she has a well-founded fear that the claimed harm will occur. (If you think that defining the social group as consisting of all females would have made it difficult for Kasinga to satisfy the "on account of" requirement, hold off on that point until you get to item 11 below.)

6. Once the Board gets over the social group hurdle, it is in a position to address what should be the central legal issue in the case—whether FGM is "persecution." What possible answers could the BIA or a court give to that question? Consider here both bright-line rules and more elastic formulas.

7. Probably the single most significant aspect of the Kasinga case was what the Board didn't do. It did not accept the invitation of the former INS to add new constraints to the general definition of persecution. Review the formula, summarized in note 47 above, that then INS General Counsel David Martin asked the Board to adopt. What is your reaction to the proposed test?

8. Suppose the applicant is a young girl whose parents file an asylum claim on her behalf. They allege that she will be subjected to FGM against their will if she is returned. Should the child receive asylum?

A separate question is whether the parent should receive asylum based on the FGM that the child would incur if the parent were removed and the child were to accompany the parent. On that question, the courts are divided.⁵²

52. Compare, e.g., Abay v. Ashcroft, 368 F.3d 634 (6th Cir. 2004) (holding mother eligible for asylum) with Matter of A-K-, 24 I. & N. Dec. 275 (BIA 2007) (holding mother ineligible on ground she could choose to leave her U.S. citizen child behind in the United States); Olowo v. Ashcroft, 368 F.3d 692 (7th Cir. 2004) (same, LPR child). Which way would you come out? See generally Marcelle Rice, Protecting Parents: Why Mothers and Fathers Who Oppose Female Genital Cutting

9. Now that Kasinga has been decided, should circumcision of male infants be a basis for asylum? Or is that different?

10. A few months after the former INS issued its Gender Guidelines, and of course before Kasinga, two immigration judges gave opposite answers to the question whether involuntary FGM constitutes persecution. On August 9, 1995, Immigration Judge Paul Nejelski (Arlington) granted asylum, declaring the practice to be "an atrocious form of persecution." Washington Post, Sept. 11, 1995, at D1; 72 IR at 1265 (Sept. 18, 1995). At about the same time, Immigration Judge John Gossart (Baltimore) denied the claim of a woman who had already been subjected to FGM and who feared that her daughters would suffer a similar fate. The claimant had also alleged that she and her daughters would be ostracized if they resisted FGM. The claimant herself had characterized FGM as an "important ritual" that "binds the tribe." Matter of Johnson, No. A72 370 565 (IJ Gossart, Apr. 28, 1995), at 3. Judge Gossart added an important observation: "[W]hile some cultures view FGM as abhorrent and/or even barbaric, others do not." Id. at 12.

Significantly, the INS opposed both asylum claims and appealed Judge Nejelski's ruling to the BIA. As you have seen, the INS also chose to oppose Kasinga's asylum claim before the IJ, to contest her appeal before the BIA, and to insist on keeping her detained. The INS positions in these cases have worried refugee and human rights advocates, who question whether the INS stance comports with the spirit of the recently issued Gender Guidelines. Washington Post, Sept. 11, 1995, at D1. Board Member Rosenberg gently raised the same concern in Kasinga.

The conclusions reached by Judges Nejelski and Gossart highlight a broader battle between cultural relativism and universalism. Judge Nejelski emphasizes the impact of FGM on the individual, finding the practice "atrocious." Judge Gossart emphasizes the foreign cultural norms that keep this practice afloat and the importance of tolerating and respecting those norms. The issue has particularly divided feminists. Those who see FGM as a cultural norm that the United States should tolerate object to the word "mutilation," preferring to call it female genital "surgery" or "cutting."⁵³

Keep in mind, too, that cultural relativism and universalism do not always diverge. Sometimes, in particular, the practice being condemned prevails in the host country as well, in a different form. Professor Isabelle Gunning, for example, has argued that the United States position, which criminalizes FGM and declares it to be persecution, reflects a hypocritical refusal to apply the same standards to analogous domestic practices.

Qualify for Asylum, Nov. 2004 Immigration Briefings.

53. For some sensitive discussion of the tension between responding to FGM and respecting the norms of other cultures, see Bhabha, note 50 above; Isabelle R. Gunning, Arrogant Perception, World-Travelling and Multicultural Feminism: The Case of Female Genital Surgeries, 23 Columbia Human Rights L.Rev. 189 (1992); Hope Lewis, Between Irua and "Female Genital Mutilation": Feminist Human Rights Discourse and the Cultural Divide, 8 Harvard Human Rights J. 1 (1995).

Isabelle R. Gunning, Global Feminism at the Local Level: Criminal and Asylum Laws Regarding Female Genital Surgeries, 3 J. Gender, Race & Justice 45 (1999). Professor Leti Volpp makes an analogous point with respect to domestic violence. See Leti Volpp, Blaming Culture for Bad Behavior, 12 Yale J. L. & Humanities 89 (2000). More broadly, she maintains that violent incidents involving minorities or people from third world countries are often depicted as cultural while similar incidents occurring in the United States are casually dismissed as anecdotal. Hence, she concludes, the oft-cited gulf between feminism and multiculturalism might be more apparent than real. Leti Volpp, Feminism versus Multiculturalism, 101 Columbia L. Rev. 1181 (2001).

What is your take on the characterization of FGM as persecution? If the applicant had been a male, and the tribal practice in question had been forcible castration, do you think the issue would have been analyzed differently?

11. None of the opinions in Kasinga shed much light on what “on account of” means. (Board Member Rosenberg argues that the standard by which the applicant must prove it is one of reasonableness, but she has no occasion here to address its substantive meaning.) All presumably will agree that it represents some type of link between the persecution and the reason for the persecution. But what, precisely, is that link?

The issue is vital, because it influences the way a court or the BIA may choose to define the social group in the first place. Earlier it was suggested that the cleanest way to approach the Kasinga case would have been to define the social group as consisting of women and girls. Kasinga can easily demonstrate that she would not have been subjected to involuntary genital mutilation had she been a male. The custom is reserved for women and girls. Does that mean that the persecution (if FGM is held to be persecution) is “on account of” her membership in the social group of females? If “on account of” is interpreted to mean “because of,” or “but for,” then Kasinga is alleging she will be subjected to FGM on account of her gender, an immutable characteristic that makes females a social group. Under that formulation, the only serious legal issue is whether FGM is persecution. If, however, “on account of” is interpreted to mean something more than “but for,” then the description of the social group becomes more complex and possibly indeterminate. At this point you needn’t try to resolve the issue. Wait for the more general discussion of “on account of,” in section B.2.d below.

12. As then INS General Counsel David Martin pointed out in this case, about 80,000,000 women and girls had already been subjected to FGM. Would they be eligible for asylum on the basis of past persecution? In section B.4.a.ii below, you will see that past persecution is relevant to asylum claims in two ways. It can independently qualify a person for refugee status—even without a well-founded fear of future persecution—and in such cases discretion will generally be exercised favorably if the past persecution was “atrocious.” In Matter of S-A-K & H-A-H, 24 I. & N. Dec. 464 (BIA 2008), the Board found an “atrocious” FGM and granted asylum to a mother and daughter. As you will see, past persecution also triggers a rebuttable presumption of a well-founded fear of future persecution (in which case, absent rebuttal, a showing of “atrocious” persecution is not required at the discretionary stage). In Matter of A-T-, 24 I. & N. Dec. 617 (AG 2008), the BIA had assumed that FGM will not be performed twice on the same individual and that, consequently, any presumption of future persecution was rebutted. But the Attorney General reversed for two reasons. First, he found, the procedure in fact is often performed more than once on the same individual, sometimes in different forms. Second, he held, the rebuttable presumption extends not just to FGM but to any future persecution on the same ground—in this case, membership in a particular social group. A-T- claimed that she would be forced into a marriage she did not want. The Attorney General thus remanded to the BIA for findings as to whether A-T-’s fear of either FGM or any other form of future persecution was well-founded. Accord, Bah v. Mukasey, 529 F.3d 99 (2d Cir. 2008); see also Mohammed v. Gonzales, 400 F.3d 785 (9th Cir. 2005) (reasoning that the harm from past FGM was “continuing” and that, therefore, the applicant had a well-founded fear of future persecution).

13. How much guidance should the BIA give, beyond the facts of the particular case? In Kasinga, the Board understandably declined to provide a comprehensive guide that would answer virtually all future FGM questions—especially since this was its first FGM case. But did the Board go to the other extreme? If the Board decides to hold, in a decision that it chooses to designate as precedent, that sometimes FGM is persecution and sometimes it isn’t, should it not discuss, at least in general terms, what its characterization depends on? Should it not at least reveal what it was about the particular facts in Kasinga that enabled the Board to find persecution?

14. Similarly, shouldn’t Board Member Vacca have explained his dissent? As the only member of the Board who voted to deny asylum in this high-visibility, en banc, precedent case, should he not have offered at least a word of explanation? What, exactly, are the purposes of a dissenting opinion? To what audiences is a dissent addressed?

15. A growing issue has been the practice of FGM within the United States, by immigrants who come from cultures in which FGM is an accepted ritual. In IIRIRA § 645, Congress made FGM a federal criminal offense, punishable by up to five years in prison. At the same time, in section 644, Congress required the INS (now DHS) and the State Department to supply, at or before entry, to both immigrants and nonimmigrants who come from countries in which FGM is commonly practiced, information about the harm that FGM can cause and about possible criminal penalties.

But enforcement will be a challenge. Many immigrants regard FGM as a religious dictate and plan to have the procedure performed abroad on their daughters if necessary. Physicians are reluctant to report suspected cases of FGM to the child abuse authorities because they do not want well-meaning parents to go to prison. See Celia W. Dugger, Tug of Taboos: African Genital Rite v. U.S. Law, New York Times, Dec. 28, 1996, at 1,8.

16. The World Health Organization has condemned FGM, and UNHCR has officially declared it a human rights violation. UNHCR, finding the practice “causes severe pain as well as permanent physical harm,” and relying on both the World Health Organization and the Convention on the Rights of the Child, considers FGM a basis for asylum.⁵⁴

DOMESTIC VIOLENCE AND THE PROBLEM OF THE NON-STATE ACTOR

Does it matter who the persecutor is? One perplexing problem is the non-state actor—the private individual or group that threatens the asylum applicant in the event of return. The issue can arise in any number of contexts, including persecution by armed guerrilla forces. But the reason for situating the issue in this section is that it arises particularly often when women file gender-related asylum claims—with respect to FGM, dress codes, forced marriages, and, perhaps most importantly, domestic violence. Typically the immediate source of the feared violence is the claimant’s male partner, not her government. Yet the government might be guilty of failing to make reasonable efforts to halt the violence, or it might be unable to do so. Either the private actor or the government might be motivated by one of the Convention grounds or by some other ground. In any of those cases, the applicant cannot turn to her government for protection and the question is whether she qualifies as a refugee. There is now a sophisticated literature on non-state actors, most of it in the context of domestic violence claims.⁵⁵

In the United States, the most controversial case has been Matter of R.A., 22 I. & N. Dec. 906 (BIA 1999). R.A. had fled Guatemala to escape the prolonged and savage physical beatings and mental abuse inflicted on her by her husband. The graphic details are recounted in the opinion. She claimed asylum, alleging persecution on the alternative grounds of imputed political opinion (her husband interpreted her resistance as a political opinion that denied his right to dominate her, and he punished her for it) and particular social group (Guatemalan women involved intimately with Guatemalan men who believe in male domination of females). The immigration judge granted asylum on both grounds, but the former INS appealed and the BIA, in a 10–5 en banc decision, reversed.

54. See UNHCR Position on Female Genital Mutilation (May 10, 1994) (unpublished memorandum), reproduced in Frank Newman & David Weissbrodt, International Human Rights: Law, Policy, and Process 668–69 (2d ed. 1996).

55. In addition to the articles by Professors Jennifer Moore and Deborah Anker, excerpted below, see, e.g., Walter Kälin, Non-State Agents of Persecution and the Inability of the State to Protect, 15 Georgetown Immigration L.J. 415 (2001); Susan Kneebone, Moving Beyond the State: Refugees, Accounta- bility and Protection, in Susan Kneebone (ed.), The Refugee Convention 50 Years On: Globalisation and International Law, ch. 11, at 281 et seq. (2003); Catherine Phuong, Persecution by Non-State Agents: Comparative Judicial Interpretations of the 1951 Refugee Convention, 4 Euro. J. Migration & L. 521 (2003); Volker Türk, Non-State Agents of Persecution, in Victor Chetail & Vera Gowlland-Debbas (eds.), Switzerland and the International Protection of Refugees, at 95 et seq. (2002).

The BIA had no trouble agreeing that the past events constituted persecution. Ultimately, however, it concluded that the persecution could not be linked to either her political opinion or any “particular social group.” As for the social group claim, the BIA invoked the Sanchez-Trujillo test (because the case arose within the Ninth Circuit) and found that the claimed social group failed for lack of a “voluntary associational relationship” among the group members. Id. at 917–18. The Board could have stopped there. But it went on at some length to add that it would reject this social group even if it were not bound by Sanchez-Trujillo. The Board acknowledged that the group satisfied the Acosta immutability test, but it held that Acosta was merely a necessary, not a sufficient, condition for social group. The Board implied that the applicant had to make an additional “showing of how the characteristic is understood in the alien’s society;” i.e., “whether anyone in Guatemala perceives this group to exist in any form whatsoever,” or whether the group is a “recognized segment of the population.” Id. at 918.

“The respondent’s showing fails in another respect,” the Board added: “[S]he has not shown that women are expected by society to be abused, or that there are any adverse societal consequences to women or their husbands if the women are not abused.” Id. at 919. (Should such an extraordinary showing really be expected?) The Board hastened to add that these additional considerations are not “prerequisites” to a social group claim; they are just “appropriate, in our judgment, for consideration.” Id. at 919–20. As the earlier discussion of the Justice Department’s proposed asylum regulations noted, see page 937 above, the legal significance of these factors remains unclear.

On January 19, 2001, her last day in office, Attorney General Janet Reno vacated the Board’s decision in R.A., and ordered the Board to reconsider the case in the light of the then pending asylum regulations once they were finalized. Until then, reconsideration was to be stayed. Id. at 906.

On February 21, 2003, still not having issued the final asylum regulations, Attorney General John Ashcroft “recertified” the case to himself for a decision. Amidst widespread rumors that Ashcroft planned to deny her claim, the Department of Homeland Security filed a brief with the Attorney General, urging him to grant R.A.’s request for asylum. See Lori A. Nessel, “Willful Blindness” to Gender-Based Violence Abroad: United States’ Implementation of Article Three of the United Nations Convention Against Torture, 89 Minnesota L. Rev. 71, 110–11 (2004); see also 81 IR 245 (Feb. 23, 2004). In the end, Ashcroft decided not to decide, opting instead to remand the case to the BIA again for reconsideration once the final asylum regulations were issued. Matter of R.A., 23 I. & N. Dec. 694 (A.G. 2005). Finally, in 2008, Michael Mukasey became the third attorney general to certify the case to himself. He too remanded the case to the BIA, but unlike his predecessors he ordered the BIA to decide the case without waiting for any new asylum regulations. See Matter of R.A., 24 I. & N. Dec. 629 (AG 2008). At this writing, the final regulations have yet to appear and the case is still pending before the BIA.

There has also been much helpful commentary on the more general subject of domestic violence as a basis for asylum, much of it prompted by the developments in R-A.⁵⁶ As noted earlier, see page 963 above, the BIA has recognized domestic violence claims when the violence can be linked to religion. See Matter of S-A-, 22 I. & N. Dec. 1328, 1336 (BIA 2000).

For some time the subject of non-state actors divided the world's receiving states. The United States, Canada, Australia, New Zealand, and most western European states recognized asylum claims based on persecution by private actors early on.⁵⁷ Until recently, Germany and France were among the holdouts, with slight differences between them. See generally Moore, below, at 106-08. In the U.K., the House of Lords has held France and Germany not to be safe countries because of their practices of returning asylum claimants to states in which they would be in danger of persecution by non-State actors. See R. v. Secretary of State for the Home Dept., ex parte Adan and Aitseguer, [2001] 2 W.L.R. 143 (U.K. House of Lords), reproduced in 13 Internat'l J. Refugee L. 202 (2001). The European Court of Human Rights has also examined the problems that resulted from a combination of the German practice of rejecting such claims and the Dublin Convention rules that once governed which European country should decide asylum claims.⁵⁸

Because of the adverse effects of differential refugee policies among the member states of the European Union, the EU has been working toward common standards on many refugee issues, including the substantive content of the refugee definition. See Commission of the European Communities, Proposal for a Council Directive on minimum standards for the qualification and status of third country nationals and stateless persons as refugees or as persons who otherwise need international protection, COM(2001), 510 final, 2001/0207 (CNS) (Dec. 9, 2001). Largely because of that initiative, Germany has now passed legislation, effective January 1, 2005, that officially recognizes non-state actor persecution claims. See Deutsche Welle, www.dw-world.de; see also Phuong, above, at 530. France is expected to recede as well.

56. See, e.g., Deborah Anker, Lauren Gilbert & Nancy Kelly, Women Whose Governments are Unable or Unwilling to Provide Reasonable Protection from Domestic Violence May Qualify as Refugees under United States Asylum Law, 11 Georgetown Immigration L.J. 709 (1997); Pamela Goldberg, Anyplace But Home: Asylum in the United States for Women Fleeing Intimate Violence, 26 Cornell Internat'l L.J. 565 (1993); Pamela Goldberg & Bernadette Pasade Cissé, Gender Issues in Asylum Law after Matter of R.A., Feb. 2000 Immigration Briefings; Karen Musalo, Matter of R.A.: An Analysis of the Decision and Its Implications, 76 IR 1177 (Aug. 9, 1999).

57. Accord UNHCR Handbook, para. 65; UNHCR, Guidelines on International Protection: "Membership of a particular social group" within the context of article IA(2) of the 1951 Convention and/or its 1967 Protocol relating to the Status of Refugees, U.N. Doc. HCR/GIP/02/02 (May 7, 2002), reproduced, 81 IR 571 (Apr. 26, 2004), para. II. B.20.

58. See T.I. v. United Kingdom, Decision as to Admissibility of App. No. 43844/98 (Euro. Ct. Human Rts., Third Section, 2000), reproduced in 12 Internat'l J. Refugee L. 244 (2000). The case is excerpted and analyzed in section C.3 below.

Jennifer Moore, From Nation State to Failed State: International Protection From Human Rights Abuses
by Non-State Agents

31 Columbia Human Rights L. Rev. 81, 102-05 (1999).

* * *

Given the emphasis in Article 1 [of the 1951 Convention] on the failure of state protection, it would appear significant that the conventional refugee definition does not identify the state as the necessary author or agent of the persecution feared. In fact, the text of Article 1 does not speak to the character of the persecution at all: the state is notable for its powerlessness in stopping persecution, rather than its status as persecutor per se. Moreover, in interpreting the silence of the treaty on the issue of agency, Paragraph 65 of the UNHCR Handbook reads Article 1 to encompass non-state agents of persecution. The text states explicitly that "offensive acts . . . committed by the local populace . . . can be considered as persecution . . . if the authorities refuse, or prove unable, to offer effective protection." Paragraph 65 of the UNHCR Handbook has been widely cited and utilized by states.

Paragraph 65 has inspired a common sense approach to understanding a government's fundamental failure to provide effective protection from persecution by non-state agents which may underlie a claim to surrogate protection. Its language encompasses situations in which effective protection from unofficial abuses is lacking for one of two reasons: either the authorities will not or they cannot protect the individual with the well-founded fear. Situations in which the state "will not" provide protection generally involve complicity in, or at least tolerance of, human rights violations by a functional state, and fall within the outer ring of the conceptual framework established in the introductory section of this Article. In contrast, situations in which the state is "unable" to protect are often associated with internal armed conflict in which the state is either compromised or dysfunctional. These latter situations correspond to the intermediate ring or the central core of that framework, respectively.

Thus, under the UNHCR Handbook approach, the individual who fears persecution by non-state agents for an enumerated reason is entitled to refugee status, regardless of whether the national government "refuse[s]" or is "unable" to offer effective protection, and regardless of where along the radius of concentric circles—from order to conflict to failed state status—the government finds itself.

Scholarly analysis of the agency of persecution reinforces the UNHCR Handbook's approach, and confirms that refugee status is available to individuals fearing persecution by non-state as well as state agents. Prominent international jurists Atle Grahl-Madsen and Guy S. Goodwin-Gill attest that a central purpose of the Refugee Convention was to respond to the plight of refugees who flee situations in which there is no de facto protection, for whatever reason. Refugee status is triggered when "the government has the best of wills to prevent atrocities on the part of the public . . . but for some reason or other is unable to do this,” or “where protection is in fact unavailable.”

On the issue of agency in general, Goodwin–Gill is most adamant in stating that “it does not follow that the concept [of persecution] is limited to the actions of governments or their agents.” He further clarifies that “the issue of state responsibility for persecution . . . is not part of the refugee definition.” Goodwin–Gill is particularly eloquent in his condemnation of the exclusion from international protection of refugees who flee failed state situations. He cautions that “there is no basis in the 1951 Convention, or in general international law, for requiring the existence of effective operating institutions of government as a pre-condition to a successful claim to refugee status.”

It is this basic concern for effective national protection—and the refugee’s claim to surrogate international protection when such protection is lacking—that lies at the heart of the refugee definition. International protection is required in the absence of effective municipal protection—whether the state persecutes, or non-state agents persecute in a legal vacuum created by the state’s refusal or incapacity to act. The concept of effective protection requires that the international community recognize persecution by non-state agents as a basis for refugee status, if the refugee protection regime is to be logically consistent and true to its underlying values and goals.

* * *

Deborah Anker, Refugee Status and Violence Against Women in the “Domestic” Sphere: The Non–State Actor Question

15 Georgetown Immigration L.J. 391, 392–98, 400–02 (2001).

* * *

* * * [The non-state actor issue] is especially salient for women asylum seekers, since many face serious harms from “private” actors including tribal authorities in cases such as forced female genital mutilation, and members of their families or communities in cases such as bride burning and forced marriages. As Audrey Macklin has noted, a “paradigmatic example” of gender specific abuse committed by private actors is “domestic violence”—violations of women’s core human rights, such as the right to physical integrity and protection from cruel, inhuman and degrading treatment or punishment by their husbands or domestic partners. * * * [I]n cases of violence by husbands and male domestic partners, the question of state protection is especially complex due to different levels of interweaving responsibility and enabling of the “private” harm by the state. In many countries where protection is not available, “it is the very inattention and inaction by the state in relation to battering that tacitly condones and sustains it as a systematic practice. In other words, the fact that [a] state does not adequately protect women from domestic and sexual violence is both an institutional manifestation of the degraded social status of women and a cause of its perpetuation.”

Although women’s claims raise challenging issues, their appropriate analysis fits within traditional refugee law. Gender is not a special or different category of refugee law. * * * Over the course of the past year and a half, an exceptional group of opinions has been issued in cases involving women applicants fleeing violence by their husbands. Taken together, these cases articulate a framework grounded in accepted refugee law doctrine for analyzing the relationship between private harm and state protection, with implications not only for women’s claims.

The first of these is, again, the historic judgment of the House of Lords in Shah [aka Islam, considered on pages 990-97 below], with the core analysis applied and elaborated in the Federal Court of Australia’s decision in Minister for Immigration and Multicultural Affairs v. Khawar and in the notable recent opinion of Chairperson Rodger Haines of New Zealand’s Refugee Status Appeals Authority (RSAA), Refugee Appeal No. 71427/99. The evolution in this area of law and transmutation across the borders of signatory states will no doubt continue; indeed it is now extending to the United States. There the Attorney General vacated the Board of Immigration Appeal’s decision, In re R.A., denying status and protection to a Guatemalan woman fleeing her husband’s severe physical and other violence, from which the State provided no protection. Pending regulations propose a more general framework that recognizes “domestic violence” as a basis for refugee status in some cases.

The Canadian Supreme Court’s decision in Ward laid out the general principles for acceptance of claims by non-state actors. Most states parties recognize that nothing in the Convention requires that the agent of persecution be the state:

The rationale upon which international refugee law rests is not simply the need to give shelter to those persecuted by the state, but, more widely, to provide refuge to those whose home state cannot or does not afford them protection from persecution. The former is, of course, comprised in the latter, but the drafters of the Convention had the latter, wider purpose in mind. The state’s inability to protect the individual from persecution founded on one of the enumerated grounds constitutes failure of local protection.

Persecution under the Convention includes situations where the state is not in strictness an accomplice to the persecution, but it is simply unable to protect its citizens.

The agent of persecution need not be the state, but there must be a failure of state protection and, in the language of the treaty, the persecution must be “for reasons of” one of the grounds listed in the Convention. What is the analysis of “persecution” in non-state actor cases; more particularly, what is the necessary relationship between the harms perpetrated by the non-state actor and the state? What level of state involvement is required? What is the standard for assessing state protection in such cases? How can causation or the nexus to a Convention ground be established? If the ground is a gender-defined particular social group, to what entity must the gender-related reason be attributable: the state, the non-state actor, or both? If the non-state actor violence is deemed personal, can the linkage be made if the failure of state protection is, in intent or effect, discriminatory on the basis of gender? These are among the issues addressed in the recent series of decisions from the UK, New Zealand and Australia.

Shah: The Meaning of Persecution

Shah involved the conjoined appeal of refugee claims of two Pakistani women, who came to the United Kingdom after fleeing their violent husbands. Both women feared continued assaults and violence by their husbands, and denunciation by them for adultery, with resulting criminal prosecutions and severe sanctions under Pakistani law. The House of Lords found that women in Pakistan suffer severe discrimination. Although the [Pakistani] constitution prohibits discrimination on grounds of sex, in law and practice married women are treated as subordinate to the will of their husbands and protection from abuse is effectively unavailable.

The central issue addressed in Shah was the particular social group ground, and a majority of their Lordships found that, especially in light of state-sanctioned and tolerated discrimination against women, Pakistani women constituted a particular social group. However, the determination of the Convention ground is not sufficient to establish refugee status. What comprised the persecution and how could the link or nexus be made between the feared persecution and the particular social group ground?

The only two opinions to address this question were those of Lords Steyn and Hoffman. These opinions analyzed persecution as constituted by both a serious harm and a failure of state protection. This is the formula, put forth by the Refugee Women's Legal Group and specifically referred to by Lord Hoffman, i.e. "Persecution = serious harm + failure of state protection." Both Lords found that even if the serious harm were committed by a non-state actor for personal, non-Convention reasons, the claims could be recognized where the failure of state protection was for a Convention reason, in this case, a gender-defined particular social group. The evidence of state tolerated or sanctioned discrimination established the link, since state inaction was as much the reason for the harm feared as the direct violence and threats of denunciation by the husbands. In the words of Lord Steyn, "given the central feature of state-tolerated and state-sanctioned gender discrimination, the argument that the appellants fear persecution not because of membership of a social group but because of the hostility of their husbands is unrealistic." Lord Hoffman made the failure of state protection/causation analysis even more explicit:

What is the reason for the persecution which the appellants fear? Here it is important to notice that it is made up of two elements. First, there is the threat of violence to Mrs. Islam by her husband and his political friends and to Mrs. Shah by her husband. This is a personal affair, directed against them as individuals. Secondly, there is the inability or unwillingness of the state to do anything to protect them. There is nothing personal about this. The evidence was that the state would not assist them because they were women. It denied them a protection against violence which it would have given to men. These two elements have to be combined to constitute persecution within the meaning of the convention.

As noted, the non-state actor/nexus analysis of Shah has now been applied in two important decisions issuing from the Refugee Status Appeals Authority of New Zealand and the Federal Court of Australia. In elaborating on Shah, each raises new issues: in the New Zealand case, the standard for assessing state protection where the non-state actor is the agent of persecution * * *.

The Standard for Assessing State Protection: Refugee Appeal No. 71427/99 (Refugee Status Appeals Authority of New Zealand)

In the New Zealand case, * * * an Iranian woman [was] fleeing her violent first husband, in this case in the context of a custody battle over their son. As in Shah, there was overwhelming evidence that the state, in this case Iran, condoned, if not encouraged, the "private" violence from which the applicant fled. Especially with respect to the custody battle, the RSAA concluded that the state had established "the very legislative framework which to a large measure is the source of the harm" faced by the applicant. The RSAA readily found the Convention grounds of religion, political opinion, and particular social group applied; with respect to the latter, it described as "indisputable" that gender can be the defining characteristic of a social group and that "women" may constitute a particular social group.

On the critical question of nexus, Chairperson Haines restated the Shah conclusion and removed any ambiguity from its formulation or implications: persecution consists of a serious harm and a failure of state protection.

This means that if a refugee claimant is at real risk of serious harm at the hands of a non-state agent (e.g. husband, partner or other non-state agent) for reasons unrelated to any of the Convention grounds, but the failure of state protection is for reason of a Convention ground, the nexus requirement is satisfied. Conversely, if the risk of harm by the non-state agent is Convention related, but the failure of state protection is not, the nexus requirement is still satisfied. In either case the persecution is for reason of the admitted Convention ground.

* * *

Addressing the standard for assessing state protection in such cases, Haines concluded that the state fails to protect when it does not bring the level of risk of harm from the non-state actor to below a well-founded fear. He rejected the reasoning of the House of Lords in Horvath v. Secretary of State for the Home Office, in which their Lordships, using various tests, concluded that the standard of state protection should be analyzed separately either from the concept of persecution or a well-founded fear. If the state has in place a system for the protection of the citizen and a reasonable willingness to operate it, then state protection is available, even if the person faces a well-founded fear of the persecution upon her return. Haines rejected this formulation in favor of a holistic understanding of refugee status and protection. “The purpose of refugee law is to identify those who have a well-founded fear for a Convention reason. If the net result of a state’s ‘reasonable willingness’ to operate a system for the protection of the citizen is that it is incapable of preventing a real chance of persecution of a particular individual, refugee status cannot be denied that individual.”

It should be emphasized that application of the New Zealand holistic formulation—recognizing refugee status where the applicant establishes a well-founded fear of persecution, the latter understood to include both the serious harm and the failure of state protection—will certainly not result in the granting of all “domestic violence” cases. In some instances, the harms by the husband will not be sufficiently serious to meet the first part of the persecution test. In others, there will not be a particularized failure of state protection: as Lord Hoffman stated in Shah, it is not the non-state actor/husbands’ actions but, in the specific context, the availability of state protection that varies among countries. In some, systems of protection are in place which although not eliminating all risk, reduce the risk for the particular applicant to below the well-founded fear threshold. A woman who has never been abused and cannot articulate specific grounds for fearing that she will be battered in the future will be unable to establish an objective basis for her claim. A woman who was battered in the past, but successfully left the relationship and has lived openly and safely since then, will have difficulty establishing that any fear she has is “well-founded.”

A woman may have access to protection if her husband is an ordinary citizen, but not if he is influential with government officials. In some countries, a female victim of such violations may be able to obtain state protection if she has the support of her family of origin in seeking it; in other cases, her access to such protection may be more limited without such support. The refugee status inquiry is always individual; it is always particularized.

* * *

Conclusion

One note of criticism about these decisions suggests where the “next stage” in development of the law may be headed. It should not be assumed that the reason for the violence by husbands against wives is “private” or personal. Domestic violence is purposeful behavior intended to control and dominate an intimate female partner. It serves a “historical, culturally sanctioned purpose, which was and is for men to keep their wives ‘in their place.’” Studies of batterers have observed that “the typical batterer” uses violence “to meet needs for power and control over others. Their actions are often fueled by stereotypical sex-role expectations for ‘their’ women.” It is no coincidence that “the strongest risk factor for being a victim of partner violence is being female.”

This may suggest the relevance of the political opinion ground; it also suggests that the linkage to a Convention reason, be it to “women” as a particular social group or political opinion, can be the non-state actor husband, not (or as alluded to in Khawar, not just) the enabling state. It may be, therefore, that the requirements of the Convention’s refugee definition can be met where the evidence available supports only a finding that the state is “unable” rather than in some sense “unwilling” to control the violations. In such cases, and assuming the bifurcated nature of the concept of persecution, the nexus between the Convention reason and the persecution can be provided by the “serious harm limb.” These are what Lord Hoffman suggests may be the more difficult cases (although why more conceptually difficult, is not clear): where there is no evidence of a state discriminatory policy but evidence exists that the non-state actor is inflicting the harm on a discriminatory basis. This distinction may be important in “domestic violence” cases, especially where problems of lack of available evidence make it difficult to prove that the state’s failure to protect is in some sense deliberate or discriminatory.

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. As a policy matter, why should it be necessary to link the persecution to the state at all? If the applicant has a well-founded fear that he or she will be persecuted by a private actor because of one of the protected grounds, why should that not be enough for asylum? Moreover, if private acts of persecution occur within a given country, won’t it always be true that the state was either “unable” or “unwilling” to prevent them? In other words, don’t those two possibilities together exhaust the universe of explanations? Finally, how would you expect Greatbatch or other feminist scholars to analyze this question?

2. If some link to the state is required, what should the required link be? Articulate and critique the two competing positions that Anker identifies (the New Zealand approach of Chairperson Rodger Haines and the British court’s approach in Horvath).⁵⁹

59. Professor Laura Adams makes the innovative argument that in domestic violence cases the social group should be defined as family membership and the emphasis should be on the state’s policy of not intervening in intra-family matters. See Laura S. Adams, Fleeing the Family: A Domestic Violence

Victim’s Particular Social Group, 49 Loyola L. Rev. 287 (2003); see also Michael G. Heyman, Domestic Violence and Asylum: Toward a Working Model of Affirmative State Obligations, 17 Internat’l J. Refugee L. 729 (2005).

3. The applicant must also show that the persecution of which he or she has a well-founded fear is on one of the protected grounds. Do you agree with Chairperson Haines in the New Zealand case that, for this purpose, it should be enough to demonstrate that either the private actor or the state in failing to control the actor was motivated by one of the five protected grounds? (UNHCR shares this interpretation.)⁶⁰

4. Anker takes the analysis of the British House of Lords in Islam another step. Suppose, she asks in effect, the applicant in a domestic violence case can offer no specific evidence of what is motivating either the private actor or the state. What empirical premise does she suggest should guide such a case? Do you agree with the premise? If the premise is accepted, what rule of law should flow from it?

5. The “unable or unwilling” standard has been explicitly embraced by UNHCR:

There is no requirement that the persecutor be a State actor. Where serious discriminatory or other offensive acts are committed by the local populace, they can be considered as persecution if they are knowingly tolerated by the authorities, or if the authorities refuse, or prove unable, to offer effective protection.⁶¹

6. Consider the approach taken by the Justice Department’s proposed rules on the issue of state action:

* * * Inherent in the meaning of the term “persecution” is that the serious harm or suffering that an applicant experienced or fears must be inflicted by the government of the country of persecution or by a person or group that government is unwilling or unable to control. In evaluating whether a government is unwilling or unable to control the infliction of harm or suffering, the immigration judge or asylum officer should consider whether the government takes reasonable steps to control the infliction of harm or suffering and whether the applicant has reasonable access to the state protection that exists. Evidence of the following are pertinent and may be considered: Government complicity with respect to the infliction of harm or suffering at issue; attempts by the applicant, if any, to obtain protection from government offi-

60. See UNHCR, Guidelines on International Protection: “Membership of a particular social group” within the context of article IA(2) of the 1951 Convention and/or its 1967 Protocol relating to the Status of Refugees, U.N. Doc. HCR/GIP/02/02 (May 7, 2002), reproduced, 81 IR 571 (Apr. 26, 2004), paras. 21–23.

61. UNHCR, Guidelines on International Protection: “Membership of a particular social group” within the context of article IA(2) of the 1951 Convention and/or its 1967 Protocol relating to the Status of Refugees, U.N. Doc. HCR/GIP/02/02 (May 7, 2002), reproduced, 81 IR 571 (Apr. 26, 2004), para. II.B.20. Accord, Thomas v. Gonzales, 409 F.3d 1177 (9th Cir. 2005) (holding private action sufficient when government is “unable or unwilling to control” it), rev’d on other grounds, Gonzales v. Thomas, 547 U.S. 183, 126 S.Ct. 1613, 164 L.Ed.2d 358 (2006).

cials and the government's response to these attempts; official action that is perfunctory; a pattern of government unresponsiveness; general country conditions and the government's denial of services; the nature of the government's policies with respect to the harm or suffering at issue; and any steps the government has taken to prevent infliction of such harm or suffering.

65 Fed. Reg. at 76597 (Dec. 7, 2000), proposing to amend 8 CFR § 208.15(a).

The proposed regulation acknowledges that either "unwilling" or "unable" is sufficient. But look carefully at the list of factors the Department offers for determining "whether a government is unwilling or unable to control the infliction of harm or suffering." Are these factors relevant to "unable" or only to "unwilling?" What if a well-intentioned government takes all reasonable measures to prevent domestic violence, but contrary social norms are so entrenched that domestic violence is still rampant? Under the proposed regulation, does the applicant qualify for asylum or not? Does "unable" really mean only "unwilling to exert a reasonable effort?"

7. The non-state actor issue also surfaces frequently in claims based on the Convention Against Torture, particularly in the domestic violence context. See pages 1105-06 below.

d. "ON ACCOUNT OF": THE NEXUS REQUIREMENT

The U.S. statutory definition of "refugee" requires that the relevant persecution be "on account of" race, religion, etc. INA § 101(a)(42)(A, B). The 1951 Convention, in article IA(2), expresses the same concept with the phrase "for reasons of." That element of the refugee definition is often referred to as the "nexus" requirement, since it connects the persecution with one of the protected grounds. But what does it mean? Decide whether you agree with the following formulation, which is suggested by one of the current authors (Legomsky):

The refugee definition is inherently indeterminate. Application of terms like "persecution," "political opinion," and "social group" will always require a certain amount of judgment. Results will therefore be uncertain and, to some unavoidable extent, inconsistent. Judgment aside, however, perhaps the single greatest source of logical confusion has been the phrase "on account of." All the cases agree that those words require some sort of nexus between the alleged persecution and one of the five protected grounds. With the arguable exception of Elias-Zacarias, no United States court has seriously explored what this nexus is.

Yet these three simple words have proved to be of fundamental, albeit indirect, importance, particularly in cases of gender-related persecution. In Fatin, where a woman alleged persecution on account of gender, the court acknowledged that women form a social group but denied relief (under that theory) because the woman could not show she was being persecuted “solely” on account of her gender. The implication was that one who persecutes only a subcategory of a particular race, or religion, or social group has not engaged in persecution “on account of” race, or religion, or social group. Similarly, in Kasinga, the majority opinion reflected palpable confusion over how to define the social group in a way that would enable the Board to link it with the persecution. Should the group definition be confined to those women and girls who were members of Kasinga’s tribe? To those who would be subjected to the particular FGM method that her tribe used? To those who are opposed to FGM? To those who are so opposed to it that they would refuse it and take the consequences? Since the Board’s own case law (Acosta), the law of the circuit in which the case was decided (Fatin), and the UNHCR formulation discussed earlier all make it easy to hold that women are a social group (period), the only possible reason for the Board in Kasinga to flail around in search of all those qualifiers is its unstated assumption that, without such qualifiers, “on account of” would have been an obstacle to relief.

All of this confusion seems unnecessary. “On account of” should be interpreted according to its common sense, standard English, meaning—i.e., “because of.” Congress apparently shares that view. In IIRIRA § 305(a), Congress for independent reasons amended the wording of the withholding provision. In the course of the rewriting, Congress changed “on account of” to “because of.” See INA § 241(b)(3). The change was considered so innocuous that it was not even noted in the conference committee report and, to the best of the author’s knowledge, has not been discussed by commentators. The explanation for the silence, presumably, is that the normal, accepted meaning of “on account of” is “because of.” (Congress had no occasion to rewrite the “refugee” definition on which asylum depends.) Article 33(1) of the 1951 Convention similarly prohibits return when “life or freedom would be threatened on account of . . .,” while the “refugee” definition in article 1A(2) of the Convention refers to “fear of being persecuted for reasons of . . .” [emphasis added].

Once the courts acknowledge explicitly that “on account of” simply means “because of”—and the Supreme Court in Elias-Zacarias came close to explicitness on that point—then there is a library full of case law in other subject areas to guide further development. In tort law and criminal law, causation principles are particularly well developed. In torts, the usual test for judging factual causation is the but-for test. A negligent act is ordinarily considered to have “caused” a given consequence if the consequence would not have occurred but for the negligent act. See generally Dan B. Dobbs, The Law of Torts, chaps. 9, 10 (2000).

There are two major qualifications. First, causation is sometimes found even when the consequence would have occurred anyway, as long as the negligent act was at least a “substantial factor” in producing the claimed consequence. This issue can arise in an either/or situation—i.e., where either negligent act A or some other event B would have been sufficient to produce consequence X. When that is the case, the but-for test fails, since it cannot be said that X would not have occurred but for A, but factual causation can be found nonetheless if act A was at least a "substantial" factor in producing consequence X. See Dobbs, above, § 171.

Second, factual causation in tort law (whether found through the but-for test or through the substantial factor test) is constrained by the doctrine of "proximate cause." Policy considerations dictate denying recovery if the causal link between the negligent act and the consequence is too attenuated. Proximate cause problems typically arise when either the consequences were unforeseeable or the intervening forces were too numerous, too unforeseeable, or too independent of the negligent act. Id. chap. 10.

In tort law as in refugee law, a common source of confusion has been the handling of cases in which two or more facts both had to exist in order for a given consequence to have occurred. A driver negligently sideswipes a car that is parked in a lawful space. The only reason the car was parked there in the first place is that the driver had a flat tire and had to pull over. The flat tire was clearly a cause of the accident in the but-for sense. But for the flat tire, the car would not have been parked in that place and therefore would not have been hit. Does that mean the negligent driver escapes liability? Of course not. The damage also would not have occurred but for the defendant's negligent driving. Both events—the negligent driving and the flat tire—were necessary predicates for the damage. The key is that there can be, and frequently are, two or more but-for causes of the same consequence.

The same is true in refugee law. A despot singles out university students of Asian ancestry for persecution. The victims are not being persecuted solely on account of race; only the subset of Asians who are university students are being targeted. Does this mean the victims are not being persecuted on account of race? Of course not. The persecution would not have occurred but for their status as university students, but it also would not have occurred but for their race. There can be, and typically are, two or more elements that jointly define the persecuted group. If "on account of" is interpreted to mean "but for," then this case is just as easy as the negligent driving case. There is persecution on account of race.

This approach would certainly have simplified the analysis in Kasinga. The BIA could have reasoned as follows: Gender is immutable. Under Acosta, an immutable characteristic defines a social group. Therefore, women are a social group. Kasinga would not be subjected to FGM if she were not a woman. Therefore, any persecution she fears will be on account of membership in a social group. Under that approach, there are really only two serious issues in the case: Has Kasinga proved a well-founded fear that she will be subjected to FGM? And, if so, is the FGM that she fears "persecution?"

But this approach has more than linguistics, logic, and simplicity to commend it. It makes practical common sense from a policy standpoint as well. In deciding on whom to confer refugee status, the drafters of the 1951 Convention and the drafters of the corresponding United States legislation distinguished among victims of persecution. While all victims of persecution would benefit from protection, the resources of the receiving countries are finite. Only those who have been persecuted on account of one of the five familiar grounds—race, religion, nationality, social group, or political opinion—will be protected as refugees. Like the drafters of the 1951 Convention, Congress presumably selected those categories because it believed that persecution, while inherently bad, is even worse when it discriminates on the basis of one of the named classifications or otherwise impedes the free flow of ideas. If a person or group persecutes someone on precisely that basis, the fact that the persecutor is additionally discriminating on some other basis doesn't lessen the harm or diminish the victim's need for protection. As long as the persecution would not have occurred but for the victim's race, religion, nationality, political opinion, or social group, then the person should be held to meet the statutory definition of "refugee."

Will this approach open the doors too wide? Not at all. Even if a person can show adverse treatment that would not have occurred but for his or her race, religion, etc., the key is that there must be a well-founded fear of persecution. That means two things. First, as a legal matter, the harm that the person claims to fear must rise to the level of persecution. That requirement is the principal screening device for separating minor hardship from serious persecution. Second, as a factual matter, the applicant must show that his or her fear of the harm occurring is well-founded, a requirement taken up in subsection B.3 below. And even if there is a well-founded fear of persecution, and even if the persecution would not have occurred but for a Convention motive, the proximate cause qualification discussed below will prevent the finding of nexus based on de minimis connections.

Thus, explicitly holding that "but-for" causation satisfies the "on account of" requirement will not convert trivial events into grants of asylum. Fatin, for example, would still have lost under a "but-for" test; the court simply did not regard forced adherence to the Islamic dress code as "persecution" (at least not for her). The proposed test would, however, simplify the analysis, honor the everyday English understanding of the words Congress used, and conform the results to the policies that underlay both Congress's decision to allow asylum and Congress's decision to limit it. Most important, the proposed test would eliminate one arbitrary obstacle to asylum in those cases in which both the literal statutory language and the broad legislative purpose point toward granting relief.

The but-for test that I am proposing for the nexus requirement in refugee law is subject to the same two modifications that apply in tort law. First, I emphasize that I offer it as a sufficient condition for nexus (subject to the second qualifier, below), not as a necessary condition. In refugee law, as in tort law, there might be instances in which either of two motives—one of the five Convention grounds and one other ground not recognized by the Convention—would alone have been enough to prompt the persecution. In that case, the but-for test would fail, because by hypothesis the persecution would have occurred even without the Convention ground. If the Convention motive was at least a substantial factor in the persecution, however, my view is that the nexus requirement has been met.

Conceptually, the but-for test can be envisioned as simply one specific application of the substantial factor test. If a particular motive is so important that without it the persecution would not have occurred, it seems difficult to deny that the motive was at least a "substantial" factor in the persecution. In practical terms, however, hypotheticals in which a refugee claimant would be able to satisfy the substantial factor test but not the but-for test do not come readily to mind. Since the but-for test seems adequate for the vast majority of cases in which nexus is the only element of the refugee definition that is in dispute, and since the but-for test provides a more tangible criterion than one that rests on degrees of substantiality, it seems more efficient to begin with the but-for test and, in the rare case in which it fails because there exists some other motive that would independently have triggered the persecution, fall back on the substantial factor test.

Second, there might be situations, most likely rare, in which persecution technically would not have occurred but for a Convention ground, but where the link between the Convention ground and the persecution is so remote that as a policy matter the nexus requirement should be held not to have been met. The analogy is to proximate cause in tort law.

Nexus has now been the subject of a very thoughtful study organized by James Hathaway and culminating in what the contributors entitled "the Michigan Guidelines on Nexus to a Convention Ground."⁶² The authors of that study dismiss the "but-for" test advocated here. Their explanation for doing so reads as follows: "Because refugee status determination is both protection-oriented and forward-looking, it is unlikely that pertinent guidance can be gleaned from standards of causation shaped by considerations relevant to the assessment of civil or criminal liability, or which are directed solely to the analysis of past events." Rec. 11, id. at 215, 217. It is certainly true that the purposes of both tort law and criminal law differ from those of refugee law, in the ways that sentence notes and in other ways as well. It follows that the causation tests used in tort law and criminal law cannot be assumed appropriate for refugee law. It hardly follows, however, that they should be assumed not to be of use. As the discussion above suggests, there are numerous arguments—based on text, logic, policy results, and practical workability—to use the but-for test, notwithstanding that its origins lie elsewhere.

At any rate, unlike the present discussion, the Michigan Guidelines mainly address a slightly different question—what, exactly, must be linked to one of the five Convention grounds? Or, to put the question a bit differently, what must be on account of (or because of) the person's race, religion, etc? They suggest that the nexus requirement is met if the applicant's "predicament" arises on account of (or because of) one of the five grounds; predicament, in turn, might be evidenced by the reason for the persecutor threatening the harm or by the failure of the government of the country of origin to provide protection. See recs. 6–8, id. at 215.

62. See James C. Hathaway, The Causal Nexus in International Refugee Law, 23 Michigan J. Internat'l L. 207 (2002); The Michigan Guidelines on Nexus to a Convention Ground, 23 Michigan J. Internat'l L. 210

(2002); see also James C. Hathaway & Michelle Foster, The Causal Connection ("Nexus") to a Convention Ground, 15 Internat'l J. Refugee L. 461, 472 (2003).

The different question—the one with which the present discussion is concerned—is the nature of the link itself; i.e., what does “on account of” (or “because of”) mean? The position taken here is that the but-for test should be a sufficient (and the usual) means of meeting the “on account of” (or “because of”) test. Just as in torts or criminal law, however, the causal nexus should be held established even in some situations in which the but-for test breaks down because the fear of being persecuted would have existed even if the applicant had not been of the particular race, religion, etc. When the but-for test is not satisfied, nexus should be found nonetheless if the Convention ground was a “substantial factor” in causing the fear of persecution. At the same time, even if the but-for test is met, nexus should not be found if the link between the Convention motive and the persecution is simply too far-fetched.

The original version of this formulation (2nd edition, 1997) did not highlight the two qualifications described here, except in a footnote. The analysis in the Michigan Guidelines has persuaded me that both qualifications deserve greater emphasis. In the end, I now think the Michigan Guidelines, as elaborated on in the subsequent article by Hathaway and Foster, are consistent with the framework I have been suggesting. They require that one of the Convention grounds “contribute to the applicant’s exposure to the risk of being persecuted” (emphasis added), Recs. 10, 13, id. at 215, 217, but they acknowledge an exception for contributions that are “remote to the point of irrelevance.” That is, in essence, the substantial factor test. Conversely, Hathaway and Foster, in the article cited above, offer an example of a British case in which a person who witnesses a crime while on his way to church is threatened with persecution if he tells the police. The person would not have been threatened had he not gone to church that day; thus, the but-for connection to religion is arguably satisfied. (My own view is that the but-for test has not been met; it is the persecutor’s motive, not the victim’s actions, that must be linked to the persecution.) But even if one assumes that the but-for test has been met, the link between religion and persecution would be far too trivial to establish nexus. They assert a common sense limitation that would be very much at home in traditional tort analyses of proximate cause.

Some of the elements of this approach—a but-for test, with the two qualifications to avoid extreme and counterinstinctive results—have since been discussed by the British House of Lords in the following case. Consider the excerpts below and then decide whether you agree with a but-for approach.

Islam v. Secretary of State for the Home Department

[1999] 2 AC 629, [1999] 2 All ER 545, [1999] 2 W.L.R. 1015 (U.K. House of Lords).

[Two Pakistani women were driven from their homes by their husbands, who threatened to falsely accuse them of adultery. The evidence showed that in Pakistan such accusations were likely to lead to criminal proceedings for sexual immorality and severe punishment. Both women applied for asylum in the United Kingdom, alleging they would be persecuted because of their membership in a social group (defined in various ways). The administrative officials denied their applications. All five of their Lordships rejected the Sanchez-Trujillo test for social group, in favor of the Acosta test, at least in situations where, as here, the country of origin practiced discrimination in matters of fundamental human rights. Four of their Lordships proceeded to hold the applicants eligible for asylum. Lord Millett dissented.]

* * *

LORD HOFFMANN. My Lords, in Pakistan there is widespread discrimination against women. Despite the fact that the constitution prohibits discrimination on grounds of sex, an investigation by Amnesty International at the end of 1995 reported that government attempts to improve the position of women had made little headway against strongly entrenched cultural and religious attitudes. Women who were victims of rape or domestic violence often found it difficult to obtain protection from the police or a fair hearing in the courts. In matters of sexual conduct, laws which discriminated against women and carried severe penalties remained upon the statute book. The International Bar Association reported in December 1998 that its mission to Pakistan earlier in the year 'heard and saw much evidence that women in Pakistan are discriminated against and have particular problems in gaining access to justice.'

These appeals concern two women who became victims of domestic violence in Pakistan, came to the United Kingdom and claimed asylum as refugees. Shahanna Islam is a graduate school teacher from Karachi. In 1990 she became involved in a playground dispute between rival gangs of politically motivated boys. Those supporting the Mohaijur Quami Movement or 'MQM' told her husband, who belonged to the same party, that she had been unfaithful to him. As a result he gave her severe beatings which eventually drove her out of the house. The other woman, Syeda Shah is simple and uneducated. She was frequently beaten by her husband and eventually, when pregnant, turned out of the house. She too came to the United Kingdom, where her child was born.

* * *

I turn, therefore, to the question of causation. What is the reason for the persecution which the appellants fear? Here it is important to notice that it is made up of two elements. First, there is the threat of violence to Mrs Islam by her husband and his political friends and to Mrs Shah by her husband. This is a personal affair, directed against them as individuals. Secondly, there is the inability or unwillingness of the state to do anything to protect them. There is nothing personal about this. The evidence was that the state would not assist them because they were women. It denied them a protection against violence which it would have given to men. These two elements have to be combined to constitute persecution within the meaning of the convention. * * *

* * * Suppose oneself in Germany in 1935. There is discrimination against Jews in general, but not all Jews are persecuted. Those who conform to the discriminatory laws, wear yellow stars out of doors and so forth can go about their ordinary business. But those who contravene the racial laws are persecuted. Are they being persecuted on grounds of race? In my opinion, they plainly are. It is therefore a fallacy to say that because not all members of a class are being persecuted, it follows that persecution of a few cannot be on grounds of membership of that class. Or to come nearer to the facts of the present case, suppose that the Nazi government in those early days did not actively organise violence against Jews, but pursued a policy of not giving any protection to Jews subjected to violence by neighbours. A Jewish shopkeeper is attacked by a gang organised by an Aryan competitor who smash his shop, beat him up and threaten to do it again if he remains in business. The competitor and his gang are motivated by business rivalry and a desire to settle old personal scores, but they would not have done what they did unless they knew that the authorities would allow them to act with impunity. And the ground upon which they enjoyed impunity was that the victim was a Jew. Is he being persecuted on grounds of race? Again, in my opinion, he is. An essential element in the persecution, the failure of the authorities to provide protection, is based upon race. It is true that one answer to the question 'why was he attacked?' would be 'because a competitor wanted to drive him out of business'. But another answer, and in my view the right answer in the context of the convention, would be 'he was attacked by a competitor who knew that he would receive no protection because he was a Jew'.

In the case of Mrs Islam, the legal and social conditions which according to the evidence existed in Pakistan and which left her unprotected against violence by men were discriminatory against women. For the purposes of the convention, this discrimination was the critical element in the persecution. In my opinion, this means that she feared persecution because she was a woman. There was no need to construct a more restricted social group simply for the purpose of satisfying the causal connection which the convention requires.

Mr Blake [counsel for the applicants], in supporting this argument, suggested that the requirement of causation could be satisfied by applying a 'but for' test. If they would not have feared persecution but for the fact that they were women, then they feared persecution for reason of being women. I think that this goes from overcomplication to oversimplification. Once one has established the context in which a causal question is being asked, the answer involves the application of common sense notions rather than mechanical rules. I can think of cases in which a 'but for' test would be satisfied but common sense would reject the conclusion that the persecution was for reasons of sex. Assume that during a time of civil unrest, women are particularly vulnerable to attack by marauding men, because the attacks are sexually motivated or because they are thought weaker and less able to defend themselves. The government is unable to protect them, not because of any discrimination but simply because its writ does not run in that part of the country. It is unable to protect men either. It may be true to say women would not fear attack but for the fact that they were women. But I do not think that they would be regarded as subject to persecution within the meaning of the convention. The necessary element of discrimination is lacking.

* * *

■ LORD MILLETT [dissenting].

* * *

* * * I turn to consider the social group to which the present appellants claim to belong and for membership of which they fear persecution. As formulated by the appellants it consists of women in Pakistan who have been or who are liable to be accused of adultery or other conduct transgressing social norms and who are unprotected by their husbands or other male relatives. It is a subset of the set 'women' (and of the subset 'married women'). The third qualifying condition can be disposed of at once. The fact that the appellants have no one to protect them helps to show that their fear of persecution is well founded. But it does not help to define the social group to which they belong. I am content to assume that the appellants would not be persecuted if they had someone to protect them from attack. But they are not persecuted because they have no one to protect them; that is not the ground of persecution. The 'but for' test of causation, which is always necessary but rarely sufficient, is beguilingly misleading in this context.

This qualifying condition was no doubt included because of an erroneous belief that all the members of the group must be equally liable to persecution. That is not the case. It is no answer to a claim for asylum that some members of the group may be able to escape persecution, either because they have powerful protectors or for geographical or other reasons. Such factors do not narrow the membership of the group, but go to the question whether the applicant's fear of persecution is well founded. Thus I would accept that homosexuals form a distinct social group. In a society which subjected practising homosexuals but not non-practising homosexuals to persecution the relevant social group would still consist of homosexuals, not of the sub-set practising homosexuals. A non-practising homosexual would have no difficulty in establishing that he was a member of a persecuted group. His only difficulty would be in establishing that his fear of persecution was well founded, having regard to the fact that he was not a practising homosexual. This would be a matter of evidence, but given the hostility encountered by all homosexuals in such a society and the obvious problems the applicant would have in satisfying his tormentors of his own sexual abstinence, I doubt that the difficulty would be a real one.

Whether the social group is taken to be that contended for by the appellants, however, or the wider one of Pakistani women who are perceived to have transgressed social norms, the result is the same. No cognisable social group exists independently of the social conditions on which the persecution is founded. The social group which the appellants identify is defined by the persecution, or more accurately (but just as fatally) by the discrimination which founds the persecution. It is an artificial construct called into being to meet the exigencies of the case.

The appellants contended for the subset because they recognised that the head set of 'women' or 'married women' would not do. Officially, I understand, Sharia law regards women as 'separate but equal', a description which, I observe, was also applied, with scant regard for the truth, to apartheid in South Africa. The evidence clearly establishes that women in Pakistan are treated as inferior to men and subordinate to their husbands and that, by international standards, they are subject to serious and quite unacceptable discrimination on account of their sex. But persecution is not merely an aggravated form of discrimination; and even if women (or married women) constitute a particular social group it is not accurate to say that those women in Pakistan who are persecuted are persecuted because they are members of it. They are persecuted because they are thought to have transgressed social norms, not because they are women. There is no evidence that men who transgress the different social norms which apply to them are treated more favourably.

In the course of argument an illuminating instance was put forward. Suppose, in the early years of the Third Reich, Jews in Nazi Germany were required to wear a yellow star on pain of being sent to a concentration camp and murdered if they did not. Would they have failed to qualify as refugees on the ground that they were not liable to persecution on racial grounds, but because they were defying the law? Of course we know now that they should not have failed to qualify, because the law was not merely discriminatory but a necessary part of the intended persecution. Jews were required to wear a distinguishing badge in order to mark them out for persecution. At the time this would have been a matter of evidence; but given the absence of any other rational explanation for the law, the virulence of the state-inspired racial propaganda which formed the background against which it was enacted, and the wholly disproportionate penalty for disobedience, there should have been no difficulty in satisfying the requirements of the convention even in the absence of other evidence of persecution (of which there was an abundance). I find the example instructive precisely because of the differences between it and the present case rather than the similarities.

I am accordingly not willing to accept, as a general proposition, the submission that those who are persecuted because they refuse to conform to discriminatory laws to which, as members of a particular social group, they are subject, thereby qualify for refugee status. Such persons are discriminated against because they are members of the social group in question; but they are persecuted because they refuse to conform, not because they are members of the social group. * * *

* * *

* * * The evidence in the present case is that the widespread discrimination against women in Pakistan is based on religious law, and the persecution of those who refuse to conform to social and religious norms, while in no sense required by religious law, is sanctioned or at least tolerated by the authorities. But these norms are not a pretext for persecution nor have they been recently imposed. They are deeply embedded in the society in which the appellants have been brought up and in which they live. Women who are perceived to have transgressed them are treated badly, particularly by their husbands, and the authorities do little to protect them. But this is not because they are women. They are persecuted as individuals for what each of them has done or is thought to have done. They are not jointly condemned as females or persecuted for what they are. The appellants need to establish that the reason that they are left unprotected by the authorities and are liable to be persecuted by their husbands is that they are women. In my opinion they have not done so.

* * *

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. Despite the suggestion in Fatin that the persecution must be “solely” because of one of the protected grounds, the authorities generally agree on one thing: An asylum applicant need not show that every member of the protected group (for example every woman, every member of a particular religion, etc.) is in danger of being persecuted. The fact that only a subset of the protected group is targeted is no barrier to asylum. Lords Hoffmann and Millett (as well as Lord Steyn, whose judgment is not reproduced) in the Islam case are explicit on this point, as are the Justice Department’s proposed regulations, 65 Fed. Reg. 76592–93, 76598 (Dec. 7, 2000), proposing to amend 8 CFR § 208.15(b) (last sentence). See also Garcia-Martinez v. Ashcroft, 371 F.3d 1066, 1073 (9th Cir. 2004) (expressly rejecting notion that persecution must be “solely” on account of one of the five protected grounds).

But when the persecutor has multiple motives, there remains the question of precisely what “on account of” means, as the Notes and Questions below illustrate.

2. Both Lord Hoffmann and Lord Millett analyse the Nazi requirement that Jews wear the yellow Star of David as an identifying badge. Suppose, they ask, the only Jews who were in danger of persecution were those who violated this rule. Could it still be said that the latter group was being persecuted because of race? (Assume for purposes of this hypothetical that Jews constitute a race, not only a religion.) First, be sure you understand the analyses of this hypothetical by Lords Hoffman and Millett. Second, what does Lord Hoffmann say this hypothetical has to do with the present case? Third, does Lord Millett convincingly distinguish the Jewish hypothetical from the present case?

3. Consider also the second hypothetical involving Jewish persecution in Nazi Germany. Shopkeepers attack Jewish competitors for commercial gain, not because they hate Jews, but because they know that the German government's refusal to protect Jews will enable the shopkeepers to get away with the attacks. The question is whether the persecution can be said to be on account of race. What are the similarities between this hypothetical and the present case?

4. Counsel for the asylum claimants argued for a "but-for" test, the same test advocated in the essay that precedes the case. If the applicants can show that they would not be in danger of persecution but for the fact that they are women, he argues, then the persecution should be found to be on account of gender. See, e.g., Li v. Ashcroft, 356 F.3d 1153, 1160 (9th Cir. en banc 2004) (applying but-for test).

Lord Hoffmann rejects the "but-for" test. He calls it an "oversimplification." To explain why, he says "I can think of cases in which a 'but for' test would be satisfied but common sense would reject the conclusion that the persecution was for reasons of sex." He offers one such hypothetical case: "During a time of civil unrest, women are particularly vulnerable to attack by marauding men, because the attacks are sexually motivated or because they are thought weaker and less able to defend themselves. The government is unable to protect them, not because of any discrimination but simply because its writ does not run in that part of the country." His position is that in such a case it is "common sense" that the persecution is not on account of gender. What is your reaction to this reasoning? First, is he right that this applicant would fail to qualify for asylum? Second, if there is indeed a problem with granting asylum in this case, is it really because of a defect in the "but-for" test or because of the absence of a government role in the persecution?

5. Lord Millett would dismiss the social group claim entirely. In his view, if the social group is defined as Pakistani women suspected of adultery, the claim fails because the adultery accusations are the very persecution being alleged, and the social group must be defined independently of the persecution. More relevant here, if the social group is defined more broadly to include all Pakistani women, then in his view the claim fails for "on account of" reasons. He suggests that the applicants fear persecution not because they are women, but because they are thought to have transgressed social norms. First, can one agree that the applicants are persecuted for being thought to have violated social norms yet believe that they are also persecuted because of their gender? Second, consider Lord Millett's additional observation on this issue. For all we know, he says, men who transgress social norms are persecuted too; at least there is no evidence to the contrary. Suppose men are indeed persecuted when they violate social norms. Does it follow that women who are persecuted for violating social norms are not being persecuted on account of gender? Does it matter whether the social norms for men differ from those for women? Is it possible, moreover, for a given country to persecute both men and women on account of gender? Consider the Taliban prohibitions on women working or attending university, the simultaneous prohibitions on men cutting their beards, and the severe consequences for both violations.

6. Problems can arise in cases where the persecutor had “mixed motives.” Citing several cases, the Justice Department’s commentary to its proposed asylum regulations acknowledges that “[u]nder long-standing principles of U.S. refugee law, it is not necessary for an applicant to show that his or her possession of a protected characteristic is the sole reason that the persecutor seeks to harm him or her.” 65 Fed. Reg. at 76591 [emphasis added]. But the commentary goes on to say “Consistent with current law, this language [allows asylum in mixed motives cases but] does, however, require that the victim’s protected characteristic be central to the persecutor’s decision to act against the victim. For example, under this definition, it clearly would not be sufficient if the protected characteristic was incidental or tangential to the persecutor’s motivation” [emphasis added]. Id. at 76592; see also id. at 76598, proposing to amend 8 CFR § 208.15(b). Professor Deborah Anker has vigorously criticized the proposed centrality requirement. She argues that under existing case law (which the commentary to the proposed regulations acknowledges, 65 Fed. Reg. at 76591) it is enough that the persecutor acts “at least in part” because of a protected characteristic.⁶³ First, do you think that the centrality requirement proposed by the Justice Department is consistent with the “at least in part” language that it cites and that Professor Anker advocates codifying? Second, would a but-for test solve this problem too?

The REAL ID Act, § 101(a)(3), now provides a statutory answer. It requires proof that one of the five protected grounds “was or will be at least one central reason for persecuting the applicant.” INA § 208(b)(1)(B)(I); Matter of J-B-N & S-M-, 24 I. & N. Dec. 208 (BIA 2007). The courts differ over the precise meaning of that language. Compare, e.g., Menghessa v. Gonzales, 450 F.3d 142 (4th Cir. 2006) (persecutor need only be motivated “in part” by the particular statutory ground), with Parussimova v. Mukasey, 533 F.3d 1128, 1134 (9th Cir. 2008) (“central” reason must be “primary,” “essential,” or “principal,” which is a “more onerous” standard than “at least in part”).

7. There have been numerous critiques of the Islam case.⁶⁴

e. PROBLEMS

PROBLEMS 1-5

Discuss whether each of the following applicants is eligible for asylum. In each case, consider particularly (a) whether the feared harm constitutes ⁶³. See Deborah E. Anker, Gender and Social Group: Comments to Proposed Regulations, 6 BIB 185, 191-94 (Feb. 15, 2001); cf. Menghessa v. Gonzales, 450 F.3d 142 (4th Cir. 2006) (holding that applicant need show only that persecutor was motivated “in part” by political opinion).

⁶⁴. See, e.g., Deborah E. Anker, Nancy Kelly & John Willshire-Carrerra, Defining “Particular Social Group” in Terms of Gender: The Shah Decision and U.S. Law, 76 IR

1005 (July 2, 1999); Guy S. Goodwin-Gill, Judicial Reasoning and Social Group after Islam and Shah, 11 Internat’l J. Refugee L. 537 (1999); Karen Musalo, Revisiting Social Group and Nexus in Gender Asylum Claims: A Unifying Rationale for Evolving Jurisprudence, 52 DePaul L. Rev. 777, 787-91 (2003); Mavelyn Vidal, Membership of a “Particular Social Group” and the Effect of Islam and Shah, 11 Internat’l J. Refugee L. 528 (1999).

“persecution” and (b) if so, whether the persecution is on account of one of the five protected grounds.

Problem 1. Fanatical army officers staged a successful coup, overthrowing a democratically elected government. The new leaders, eager to purge the country of western influences, have begun a ruthless “relocation” campaign in which professionals are forcibly moved from the cities to rural areas to perform agricultural labor at subsistence wages. Lawyers have been particularly hard hit, since the new government sees them as the bulwark of the old capitalist establishment and also as a symbol of the rule of law. Your client, a lawyer, escaped and managed eventually to make her way to the United States border, where she applied for admission. She tells you that if she is sent back she will be forcibly relocated and required to do agricultural labor even though she is 55 years old, unaccustomed to such work, and suffering from a heart condition that would be life-threatening if she over-exerts. She also tells you, consistently with human rights reports, that those who resist relocation are taken away and never heard from again.

Problem 2. The government of a foreign country (a democracy) has lately been denouncing gays, accusing them of immorality and of spreading AIDS. Spurred on by that rhetoric, private citizens have frequently attacked and looted gay-owned businesses throughout the country and have occasionally assaulted individuals who “seem gay.” Your client tells you he lived and worked in an area of the capital that is widely known to be a gay neighborhood. He ran a bookstore that specialized in gay and lesbian books. Two doors down the street from his store a coffee shop with a gay clientele had been firebombed and several patrons killed. The next day, there had appeared on the door of your client’s bookstore a note warning him to expect the same. He called the police. The officer with whom he spoke told him there was nothing the police could do. The officer added that sodomy was a criminal offense punishable by up to ten years in prison, that the government was vigorously enforcing that law, and that your client “had better think about that.” As a matter of principle, your client will not disclose his sexual orientation.⁶⁵

Problem 3. A woman asserts that in the culture of her country women are expected to be homemakers. Most people are generally hostile to the few women who work outside the home or attend college. She would like to attend college, but she cannot afford the tuition on her own and women are legally ineligible for the government education grants routinely awarded to qualified men.

Problem 4. A Protestant married couple from a predominantly Roman Catholic country object to a law that prohibits the sale or possession of any artificial birth control device. Violations of the law are punishable by up to a year in prison. The couple has made a firm decision not to have children.

⁶⁵. The author thanks Locky Nimick for his thoughtful contributions to this Problem.

Problem 5. A twenty-year-old woman left her country, which is ruled by a despot whose armed forces routinely round up and execute anyone who speaks out in opposition. She has testified that she is consumed by hatred of her country's ruler, that because of the consequences of dissidence she forced herself to remain silent, and that she finally left the country because she knew that if she remained she would be unable to restrain herself any longer. She says her feelings have grown so intense that if she were sent back she knows she would have to speak her mind.

3. "WELL-FOUNDED" FEAR AND "WOULD BE THREATENED": THE STANDARDS OF PROOF

You have now seen that an applicant for asylum under INA § 208 must establish "refugee" status, which in turn requires a fear of persecution on account of one of the five protected grounds. INA § 101(a)(42). The applicant must also prove, however, that that fear is "well-founded." Id. The analogous requirement for withholding of removal under section 241(b)(3) is that the applicant's life or freedom "would be threatened." What do these requirements mean? For the fear to be "well-founded," as section 208 requires, how likely must it be that the claimed persecution will actually occur? For an adjudicator to find life or freedom "would be threatened," as section 241(b)(3) requires, how likely must it be that the threatened harm will actually materialize? And, importantly, are the answers to these last two questions the same or different?

The law governing the standard of proof for withholding of removal developed first. For many years the courts interpreted former section 243(h) [the predecessor of present section 241(b)(3)] to require a "clear probability of persecution." See the cases cited in Matter of Dunar, 14 I. & N. Dec. 310, 318-19 (BIA 1973). When the United States in 1968 acceded to the 1967 Protocol, it became derivatively bound by the 1951 Convention. Article 33.1 of the Convention sets out the principle of nonrefoulement (the international analog to the United States statutory term "withholding of removal"). The question arose whether article 33.1 altered the "clear probability" standard previously applied to then section 243(h). In Dunar, above, the BIA held it did not. But questions persisted, and when Congress in the Refugee Act of 1980 amended section 243(h) in several respects, there arose the analogous question whether the "clear probability" standard governed the new version of section 243(h).

In a landmark decision, INS v. Stevic, 467 U.S. 407, 104 S.Ct. 2489, 81 L.Ed.2d 321 (1984), the Supreme Court held that a person seeking withholding of removal under what is now INA § 241(b)(3) must still establish a "clear probability" that his or her life or freedom would be threatened on account of one of the five statutory grounds. The Court held also that for this purpose "clear probability" means "more likely than not." 467 U.S. at 424, 104 S.Ct. at 2498, 81 L.Ed.2d at 334.

Three years later, in INS v. Cardoza-Fonseca, 480 U.S. 421, 107 S.Ct. 1207, 94 L.Ed.2d 434 (1987), the Supreme Court interpreted the phrase “well-founded fear,” which is an element of the “refugee” definition, INA § 101(a)(42), and therefore a requirement for asylum under section 208. In Cardoza-Fonseca the former INS argued that “well-founded fear” similarly embodies a “more likely than not” standard. The Court disagreed, construing it to require something less but declining to spell out the precise standard. The BIA and the lower courts have subsequently held that a fear is “well-founded” if “a reasonable person in [the applicant’s] circumstances would fear persecution.”⁶⁶ The regulations now essentially codify those holdings. See 8 CFR § 208.13(b)(2)(B) (2008) (“reasonable possibility of suffering such persecution”). A “reasonable” possibility is clearly less than a 50% chance. In Montecino v. INS, 915 F.2d 518, 520 (9th Cir.1990), the court suggested that a well-founded fear is made out when an applicant, “on the basis of objective circumstances personally known to him, believes that he has at least a one in ten chance of being killed by the guerrillas.” The Ninth Circuit has more recently reaffirmed that statement.⁶⁷

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. In Cardoza-Fonseca one of the government’s arguments was that Congress must have intended “well-founded fear” to be at least as stringent as “clear probability.” Otherwise, the government observed, the applicant would have to prove more just to receive withholding of removal than to receive asylum, which is a more desirable remedy. This, the government argued, is a result Congress could not possibly have intended. Had you been writing the majority opinion, how would you have answered that argument? (In fact, the Court provided an answer. 480 U.S. at 443–45.)

2. As a policy matter, should the law permit the involuntary return of a person who has a well-founded fear of persecution as long as the probability of such persecution actually occurring is not greater than 50%?

3. Can a fear of persecution be well-founded if one can avoid persecution by moving to another part of the same country? The BIA in Acosta (see page 947 above) in effect gave a “no” answer to that question. It observed that the danger of non-governmental persecution must be countrywide; if there is an internal flight alternative, then the fear is not well-founded. The asylum regulations now make this principle explicit; persecution is not well-founded if it is “reasonable to expect the applicant” to relocate internally. 8 CFR § 208.13(b)(2)(i)(C)(ii) (2008). A nonexclusive list of factors relevant to reasonableness includes “whether the applicant would face other serious harm in the place of suggested relocation; any ongoing ⁶⁶. See, e.g., Matter of Mogharrabi, 19 I. & N. Dec. 439, 445 (BIA 1987); Zamora-Morel v. INS, 905 F.2d 833, 837 (5th Cir. 1990); De Valle v. INS, 901 F.2d 787, 790 (9th Cir.1990).

⁶⁷. Knezevic v. Ashcroft, 367 F.3d 1206, 1212 (9th Cir. 2004). For a useful synthesis of the Second Circuit’s applications of the relevant standards of proof in the context of gender-related claims, see Pamela Goldberg, Analytical Approaches in Search of Consistent Application: A Comparative Analysis of the Second Circuit Decisions Addressing Gender in the Asylum Law Context, 66 Brooklyn L. Rev. 309 (2000).

civil strife within the country; administrative, economic or judicial infrastructure; geographical limitations; and social and cultural constraints, such as age, gender, health, and social and familial ties." Id. § 208.13(b)(3). By way of exception, if the government is either the perpetrator or the sponsor of the persecution (or the applicant has demonstrated past persecution), there is a rebuttable presumption that relocation is not a reasonable alternative.⁶⁸

Thus, an applicant who is able to retreat safely to another location within his or her country is ineligible for asylum. As you might recall from previous courses, American law is generally disinclined to deny otherwise valid defenses solely because a retreat option is available. In both criminal law and torts, for example, most states permit people to use even deadly force in self-defense rather than accept a safe retreat. And virtually all jurisdictions reach that result when retreat would entail fleeing one's home. See Wayne R. LaFave, Criminal Law § 10.4(f) (4th ed. 2003); Dan B. Dobbs, The Law of Torts, § 71 (2000). Yet in immigration law, retreat from one's home is held preferable to asylum. Why do you think that is? How does this issue differ from its criminal law and torts analogs?

4. Nationals of the European Union member states enjoy almost unrestricted freedom of movement within the Union. By analogy to the principle that one must show country-wide persecution in order to qualify for asylum, should nationals of EU countries have to prove Union-wide persecution? Or does that question present different policy tradeoffs? The issue could command increasing importance with the enlargement of the EU to include Eastern European countries.⁶⁹

5. Special problems arise when conditions in the country of origin improve as a result of democratic change. Professor Peter Margulies argues that unrealistic assumptions about the speed of change often result in asylum denials even when the fear of persecution is still well-founded. See Peter Margulies, Democratic Transitions and the Future of Asylum Law, 71 Univ. Colorado L. Rev. 3, 14–15 (2000); see also Matter of N.M.A., 22 I. & N. Dec. 312 (BIA 1998). A reviewing court must give the BIA an opportunity to decide a changed circumstances issue rather than decide the issue itself. INS v. Orlando Ventura, 537 U.S. 12, 123 S.Ct. 353, 154 L.Ed.2d 272 (2002).

6. Keep prominently in mind that, aside from nonrefoulement, establishing "refugee" status entitles the person to a whole range of rights spelled out in articles 3–34 of the 1951 Convention. These provisions deal with such subjects as nondiscrimination, freedom of religion, property

68. Id. § 208.13(b)(3)(ii). See also James C. Hathaway, International Refugee Law: The Michigan Guidelines on the Internal Protection Alternative, 21 Michigan J. Internat'l L. 131 (1999) (colloquium participants urging that denial on internal flight alternative grounds be permitted only when relocation alternative is "meaningful," specifically requiring real protection from persecution, protection from other serious risks such as famine or armed conflict, and compliance with other international refugee law norms, including procedural fairness); see generally Anker at 55–67.

69. Credit is due to Werner Dillmann, then an LL.M student from Austria, for spotting this issue.

rights, freedom of association, access to court, housing, employment, and welfare, among other things. In Cardoza-Fonseca, the Court said: “[T]hose who can only show a well-founded fear of persecution are not entitled to anything, but are eligible for the discretionary relief of asylum” [emphasis added]. 480 U.S. at 444. Two commentators have criticized this dictum, interpreting it to mean that, without a clear probability of persecution, refugees are not entitled to any of the refugee rights enumerated in the Convention. James C. Hathaway & Anne K. Cusick, Refugee Rights Are Not Negotiable, 14 Georgetown Immigration L.J. 481, 514–16 (2000). Query whether the Court, focused as it was on the specific question of standard of proof under article 33, literally meant to convey such a radical intention. See also Andrew Schoenholtz, Beyond the Supreme Court: A Modest Plea to Improve Our Asylum System, 14 Georgetown Immigration L.J. 541, 541–42 (2000) (arguing the standard of proof issues in Stevic and Cardoza-Fonseca have proven to be of little importance, since well-founded fear almost always translates into asylum).

PROBLEM 6

As the immigration judge in a particular case, you have reached the following conclusions: The applicant has a well-founded fear of persecution; it is slightly less likely than not that he will be persecuted if returned home; there is a third country (not the one designated by the applicant under INA § 241(b)(2)) that might be willing to take him, but at the time of your decision you cannot be sure whether it will do so; and there are some negative factors that leave you uneasy about granting asylum, but those negatives are not so strong that you would want to send him back to the country in which he fears persecution if you can help it. Realistically, what would you probably do?

4. METHODS OF PROOF

Preceding sections have examined the substantive elements that the applicant for either asylum or withholding of removal must establish, including the requisite likelihood of persecution. As a practical matter, how does the applicant go about proving that his or her fear of persecution is well-founded, or that a return to a particular country is more likely than not to threaten the applicant’s life or freedom? In general, any probative evidence is admissible for these purposes, but certain specific strategies are common enough to warrant special mention. Two problems should be distinguished: First, what commonly occurring facts are material to the likelihood of persecution? Second, what evidence is relevant to (and sufficient to establish) those facts or any other facts affecting the likelihood of persecution?

a. MATERIAL FACTS

i. Membership in a Persecuted Group

In the Acosta materials you saw the notion, accepted by different courts with different degrees of conviction, that “persecution” implies a “singling out” of the particular individual. Yet it is well known that governments all too often persecute entire identifiable groups; Jews in Nazi Germany are the classic example. In such cases two questions arise. First, as a substantive matter, would such group persecution satisfy the “singling out” requirement? That question was considered earlier. Second, and more pertinent here, even when the group consequences can be termed “persecution,” does membership in the persecuted group establish that the particular applicant is sufficiently likely to incur those consequences?

In thinking about this question, consider that the persecution must be on account of “race, religion, nationality, membership in a particular social group, or political opinion.” The first four categories expressly contemplate persecution based on group membership. That does not mean, however, that group membership, with nothing more, creates a high enough probability that the particular applicant would actually suffer the feared persecution. See UNHCR Handbook, paras. 70, 73, 74, 79. Absent “special circumstances,” more will generally be required. Id. Now that you have studied the “well-founded fear” standard, take another look at 8 CFR § 208.13(b)(2)(iii) (2008), reproduced on page 951 above. This provision permits the applicant to establish a well-founded fear of persecution by showing a pattern or practice of the country persecuting a group of people and the applicant’s inclusion in that group, but adds the qualifier “such that [the applicant’s] fear of persecution upon return is reasonable.” See also id. § 208.16(b)(2) (analogous provisions for withholding of removal, adjusted to reflect higher standard of proof).

ii. Past Persecution

Persecution that a person suffered in the past can be material to asylum eligibility in two ways. First, evidence of past persecution can help the applicant establish a well-founded fear of future persecution. Second, the refugee definition in INA § 101(a)(42) makes past persecution an independent basis for refugee status—i.e., even when there is no threat of future persecution. As discussed below, both concepts are subject to limitations. See generally Anker at 40–55.

Following Matter of Chen, 20 I. & N. Dec. 16 (BIA 1989), the regulations provide a rebuttable presumption that one who has suffered past persecution has a well-founded fear of future persecution. 8 CFR § 208.13(b)(1) (2008). Until 2000, the only way the government could rebut that presumption was to prove that the conditions in the country of origin had sufficiently improved. See Matter of C.Y.Z., 21 I. & N. Dec. 915 (BIA 1997), review denied, I.D. 3503 (A.G. Dec. 1, 2004). Many felt that restricting the government’s proof in that way made little sense in those cases where the very nature of the past persecution made repeat persecution unlikely or even impossible. Female genital mutilation (FGM) was sometimes offered as an example, on the assumption that it would never be performed twice on the same person. As it turns out, however, FGM indeed often is performed twice on the same person, and in addition those who have already experienced FGM frequently fear related gender-based persecution. See item 12 of the Notes following Kasinga, pages 972–73 above.

In 2000, the Justice Department amended its regulations to permit the government to rebut the presumption of well-founded fear of future persecution either (a) by showing any “fundamental change in circumstances” that eliminates the required well-founded fear on one of the protected grounds (i.e., changes in personal circumstances as well as country conditions); or (b) by showing that “[t]he applicant could avoid future persecution by relocating to another part of the applicant’s country . . . and under all the circumstances, it would be reasonable to expect the applicant to do so.” 65 Fed. Reg. 76133, amending 8 CFR § 208.13 (b)(1)(i). The cited provisions govern asylum; the rules for withholding of removal are similar. 8 CFR § 208.16(b)(1) (2008). As you saw earlier, however, both the BIA and the courts have occasionally been willing to find a well-founded fear of future persecution, based on a presumption of past persecution, even when there was no danger that the previous act would be repeated. They have done so in the contexts of sterilization, see Qu v. Gonzales, 399 F.3d 1195 (9th Cir. 2005); Matter of Y-T-L-, 23 I. & N. Dec. 601 (BIA 2003), and female genital mutilation, Mohammed v. Gonzales, 400 F.3d 785 (9th Cir. 2005). In each setting the reasoning has been that the past persecution was of such a nature as to constitute a “continuing” harm.

But if past persecution is an independent ground for refugee status, as the Board in Chen had earlier acknowledged, 20 I. & N. Dec. at 18, why would it matter whether past persecution also helps the applicant establish the alternative ground of a well-founded fear of future persecution? The answer lies mainly in the discretionary component of asylum. Suppose the adjudicator finds past persecution but, even with the aid of the presumption, cannot find a well-founded fear of future persecution. By what standard should the discretionary decision be made?

In such cases, the regulations, reflecting the same 2000 amendments, now limit the exercise of asylum officers’ and immigration judges’ discretion. If a person is found to be a refugee solely on the basis of past persecution, then asylum must be denied on discretionary grounds unless the person has demonstrated either (a) “compelling” reasons for being unable or unwilling to return; or (b) “a reasonable possibility that he or she may suffer other serious harm upon removal to that country.” 8 CFR § 208.13(b)(1)(iii) (2008).

The discretionary hurdle in INA § 208 is one reason for asserting past persecution as an indicator of future persecution even though the former is itself a basis for refugee status. There is another reason. Although the refugee definition incorporated in section 208 expressly encompasses actual (past) persecution, withholding of removal under section 241(b)(3) does not embody the refugee definition. Nor does that section otherwise make actual past persecution a basis for eligibility. Section 241(b)(3) requires that the applicant’s life or freedom “would be threatened,” a phrase that you now know has been interpreted to require that future persecution be more likely than not. Thus, an applicant who has suffered past persecution but who lacks the "compelling reasons" or "reasonable possibility" of "serious harm" critical to the favorable exercise of discretion will want to assert the past persecution as a way of establishing a future threat to life or freedom.

b. RELEVANT EVIDENCE

i. The Applicant's Own Testimony

Courts and the BIA have recognized that "[a]uthentic refugees rarely are able to offer direct corroboration of specific threats or specific incidents of persecution." Turcios v. INS, 821 F.2d 1396, 1402 (9th Cir.1987); accord, Matter of Mogharrabi, 19 I. & N. Dec. 439, 445 (BIA 1987). As Stephen Yale-Loehr and John Palmer put it:

Genuine asylum seekers often have great difficulty obtaining evidence to support their claims. They usually have neither the foresight, the time, nor the ability to collect corroborating evidence before fleeing their homes. The documents they do bring along may be destroyed or stolen during flight. Once they have departed, asylum applicants may have difficulties in obtaining evidence from their countries of origin. Long distances and unreliable mail may present logistical problems; friends and family members may be unwilling to provide statements or even assist in obtaining documents due to fear of reprisal. The fact that applicants are often held in detention while preparing their cases only compounds these difficulties. Moreover, corroborating evidence may simply not be available, given the often clandestine practices of regimes responsible for persecution.

Stephen Yale-Loehr & John R.B. Palmer, Evidentiary Issues in Asylum Cases, 6 BIB 595, at 595 (June 15, 2001); see also UNHCR Handbook, para. 196.

Consequently, asylum claimants often must rely chiefly on their own testimony to establish the specific events that leave them vulnerable to persecution. For those reasons, the credibility of the applicant is an especially critical issue in asylum cases. Two kinds of issues arise frequently. One is how to assess the credibility of the applicant. The other is what should happen when the applicant's testimony is found credible. Will credible testimony alone establish eligibility for asylum, or is corroborating evidence necessary? See generally Anker at 150-69; Yale-Loehr & Palmer, above.

As to the first issue: Testimony that establishes eligibility for asylum will obviously serve the applicant's own interests, but that fact does not mean the testimony is false. See Dawood-Haio v. INS, 800 F.2d 90, 96 (6th Cir.1986). How, then, can an asylum officer or an immigration judge decide whether the applicant's testimony is credible? And by what standards should the BIA and the courts review the credibility assessments of the immigration judge?⁷⁰

70. For a comprehensive analysis by an immigration judge, see Henry G. Watkins, Credibility Findings in Deportation Proceedings: "Bear[ing] Witness Unto the Truth", 2

The REAL ID Act, § 101(a)(3), added section 208(b)(1)(B)(iii) to the INA. It enumerates some of the factors relevant to credibility:

the demeanor, candor, or responsiveness of the applicant or witness, the inherent plausibility of the applicant's or witness's account, the consistency between the applicant's or witness's written and oral statements (whenever made and whether or not under oath, and considering the circumstances under which the statements were made), the internal consistency of each such statement, the consistency of such statements with other evidence of record (including the reports of the Department of State on country conditions), and any inaccuracies or falsehoods in such statements, without regard to whether an inconsistency, inaccuracy, or falsehood goes to the heart of the applicant's claim, or any other relevant factor.

In the past several years, the second issue—whether credible testimony by the applicant is enough to sustain his or her burden of proof without corroboration—has heated up. The BIA has seemed increasingly inclined to allow immigration judges to deny asylum claims on grounds of lack of corroborating evidence, even as reviewing courts remind the Board of the obstacles faced by victims of persecution in procuring supporting documents. See, e.g., Senathirajah v. INS, 157 F.3d 210, 215–16 (3d Cir. 1998). More generally, the Board has steadily increased its deference to adverse credibility determinations by immigration judges.⁷¹ Most of those decisions have prompted strong dissents, some suggesting that the Board's decisions on this subject have implicitly imported a legal presumption that an asylum claimant's testimony is fraudulent. See, e.g., Matter of A-S-, 21 I. & N. Dec. 1106, 1124–25 (BIA en banc 1998) (Rosenberg, dissenting). The courts of appeals have adopted varying approaches. Compare, e.g., Diallo v. INS, 232 F.3d 279, 286 (2d Cir. 2000) (approving BIA rule that even credible applicant must offer corroborating evidence or explain why he or she did not, whenever such evidence is “reasonable to expect”) with Ladha v. INS, 215 F.3d 889, 901 (9th Cir. 2000) (holding credible testimony that is unrefuted, direct, and specific renders corroboration unnecessary). Professor Virgil Wiebe has prepared a valuable analysis of the rules and strategies for assuring the reliability of corroborating documents.⁷² Professor Ilene

Georgetown Immigration L.J. 231 (1987); see also Elwin Griffith, Asylum and Withholding of Deportation—Challenges to the Alien after the Refugee Act of 1980, 12 Loyola of L.A. Int'l & Comp. L.J. 515, 529–32 (1990).

71. For useful summaries and critiques of this trend, see Kate Jastram, Considering the Circumstances: The Credibility of Prior Statements under the REAL ID Act, 10 BIB 1360 (Sept. 1, 2005); Harvey Kaplan & Maureen O'Sullivan, The Role of the BIA in Reviewing Negative Credibility Findings:

Circumventing the Well-Founded Fear Standard, 75 IR 1181 (Aug. 31, 1998); cf. Katherine E. Melloy, Note, Telling Truths: How the REAL ID Act's Credibility Provisions Affect Women Asylum Seekers, 92 Iowa L. Rev. 637 (2007).

72. See Virgil Wiebe, Maybe You Should, Yes You Must, No, You Can't: Shifting Standards and Practices for Assuring Document Reliability in Asylum and Withholding of Removal Cases, Nov. 2006 Immigration Briefings; see also Virgil Wiebe (with

Durst (writing before the REAL ID Act) advocated a formal presumption that the applicant is credible, one that could be rebutted only by “clear and convincing evidence of material misrepresentations or other material distortion of the facts.” See Ilene Durst, Lost in Translation: Why Due Process Demands Deference to the Refugee’s Narrative, 53 Rutgers L. Rev. 127, 128 (2000).

In an attempt to forge a uniform standard, the REAL ID Act, § 101(a)(3), added section 208(b)(1)(B)(ii) to the INA. This provision confirms that the applicant’s testimony may suffice without corroboration, “but only if the applicant satisfies the trier of fact that the applicant’s testimony is credible, is persuasive, and refers to specific facts sufficient to demonstrate that the applicant is a refugee.” The same provision goes on to say that, if the trier of fact requests corroboration of credible testimony, “such evidence must be provided unless the applicant does not have the evidence and cannot reasonably obtain the evidence.” INA § 208(b)(1)(B)(iii) then expressly rejects any “presumption of credibility” for the trier of fact, “but if no adverse credibility determination is explicitly made, the applicant or witness shall have a rebuttable presumption of credibility on appeal.” Id. These principles apply not only to asylum, but also to withholding of removal. See INA § 241(b)(3)(C).

Damaize–Job v. INS

United States Court of Appeals, Ninth Circuit, 1986.
787 F.2d 1332.

■ FLETCHER, CIRCUIT JUDGE:

Alberto Damaize–Job appeals from the Board of Immigration Appeals’s (BIA’s) denial of his application for withholding of deportation under section 243(h)⁷³ of the Immigration and Nationality Act, and for political asylum under section 208(a) of the Refugee Act of 1980. We find that the BIA’s decision is not supported by substantial evidence, and that Damaize satisfies both the “clear probability of persecution” standard of section 243(h) and the “well-founded fear of persecution” standard of section 208(a). We therefore reverse the BIA on Damaize’s section 243(h) claim and reverse and remand on his section 208(a) claim so that the Attorney General can exercise his discretion and determine whether to grant Damaize asylum.

* * *

[After considering the applicant’s claim and the evidence, the court concludes] that Damaize’s allegations, if true, are sufficient to satisfy the clear probability of persecution standard of section 243(h) and would entitle him to withholding of deportation under section 243(h).

Serena Parker), Asking for a Note from Your Torturer: Corroboration and Authentication Requirements in Asylum, Withholding, and Torture Convention Cases, Oct. 2001 Immigration Briefings.

73. Now INA § 241(b)(3)—Eds.

3. The Credibility Findings of the IJ

The IJ questioned Damaize's credibility for three specific reasons: (1) the discrepancies in certain dates provided in his asylum application and oral testimony; (2) his failure to marry the mother of his two children; and (3) his failure to apply for asylum in the other countries which he visited or in which he worked prior to coming to the United States. We conclude that none of these is a valid ground upon which to base a finding that an asylum applicant is not credible.

First, minor discrepancies in dates that are attributable to the applicant's language problems or typographical errors and cannot be viewed as attempts by the applicant to enhance his claims of persecution have no bearing on credibility. Damaize stated in his oral testimony that his daughter was born in 1968 and in his asylum application that she was born in 1967; his asylum application indicated that his other child was born nine months after Damaize himself was born, which was clearly a mistake. The IJ nowhere explained how these inaccuracies reflected on the credibility of his persecution claims or for what possible reason Damaize would intentionally have provided incorrect information on such trivial points. These trivial errors merely provided an excuse upon which to predicate a finding of no credibility.

Second, to the extent that the IJ questioned Damaize's credibility based upon his failure to marry the mother of his children, this was clearly impermissible. The personal choices that an asylum applicant has made concerning marriage, children, and living arrangements should not be used to evaluate the applicant's credibility concerning his claims of persecution, unless they reflect some inconsistency in a relevant portion of the applicant's testimony.

Finally, Damaize's failure to apply for asylum in any of the countries through which he passed or in which he worked prior to his arrival in the United States does not provide a valid basis for questioning the credibility of his persecution claims. The IJ appears to have assumed that an individual who truly fears persecution in his homeland will automatically seek asylum in the first country in which he arrives. However, there is no basis for this assumption. Damaize's claims of persecution are no less credible because once he left Nicaragua, he was not satisfied with "any port in a storm." It is quite reasonable for an individual like Damaize, who has experienced persecution in Nicaragua, to seek a new homeland that is insulated from the instability of Central America and that offers more promising economic opportunities. Moreover, to qualify for relief under sections 243(h) and 208(a), Damaize must demonstrate only that he may be "subject to persecution in [his] homeland" [citing legislative history]. Thus, it was perfectly consistent for Damaize, once he was out of Nicaragua and thus out of immediate danger, not to seek asylum in the first place where he arrived. Damaize's failure to contact United States embassies in Central America and Mexico may simply indicate a lack of awareness about this procedure, a fear of authority or rejection, or both.

In short, the information relied upon by the IJ to question Damaize's credibility reveals nothing about whether or not Damaize is an honest individual, or whether or not he feared for his safety in Nicaragua. The IJ had no legitimate, articulable basis to question Damaize's credibility, nor did he offer "a specific, cogent reason for [his] disbelief."

In the present case, the record has been thoroughly developed. Damaize testified in detail concerning his activities since 1979 and his basis for believing that he likely will be persecuted if he returns to Nicaragua. Damaize vividly described his incarceration, his torture, the threats to his life, and his fears of persecution as a Miskito. The IJ had a full opportunity to cross-examine Damaize and to expose any internal inconsistencies and improbabilities in his story. Yet other than the impermissible or insignificant reasons given by the IJ for questioning Damaize's testimony, there is a "total absence of contradictory evidence" in the record as a whole that potentially undermines Damaize's credibility. Nor is there "any inherent improbability [or inconsistency] in [Damaize's] testimony" itself.

We presume that if the IJ had any additional reasons to doubt Damaize's credibility, the IJ would have stated so in the decision below. Because the IJ expressed no further concerns, and the only explicitly articulated reasons rested on impermissible factors, then we conclude from the IJ's opinion that Damaize was an otherwise credible witness. * * *

* * *

■ BURNS, J., respectfully dissents.

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. Historically, reviewing courts have generally accorded great deference to the credibility determinations of the immigration judge, who "views the witness as the testimony is given." Canjura-Flores v. INS, 784 F.2d 885, 888 (9th Cir.1985). The BIA now reviews IJ findings of fact under a "clearly erroneous" standard, see 8 CFR § 1003.1(d)(3) (2008), but even when it used to review findings of fact de novo, it typically deferred to the IJ's credibility assessments, again because he or she had the opportunity to observe the applicant's demeanor.⁷⁴

Still, as the court in Damaize-Job indicates, an immigration judge who disbelieves the applicant's testimony must give specific reasons for doing so. Accord, Osorio v. INS, 99 F.3d 928, 931 (9th Cir. 1996) (IJ must have "legitimate articulable basis" to question credibility and "must offer a specific, cogent reason"). As noted earlier, INA § 208(b)(1)(B)(iii) now provides a (non-exclusive) list of factors relevant to credibility.

2. Among the factors listed in section 208(b)(1)(B)(iii) are internal inconsistencies (between the applicants' statements, written or oral, or within a single statement). The court in Damaize-Job makes clear that minor inconsistencies will not support an adverse credibility assessment. Accord, Osorio, 99 F.3d at 931; Blanco-Comarribas v. INS, 830 F.2d 1039, 1043 (9th Cir.1987). In Aguilera-Cota v. USINS, 914 F.2d 1375 (9th Cir.1990), the court held the immigration judge may not base an adverse credibility determination solely on the fact that the applicant's written application did not recite all the facts to which he or she later testified.

⁷⁴. Matter of Kulle, 19 I. & N. Dec. 318, 331 (BIA 1985); see also Susan Kneebone, ment of Credibility: An Inquisitorial Role?, 5 Australian J. Administrative L. 78 (1998). The Refugee Review Tribunal and the Assess-

With the advent of expedited removal, immigration judges now often have access to the handwritten notes of the interview conducted by the CBP officer at the airport. In Balasubramanrim v. INS, 143 F.3d 157 (3d Cir. 1998), the court held that the immigration judge had relied far too heavily on apparent disparities between the airport notes and the applicant's hearing testimony. The court recited countless deficiencies in the airport notes that made their content unreliable and reversed the BIA's affirmation of the immigration judge.

In Damaize-Job, the IJ relied in part on the applicant's inconsistent statements concerning the birth years of his children. If INA § 208(b)(1)(B)(iii) had then been in force, would the IJ's reliance on those inconsistencies have been appropriate? As a normative matter, how should an IJ decide whether discrepancies—either positive misstatements or omissions—are significant enough to warrant adverse credibility determinations? Should it matter whether the applicant had a motive to misrepresent?

3. Character evidence can sometimes be damning. Note the reliance the immigration judge in Damaize-Job placed on the applicant's failure to marry the mother of his children. At one point, the immigration judge said that the failure to marry the mother "raises some questions about [the applicant's] morality," 787 F.2d at 1334 n. 4, a factor that the court believes affected the judge's credibility assessment. The reviewing court rejects that reasoning. Was it right to do so? Is there anything in INA § 208(b)(1)(B)(iii) that would have altered the analysis of this issue today?

4. Actual deliberate lies about other matters can obviously undermine any witness's credibility. See, e.g., Sarvia-Quintanilla v. United States INS, 767 F.2d 1387, 1393 (9th Cir.1985). But even a lie to which the applicant confesses will not always support an adverse credibility finding. In Turcios v. INS, 821 F.2d 1396 (9th Cir.1987), a Salvadoran asylum claimant admitted that, when apprehended by the former INS, he had told them he was Mexican so that he would not be deported to El Salvador. The court rejected the finding of no credibility, reasoning that, far from diminishing the person's claim of feared persecution, the lie actually supported it. The lie demonstrated the lengths to which the applicant was willing to go (even risking deportation to Mexico) rather than risk being returned to El Salvador. Id. at 1400-01. How might the government respond to that argument?

5. Vague or evasive statements can also detract from credibility. See, e.g., Estrada v. INS, 775 F.2d 1018, 1021 (9th Cir.1985).

6. The immigration judge may certainly reject testimony as inherently unbelievable, though that was not the case in Damaize-Job. Suppose the applicant testifies to having been persecuted by government officials because of her race, she delivers her testimony with what looks and sounds like great conviction, there are no internal discrepancies, the testimony is not contradicted, the statements are clear and detailed, and there is no evidence of character flaws, but the country is a democracy with a good human rights record. Under INA § 208(b)(1)(B)(iii), should the immigration judge find the testimony credible? Cf. Matter of Dass, 20 I. & N. Dec. 120 (BIA 1989) (pre-REAL ID Act).

7. Now assume that the facts to which the applicant testifies, if true, would establish eligibility for asylum. Assume also that there is no articulable reason to doubt the person's credibility. The issue, then, is whether that testimony is alone sufficient to establish eligibility for asylum.

The fact remains that an asylum claimant can have a motive to misrepresent. Suppose, therefore, that the immigration judge concludes there is no way to know whether the person testified as he or she did because (a) the stated facts are true or (b) the testimony would increase the chances of receiving asylum. If there is no other evidence, should the immigration judge find, or be permitted to find, that the person has not met his or her burden of proof? Should there be, as Professor Durst argued, see above, a rebuttable presumption that a witness is telling the truth, even when there is a motive to misrepresent? Alternatively, given the stakes, should the asylum claimant at least receive the benefit of the doubt? See UNHCR Handbook, paras. 203, 204 (yes, provided "all available evidence has been obtained and checked," the adjudicator is satisfied that the applicant is generally credible, and the statements are coherent, plausible, and not contrary to generally known facts).

ii. State Department Opinions

Under 22 USC § 2151n(d), the State Department must compile annual reports that describe the status of human rights in most of the world's countries. These "Country Reports" are now on line, at <http://www.state.gov/g/drl/hr/c1470.htm>. Their original purpose was to make promotion of human rights an element of our foreign assistance program, see 22 USC § 2151n(a), but in practice the Reports often are considered also by those involved in the asylum adjudication process. See David A. Martin, Reforming Asylum Adjudication: On Navigating the Coast of Bohemia, 138 U.Pa. L.Rev. 1247, 1310 (1990).

Human rights organizations have been highly critical of the Country Reports. A joint publication of two such organizations, before commenting on individual countries, offers this general critique:

The State Department's Country Reports on Human Rights Practices for 1987 reflects the continuing influence of policy considerations on what should be an objective exercise. In certain countries—such as Chile, the Soviet Union, Peru, Czechoslovakia and Panama—the country reports are models of thoroughness and even-handed analysis. * * *

Unfortunately, a number of the reports depart from straightforward reporting to serve an advocacy function. In countries such as El Salvador, Guatemala, Haiti, Turkey, the Philippines and the People's Republic of China—countries where the Administration strongly identifies with the government or perceives important U.S. interests to be served by harmonious relations—the State Department fails adequately to portray human rights violations. Reports on those countries suffer from understatement and the glossing over of real abuses. Similarly, in some countries that the Administration perceives as ideological adversaries, such as Cuba, Nicaragua and Vietnam, the State Department tends to distort its reporting by discounting positive human rights developments and by emphasizing unverified or speculative allegations of abuses.

The State Department uses a variety of techniques to soften reports of violations by perceived allies, mainly by shading the presentation of violations in a way that blunts their impact. * * *

* * *

What emerges is that, despite repeated criticism on this score, foreign policy considerations continue to taint the State Department's human rights reporting. In condemning this politicizing of certain country reports, we are not suggesting that human rights should be the sole consideration in U.S. foreign policy. * * * We believe strongly, however, that competing foreign policy concerns should not affect the State Department's human rights reporting to Congress and the public. Despite inevitable differences over the precise foreign policy balance to be pursued, the facts about human rights practices should not be distorted. * * *

Human Rights Watch and Lawyers Committee for Human Rights, Critique—Review of the Department of State's Country Reports on Human Rights Practices for 1987, at 1-3 (1988).

In addition to the Country Reports, the State Department's Bureau of Human Rights and Humanitarian Affairs (BHRHA) may supply "advisory opinions" in individual asylum cases. At one time the practice was to furnish such opinions in all asylum cases and to include in each one the Department's bottom line conclusion as to whether the applicant had a well-founded fear of persecution. The adjudicator would then assign this evidence whatever weight he or she felt it deserved. In reality, most such letters were standard forms containing boilerplate language that reflected the findings of the relevant Country Report. See generally Martin, above, at 1310-11. In 1987, responding to large increases in the volume of cases,⁷⁵

75. In an article written shortly after enactment of the 1980 Act, two commentators proved prophetic: "It is unrealistic to think BHRHA will have sufficient staff to consider carefully every application for asylum in the country." Deborah E. Anker &

the State Department announced a new procedure. See 65 IR 159 (1988); 53 Fed.Reg. 2893-94 (Feb. 2, 1988). Under the new policy, the State Department provided individualized letters only in a small fraction of cases. In other cases it either attached to the file a sticker referring the adjudicator to the State Department's Country Reports or sent supplementary information about either the country or the persecuted group.

Under the current regulations, the State Department is still notified of the case and given an opportunity to comment. 8 CFR § 208.11 (2008). The former INS announced, however, that its asylum officers would be influenced only by those advisory opinions that contain information the asylum officers do not already have. See 67 IR 861 (1990). In particular, that meant "sticker" opinions would not be considered. Id.

State Department participation in the asylum adjudication process has given rise to two different sorts of concerns. There is, as noted earlier, the problem of accuracy. One court, finding "the competency of State Department letters in matters of this kind * * * highly questionable," added:

Such letters from the State Department do not carry the guarantees of reliability which the law demands of admissible evidence. A frank, but official, discussion of the political shortcomings of a friendly nation is not always compatible with the high duty to maintain advantageous diplomatic relations with nations throughout the world. * * * No hearing officer or court has the means to know the diplomatic necessities of the moment, in the light of which the statements must be weighed.⁷⁶

A second and related concern is procedural fairness. Since there is no opportunity to cross-examine the writer of the letter to learn the basis for his or her opinion, it is often difficult to determine whether the opinion reflects only factors relevant to the likelihood of persecution or whether it was shaped also by foreign policy considerations. The regulations now require that State Department comments, unless classified, be made a part of the record and that the applicant have an opportunity to respond to them—but not by cross-examining the commenter. 8 CFR § 208.11(d) (2008). In addressing the problem, Judge Friendly has invoked Professor Kenneth Culp Davis's classic distinction between "adjudicative facts" about the particular parties and "legislative facts" about more general events and conditions. Facts concerning the general attitudes of a government are, Judge Friendly said, properly classified as "legislative facts" on which the factfinder needs the best available information, even if that means admitting written statements into evidence when there is no opportunity for cross-examination. In contrast, Judge Friendly reasoned, State Department assessments of the probability that the particular individual would be

Michael H. Posner, The Forty-year Crisis: A Legislative History of the Refugee Act of 1980, 19 San Diego L.Rev. 9, 76 (1981).

⁷⁶ Kasravi v. INS, 400 F.2d 675, 677 n. 1 (9th Cir.1968); see also T. Alexander Aleinikoff, Political Asylum in the Federal Republic of Germany and the Republic of France: Lessons for the United States, 17 Univ. Michigan J. L. Reform 183, 194-95 (1984) (suggesting at least an appearance of political distortion).

persecuted are “adjudicative” facts that should not be received into evidence without the safeguard of cross-examination.⁷⁷

Do you agree with Judge Friendly either (a) that DOS opinions concerning country conditions should be admissible even if cross-examination is not permitted or (b) that DOS opinions concerning the likelihood of persecution of the particular applicant should not be admitted? (As noted below, there are now alternative sources of country information available to adjudicators in asylum cases.)

iii. Advice From UNHCR

When the United Nations formally laid out the responsibilities of the UNHCR, it entrusted it with two basic functions—“providing international protection” and “seeking permanent solutions” to the refugee problem. The U.N. called upon all its members to cooperate with UNHCR in the performance of those functions. See Guy S. Goodwin-Gill, The Obligations of States and the Protection Function of the Office of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees, 1982 Michigan Yearbook Internat’l Legal Studies 291, 292. Such cooperation has taken many forms:

The role of the UNHCR in the determination of refugee status varies from country to country. In Belgium, the Minister of Foreign Affairs has delegated the determination of refugee status to the UNHCR, while in Italy, Somalia, and Tunisia, the UNHCR is one of the decision makers in the process. In seven other countries, the UNHCR is represented on an advisory commission that interviews applicants and makes recommendations to the final decision maker. In Spain, the UNHCR is consulted before a decision on refugee status is made, and in Austria the UNHCR may express its views prior to a decision.

Other countries facilitate UNHCR oversight of the refugee determination process by various methods. For example, the UNHCR is informed of all applications for refugee status in Austria, Greece, and New Zealand, while in West Germany, a UNHCR representative may attend applicant interviews with the federal official who decides on applications. * * *

Helton, note 77 above, at 263-64.

United States law makes no formal provision for UNHCR participation in the adjudication of asylum cases, although for a brief period during the late 1970’s the State Department consulted UNHCR in the Haitian cases. See David A. Martin, Reforming Asylum Adjudication: On Navigating the Coast of Bohemia, 138 Univ. Pennsylvania L. Rev. 1247, 1319-20 (1990).

77. Zamora v. INS, 534 F.2d 1055, 1061 & nn. 4-5 (2d Cir.1976); see also Aleinikoff, note 76 above, at 194 (observing that applicant has no opportunity to question DOS); Arthur C. Helton, Political Asylum under the 1980 Refugee Act: An Unfulfilled Promise, 17 Univ. Michigan J. L. Reform 243, 263 (1984) (arguing DOS should not express opinion as to ultimate question in individual case; information on general conditions in country acceptable with proper disclosure).

Still, attorneys for asylum claimants frequently ask UNHCR for expressions of its views about the particular cases, and when UNHCR is able to accommodate the request the resulting letters are admissible as evidence. Id. at 1320. See also 8 CFR § 208.12(a) (2008) (asylum officers may rely on such “credible sources” as “international organizations”). Many commentators have called for a more direct UNHCR role in the United States asylum (and withholding of removal) process.⁷⁸ What role, if any, do you think UNHCR ought to play in individual asylum cases?

iv. Other Sources of Information

An important reform introduced in 1990 was the establishment, within the former INS (and now DHS), of “a documentation center with information on human rights conditions.” 8 CFR § 208.1(b) (2008). The regulations also authorize reliance on other “credible sources, such as international organizations, private voluntary agencies, news organizations, or academic institutions.” Id. § 208.12(a).⁷⁹ Together with the training that the specialized asylum officers now receive, these various sources help to reduce dependence on State Department opinions.

One large development in recent years has been the BIA’s practice of taking “administrative notice” of country conditions generally and changed country conditions in particular. Administrative notice is the government agency equivalent of judicial notice. It involves accepting certain facts as true without the taking of evidence. There are obvious fairness issues to be resolved. Deborah Anker provides this succinct summary of the guiding principles that limit its use:

First, the noticed facts cannot be controverted, but must be generally accepted and “commonly acknowledged.” Second, noticed facts must not be used in such a way as to deny the applicant an individualized adjudication. Third, the applicant must have a meaningful opportunity to submit rebuttal evidence.

Anker at 114. She observes that the Board has been inclined to disregard the third limitation in many cases, and she discusses the significance of that failure. See generally Anker at 112–50; see also Kowalczyk v. INS, 245 F.3d 1143 (10th Cir. 2001) (holding that asylum denial based on administrative notice of changed conditions in Poland, without affording applicant chance to rebut noticed facts, violated due process.)

⁷⁸ See, e.g., Aleinikoff, note 76 above, at 236; Anker & Posner, note 75 above, at 77–79; Helton, note 77 above, at 263–64.

⁷⁹ Reports of human rights organizations were admissible under the pre-1990 regulations as well, but one empirical study raised doubts that immigration judges were actually assigning those reports significant weight. Deborah E. Anker, Determining Asylum Claims in the United States—Summary Report of an Empirical Study of the Adjudication of Asylum Claims Before the Immigration Court, 2 Internat’l J. Refugee L. 252, 257 (1990).

5. EXCEPTIONS TO ELIGIBILITY

The preceding subsections considered the elements that applicants for asylum or withholding of removal must affirmatively prove. Both the 1951 Convention and United States domestic law also contain specific exclusions. See generally Anker at 415–64.

The 1951 Convention has two important provisions that disqualify certain classes of applicants. Under article 1(F), the entire Convention (including articles 3–34, which otherwise recognize certain basic rights of refugees) is inapplicable to certain international criminal offenders, those who have committed “serious nonpolitical crimes” before entering the host state, and those “guilty of acts contrary to the purposes and principles of the United Nations.” Article 33.2 provides exceptions to the principle of nonrefoulement for those who are thought to be national security threats or who have been convicted of “particularly serious” crimes and constitute dangers to their communities.

The domestic law of the United States contains some rough parallels discussed in the pages that follow:

a. FIRM RESETTLEMENT

When you studied the overseas refugee admission program in section A of this chapter, you might have noticed the statutory disqualification of those refugees who are “firmly resettled” in third countries. See INA § 207(c)(1). The statute imposes a similar disqualification on asylum claimants. INA § 208(b)(2)(A)(vi). For obvious reasons, there is no analogous limitation to withholding of removal; the fact that someone is firmly resettled in country A would be no reason to send him or her to country B, where life or freedom would be threatened.

Under the Justice Department regulations, a person will be considered “firmly resettled” in another country if, before arriving in the United States, the person received an offer to resettle permanently in that country. 8 CFR § 208.15 (2008); Abdille v. Ashcroft, 242 F.3d 477 (3d Cir. 2001). By way of exception, firm resettlement will not be found if the person’s entry into the third country was “a necessary consequence of his flight from persecution,” he or she “remained in that country only as long as was necessary to arrange onward travel,” and “significant ties” were not established. Id. § 208.15(a). Moreover, the conditions attached to residence can be “so substantially and consciously restricted” that in fact the person was not resettled. Id. § 208.15(b). Professor Anker persuasively criticizes, on human rights grounds, cases that appear to find firm resettlement in a country where the person was denied permission to work. Anker at 451. For the international analog of firm resettlement, see 1951 Convention, art. 1.E; UNHCR Handbook, paras. 144–46.

As a policy matter, suppose a refugee has received an offer of permanent resettlement from a country that he or she passed through en route to the United States; the conditions of residence in that country were not restrictive; and the person has no significant ties to either that country or the United States. Should he or she be eligible for asylum?

The issue of firm resettlement is related to, but different from, the concept of “safe third country,” also known as “safe country of asylum.” As a result of IIRIRA § 604(a), United States law now permits DHS to remove asylum applicants even to third countries in which they are not firmly resettled. There must be a bilateral or multilateral agreement, and certain minimum safeguards have to be present. INA § 208(a)(2). This issue is considered in section B.7.b.iii below.

b. PAST WRONGDOING⁸⁰

The exception you just studied exists because an applicant’s firm resettlement in a third country is considered relevant to his or her need for asylum. The exceptions you will see in this subsection are different in kind; they go to an applicant’s desirability as a member of society. To understand the discussion that follows, first read INA §§ 208(b)(2)(A), 208(b)(2)(B), and 241(b)(3)(B).

As you have just seen, claimants who have participated in the persecution of others on account of race, religion, etc. are statutorily ineligible for both asylum and withholding of removal. INA §§ 208(b)(2)(A)(i), 241(b)(3)(B)(1). (The former is actually duplicative, because only a “refugee” may receive asylum, and the refugee definition already disqualifies the same group.) This exception does not appear to violate the nonrefoulement rules of the 1951 Convention, for the Convention contains a generally analogous proviso, art. 1.F(a, c). That proviso reflected a desire to disqualify war criminals, whose trials had been a recent memory at the time the Convention was drafted. See UNHCR Handbook, para. 148.

What if the applicant was coerced into assisting the persecution of others? In Negusie v. Holder, 129 S.Ct. 1159, 173 L.Ed.2d 20 (2009), the asylum seeker, an Eritrean, had been forced to guard prisoners whom the government was torturing. The BIA, relying on an analogous Supreme Court case that had interpreted a differently worded predecessor statute, held that the persecutor bar applies even to coercion cases. The Fifth Circuit affirmed. The Supreme Court held that the BIA had misinterpreted the earlier Supreme Court decision. Finding the current statutory language ambiguous, the Court remanded to the BIA for reconsideration. Two Justices (Stevens and Breyer), rather than remand, would have read the persecutor bar as inapplicable to cases of coerced participation in persecution. One Justice (Thomas) would have reached the opposite conclusion—that coercion is not a defense.

A separate issue arose in Matter of McMullen, 19 I. & N. Dec. 90 (BIA 1984), aff’d on other grounds, 788 F.2d 591 (9th Cir.1986). McMullen was a former member of the Provisional Irish Republican Army (PIRA), an anti-

⁸⁰. See generally Anker at 415–64; World Disorder, 34 Cornell Internat’l L.J. James C. Hathaway & Colin J. Harvey, 257 (2001). Framing Refugee Protection in the New

British terrorist organization operating in Northern Ireland and Great Britain. Having left PIRA and then having refused PIRA's request to assist it in a kidnapping, McMullen feared reprisals from PIRA in the event he were returned to the British Isles. The Board held that the feared persecution would not be on account of political opinion because his rejection of PIRA's request had been prompted by safety concerns rather than political motives. Further, because McMullen had previously played an indirect support role in PIRA's assassinations of individuals who expressed anti-PIRA opinions, he was ineligible for both asylum and withholding for the additional reason that he had assisted in the persecution of others on account of political opinion. The combination of the two conclusions—that the persecution he had helped PIRA inflict on others was on account of political opinion while the persecution he feared PIRA would inflict on him was not—reveals the thin line that the BIA was willing to walk in that case. As you might also have figured out, a broad reading of the persecution exclusion is not necessarily bad news for asylum claimants, since the precedential value of such a reading will also influence future determinations of applicants' own well-founded fears of persecution on account of race, religion, etc.

Both asylum and withholding of removal are also unavailable when the Attorney General finds "reasonable grounds" for believing the person is "a danger to the security of the United States." INA §§ 208(b)(2)(A)(iv), 241(b)(3)(B)(iv). Terrorists are made specifically ineligible, although the terms vary slightly as between asylum and withholding of removal. Compare INA § 208(b)(2)(A)(5) with INA § 241(b)(3)(B) (last sentence); see generally Won Kidane, The Terrorism Exception to Asylum: Managing the Uncertainty in Status Determination, 41 Univ. Michigan J. L. Reform 669 (2008). Earlier you encountered the inadmissibility ground for those who provided "material support" for terrorist activities or organizations. Some have questioned whether the material support exclusion, as currently interpreted and applied, is compatible with the narrow Refugee Convention grounds for national security exclusions. See, e.g., David A. Martin, Major Developments in Asylum Law Over the Past Year, 83 IR 1889, 1895 (Sept. 1, 2006).

The other exceptions discussed in this subsection entail criminal conduct. The crime-related disqualifications for asylum are the same as for withholding of removal, with one important caveat noted in item 4 of the Notes and Questions below. See INA §§ 208(b)(2)(A)(ii, iii), 241(b)(3)(B)(ii, iii). In the following case the BIA addresses a significant issue that arises under one of those exceptions:

Matter of Carballe

Board of Immigration Appeals, 1986.
19 I. & N. Dec. 357.

* * *

The applicant is a 22-year-old native and citizen of Cuba. After departing Cuba and arriving at Key West, Florida, in April 1980 as part of the Mariel boatlift, the applicant was paroled into the United States.

On February 18, 1983, in the Circuit Court for Dade County, Florida, the applicant was convicted, on his plea of guilty, of (1) robbery with a firearm, to wit, a pistol (two counts), (2) attempted robbery with a firearm, to wit, a pistol (two counts), (3) grand theft second degree, and (4) accessory after the fact, in violation of sections 812.13, 812.014, and 777.03 of the Florida Statutes. The applicant was sentenced to terms of 15 years each on the robbery and attempted robbery counts with the sentences to run concurrently. He also was sentenced to terms of 5 years each on the grand theft and accessory counts with the sentences to run concurrently with the robbery counts. He was incarcerated at the time of the exclusion hearing.

At his hearing, the applicant, through counsel, conceded [inadmissibility for both lack of valid entry documents and conviction of a crime involving moral turpitude]. He requested asylum and withholding of deportation. The applicant submitted that he would be imprisoned and singled out for disparate treatment by Cuban authorities because he was one of the first Cubans to enter the Peruvian Embassy in Havana in 1980. The record includes a "Safe Conduct Definitive," issued by the Cuban Government, which essentially authorized the applicant's safe conduct from the Peruvian Embassy to any country that offered him a visa. Also, the applicant stated that he would be persecuted in Cuba because of his robbery convictions in the United States.

The immigration judge denied the applicant's applications for asylum and withholding of deportation without reaching the merits of the claim or submitting any documents to the State Department for an advisory opinion. In view of the nature of the offenses that had been committed, the immigration judge found that the applicant was ineligible for relief under section 243(h) of the Act⁸¹ as one who had been convicted of a particularly serious crime and constituted a danger to the community of the United States. For the same reason, the immigration judge denied asylum.

In pertinent part, section 243(h)(2)(B) of the Act⁸² provides that withholding of deportation "shall not apply to any alien if the Attorney General determines that the alien, having been convicted by a final judgment of a particularly serious crime, constitutes a danger to the community of the United States."

On appeal, the applicant contends that the immigration judge erred in his interpretation of section 243(h)(2)(B) of the Act. Through counsel, he submits that section 243(h)(2)(B) requires two separate factual findings. First, it must be determined that an applicant has committed a particularly serious crime. Then, there must be a second, distinct finding that the applicant constitutes a danger to the community of the United States. The applicant submits that “the use of the present tense verb ‘constitutes’ in section 243(h)(2)(B) indicates that this second question should be appraised in light of present circumstances and the record should therefore be carefully scrutinized for evidence of rehabilitation or other factors indicating that [the] applicant may not now be a danger to the community.”

81. Now INA § 241(b)(3)—Eds.

82. Now INA § 241(b)(3)(B)(ii)—Eds.

The Service, however, argues that both the language of section 243(h)(2)(B) of the Act and its legislative history make clear that only one test is required. It is submitted that section 243(h)(2)(B) “establishes a cause and effect relationship between the two clauses.” If Congress had “intended to establish two separate criteria,” the Service argues, “it could have easily done so by its use of the conjunction ‘and.’ Instead, the grammatical structure shows that a conviction for a particularly serious crime is the sole factor which Congress has made determinative of whether the alien constitutes a danger to the community.”

The Service contends that the legislative history of this statutory provision supports the contention that only one finding is required. The present provisions of section 243(h) of the Act were enacted as part of the Refugee Act of 1980. The House Judiciary Committee Report, in reviewing the provisions of section 243(h), noted that an exception to eligibility for such relief included “aliens . . . who have been convicted of particularly serious crimes which make them a danger to the community of the United States.” (Emphasis added [by BIA]). The Service submits that this language reflects the congressional understanding of how section 243(h)(2)(B) is properly read. The phrase “danger to the community” is an aid to defining a “particularly serious crime,” not a mandate that administrative agencies or the courts determine whether an alien will become a recidivist.

We find section 243(h)(2)(B) of the Act does not require that two separate and distinct factual findings be made in order to render an alien ineligible for withholding of deportation. It must be determined that an applicant for relief constitutes a danger to the community of the United States to come within the purview of section 243(h)(2)(B). However, the statute provides the key for determining whether an alien constitutes such a danger. That is, those aliens who have been finally convicted of particularly serious crimes are presumptively dangers to this country’s community. The clauses of section 243(h)(2)(B), nevertheless, are inextricably related. We have noted that the phrase “particularly serious crime” is not defined in the statute. In determining whether a conviction is for such a crime, the essential key is whether the nature of the crime is one which indicates that the alien poses a danger to the community. * * * [S]ome crimes * * * are inherently “particularly serious” while others clearly are not. There will be cases, however, where the seriousness of a crime will have to be judged by considering the nature of the conviction, the circumstances and underlying facts of the conviction, the sentence imposed, and whether the type and circumstances of the crime indicate the alien will be a danger to the community. The focus here is on the crime that was committed. If it is determined that the crime was a “particularly serious” one, the question of whether the alien is a danger to the community of the United States is answered in the affirmative. We do not find that there is a statutory requirement for a separate determination of dangerousness focusing on the likelihood of future serious misconduct on the part of the alien.

Has this applicant been convicted of a particularly serious crime? In addition to two other offenses, the applicant was convicted * * * of two counts of armed robbery and two counts of attempted armed robbery. The offenses involved the use of a firearm. They were felonies, as well as offenses against individuals. On their face, they were dangerous.

Robbery is a grave, serious, aggravated, infamous, and heinous crime. We have previously found a California conviction for armed robbery to be a crime rendering an alien statutorily ineligible for withholding of deportation. We have little difficulty concluding that the applicant herein has been convicted of a particularly serious crime and, therefore, constitutes a danger to the community of the United States within the meaning of section 243(h)(2)(B) of the Act. Moreover, the same reasons that lead us to conclude this applicant has been finally convicted of such a crime satisfy us that his request for asylum properly warrants denial in the exercise of discretion.⁸³

The applicant complains that the immigration judge erred by refusing to admit background information, including the circumstances of the armed robberies, into evidence. We conclude that there has been no error on the part of the immigration judge as the crimes at issue in this case are inherently "particularly serious."

* * *

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. The courts have deferred to the Board's conclusion that the "particularly serious crime" exception does not require an independent finding of danger to the community. See, e.g., Ahmetovic v. INS, 62 F.3d 48, 52-53 (2d Cir. 1995); Arauz v. Rivkind, 845 F.2d 271, 275 (11th Cir.1988); Ramirez-Ramos v. INS, 814 F.2d 1394, 1396-97 (9th Cir.1987) (BIA interpretation accepted as "reasonable"). First, as a practical matter, what really turns on this issue? Second, do you agree with the Board's conclusion? Argue both sides, based (a) on the literal statutory language; (b) on the legislative history discussed in Carballe; and (c) on policy. As a matter of policy, should a 65-year-old person whose life or freedom would be threatened if she were sent home be made ineligible for withholding of removal because, at age 18, she had been convicted of a "particularly serious crime?"

2. A related question is how to tell whether a crime is "particularly serious." This disqualification is expressly permitted by article 33.2 of the 1951 Convention but, unlike the "serious nonpolitical crime" exception discussed below, is not interpreted in the UNHCR Handbook. The BIA in a previous case had made clear that a crime may not be classified as “particularly serious” just because it is a crime “involving moral turpitude.” Matter of Frentescu, 18 I. & N. Dec. 244, 246 n.7 (BIA 1982). The Board then offered more general guidance:

⁸³. Today this exception destroys eligibility for asylum, not just the favorable exercise of discretion. INA § 208(b)(2)(A)(ii).

[A] “particularly serious crime” is more serious than a “serious nonpolitical crime,” although many crimes may be classified [as] both. * * * While there are crimes which, on their face, are “particularly serious crimes” or clearly are not “particularly serious crimes,” the record in most proceedings will have to be analyzed on a case-by-case basis. In judging the seriousness of a crime, we look to such factors as the nature of the conviction, the circumstances and underlying facts of the conviction, the type of sentence imposed, and, most importantly, whether the type and circumstances of the crime indicate that the alien will be a danger to the community. Crimes against persons are more likely to be categorized as “particularly serious crimes.” Nevertheless, we recognize that there may be instances where crimes * * * against property will be considered as such crimes.

* * * On the record before us, we do not find that the applicant has been convicted of a “particularly serious crime.” We do not condone his crime, in essence, burglary with intent to commit theft. However, considering the totality of the circumstances before us concerning this crime, we do not find it to be of such a particularly serious nature to preclude relief. The crime was an offense against property, rather than against a person. Although the applicant did enter a dwelling, there is no indication that the dwelling was occupied or that the applicant was armed; nor is there any indication of an aggravating circumstance. Further, the applicant received a suspended sentence after spending a relatively short period of time in prison (3 months). Such sentence as viewed by the state circuit court judge, reflects upon the seriousness of the applicant’s danger to the community.

Id. at 247. See also Matter of N-A-M-, 24 I. & N. Dec. 336 (BIA 2007) (once the elements of an offense make a crime potentially “particularly serious,” facts outside record of conviction may be consulted).

In Beltran-Zavala v. INS, 912 F.2d 1027 (9th Cir.1990), the court expressly approved the holding in Frentescu that the determination whether a crime is “particularly serious” requires inquiry into the individual facts. Id. at 1031-32; accord, Matter of L-S-, 22 I. & N. Dec. 645 (BIA 1999). The court remanded to the BIA for a finding on whether the facts of this person’s crime—sale of $10 worth of marijuana—made the offense “particularly serious.” Contrast that willingness to examine the circumstances of the individual case with the approach the BIA had used, and most courts use, when deciding whether crimes involve “moral turpitude” for purposes of the removal grounds that contain that term. Recall that under the majority view “moral turpitude” determinations rest solely on the crime in the abstract, not on the evidence in the individual case, although the BIA has recently shifted from that position in Matter of Silva-Trevino, 24 I. & N. Dec. 687 (AG 2008). The same categorical approach is used in classifying crimes as “aggravated felonies.” See pages 540–49, 560 above. Which approach is more favorable to the noncitizen?

3. As the BIA implied in Frentescu, item 2 above, some crimes are inherently “particularly serious;” for those crimes, the individual facts need not be examined.⁸⁴

4. An aggravated felony is automatically considered a “particularly serious crime” for purposes of asylum, see INA § 208(b)(2)(B)(i), and an aggravated felony for which the person has been sentenced to at least five years in prison is automatically considered a “particularly serious crime” for purposes of withholding of removal, see INA § 241(b)(3)(B). (The latter provision does not mean that an aggravated felony for which the person is sentenced to less than five years is not a particularly serious crime. Id.) Since the courts have accepted the holding in Carballe that a particularly serious crime automatically makes the person a danger to the community, the bottom line is that an aggravated felony conviction alone precludes asylum, and an aggravated felony conviction with a five-year sentence imposed bars even withholding of removal.⁸⁵ Coupled with the sweeping expansions of the aggravated felony definition in recent years, these holdings make asylum and withholding of removal unattainable for people convicted of a wide range of crimes. Whether that result comports with the intent of the criminal exclusions in the 1951 Convention is not clear. Note too that crimes not rising to the level of aggravated felonies can also be “particularly serious” crimes. Matter of N-A-M-, 24 I. & N. Dec. 336 (BIA 2007).

For criticisms of automatic criminal bars, see U.S. Commission on Immigration Reform, U.S. Refugee Policy: Taking Leadership 33–34 (June 1997); Evangeline G. Abriel, The Effect of Criminal Conduct upon Refugee and Asylum Status, 3 Southwestern J. L. & Trade in the Americas 359, 369–71 (1996). Note, however, that for purposes of withholding, when a person has been convicted of an aggravated felony but not sentenced to five or more years of confinement, a finding of “particularly serious crime” is not automatic. In that situation, the seriousness of the crime is assessed with reference to the facts of the individual case. Matter of L-S-, 22 I. & N. Dec. 645 (BIA 1999) (armed robbery of occupied home was “particularly serious”); Matter of S-S-, 22 I. & N. Dec. 458 (BIA 1999) (importation of undocumented migrant not “particularly serious”). In making that assessment, however, the adjudicator must now presume that a drug trafficking conviction is “particularly serious.” Reversing the BIA, the Attorney Gen-

84. See, e.g., Matter of Garcia-Garrocho, 19 I. & N. Dec. 423 (BIA 1986) (burglary of a dwelling, with aggravating factors). See also Arauz v. Rivkind, 845 F.2d 271, 275 (11th Cir. 1988); Matter of Gonzalez, 19 I. & N. Dec. 682 (BIA 1988) (both decisions holding drug trafficking offenses “particularly serious,” seemingly per se).

85. See, e.g., Kofa v. INS, 60 F.3d 1084 (4th Cir. en banc 1995); Al-Salehi v. INS, 47 F.3d 390 (10th Cir. 1995); Feroz v. INS, 22 F.3d 225 (9th Cir. 1994).

eral has held that only “extraordinary and compelling” circumstances can rebut that presumption. Matter of Y-L-, 23 I. & N. Dec. 270 (A.G. 2002).

5. Compare subsections ii and iii of INA § 241(b)(3)(B), element by element. Is (ii) just a subcategory of (iii), or does (ii) snare some people that (iii) misses?

6. The “serious nonpolitical crime” exception is taken from article 1.F(b) of the 1951 Convention. Paragraphs 151–61 of the UNHCR Handbook provide some useful interpretive guidance. Paragraph 156 requires the decisionmaker to balance “the nature of the offence” against “the degree of persecution feared.” The more severe the persecution that the applicant fears, the graver the crime must be before it can be considered “serious.” The BIA, however, has explicitly rejected such a balancing approach, both for the “serious nonpolitical crime” exception and for the “particularly serious crime” exception, holding instead that the level of seriousness depends solely on the nature of the crime. Matter of Garcia-Garrocho, 19 I. & N. Dec. 423 (BIA 1986); Matter of Rodríguez-Coto, 19 I. & N. Dec. 208, 209–10 (BIA 1985). The Supreme Court has now resolved this issue. In INS v. Aguirre-Aguirre, 526 U.S. 415, 119 S.Ct. 1439, 143 L.Ed.2d 590 (1999), the Court held that the BIA interpretation of the “serious nonpolitical offense” exception was entitled to deference, was “reasonable,” and therefore would be upheld. Id. at 1445–46. The contrary position of the UNHCR handbook, the Court said, was “useful” but not “binding.” Id. at 1446–47. The case is thoughtfully analyzed in Andy Schoenholtz, Supreme Court Orders Ninth Circuit to Defer to the BIA in Refugee Cases, 4 BIB 615 (June 15, 1999).

Which approach seems sounder to you? Should the terms “serious” and “particularly serious” be treated as absolute, or as relative to the degree of persecution?

7. A more troublesome problem has been the meaning of the word “nonpolitical.” Paragraph 153 of the UNHCR Handbook says:

In determining whether an offence is “non-political” or is, on the contrary, a “political” crime, regard should be given in the first place to its nature and purpose, i.e., whether it has been committed out of genuine political motives and not merely for personal reasons or gain. There should also be a close and direct causal link between the crime committed and its alleged political purpose and object. The political element of the offence should also outweigh its common-law character. This would not be the case if the acts committed are grossly out of proportion to the alleged objective. The political nature of the offence is also more difficult to accept if it involves acts of an atrocious nature.

Accord, McMullen v. INS, 788 F.2d 591, 596–97 (9th Cir.1986).

“Political offenses” are also commonly excepted from extradition treaties. Under the traditional test, acts that are “incident to or in furtherance of” an insurrection or rebellion are generally regarded as political for extradition purposes. McMullen, 788 F.2d at 596. The applicant in that case urged the court to apply the same formula to withholding of removal. The court declined, opting instead to apply the balancing test outlined in the UNHCR Handbook. The court rejected the analogy to extradition, in part because it saw deportation (unlike extradition) strictly as a matter between the United States and the individual. In deportation, the court said, the United States is seeking only to rid itself of an undesirable person; “[n]o other sovereign is involved,” and “we are not ‘interfering with any internal struggle’ ” (emphasis in original). Id. First, does this analysis take adequate account of the fact that the relief for which the crime disqualifies the applicant is withholding of removal, not asylum? Second, does the court’s characterization of deportation as a purely domestic matter between the United States and the individual square with the courts’ tendency to emphasize the foreign relations effects of immigration policy when they are asked to review statutory deportation provisions for constitutionality? Recall chapter 2.

8. Compare the exceptions listed in section 241(b)(3)(B) to those listed in articles 1.F and 33.2 of the 1951 Convention. Does the United States law conform to its treaty obligations?

6. DISCRETION IN ASYLUM CASES

Sections B.1 through B.5 have taken you through the statutory eligibility requirements for INA §§ 208 and 241(b)(3). Asylum under INA § 208 additionally entails discretion, as you saw in the specific context of past persecution.

At first, the BIA took a broad view of its discretionary power to deny asylum to applicants who had established a well-founded fear of persecution. In Matter of Salim, 18 I. & N. Dec. 311 (BIA 1982), an Afghan rebel fled to the United States and attempted to enter by displaying another person’s passport. Finding that Salim had established “the requisite probability of persecution in Afghanistan,” the Board granted withholding of removal. But the Board denied asylum on discretionary grounds. It said: “This Board finds that the fraudulent avoidance of the orderly refugee procedures that this country has established is an extremely adverse factor which can only be overcome with the most unusual showing of countervailing equities.” Id. at 316.

The Board’s rationale actually emphasized two different, though related, problems: (1) fraud and (2) the bypassing of the more orderly procedure for the admission of overseas refugees. This last factor—jumping the queue—was especially prominent in a later decision, Matter of Gharadaghi, 19 I. & N. Dec. 311 (BIA 1985), where even the fact that the rest of the applicant’s immediate family was in the United States was not enough to offset the applicant’s circumvention of the overseas refugee admission process.

Decisions like Salim and Gharadaghi provoked forceful criticism from prominent asylum scholars. Arthur Helton stressed the conflict between denying relief on grounds related to the manner of entry and the humanitarian objectives of asylum. Arthur C. Helton, The Proper Role of Discretion in Political Asylum Determinations, 22 San Diego L. Rev. 999, 1010–11 (1985). Further, given the small proportion of the world's refugees who are accepted for admission overseas, Helton questioned how realistic an alternative asylum claimants actually have. Id. at 1011. Finally, he pointed out, those who are refused asylum on discretionary grounds can all too often become "refugees in orbit." The metaphor refers to the unseemly scenario in which the asylum-denying nation deports the refugee to a third country, which refuses admission and sends the refugee right back to the asylum-denying country. Sometimes the person is shuttled back and forth more than once, and sometimes the third country returns the refugee to the country of persecution. Id. at 1018–19.

To these concerns Deborah Anker has added others. See Deborah E. Anker, Discretionary Asylum: A Protection Remedy for Refugees Under the Refugee Act of 1980, 28 Virginia J. Internat'l L. 1 (1987). To the extent the emphasis on fraud is intended to be a "moral screening" device, she observes, the Salim approach is even harsher than that ordinarily applied when non-refugees are excluded for fraud; the latter exclusions at least require that the misrepresentations be material. Id. at 20–22. Moreover, even though refugees' entry fraud is more likely to be compelled by circumstances beyond their control, id. at 18, the Salim approach to asylum is less forgiving than the discretionary practices in waiving fraud in non-refugee cases, id. at 22–23. As for the Board's emphasis on circumventing the overseas refugee process, Anker points out, the overwhelming majority of asylum-seekers have either entered surreptitiously or knowingly overstayed their nonimmigrant visas.⁸⁶ Id. at 29–30. Is entry by means of a false document morally worse, or are surreptitious entrants and overstayers also to be rejected, in the absence of "most unusual * * * countervailing equities?" If the latter, then for whom is asylum intended?

Anker concludes:

[M]oral screening primarily should focus on those who are morally unfit in the sense that they present a serious danger and, secondarily, on those who prior to seeking asylum in the United States, had secured refuge elsewhere. A legitimate moral screening role is one which exposes individuals to the possibility of persecution only if they represent a substantial threat to the national community. * * * [T]he only coherent approach to discretion is one centered upon the existence of a viable safehaven.

Id. at 50–51. See also Hernandez-Ortiz v. INS, 777 F.2d 509, 519 (9th Cir.1985). Do you agree?

86. An asylum applicant must be "physically present in the United States or at a land border or port of entry, irrespective of such alien's status." INA § 208(a). The only significant categories of asylum-seekers who have complied with all United States immigration laws would be those who apply for asylum at a port of entry without having attempted to enter surreptitiously and non-immigrant affirmative asylum applicants whose stays have not expired.

In Matter of Pula, 19 I. & N.Dec. 467 (BIA 1987), the Board abruptly changed course:

We turn now to the issue of whether the applicant merits asylum in the exercise of discretion. In Matter of Salim, we * * * found the fraudulent avoidance of orderly refugee procedures to be an extremely adverse factor which could only be overcome with the most unusual showing of countervailing equities.

* * *

Yet while we find that an alien's manner of entry or attempted entry is a proper and relevant discretionary factor to consider in adjudicating asylum applications, we agree with the applicant that Matter of Salim places too much emphasis on the circumvention of orderly refugee procedures. This circumvention can be a serious adverse factor, but it should not be considered in such a way that the practical effect is to deny relief in virtually all cases. This factor is only one of a number of factors which should be balanced in exercising discretion, and the weight accorded to this factor may vary depending on the facts of a particular case. We therefore withdraw from Matter of Salim insofar as it suggests that the circumvention of orderly refugee procedures alone is sufficient to require the most unusual showing of countervailing equities.

Instead of focusing only on the circumvention of orderly refugee procedures, the totality of the circumstances and actions of an alien in his flight from the country where he fears persecution should be examined in determining whether a favorable exercise of discretion is warranted. Among those factors which should be considered are whether the alien passed through any other countries or arrived in the United States directly from his country, whether orderly refugee procedures were in fact available to help him in any country he passed through, and whether he made any attempts to seek asylum before coming to the United States. In addition, the length of time the alien remained in a third country, and his living conditions, safety, and potential for long-term residency there are also relevant. For example, an alien who is forced to remain in hiding to elude persecutors, or who faces imminent deportation back to the country where he fears persecution, may not have found a safe haven even though he has escaped to another country. Further, whether the alien has relatives legally in the United States or other personal ties to this country which motivated him to seek asylum here rather than elsewhere is another factor to consider. In this regard, the extent of the alien's ties to any other countries where he does not fear persecution should also be examined. Moreover, if the alien engaged in fraud to circumvent orderly refugee procedures, the seriousness of the fraud should be considered. The use of fraudulent documents to escape the country of persecution itself is not a significant adverse factor while, at the other extreme, entry under the assumed identity of a United States citizen with a United States passport, which was fraudulently obtained by the alien from the United States Government, is very serious fraud.

In addition to the circumstances and actions of the alien in his flight from the country where he fears persecution, general humanitarian considerations, such as an alien's tender age or poor health, may also be relevant in a discretionary determination. A situation of particular concern involves an alien who has established his statutory eligibility for asylum but cannot meet the higher burden required for [withholding of removal]. Deportation to a country where the alien may be persecuted thus becomes a strong possibility. In such a case, the discretionary factors should be carefully evaluated in light of the unusually harsh consequences which may befall an alien who has established a well-founded fear of persecution; the danger of persecution should generally outweigh all but the most egregious of adverse factors.

Each of the factors mentioned above will not, of course, be found in every case. An applicant for asylum has the burden of establishing that the favorable exercise of discretion is warranted. Therefore, the alien should present evidence on any relevant factors which he believes support the favorable exercise of discretion in his case. In the absence of any adverse factors, however, asylum should be granted in the exercise of discretion.

Id. at 472-74.

The last two paragraphs of the above excerpt from Pula raise some interesting possibilities. The last sentence counsels the favorable exercise of discretion whenever there are no adverse factors, but it says nothing about how strong the positive equities must be when there are adverse factors. In the preceding paragraph, however, the Board suggests that one who demonstrates a well-founded fear of persecution but not the clear probability required for withholding of removal should receive asylum unless the adverse factors are "most egregious." Accord, Matter of Rivera-Rioseco, 19 I. & N. Dec. 833, 836 (BIA 1988). Suppose applicant A establishes a well-founded fear of persecution but not a clear probability, applicant B establishes a clear probability, neither applicant has any ties to the United States or other positive equities, and in both cases there exist factors that are "adverse" but not "egregious." Under the Pula formulation, what will happen to each person? Does that combination of results make sense?

The Pula decision came down just as the Anker article was going to press. In a postscript, Anker welcomed the Board's reduced emphasis on fraudulent entries but criticized the Board for not going far enough. In her view, the Board should simply have "reject[ed] manner of entry as a significant consideration." Anker, 28 Virginia J. Internat'l L. at 71. Her concern was timely; about a year later the Board in an unpublished decision granted withholding of removal but denied asylum on discretionary grounds because the person had been criminally convicted of entering the United States on a fraudulent passport. Distinguishing Pula, the Board found the crime outweighed the applicant's positive equities. Matter of Bhupinder Sigh Kamboj, A27 887 288, AILA Monthly Mailing (Feb.1989) at 100. Do you agree with Anker that manner of entry should not be a significant factor in exercising discretion for asylum purposes?

Although decisions like Pula make the discretionary hurdle easier to clear, anecdotal evidence suggests the issue is beginning to reemerge. Practitioners now report a growing practice among some immigration judges (either sua sponte or upon requests by some ICE trial attorneys) to promote the functional equivalent of a plea bargain. They offer the applicant withholding of removal under INA § 241(b)(3) in exchange for a withdrawal of the application for asylum under section 208.

Those kinds of offers can force some difficult personal decisions. The applicant who accepts such an offer will receive protection from persecution but will not become an LPR (a year later) and will have no basis for bringing in his or her spouse or minor children. But if the applicant turns down the offer, there is a risk that the IJ will deny both asylum and withholding and return the applicant to his or her persecutors. In theory, that risk should not exist. That the offer was made should mean the IJ has found the applicant eligible for withholding (which is a nondiscretionary remedy). And if that is the case, and the applicant turns down the offer in the hope that the IJ will grant asylum, the IJ should be required to grant at least withholding (assuming circumstances don't change in the interim). But the applicant can never be certain that the practice will follow the theory. Thus, on the one hand, the applicant has to choose between gambling with his or her life or freedom and parting with his or her family, possibly forever—a cruel choice. On the other hand, can one rationally argue against having the option of accepting withholding? How can it be worse than not having the option? (One possibility is that some applicants will accept the offers because they perceive, rightly or wrongly, that to do otherwise would antagonize their judges and provoke denials of all relief.)

7. PROCEDURE

The procedures for adjudicating asylum and withholding of removal claims have developed over the years in response to changing refugee flows, political climates, and congressional commands. For a useful history, see David A. Martin, Reforming Asylum Adjudication: On Navigating the Coast of Bohemia, 138 Univ. Pennsylvania L. Rev. 1247, 1294-98 (1990) [hereafter cited in this subsection as Martin, Reforming Asylum].⁸⁷

87. A clear, detailed, and comprehensive description of the current United States asylum process appears in Anker at 523-74; see also Philip Schrag, A Well-Founded Fear—The Congressional Battle to Save Asylum in America (2000) (a fascinating insider's account of the political process of asylum reform); Stephen H. Legomsky, An Asylum Seeker's Bill of Rights for a Non-Utopian

World, 14 Georgetown Immigration L.J. 619 (2000) (formulating minimum procedural rights in asylum cases). For some good comparative studies of asylum procedure, see Randall Hansen, Susan Martin, Andrew Schoenholtz & Patrick Weil, Report on the Workshop on Refugee and Asylum Policy in Practice in Europe and North America, 14 Georgetown Immigration L.J. 801 (2000); Su-

a. GENERAL PRINCIPLES OF UNITED STATES ASYLUM PROCEDURE

The first thing to understand about United States asylum procedure is that two separate adjudication systems are in place. One system is administered by USCIS. The other is administered by the EOIR—more specifically, by immigration judges and the BIA. In each system, the application procedure for asylum under section 208 is essentially the same as the procedure for withholding of removal under section 241(b)(3). In fact, as noted earlier, an asylum application is automatically treated as an application for withholding of removal in the event asylum is denied. 8 CFR § 208.3(b) (2008).

A person who is already in removal proceedings applies for asylum and/or withholding of removal by filing an application with the immigration judge. 8 CFR § 208.4(b)(3) (2008). The decision of the immigration judge is appealable to the BIA, id. § 3.1(b)(3), and reviewable in court under INA § 242(a)(1).⁸⁸

A person who is not yet the subject of removal proceedings may take the initiative and apply to USCIS for asylum, 8 CFR § 208.4(b)(2) (2008), but not for withholding of removal, which USCIS lacks the authority to grant, id. § 208.16(a). These claims are usually called “affirmative” applications, as distinguished from the “defensive” applications filed in removal proceedings. The details of the USCIS asylum procedure are laid out in United States CIS, Affirmative Asylum Procedures Manual (rev. Feb. 2003).

Until 1990, affirmative applications were filed with the local INS district office and processed by all-purpose immigration officials. Important reforms inaugurated that year, see 55 Fed.Reg. 30674–87 (July 27, 1990), created a new corps of INS (now USCIS) “asylum officers,” specially trained in international law, country conditions, and refugee law. 8 CFR § 208.1(b) (2008). The asylum officers are based in several major cities throughout the United States. After receiving the application, an asylum officer conducts a nonadversarial interview at which the claimant may be represented by counsel and may submit documentary evidence. Id. § 208.9(b).

After the interview, the asylum officer makes a decision. The 1994 reforms changed the nature of that decision. Under the pre-1994 regulations, the asylum officer either granted or denied the application. 8 CFR san F. Martin & Andrew I. Schoenholtz, Asylum in Practice: Successes, Failures, and the Challenges Ahead, 14 Georgetown Immigration L.J. 589 (2000). For a frustrating but poignant story of one Kenyan refugee’s marathon battle for asylum, see David Ngaruri Kenney & Philip G. Schrag, Asylum Denied: A Refugee’s Struggle for Safety in America (2008).

88. See also INA § 242(a)(2)(B)(ii) (exempting asylum from the general preclusion of judicial review of discretionary decisions). But see Stephen M. Knight, Shielded from Review: The Questionable Birth and Development of the Asylum Standard of Review under Elias-Zacarias, 20 Georgetown Immigration L.J. 133 (2005) (criticizing the Supreme Court’s narrow interpretation of the “substantial evidence” standard of review).

§§ 208.14(a), 208.16, 208.17 (1994). If the asylum officer denied the application, and if (as was usually the case) the applicant did not otherwise have a lawful immigration status, the former INS was free to initiate deportation proceedings. If it did so, the claimant could then renew his or her application before the immigration judge. 8 CFR § 208.18(b) (1994). At that point, the procedure described above for defensive applications—a formal evidentiary hearing, followed by a right of appeal to the BIA, followed by possible judicial review—was triggered.

As discussed in more detail below, both Congress and the Justice Department were concerned about mounting backlogs, long delays in disposing of cases, and a hit-and-miss pattern of removing deportable applicants whose asylum claims were finally denied. There was also a perception (right or wrong) that many claims were legally frivolous. The 1994 changes to the Justice Department regulations were aimed at those problems. See 59 Fed.Reg. 62284–303 (Dec. 5, 1994). Under the post-1994 regulations, with some exceptions, the asylum officer no longer “denies” an application for asylum or withholding of removal. Instead, after a more abbreviated procedure, the officer either grants the application or refers the case to an immigration judge for the initiation of removal proceedings. 8 CFR § 208.14(b, c) (2008). In the latter event, the regular EOIR procedure—a removal hearing before the immigration judge, a right of appeal to the BIA, and a right of judicial review—kicks in.⁸⁹

Congress took a more radical step in 1996. AEDPA created a new procedure called “expedited removal,” which IIRIRA amended later the same year. Under the new procedure, certain arriving noncitizens—generally those without documents and those whom immigration inspectors suspect of fraud—are relegated to a more summary process that is detailed in section B.7.b.iv below.

Before asylum may be granted in any of these contexts, the statute requires a check of the applicant’s identity against various government databases that are designed to reveal possible grounds of inadmissibility, deportability, or other ineligibility for asylum. INA § 208(d)(5)(A)(i). That requirement took on additional importance in 2005, with the issuance of a regulation that made completion of a DHS identity, law enforcement, and security check a prerequisite to the granting of any relief that enables a noncitizen to reside in the United States (including asylum). See 70 Fed. Reg. 4743 (Jan. 26, 2005), adding 8 CFR § 1003.47 and amending 8 CFR § 1208.4. To initiate the check, the noncitizen must supply certain biographical data and biometric identifiers, usually by reporting to a DHS office. The DHS goal, expressed in the Federal Register notice, is to do the processing while the applicant is waiting for the hearing on the merits of

89. For an interesting account of the political dynamics of the 1994 reforms, see David A. Martin, Making Asylum Policy: The 1994 Reforms, 70 Washington L. Rev. 725 (1995). For a helpful description of the effects on immigration practitioners, see Jeanne A. Butterfield, The New Asylum Regulations: A Practitioner’s Guide, Jan. 1995 Immigration Briefings.

the claim. There are concerns, however, that in practice the security checks will generate backlogs that delay grants of relief for substantial periods.

Finally, under INA § 209(b), individuals who have received asylum and thereafter remained in the United States for one year may adjust to permanent residence. Until 2005, the statute limited the number of adjustments of status available to asylees to 10,000 per year. That cap proved highly problematic. By March 1, 2004, the backlog of asylee adjustment applications had reached approximately 160,000. See 81 IR 583 (Apr. 26, 2004). A person granted asylum at that time would thus have had to wait 16 years to attain LPR status. During the waiting period, an asylee may travel overseas (after obtaining a “refugee travel document” from USCIS) and may work. INA § 208(c)(1)(B, C). Not being an LPR, however, an asylee does not qualify as a family-sponsored second preference petitioner and thus has no mechanism for uniting with an after-acquired spouse or child. (Under INA § 208(b)(3), a spouse or child accompanying or following to join the asylee may be admitted, but recall that “accompanying or following to join” status is limited to preexisting spouses and children.) Not being an LPR, an asylee is also ineligible for naturalization. In 2005, Congress repealed the annual 10,000 cap. REAL ID Act, § 101(g)(1), amending INA § 209(b).

Despite, and in some cases because of, these changes, certain features of the present adjudication process have been the subjects of wide-ranging debate. Among the problems that have received the most attention are these:

(1) Political Bias. As you saw earlier, admissions under the overseas refugee program have historically been tilted dramatically toward those refugees fleeing regimes unfriendly to the United States. For many years critics have similarly charged that the various officials who decide asylum cases improperly emphasize political factors. In part, the critics argue, this pattern reflects the foreign relations agenda of the State Department, whose advisory opinions used to influence both affirmative and defensive asylum adjudications.⁹⁰

The data certainly support historical accusations of political bias. For applications filed with the former INS from June 1983 to September 1988, the approval rates for applicants fleeing communist countries and other countries that the United States regarded as adversaries were dramatically higher than for applicants fleeing friendly countries whose human rights

90. A small sampling of the many writers who have voiced those objections includes Gil Loescher & John A. Scanlan, Calculated Kindness—Refugees and America’s Half-Open Door 1945–Present, chs. 9–11 (1986); Deborah E. Anker, A Case Study on the Implementation of Legal Norms in an Unstructured Adjudicatory Environment, 19 NYU Rev. L. & Social Change 433 (1992); Joyce A. Hughes, Flight from Cuba, 36 Calif. Western L. Rev. 39 (1999); cf. Ira J. Kurzban, A Criti- cal Analysis of Refugee Law, 36 Univ. Miami L. Rev. 865, 876–78 (1982) (refugees from noncommunist countries effectively omitted from overseas refugee program and relegated to asylum program in which standards more demanding). See also M.A. v. United States INS, 899 F.2d 304, 320–21 (4th Cir.1990) (Winter, J., dissenting) (BIA interpretation should be accorded less deference than usual because Board has not respected congressional mandate to apply Refugee Act neutrally).

records were generally perceived as being at least equally bad. See Martin, Reforming Asylum, at 1305, Table II. The ten highest country approval rates, ranging from 30.0% to 61.7%, were for applicants from Iran, Syria, and eight communist countries. Id. The rate for Nicaragua was 27.9%; in contrast, the rates for El Salvador, Guatemala, and Haiti—all United States allies—were 2.7%, 2.1% and 2.0%, respectively. Id. Analogous figures for the immigration judges also showed a large disparity between the approval rate for Nicaraguans (37.4%) and that for Salvadorans (12%), though the difference was not as severe as the corresponding disparity for INS adjudications. Id. at 1309 n.160.

In 1985, those patterns prompted a class action by Salvadoran and Guatemalan asylum claimants against the former INS, EOIR, and the State Department. The complaint alleged a pattern and practice of widespread discrimination against nationals of El Salvador and Guatemala in the adjudication of asylum claims. In 1990 the parties signed, and in 1991 the district court for the Northern District of California approved, a settlement agreement destined to have monumental effects on the asylum process. American Baptist Churches v. Thornburgh, 760 F.Supp. 796 (N.D.Cal.1991) [the ABC Case]. Subject to some exceptions, the agreement permitted Salvadorans who had arrived in the United States by September 19, 1990 and Guatemalans who had arrived by October 1, 1990, and whose asylum claims had been turned down, to reapply under the revised procedures that had been inaugurated earlier that year. While those renewed claims were pending, the applicants could remain in the United States and could work. Similar stays of deportation and grants of work authorization were extended to those Salvadorans and Guatemalans who had arrived by the specified dates but who had not previously applied for asylum. The agreement affected hundreds of thousands of individuals and took many years to implement fully.⁹¹

By the early 1990's, the end of the Cold War and a series of other world developments had combined to alter these patterns. There are now far fewer Communist countries in the world, and therefore fewer Communist countries in the high asylum approval group. But there is always a lag time between formal changes in international relations and formal responses. Thus, refugees from former Communist countries, as well as from the remaining Communist countries and other United States adversaries, remained disproportionately represented in favorable asylum decisions for several years. Still, such ideological patterns are not obvious today. See generally 2007 Yearbook of Immigration Statistics, Tables 17 and 19, which list the approval percentages by country of origin.

(2) Long delays. All sides agree that the huge volumes of asylum applications have placed pressure on the available adjudicative resources. The problem is not uniquely American; it is felt in most western democracies. In the United States, through the early 1990's, the INS asylum officers could handle only a fraction of the applications filed. The backlog kept growing. See 73 IR 45, 46 (Jan. 10, 1996). The 1994 amendments to the asylum regulations, discussed below, caused asylum applications to drop rapidly while dispositions rose. In fiscal year 1995, some 147,000 affirmative asylum applications were filed; 2003 Yearbook of Immigration Statistics, Table 16. As soon as the amendments went into effect in 1995, applications dropped dramatically and have stayed far below the 1995 figure ever since.

⁹¹ See generally Debbie Smith & ABC Legal Team, The ABC Settlement: A Guide for Class Members and Advocates, 72 IR 1497 (Nov. 6, 1995); Washington Post, Dec. 20, 1990, at 1.

The delays, which have clearly diminished, occur for many reasons: Administrative resources, though increased, are limited. Immigration judges' hearing calendars are backed up. Applicants sometimes need considerable time to obtain pro bono counsel. Martin, Reforming Asylum, at 1327–28. If either side appeals to the BIA, it can take months just to transcribe the recording of the removal hearing. In the small proportion of cases that go to court, judicial backlogs add further delay. The security checks and other administrative measures implemented in the wake of September 11 have exacerbated these delays. See generally Andrew I. Schoenholtz, Refugee Protection in the United States Post–September 11, 36 Columbia Human Rights L. Rev. 323 (2005).

Delays are harmful for various reasons. As Professor Martin has pointed out, id. at 1293, they prolong the uncertainty for genuine refugees who need security and peace of mind. Moreover, as discussed below, the very act of applying for asylum can bring concrete interim benefits. See, e.g., Michael S. Teitelbaum, Political Asylum in Theory and Practice, 76 Pub. Interest 74 (1984). Thus, critics charge, long delays enlarge the incentives for ineligible applicants to file asylum claims, which in turn make the delays even longer, which in turn further increases the incentive for other ineligible applicants to file claims, etc. Somewhere, the argument runs, the cycle must be broken. As discussed below, the challenge is to find ways of reducing the delays without unduly sacrificing procedural fairness and accuracy.

(3) Unfounded claims. No one seriously disputes that some asylum applications lack reasonable foundation, but there has always been much difference of opinion as to how great that number is. See Ira J. Kurzban, Restructuring the Asylum Process, 19 San Diego L. Rev. 91, 96 (1981). There exist at least two incentives to file an unfounded asylum claim. The most obvious is the hope that the application will erroneously be granted. See Martin, Reforming Asylum, id. at 1287–88. The other is that certain interim benefits typically attach while the claim is pending. Id. at 1288–89. Perhaps the most significant interim benefit is permission to work, but the 1994 regulations have greatly restricted the employment authorization rules, as discussed in section B.7.b.vii below. Professor Diane Uchimiya has suggested some thoughtful ways to reconcile suspicions of fraud with the demands of fair procedure. See Diane Uchimiya, A Blackstone's Ratio for Asylum Seekers, 26 Penn State Internat'l L. Rev. 383, 432–38 (2007).

(4) Fiscal Costs. The present process is expensive and, in the minds of some, wasteful. Many have criticized as unnecessary, for example, the feature that permits “two bites at the apple”—an application to USCIS, followed by a renewal of the application before the immigration judge in removal proceedings.⁹² The additional costs associated with detention and other aspects of the asylum process are also considerable. See Martin, above, at 1379–80.

(5) Procedural Fairness. Many have questioned whether the current asylum process adequately safeguards the claimants’ procedural needs. Access to counsel has been a major sticking point. As you saw in chapter 9, section B.2.b above, noncitizens in removal proceedings often face practical obstacles to securing counsel. The problem is of particular importance to asylum claimants, since their cases tend to present more than the usual complexities and thorough documentation is essential. As discussed earlier, represented asylum claimants fare far better than unrepresented claimants, though causation is not possible to gauge scientifically because lawyers are more likely to take strong cases than weaker ones. See pages 653–54 above.

Other elements of the hearing process have also been criticized. Some, for example, have questioned the adequacy of the government’s foreign language interpreters in immigration judge proceedings.⁹³

The asylum process for children has become a major issue in recent years. In 2003, approximately 50,000 children who had been separated from their families applied for asylum in Europe.⁹⁴ In the United States, the problems have been both substantive and procedural.⁹⁵ Children also face

92. See, e.g., Martin, Reforming Asylum, at 1322–24; Ira J. Kurzban, Restructuring the Asylum Process, 19 San Diego L. Rev. 91, 111–12 (1981); see also 53 Fed.Reg. 32552 (Aug. 28, 1987) (proposed Justice Department regulations that would have eliminated opportunity to apply to immigration judge; not adopted).

93. See, e.g., Deborah E. Anker, Determining Asylum Claims in the United States—Summary Report of an Empirical Study of the Adjudication of Asylum Claims Before the Immigration Court, 2 Internat’l J. Refugee L. 252, 257 (1990); see also El Rescate Legal Services, Inc. v. EOIR, 959 F.2d 742 (9th Cir.1991) (amended version) (reversing ruling that had required interpretation of entire exclusion or deportation hearing—not just respondent’s own testimony—when respondent needs interpreter). See generally Muneer I. Ahmad, Interpreting Communities: Lawyer-ing Across Language Difference, 54 UCLA L. Rev. 999 (2007); Angela McCaffrey, Don’t Get Lost in Translation: Teaching Law Students to Work with Language Interpreters, 6 Clinical L. Rev. 347 (2000).

94. See Jacqueline Bhabha, “More than Their Share of Sorrows”: International Migration Law and the Rights of Children, 22 St. Louis Univ. Public L. Rev. 253, 254–55 (2003); see also Jacqueline Bhabha, Minors or Aliens? Inconsistent State Intervention and Separated Child Asylum-Seekers, 3 European J. Migration & L. 283 (2001); Mary Crock, Seeking Asylum Alone—Australia (2006); Guy S. Goodwin-Gill, Unaccompanied Refugee Minors: The Role and Place of International Law in the Pursuit of Durable Solutions, 3 Internat’l J. Children’s Rights 405 (1995).

95. For some thoughtful and sensitive treatments, see, e.g., Jacqueline Bhabha, Lone Travelers: Rights, Criminalization, and the Transnational Migration of Unaccompanied Children, 7 Univ. Chicago L. School Roundtable 269 (2000); Michael A. Olivas, “Breaking the Law” on Principle: An Essay on Lawyers’ Dilemmas, Unpopular Causes, and Legal Regimes, 52 Univ. Pittsburgh L. Rev. 815, 820–35 (1991)(discussing lawyers’ ethical responses to governments’ treatment of unaccompanied refugee children); Michael several forms of child-specific persecution and special problems in demonstrating even adult-style persecution.⁹⁶

The most famous child asylum claimant was little Elián González, the 6-year-old boy who was rescued at sea clinging to an inner tube. His parents had divorced in Cuba, and his mother then tried to bring him to the U.S. without the knowledge of his father. His mother and several other adults drowned in the attempted escape from Cuba to the United States. Elián's great uncle in Miami filed an asylum claim on the child's behalf. Elián's father refused to consent to the claim and came to the United States to bring his son back to Cuba. Ultimately, the former INS, in its discretion, recognized the father's decision and declined to adjudicate the application. The stridently anti-Castro Cuban community in Miami lined up solidly on the side of Elián's great uncle. Amidst a passionate firestorm, intense domestic politics on all sides, the personal efforts of Fidel Castro to secure Elián's return, and a relentless media circus, the final decision fell to the courts. Eventually, the Eleventh Circuit upheld the discretionary power of the INS to decide who speaks for the child in an asylum case. Taking into account the young age of the child, the obviously close relationship between father and child, and the absence of evidence of likely persecution or other harm to Elián, the court further held that the INS had not abused its discretion. González v. Reno, 212 F.3d 1338 (11th Cir. 2000). There was extra drama at the end. While the litigation was pending, Elián was staying with his Miami relatives. When the relatives refused to release him to the INS so that he and his father could return to Cuba, the INS, after prolonged negotiations, seized him by force in a controversial surprise raid.

The Elián case, however, was more than melodrama. It highlighted a serious and difficult issue of law and policy: What should happen when a child applies for asylum against the wishes of his or her sole surviving

A. Olivas, Unaccompanied Refugee Children: Detention, Due Process, and Disgrace, 2 Stanford L. & Policy Rev. 159 (1990); Everett M. Ressler, Neil Boothby & Daniel J. Steinbock, Unaccompanied Children: Care and Protection in Wars, Natural Disasters, and Refugee Movements (1988); Daniel J. Steinbock, Separated Children in Mass Migration: Causes and Cures, 22 St. Louis Univ. Public L. Rev. 297 (2003); Daniel J. Steinbock, The Admission of Unaccompanied Children into the United States, 7 Yale L. & Policy Rev. 137 (1989). A recent symposium devoted specifically to this subject included some helpful contributions. See, e.g., Jacqueline Bhabha, "Not a Sack of Potatoes": Moving and Removing Children Across Borders, 15 Boston Univ. Public Interest L.J. 196 (2006); Berta Hernández-Truyol & Justin Luna, Children and Immigration: International, Local, and Social Responsibilities, 15 Boston Univ. Pub- lic Interest L.J. 297 (2006); Angela Lloyd, Regulating Consent: Protecting Undocumented Immigrant Children from their (Evil) Step-Uncle Sam, or How to Ameliorate the Impact of the 1997 Amendments to the SIJ Law, 15 Boston Univ. Public Interest L.J. 237 (2006).

96. See Jacqueline Bhabha & Wendy A. Young, Through a Child's Eyes: Protecting the Most Vulnerable Asylum Seekers, 75 IR 757 (June 1, 1998). See generally Convention on the Rights of the Child, 1577 U.N.T.S. 3 (done at New York, Nov. 20, 1989), especially art. 22 (but not ratified by the United States); the various UNHCR Executive Committee Conclusions, reproduced in 23 Refugee Survey Q. #2 at 334-60; the (former) INS Guidelines for Children's Asylum Claims (Dec. 10, 1998), reproduced in 76 IR 5 (Jan. 4, 1999).

parent or parents? Many observers had mixed feelings about the case. While few experts believed that 6-year-old Elián—a hero in Cuba—had a well-founded fear of persecution at the hands of his government (much less persecution because of his political opinions!), there was some queasiness about the precedent that the case could possibly set. Some provocative commentary has resulted.⁹⁷ Professor Peter Margulies brings family law to bear on the case. He identifies three common situations in which parents might object to their child's asylum claims—“(1) the parent as persecutor; (2) the parent in denial; and (3) the parent as true believer.” See Peter Margulies, Children, Parents, and Asylum, 15 Georgetown Immigration L.J. 289, 293 (2001).

Like most other components of post-September 11 U.S. immigration policy, the asylum process has been scrutinized for possible national security vulnerabilities. The conference committee report accompanying the REAL ID Act charged that terrorists have been able to exploit loopholes in the asylum procedure to enter, remain, and operate in the United States. See Rpt. 109-72 (109th Cong., 1st Sess.) (May 3, 2005), at 160-61, 164-65. The report cites examples of terrorists who entered the United States through the asylum system, though in most of the cited examples (not all), the terrorists entered either before September 11, 2001 or through procedures that have since been changed in the wake of September 11.

More general criticisms of the asylum process have begun to accumulate in recent years. See, e.g., Anker, above; Katherine L. Vaughns, Taming the Asylum Adjudication Process: An Agenda for the Twenty-First Century, 30 San Diego L. Rev. 1 (1993). In one case, a unanimous three-judge panel of the Ninth Circuit was unusually acerbic:

The legal quality of the decisions in the case were substandard. * * * [In footnote: The State Department, whose relevant bureau enjoys a name that indicates a human and humanitarian purpose, instead of providing relevant data within its knowledge of the state of affairs in El Salvador, responded with the kind of perfunctory form letter that might be used by a department store dismissing a customer's mistaken complaint of an overcharge.] [Immigration!] Judge Nail was unfamiliar with the statutory difference between the statutes on withholding deportation and granting asylum. The Board invented a new standard that was not responsive to the United States Supreme Court. The Board failed to address one of the two principal claims made by the petitioner. The whole record is one of a shoddy process. Courts of appeals

97. Thoughtful reactions include David Abraham, International Decisions, González ex rel. González v. Reno, 212 F.3d 1338 (11th Cir. 2000), 95 Amer. J. Internat'l L. 204 (2001); Berta Esperanza Hernández-Truyol, On Becoming the Other: Cubans, Castro, and Elián—A LatCritical Analysis, 78 Denver Univ. L. Rev. 687 (2001) (discussing the effects that the differing personal histories of Cuban-born law professors tend to have on their views of the Elián case); Hiroshi Motomura, The Year is 2020: Looking Back on the Elián Gonzalez Case (A Fantasy), 77 IR 853 (2000); Victor C. Romero, On Elián and Aliens: A Political Solution to the Plenary Power Problem, 4 NYU J. Legislation & Public Policy 343 (2000-01).

spend countless hours of consideration on capital cases arising in this country. Here where Congress has provided that a helpless alien does not have to be sent back to face death if he is eligible for asylum, the process as it is revealed in this case is one of haste, carelessness and ineptitude. The State Department, the Board, and the Immigration Service need to improve their standards.

Montecino v. INS, 915 F.2d 518, 521 (9th Cir.1990).

Since the implementation of the grant-or-refer system, the asylum officers have been able to process far more cases per year, not only because there are more asylum officers, but also because the number of dispositions per officer has increased. Many, however, have questioned whether the price for that increased productivity has been sloppier decisionmaking. In 1996 the U.S. Committee for Refugees reported:

[A New York attorney lamented that asylum officers] “don’t have time to conduct the interviews. If they can’t get the full story in one hour, they blame the applicants for not telling their stories well, and refer the case. It is easier to refer than to grant.”

Other practitioners complain that INS asylum officers come into the interviews unprepared, not having read the applications and supporting documents ahead of time.

“I consider myself lucky if the asylum officer has read the application form and declaration before the interview,” said an attorney in Los Angeles. “You can’t have a solid interview if the asylum officer is reviewing the file for the first time while the client is sitting there.”

* * *

“Some denials—I can’t bring myself to call them referrals—make your jaw drop,” said a practitioner in Chicago. “We recommend that no one file affirmatively any more unless they have a very strong case.”

“Before,” said the Chicago practitioner, “asylum officers would take as long as they needed, two-to-three hours; they would call people back for another interview. Now, they’re under pressure to crank them out.”

Some practitioners noted that the performance rating system for AOs used in the INS’s Arlington office is based on a point system that awards points for completing a case in a single day.

* * *

U.S. Comm. for Refugees, Refugee Reports at 3, 5 (June 30, 1996). Without minimizing the problems that these commentators have described, one should not assume that affirmative asylum applications are a waste of time. To the contrary, statistics for fiscal year 2005 show an approval rate by USCIS asylum officers of 40.7% for asylum claimants from all countries combined. The rates vary considerably, of course, by source country. See U.S. Comm. for Refugees and Immigrants, Refugee Reports (Feb. 2006), at 12.

A massive, recently completed, empirical study also confirms what practitioners have long recognized as a serious problem—sharp disparities in the asylum approval rates from one adjudicator to another. The most striking disparities, which persist even after controlling for country of origin and other possible confounding variables, are summarized in the abstract of the study:

This study analyzes databases of decisions from all four levels of the asylum adjudication process: 133,000 decisions involving nationals from 11 key countries rendered by 884 asylum officers over a seven year period; 140,000 decisions of 225 immigration judges over a four-and-a-half year period; 76,000 decisions of the Board of Immigration Appeals over six years; and 4215 decisions of the U.S. Courts of Appeal during 2004 and 2005. The analysis reveals amazing disparities in grant rates, even when different adjudicators in the same office each considered large numbers of applications from nationals of the same country. For example, in one regional asylum office, 60% of the officers decided in favor of Chinese applicants at rates that deviated by more than 50% from that region's mean grant rate for Chinese applicants, with some officers granting asylum to no Chinese nationals, while other officers granted asylum in as many as 68% of their cases. Similarly, Colombian asylum applicants whose cases were adjudicated in the federal immigration court in Miami had a 5% chance of prevailing with one of that court's judges and an 88% chance of prevailing before another judge in the same building. Half of the Miami judges deviated by more than 50% from the court's mean grant rate for Colombian cases.

Using cross-tabulations based on public biographies, the paper also explores correlations between sociological characteristics of individual immigration judges and their grant rates. The cross tabulations show that the chance of winning asylum was strongly affected not only by the random assignment of a case to a particular immigration judge, but also in very large measure by the quality of an applicant's legal representation and by the gender of the immigration judge. While the political party of the appointing president had little impact on the outcome of asylum cases, the immigration judge's work experience prior to appointment significantly affected grant rates.

Jaya Ramji-Nogales, Andrew I. Schoenholtz & Philip G. Schrag, Refugee Roulette: Disparities in Asylum Adjudication, 60 Stanford L. Rev. 295 (2007). The authors conclude: "In many cases, the most important moment in an asylum case is the instant in which a clerk randomly assigns an application to a particular asylum officer or immigration judge." *Id.*⁹⁸ The normative implications of adjudicative inconsistency, the forces that drive it, and the asylum-specific policy responses are considered in Stephen H. Legomsky, Learning to Live with Unequal Justice: Asylum and the Limits to Consistency, 60 Stanford L. Rev. 413 (2007). See also the thoughtful response of Margaret H. Taylor, Refugee Roulette in an Administrative Law Context: The Déjà Vu of Decisional Disparities in Agency Adjudication, 60 Stanford L. Rev. 475 (2007) (bringing both political science and administrative law lessons to bear on the findings).

98. Accord (as to immigration judges), U.S. Asylum System—Significant Variation United States General Accountability Office, Existed in Asylum Outcomes across Immigra-

IIRIRA imposed statutory time constraints on various steps in the adjudication process. With narrow exceptions, an asylum application may not be filed more than one year after the applicant's arrival in the United States. INA § 208(a)(2)(B, D). The concept of a time limit on filing asylum claims is considered separately in section B.7.b.i below. The hearing or interview must begin within 45 days of the filing, and the asylum officer or immigration judge must decide the case no later than 180 days after the filing. INA § 208(d)(5)(A)(ii, iii). Any administrative appeal must be filed within 30 days of the initial decision. INA § 208(d)(5)(A)(iv). These constraints might well speed up adjudication even further. Whether they will exacerbate some of the problems noted above remains to be determined.

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. Not all observers agree about either the existence or the scale of all those problems. But each is seen as a significant problem by a significant number of people. Varying solutions, reflecting different substantive ideologies and procedural preferences, have been advanced over the years. One of the most comprehensive analyses of the United States asylum adjudication procedure is David Martin, Reforming Asylum Adjudication: On Navigating the Coast of Bohemia, 138 Univ. Pennsylvania L. Rev. 1247 (1990) (consultant's report to the Administrative Conference of the United States, a now defunct federal government agency that was charged with monitoring and improving the administrative process). Among Professor Martin's recommendations were (1) establish a corps of properly trained specialized asylum adjudicators (the INS, now USCIS, Asylum Office did not then exist); (2) locate that corps in a new department of EOIR; (3) substitute these asylum officers for the combination of INS (now USCIS) and immigration judge asylum decisionmaking, thus eliminating the "two bites at the apple" feature; (4) select adjudicators who were interested in international affairs and sensitive to cultural differences; (5) require they be lawyers; (6) create an official documentation center that would make reliance on State Department expertise unnecessary; (7) adopt a nonadversarial, interview-style procedure in which the specialized asylum adjudicator develops the factual record; and (8) proceed without counsel in the

tion Courts and Judges, GAO-08-940 (Sept. 2008); TRAC Immigration, Asylum Disparities Persist, Regardless of Court Location and Nationality (2007), <http://trac.syr.edu/immigration/reports/183>.

event the applicant cannot secure counsel within a reasonable time. The Administrative Conference of the United States substantially endorsed these recommendations. See 1 CFR § 305.89(4) (1996). As the preceding discussion showed, most of the proposed reforms have made their way into the present asylum adjudication system, though some (most notably 2 and 3 above) have not.

2. Other commentators (as Martin acknowledges, Reforming Asylum, at 1338 n. 250), had also urged the use of specialized asylum adjudicators.⁹⁹ What arguments can you make both for and against reliance on asylum specialists? For a general analysis of the benefits and costs of specialized adjudication, methods of identifying case types for which the benefits outweigh the costs, and the varying forms that specialized adjudication can take, see Stephen H. Legomsky, Specialized Justice—Courts, Administrative Tribunals, and a Cross-National Theory of Specialization, chaps. 1–3 (1990).

3. A more specific issue concerns the proper degree of specialization. Most people would regard immigration law as a highly specialized field and, thus, immigration judges as already performing highly specialized work. Asylum, being a subcategory of immigration law, is more specialized yet. Martin in fact raises, though he rejects as impractical for a country as large in area as the United States, the possibility of even greater specialization—the cases of asylum-seekers from particular countries or regions of the world. One leading writer, emphasizing the dangers of cross-cultural misunderstandings, has argued that an asylum adjudicator should “deal with asylum-seekers from only one or a few culturally similar countries.”¹⁰⁰ What do you see as the optimal level of specialization in this context?

4. Should all asylum adjudicators be lawyers?

5. Before the 1994 amendments to the regulations, an asylum officer who was about to deny a claim would give the applicant a “Notice of Intent to Deny” [NOID], which stated the reasons for the proposed denial. The applicant would then have an opportunity to meet the deficiency by producing additional information. The 1994 amendments deleted NOIDs. 59 Fed.Reg. 62284, 62293–94, 62300 (1994). What do you see as the pros and cons of NOIDs?

6. Martin argues against “two bites at the apple”—i.e., a non-adversarial interview with a (then) INS official and then a renewal of the application to an immigration judge at an adversarial hearing. Others similarly advocated eliminating the INS from the asylum process.¹⁰¹ Are

99. See, e.g., Deborah E. Anker & Michael H. Posner, The Forty-Year Crisis: A Legislative History of the Refugee Act of 1980, 19 San Diego L. Rev. 9, 74–75 (1981); see also Christopher Avery, Refugee Status Decision-Making: The Systems of Ten Countries, 19 Stanford J. Internat'l L. 235 (1983).

100. Walter Kälin, Troubled Communication: Cross-Cultural Misunderstandings in the Asylum-Hearing, 20 Internat'l Migration Rev. 230, 239 (1986).

101. See, e.g., Ira J. Kurzban, Restructuring the Asylum Process, 19 San Diego L. Rev. 91, 111–12 (1981); Michael P. Brady, Asylum Adjudication: No Place for the INS, 20 Columbia Human Rights L. Rev. 129 (1988).

there any advantages to the present system? What about the possibility that a second round decreases the chance of error? Martin rejects that argument on the ground that there is no reason to think the pictures inside the head of the second adjudicator will be any more accurate than those inside the head of the first. Is he right about that? Either way, are there other advantages to the two-bite system?

7. If one of the bites is to be eliminated, which one should it be? Initial adjudication (as distinguished from appeal or review) could be assigned solely to the immigration agency officials, as the INS once proposed, 52 Fed.Reg. 32552, 32554 (August 28, 1987), solely to immigration judges, or, as Martin proposes, solely to some third type of decisionmaker. If the last option is chosen, a further question is whether the adjudicators should remain within the Justice Department, be placed within some other Department, or be part of a new independent agency. Other variables affecting the degree of independence include whether the adjudicators are subject to removal by, and whether their decisions are reviewable by, political officials.¹⁰²

In answering these questions, think about what it is the adjudicators should be independent of. Is it control by political officials? Control by officials whose first priority is foreign policy? Control by officials who perform law enforcement functions? Should an individual persecution claim be seen as an “adjudicative” decision that reflects only an assessment of the law and the facts of the case, or should it be seen as a “policy” decision shaped also by assessments of the likely domestic and foreign affairs consequences? Is your analysis of this question the same for asylum as it is for withholding of removal?

8. Martin favors non-adversarial proceedings, in which the adjudicator has the principal responsibility for identifying the issues and extracting the relevant facts and legal arguments. An adversarial system, in contrast, would rely more heavily on the efforts of the parties and their counsel. Which do you favor for asylum cases?

9. A key element of Martin’s nonadversarial system is that the hearing would proceed without counsel if counsel cannot be obtained quickly. That scenario would probably occur often since, as you saw earlier, affordable lawyers are frequently unavailable. The question, therefore, is how important it is for asylum claimants to be represented. Under the present system, obtaining counsel markedly improves the chances of approval, as you have seen. A good illustration is Castro-O’Ryan v. United States Dept. of Immigration and Naturalization [sic], 847 F.2d 1307 (9th Cir.1987), where the court reversed an asylum denial on the ground that the applicant’s waiver of his right to counsel had not been intelligent and voluntary. The court noted a clear legal error by Immigration Judge Nail (the same IJ criticized in Montecino, pages 956–57 above) that competent

102. For commentary advocating the independent agency approach, see T. Alexander Aleinikoff, Political Asylum in the Federal Republic of Germany and the Republic of counsel would have prevented. Id. at 1313. The court also observed a striking contrast between the vivid story related by the applicant and the immigration judge's summation of the evidence:

France: Lessons for the United States, 17 Univ. Michigan J. L. Reform 183, 235–36 (1984) (would avoid public perception of political bias).

In support of his request for asylum Castro prepared an affidavit in February 1985 which, written in his own hand, was filed with the Immigration Judge. It, in relevant part, reads:

* * *

* * * On the night of October 21st, 1975 (about 8:00 P.M.), as I left the student's residence, where I lived, in Santiago, during the school season, I was detained and escorted to a waiting Army truck, by two soldiers.

I was ordered to lay face down on the truck's bed and to pull my trousers down to my knees. There were other two civilian detainees with me, in the same position. In the canvas' covered bed of the truck were about 10 soldiers. The ones closer to the tail, closed the tail gate and pulled down the tail canvas.

The Army truck rode for about one hour before coming to a final stop.

We (all three detainees) were order out, to what seemed to be an isolated country estate.

I never saw again the other two detainees.

I was order to remove all my cloth, and locked in a cell, without light, in the basement of the building.

After about two hours, two civilians came for me. I was taken nude to another room on the floor above. It was a walk in freezer, illuminated by very deem lighting. I was order to sat down on a metal chair. I was hand and leg strapped into the metal chair. The two civilians left.

About an hour later the two civilians came back. By this time I was getting close to be frozen in the freezer.

One of the civilians introduced himself as an Army Intelligence Officer.

He was the one that conducted the interrogation. I was asked about my participation in the movement, our plans, the names of other members of the movement. I denied any knowledge of the movement (if I had accepted any of their allegations, they would have had bases for my prosecution; if found guilty, I would have faced at least a long prison sentence, if not death). After about half an hour of interrogation, it became obvious to me that the Army Intelligence new more about the movement than I did myself. That only meant that they had infiltrated the movement.

After one hour of interrogation, the two civilians left. By this time I was in pain because of the cold, inside the freezer.

Half an hour later, my interrogator, with two soldiers came back. They hose me with high pressure water; unstrapped me, and took me out of the freezer. On my way back to the basement cell, the officer in civil cloth told me to leave the country.

I was given back my cloth and put back on the same cell. After about 4 to 5 hours, two soldiers come for me. I was brought back to the Army truck. Order to lay face down on the floor of the bed of the truck and to pull my trousers down to my knees. This time only two soldiers were on the back of the truck. I was the only civilian.

After half an hour of ride, the truck stopped and I was order out of it. I was left in the southwest suburbs of Santiago. It was 6:30 A.M., October 22nd, 1975. It had been over 10 hours since I was taken into custody.

* * *

* * * Judge Nail's [entire] description of the main incident described by Castro in his affidavit was as follows:

The Respondent stated that about October of 1975, that he was taken into custody by individuals of the Government and that he was held overnight and during the time that he was held he was questioned and he was mistreated.

Id. at 1310-12.

Under Martin's proposal, of course, the asylum adjudicators would receive specialized training and, through their caseloads, accumulate specialized expertise. There would also be, and indeed there now is, a documentation center capable of providing further support. Do you think those innovations, combined with the more assertive roles proposed for the adjudicators, would adequately compensate for lack of counsel?

10. IIRIRA all but eliminated judicial review in those asylum cases that are subject to the new expedited removal procedure. See the expedited removal discussion (item 3) below; Kevin R. Johnson, A "Hard Look" at the Executive Branch's Asylum Decisions, 1991 Utah L. Rev. 279 (urging more assertive judicial review of asylum denials).

What, exactly, does judicial review of asylum decisions accomplish? What are the costs of allowing such review? See generally Stephen H. Legomsky, Political Asylum and the Theory of Judicial Review, 73 Minnesota L. Rev. 1205, 1207 (1989).

11. Based on what you now know about the asylum process, is a competent terrorist very likely to apply for asylum rather than pursue other means of entering and remaining?

b. BARRING OR DISCOURAGING ACCESS TO THE ASYLUM PROCESS

The case management strategies that you have encountered up to this point are designed primarily to make the disposition of asylum claims speedier and more efficient. In contrast are a package of other asylum reforms adopted or considered in the United States in recent years. These latter reforms are generally meant to cut off access to the asylum system entirely or, in some instances, at least discourage potential asylum applicants from filing claims. They are described in this subsection.¹⁰³

i. Filing Deadlines

As a result of IIRIRA § 604(a), asylum (but not withholding of removal) requires “clear and convincing evidence” that the application is being filed within one year of the applicant’s arrival in the United States. INA § 208(a)(2)(B). There are two exceptions—“changed circumstances which materially affect the applicant’s eligibility for asylum or extraordinary circumstances relating to the delay in filing.” INA § 208(a)(2)(D). The regulations define “extraordinary circumstances” as “events or factors directly related to the failure to meet the 1-year deadline.” 8 CFR § 208.4(a)(5) (2008). A non-exhaustive list of possible “extraordinary circumstances” includes physical, mental, and legal disabilities, and (subject to several rigorous conditions) ineffective assistance of counsel. Id. Once the administrative officials find an absence of clear and convincing evidence that the applicant arrived during the past year, and also find that neither of the exceptions applies, the asylum denials are final; no judicial review is permitted. INA § 208(a)(3).

The regulations define “arrival” to mean the person’s “last arrival” in the United States. 8 CFR § 208.4(a)(2)(ii) (2008). The BIA in Matter of F-P-R-, 24 I. & N. Dec. 681, 683 (BIA 2008), left open whether there might be an exception for a trip that was “solely or principally intended to overcome the 1-year time bar,” id. at 685 (emphasis in original).

Asylum professionals vigorously resisted the introduction of filing deadlines. The leading advocates were Professors Philip Schrag and Michele Pistone, who explained many of the practical reasons that asylum applicants often do not file their claims soon after arrival. The immediate priorities of most refugees are to locate United States relatives, friends, or others, who will help them find food and lodging. Genuine refugees are frequently still traumatized by the persecution they are fleeing. Many cannot speak English when they arrive and do not have a clue how to go about applying for asylum. Most important, it is immensely difficult to file an asylum application without help from a lawyer or other professional who specializes in asylum. Unfortunately, most refugees lack the resources to

103. For more detail, see Stephen H. Legomsky, The New Techniques for Managing High-Volume Asylum Systems, 81 Iowa L. Rev. 671, 675-704 (1996). To put the United States initiatives in perspective, note that similar actions have been taken or proposed in western Europe. See, e.g., Elspeth Guild, The Impetus to Harmonize: Asylum Policy in the European Union, in Frances Nicholson & Patrick Twomey (eds.), Refugee Rights and Realities (1999), at 313 et seq.; Kay Hailbronner, New Techniques for Rendering Asylum Manageable, in 4 Kay Hailbronner, David A. Martin & Hiroshi Motomura (eds.), Immigration Controls (1998), at 59 et seq.; Reinhard Marx & Katharina Lumpp, The German Constitutional Court's Decision of 14 May 1996 on the Concept of "Safe Third Countries"—A Basis for Burden-Sharing in Europe, 8 Internat'l J. Refugee L. 419 (1996).

retain such professionals, and the supply of pro bono services falls far short of the demand. Even when a suitable lawyer is willing to take the case, gathering documentary support and otherwise preparing serious asylum applications are enormously labor-intensive.¹⁰⁴

ii. Safe Countries of Origin

In some European asylum systems, government officials have compiled lists of “safe” countries. These are usually defined as countries that neither practice the kinds of persecution with which the 1951 Convention is concerned, nor return refugees to countries that will persecute them. Two different uses have been made of such lists.

One kind of safe country provision is the so-called “safe third country” restriction; it is described in the next subsection. The other is the “safe country of origin” constraint. Under this approach, which is in place in some European countries, asylum claimants from countries that are on the safe list are presumed ineligible. The presumption might lead to actual denial or it might merely trigger a more summary procedure. The two sides of the debate are superbly represented by Rosemary Byrne & Andrew Shacknove, The Safe Country Notion in European Asylum Law, 9 Harvard Human Rights J. 185 (1996) (critical of the safe country of origin concept); and Kay Hailbronner, The Concept of “Safe Country” and Expeditious Asylum Procedures: A Western European Perspective, 5 Internat’l J. Refugee L. 31, 49–58 (1993) (supportive of it). The United States has not adopted or even seriously contemplated such a constraint.

iii. Returning Asylum-Seekers to Third Countries

Refugees today seldom take direct routes from their countries of origin to the countries in which they intend to request asylum. For a variety of reasons, refugees are usually forced to travel circuitous routes to their ultimate intended destinations. The movement from the country of origin to one of the intermediate (“third”) countries is often called a “primary” movement. The subsequent movement from a third country to the country in which asylum is sought is usually called a “secondary” movement.

Earlier, you saw that a person who is found to have been “firmly resettled” in a third country is generally ineligible for asylum in the United States. The idea is that a person does not need, and therefore should not receive, asylum if he or she is already firmly (and safely) resettled elsewhere. The firm resettlement exception can be thought of as one subcategory of a broader notion sometimes referred to as “first country of asylum.”

¹⁰⁴ See Philip G. Schrag, Don't Gut Political Asylum, Wash. Post, Nov. 12, 1995, at C7, reproduced in 10 Georgetown Immigration L.J. at 93–94 (1996); Michele R. Pistone, Asylum Filing Deadlines: Unfair and Unnecessary, 10 Georgetown Immigration L.J. 95 (1996); Philip G. Schrag & Michele R. Pistone, The 1996 Immigration Act: Asylum Application Deadlines and Expedited Removal—What the INS Should Do, 73 IR 1565 (Nov. 11, 1996). For strong criticisms of the one-year bar in practice, see Karen Musalo & Marcelle Rice, Center for Gender & Refugee Studies: The Implementation of the One-Year Bar to Asylum, 31 Hastings Internat’l & Comp. L. Rev. 693 (2008).

A related, but different, practice prevalent in many countries is the "safe third country" restriction. Under certain circumstances, if a person travels through one or more "safe" third countries before arriving in the country where the asylum application is filed, the latter country will refuse to decide the asylum claim on the merits and, instead, return him or her to that safe third country. The theory is not that the person in fact had been granted refuge in that third country; it is that the person could, and should, at least have requested it there.

In Europe, both sorts of third country limitations—first country of asylum restrictions and "safe third country" restrictions—are now common. Typically, they entail regional agreements whereby states accept common rules for determining which of them should adjudicate the asylum claims of individuals whose flights have taken them through several signatory states. Those agreements normally contain language that purports to assure that asylum applicants are sent only to "safe" countries for adjudication of their claims. But there is disagreement over the very concept of a "safe third country" limitation, over the definition of "safe," and over how the definition is applied in practice.¹⁰⁵

Third country restrictions raise fundamental legal and policy questions. Precisely how much legal freedom should a person have to choose the country in which he or she will request asylum? From the standpoints of countries of origin, third countries, ultimate destination countries, and the world community, how should the responsibility for protecting refugees be allocated?

Depending on the way they are applied, third country restrictions can serve a useful and legitimate role. But they have also engendered major problems, both for the asylum seekers themselves and for the third countries to which the applicants are returned:

There is, first, the problem of "orbit"—refugees who have escaped from persecution or from other trauma, only to be shuttled consecutively from one country to another. There is the more serious problem of "chain" refoulement, in which the third country in turn refoules the person to his or her persecutors in the country of origin. The third country might not have a fair refugee status

105. Some excellent European literature on this subject includes Jacqueline Bhabha, European Harmonisation of Asylum Policy: A Flawed Process, 35 Virginia J. Internat'l L. 101 (1994) (dealing more generally with the notion of uniform immigration laws within Europe); Rosemary Byrne & Andrew Shacknove, The Safe Country Notion in European Asylum Law, 9 Harvard Human Rights J. 185 (1996); Rosemary Byrne, Gregor Noll & Jens Vested-Hansen (eds.), New Asylum Countries? Migration Control and Refugee Protection in an Enlarged European Union (2002); Maryellen Fullerton, Failing the Test: Germany Leads Europe in Dismantling Refugee Protection, 36 Texas Internat'l L.J. 231, 243-50 (2001); Kay Hailbronner, The Concept of "Safe" Country and Expeditious Asylum Procedures: A Western European Perspective, 5 Internat'l J. Refugee L. 31 (1993); Agnes Hurwitz, The Dublin Convention: A Comprehensive Assessment, 11 Internat'l J. Refugee L. 646 (1999); Reinhard Marx & Katharina Lumpp, The German Constitutional Court's Decision of 14 May 1996 on the Concept of "Safe Third Countries"—A Basis for Burden-Sharing in Europe?, 8 Internat'l J. Refugee L. 419 (1996).

determination procedure in place. The third country might not be a party to the 1951 Refugee Convention. The third country might not provide formal refugee or other lawful status or might not provide the kind of documentation that the person needs to procure the necessities of life or to travel. The protection afforded by the third country might not be durable. The third country might be unable to protect the person from discrimination, or persecution, or other human rights violations; indeed, the government of the third country might engage in those practices itself. There might be threats to the applicant's physical security or basic subsistence. The third country might practice indiscriminate or long-term detention or might otherwise inhibit essential freedom of movement. One recurring problem has been the return of asylum seekers to third countries to which they have no links or connections. There might be serious deficiencies in the procedures by which the destination country itself decides whether return is appropriate in a particular case. Finally, some of the more common destination state practices have the effect of distributing the responsibility for refugee protection inequitably, so that the obligations fall disproportionately on developing countries and on countries whose frontiers are geographically the most accessible.

Stephen H. Legomsky, Secondary Refugee Movements and the Return of Asylum Seekers to Third Countries: The Meaning of Effective Protection, 15 Internat'l J. Refugee L. 567, 572 (2003) (consultant's report to UNHCR).¹⁰⁶

These persistent problems prompted UNHCR to take up the entire question of "secondary" refugee movements as part of its Agenda for Protection. It has long been assumed that international law prohibits the return of asylum seekers to third countries unless those third countries will provide "effective protection." But the content of "effective protection" remains elusive. To determine precisely what elements constitute the international legal minima and what additional protections are recommended, UNHCR commissioned the consultant's report cited above. The report concluded with the following recommendations concerning the minimum legal requirements, and the best practice criteria, for the return of asylum seekers to third countries:

1. Minimum legal requirements

Under certain circumstances, a destination country (i.e., a country in which an asylum application has been lodged) may decline to determine the application in substance and instead return the applicant to a third country (i.e. a country other than the destination country or the country of origin). Such returns are permissible, however, only if all of the following conditions, collectively referred to as effective protection, are met:

¹⁰⁶ See also James C. Hathaway, The Michigan Guidelines on Protection Elsewhere, Adopted January 3, 2007, 28 Michigan J. Internat'l L. 207 (2007); Michelle Foster, Protection Elsewhere: The Legal Implications of Requiring Refugees to Seek Protection in Another State, 28 Michigan J. Internat'l L. 223 (2007).

1. The third country has explicitly agreed (a) to readmit the particular individual; and (b) to accord him or her either a fair refugee status determination or effective protection without such a determination. To protect the applicant's privacy interests, however, the assurance described in part (b) is not required, and should not be requested by the destination country, without the applicant's authorization.

2. The applicant has no well-founded fear of being persecuted, in the third country, on any of the 1951 Convention grounds.

3. The applicant has no well-founded fear of being refouled by the third country, directly or indirectly, to a territory where his or her life or freedom would be threatened on any of the 1951 Refugee Convention grounds. * * * If the third country is not a party to the 1951 Refugee Convention or the 1967 Refugee Protocol, that fact must be considered in determining whether this and the other minimum legal requirements for return have been met.

4. The destination country may not knowingly return the applicant to a third country that will violate any of the applicant's rights under the 1951 Refugee Convention (apart from nonrefoulement, which is treated separately in criterion 3 above). The degree of certainty required by the word "knowingly" should vary inversely with the importance of the particular right. With respect to those Convention rights that are contingent upon the refugee "lawfully staying" in the third country, the destination country is not required to speculate that lawful stay will be granted. * * *

5. The destination country may not knowingly return the applicant to a third country that will breach any of the applicant's rights under any human rights agreement to which the destination country is a party. The degree of certainty required by the word "knowingly" should vary inversely with the importance of the particular right. For purposes of this criterion, these violations encompass both harms that occur in the third country and harms that might result from the third country sending the applicant elsewhere. Depending on the circumstances of the case, knowingly sending the applicant to a third country where he or she will lack either physical security or basic subsistence can be "cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment" for purposes of the various human rights agreements that use that term.

6. The third country will either provide a fair refugee status determination or provide effective protection without such a determination. * * * Many first countries of asylum provide no formal refugee status determination but nonetheless provide some form of de facto protection. Such arrangements are not adequate substitutes for refugee status determinations, unless in the particular case the lack of formal status or documentation does not impair the other requirements of effective protection enumerated here. A fair refugee status determination also requires respect for the privacy interests of the applicant and his or her family, as well as consideration of any special vulnerabilities of the applicant. Specially vulnerable groups include, but are not limited to, torture victims, women, subcategories of women (for example victims of rape or other sexual violence, pregnant women, and women who are single heads of households), children (especially unaccompanied children), the elderly, the physically or mentally disabled, and stateless persons.

7. The third country is willing and able to provide effective protection for as long as the person remains a refugee or until another source of durable effective protection can be found.

8. Even when the third country will otherwise provide effective protection, return is prohibited if, in the light of the applicant's comparative family ties to the destination country and the third country, return would violate the applicant's internationally recognized right to family unity.

9. The destination country must apply each of the above criteria on an individual, case-by-case basis. The applicant may not be returned involuntarily to the third country until this procedure, including appeal, has been completed.

2. Best practice criteria

In addition to the above conditions, which constitute the minimum requirements of international law, the following safeguards are recommended as best practice criteria:

1. The applicant should not be returned to a third country with which he or she lacks meaningful links, even if that third country is otherwise willing and able to provide effective protection. Mere transit or other momentary physical presence in the third country should not be deemed sufficient. Examples of meaningful links include family connections, cultural ties, knowledge of the language, the possession of a residence permit, the applicant's previous period of residence in the other State, and any other connections that would expedite or enhance the prospects of integration. Among the cited examples, family unity is especially critical and is treated separately in the list of minimum legal requirements. The applicant's links to the third country should not be evaluated in isolation; rather, the test should be whether the applicant's links to the destination country are greater than his or her links to the third country. Finally, while not controlling, the applicant's preference—as distinguished from links—is a relevant factor that the destination country should take into account in deciding whether to divert the application to a third country.

* * *

6. Normally, an asylum applicant should not be returned to a third country that is not bound by the 1951 Refugee Convention and the 1967 Refugee Protocol.

7. * * * It is further recommended that states avoid relying on preformulated lists of "safe" countries, even though such lists are not barred when individuals are given the opportunity to rebut the presumption of safety.

Legomsky, above, at 673-76.¹⁰⁷

While the firm resettlement restriction has not had major consequences in the United States, recent developments portend larger significance for the concept of safe third country. In 1996 Congress disqualified from asylum any person whom the Secretary of DHS finds "may be removed, pursuant to a bilateral or multilateral agreement," to a third country in which the person's life or freedom would not be threatened on account of race, religion, etc., and where the person "would have access to a full and fair procedure for determining a claim to asylum or equivalent temporary protection" (unless the Secretary finds that granting asylum would be in the public interest). IIRIRA § 604(a), amending INA § 208(a)(2)(A). The Secretary's decision under that provision is not subject to judicial review. INA § 208(a)(3).

By its terms, that provision was not to become operative until the United States entered into a safe third country agreement with one or more other nations. That has now happened. After several years of negotiation that had foundered over concerns about the adequacy of United States protection, see Bill Frelick, Who's on First? The Canada-U.S. Memorandum of Agreement on Asylum, 73 IR 217 (Feb. 26, 1996), the United States and Canada in 2002 entered into an agreement to allocate responsibility for deciding asylum claims. Agreement Between the Government of Canada and the Government of the United States of America Regarding Asylum Claims Made at Land Borders (Dec. 15, 2002) [hereafter cited as Canada-U.S. Agreement], text reproduced in advance in 79 IR at 1446 et seq. (Sept. 23, 2002). The agreement spells out the two countries' respective responsibilities for those asylum seekers who travel through the territory of one of the two countries before applying for asylum at a land border port of entry in the other.

The agreement defines the term "country of last presence" to mean either Canada or the United States when the person was physically present in that country immediately before claiming refugee status at a land border port of entry. Canada-United States Agreement, art. 1.1(a). (Note the agreement does not apply to asylum applications filed at airports or seaports or to applications filed by those who enter at unauthorized points.) The agreement goes on to say that the country of last presence is generally

107. For the "Summary Conclusions" from the Lisbon UNHCR Expert Round Table on the report, see www.unhcr.ch, Protecting Refugees, Legal and Protection Policy responsible for deciding the asylum claim. Id. art. 4.1. Exceptions relate to family unity, transit passengers, arriving passengers with non-transit visas, and certain individuals who are permitted to enter without visas. Id. arts. 4.2, 5. Either state may voluntarily accept an asylum application even if the agreement does not obligate it to do so. Id. art.6. Importantly, once one of the two states returns a person to the other, the latter must decide the asylum application itself; it cannot simply return the person to yet another country for an asylum decision. Id. art. 3. For the final implementing rules on the U.S. side (by DHS and EOIR), see 69 Fed. Reg. 69479 (Nov. 29, 2004).

Research Series, Expert Meetings, Effective Protection (Lisbon, Dec. 2002), Summary Conclusions from the Round Table.

For various reasons—some relating to geography and others relating to the two countries' differing refugee policies—far more people travel through the United States to apply for asylum in Canada than vice versa. The agreement will therefore result in Canada returning more asylum seekers to the United States than vice versa. That fact is of concern to refugee advocates, because of U.S. detention practices (discussed below) and other less favorable U.S. refugee policies.¹⁰⁸ A federal court in Canada struck down the U.S.–Canada readmission agreement on constitutional grounds, holding that various U.S. refugee practices rendered return to the United States unsafe, Canadian Council for Refugees v. The Queen, [2007] F.C. 1262, but the Federal Court of Appeal reversed, The Queen v. Canadian Council for Refugees, 2008 FCA 229; see also 13 BIB 1023 (Aug. 15, 2008). The willingness of the United States to enter into the agreement apparently reflected an unrelated quid pro quo of greater Canadian cooperation in national security matters.

iv. Expedited Removal

Amid mounting concerns over both high levels of illegal immigration and large numbers of asylum applicants, western nations are increasingly prone to prescribe various summary procedures for the admission and exclusion of noncitizens. The new procedures are designed to deter fraudulent entries, reduce the number of asylum applications, and dispose cheaply and speedily of those asylum applications that are filed. For a critique of extreme forms of accelerated procedures in Spain and Portugal, see Maryellen Fullerton, Inadmissible in Iberia: The Fate of Asylum Seekers in Spain and Portugal, 17 Internat'l J. Refugee L. 659 (2005). In 1996 the United States established the expedited removal procedure that you encountered

108. See generally François Crépeau & Stephen H. Legomsky, North American Responses: A Comparative Study of U.S. and Canadian Refugee Policy, in Susan Kneebone & Felicity Rawlings-Sanaei (eds.), New Regionalism and Asylum Seekers—Challenges Ahead (2007), ch. 6, at 153–59; Bill Frelick, North America Considers Agreement to Deflect Asylum Seekers, 7 BIB 1404 (Nov. 15, 2002); Audrey Macklin, Disappearing Refugees: Reflections on the Canada–U.S. Safe

Third Country Agreement, 36 Columbia Human Rights L. Rev. 365 (2005); Andrew F. Moore, Unsafe in America: A Review of the U.S.–Canada Safe Third Country Agreement, 47 Santa Clara L. Rev. 201 (2007) (arguing that, in the light of various U.S. asylum policies, Canada's return of asylum seekers to the U.S. potentially violates the complicity theory formulated in the Legomsky UNHCR report, above).

earlier. As you might recall, expedited removal kicks in when an immigration officer “determines” that an arriving noncitizen is inadmissible for lack of documents or for fraud. INA § 235(b)(1)(A)(i).

If an immigration officer invokes the expedited removal provision, and the person either requests asylum or otherwise indicates a fear of persecution, then an asylum officer interviews the person and performs a preliminary screening to decide whether there is a “credible fear of persecution.” INA § 235(b)(1)(B)(i, ii). For this purpose, “credible fear” requires a “significant possibility . . . that the alien could establish eligibility for asylum.” INA § 235(b)(1)(B)(v). If the asylum officer finds a credible fear, the person is detained for “further consideration of the application for asylum.” INA § 235(b)(1)(B)(ii). The statute does not say what form such further consideration will take, but the regulations clarify that one who demonstrates “credible fear” is placed in regular removal proceedings for “full consideration of the asylum and withholding of removal claim in [regular removal] proceedings.” 8 CFR § 208.30(f) (2008).

Upon finding no credible fear, the asylum officer orders the person removed and writes up a report summarizing the facts and the reasons for the finding. INA § 235(b)(1)(B)(iii)(I, II). Upon the individual’s request, an immigration judge will “promptly” review the finding of no credible fear, either in person or by telephone or video, within 24 hours if practicable, and “in no case later than 7 days after the date of the determination.” INA § 235(b)(1)(B)(iii)(III). There is no other administrative review unless the person attests under penalty of perjury that he or she has already been admitted as an LPR, a refugee, or an asylee. INA § 235(b)(1)(C). Nor, with very limited exceptions, is there any judicial review. INA §§ 242(a)(2)(A), 242(e).

Information on the actual experience with expedited removal has proved difficult to obtain. The first important study was the Expedited Removal Study, a project based at the University of California at Hastings and led by Professor Karen Musalo. For several years the former INS, citing concerns of personal privacy, declined to release statistical data or files or to permit observation of the process by either the Expedited Removal Study or other NGOs. In 2000, however, after negotiations conducted during litigation over the Study’s Freedom of Information Act request, the former INS released much of the requested data, though not all. See Karen Musalo et al., The Expedited Removal Study, Report on the First Three Years of Implementation of Expedited Removal (May 2000).

The released data covered the years 1997 through 1999. One surprising finding was that, in each of the three years studied, between 80% and 89% of all the expedited removals were on grounds of suspected fraud rather than on grounds of invalid documentation. That fact is extremely important, because, as you saw in chapter 5, immigration fraud usually makes the person inadmissible for life. INA § 212(a)(6)(C). In contrast, those removed only because of invalid documentation under section 212(a)(7) become inadmissible only for five years. Id. § 212(a)(9)(A)(i). A frequent basis for a finding of fraud is that the person states an intention to return home upon the expiration of his or her temporary visa and the immigration inspector believes the true intention is to remain permanently. In other cases it is clear that the person has misstated a fact but there is uncertainty whether the misstatement was deliberate or inadvertent. Both a determination that a fact has been misstated and the determination that the misstatement was intentional require judgment.

Because the consequences of removal—both the five-year or lifetime ban on readmission and the possibility of erroneous return to persecution—are so serious, and because of other process concerns, Congress requested the General Accounting Office to study four questions (discussed below). See United States General Accounting Office, Illegal Aliens: Opportunities to Improve the Expedited Removal Process (Sept. 2000). The GAO found itself unable to answer the questions directly, citing a lack of expertise in legal matters, inadequate resources, and the lack of an acceptable methodology. It compiled some additional data and studied the then existing INS management controls, id., but little conclusive information emerged and the study was later exposed to serious criticisms. See Karen Musalo et al., The Expedited Removal Study, Evaluation of the General Accounting Office's Second Report on Expedited Removal (Oct. 2000).

Congress turned next to the U.S. Commission on International Religious Freedom, a bipartisan Commission established by the International Religious Freedom Act of 1998, Pub. L. 105-292, 112 Stat. 2787 (Oct. 27, 1998) [IRFA], to monitor religious freedom worldwide. Section 605 of IRFA specifically authorized the Commission to study expedited removal (not just with respect to religious-based asylum claims) and to address the same four questions that had been directed to the GAO. The Commission's voluminous study, United States Commission on International Religious Freedom, Report on Asylum Seekers in Expedited Removal (Feb. 2005), included the following findings, which it synthesized in the Executive Summary at 5-8:

The first question was whether immigration inspectors were inappropriately encouraging people to withdraw their applications for admission rather than face expedited removal (with its consequent bar on future admission). In cases in which there is little chance of admission, withdrawal is generally a sensible option, but the concern is whether significant numbers of people who might otherwise have been admitted felt pressured to withdraw. The Commission did not find a common practice of immigration inspectors pressuring arriving noncitizens to return voluntarily, but it found such cases on occasion and emphasized the gravity of the harm that can result.

The second area of congressional concern related to those noncitizens who did not voluntarily withdraw their applications. The question was whether immigration inspectors were wrongly failing to refer them for credible fear interviews. Here, the Commission found a more serious problem. Although immigration inspectors are required to refer applicants for credible fear interviews when the latter indicate fears of persecution, the Commission discovered that 15% of the applicants whom it observed expressing specific fears of persecution were returned without credible fear interviews.

A third congressional inquiry was whether asylum seekers were being wrongly returned to places where they feared persecution. One specific finding of the Commission was that in only 1% of the cases did the asylum officers find a lack of credible fear. In the remaining cases, the immigration judges who decided the asylum claims approved 25% of those in which the applicants were represented by counsel but only 2% of the others.

The fourth congressional concern was detention. If the asylum officer finds no credible fear of persecution, and the applicant requests that an immigration judge review that decision, then the applicant "shall be detained pending a final determination of credible fear of persecution and, if found not to have such a fear, until removed." INA § 235(b)(1)(B)(iii)(IV). The literal statutory language appears to contemplate detention even after an asylum officer finds a credible fear of persecution, INA § 235(b)(1)(B)(ii), but this provision has been assumed not to supersede the parole power of the Secretary of DHS. INA § 212(d)(5)(A) allows parole for "urgent humanitarian reasons" or "significant public benefit," absent a security risk or a risk of absconding. An ICE memo sets out standards and procedures for exercising the parole discretion in such cases. Parole is allowed only if the person has valid identification, is not a risk to flee or endanger the public, and falls into one of five affirmative categories, all narrowly defined except the last one ("public interest"), which under the memo requires some specific positive justification. See U.S. ICE, Parole of Arriving Aliens Found to Have a "Credible Fear" of Persecution or Torture (Nov. 6, 2007). In actual practice, the Commission discovered, the release rates of those who are found to have credible fear, pending their merits determinations, varied wildly from one location to another—from 98% in Harlingen, Texas to 0.5% in New Orleans.

A related congressionally mandated inquiry—relevant not only to expedited removal but also to detention—concerned the conditions of confinement. DHS uses a combination of its own detention facilities, private facilities, and local jails. The Commission expressed deep concern that asylum seekers are consistently detained in jails or jail-like facilities, often together with criminal offenders.

In the light of all this, there remains considerable difference of opinion concerning the benefits and dangers of expedited removal and concerning possible improvements. Some observers continue to feel that expedited removal discourages illegal immigration, disposes quickly and cheaply of those cases that present no substantial factual or legal issues, and saves administrative resources for the cases in which significant risks of persecution are truly presented. See David A. Martin, Two Cheers for Expedited Removal in the New Immigration Laws, 40 Virginia J. Internat'l L. 673 (2000). Other observers concede the legitimacy of those goals but contend that expedited removal—because of either the law itself or its implementation—sacrifices accuracy and procedural fairness to an unacceptable degree.¹⁰⁹

v. Detention

Earlier you saw that certain noncitizens are detained while their admissibility or deportability is being decided. Special considerations come into play, however, when the person is an asylum applicant.

Congress and the executive branch increasingly detain asylum seekers pending decisions on their claims. There is no provision for detaining those who file affirmative applications, but those who apply for asylum in removal proceedings are ordinarily subject to the same detention rules as anyone else in those proceedings. Generally, they may be held without bond, released on bond, or paroled without bond. INA § 236(a).

Asylum seekers can encounter some special detention rules. As you saw earlier, in expedited removal cases detention is the norm at least until there has been a finding of credible fear. Additionally, Haitian boat people are routinely detained, partly in an attempt to deter mass migrations by sea, as discussed in detail in chapter 10, section A.1. As that discussion explained, national security has been the stated justification. The Attorney General's principal rationale has been that detention will deter mass migrations of boat people; deterring them, in turn, avoids having to divert enforcement resources that could be used to combat terrorism. Moreover, the Attorney General argued, potential terrorists from other countries might be on board Haitian vessels.

Whether these various detention programs are compatible with United States obligations under the 1951 Convention has been the subject of recent debate. Article 26 of the Convention reads: "Each Contracting State shall accord to refugees lawfully within its territory the right to choose their place of residence and to move freely within its territory, subject to any regulations applicable to aliens generally in the same circumstances."

109. In addition to the sources already cited, see, e.g., Lawyer's Committee for Human Rights, Slamming "The Golden Door": A Year of Expedited Removal (1998); Anthony Lewis, A Bad Time for Civil Liberties, 5 Annual Survey Internat'l & Comp. L. 1 (1999); Philip G. Schrag & Michele R. Pistone, The New Asylum Rule: Not Yet a Model of Fair Procedure, 11 Georgetown Immigration L.J. 267, 283-86 (1997); U.S. Commission on Immigration Reform, U.S. Refugee Policy: Taking Leadership 30-31 (June 1997) (expedited removal should not apply to asylum claimants). For the more common types of errors in administering the expedited removal system, estimates of the frequency of the resulting wrongful removals, and some cogent recommendations, see Michele R. Pistone & John J. Hoeffner, Rules are Made to be Broken: How the Process of Expedited Removal Fails Asylum Seekers, 20 Georgetown Immigration L.J. 167 (2006). The special problems that face detainees in this setting are well described in Won Kidane, The Challenges of Representing Detained Noncitizens in Expedited Removal Proceedings from the Perspective of the Dickinson School of Law Immigration Clinic, 17 Widener L.J. 391 (2008). For other helpful commentary describing the workings of expedited removal, see Bo Cooper, Procedures for Expedited Removal and Asylum Screening under the Illegal Immigration Reform and Immigrant Responsibility Act of 1996, 29 Connecticut L. Rev. 1501 (1997); Juan P. Osuna & Patricia Mariani, Expedited Removal: Authorities, Implementation, and Ongoing Policy and Practice Issues, Nov. 1997 Immigration Briefings.

(For present purposes, let us assume (1) that asylum applicants at ports of entry are “within [the] territory” of the state; and (2) that one who presents himself or herself at the frontier is lawfully exercising a right recognized in international law, as well as U.S. law, and is therefore “lawfully” within the state’s territory.) Article 31 of the 1951 Convention, also relevant here, prohibits “penalties, on account of their illegal entry or presence, on refugees who, coming directly from a territory where their life or freedom was threatened . . . , enter or are present in their territory without authorization, provided they present themselves without delay to the authorities and show good cause for their illegal entry or presence.” Article 3 requires the contracting states to “apply the provisions of this Convention to refugees without discrimination as to race, religion or country of origin” (emphasis added). Finally, consider article 14 of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, which recognizes a “right to seek and to enjoy in other countries asylum from persecution.”

Do any of the U.S. detention programs for asylum-seekers violate any of these provisions? Based mainly on article 31, UNHCR has roundly condemned the detention of asylum seekers, absent exceptional circumstances found after individualized determinations (as distinguished from the use of mandatory detention categories). See UNHCR Revised Guidelines on Applicable Criteria and Standards Relating to the Detention of Asylum-Seekers (Feb. 1999), confirming UNHCR Executive Committee, Ex. Com. Conclusion 44, Detention of Refugees and Asylum-Seekers, No. 44 (XXXVII) (1986). Under the UNHCR Ex. Com. Conclusion and subsequent 1999 Guidelines, an asylum seeker may be detained only if it is “necessary” to accomplish one of four things—verify the person’s identity; determine the elements on which the person’s claim is based; respond to the destruction of travel or identity documents or the use of fraudulent documents to mislead the authorities of the state in which the person applies for asylum; and “to protect national security and public order.” The last objective, like all the others, may be invoked only when the facts pertaining to the particular individual so require; there must be “evidence to show that the asylum-seeker has criminal antecedents and/or affiliations which are likely to pose a risk to public order or national security . . .” See 1999 Guidelines, Guideline 3. Even then, detention is subject to a number of other conditions. Id., Guidelines 4–10.

UNHCR has responded more specifically to the selective detention of Haitians. An April 15, 2002 advisory opinion by the UNHCR regional representative, reproduced in 79 IR at 630 et seq. (Apr. 29, 2002), reiterated that “there must be an individualized analysis of the need to detain a particular individual.” Id. at 635. Deterrence, it said, “is an inappropriate goal and insufficient reason for detention.” Id. Finally, the opinion added, “[t]he detention of asylum seekers based on their national origin” is discriminatory and therefore violates article 3. Id. at 636.

These UNHCR authorities suggest that not only the Haitian detention policy, but also the detention of those asylum seekers who are subjected to expedited removal, run afoul of United States obligations under the Convention. In both programs, decisions are categorical rather than individualized, and in the case of the Haitian program the other UNHCR objections—deterrence as an insufficient reason to detain and discrimination based on country of origin—equally apply.

The Attorney General might well have had legal arguments in opposition to those advanced by UNHCR, but as noted earlier in this chapter he chose instead to dismiss the UNHCR objections on the ground that the Convention and Protocol are not self-executing. See Matter of D-J-, 23 I. & N. Dec. 572, 584–85 n.8 (A.G. 2003). Again, while a non-self-executing treaty cannot be enforced in a domestic court, it is not clear why the executive branch assumes it would not be bound by U.S. treaty obligations on the international plane.

The U.S. Commission on Immigration Reform similarly criticized detention in expedited removal cases, at least once credible fear has been found. U.S. Commission on Immigration Reform, U.S. Refugee Policy: Taking Leadership 32–33 (June 1997). While ICE frequently asserted that 85% of noncitizens in ICE custody fail to appear (aggregating noncitizens in pending removal proceedings with those who have been finally ordered removed), the Commission, using data provided by EOIR, found that among the relevant population— asylum claimants who had demonstrated credible fear and who had been released pending their removal hearings—the nonappearance rate was only 22%. See Bill Frelick, U.S. Detention of Asylum Seekers: What's the Problem? What's the Solution?, 10 BIB 159 (Apr. 1, 2005).

The commentary has been highly critical of recent U.S. detention policy for asylum claimants.¹¹⁰ Others, while similarly deploring the conditions in which asylum claimants are confined, have additionally argued that detention tends to be ordered too often and for too long.¹¹¹

vi. Criminal Prosecutions of Asylum-Seekers for Illegal Entry

In a departure from past practice, United States federal prosecutors are increasingly bringing criminal prosecutions against asylum seekers for entering the country with false documents. The practice came to light in South Florida, where “local attorneys report that some asylum seekers are arrested upon arrival at Miami International Airport while others have been charged after months of immigration detention.” Tanya Weinberg, 110. In addition to the writings noted on page 240 n. 2 above, see, e.g., Amnesty International, United States of America: Lost in the Labyrinth: Detention of Asylum-Seekers, Rpt. AMR51/51/99 (Sept. 1999); Human Rights First, In Liberty's Shadow—U.S. Detention of Asylum Seekers in the Era of Homeland Security (2004); Michele R. Pistone, Justice Delayed is Justice Denied: A Proposal for Ending the Unnecessary Detention of Asylum Seekers, 12 Harvard Human Rights J. 197 (1999) (arguing for rules modeled on those for pre-trial detention in criminal cases).

111. See, e.g., Women's Commission for Refugee Women and Children, Liberty Denied: Women Seeking Asylum Imprisoned in the United States (April 1997); Women's Commission for Refugee Women and Children, An Uncertain Future, A Cruel Present: Women in INS Detention (1996), reviewed in 73 IR at 371 (Mar. 25, 1996).

Asylum Seekers Face U.S. Charges: Prosecutors Say Dozens Entered Country Illegally, Sun-Sentinel (Ft. Lauderdale), Apr. 16, 2003. From fall 2003 through April 2004, the U.S. Attorney's Office in Miami obtained 75–80 such federal indictments. See Kathleen Sullivan, The Year in Detention Law and Policy: Immigration Detention Developments May 2003–April 2004, 9 BIB 851 (July 15, 2004). Some similar prosecutions were initiated in the United Kingdom until a court declared the practice violates article 31 of the 1951 Convention (the penalty provision discussed in subsection v above). See R. v. Uxbridge Magistrates Court, ex parte Adimi, [2001] Q.B. 667. And Malaysia has received international criticism for its policy of caning undocumented immigrants, including Burmese refugees. Jalil Hamid, Caning of refugees in Malaysia sparks protest, Reuters (Aug. 7, 2007).

These practices raise serious issues. Eleanor Acer, the asylum program director for the Lawyers Committee for Human Rights, commented: “There’s longstanding recognition that sometimes refugees are forced to flee from their persecutors with false documents. . . . That’s why Raoul Wallenberg is seen as a hero, for giving false passports to Jews fleeing the Holocaust.” Weinberg, above.

With those practicalities in mind, the drafters of the 1951 Convention included article 31, which you saw in the preceding subsections. The prohibition on penalizing refugees for illegal entry (including the use of false documents) is, however, subject to several conditions. Some of those conditions are highly indeterminate. When will refugees be found to have come “directly” from their countries of origin? Given the circuitous routes that refugees are often forced to take, this issue is critical. And what will constitute “good cause for their illegal entry or presence?” The British court in Adimi, above, took a broad view of the drafters’ desire to immunize asylum seekers from being penalized for false documents.¹¹²

One especially difficult problem is the interpretation of the “without delay” language of article 31. When a person applies for asylum immediately upon arrival at a port of entry, there is obviously no delay issue. (There might be a “coming directly” problem, depending on how long it took the person to reach the port of entry and by what route.) Similarly, the court in Adimi had no difficulty applying article 31 to individuals who had applied for asylum within a few days after their arrival in the U.K. But suppose a person who entered on false documents (or who evaded inspection) is apprehended months later and criminally prosecuted for the irregular entry. If the person then applies for asylum, must prosecution cease? If the asylum claim is ultimately denied, may prosecution then resume? The policy questions are difficult. On the one hand, a liberal interpretation of article 31 assures that valid claims are not chilled by the prospect of criminal prosecution. On the other hand, the Convention drafters surely

112. For a thorough and thoughtful treatment of article 31, see Guy S. Goodwin-Gill, Article 31 of the 1951 Convention Relating to the Status of Refugees: Non-penalization, Detention and Protection, in Erika Feller, Volker Türk & Frances Nicholson (eds.), Refugee Protection in International Law: UNHCR’s Global Consultations on International Protection, at 185–252 (2003).

did not intend to give everyone charged with illegal entry the power to stave off criminal charges simply by filing an asylum application. How and where the line should be drawn remains an unsettled issue.

vii. Denying Employment Authorization

Until 1995, it was relatively easy for an asylum claimant to obtain permission to work while the claim was pending. The claimant would apply for asylum and work authorization at the same time, and the latter would be granted within 90 days unless the application was found “frivolous.” 8 CFR § 208.7(a) (1995). As a result of the 1994 amendments to the Justice Department regulations, now effectively codified by INA § 208(d)(2), USCIS is barred from granting employment authorization until 180 days after the filing of the asylum application. Upon receiving asylum, the person automatically acquires the right to work. INA § 208(c)(1)(B). The goal was to discourage the filing of unfounded asylum claims.

In fact, asylum applications did drop markedly once the 1994 amendments to the regulations went into effect. Former INS Commissioner Doris Meissner attributed much of the decline to the new restrictions on employment authorization, stating that “INS has removed the primary incentive for baseless asylum claims.” 73 IR at 46 (Jan. 10, 1996).

Measuring the causal connection between the more restrictive work authorization rules and the drop in filings is difficult. More difficult, perhaps, is measuring the human costs of those restrictions. With no welfare benefits and no right to work, how do asylum claimants—genuine refugees, noncitizens who file manifestly unfounded applications, and all those in between—survive? The answer that most private social service providers give is “not very well.” See especially 17 Refugee Rpts. No. 6 at 6–7 (June 30, 1996) (more homelessness, psychological deterioration, stress, illegal work, exploitation, and begging). Other high-volume asylum countries, in contrast, either allow asylum claimants to work while their claims are pending or provide welfare. Id.

viii. Sanctioning Frivolous Applications

Earlier, you saw that attorneys and accredited representatives who engage in “frivolous behavior” in various immigration settings are subject to a range of disciplinary sanctions. Since the sanctions specifically govern behavior that takes place in proceedings before immigration judges or the BIA, they are fully applicable to asylum claims.

In addition to potential sanctions on the attorneys and representatives, IIRIRA § 604(a) imposed sanctions on the applicants themselves. Under INA § 208(d)(4)(A), the Secretary of Homeland Security must warn every asylum applicant of the consequences of filing a frivolous application for asylum. INA § 208(d)(6) then renders any noncitizen who “has knowingly made a frivolous application for asylum” and who has received the required notice “permanently ineligible for any benefits” under the INA. That sanction requires a specific finding of frivolousness by an immigration judge or the BIA. 8 CFR § 208.20 (2008).

Given the serious consequences of a frivolousness determination, the Second Circuit ordered the BIA to develop standards to guide those determinations. Yuanliang Liu v. United States Dept. of Justice, 455 F.3d 106 (2d Cir. 2006). On remand, the Board affirmed the statutory requirement that the applicant be notified of the consequences of knowingly filing a frivolous asylum claim; required that the immigration judge or the Board make an explicit finding of knowing frivolousness; held that, in a case where the finding is based on the applicant's deliberate fabrication of a material element of the claim, the record must contain sufficient evidence of that; and required that the applicant be afforded the chance to explain any discrepancies or implausible assertions. Matter of Y-L-, 24 I. & N. Dec. 151 (BIA 2007). The Board rejected, however, the Second Circuit's suggestion that the seriousness of a frivolousness determination warranted a high standard of proof along the lines of "concrete and conclusive evidence of fabrication." Finding no such requirement in the statute or regulations, the Board ruled that frivolousness need be proven only by a preponderance of the evidence. Id. at 157-159.

ix. Application Fees

Should the government charge an application fee for asylum or withholding of removal, or for permission to work while an asylum claim is pending? At present it does not do so, 8 CFR § 103.7(b) (2008), although there is a fee for renewing or replacing a work authorization, id. § 274a.13(a)(2). The Justice Department in 1994 proposed charging $130 to apply for asylum and another $60 to apply for initial work authorization. 59 Fed.Reg. 14779, 14781, 14784 (Dec. 5, 1994). The former INS promoted the proposal mainly as a revenue measure and as an equitable "user-pays" device, 59 Fed.Reg. at 14781, but the proposal is included in the present discussion because its purpose and its effect could also be to discourage the filing of baseless asylum claims.

Commenters raised vigorous objections, both philosophical and practical. One practical obstacle proved fatal. The Department recognized that many genuine refugees would be unable to afford the proposed filing fees. It would therefore be necessary to waive the fees for indigent applicants. But indigence would have to be proved, and proof requires procedure. Since the stated purpose of the proposed application fees was to raise revenue, an expensive new system just to adjudicate requests for fee waivers would have been self-defeating. Consequently, the proposal was dropped. 59 Fed.Reg. at 62286-87, 62291 (Dec. 5, 1994). In IIRIRA § 604(a), Congress added a new INA § 208(d)(3) expressly authorizing the Attorney General (now the Secretary of Homeland Security) to charge filing fees for asylum and certain related applications, but at this writing the government has shown no interest in resurrecting the fee proposal. See 62 Fed.Reg. 444, 448 (Jan. 3, 1997).

x. Preinspection

Normally, the inspection of a noncitizen who seeks admission to the United States takes place at an authorized U.S. port of entry. For many years, however, the former INS—sometimes in conjunction with the former Customs Service—operated inspections stations at foreign airports. That practice continues; today, there are “pre-flight inspection” stations in 12 airports in Canada, the Bahamas, Bermuda, Aruba, and Ireland, as well as seaports in Vancouver and Victoria, Canada. 69 Fed. Reg. 51695 (Aug. 20, 2004). The idea is that passengers can be inspected before they make journeys to the United States, and, if found inadmissible, will not face voyages home. Of course, those travelers also do not have recourse to the adjudicative system available to most other arriving noncitizens—an evidentiary hearing before an immigration judge, appeal to the BIA, and a right of judicial review. INA § 235A requires the establishment of additional pre-inspection stations in foreign airports. They must be located in countries that observe the 1951 Convention or the 1967 Protocol. INA § 235A(a)(5)(C).

Many concerns have been expressed. They include the difficulties of successful negotiation with the host countries, the financial costs, the practical problems for returning residents who lose their green cards, and the fear that asylum claimants will be too casually screened out and unable to secure review. 73 IR at 1533–34 (Nov. 4, 1996).

xi. Visas and Carrier Sanctions

The combination of two other devices operates as a practical bar to the asylum system for many potential applicants. Under United States law, like that of most other major asylum countries, asylum requires that the person be “physically present in the United States” or arriving at a port of entry. INA § 208(a)(1). If the person cannot get to the port of entry, asylum is impossible.

A noncitizen normally requires a visa to gain admission to the United States. INA § 212(a)(7)(A)(i)(I). And commercial carriers are subject to heavy fines when they transport noncitizens to ports of entry without the required visas. INA § 273. For that reason, airlines and shipping lines will not board passengers who lack required visas. If the person is a refugee, the practical consequence is that he or she never gets the chance even to apply for asylum unless a false document convincing enough to fool the carrier can be procured.

xii. Interdiction of Vessels on the High Seas

One last device for preventing potential asylum claimants from gaining access to the asylum adjudication system requires a more extended discussion. The modern phenomenon of “boat-people” has been met, by some nations, with a strategy known as “interdiction,” or “pushbacks.” The intended asylum nation intercepts vessels suspected of carrying would-be entrants and either turns the vessels away before they reach the nation’s shores or destroys the vessels and returns the passengers to their home countries.¹¹³

The most massive of the early pushback operations took place in Southeast Asia, see generally U.S. Comm. for Refugees, 11 Refugee Reports No. 5 at 1-8 (May 18, 1990), but boat-people from Haiti began fleeing ruthless regimes in significant numbers in the 1970's and have generally been interdicted by the United States, as discussed below. There have also been intermittent interceptions of Albanian boat people by Italian authorities, as well as highly controversial and longstanding interdictions of all suspected refugee vessels by Australia, see, e.g., Mary Crock & Ben Saul, Future Seekers—Refugees and the Law in Australia (2002); Penelope Mathew, Address—Legal Issues Concerning Interdiction, 17 Georgetown Immigration L.J. 221 (2003). Recently the U.S. has been intercepting vessels off the coast of Ecuador and asserting the U.S. right to board and destroy vessels on the High Seas anywhere in the world. See Bruce Finley, U.S. Takes Border War on the Road, Denver Post (Dec. 19, 2004), p. A-01.

The initial response of the United States to the Haitian exodus was the Haitian Migrant Interdiction Program, designed to head off the Haitians before they could reach United States territory and acquire the right to formal hearings on their asylum claims. The history and mechanics of the program, as well as the problems with it, are well described in a detailed study by the Lawyers Committee for Human Rights, Refugee Refoulement: The Forced Return of Haitians Under the U.S.-Haitian Interdiction Agreement (Feb.1990). The following, which draws heavily on the Lawyers Committee report, summarizes the program and its results (with editorial commentary):

During his first year in office, President Reagan, concerned about these numbers, entered into a co-operative agreement with the government of Haiti. The agreement authorized United States officials to board Haitian flag vessels on the high seas and to question the crew and passengers about "the registry, condition and destination of the vessel, and the status of those on board the vessel." If as a result of that questioning the U.S. officials find that a violation of either U.S. or Haitian law "has been or is being committed," then the U.S. officials are authorized to return the vessel to Haiti. At the same time, however, the United States pledged not to return to Haiti any migrant who is found to qualify as a refugee. To this end, the official INS programme guidelines provide:

"If the interview suggests that a legitimate claim to refugee status exists, the person involved shall be removed from the

113. See generally Joanne van Selm & Betsy Cooper, Migration Policy Institute, The New "Boat People"—Ensuring Safety and Determining Status (Jan. 2006). An estimated 4,000 boat people drown at sea each year, approximately half of them in the Mediterranean while crossing from northern Africa to southern Europe. See Owen Bowcott, 4000 Refugees Believed Drowned at Sea Every Year, The Guardian (Oct. 9, 2004).

interdicted vessel, and his or her passage to the United States shall be arranged.”

To implement the co-operative agreement, United States Coast Guard cutters with INS officials on board patrol the Windward Passage, the body of water that separates Haiti from Cuba and through which most ocean travel from Haiti to the United States customarily passes. In the event the Haitian vessel escapes through the Windward Passage undetected, another United States Coast Guard cutter patrols the coast of Miami. These naval operations are reinforced by aerial surveillance. If an aircraft picks up what looks like a suspicious vessel, it transmits the information to a central command centre, which in turn relays the information to the nearest Coast Guard cutter. The cutter then intercepts the vessel, and INS officials on board the cutter supervise the transfer of the passengers and crew from the Haitian vessel to the Coast Guard cutter, where the interviews take place. Although the INS programme guidelines require that the interviews be conducted out of the hearing of others, the interviews in fact are frequently held within eyesight, and sometimes (according to the Haitians) within hearing, of other passengers.

* * *

The reality is that it is almost unheard of for a Haitian who has been intercepted on the high seas ultimately to receive asylum in the United States. The Lawyers Committee Report compiled telling statistics. From the inception of the programme in 1981 until the time of the report (February 1990), the United States interdicted 364 vessels on the high seas and returned more than 21,000 Haitians. Out of that total, six Haitians were transported to the United States to apply for asylum.

The government takes great pride in those figures. It sees the high number of apprehensions as evidence that the interdiction programme is working. It points out that, but for this programme, up to 21,000 additional Haitians might have entered United States territory illegally. As for the low success rate on the asylum claims, the government sees this as confirmation of its long-held view that aliens fleeing Haiti are almost invariably economic migrants rather than political refugees.

I am unable to share the government's pride in those statistics. Respected human rights organizations have consistently documented the high incidence of grotesque human rights violations in Haiti. Given those reports, one can be forgiven for asking whether the low success rate has less to do with the merits of the claims than with the adequacy of the procedures.¹¹⁴

114. Stephen H. Legomsky, The Haitian Interdiction Programme, Human Rights, and the Role of Judicial Protection, Int'l J. Refugee L. at 182-83 (special ed.1990); see

Some positive developments for the Haitian boat people were to follow. After the election of President Jean-Bertrand Aristide in December 1990, the number of Haitians fleeing the country dropped off dramatically. Miami Herald, March 20, 1991, at 1A. The Haitians anticipated substantial political reform. That emigration dropped off so suddenly without a corresponding change in the poverty levels vindicated the long held view of refugee advocates that large numbers of Haitians had been leaving out of genuine fear of political persecution rather than for purely economic reasons.¹¹⁵

As the following case reveals, however, the Haitians' troubles were just beginning and the full implications of interdiction as a core element of United States refugee policy were just emerging:

Sale v. Haitian Centers Council

Supreme Court of the United States, 1993.
509 U.S. 155, 113 S.Ct. 2549, 125 L.Ed.2d 128.

■ JUSTICE STEVENS delivered the opinion of the Court.

The President has directed the Coast Guard to intercept vessels illegally transporting passengers from Haiti to the United States and to return those passengers to Haiti without first determining whether they may qualify as refugees. The question presented in this case is whether such forced repatriation, "authorized to be undertaken only beyond the territorial sea of the United States," violates § 243(h)(1) [now 241(b)(3)—Eds.] of the Immigration and Nationality Act of 1952 (INA or Act). We hold that neither § 243(h) nor Article 33 of the United Nations Protocol Relating to the Status of Refugees applies to action taken by the Coast Guard on the high seas.

I

* * * The INA offers [asylum and withholding of removal] only to aliens who reside in or have arrived at the border of the United States. For 12 years, in one form or another, the interdiction program challenged here has prevented Haitians such as respondents from reaching our shores and invoking those protections.

On September 23, 1981, the United States and the Republic of Haiti entered into an agreement authorizing the United States Coast Guard to intercept vessels engaged in the illegal transportation of undocumented aliens to our shores. While the parties agreed to prosecute "illegal traffickalso Lory Diana Rosenberg, The Courts and Interception: The United States' Interdiction Experience and Its Impact on Refugees and Asylum Seekers, 17 Georgetown Immigration L.J. 199 (2003).

115. Id.; see also Kathleen Newland, The Impact of U.S. Refugee Policies on U.S.

Foreign Policy: A Case of the Tail Wagging the Dog?, in Michael S. Teitelbaum & Myron Weiner (eds.), Threatened Peoples, Threatened Borders, ch. 5, at 199 (1995) (boat traffic dropped suddenly upon election of Aristide and then soared immediately upon his overthrow).

ers," the Haitian Government also guaranteed that its repatriated citizens would not be punished for their illegal departure. The agreement also established that the United States Government would not return any passengers "whom the United States authorities determined to qualify for refugee status."

On September 29, 1981, President Reagan * * * suspended the entry of undocumented aliens from the high seas and ordered the Coast Guard to intercept vessels carrying such aliens and to return them to their point of origin. His executive order expressly "provided, however, that no person who is a refugee will be returned without his consent."

In the ensuing decade, the Coast Guard interdicted approximately 25,000 Haitian migrants. After interviews conducted on board Coast Guard cutters, aliens who were identified as economic migrants were "screened out" and promptly repatriated. Those who made a credible showing of political refugee status were "screened in" and transported to the United States to file formal applications for asylum.

On September 30, 1991, a group of military leaders displaced the government of Jean Bertrand Aristide, the first democratically elected president in Haitian history. As the District Court stated in an uncontested finding of fact, since the military coup "hundreds of Haitians have been killed, tortured, detained without a warrant, or subjected to violence and the destruction of their property because of their political beliefs. Thousands have been forced into hiding." Following the coup the Coast Guard suspended repatriations for a period of several weeks, and the United States imposed economic sanctions on Haiti.

On November 18, 1991, the Coast Guard announced that it would resume the program of interdiction and forced repatriation. * * *

In the meantime the Haitian exodus expanded dramatically. During the six months after October 1991, the Coast Guard interdicted over 34,000 Haitians. Because so many interdicted Haitians could not be safely processed on Coast Guard cutters, the Department of Defense established temporary facilities at the United States Naval Base in Guantanamo, Cuba, to accommodate them during the screening process. Those temporary facilities, however, had a capacity of only about 12,500 persons. In the first three weeks of May 1992, the Coast Guard intercepted 127 vessels (many of which were considered unseaworthy, overcrowded, and unsafe); those vessels carried 10,497 undocumented aliens. On May 22, 1992, the United States Navy determined that no additional migrants could safely be accommodated at Guantanamo.

With both the facilities at Guantanamo and available Coast Guard cutters saturated, and with the number of Haitian emigrants in unseaworthy craft increasing (many had drowned as they attempted the trip to Florida), the Government could no longer both protect our borders and offer the Haitians even a modified screening process. It had to choose between allowing Haitians into the United States for the screening process or repatriating them without giving them any opportunity to establish their qualifications as refugees. In the judgment of the President's advisors, the first choice not only would have defeated the original purpose of the program (controlling illegal immigration), but also would have impeded diplomatic efforts to restore democratic government in Haiti and would have posed a life-threatening danger to thousands of persons embarking on long voyages in dangerous craft. The second choice would have advanced those policies but deprived the fleeing Haitians of any screening process at a time when a significant minority of them were being screened in.

On May 23, 1992, President Bush adopted the second choice. After assuming office, President Clinton decided not to modify that order; it remains in effect today. The wisdom of the policy choices made by Presidents Reagan, Bush, and Clinton is not a matter for our consideration. We must decide only whether Executive Order No. 12807, which reflects and implements those choices, is consistent with § 243(h) of the INA.

II

Respondents filed this lawsuit * * * before the promulgation of Executive Order No. 12807. The plaintiffs include organizations that represent interdicted Haitians as well as Haitians who were then being detained at Guantanamo. They sued the Commissioner of the Immigration and Naturalization Service, the Attorney General, the Secretary of State, the Commandant of the Coast Guard, and the Commander of the Guantanamo Naval Base, complaining that the screening procedures provided on Coast Guard cutters and at Guantanamo did not adequately protect their statutory and treaty rights to apply for refugee status and avoid repatriation to Haiti.

They alleged that the September 1991 coup had "triggered a continuing widely publicized reign of terror in Haiti"; that over 1,500 Haitians were believed to "have been killed or subjected to violence and destruction of their property because of their political beliefs and affiliations"; and that thousands of Haitian refugees "have set out in small boats that are often overloaded, unseaworthy, lacking basic safety equipment, and operated by inexperienced persons, braving the hazards of a prolonged journey over high seas in search of safety and freedom."

In April, the District Court granted the plaintiffs a preliminary injunction requiring defendants to give Haitians on Guantanamo access to counsel for the screening process. We stayed that order on April 22, 1992, and, while the defendants' appeal from it was pending, the President issued the Executive Order now under attack. Plaintiffs then applied for a temporary restraining order to enjoin implementation of the Executive Order. They contended that it violated § 243(h) of the Act and Article 33 of the United Nations Protocol Relating to the Status of Refugees. The District Court denied the application because it concluded that § 243(h) is "unavailable as a source of relief for Haitian aliens in international waters," and that such a statutory provision was necessary because the Protocol's provisions are not "self-executing."

The Court of Appeals reversed. * * * [T]he Court held that § 243(h)(1) does not apply only to aliens within the United States. * * *

* * *

The Second Circuit's decision conflicted with the Eleventh Circuit's decision in Haitian Refugee Center v. Baker, 953 F.2d 1498 (1992). * * * Because of the manifest importance of the issue, we granted certiorari.

III

Both parties argue that the plain language of § 243(h)(1) is dispositive. It reads as follows:

“The Attorney General shall not deport or return any alien * * * to a country if the Attorney General determines that such alien's life or freedom would be threatened in such country on account of race, religion, nationality, membership in a particular social group, or political opinion.”¹¹⁶

Respondents emphasize the words “any alien” and “return”; neither term is limited to aliens within the United States. Respondents also contend that the 1980 amendment deleting the words “within the United States” from the prior text of § 243(h) obviously gave the statute an extraterritorial effect. This change, they further argue, was required in order to conform the statute to the text of Article 33.1 of the Convention, which they find as unambiguous as the present statutory text. Petitioners' response is that a fair reading of the INA as a whole demonstrates that § 243(h) does not apply to actions taken by the President or Coast Guard outside the United States; that the legislative history of the 1980 amendment supports their reading; and that both the text and the negotiating history of Article 33 of the Convention indicate that it was not intended to have any extraterritorial effect.

* * *

A. The Text and Structure of the INA

Although § 243(h)(1) refers only to the Attorney General, the Court of Appeals found it “difficult to believe that the proscription of § 243(h)(1)—returning an alien to his persecutors—was forbidden if done by the Attorney General but permitted if done by some other arm of the executive branch.” Congress “understood” that the Attorney General is the “President's agent for dealing with immigration matters,” and would intend any reference to her to restrict similar actions of any government official. As evidence of this understanding, the court cited 8 USC § 1103(a). That section, however, conveys to us a different message. It provides, in part:

“The Attorney General shall be charged with the administration and enforcement of this chapter and all other laws relating to the immigration

116. IIRIRA modified that wording. See this case.—Eds. item 12 in the Notes and Questions following and naturalization of aliens, except insofar as this chapter or such laws relate to the powers, functions, and duties conferred upon the President, the Secretary of State, the officers of the Department of State, or diplomatic or consular officers . . ." (Emphasis added) [by the Court].

Other provisions of the Act expressly confer certain responsibilities on the Secretary of State, the President, and, indeed, on certain other officers as well. The 1981 and 1992 Executive Orders expressly relied on statutory provisions that confer authority on the President to suspend the entry of "any class of aliens" or to "impose on the entry of aliens any restrictions he may deem to be appropriate." We cannot say that the interdiction program created by the President, which the Coast Guard was ordered to enforce, usurped authority that Congress had delegated to, or implicated responsibilities that it had imposed on, the Attorney General alone.

The reference to the Attorney General in the statutory text is significant not only because that term cannot reasonably be construed to describe either the President or the Coast Guard, but also because it suggests that it applies only to the Attorney General's normal responsibilities under the INA. The most relevant of those responsibilities for our purposes are her conduct of the deportation and exclusion hearings in which requests for asylum or for withholding of deportation under § 243(h) are ordinarily advanced. Since there is no provision in the statute for the conduct of such proceedings outside the United States, and since Part V and other provisions of the INA obviously contemplate that such proceedings would be held in the country, we cannot reasonably construe § 243(h) to limit the Attorney General's actions in geographic areas where she has not been authorized to conduct such proceedings. Part V of the INA contains no reference to a possible extraterritorial application.

Even if Part V of the Act were not limited to strictly domestic procedures, the presumption that Acts of Congress do not ordinarily apply outside our borders would support an interpretation of § 243(h) as applying only within United States territory. * * * The Court of Appeals held that the presumption against extraterritoriality had "no relevance in the present context" because there was no risk that § 243(h), which can be enforced only in United States courts against the United States Attorney General, would conflict with the laws of other nations. We have recently held, however, that the presumption has a foundation broader than the desire to avoid conflict with the laws of other nations. Smith v. United States, 113 S.Ct. 1178, 1183 (1993).

Respondents' expansive interpretation of the word "return" raises another problem: it would make the word "deport" redundant. If "return" referred solely to the destination to which the alien is to be removed, it alone would have been sufficient to encompass aliens involved in both deportation and exclusion proceedings. And if Congress had meant to refer to all aliens who might be sent back to potential oppressors, regardless of their location, the word "deport" would have been unnecessary. By using both words, the statute implies an exclusively territorial application, in the context of both kinds of domestic immigration proceedings. The use of both words reflects the traditional division between the two kinds of aliens and the two kinds of hearings. We can reasonably conclude that Congress used the two words “deport or return” only to make § 243(h)’s protection available in both deportation and exclusion proceedings. Indeed, the history of the 1980 amendment confirms that conclusion.

B. The History of the Refugee Act of 1980

As enacted in 1952, § 243(h) authorized the Attorney General to withhold deportation of aliens “within the United States.” Six years later we considered the question whether it applied to an alien who had been paroled into the country while her admissibility was being determined. We held that even though she was physically present within our borders, she was not “within the United States” as those words were used in § 243(h). Leng May Ma v. Barber, 357 U.S. 185, 186 (1958). We explained the important distinction between “deportation” or “expulsion,” on the one hand, and “exclusion,” on the other.

* * *

Under the INA, both then and now, those seeking “admission” and trying to avoid “exclusion” were already within our territory (or at its border), but the law treated them as though they had never entered the United States at all; they were within United States territory but not “within the United States.” Those who had been admitted (or found their way in) but sought to avoid “expulsion” had the added benefit of “deportation proceedings”; they were both within United States territory and “within the United States.” Although the phrase “within the United States” presumed the alien’s actual presence in the United States, it had more to do with an alien’s legal status than with his location.

The 1980 amendment erased the long-maintained distinction between deportable and excludable aliens for purposes of § 243(h). By adding the word “return” and removing the words “within the United States” from § 243(h), Congress extended the statute’s protection to both types of aliens, but it did nothing to change the presumption that both types of aliens would continue to be found only within United States territory. The removal of the phrase “within the United States” cured the most obvious drawback of § 243(h): as interpreted in Leng May Ma, its protection was available only to aliens subject to deportation proceedings.

Of course, in addition to this most obvious purpose, it is possible that the 1980 amendment also removed any territorial limitation of the statute, and Congress might have intended a double-barreled result. That possibility, however, is not a substitute for the affirmative evidence of intended extraterritorial application that our cases require. * * *

The addition of the phrase “or return” and the deletion of the phrase “within the United States” are the only relevant changes made by the 1980 amendment to § 243(h)(1), and they are fully explained by the intent to apply § 243(h) to exclusion as well as to deportation proceedings. That intent is plainly identified in the legislative history of the amendment.

* * *

In sum, all available evidence about the meaning of § 243(h)—the government official at whom it is directed, its location in the Act, its failure to suggest any extraterritorial application, the 1980 amendment that gave it a dual reference to “deport or return,” and the relevance of that dual structure to immigration law in general—leads unerringly to the conclusion that it applies in only one context: the domestic procedures by which the Attorney General determines whether deportable and excludable aliens may remain in the United States.

IV

* * * [B]ecause the history of the 1980 Act does disclose a general intent to conform our law to Article 33 of the Convention, it might be argued that the extraterritorial obligations imposed by Article 33 were so clear that Congress, in acceding to the Protocol, and then in amending the statute to harmonize the two, meant to give the latter a correspondingly extraterritorial effect. Or, just as the statute might have imposed an extraterritorial obligation that the Convention does not (the argument we have just rejected), the Convention might have established an extraterritorial obligation which the statute does not; under the Supremacy Clause, that broader treaty obligation might then provide the controlling rule of law. With those possibilities in mind we shall consider both the text and negotiating history of the Convention itself.

Like the text and the history of § 243(h), the text and negotiating history of Article 33 of the United Nations Convention are both completely silent with respect to the Article’s possible application to actions taken by a country outside its own borders. Respondents argue that the Protocol’s broad remedial goals require that a nation be prevented from repatriating refugees to their potential oppressors whether or not the refugees are within that nation’s borders. In spite of the moral weight of that argument, both the text and negotiating history of Article 33 affirmatively indicate that it was not intended to have extraterritorial effect.

A. The Text of the Convention

* * *

The full text of Article 33 reads as follows:

“Article 33.—Prohibition of expulsion or return (‘refoulement’)

“1. No Contracting State shall expel or return (‘refouler’) a refugee in any manner whatsoever to the frontiers of territories where his life or freedom would be threatened on account of his race, religion, nationality, membership of a particular social group or political opinion.

“2. The benefit of the present provision may not, however, be claimed by a refugee whom there are reasonable grounds for regarding as a danger to the security of the country in which he is, or who, having been convicted by a final judgment of a particularly serious crime, constitutes a danger to the community of that country.” Convention Relating to the Status of Refugees, July 28, 1951 [emphasis added by the Court].

Under the second paragraph of Article 33 an alien may not claim the benefit of the first paragraph if he poses a danger to the country in which he is located. If the first paragraph did apply on the high seas, no nation could invoke the second paragraph’s exception with respect to an alien there: an alien intercepted on the high seas is in no country at all. If Article 33.1 applied extraterritorially, therefore, Article 33.2 would create an absurd anomaly: dangerous aliens on the high seas would be entitled to the benefits of 33.1 while those residing in the country that sought to expel them would not. It is more reasonable to assume that the coverage of 33.2 was limited to those already in the country because it was understood that 33.1 obligated the signatory state only with respect to aliens within its territory.

Article 33.1 uses the words “expel or return (‘refouler’)” as an obvious parallel to the words “deport or return” in § 243(h)(1). There is no dispute that “expel” has the same meaning as “deport”; it refers to the deportation or expulsion of an alien who is already present in the host country. The dual reference identified and explained in our opinion in Leng May Ma v. Barber, suggests that the term “return (‘refouler’)” refers to the exclusion of aliens who are merely “on the threshold of initial entry.”

This suggestion—that “return” has a legal meaning narrower than its common meaning—is reinforced by the parenthetical reference to “refouler”, a French word that is not an exact synonym for the English word “return.” Indeed, neither of two respected English–French Dictionaries mentions “refouler” as one of many possible French translations of “return.”¹¹⁷ Conversely, the English translations of “refouler” do not include the word “return.” They do, however, include words like “repulse,” “repel,” “drive back,” and even “expel.” To the extent that they are relevant, these translations imply that “return” means a defensive act of resistance or exclusion at a border rather than an act of transporting someone to a particular destination. In the context of the Convention, to “return” means to “repulse” rather than to “reinstate.”

* * *

The drafters of the Convention and the parties to the Protocol—like the drafters of § 243(h)—may not have contemplated that any nation would gather fleeing refugees and return them to the one country they had desperately sought to escape; such actions may even violate the spirit of Article 33; but a treaty cannot impose unanticipated extraterritorial

117. [Footnote 37 in original] The New Cassell’s French Dictionary 440 (1973), gives this translation: “return (I) v.i. Revenir (to come back); retourner (to go back); rentrer (to come in again); répondre, répliquer (to answer). To return to the subject, revenir au sujet, (fam.) revenir ses moutons.—v.t. Rendre (to give back); renvoyer (to send back); rembourser (to repay); * * *

Although there are additional translations in the Larousse Modern French–English Dictionary 545 (1978), “refouler” is not among them.

obligations on those who ratify it through no more than its general humanitarian intent. Because the text of Article 33 cannot reasonably be read to say anything at all about a nation's actions toward aliens outside its own territory, it does not prohibit such actions.

B. The Negotiating History of the Convention

In early drafts of the Convention, what finally emerged as Article 33 was numbered 28. At a negotiating conference of plenipotentiaries held in Geneva, Switzerland on July 11, 1951, the Swiss delegate explained his understanding that the words "expel" and "return" covered only refugees who had entered the host country. He stated:

"Mr. ZUTTER (Switzerland) said that the Swiss Federal Government saw no reason why article 28 should not be adopted as it stood; for the article was a necessary one. He thought, however, that its wording left room for various interpretations, particularly as to the meaning to be attached to the words 'expel' and 'return'. In the Swiss Government's view, the term "expulsion" applied to a refugee who had already been admitted to the territory of a country. The term 'refoulement', on the other hand, had a vaguer meaning; it could not, however, be applied to a refugee who had not yet entered the territory of a country. The word 'return', used in the English text, gave that idea exactly. Yet article 28 implied the existence of two categories of refugee: refugees who were liable to be expelled, and those who were liable to be returned. In any case, the States represented at the Conference should take a definite position with regard to the meaning to be attached to the word 'return'. The Swiss Government considered that in the present instance the word applied solely to refugees who had already entered a country, but were not yet resident there. According to that interpretation, States were not compelled to allow large groups of persons claiming refugee status to cross its frontiers. He would be glad to know whether the States represented at the Conference accepted his interpretations of the two terms in question. If they did, Switzerland would be willing to accept article 28, which was one of the articles in respect of which States could not, under article 36 of the draft Convention, enter a reservation." [Emphases added by the Court].

No one expressed disagreement with the position of the Swiss delegate on that day or at the session two weeks later when Article 28 was again discussed. At that session, the delegate of the Netherlands recalled the Swiss delegate's earlier position:

"Baron van BOETZELAER (Netherlands) recalled that at the first reading the Swiss representative had expressed the opinion that the word 'expulsion' related to a refugee already admitted into a country, whereas the word 'return' ('refoulement') related to a refugee already within the territory but not yet resident there. According to that interpretation, article 28 would not have involved any obligations in the possible case of mass migrations across frontiers or of attempted mass migrations.

"He wished to revert to that point, because the Netherlands Government attached very great importance to the scope of the provision now contained in article 33. The Netherlands could not accept any legal obligations in respect of large groups of refugees seeking access to its territory.

“At the first reading the representatives of Belgium, the Federal Republic of Germany, Italy, the Netherlands and Sweden had supported the Swiss interpretation. From conversations he had since had with other representatives, he had gathered that the general consensus of opinion was in favour of the Swiss interpretation.

* * *

“There being no objection, the PRESIDENT ruled that the interpretation given by the Netherlands representative should be placed on record.”

* * *

Although the significance of the President’s comment that the remarks should be “placed on record” is not entirely clear, this much cannot be denied: at one time there was a “general consensus,” and in July of 1951 several delegates understood the right of non-refoulement to apply only to aliens physically present in the host country. * * *

* * * The negotiating history, which suggests that the Convention’s limited reach resulted from a deliberate bargain, is not dispositive, but it solidly supports our reluctance to interpret Article 33 to impose obligations on the contracting parties that are broader than the text commands. We do not read that text to apply to aliens interdicted on the high seas.

* * *

The judgment of the Court of Appeals is reversed.

* * *

■ JUSTICE BLACKMUN, dissenting.

When, in 1968, the United States acceded to the United Nations Protocol Relating to the Status of Refugees, it pledged not to “return (refouler) a refugee in any manner whatsoever” to a place where he would face political persecution. In 1980, Congress amended our immigration law to reflect the Protocol’s directives. Today’s majority nevertheless decides that the forced repatriation of the Haitian refugees is perfectly legal, because the word “return” does not mean return, because the opposite of “within the United States” is not outside the United States, and because the official charged with controlling immigration has no role in enforcing an order to control immigration.

I believe that the duty of withholding of removal expressed in both the Protocol and the statute is clear. The majority finds it “extraordinary” that Congress would have intended the ban on returning “any alien” to apply to aliens at sea. That Congress would have meant what it said is not remarkable. What is extraordinary in this case is that the Executive, in disregard of the law, would take to the seas to intercept fleeing refugees and force them back to their persecutors—and that the Court would strain to sanction that conduct.

I

I begin with the Convention, for it is undisputed that the Refugee Act of 1980 was passed to conform our law to Article 33, and that "the nondiscretionary duty imposed by § 243(h) parallels the United States' mandatory nonrefoulement obligations under Article 33.1. . . ." * * *

A

Article 33.1 of the Convention states categorically and without geographical limitation:

"No Contracting State shall expel or return (refouler) a refugee in any manner whatsoever to the frontiers of territories where his life or freedom would be threatened on account of his race, religion, nationality, membership of a particular social group or political opinion."

The terms are unambiguous. Vulnerable refugees shall not be returned. The language is clear, and the command is straightforward; that should be the end of the inquiry. Indeed, until litigation ensued, the Government consistently acknowledged that the Convention applied on the high seas.

The majority, however, has difficulty with the Treaty's use of the term "return (refouler)." "Return," it claims, does not mean return, but instead has a distinctive legal meaning. For this proposition the Court relies almost entirely on the fact that American law makes a general distinction between deportation and exclusion. Without explanation, the majority asserts that in light of this distinction the word "return" as used in the Treaty somehow must refer only to "the exclusion of aliens who are . . . 'on the threshold of initial entry'".

Setting aside for the moment the fact that respondents in this case seem very much "on the threshold of initial entry"—at least in the eyes of the Government that has ordered them seized for "attempting to come to the United States by sea without necessary documentation"—I find this tortured reading unsupported and unnecessary. The text of the Convention does not ban the "exclusion" of aliens who have reached some indeterminate "threshold"; it bans their "return." It is well settled that a treaty must first be construed according to its "ordinary meaning." Article 31.1 of the Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties. The ordinary meaning of "return" is "to bring, send, or put (a person or thing) back to or in a former position." Webster's Third New International Dictionary 1941 (1986). That describes precisely what petitioners are doing to the Haitians. By dispensing with ordinary meaning at the outset, and by taking instead as its starting point the assumption that "return," as used in the Treaty, "has a legal meaning narrower than its common meaning," the majority leads itself astray.

The straightforward interpretation of the duty of withholding of removal is strongly reinforced by the Convention's use of the French term "refouler." The ordinary meaning of "refouler," as the majority concedes, is "[t]o repulse, . . . ; to drive back, to repel." Thus construed, Article 33.1 of the Convention reads: "No contracting state shall expel or [repulse, drive back, or repel] a refugee in any manner whatsoever to the frontiers of territories where his life or freedom would be threatened. . . ." That, of course, is exactly what the Government is doing. It thus is no surprise that when the French press has described the very policy challenged here, the term it has used is "refouler." See, e.g., Le boubier hatien, Le Monde, May 31–June 1, 1992 ("[L]es États-Unis ont décidé de refouler directement les réfugiés recueillis par la garde cotière." (The United States has decided [de refouler] directly the refugees picked up by the Coast Guard)).

And yet the majority insists that what has occurred is not, in fact, "refoulement." It reaches this conclusion in a peculiar fashion. After acknowledging that the ordinary meaning of "refouler" is "repulse," "repel," and "drive back," the majority without elaboration declares: "To the extent that they are relevant, these translations imply that 'return' means a defensive act of resistance or exclusion at a border. . . ." I am at a loss to find the narrow notion of "exclusion at a border" in broad terms like "repulse," "repel," and "drive back." Gage was repulsed (initially) at Bunker Hill. Lee was repelled at Gettysburg. Rommel was driven back across North Africa. The majority's puzzling progression ("refouler" means repel or drive back; therefore "return" means only exclude at a border; therefore the treaty does not apply) hardly justifies a departure from the path of ordinary meaning. The text of Article 33.1 is clear, and whether the operative term is "return" or "refouler," it prohibits the Government's actions.

Article 33.1 is clear not only in what it says, but also in what it does not say: it does not include any geographical limitation. It limits only where a refugee may be sent "to", not where he may be sent from. This is not surprising, given that the aim of the provision is to protect refugees against persecution.

Article 33.2, by contrast, does contain a geographical reference, and the majority seizes upon this as evidence that the section as a whole applies only within a signatory's borders. That inference is flawed. Article 33.2 states that the benefit of Article 33.1 "may not . . . be claimed by a refugee whom there are reasonable grounds for regarding as a danger to the security of the country in which he is, or who, having been convicted by a final judgment of a particularly serious crime, constitutes a danger to the community of that country."

The signatories' understandable decision to allow nations to deport criminal aliens who have entered their territory hardly suggests an intent to permit the apprehension and return of noncriminal aliens who have not entered their territory, and who may have no desire ever to enter it. One wonders what the majority would make of an exception that removed from the Article's protection all refugees who "constitute a danger to their families." By the majority's logic, the inclusion of such an exception presumably would render Article 33.1 applicable only to refugees with families.

* * *

B

The majority further relies on a remark by Baron van Boetzelaer, the Netherlands' delegate at the Convention's negotiating conference, to support its contention that Article 33 does not apply extraterritorially. This reliance, for two reasons, is misplaced. First, the isolated statement of a delegate to the Convention cannot alter the plain meaning of the Treaty itself. Second, placed in its proper context, van Boetzelaer's comment does not support the majority's position.

It is axiomatic that a treaty's plain language must control absent "extraordinarily strong contrary evidence." Reliance on a treaty's negotiating history (travaux préparatoires) is a disfavored alternative of last resort, appropriate only where the terms of the document are obscure or lead to "manifestly absurd or unreasonable" results. See Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties, Art. 32. Moreover, even the general rule of treaty construction allowing limited resort to travaux préparatoires "has no application to oral statements made by those engaged in negotiating the treaty which were not embodied in any writing and were not communicated to the government of the negotiator or to its ratifying body." There is no evidence that the comment on which the majority relies was ever communicated to the United States' Government or to the Senate in connection with the ratification of the Convention.

The pitfalls of relying on the negotiating record are underscored by the fact that Baron van Boetzelaer's remarks almost certainly represent, in the words of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees, a mere "parliamentary gesture by a delegate whose views did not prevail upon the negotiating conference as a whole" (emphasis in original). The Baron, like the Swiss delegate whose sentiments he restated, expressed a desire to reserve the right to close borders to large groups of refugees. "According to [the Swiss delegate's] interpretation, States were not compelled to allow large groups of persons claiming refugee status to cross [their] frontiers." * * * Yet no one seriously contends that the Treaty's protections depend on the number of refugees who are fleeing persecution. * * *

There is strong evidence as well that the Conference rejected the right to close land borders where to do so would trap refugees in the persecutors' territory. Indeed, the majority agrees that the Convention does apply to refugees who have reached the border. The majority thus cannot maintain that van Boetzelaer's interpretation prevailed.

That it did not is evidenced by the fact that Baron van Boetzelaer's interpretation was merely "placed on record," unlike formal amendments to the Convention which were "agreed to" or "adopted." It should not be assumed that other delegates agreed with the comment simply because they did not object to their colleague's request to memorialize it, and the majority's statement that "this much cannot be denied: at one time there was a 'general consensus'" is wrong. * * *

In any event, even if van Boetzelaer's statement had been "agreed to" as reflecting the dominant view, this is not a case about the right of a nation to close its borders. This is a case in which a Nation has gone forth to seize aliens who are not at its borders and return them to persecution.¹¹⁸

In sum, the fragments of negotiating history upon which the majority relies are not entitled to deference, were never voted on or adopted, probably represent a minority view, and in any event do not address the issue in this case. It goes without saying, therefore, that they do not provide the “extraordinarily strong contrary evidence” required to overcome the Convention’s plain statement: “No Contracting State shall expel or return (refouler) a refugee in any manner whatsoever to the frontiers of territories where his life or freedom would be threatened”

II

A

Like the Treaty whose dictates it embodies, § 243(h) is unambiguous. * * * “With regard to this very statutory scheme, we have considered ourselves bound to assume that the legislative purpose is expressed by the ordinary meaning of the words used.” Ordinary, but not literal. The statement that “the Attorney General shall not deport or return any alien” obviously does not mean simply that the person who is the Attorney General at the moment is forbidden personally to deport or return any alien, but rather that her agents may not do so. In the present case the Coast Guard without question is acting as the agent of the Attorney General. “The officers of the Coast Guard insofar as they are engaged . . . in enforcing any law of the United States shall . . . be deemed to be acting as agents of the particular executive department . . . charged with the administration of the particular law . . . and . . . be subject to all the rules and regulations promulgated by such Department . . . with respect to the enforcement of that law.” 14 USC § 89(b). The Coast Guard is engaged in enforcing the immigration laws. * * *

* * *

* * * Accordingly, there is no merit to the argument that the concomitant legal restrictions placed on the Attorney General by Congress do not apply with full force in this case.

B

Comparison with the pre-1980 version of § 243(h) confirms that the statute means what it says. Before 1980, § 243(h) provided:

“The Attorney General is authorized to withhold deportation of any alien . . . within the United States to any country in which in his opinion the alien would be subject to persecution on account of race, religion, or

118. [Footnote 8 in original] The majority also cites secondary sources that, it claims, share its reading of the Convention. Not one of these authorities suggests that any signatory nation sought to reserve the right to seize refugees outside its territory and forcibly return them to their persecutors. * * * These sources emphasize instead that nations need not admit refugees or grant them asylum—questions not at issue here. * * *

political opinion and for such period of time as he deems to be necessary for such reason" (emphasis added)[by the Court].

The Refugee Act of 1980 explicitly amended this provision in three critical respects. Congress (1) deleted the words "within the United States"; (2) barred the Government from "return[ing]," as well as "deport[ing]," alien refugees; and (3) made the prohibition against return mandatory, thereby eliminating the discretion of the Attorney General over such decisions.

The import of these changes is clear. Whether "within the United States" or not, a refugee may not be returned to his persecutors. To read into § 243(h)'s mandate a territorial restriction is to restore the very language that Congress removed. * * * Moreover, as all parties to this case acknowledge, the 1980 changes were made in order to conform our law to the United Nations Protocol. As has been shown above, that Treaty's absolute ban on refoulement is similarly devoid of territorial restrictions.

* * *

The problems with the majority's Leng May Ma theory run deeper, however. * * * The Refugee Act revised the immigration code to establish a comprehensive, tripartite system for the protection of refugees fleeing persecution. Section 207 governs overseas refugee processing. Section 208, in turn, governs asylum claims by aliens "physically present in the United States, or at a land border or entry port." Unlike these sections, however, which explicitly apply to persons present in specific locations, the amended § 243(h) includes no such limiting language. The basic prohibition against forced return to persecution applies simply to "any alien." The design of all three sections is instructive, and it undermines the majority's assertion that § 243(h) was meant to apply only to aliens physically present in the United States or at one of its borders. When Congress wanted a provision to apply only to aliens "physically present in the United States, or at a land border or port of entry," it said so. See § 208(a). * * *

C

That the clarity of the text and the implausibility of its theories do not give the majority more pause is due, I think, to the majority's heavy reliance on the presumption against extraterritoriality. The presumption runs throughout the majority's opinion, and it stacks the deck by requiring the Haitians to produce "affirmative evidence" that when Congress prohibited the return of "any" alien, it indeed meant to prohibit the interception and return of aliens at sea.

The judicially created canon of statutory construction against extraterritorial application of United States law has no role here, however. It applies only where congressional intent is "unexpressed." Here there is no room for doubt: a territorial restriction has been deliberately deleted from the statute.

* * *

In this case we deal with a statute that regulates a distinctively international subject matter: immigration, nationalities, and refugees. Whatever force the presumption may have with regard to a primarily domestic statute evaporates in this context. There is no danger that the Congress that enacted the Refugee Act was blind to the fact that the laws it was crafting had implications beyond this Nation's borders. * * *

* * *

III

The Convention that the Refugee Act embodies was enacted largely in response to the experience of Jewish refugees in Europe during the period of World War II. The tragic consequences of the world's indifference at that time are well known. The resulting ban on refoulement, as broad as the humanitarian purpose that inspired it, is easily applicable here, the Court's protestations of impotence and regret notwithstanding.

The refugees attempting to escape from Haiti do not claim a right of admission to this country. They do not even argue that the Government has no right to intercept their boats. They demand only that the United States, land of refugees and guardian of freedom, cease forcibly driving them back to detention, abuse, and death. That is a modest plea, vindicated by the Treaty and the statute. We should not close our ears to it.

I dissent.

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. What was the original point of the interdiction policy? Why do you think the government didn't simply wait to see who arrived at United States shores and then use the regular asylum system to process any claims that the arriving Haitians filed? Were any other options available?

2. Several commentators have suggested that, from the start, the Haitian interdiction program has been racially motivated.¹¹⁹ Professor Kevin Johnson argues that the general judicial deference to the executive branch in immigration cases might also have signaled President Bush that the courts would uphold his policy. See Kevin R. Johnson, Judicial Acquiescence to the Executive Branch's Pursuit of Foreign Policy and Domestic

119. See, e.g., Joyce A. Hughes & Linda P. Crane, Haitians: Seeking Refuge in the United States, 7 Georgetown Immigration L.J. 747 (1993); Janice D. Villiers, Closed Borders, Closed Ports: The Plight of Haitians Seeking Political Asylum in the United States, 60 Brooklyn L. Rev. 841 (1994). Others see historical parallels in analogous mass movements of refugees to the United States. For a particularly poignant historical comparison, see Peter Margulies, Difference and Dis- trust in Asylum Law: Haitian and Holocaust Refugee Narratives, 6 St. Thomas L.Rev. 135 (1993); see also Michael J. Churgin, Mass Exoduses: The Response of the United States, 30 Internat'l Migration Rev. 310 (1996) (arguing United States has typically acted unilaterally in dealing with mass movements of refugees except in cases where international agreement would facilitate government action).

Agendas in Immigration Matters: The Case of the Haitian Asylum-Seekers, 7 Georgetown Immigration L.J. 1 (1993).

3. As for Haiti, much has happened since Sale. The Clinton Administration first tried to topple the military regime in Haiti through trade and other economic sanctions, but those efforts proved fruitless. In July 1993, on Governors Island in New York, the coup leaders agreed to step aside and allow President Aristide to return to power by October 30. That deadline was not honored, and in the meantime Aristide supporters continued to be rounded up and murdered in Haiti. A United States warship retreated from Haiti in the face of a mob. The United States then led a multinational blockade of Haiti. See Harold Hongju Koh, The "Haiti Paradigm" in United States Human Rights Policy, 103 Yale L.J. 2391, 2397-98 (1994).

In May 1994, President Clinton ended the automatic repatriation policy challenged in Sale. Instead, he announced, the government would interview interdicted Haitians to determine their eligibility for refugee status. In June 1994, Jamaica agreed to allow the United States to bring intercepted Haitians to Kingston Harbor, where they could be interviewed on board the U.S. ships. 71 IR at 743-44 (June 6, 1994). The United Kingdom, which administers the Turks and Caicos Islands just north of Haiti, allowed the asylum processing of the captured Haitians on land. Id. Unlike the preliminary screening previously performed at sea and at Guantánamo, these interviews were determinations on the merits. 71 IR at 885-86 (July 11, 1994). Also unlike the previous shipboard interviews, these were monitored and reviewed by UNHCR, and private agencies were permitted to assist the Haitians. Id. at 886. Initial approval rates were at about 30%. Id.

But a longer-term solution did not come until September 19, 1994, when an international military force led by the United States landed in Haiti to remove the coup leaders and restore President Aristide. See Rick Bragg, Mission to Haiti: The Haitians, New York Times, Sept. 20, 1994, at A-11. The coup leaders chose to leave peacefully, and on October 15, 1994, Aristide returned home and resumed his Presidency. John Kifner, Mission to Haiti: The Homecoming, New York Times, Oct. 16, 1994, at 1. These events were followed by the involuntary repatriation of those Haitians who had been housed at Guantánamo, amidst warnings by many that their safety could not yet be taken for granted. See 72 IR 129 (Jan. 23, 1995).

With the return of President Aristide, boat traffic from Haiti virtually stopped.¹²⁰ An independent expert retained by the UN Commission on Human Rights found that the human rights situation in Haiti had improved dramatically with the return of Aristide, but that significant human rights abuses still existed (mostly by the Haitian police), and that weaknesses in the judicial system persisted.¹²¹

120. See Kathleen Newland, The Impact of U.S. Refugee Policies on U.S. Foreign Policy: A Case of the Tail Wagging the Dog?, ch. 5 in Michael S. Teitelbaum & Myron Weiner (eds.), Threatened Peoples, Threatened Borders at 199 (1995).

121. See Adama Dieng, U.N. ECOSOC Doc. No. E/CN.4/1996/94 (24 Jan. 1996). For NACARA, passed in 1997, addressed some of the immigration problems of designated Central Americans, Soviets, and Eastern Europeans—but not Haitians. See the earlier discussion in chapter 8. Believing Haitians to be equally deserving of special dispensation, President Clinton in January 1998 ordered temporary relief in the form of “deferred enforced departure” for Haitians who had been paroled, or had applied for asylum, before December 1, 1995. See 75 IR 2 (Jan. 5, 1998). The Haitian Refugee Immigration Fairness Act of 1998, Pub. L. 105-277, Div. A, § 101(h), Title IX, 112 Stat. 2681 (Nov. 2, 1998), eventually codified President Clinton’s order.

President Aristide was ousted again in 2004. The United Nations dispatched a “Stabilization Mission” to Haiti to safeguard security, prepare for democratic elections, and protect human rights. A 2005 report, however, paints a discouraging picture of the human rights situation in Haiti and criticizes the UN Stabilization Mission for what the authors regard as a lackluster performance. See Harvard Law Student Advocates for Human Rights & Centro de Justico Global, Keeping the Peace in Haiti? (Mar. 2005).

4. Whether INA § 243(h) [now section 241(b)(3)] was meant to apply outside United States territory is a difficult question of statutory interpretation. First, articulate both parties’ plain meaning arguments.

5. In construing narrowly the limitation on returning refugees, the Supreme Court in Sale relies heavily on a presumption against extraterritorial application of statutory language. With surprising ease, however, and notwithstanding the presumption against extraterritoriality, the Ninth Circuit subsequently held that the statutory enforcement powers of the former INS did apply on the high seas. United States v. Chen, 2 F.3d 330 (9th Cir. 1993) (approving an INS sting operation on the high seas).

What are the rationales for this presumption? Do those rationales apply to interdiction?

6. The key word in Sale is “return.” First, articulate what each of the opposing parties says that word means. Second, explain why the Court believes that the Haitians’ interpretation of “return” would render the word “deport” redundant. As the Haitians’ counsel, how would you respond to that argument? Third, although not discussed in the opinion, all the other INA provisions that you have studied then used the word “exclude” [but see item 12 below] to describe the act of turning away a noncitizen who is physically at a United States port of entry. What argument might the Haitians’ counsel have been able to make on the basis of that observation? What counter-arguments would you expect?

comprehensive descriptions of events and prospects as seen during the mid 1990s, see Irwin P. Stotzky, Silencing the Guns in Haiti (1997); Patrick Costello, Haiti: Prospects for Democracy, 15 Ref. Survey Q. 1 (1996); Carlos Ortiz Miranda, Haiti and the United States During the 1980s and 1990s, Refugees, Immigration, and Foreign Policy, 32 San Diego L.Rev. 673 (1995).

7. How, exactly, is the U.N. Convention legally relevant to the Haitians' arguments? If the Supreme Court had held that article 33 was meant to have extraterritorial reach, what legal consequences would that holding have had in this case?

8. As to the interpretation of article 33, the Court examines several factors. It suggests that, under the Haitians' construction, article 33.2 would lead to anomalous results. Why? How could the Haitians respond?

9. In your contracts course you saw how ambiguous an agreement can be even when both parties speak the same language. When multiple languages are involved, as they are in the typical multilateral convention, the problems are exacerbated. Here, the issue revolves around the English word "return" and the French word "refouler." To solve the problem, the Court dusts off its English-French dictionary. First, what does the Court learn from this dictionary? Second, looking at the list of French words that correspond to the English word "return," which one do you think would most closely have captured the Haitians' interpretation? Third, if your answer to the previous question was not "refouler," how might the Haitians have been able to salvage their interpretation?

10. Consider also the Court's use of the negotiating history of the Convention. First, what lesson does the Court distill from that history? Second, thinking about the geography of Switzerland, do you find the Court's interpretation of the Swiss representative's comments realistic? What point do you think the quoted participants were making?

11. The interdictions that the plaintiffs were challenging in Sale occurred in what were indisputably international waters. The Justice Department's Office of Legal Counsel later took the position that the result would be the same even in United States territorial waters. U.S. Comm. for Refugees, Refugee Reports (Aug. 19, 1994), at 11.

12. IIRIRA § 305(a) amended the withholding of removal provision and renumbered it INA § 241(b)(3). The changes are largely in the nature of housekeeping, to conform the language of the provision to other new terminology that IIRIRA introduced. In particular, Congress changed "deport or return" to "remove," which is the same word that Congress substituted for both "deport" and "exclude" throughout virtually the entire INA. It seems likely, therefore, that the amendment reflected congressional satisfaction with the decision in Sale. Of course, IIRIRA reveals nothing about the intended meaning of article 33, the wording of which has not changed. At any rate, just two years later, Congress in a comprehensive appropriations bill expressly forbade the use of the appropriated funds to effect the involuntary return of any person to a country in which he or she had a well-founded fear of persecution on account of any of the 1951 Convention's protected grounds. Pub. L. 105-277, § 2241(a), 112 Stat. 2681 at 2681-821 (Oct. 21, 1998). Then, several times in 1999, the Coast Guard interdicted Chinese vessels in U.S. territorial waters near the Northern Mariana Islands and forcibly returned the passengers to China. 76 IR 1490 (Oct. 11, 1999).

13. Shortly after the Supreme Court decision in Sale, the Executive Committee of UNHCR issued a statement disagreeing with the decision, based on the language, structure, and purposes of the 1951 Convention. UNHCR strenuously maintains that article 33 of the Convention applies on the High Seas. Its statement chastised the Supreme Court:

UNHCR considers the Court's decision a setback to modern international refugee law which has been developing for more than forty years, since the end of World War II. It renders the work of the Office of the High Commissioner in its global refugee protection role more difficult and sets a very unfortunate example.¹²²

The Inter-American Commission on Human Rights has expressed similar sentiments and has also suggested that the decision in Sale violated the American Declaration of the Rights and Duties of Man. See Louis Henkin, Gerald L. Neuman, Diane F. Orentlicher & David W. Leebron, Human Rights 426 (1999). Some other international law issues related to the interdiction program have also been discussed.¹²³

14. The plaintiffs in Sale received pro bono representation from the Yale Law School's Lowenstein Human Rights Clinic. Under the supervision of Professor Harold Hongju Koh, some 100 law students teamed up to research the case and construct the arguments. Several other distinguished co-counsel chipped in. The lawyers and law students involved have written several articles that furnish fascinating glimpses into the legal strategies, logistical hurdles, emotional impact, and future implications of the experience and the result.¹²⁴ Although the plaintiffs did not prevail in the Sale case, they did enjoy partial success in related litigation, winning the release of about 300 HIV-positive Haitians who had been confined at Guantánamo

122. UN High Commissioner for Refugees Responds to U.S. Supreme Court Decision in Sale v. Haitian Centers Council, 32 I.L.M. 1215 (1993); accord, Daniel J. Steinbock, Interpreting the Refugee Definition, 45 UCLA L. Rev. 733, 755-56 (1998); cf. Andrew I. Schoenholtz, Aiding and Abetting Persecutors: The Seizure and Return of Haitian Refugees in Violation of the U.N. Refugee Convention and Protocol, 7 Georgetown Immigration L.J. 67 (1993) (arguing for the UNHCR position even before the decision in Sale).

123. For an argument that article 33 is self-executing, see Carlos M. Vazquez, The "Self-Executing" Character of the Refugee Protocol's Nonrefoulement Obligation, 7 Georgetown Immigration L.J. 39 (1993). For a discussion of the international law of the sea limitations on interdiction, see Jon L. Jacobson, At-Sea Interception of Alien Migrants: International Law Issues, 28 Williamette L. Rev. 811 (1992); Barbara Miltner, Irregular Maritime Migration: Refugee Protection Issues in Rescue and Interdiction, 30

Fordham Internat'l L.J. 75 (2006). For the view that intercepting refugees on the high seas and returning them to their persecutors might violate both the Torture Convention and the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, see Gerald L. Neuman, Extraterritorial Violations of Human Rights by the United States, in Amer. Univ. J. Internat'l L. & Policy and Loyola L.A. Internat'l & Comp. L.J. (eds.), Immigration Law: International Perspectives on Asylum and Refugee Status at 213 (1994).

124. See, e.g., Harold Hongju Koh, Reflections on Refoulement and Haitian Centers Council, 35 Harvard Internat'l L.J. 1 (1994); Harold Hongju Koh, The "Haiti Paradigm" in United States Human Rights Policy, 103 Yale L.J. 2391 (1994); Harold Hongju Koh, The Human Face of the Haitian Interdiction Program, 33 Virginia J. Internat'l L. 483 (1993); Essay, Litigating as Law Students: An Inside Look at Haitian Centers Council, 103 Yale L.J. 2337 (1994).

despite having been found to present credible asylum claims. Essay, note 124 above, 103 Yale L.J. at 2342–45.

15. At this writing, the interdiction program continues. In 2005, President Bush responded to a Haitian boat exodus by declaring “I have made it abundantly clear to the Coast Guard that we will turn back any refugee that attempts to reach our shore” (emphasis added). See Bill Frelick, “Abundantly Clear”: Refoulement, 19 Georgetown Immigration L.J. 245, at 245 (2005); Andrew I. Schoenholtz, Refugee Protection in the United States Post–September 11, 36 Columbia Human Rights L. Rev. 323, 362 (2005). This announcement was significant, for it was the first time a U.S. President had referred to the boat people as “refugees” and still asserted the right to return them.

In actual practice, when a Coast Guard cutter captures a Haitian vessel in the Windward Passage, only the most vociferous passengers are typically allowed to request an asylum determination; hence, the popular term “shout test” to describe the shipboard procedure. See Frelick, above, at 245–47. The Coast Guard has also acknowledged that there are “rarely” asylum officers on board its cutters. Ruth Morris, Coast Guard Told Not to Encourage Asylum Claims by Haitian Migrants, South Florida Sun Sentinel (Ft. Lauderdale), Jan. 19, 2006. In fiscal year 2005, out of 1850 interdicted Haitians, only 9 were found to warrant asylum hearings, and only one of those nine is known ultimately to have received asylum. Id.; see generally Stephen H. Legomsky, The USA and the Caribbean Interdiction Program, 18 Internat’l J. Refugee L. 677 (2006).

8. A SIMULATED ATTORNEY-CLIENT ASYLUM INTERVIEW¹²⁵

You are an immigration lawyer about to interview a new client. You have not previously met. All you know at this stage is that your client is from Quito, a tiny Spanish-speaking country in Central America, and that he or she wants to apply for asylum in the United States.

Your instructor will tell you how many minutes you have for this interview. Your instructor will also tell you whether the client speaks English. If not, a Spanish–English interpreter will be provided.

At the interview you will need to do several things: Naturally, you should try to gather as complete a picture of the facts as you can, while being sensitive to the special traumas faced by refugees. You should then make a preliminary judgment whether an asylum application is advisable, and you should share your initial impressions with the client. If you recommend applying for asylum, then you should explain to the client what he or she will need to establish and, generally, what the process will entail. At the end of the interview, be sure you and the client are clear as to what

125. Thanks are due to Stacie Powderly for her exceptional contributions to this exercise. We are also indebted to Pamela Goldberg, Isabel Medina, Michele Pistone, Bernard Trujillo, and Virgil Wiebe for their generous and detailed feedback on earlier drafts of this simulation. Philip Schrag deserves special mention for going well beyond the call of duty.

will happen next. (If this were a real-life initial consultation, you would also discuss your fees; for this exercise you can skip that discussion.)

To prepare for your part, you should (1) review what you have learned thus far concerning the substantive criteria and the procedures for asylum and withholding of removal, and jot down the essential elements of an asylum claim; (2) read the (fictional) U.S. State Department Country Report on Oquito (below); and (3) read the excerpts from "Interviewing a Client," immediately following the Country Report. Your instructor will supply the logistical details.

United States Department of State Country Report on Human Rights Practices

Report for [Current Year].

Oquito.

I. Background

Oquito is a multiparty democracy with a constitution that provides for a strong executive, a bicameral legislature, and a tenured (until age 70) judiciary. Approved by referendum 15 years ago and amended 11 years ago, the Constitution was written under the former military government of Roberto Gonzalez and retains certain institutional limits on popular rule. [Nine months ago], Hector Caleros, of the Socialist Party, rose to power via military coup.

In elections held just one month after the coup, Caleros's Socialist Party won 55 of the 100 seats in the lower house. The Senate was divided 24-24 between the Socialist Party and Gonzalez supporters. The Supreme Judicial Court currently is comprised of seven judges. Five of the judges were appointed by Gonzalez, the others by Caleros. Although independent in theory, there is some uncertainty about the actual influence of the political branches and the military over individual judges.

The armed forces are constitutionally subordinate to the President through an appointed civilian Minister of Defense but enjoy a large degree of legal autonomy. Most notably, the President must have the concurrence of the National Security Council, which consists of military and civilian officials, to remove military chiefs. While the Minister of Defense generally maintains effective control of the military forces, a considerable number of soldiers commit human rights abuses.

Vestiges of the Gonzalez regime remain in the central government. Most notably, the Minister of Defense and the highest ranking general in the Oquito army under Gonzalez have been absorbed into the Caleros government. In addition, many soldiers and local police remain loyal to Gonzalez.

II. Human Rights

General Background: Since the departure of Gonzalez, the human rights situation in Oquito has improved. The Caleros government generally respects its citizens' human rights, though problems remain in some key areas noted below.

Respect for the Integrity of the Person:

Arbitrary or Unlawful Deprivation of Life: There were no confirmed reports of political killings this year, but it is widely believed that members of the federal and state police, as well as military personnel, committed extra-judicial killings during the year. Most of these extra-judicial killings resulted from excessive use of force or mistreatment of prisoners.

Disappearances: The Constitution prohibits forced disappearance. It also requires individuals to disobey orders to commit such crimes and prescribes criminal prosecution of the intellectual authors of the crimes. This year there were two credible reports of politically motivated disappearances. Neither of these disappearances has been linked to state actors.

Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment: The Constitution prohibits torture. While torture is rare, there were five credible reports of torture by Quito police and military officers this year. The abuse most commonly consisted of beatings during arrest or interrogation. The Caleros government has instituted independent investigations of all the allegations. A civilian minister oversees the investigations and has placed all of the accused on administrative leave pending the outcome of the investigations.

Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, and Home: Constitutional provisions prohibit arbitrary interference with privacy, family, and home; however, the police and military continued to infringe on citizens' privacy rights by conducting searches of homes without warrants, especially during anticrime sweeps in poor neighborhoods. Reports of illegal wiretapping and invasion of privacy by the police and military forces increased during the year. In October and November, the Government released recordings of conversations it alleged occurred among opposition leaders. The Government did not divulge how it obtained the recordings.

Freedom of Speech:

The Quito Constitution guarantees freedom of speech. Under the Gonzalez regime, however, freedom of speech was not respected. The Government regularly threatened or physically harmed those who spoke out against it. The Caleros government appears to have rejected any formal policy of targeting political dissidents.

Freedom of speech remains restricted. In several instances, Government authorities confiscated opposition newspapers and pamphlets and withheld television and radio air time from the opposition. Human rights groups also cite instances where the Caleros government has illegally imprisoned people for expressing anti-government opinions. The majority of those imprisoned were released promptly, since no formal law had been broken. The human rights groups acknowledge that physical violence against prisoners in custody is rare.

In several reported recent incidents, pro-Gonzalez loyalists within the military and local police forces have threatened or assaulted those who have criticized the Gonzalez regime. The families of the targeted individuals have also been threatened, imprisoned, and sometimes physically assaulted. As of this report, little has been done to control the Gonzalez loyalists who commit these abuses.

INTERVIEWING A CLIENT, ASYLUM LAW MANUAL, CENTER FOR APPLIED LEGAL STUDIES OF GEORGETOWN UNIVERSITY LAW CENTER (2005 edition)¹²⁶

I. General Purposes of Initial Interview

An initial interview has several general purposes. They usually include (among others):

- explaining to the client who you are, * * * how the asylum process works, any possible non-asylum immigration alternatives, and (especially in an affirmative case) any risks involved in pursuing an asylum claim;
- enabling you and your client to decide whether to enter into an attorney-client relationship, and, if so, signing a retainer and other forms;
- creating a sound and trusting working relationship between you and your client;
- obtaining the information needed for further development of the case;
- [and] counseling the client about decisions he or she must make, and actions he or she can take (e.g., obtaining documents) to make success more likely * * *.

* * *

III. Preparation

* * *

A. Pre-Interview Study

* * *

* * * [L]earn something about the country from which your client has come, and particularly about its recent political and human rights history. * * * We suggest that before the interview you read at least (a) the U.S. State Department's most recent published information about the country and its human rights record, and (b) one independently published human rights report about the country (e.g., by Amnesty International or Human Rights Watch). * * *

¹²⁶. Copyright © 2005 Philip G. Schrag. These excerpts are reprinted by permission.

* * *

C. Interpersonal Relationships

* * *

[T]o what extent do you (and your partner) want to direct the interview (e.g., decide the order of topics, decide when to change topics, determine when it is appropriate for the interviewers to ask questions and when the interviewee should ask questions, decide what issues are “extra-neous” and should not be discussed at length, etc.)? In the traditional model of legal interviewing, the lawyer is very much in charge. The idea, perhaps, is that while the client is the expert on the subject of the client’s problem, the lawyer is the expert on the subject of how to conduct an interview. But in the last 25 years, some authorities have challenged this model, claiming that it reproduces the hierarchy that clients, particularly low-income clients, experience all too often in their lives. It puts the lawyer, who already has more social status than most clients, in a position of even more power. Thus, for a client who is used to standing in lines and answering bureaucrats’ questions to obtain licenses, public benefits, or other services, the lawyer becomes still another bureaucrat who processes the client’s claim—perhaps not the best start for a truly trusting relationship. Some of the critics of the traditional model suggest that the lawyer empower the client by putting the client in charge of the interview * * * or at least that they negotiate with clients, at the outset, about who should direct the interview or how control over the interview should be shared. Empowerment of relatively unempowered clients, they suggest, is both an important end in itself (and it may be a goal for some clients) and a facilitator of a positive lawyer-client relationship.

The traditional model has not withered away as a result of this criticism. Its proponents sometimes suggest that client-directed interviews can be exceedingly lengthy, inefficient, and frustrating, precisely because many clients lack the organizational skills necessary to cover all relevant topics thoroughly within a limited period of time. They note that because they do not know the law, clients cannot be expected even to know what aspects of their stories are relevant to the representation. It can also be argued that an excessively chaotic initial meeting of lawyer and client is less likely to instill a sense of trust than one organized by the lawyer, and that a client who comes to the interview expecting a lawyer to behave in the “traditional” way will be frustrated and disappointed if the lawyer asks the client to take charge.

There is no “right answer” to the question of control. But it is an important issue deserving of some of your time as you prepare for your first interviews.

Related issues involve how distant or friendly you should be, and how formal or informal you want the relationship to be. Whether or not they decide to control the interviewing process, some lawyers believe that they should maintain "professional distance" from the client, not only in the sense of exercising independent judgment about the case, but also in terms of the human dimensions of the relationship. Some methods of maintaining distance might include using last names, keeping a table between the lawyer and the client during interviews, not going to the client's residence, discouraging the client from talking about family matters unrelated to representation, etc. However, other lawyers think that a professional relationship cannot be fulfilling on either side if it is not a relationship between "whole people." Such lawyers might at least avoid creating what they would regard as barriers between themselves and their clients, and some think it a very positive development when lawyer-client relationships evolve into friendships. Some people have even concluded that a more "informal" relationship is not only more enjoyable, but also more successful; it builds a rapport that results in the client disclosing more details and cooperating more fully.

Still another related question involves empathy. Most lawyers would say that they want to maintain a considerable degree of intellectual detachment from their clients' cases, so that they can exercise independent professional judgment about the likely outcome and thereby counsel their clients more effectively. Emotional detachment is a more complex question. Asylum cases often involve strong emotional content, and discussing them may bring up feelings associated with separation from family and country, loss of community, and the disappearance or death of friends or relatives. Suppose that, during your interview, your client experiences or expresses strong feelings. Should you discourage the expression of those emotions, because they may restrict the flow of information? Should you try to feel your client's feelings with him or her? Should you encourage your client to express emotion but try to remain at an emotional as well as an intellectual distance from the case? If you feel emotions along with your client, should you express those emotions to him or her? What should you do if you experience emotion, but your emotions are quite different from those of your client? If you have experienced some of the same things your client has experienced, should you reveal that?

* * *

IV. The Interview

* * * If your initial interview is fairly typical, it will include each of the following features: (a) you will tell the client something about yourself, your institution, the lawyer-client relationship, the nature and risks of the asylum process, and the bases for possible collateral routes to immigration, (b) you will gather information about your client's experiences and other facts relevant to the case, (c) you will have to deal with inter-cultural factors, and perhaps problems involving interpretation to and from English, that could interfere with communication during the interview, (d) you may have to answer questions or give advice, (e) you and your client will discuss and possibly sign a retainer agreement and other documents, and (f) you will bring the interview to a close, and if the client has decided to retain you, you will deal with such other matters as scheduling a next meeting and agreeing on tasks to be undertaken in the interim.

A. Disclosures

* * *

1. The confidential nature of the relationship. Clients should understand that they may provide information to you in confidence, and that neither you nor any interpreter with whom you work will share with people outside of the clinic any information they tell you in confidence that could reveal their identities. (You need not explain this detail unless asked, but even if a client ultimately decides not to retain you, your initial discussions are protected by the attorney-client privilege and the ethical duty to keep confidences).

* * *

4. The process. * * * Absent unusual circumstances, before clients retain you to initiate or participate in a legal process, they should be educated about the basics of that process. If the client has no lawful immigration status and is initiating an asylum application, it is very important that he or she be advised that the failure to obtain asylum at any level of the process could result in removal. If the client has other possible means for remaining in the United States (such as a family petition), these should be explored. * * *

* * *

8. FOIA. * * *

— * * * [Y]ou should send a FOIA request to the Department of Homeland Security (with a copy to the Court) immediately after your first interview. You can have the client sign the G-639 Form at the first interview or at another early interview.

— If you see that a FOIA request was filed, but there has been no response, you should file a second request. Mark it as a second request, mark it urgent, and note the hearing date.

— As a last resort, contact the FOIA officer to follow up or contact the trial attorney to request a copy of the file or to prod the FOIA officer.

— If pages were withheld from the FOIA response, as a policy, we file an appeal with the FOIA/PA Appeals Office. * * *

* * *

B. Information Gathering

* * *

2. The funnel sequence. * * * [T]he interviewer starts an area of questioning with a broad question (e.g., tell me about any trouble you have had with the police) and only very gradually works down to specific questions (e.g., what did the officer say when he came to arrest you?). The image is that of a narrowing funnel, and the purpose of the technique is to permit the client to talk, and to provide leads for specific follow-up questions. By contrast, if the lawyer mainly asks specific questions, he or she might miss large areas of a case that the client might reveal if given a more open-ended opportunity to talk.

3. Attention to vocabulary. Even when clients speak English fluently, lawyers must attend to vocabulary, taking pains neither to speak over their clients' heads nor to talk down to them. Lawyers are used to using jargon, and it is especially important to avoid or explain technical terms. Language barriers only compound the difficulty, and some interpreters may not even be able to translate legal terminology.

4. Major issues. * * * These include, among others,
- your client's personal and family history;
 - what happened to your client in his or her country;
 - how your client got to the United States;
 - your client's current immigration status;
 - any prior legal representation or contact with [DHS];
 - any relevant witnesses or documents;
 - possible or actual criminal convictions;
 - and time spent in a third country.

5. Details. It is very important to know the details of your client's experience, because details prove cases and make testimony credible. * * *

6. Corroborating evidence. * * * [C]orroborating evidence can be crucial to the success of a case. Therefore, it is important that your client fully understand that you will need his or her assistance in discovering how the case might be corroborated. Your client may immediately be aware of the availability of, for example, a death certificate which would corroborate the murder of a family member. Such a document might take weeks to produce. Accordingly, making your client aware of this important task at the first interview is a step not to be overlooked.

7. Contradictions. It is very common for asylum applicants not to tell the entire story at the first interview, or to tell a series of contradictory stories. Although the lapses and contradictions may well result from forgetfulness or trauma, they may be interpreted by adjudicators (or even by the applicants' lawyers) as lying. It is important to work with clients to develop accurate and stable facts, even though this may take several interviews. Steven Forester's article, "Haitian Asylum Advocacy: Questions to Ask Applicants and Notes on Interviewing and Representation, Part II," 20 Immigration Newsletter, no. 2, p. 1 (1991) offers a series of suggestions in this regard. The article can also be found at 10 N.Y.L. Sch. J. Hum. Rts. 351 (1993), available on Westlaw. Some excerpts are noted here (not because we necessarily endorse these suggestions, but because they are worthy of your consideration):

You can't expect your client to 'open up' immediately. He or she may not do so for hours or until your third or fourth interview. . . . You may exasperate the client by asking so many questions, by investigating, cross-examining, triple-checking, taking pains. But you must: anything less is sloppy, disrespectful, and damning to the claim.

You must often repeat a question in different ways. . . . Probe and follow up to confirm. * * * Don't take assertions at face value. Triple-check facts, numbers, specifics. Mix things up. If your client identifies a committee's president as Joseph Maxy and its vice-president as Sonia Gilbert, switch the names around: "So you said Sonia Gilbert was president?" Your client should correct you.

Be demonstrative and vivid. . . . Soldiers stomped on your client's left leg, rebreaking it, while he was lying on the floor on his right side in the 'djak' torture position. Ask him to demonstrate. If he is reluctant or slow, get on the floor on your right side in the djak position to check with him if that is how it was, or have someone else do so. Don't hesitate out of decorum or shyness. . . . Describe gore, rape, outrage explicitly, factually, and in detail. . . . But . . . tell the client never to exaggerate anything, or he or she loses; the truth suffices.

An additional threat to credible testimony arises when lawyers demand of clients that they speak with a false precision. If a client is unsure about certain facts, efforts to eliminate ambiguity may result in a story that changes at awkward moments and a client who feels s/he must lie to win asylum. You must decide when to push the client to give a clear account of facts and when to accept uncertainty.

C. Differences

* * * In your client's culture, for example, lawyers may be regarded with even greater suspicion than in the United States, or issues touching on sexual relations or sexuality may be taboo. * * * [B]e alert to the fact that an interview with a person from another culture is quite different from other interviews with which you may have experience (e.g., job interviews). Furthermore, you cannot always rely on an interpreter to give you or your client a precise interpretation. The interpreter may begin to paraphrase to save time, or because he or she thinks it is helpful. If you have any clue that you are not getting phrase-by-phrase interpretation, you may want to interrupt the interview to address the issue. The interpreter should not be paraphrasing your words, nor those of the client. Neither should the interpreter be inserting his or her own opinions or knowledge into the translation.

1. Torture Victims

Some * * * clients have been tortured. Interviewing victims of torture requires (1) special sensitivity to the experiences they have suffered, (2) attention to ways in which the effects of torture may impair their ability to tell you all the facts (particularly during the initial meetings with you), (3) awareness of the barriers that may make it difficult for them to communicate the facts to the asylum officer or judge, and (4) understanding of techniques that experts have developed for helping torture victims to tell sympathetic interviewers about what happened to them.

* * * [Here the Manual recommends] Chapter III, "General Interview Considerations," of the Manual "Examining Asylum Seekers" published by Physicians for Human Rights. The URL is http://www.phrusa.org/campaigns/pdf/asylum_pdf/03.pdf.

* * *

D. Counseling

It is not unusual for a client to ask lawyers for advice, even during the first interview. What should you do if a client asks you what to do, and you aren't sure you know enough to respond? A lawyer who seems to be withholding counseling, or who admits that he or she lacks enough knowledge to be able to provide advice, may cause the client to doubt his or her competence. On the other hand, poor advice may lead the client to make bad, even irrevocable decisions, and poor advice based on an undisclosed lack of knowledge could constitute malpractice. Similar issues may arise when a client asks for assurance that if he or she retains you, asylum will be granted. It is surely appropriate to say, if true, that you will do your best for a client, but a lawyer who promises a successful outcome risks disaster.

Another aspect of counseling is educating clients about the law of their case. Lawyers have various opinions about whether, when, and how this should be done. Some worry that early explanations about the applicable law may cause clients to tilt their stories and distort the facts to fit within the summaries of the law that their representatives offer them. Other lawyers believe early counseling along these lines to be very useful, precisely because it enables clients to organize their thoughts in a way that is useful to representatives.

* * *

F. Closing

An interview should be concluded in an orderly, professional manner. The client should know what will happen next (it may be a second interview) and when it will happen. He or she should understand what you will do and what he or she will do during the week or two following the interview.

Before you close, be certain that you know how to get in touch with your client (and a suitable interpreter, if need be) on short notice. In addition to ascertaining all of your client's addresses and telephone numbers, try to obtain the telephone number of at least one friend or relative, residing at a different address, who will know how to reach your client if your client moves before the proceeding is over. Also be certain that your client knows that he or she can contact you * * *.

C. BEYOND PERSECUTION: PROTECTION AGAINST OTHER DANGERS

The first two sections of this chapter dealt, respectively, with offshore and onshore refugees. They considered protections afforded by both United States and international law, and they had one vital element in common—protection from certain categories of persecution.

But what if a person is fleeing from armed conflict, or the chaos of a failed state, or natural disaster, or mass starvation, or any other danger that does not qualify as “persecution?” Moreover, what happens if the person is fleeing persecution but does not qualify as a Convention refugee because (a) he or she is internally displaced; or (b) the persecution is not on account of one of the five protected grounds; or (c) the person falls within one of the criminal or other exclusions; or (d) procedural obstacles bar access to the host state’s asylum determination system? And what if the person qualifies for nonrefoulement under the 1951 Convention, and the host state is willing to honor that principle but is not willing to grant asylum?

The materials in this section briefly survey a variety of other protection mechanisms to supplement, or in some cases substitute for, relief under the 1951 Convention. Some of the mechanisms discussed here have actually been adopted and applied by the United States, other states, regional associations, or the larger international community. Others have been merely proposed or discussed. See generally Jane McAdam, Complementary Protection in International Refugee Law (2007).

Three subjects are considered—the Convention Against Torture, Temporary Protection (TP), and Other Subsidiary Protection under International Law. As you read these materials, keep in mind that the three concepts overlap considerably, with each other and with the 1951 Convention. Torture, for example, is a form of persecution but not necessarily persecution on account of race, religion, nationality, etc. Temporary protection, as Professor Joan Fitzpatrick argues in her excerpted article, might be embraced by destination states in lieu of asylum rather than in addition to it, especially during times of mass influx. Human rights agreements that trigger nonrefoulement (for example, regional conventions and the Convention Against Torture) might require only temporary protection.

1. THE CONVENTION AGAINST TORTURE

In 1984 the United Nations General Assembly adopted the Convention Against Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment. U.N.G.A. Res. 39/46, 39 U.N. GAOR Supp. (No. 51) at 197, U.N. Doc. A/39/51 (1984), reproduced in 23 Internat’l Legal Materials 1027 (1984), modifications in 24 Internat’l Legal Materials 535 (1985) [hereafter cited as CAT]. The United States Senate ratified CAT in 1990, see 136

Cong. Rec. S17491-92 (Oct. 27, 1990), albeit with a long list of reservations, understandings, and declarations that are examined below.

Until 1999, United States lawyers made scant use of CAT, principally because until then the domestic legal machinery for implementing CAT had not been established. In 1998, however, Congress passed the necessary implementing legislation, see Foreign Affairs Reform and Restructuring Act of 1998, Pub. L. 105-277, 112 Stat. 2681, Div. G, § 2242 (Oct. 21, 1998), and in 1999 the Justice Department issued interim regulations establishing the administrative machinery for the filing of CAT claims. 64 Fed. Reg. 8478 (Feb. 19, 1999). Since then, CAT claims have become a standard weapon in every refugee advocate's strategic arsenal.¹²⁷

CAT is the first worldwide convention targeted specifically at torture and related cruelties. It requires the participating states to prevent torture within their own territories, to cooperate with other states by prosecuting or extraditing alleged perpetrators, and to do various things to protect actual or potential victims of torture. In addition CAT establishes a body called the "Committee against Torture," which has jurisdiction to investigate and adjudicate certain complaints of violations brought by individuals or states parties. As explained below, however, the Committee plays only a minor role in disputes that involve the United States.

Most relevant here is CAT article 3.1. It says: "No State Party shall expel, return (refouler) or extradite a person to another State where there are substantial grounds for believing that he would be in danger of being subjected to torture." Note the parallels to article 33 of the 1951 U.N. Refugee Convention.

Article 3.1 promises hope for some people who for various reasons are unable to procure nonrefoulement under the 1951 Convention. Some are individuals who cannot satisfy the substantive criteria for asylum because the harm they fear is not persecution or because the persecution is not on account of any of the five protected grounds. Personal grudges and police torture to extract confessions or other information are examples. Certain gender-related cruelties for which asylum is denied could possibly qualify under CAT. See, e.g., Lori Nessel, "Wilful Blindness" to Gender-Based Violence Abroad: United States' Implementation of Article III of the United Nations Convention Against Torture, 89 Minnesota L. Rev. 71 (2004) (arguing that CAT could, and should, be useful in domestic violence cases). In other instances, CAT claims can possibly avoid some of the procedural obstacles associated with relief under the 1951 Convention. Perhaps most importantly of all, CAT contains no exclusions for wrongdoing or for anything else. Conversely, as you will also see, there are situations in which a persecution-based claim will lie even though a CAT claim will not.

127. For helpful commentary, see, e.g., Anker at 465-522; Francisco Isgro, Seeking Relief Under the Convention Against Torture, 27 Migration World #3 at 44 (1999); Kristen B. Rosati, Article 3 of the United Nations Convention Against Torture: A Powerful Tool to Prevent Removal Just Became More Powerful, 4 BIB 137 (Feb. 15, 1999); Morton Sklar, New Convention Against Torture Procedures and Standards, July 1999 Immigration Briefings.

Because of various modifications introduced by the Senate during the ratification process, and because of some disputes concerning the precise effects of CAT, a brief detour on the law of treaties is necessary. Treaty law consists of both international law and municipal law. As for international law, the most important source is the Convention on the Law of Treaties, U.N. Doc. A/CONF.39/27 (1969), 1155 U.N.T.S. 336 (signed at Vienna, May 23, 1969), commonly called the Vienna Convention or sometimes the Treaty on Treaties. The United States is not a party to the Vienna Convention, but the State Department nonetheless treats it as “the authoritative guide to current treaty law and practice.” See Mark W. Janis, An Introduction to International Law 17 (4th ed. 2003).

Treaties are negotiated in different ways, ranging from informal discussions among executive branch officials to formal conferences that often precede major multinational conventions. Some treaties, including both the 1951 Convention and CAT, were officially sponsored by the United Nations.

Importantly, the fact that a state has “signed” a treaty does not ordinarily make the treaty legally binding on that state. Signing typically indicates only that the text of the document is accurate. Janis, above, at 20. The treaty itself normally specifies what a state has to do to become a party; usually the state must communicate its ratification in a specified manner. In the case of CAT, a state becomes a party by depositing the instrument of ratification with the Secretary-General of the United Nations. CAT art. 25.2.

States also have their own constraints, imposed by municipal law. In the United States, the President presents a proposed treaty to the Senate, which may ratify it by a two-thirds vote. U.S. Const. art. II, § 2, cl. 2. Treaties that are ratified in this way become part of the “Law of the Land.” U.S. Const. art. VI, cl. 2. But what effect do they have in a United States domestic court?

The answer is “it depends.” As discussed earlier, the internal allocation of the United States machinery for implementing its international legal obligations is a matter of domestic United States law. Those agreements that are “self-executing” create binding internal law and judicially enforceable obligations. Otherwise the treaty requires implementing legislation before an aggrieved individual will have a right of action in court—and then the action will be under the statute, not under the treaty. Whether a treaty is self-executing normally depends on the intentions of the states parties, but some courts will also consider executive branch statements made in connection with the United States treaty ratification process. See Thomas Buergenthal & Sean D. Murphy, Public International Law in a Nutshell 198–201 (4th ed. 2007).

Complications arise when the ratifying body—in the United States, the Senate—attaches conditions to ratification. These conditions take different forms. The most common condition is a “reservation;” the state purports to ratify the treaty but with modifications. Vienna Convention, art. 2(1)(d). This is permissible unless the treaty prohibits the reservation, or the treaty allows “only specified reservations, which do not include the reservation in question,” or the reservation is “incompatible with the object and purpose of the treaty.” Vienna Convention, art. 19. Depending on the treaty, a reservation might require affirmative acceptance by one or more of the other parties, or acceptance might be the default option. In any event, the reservation alters the obligations of the reserving state only as against those states that accept the reservation; furthermore, the alteration is reciprocal. See Janis, above, at 24.

When a state prefers not to make reciprocal modifications, it sometimes stops short of offering formal reservations and instead articulates its “understandings” or “declarations” of what particular provisions mean. Although it is the courts’ job to interpret the law, they commonly defer to these pronouncements. See Barry E. Carter & Phillip R. Trimble, International Law 198 (2d ed. 1995).

With that background, the sequence of events that have made CAT a live option in the United States can be described. As noted earlier, the U.N. General Assembly passed a resolution adopting the Convention in 1984. The United States signed it in 1988, the Senate ratified it (with reservations, understandings, and declarations that you will soon see) in 1990, and the President deposited the ratification instrument with the U.N. Secretary-General in 1994. See Rosati, note 127 above, at 184. Only at that point did the United States become a party. As noted above, the implementing legislation was passed in 1998 and the interim regulations in 1999.

The Senate declared that CAT is not self-executing, 136 Cong. Rec. S17492 (Oct. 27, 1990), Dec. #1, and the BIA (before Congress passed implementing legislation) accepted the Senate’s conclusion.¹²⁸ Since Congress has passed implementing legislation anyway, you might be wondering, why does it matter whether CAT is self-executing? The answer is that there are several respects in which the implementing statute, which reflects the Senate’s reservations, understandings, and declarations, arguably falls short of meeting the United States obligations under CAT. If that turns out to be the case, nonrefoulement applicants will want to invoke the Convention directly; whether CAT is self-executing will thus become highly important.

Convention Against Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

U.N. General Assembly Res. 39/46, 39 U.N. GAOR Supp. (No. 51) at 197, U.N. Doc. A/39/51 (adopted Dec. 10, 1984).

Part I

Article 1

1. For the purposes of this Convention, torture means any act by which severe pain or suffering, whether physical or mental, is intentionally

128. See Matter of H-M-V-, 22 I. & N. Dec. 256, 259-60 (BIA en banc 1998). At least one commentator vigorously disagrees. See Kristen B. Rosati, The United Nations Con- vention Against Torture: A Self-Executing Treaty that Prevents the Removal of Persons Ineligible for Asylum and Withholding of Removal, 26 Denver J. Internat'l L. 533 (1998).

inflicted on a person for such purposes as obtaining from him or a third person information or a confession, punishing him for an act he or a third person has committed or is suspected of having committed, or intimidating or coercing him or a third person, or for any reason based on discrimination of any kind, when such pain or suffering is inflicted by or at the instigation of or with the consent or acquiescence of a public official or other person acting in an official capacity. It does not include pain or suffering arising only from, inherent in or incidental to lawful sanctions.

2. This article is without prejudice to any international instrument or national legislation which does or may contain provisions of wider application.

Article 2

1. Each State Party shall take effective legislative, administrative, judicial or other measures to prevent acts of torture in any territory under its jurisdiction.

2. No exceptional circumstances whatsoever, whether a state of war or a threat of war, internal political instability or any other public emergency, may be invoked as a justification of torture.

3. An order from a superior officer or a public authority may not be invoked as a justification of torture.

Article 3

1. No State Party shall expel, return ("refouler") or extradite a person to another State where there are substantial grounds for believing that he would be in danger of being subjected to torture.

2. For the purpose of determining whether there are such grounds, the competent authorities shall take into account all relevant considerations including, where applicable, the existence in the State concerned of a consistent pattern of gross, flagrant or mass violations of human rights.

* * *

Article 12

Each State Party shall ensure that its competent authorities proceed to a prompt and impartial investigation, wherever there is reasonable ground to believe that an act of torture has been committed in any territory under its jurisdiction.

Article 13

Each State Party shall ensure that any individual who alleges he has been subjected to torture in any territory under its jurisdiction has the right to complain to and to have his case promptly and impartially examined by its competent authorities. Steps shall be taken to insure that the complainant and witnesses are protected against all ill-treatment or intimidation as a consequence of his complaint or any evidence given.

* * *

Part II

Article 17

1. There shall be established a Committee against Torture (hereinafter referred to as the Committee) which shall carry out the functions hereinafter provided. The Committee shall consist of 10 experts of high moral standing and recognized competence in the field of human rights, who shall serve in their personal capacity. The experts shall be elected by the States Parties, consideration being given to equitable geographical distribution and to the usefulness of the participation of some persons having legal experience.

* * *

Article 20

1. If the Committee receives reliable information which appears to it to contain well-founded indications that torture is being systematically practiced in the territory of a State Party, the Committee shall invite that State Party to co-operate in the examination of the information and to this end to submit observations with regard to the information concerned.

* * *

5. * * * [T]he Committee may, after consultations with the State Party concerned, decide to include a summary account of the results of the proceedings in its annual report * * *.

Article 21

1. A State Party to this Convention may at any time declare under this article that it recognizes the competence of the Committee to receive and consider communications to the effect that a State Party claims that another State Party is not fulfilling its obligations under this Convention. Such communications may be received and considered according to the procedures laid down in this article only if submitted by a State Party which has made a declaration recognizing in regard to itself the competence of the Committee. No communication shall be dealt with by the Committee under this article if it concerns a State Party which has not made such a declaration. * * *

* * *

(c) The Committee shall deal with a matter referred to it under this article only after it has ascertained that all domestic remedies have been invoked and exhausted in the matter, in conformity with the generally recognized principles of international law. This shall not be the rule where the application of the remedies is unreasonably prolonged or is unlikely to bring effective relief to the person who is the victim of the violation of this Convention.

* * *

Article 22

1. A State Party to this Convention may at any time declare under this article that it recognizes the competence of the Committee to receive and consider communications from or on behalf of individuals subject to its jurisdiction who claim to be victims of a violation by a State Party of the provisions of the Convention. No communication shall be received by the Committee if it concerns a State Party to the Convention which has not made such a declaration.

* * *

5. The Committee shall not consider any communications from an individual under this article unless it has ascertained that

(a) The same matter has not been, and is not being, examined under another procedure of international investigation or settlement;

(b) The individual has exhausted all available domestic remedies; this shall not be the rule where the application of the remedies is unreasonably prolonged or is unlikely to bring effective relief to the person who is the victim of the violation of this Convention.

* * *

Part III

Article 25

1. This Convention is open for signature by all States.

2. This Convention is subject to ratification. Instruments of ratification shall be deposited with the Secretary-General of the United Nations.

* * *

Article 28

1. Each State may, at the time of signature or ratification of this Convention or accession thereto, declare that it does not recognize the competence of the Committee provided for in article 20.

2. Any State Party having made a reservation in accordance with paragraph 1 of this article may, at any time, withdraw this reservation by notification to the Secretary-General of the United Nations.

* * *

Resolution of the United States Senate Ratifying the Convention Against Torture

101st Cong. 2nd Sess.
136 Cong. Rec. S17491-92.
October 27, 1990.

RESOLVED (TWO-THIRDS OF THE SENATORS PRESENT CONCURRING THEREIN), That the Senate advise and consent to the ratification of the Convention Against Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment, adopted by unanimous agreement of the United Nations General Assembly on December 10, 1984, and signed by the United States on April 18, 1988: PROVIDED, That:

I. The Senate's advice and consent is subject to the following reservations:

* * *

II. The Senate's advice and consent is subject to the following understandings, which shall apply to the obligations of the United States under this Convention:

(1)(a) That with reference to Article 1, the United States understands that, in order to constitute torture, an act must be specifically intended to inflict severe physical or mental pain or suffering and that mental pain or suffering refers to prolonged mental harm caused by or resulting from: (1) the intentional infliction or threatened infliction of severe physical pain or suffering; (2) the administration or application, or threatened administration or application, of mind altering substances or other procedures calculated to disrupt profoundly the senses or the personality; (3) the threat of imminent death; or (4) the threat that another person will imminently be subjected to death, severe physical pain or suffering, or the administration or application of mind altering substances or other procedures calculated to disrupt profoundly the senses or personality.

(b) That the United States understands that the definition of torture in Article 1 is intended to apply only to acts directed against persons in the offender's custody or physical control.

(c) That with reference to Article 1 of the Convention, the United States understands that "sanctions" includes judicially imposed sanctions and other enforcement actions authorized by United States law or by judicial interpretation of such law. Nonetheless, the United States understands that a State Party could not through its domestic sanctions defeat the object and purpose of the Convention to prohibit torture.

(d) That with reference to Article 1 of the Convention, the United States understands that the term "acquiescence" requires that the public official, prior to the activity constituting torture, have awareness of such activity and thereafter breach his legal responsibility to intervene to prevent such activity.

(e) That with reference to Article 1 of the Convention, the United States understands that noncompliance with applicable legal procedural standards does not per se constitute torture.

(2) That the United States understands the phrase, "where there are substantial grounds for believing that he would be in danger of being subjected to torture," as used in Article 3 of the Convention, to mean "if it is more likely than not that he would be tortured."

* * *

III. The Senate's advice and consent is subject to the following declarations:

(1) That the United States declares that the provisions of Articles 1 through 16 of the Convention are not self-executing.

(2) That the United States declares, pursuant to Article 21, paragraph 1, of the Convention, that it recognizes the competence of the Committee against Torture to receive and consider communications to the effect that a State Party claims that another State Party is not fulfilling its obligations under the Convention. It is the understanding of the United States that, pursuant to the above mentioned article, such communications shall be accepted and processed only if they come from a State Party which has made a similar declaration.

* * *

Foreign Affairs Reform and Restructuring Act of 1998

Pub. L. 105-277, Div. G, 112 Stat. 2681.
October 21, 1998.

SECTION 2242. UNITED STATES POLICY WITH RESPECT TO THE INVOLUNTARY RETURN OF PERSONS IN DANGER OF SUBJECTION TO TORTURE.

(a) Policy.—It shall be the policy of the United States not to expel, extradite, or otherwise effect the involuntary return of any person to a country in which there are substantial grounds for believing the person would be in danger of being subjected to torture, regardless of whether the person is physically present in the United States.

(b) Regulations.—Not later than 120 days after the date of enactment of this Act, the heads of the appropriate agencies shall prescribe regulations to implement the obligations of the United States under Article 3 of the United Nations Convention Against Torture and Other Forms of Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment, subject to any reservations, understandings, declarations, and provisos contained in the United States Senate resolution of ratification of the Convention.

(c) Exclusion of Certain Aliens.—To the maximum extent consistent with the obligations of the United States under the Convention, subject to any reservations, understandings, declarations, and provisos contained in the United States Senate resolution of ratification of the Convention, the regulations described in subsection (b) shall exclude from the protection of such regulations aliens described in [INA § 241(b)(3)(B)].

(d) Review and Construction.—Notwithstanding any other provision of law, and except as provided in the regulations described in subsection (b), no court shall have jurisdiction to review the regulations adopted to implement this section, and nothing in this section shall be construed as providing any court jurisdiction to consider or review claims raised under the Convention or this section, or any other determination made with respect to the application of the policy set forth in subsection (a), except as part of the review of a final order of removal pursuant to [INA § 242].

[The REAL ID Act, § 106(a)(1)(B), without altering the language of the above provision, added new INA § 242(a)(4), which further governs judicial review of CAT claims. Please read INA § 242(a)(4) now—Eds.]

(e) Authority To Detain.—Nothing in this section shall be construed as limiting the authority of the Attorney General to detain any person under any provision of law, including, but not limited to, any provision of the Immigration and Nationality Act.

(f) Definitions.—

(1) Convention defined.—In this section, the term “Convention” means the United Nations Convention Against Torture and Other Forms of Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment, done at New York on December 10, 1984.

(2) Same terms as in the convention.—Except as otherwise provided, the terms used in this section have the meanings given those terms in the Convention, subject to any reservations, understandings, declarations, and provisos contained in the United States Senate resolution of ratification of the Convention.

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. As the title of the Convention suggests, the drafters regard “torture” as a subset of “cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment.” As the body of the Convention suggests, torture is seen as an especially virulent subset. The measures that CAT requires states to take with respect to torture are more stringent than those required with respect to “other cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment.”

By way of example, states must take specific affirmative measures to prevent acts of torture within their respective territories, CAT art. 2.1, including criminalizing such acts, CAT art. 4. When torture is alleged, the state must either extradite or submit the case for prosecution. CAT art. 7. States must ensure procedures for torture victims to obtain compensation. CAT art. 14. Most important for present purposes, the nonrefoulement obligations imposed by article 3 apply only to torture.

The obligation to prevent and redress other cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment is narrower. CAT article 16.1 requires states to “undertake to prevent” such acts (by public officials) within their own territories, and it specifically makes articles 10–13 applicable to all cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment, not just torture. But those articles merely require states to include certain information in the education and training of law enforcement officials, investigate alleged misconduct, and provide a forum for complaints. The phrase “cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment,” or a very close variant, appears in other international human rights conventions as well.¹²⁹

The present concern is with the nonrefoulement prohibition contained in article 3. Since that article by its terms covers only “torture,” the discussion from this point on similarly focuses on torture, not “other cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment.”

2. There are only two “reservations” to the Senate’s ratification of CAT, and neither one is crucial to nonrefoulement. In contrast, Understandings 1(a), 1(b), 1(c), 1(d), 1(e), and 2, as well as Declaration 1, are highly significant here. Read carefully the Senate’s Understanding #1(a), relating to mental suffering as a form of torture. Do you think this definition fulfills U.S. obligations under CAT? If initially it seems to fall short, does the second prong cure the defect? That prong covers “the administration or application, or threatened administration or application, of mind altering substances or other procedures calculated to disrupt profoundly the senses or the personality” [emphasis added].

3. The torture definition in CAT article 1.1 lists several purposes for which torture might be inflicted—obtaining information or a confession, punishment, intimidation or coercion, and discrimination. Since the listed purposes are prefaced by the phrase “such purposes as,” they seem merely illustrative, not exhaustive. The Senate committee that recommended ratification shares that view. See Comm. on Foreign Relations, United States Senate, Exec. Report 101-30, Convention Against Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment at 14 (Aug. 30, 1990) [hereafter cited as Senate Foreign Relations Committee Report].

4. The torture that CAT article 1.1 recognizes must be “inflicted by or at the instigation of or with the consent or acquiescence of a public official or other person acting in an official capacity.” Compare this requirement to the non-state actor rule that you encountered earlier in connection with persecution-based asylum and nonrefoulement claims. That latter standard requires a government “unwilling or unable” to control the private actor.

What if a private individual or group inflicts torture and one or more government officials fail to intervene? Is this “acquiescence?” Senate Understanding 1(d) defines “acquiescence” to require “awareness” by the public official and a breach of “his legal responsibility.”

The Senate Foreign Relations Committee Report, above at 9, says that the “awareness” requirement was added in order to clarify that even “wilful blindness” will suffice. Accord, Ontunez-Tursios v. Ashcroft, 303

129. See, e.g., Universal Declaration of Human Rights, U.N.G.A. Res. 217A(III), U.N. Doc. A/810 at 71, art. 5 (1948); International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, U.N.G.A. Res. 2200A(XXI), 21 U.N. GAOR Supp. (No. 16) at 52, U.N. Doc. A/6316, 999 U.N.T.S. 171, art. 7 (adopted Dec. 19, 1966); African [Banjul] Charter on Human and Peoples’ Rights, OAU Doc. CAB/LEG/67/3 rev. 5, art. 5 (adopted June 27, 1981); American Convention on Human Rights, O.A.S. Treaty Series No. 36, at 1, OEA/Ser. L.V/II.23 doc. rev. 2, art. 5 (Nov. 22, 1969); [European] Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms, 213 U.N.T.S. 222, art. 3 (signed Nov. 4, 1950).

F.3d 341, 354 (5th Cir. 2002). (Does adding an “awareness” requirement really clarify that wilful blindness establishes such awareness?)

As for the “legal responsibility” requirement, at least one commentator argues, and the General Counsel’s Office of the former INS agreed, that “legal” includes international law and that the enforcement responsibilities created by CAT itself should therefore suffice. See Kristen Rosati, Article 3 of the United Nations Convention Against Torture: A Powerful Tool to Prevent Removal Just Became More Powerful, 4 BIB 137, 140–41 (Feb. 15, 1999).

A potentially more serious constraint is Understanding 1(b), which limits torture to “acts directed against persons in the offender’s custody or physical control” [emphasis added]. In cases of government acquiescence in private acts, to which “offender” is the Senate referring? If it is the private actor, does the claim fail because he or she is not a public official? If it is the public official who offends by acquiescing, will Understanding 1(b) bar recovery, since the official does not have custody or control over the victim?

The early United States cases have been inconclusive. In Matter of S.V., 22 I. & N. Dec. 1306 (BIA en banc 2000), the Board held that acts by rebel guerrillas would not constitute torture because the government could not be said to acquiesce in those acts. And in Ali v. Reno, 237 F.3d 591 (6th Cir. 2001), the court reached a similar conclusion with respect to violent acts committed against the applicant by her siblings. But in Reyes-Reyes v. Ashcroft, 384 F.3d 782 (9th Cir. 2004), the court majority held that the government need not knowingly acquiesce. Id. at 787. The concurring judge disagreed, relying on the language in the regulations, 8 CFR § 208.18(a)(7) (2008) (drawn from Senate Understanding 1(d) above) to require that “the public official, prior to the activity constituting torture, have awareness of such activity and thereafter breach his or her legal responsibility to intervene to prevent such activity.” 384 F.3d at 789–90. As in the persecution-based asylum and nonrefoulement cases, the issue is likely to assume particular significance in domestic violence cases. See Problem 9 below.

5. Note the second sentence of CAT article 1.1 (torture does not include suffering from “lawful sanctions”). The Senate Foreign Relations Committee Report, at 30, recommended the following Understanding:

* * * [T]he United States understands that “sanctions” includes judicially imposed sanctions and other enforcement actions authorized by United States law or by judicial interpretations of such law provided that such sanctions or actions are not clearly prohibited under international law.

On the floor of the Senate, however, this recommended language was amended. The amended version eventually became Senate Understanding 1(c), which you should now review.

(a) Identify precisely how the recommended language differs from the language ultimately adopted.

(b) What practical significance do you think the amendment has?

(c) Do you see any circular logic problems in the 2nd sentence of Understanding 1(c) (the sentence that begins “Nonetheless”)? Consider especially the qualifying phrase “to prohibit torture” [emphasis added].

6. Section B of this chapter dealt with asylum and withholding of removal in the context of persecution. Recall that asylum under INA § 208 requires the person to meet the “refugee” definition of INA § 101(a)(42), under which either past persecution or a well-founded fear of future persecution will suffice. Under the withholding of removal provision for persecution, INA § 241(b)(3), and under article 33 of the 1951 U.N. Refugee Convention, only a future threat to one’s life or freedom suffices; past persecution is not a basis for 241(b)(3) relief.

In this respect the nonrefoulement remedy established by CAT article 3 is analogous to nonrefoulement in the persecution context. Both protect only against threats of future torture; past torture is not a basis for relief.

7. CAT article 3 prohibits refoulement “where there are substantial grounds for believing that he would be in danger of being subjected to torture.” Senate Understanding #2 interprets this language to mean that torture must be “more likely than not.” So far, that interpretation has held up. See, e.g., Lukwago v. Ashcroft, 329 F.3d 157, 182–83 (3d Cir. 2003); Matter of M-B-A-, 23 I. & N. Dec. 474 (BIA 2002). The stated explanation was that, as you might recall, the United States uses a “more likely than not” test for nonrefoulement in persecution cases. Senate Foreign Relations Committee Report, above at 10. Does Senate Understanding #2 accurately interpret CAT article 3? If a physician told you there was a one-third chance that your disease would prove fatal, would you really doubt that there were “substantial” grounds to feel that you were at least “in danger?”

8. As you saw earlier, article 33.1 of the 1951 Convention prohibits refoulement in the persecution context, but article 33.2 expressly allows states to make exceptions on certain criminal and national security grounds. Exceptions along these lines (though arguably broader than what the 1951 Convention authorizes) also appear in the United States implementing legislation. INA § 241(b)(3)(B). These were discussed in section B.5 above.

CAT article 3, in sharp contrast to article 33 of the 1951 Convention, makes the prohibition on refoulement absolute. It allows no exceptions. The BIA appears to share that view, see Matter of H-M-V-, 22 I. & N. Dec. 256, 258 (BIA en banc 1998) (dictum), as did the former INS. 64 Fed. Reg. 8478, 8481 (Feb. 19, 1999). International law, including decisions of the Committee Against Torture, takes a similar view. See Rosati, above, at 143-44. Even the Senate ratification resolution, which weakens the Convention in so many ways that you have already seen, makes no attempt to engraft criminal or national security exceptions onto article 3.

The implementing statute, however, raises the issue. Section 2242(b) requires “the appropriate agencies” to issue regulations implementing U.S. obligations under CAT. Section 2242(c) then says:

To the maximum extent consistent with the obligations of the United States under the Convention, * * * the regulations described in subsection (b) shall exclude from the protection of such regulations aliens described in [INA § 241(b)(3)(B)].

Since the Convention doesn't permit any exceptions to the bar on refoulement, the qualifying opening phrase would seem to render subsection 2242(c) a nullity. This provision thus posed a dilemma for the Justice Department. If its regulations truly excluded the 241(b)(3)(B) individuals from protection, the regulations would surely violate United States obligations under CAT. For the same reason, they would exceed the authority conferred by section 2242(c) above, given the opening qualifier. But if the regulations made no special provision at all for the 241(b)(3)(B) individuals, the Department would risk the political ire of Congress.

The solution was to issue interim regulations that distinguished "withholding of removal" (the usual remedy) from "deferral of removal" (a more limited remedy for 241(b)(3)(B) individuals). Both remedies prohibit refoulement for as long as there are substantial grounds to believe the person is in danger of torture, but the latter makes it procedurally less cumbersome to refoule the person once the danger subsides. The procedures are discussed more fully in item 13 below.

If the regulations were to change, and the Justice Department were to begin returning 241(b)(3)(B) individuals in circumstances in which CAT prohibits refoulement, the regulations would be vulnerable to challenge under the opening phrase of section 2242(c). In such an event, some difficult issues of judicial power would arise. These are discussed in item 14 below.

9. In Sale v. Haitian Centers Council, reproduced and discussed on pages 922–38 above, the Supreme Court interpreted the nonrefoulement provisions of both the 1951 Convention and the United States statute [now INA § 241(b)(3)] as being inapplicable to anyone intercepted on the high seas. Compare the language of INA § 241(b)(3) with that of the CAT implementing statute, in particular section 2242(a). Do you think Sale will be held to apply to CAT claims if the issue arises?

10. Based on what you have read so far, what do you see as the practical significance of CAT article 3 for noncitizens in the United States? Invent one or more hypotheticals in which a 241(b)(3) claim might fail while a CAT nonrefoulement claim might succeed.

11. Conversely, is it possible for a CAT claim to fail when a persecution-based claim would succeed?

12. The U.S. legislation that you just read protects the beneficiary from return to his or her torturers but makes no provision for permanent status in the United States and, importantly, makes no provision for the person's family members. Professor Lori Nessel identifies the special problems these gaps pose for victims of extreme domestic violence. CAT may be useful to domestic violence victims because, unlike asylum, there is no requirement that the harm be inflicted on any of the five Refugee Convention grounds. But the price for protecting someone from her torturer might be long-term, even permanent, separation from her children and other family members. Professor Nessel argues that these restrictions are incompatible with several norms of international human rights law. See Lori A. Nessel, Forced to Choose: Torture, Family Unification, and United States Immigration Policy, 78 Temple L. Rev. 897 (2005).

13. The procedures for filing and adjudicating CAT claims are laid out in the regulations. Except as discussed in the next paragraph, they are essentially the same as the procedures for persecution-based claims. 8 CFR § 208.16 (2008); see also id. § 208.30. Even the same application form—the familiar I-589—is prescribed for CAT claims, so that persecution-based claims and CAT requests can be made and decided together. The persecution-related nonrefoulement provisions of the expedited removal process, which were discussed in section B.7.b.iv above, also apply equally to CAT claims. Id. § 235.3(b)(4). Note that nonrefoulement claims, whether based on persecution or torture, are not subject to the one-year (or any other) filing deadline applicable to asylum.

The one major procedural difference between CAT claims and persecution-based claims stems from the statutory constraint discussed in item 9 above. The CAT implementing statute, in section 2242(c), commands the administration to deny protection to anyone described in INA § 241(b)(3)(B) (individuals ineligible for persecution-based nonrefoulement because of crime, persecution, or national security concerns), “to the maximum extent consistent with the obligations of the United States under the Convention.” Since the nonrefoulement obligations under CAT are not subject to any exceptions, the government recognized it could not deny all protection, even to 241(b)(3)(B) individuals. It therefore distinguished two protective remedies—“withholding of removal” and a slightly less favorable remedy called “deferral of removal.” The former is for applicants who satisfy all the requirements of CAT and do not fall within any of the 241(b)(3)(B) disqualifications. The latter is for those who meet the CAT requirements but fall within one of the 241(b)(3)(B) disqualifications. See 8 CFR § 208.17 (2008).

Both remedies bar the person’s return to the country in which torture is feared but, like the persecution-related form of nonrefoulement that you studied earlier, neither remedy prevents the government from returning the person to a safe third country. The rules that govern detention and employment authorization pending proceedings to determine persecution-based asylum or nonrefoulement apply here as well.

The main difference between withholding and deferral concerns the ease of termination. To terminate withholding of removal, the government must move to reopen, produce new evidence that was previously unavailable, and sustain its burden of proof by a preponderance of the evidence. 8 CFR § 208.24(f) (2008). In contrast, to terminate deferral of removal, the government need only move for a hearing and produce relevant evidence not previously considered. The immigration judge will then hold an expedited hearing at which the applicant will have the burden of proof and the IJ will decide de novo. Id. § 208.17(d). An immigration judge's order terminating either withholding or deferral is appealable to the BIA. Id. § 208.17(d)(4).

14. The implementing statute, in section 2242(d), addresses the subject of judicial review. Please review that paragraph carefully at this time. Dissected, the provision consists of a "notwithstanding" clause, then an "except" clause, then a clause that speaks to the reviewability of the regulations themselves, then a pair of clauses dealing with the reviewability of the denials of individual claims, and finally another "except" clause—all in one breathtaking sentence. See some insightful parsing in Kristen Rosati's article, cited in item 4 above, at 145-46.

a. Taken alone, section 2242(d) might have left some uncertainty whether the "notwithstanding" clause was meant to be subject to an implied habeas corpus exception. Recall the materials in chapter 9, section B.6.b above. But in 2005, the REAL ID Act, § 106(a)(1)(B), added new INA § 242(a)(4), which makes clear that the petition for review procedure is the exclusive means of challenging administratively final denials of Torture Convention claims; even habeas corpus is expressly excluded. If for some reason a petition for review is not possible in a given case (for example, because the time for filing the petition has lapsed), it is not clear whether the Constitution would require the availability of habeas. See generally the St. Cyr decision and the accompanying discussion in chapter 9, section B.6.b above. Also unclear is whether a total bar on judicial review of a CAT claim denial in a given case would violate the Convention itself.

b. Suppose the BIA denies a CAT claim on the basis of something contained in the regulations, and the applicant files a petition for review of the resulting removal order. Suppose further that the court believes that the regulations exceeded the authority conferred by the statute. May the court reverse the BIA decision on the ground that the regulations on which it was based were invalid? (Watch the statutory punctuation.)

c. The first "except" clause, near the beginning of the provision, purports to empower the Attorney General to decide, in the regulations, whether a court will have jurisdiction to review those regulations. In turn, the regulations say only that, pursuant to the statute, "there shall be no judicial appeal or review of any action, decision, or claim raised under the Convention or [section 2242(d)], except as part of the review of a final order of removal [under INA § 242] . . ." 8 CFR § 208.18(e) (2008). What do you think of the first "except" clause in section 2242(d)?

d. At least two courts have asserted habeas corpus jurisdiction under 28 USC § 2241, notwithstanding the court-stripping language in section 2242(d). See Saint Fort v. Ashcroft, 329 F.3d 191 (1st Cir. 2003); Mu-Xing Wang v. Ashcroft, 320 F.3d 130 (2d Cir. 2003).

15. The procedures you have been considering are provided by United States municipal law. CAT also establishes some international remedies in torture cases, but as you will soon discover they are of little use to CAT claimants in the United States, at least in the nonrefoulement context. To see why this is so, review CAT articles 20, 21, and 22 (which deal with three different powers of the Committee Against Torture), then CAT article 28, and then Declaration #2 of the Senate ratification resolution. Exactly which competencies of the Committee Against Torture does the United States accept?

16. CAT Article 30.1 creates another mechanism for resolving international disputes. If states parties disagree about the interpretation or application of CAT and cannot resolve the dispute through negotiation, any one of them may submit the case to arbitration. If after six months the parties cannot agree on the organization of the arbitration, then any of them may refer the case to the International Court of Justice (ICJ) in the Hague. Article 30.2, however, allows any State Party to opt out of article 30.1. In Reservation #2 of the Senate ratification resolution, the United States did so. The Senate Foreign Relations Committee Report, at 28, explained that this decision was in keeping with the Reagan Administration's 1985 withdrawal from the compulsory jurisdiction of the ICJ (in the midst of Nicaragua's suit against the U.S.).

17. As is probably obvious from the long list of reservations, understandings, and declarations in the Senate ratification resolution, the final product reflected compromises among Senators with vastly different views about human rights, United States sovereignty, and the whole concept of an international legal order. Some Senators wanted CAT to have real teeth, even if that meant that the United States, like every other State Party, could be held accountable to an international body. Other Senators staunchly opposed ratification and as a fallback position sought to make CAT as ineffectual as possible. Contrast the following speeches on the Senate floor during the ratification debate:

Senator Nancy Kassebaum (R-Kansas):

Mr. President, I rise today to express my strong support for ratification of [CAT]. * * *

Last July, Amnesty International released its 1990 report documenting the incidence of torture of thousands of individuals in more than 100 countries. Though we do live with the reality of state-sanctioned torture in some countries, as well as its random occurrence, amnesty's statistics were nothing less than shocking.

Our ratification of the Convention Against Torture will, in itself, lead us closer to the goal it represents. The convention makes legitimate the right of nations to be concerned and to intercede regarding the behavior of another country toward its citizens. * * *

* * *

Critics of this convention also say it may give other countries opportunity to make charges against the United States. I do not agree with this because I believe we have nothing to fear about our compliance with the terms of this treaty. Torture is simply not accepted in this country, and never will be. [This speech was delivered long before September 11, 2001 and the controversial Bush Administration policies on torture—Eds.]

* * *

Mr. President, I would note that the United States is the only permanent member of the U.N. Security Council which has not ratified the convention. * * *

The Torture Convention * * * would send a powerful signal to torturers around the world that the United States will not tolerate its practice. As we near the end of the 20th century, let us take this step to help bring the world closer to ending practices which deny individuals basic human dignity.

136 Cong. Rec. at S17491 (Oct. 27, 1990).

Senator Jesse Helms (R-N.C.), Chairman, Senate Foreign Relations Committee:

* * * [Here Senator Helms is speaking in support of a contentious “sovereignty” reservation that would have made CAT subject to the U.S. Constitution insofar as it is enforced against the United States.] [O]ne only has to look at the current membership of the Committee on Torture, which includes a representative from the Soviet Union and a representative from Bulgaria.

The Soviet Union and Bulgaria have their own particular expertise in the matters of torture. This Convention’s Committee on Torture is a farce, and it may be a dangerous farce. One could well say in this case that the lunatics are indeed running the asylum. I do not want those folks poking their noses into the operation of the U.S. legal system. They have plenty to do with the notorious injustice exemplified by the two countries I have just mentioned.

* * *

However, since this Convention is primarily symbolic, it is not necessary to engage in a superfluous debate. * * *

* * *

* * * [I]nternational law is a mere subordinate agent to the U.S. Constitution. * * * A treaty is a contract between two independent parties; but unlike domestic contracts which are subordinate to the U.S. Constitution and customary law, a treaty is without sanctions other than the good faith, prestige and power of the contracting parties.

* * * International law is merely a combination of codification and basic international customary practice leading to expectations of action by a nation state, but it can in no way be determinative of any such act.

* * *

The Torture Convention is by and large a rhetorical gesture, expressing the revulsion which every decent nation has against torture. * * *

But if the convention is meant in itself to be anything more than a rhetorical gesture, or to lay the basis to go beyond a rhetorical gesture, then it may present a clear and present danger to U.S. sovereignty and to the people of the United States. When even nations notorious in the annals of torture such as the Soviet Union and Bulgaria, piously sign such a treaty, it cheapens the consensus.

136 Cong. Rec. S17487-89 (Oct. 27, 1990).

18. The Torture Victims Relief Act of 1998, Pub. L. 105-320, 112 Stat. 3016 (Oct. 30, 1998), is also relevant here. Sections 4 and 5 of this statute award grants to overseas and United States treatment centers for torture victims. Section 7 requires the Secretary of State to provide special training for foreign service officers on the subject of torture, including gender-specific training for dealing with victims of sexual violence.

PROBLEMS 7-9

Problem 7. Police detectives in a totalitarian country have taken A into custody. Although they have no evidence that he has committed any crime, they think he knows the whereabouts of a prominent criminal fugitive. A denies knowing anything about the fugitive, but his captors do not believe him. After several hours of fruitless interrogation, his captors tell him that if he doesn't cooperate they will confine him permanently, and then one night in the next year they will kill him in his sleep. "Try thinking about that for a while," they tell him. They also tell him (falsely) that they have already killed his family. It has now been eight months, and A is still in detention. Has he been tortured (a) according to CAT; and (b) according to the U.S. Senate?

Problem 8. The secret police of another totalitarian country, acting on the direct orders of the President, apprehend and arrest B, one of the leaders of a peaceful democratic resistance movement. They detain him in a 4' by 4' jail cell. Every night the guards awaken him two or three times, beat him, and administer excruciating electrical shocks. He is given only enough food and water to stay alive and is never allowed to leave his cell. They tell him this treatment will continue until he signs a statement publicly denouncing the resistance movement and discrediting the other leaders by accusing them of fabricated crimes. B refuses. After three years in detention under those conditions, the President instructs the police to release him if he agrees to leave the country.

Emaciated, dangerously weak, and psychologically defeated, B agrees. Upon his release he obtains funds from the resistance, makes his way to the United States, and enters surreptitiously with the help of a smuggler. One week later ICE apprehends B and initiates removal proceedings. B applies for asylum under INA § 208 and for relief under CAT. While proceedings are pending, B, desperate for cash, commits an armed robbery of a gas station. He is convicted and sentenced to five years in prison. (Note his offense is an aggravated felony under INA § 101(a)(43)(F)). In the meantime, the democratic resistance movement that B helped to lead has toppled the totalitarian regime and now leads a democratic government. Nonetheless the haunting memories of his imprisonment and torture at the hands of the secret police are overwhelming, and B wishes never to return. B is still serving his criminal sentence and the removal hearing is about to begin. Is there any relief for which B is eligible? Before answering, review INA §§ 208(b)(2)(A, B) and 241(b)(3)(B).

Problem 9. C, who lives in a rural region of a third-world country, has been relentlessly abused by her husband for the duration of their two-year-old marriage. The abuse has included dangerous physical beatings and violent sexual assaults, occurring several times per month. Her husband repeatedly threatens to make the assaults even more brutal if she ever tells anyone or tries to escape. In any event, he assures her, he knows enough people that he could easily hunt her down anywhere in the country. Her screams and her conspicuous bruises make her situation obvious to all observers, including the police, but spousal violence is commonplace in her village and is routinely overlooked.

C escapes to the United States and applies for both asylum under INA § 208 and relief under CAT. Will she succeed?

2. TEMPORARY PROTECTION

a. UNITED STATES DOMESTIC LAW: TEMPORARY PROTECTED STATUS AND ITS PREDECESSORS

You have seen that the applicant for either asylum or withholding of removal must prove an individualized danger based on his or her race, religion, nationality, membership in a social group, or political opinion. The person who simply fears being caught in the crossfire of an armed conflict, or who is targeted because of some personal feud, or who is fleeing economic or natural disaster does not qualify. On this, if little else, the case law is clear. See, e.g., Martinez-Romero v. INS, 692 F.2d 595 (9th Cir. 1982); Matter of Mogharrabi, 19 I. & N. Dec. 439 (BIA 1987).

Yet most will agree that those whose lives would be endangered at home present compelling humanitarian claims for protection even if they do not meet the Convention definition of refugee or the other Convention requirements for withholding of removal. Of particular importance, because of their vast numbers, are those who seek to escape armed conflict or natural disaster. As you will see in this section, many have advocated reforms designed to provide at least temporary, and under some proposals permanent, relief.

In the United States, two vehicles historically supplied that relief on an ad hoc basis. As you saw earlier, noncitizens who have not yet entered the United States may, in the discretion of the Attorney General, be "paroled" in. INA § 212(d)(5).¹³⁰ Both before and after the Refugee Act of 1980, various Attorneys General invoked that authority on a blanket basis to aid groups of people fleeing armed conflict in particular countries. See Congressional Research Service, Review of U.S. Refugee Resettlement Programs and Policies 7-11 (Comm. Print, Senate Comm. on the Judiciary, 1980). That is no longer possible today, because IIRIRA § 602(a) amended INA § 212(d)(5) so as to confine it to case-by-case, rather than blanket, application. As a result, the executive branch today has no clearly available statutory authority to bring into the United States a group of people who face dangers other than persecution.

As for those who have already entered the United States, either unlawfully or as lawful nonimmigrants, the statute until 1990 provided no obvious form of relief. The executive branch had to be inventive. It responded by devising a remedy known as "extended voluntary departure" (EVD). As its name implies, EVD was technically an exercise of the Attorney General's power to grant voluntary departure in lieu of deportation. But EVD differed from the usual type of voluntary departure in several respects: First, EVD was granted on a blanket basis, typically to nationals of a particular war-torn country, though often limited to those who had already entered the United States by the date of the EVD announcement or some other date. In contrast, as you might recall, the usual voluntary departure is granted on a case-by-case basis. Second, unlike the usual voluntary departure, EVD was generally granted for a lengthy duration. The grant would typically be renewed if the danger had not sufficiently subsided by the initial expiration date; in some instances, Congress eventually enacted special legislation to allow adjustment of status to permanent residence. See 64 IR 1093 (1987). Third, while local officials and immigration judges routinely grant voluntary departure on a case-by-case basis under INA § 240B, only the Attorney General, acting nationwide and often upon the advice of the State Department, could then grant EVD. See 61 IR 103-04 (1984).

Here is a list of the known grants of EVD from 1960 on:

Country of Nationality	Year EVD Granted
Cuba	1960
Dominican Republic	1966
Czechoslovakia	1968
Chile	1971
Cambodia	1975

130. "Refugees" have been ineligible for parole since 1980 in the absence of "compelling reasons in the public-interest," INA § 212(d)(5)(B), but we are concerned here with those do not meet the statutory definition of "refugee."

Country of Nationality	Year EVD Granted
Vietnam	1975
Laos	1975
Lebanon	1976
Ethiopia	1977
Hungary	1977
Romania	1977
Uganda	1978
Iran	1979
Nicaragua	1979
Afghanistan	1980
Poland	1981

64 IR 1093 (1987) (also showing expiration dates and any subsequent legislation authorizing adjustment of status).

Ad hoc responses to specific crises had the advantage of flexibility. But they had clear disadvantages as well. As one commentator pointed out, "EVD is essentially ungoverned by any legally enacted standards." Michael G. Heyman, Redefining Refugee: A Proposal for Relief for the Victims of Civil Strife, 24 San Diego L.Rev. 449, 451 (1987). Consequently, the decision whether to grant EVD was subject to the same sorts of political biases that critics had imputed to the overseas refugee admission program and to asylum adjudication. A glance at the above list of countries whose nationals received EVD illustrates that the issue of foreign policy bias was a serious one. Almost all the countries on the list were adversaries of the United States at the pertinent times. The steadfast refusal of the executive branch to grant EVD to Salvadorans stood in marked contrast and during the 1980's was a continual focal point of the debates on EVD.

Also like parole, a decision not to grant EVD triggered few if any procedural rights, Heyman, above, and even a grant of EVD left the recipient with a highly uncertain, and therefore insecure, status. Apart from those considerations, there was a nagging question whether the decision to grant EVD should have been congressional, executive, or both.

For all those reasons, many suggested expanding and structuring the forms of relief available to individuals who flee civil strife. Professor Michael Heyman, in the article just mentioned, proposed amending the statutory refugee definition to embrace such people (and making corresponding changes to withholding of removal). See id. at 479-83. His approach was modeled on one adopted by the Organization for African Unity, a position discussed further below. The effect would have been to make asylum (as well as relief under the overseas admission program, which under INA § 207 applies to "refugees") available to those endangered by armed conflict.

Others advocated legislation establishing a special program, separate and apart from asylum and withholding of removal, for granting temporary refuge to those who flee generalized armed conflict or other enumerated dangers. See, e.g., the 1983 testimony of Professor T. Alexander Aleinikoff before the House Subcommittee on Immigration, Refugees and International Law, reproduced in T. Aleinikoff & D. Martin, Immigration Process and Policy 739-43 (1st ed. 1985). The generic terms for such relief are “safe haven” or “temporary protection.”

In the late 1980s a number of safe haven bills were introduced in Congress. Those efforts bore fruit in 1990. The Immigration Act of 1990, § 302, created a new program to grant “temporary protected status” (TPS) to certain individuals who could not safely return home. The program appears in INA § 244, which you should skim now.

Notice the following key elements of the statute and the implementing regulations: The Secretary of Homeland Security, after consulting with “appropriate” government agencies, may designate a foreign state or part of a foreign state under any of three circumstances: (A) There is an ongoing armed conflict that would pose a serious threat to the personal safety of the state’s nationals if they were returned there; (B) An environmental disaster has substantially but temporarily disrupted living conditions, and the state has requested designation because it cannot adequately handle the return of its nationals; or (C) “[E]xtraordinary and temporary conditions” prevent safe return, and permitting the state’s nationals to remain temporarily in the United States would not be contrary to the national interest. INA § 244(b)(1). The Secretary specifies the time period during which the designation will remain in force; that period must be somewhere between six and eighteen months. INA § 244(b)(2). Other paragraphs provide for periodic review of the conditions in the designated countries, premature terminations of those designations, and extensions. INA § 244(b)(3). There is no judicial review of the Secretary’s decision whether to designate a particular state or whether to terminate or extend a designation. INA § 244(b)(5)(A).

Nationals of a designated country then apply individually for TPS. The Secretary’s regulations generally require the person to apply to USCIS, even if removal proceedings have already begun by the time the Secretary designates the person’s country. 8 CFR § 244.7(a, d) (2008). Eligibility requirements include continuous physical presence in the United States since the effective date of the designation, continuous residence since a date specified by the Secretary, admissibility as an immigrant (with some exclusion grounds automatically excepted and some others waivable in the exercise of discretion), registration with USCIS within a specified time, and the absence of certain criminal and other disqualifications. INA § 244(c)(2).

The statute says the Secretary “may” grant TPS to an eligible national of a designated country. INA § 244(a)(1)(A). The Secretary has expressly delegated to the local USCIS directors not only the authority to decide eligibility, but also the discretion whether to grant TPS once eligibility is found. 8 CFR § 244.10(b) (2008).

The statute also requires the Secretary to provide for administrative review of TPS denials and specifies that a national of a designated country may also claim TPS in removal proceedings. INA § 244(b)(5)(B). To implement that provision, the regulations authorize appeal of the local USCIS director’s decision to the Administrative Appeals Unit (AAU), 8 CFR § 244.10(c) (2008), unless the basis for the denial was a fact that also makes the applicant removable. In that latter event, the director must issue a charging document and the applicant will have the right to a de novo TPS determination in the ensuing removal hearing. Id.

The statute does not discuss judicial review of TPS denials. In the case where the TPS application is denied in removal proceedings, the removal order itself will be reviewable in the court of appeals under INA § 242, but the denial of TPS is another matter. A denial of TPS on discretionary grounds appears to be unreviewable. INA § 242(a)(2)(B)(ii). Whether eligibility determinations may be reviewed in court is not clear. Whether AAU denials will be subject to judicial review is also unclear. General federal question jurisdiction under 28 USC § 1331 might be asserted, but the same issue of whether INA § 242(a)(2)(B)(ii) precludes judicial review of the eligibility determination arises.

TPS can also be withdrawn. The statute requires withdrawal when the Secretary finds that the recipient was ineligible for TPS at the time it was granted, or has not remained continuously physically present since receiving TPS (with some exceptions), or the recipient, without good cause, fails to register annually with USCIS. See INA § 244(c)(3).

While TPS is in effect, the beneficiary may not be removed and may work. INA § 244(a)(1). Moreover, he or she is regarded as being in lawful nonimmigrant status for purposes of INA §§ 245 and 248 (adjustment of status to permanent residence and change of status from one nonimmigrant category to another, respectively), both of which require that the applicant be in lawful status. See INA § 244(f)(4). TPS beneficiaries may not travel abroad, however, without the Secretary's prior consent. Id. § 244(f)(3). The statute also provides that TPS-time does not count toward the continuous physical presence required for cancellation of removal, but then adds, mysteriously, "unless the Secretary of Homeland Security determines that extreme hardship exists." INA § 244(e). The effect of that provision is unclear, because if the Secretary doesn't find extreme hardship (and now, the more demanding "exceptional and extremely unusual hardship"), the individual will be ineligible for cancellation of removal anyway.

Importantly, section 244(g) makes TPS the "exclusive authority" of the Secretary of Homeland Security to allow parolees or deportable noncitizens to remain in the United States temporarily on the basis of country or region. The objective of that provision was to eliminate EVD.

As noted earlier, much of the debate over safe haven in the 1980's swirled around Salvadorans, whose asylum approval rates were unusually low. Congress included in the Immigration Act of 1990 a provision, section 303, specifically designating El Salvador as a TPS country. Since then, the Administration has granted TPS to nationals of Angola, Bosnia-Herzegovina, Burundi, Honduras, Kuwait, Lebanon, Liberia, Nicaragua, Rwanda, Sierra Leone, Somalia, Sudan, and Kosovo (a breakaway province of Serbia), as well as a related remedy that it called "deferred enforced departure" to certain nationals of China and Haiti. See U.S. Cong. Research Service, CRS Report for Congress, Temporary Protected Status: Current Immigration Policy and Issues, Order Code RS20844 (Sept. 18, 2008), <http://fpc.state.gov/documents/organization/110760.pdf>, at 4–5. In many cases the grants were renewed. Relief has typically been limited to people who arrived in the United States before the designation date. See 3 Gordon, Mailman & Yale-Loehr § 33.08[2]. In addition to the countries listed in the CRS Report, Montserrat in 1997 became the first state to be designated for TPS for environmental reasons. See 62 Fed. Reg. 45685–86 (Aug. 28, 1997). Soon after that, however, the devastation wrought by Hurricane Mitch prompted the Attorney General to designate Honduras and Nicaragua as TPS states. 64 Fed. Reg. 524, 526 (Jan. 5, 1999). Two authors have urged a grant of TPS status to Palestinians. See Susan M. Akram & Terry Rempel, Temporary Protection as an Instrument for Implementing the Right of Return for Palestinian Refugees, 22 Boston Univ. Internat'l L.J. 1 (2004).

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. Even with the enactment of TPS, United States law treats people who fear persecution differently from those who fear civil strife. Why do you think the law draws that distinction? Should it? Should national economic collapse be a basis for either asylum or TPS?

2. Contrast the Heyman proposal to expand the statutory refugee definition with the TPS program that was eventually enacted. How do the two approaches differ in their practical effects? Accepting the goal of granting protection to individuals who would face generalized dangers at home, which solution do you prefer?

3. Within the TPS program, identify the statutory differences between the treatment of those who would face armed conflict and the treatment of those who would face environmental catastrophe. Should those two groups be treated differently?

4. One of Professor Heyman's concerns about having to rely on EVD was that it was "essentially ungoverned by any legally enacted standards." Does TPS adequately address that concern? In answering, first identify the various sources of executive discretion built into the TPS program. They fall generally into two categories:

a. Some concern the decision as to country designations.

b. Others concern the adjudication of individual applications. One aspect of the latter discretion is INA § 244(a)(1)(A), which says the Secretary may grant TPS to an eligible national of a designated state. What other discretion does the Secretary or his or her delegates have in adjudicating individual cases?

Do you approve of the various discretionary elements you have just identified?

5. In contrast to the discretion not to grant TPS, there is no discretion not to withdraw TPS if any of the three grounds for withdrawal is found. INA § 244(c)(3). One such ground is the beneficiary's failure, without good cause, to comply with the registration requirements (timing, form, and manner). Id. § 244(c)(3)(C). To put this in practical terms, a TPS beneficiary who registers a day late and does not have a good enough excuse shall be sent back to a country that the Secretary of Homeland Security has just characterized as too dangerous to return to. The Secretary is given no discretion to avoid that consequence, even in the most compelling case. Is the penalty proportionate to the transgression?

6. As its name implies, TPS is supposed to be “temporary.” Relief is to last until it becomes safe for the person to return home. Some opponents of TPS were skeptical that the beneficiaries, after tasting prosperity and security and after developing deeper ties to people and institutions here, would really leave when their time was up. Many also believed that, once TPS had been granted for an extended period of time, Congress would be tempted to avoid hardship by passing special legislation granting permanent resident status to TPS beneficiaries. The compromise appears in INA § 244(h). TPS would be enacted, but Congress would not later pass the kind of permanent residence provision just described unless there was especially strong support for doing so. What effect will section 244(h) have if, at some future time, a simple majority in each House wishes to bestow permanent residence on TPS recipients from a particular country?

7. Another point of controversy during the years in which TPS was debated was the proper role of country-specific legislation. You have seen that section 302 of the Immigration Act of 1990 created generic criteria and procedures for TPS at the same time that section 303 was conferring TPS on nationals of one particular country, El Salvador. What do you see as the pros and cons of country-specific legislation in the context of TPS, either with or without corresponding generic legislation?

b. GLOBAL AND REGIONAL APPROACHES TO TEMPORARY PROTECTION

One of the first commentators to chide American immigration scholars for inadequate attention to international law was James A.R. Nafziger, A Commentary on American Legal Scholarship Concerning the Admission of Migrants, 17 Univ. Michigan J. L. Reform 165, 173–77 (1984). In that article Professor Nafziger advocated expanding the international definition of refugee to include a broader set of dangers; accord, Isabelle R. Gunning, Expanding the International Definition of Refugee: A Multicultural View, 13 Fordham Internat’l L.J. 35 (1989–90). This call for a broader vision appears to have borne fruit, as abundant international refugee law scholarship quickly blossomed in the United States.¹³¹ And for a long time overseas

¹³¹ See, e.g., T. Alexander Aleinikoff & Vincent Chetail (eds.), Migration and International Legal Norms (2003); Anker at 9–11, 465–522; Gunning, above; Isabelle R. Gunning, Modernizing Customary International Law and the Challenge of Human Rights, 31 Virginia J. Internat’l L. 301 (1991); David A. Martin, Effects of International Law on Migration Policy and Practice:

The Uses of Hypocrisy, 23 Internat’l Migration Rev. 547 (1989); Deborah Perluss & Joan F. Hartman [subsequently Fitzpatrick], Temporary Refuge: Emergence of a Customary Norm, 26 Virginia J. Internat’l L. 551 (1986) [hereafter cited as Perluss & Fitzpatrick]; Peter H. Schuck, Refugee Burden-Sharing: A Modest Proposal, 22 Yale J. Internat’l L. 243 (1997); David Weissbrodt & Lau-scholars have analyzed carefully the limitations that international law places on national sovereignty in the context of immigration.¹³² But it remains true that the immigration literature has not fully tapped the rich resources of international law. And in no area of immigration is the potential relevance of international law greater than in the context of refugees, asylees, and other displaced persons.

The literature on temporary protection has reflected similar philosophical trends. The conventional wisdom has been that temporary protection of non-Convention refugees, while less advantageous to the beneficiary than asylum is, nonetheless provides an important safety valve for the affected individuals. Professor Joan Fitzpatrick in 1994 questioned that conventional wisdom. She argued that in actual practice the nations of the world frequently use temporary safe haven less as a supplement to the protections afforded by asylum than as an excuse for restricting grants of asylum. See Joan Fitzpatrick, Flight from Asylum: Trends Toward Temporary "Refuge" and Local Responses to Forced Migrations, 35 Virginia J. Internat'l L. 13 (1994). There is now a lively debate about whether refugee advocates should favor increased reliance on temporary refuge as a strategy for persuading the world's receiving states to welcome larger numbers of refugees. See, e.g., Davor Sopf, Temporary Protection in Europe after 1990: The "Right to Remain" of Genuine Convention Refugees, 6 Washington Univ. J. L. & Policy 109 (2001).

In the article that follows, Professor Fitzpatrick develops that theme further. She considers not only the benefits and dangers of temporary protection regimes, but also whether temporary protection ought to be made the subject of an international agreement rather than left entirely to the discretion of individual states.

Joan Fitzpatrick, Temporary Protection of Refugees: Elements of a Formalized Regime

94 Amer. J. Internat'l L. 279, 279-80, 285-91, 296, 299-300, 303-04 (2000).

Temporary protection of refugees (TP) gained surprising prominence during the 1990s as a response to forced migration, at times seeming poised to displace the regime based on the 1951 Convention Relating to the Status of Refugees and its 1967 Protocol. The unprecedented Humanitarian Evacuation Programme to airlift Kosovar refugees to temporary safety in European and more distant states exemplifies TP's appeal and adaptability. The Kosovo experience, by restoring faith that some mass influxes are ra Danielson, Immigration Law and Procedure in a Nutshell, ch. 11 (5th ed. 2005); see also James A.R. Nafziger, The General Admission of Aliens under International Law, 77 Amer. J. Internat'l L. 804 (1983).

132. E.g., Guy S. Goodwin-Gill & Jane McAdam, The Refugee in International Law (3d ed. 2007); Guy S. Goodwin-Gill, Internation-

Law and the Movement of Persons Between States (1978); Atle Grahl-Madsen, The Status of Refugees in International Law (2 vols., 1966 and 1972); James C. Hathaway, The Rights of Refugees under International Law (2005); James C. Hathaway, The Law of Refugee Status (1991); Richard Plender, International Migration Law (rev. 2d ed. 1988).

genuinely temporary, may reinvigorate enthusiasm for TP, which had flagged during the endgame to the Bosnian refugee crisis.

Temporary protection is not a new concept. Various versions of it were codified in a 1969 African refugee convention, promoted during mass flows from Southeast Asia two decades ago, and vigorously debated in the context of flight from Central American civil wars in the 1980s. Yet steps toward comprehensive codification of TP at the international level have been notably modest and slow. * * * The issue explored here is whether formalization of temporary protection, at the universal or regional level, is either likely or advisable.

* * *

Temporary protection is like a magic gift, assuming the desired form of its enthusiasts' policy objectives. Simultaneously, it serves as a magic mirror of its observers' fears. For refugee advocates, TP expands the protection of forced migrants who cannot satisfy the criteria under the 1951 Convention and it promises group-based protection when the determination of an individual's status proves impossible. At the same time, refugee rights organizations fear that informal and discretionary TP may dislodge refugee protection from the realm of enforceable human rights. For refugee agencies such as the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees, TP serves as a short-term strategy to secure the immediate physical safety of refugees and a way station to more durable protection. But where TP is offered as a diluted substitute protection for Convention refugees, it represents a threat to the 1951 refugee regime. Moreover, regionalization of temporary protection could erode the UNHCR's influence. States, especially those under pressure from domestic constituencies preoccupied with migration, hope that TP will help them save costs on status determination, reduce social and economic benefits to asylum seekers, resist full integration of those who are granted asylum, and prioritize their rapid repatriation. TP may assist democratic states in mediating competing public demands that asylum not be a back door to immigration but that humanitarian ideals be sustained. Yet states also remain skeptical about formalizing temporary protection, since international TP obligations might expand the numbers of forced migrants eligible for legal protection against repatriation and pledges of international solidarity may create unpredictable and politically costly future burdens.

* * *

The establishment of a separate group-based status determination process through temporary protected status in the United States * * * [suggested] that TP's beneficiaries differ significantly from Convention refugees. First, TPS beneficiaries are assumed to be persons facing generalized danger rather than an individualized peril. Individual beneficiaries are approved through a streamlined process that focuses on nationality, rather than personal histories of harm and risk.

Second, leave to remain is limited in time, in contrast to open-ended grants of asylum, which by design often facilitate the rapid acquisition of permanent resident status. TPS preserves administrative discretion and avoids durable ties to beneficiaries. Although the statute sets forth general criteria for the grant, extension, and termination of TPS, the Attorney General's application of these criteria is not transparent or subject to external review. As a result, the duration of TPS is susceptible to significant political influence and is not necessarily tied to the severity of the danger prevailing in the state of origin. TPS thus contrasts markedly with non-refoulement under the 1951 Convention, which must be non-discriminatory on nationality grounds and is tied to the persistence of danger rather than artificial time constraints.

Third, TPS does not function as an admissions program but protects only those who happen to be in the United States at the time the Attorney General recognizes the crisis. Thus, TPS is not a strategy for responding to mass influx. In such crises the United States responds variably by establishing external safe havens or admitting the migrants as refugees.

The pressures of rapidly increasing asylum caseloads during the late 1980s and early 1990s in northern states attracted policymakers to temporary protection as a strategy to circumvent the highly contested arena of refugee status determination. Lesser-regulated and lower-visibility measures of protection could assuage demands for a humanitarian response to forced migrants, without committing the states of Western Europe to a durable solution or the full range of social and economic benefits extended to successful applicants for asylum.

In the early 1990s, European states found themselves in an unwanted frontline position with respect to forced migrants from the former Yugoslavia. They responded by favoring temporary protection and avoiding grants of durable asylum; additional interim measures of protection were introduced in national law and practice. Administrative costs could be saved by diverting TP beneficiaries from the process of refugee status determination. Because this sudden enthusiasm for temporary protection coincided with a substantial raising of barriers to entry by migrants from the former Yugoslavia, such as visa requirements and a general tightening of asylum procedures, the UNHCR acquiesced in the TP strategy as likely to contribute to an overall enhancement in safety. The European practice of temporary protection for these migrants was restrictive, however, and tended to favor those with strong claims to the status of Convention refugee. * * *

* * *

An additional factor animating resort to temporary protection in response to both the Bosnian and the Kosovo crises was the nature of the displacement. Ethnically based armed conflict is largely aimed at driving out disfavored populations. Offering durable asylum to the victims of "ethnic cleansing" poses a moral and political dilemma to receiving states, which wish to avoid complicity in genocide and to resist the persecutor's fait accompli. The Kosovo experience suggests that concerted intervention, accompanied by temporary protection in regional and more distant states, can reverse ethnic cleansing. However, Kosovo also demonstrates that rapid repatriation, even when voluntary, may precipitate new population displacement if conditions are insecure.

II. THE WHY—OBJECTIVES AND MOTIVATIONS

At least four motivations influence the participants in the debate over TP. First, some are dissatisfied because the 1951 Convention does not encompass all forced migrants generally acknowledged to be in need of international protection. Formalization of temporary protection could fill this perceived gap in international legal standards, and provide a comprehensive framework to substitute for the current patchwork of national TP laws and practices.

Second, temporary protection serves as an interim response to mass influx, providing safety while a durable solution is sought. For developed states burdened with heavy asylum caseloads and social tensions over levels of immigration, temporary protection is an attractive option precisely because it seems to impose no enduring obligation and because in certain formulations regional solutions are prioritized. Since most refugees are located in the South, regional TP could advantage the North. There is obvious tension between the first objective to expand legal obligations to forced migrants and the second impulse toward discretion, flexibility, and avoidance of direct protection for endangered persons from distant regions.

Third, temporary protection is often associated with effective responsibility sharing, possibly involving the physical transfer of asylum seekers and structured schemes for financial assistance for states of refuge. This objective may be resisted by states seeking to avoid legal commitment and by refugee advocates who fear the commodification of refugee protection.

Fourth, states weary of their obligations under refugee law may look upon a TP regime as a strategy to shift refugee protection from the realm of law to that of politics and voluntary humanitarian assistance. The flat repudiation of the 1951 Convention without some substitute multilateral framework is unlikely, especially as the non-refoulement norm in general human rights law is strengthening, but TP can be presented as an adaptation to the contemporary realities of forced displacement. This possible ulterior state motivation dampens the enthusiasm of many refugee advocates for a formalized TP regime.

* * *

There are at least two drawbacks to a strategy of seeking to broaden the definition of refugee through the formalization of temporary protection. First, the dangers provoking the flight of non-Convention refugees (such as internal armed conflict) are not inherently more temporary than the risk of persecution. A system of protection rigidly designed to provide only short-term refuge for expanded categories of refugees would be counterproductive if premature and unsafe repatriation emerged as the likely endgame. Second, it may be misleading to associate non-Convention refugees with mass influx. Recent experience with forced migrants from Bosnia and Kosovo suggests that severe religious and political persecution, well within the 1951 definition, may trigger the flight of large groups of persons. The invocation of temporary protection in all circumstances of mass influx and the association of TP by policymakers and publics with non-Convention refugees could dilute existing legal guarantees under the 1951 Convention for persons who flee en masse from persecutory harm.

Concerns like these appear to have induced nongovernmental organizations such as the European Council on Refugees and Exiles to urge, and the European Commission to accept, a two-track approach to broadening the definition of refugee and formalizing temporary protection. ECRE argues that the humanitarian practices of many European states, in granting leave to remain to persons unable to satisfy national interpretations of the definition in the 1951 Convention, could usefully be harmonized and incorporated in a binding regional legal instrument. However, ECRE urges that this important task not be consigned to the process of constructing a regional system of temporary protection. The latter should be limited to situations of mass influx that genuinely overwhelm the system for determining refugee status, where temporary protection could serve as an interim solution until an appropriate long-term response could be collectively devised.

* * *

Temporary Protection and Mass Influx

Temporary protection is often linked to mass influx, but whether TP should be so restricted is not clearly agreed. Admission to safety and protection against unsafe forced return are commonly assumed to be the guarantees most vital to mass arrivals, while other aspects of their treatment may have to be compromised, at least in the short term, to avoid placing an unrealistic burden on the state of refuge.

Even when the causes of flight are not ephemeral, a time-limited form of protection may be desirable if large-scale arrivals overwhelm the system for determining refugee status or no such system even exists. TP, however, is not the only acceptable response to mass influx. Group-based status determination is also an alternative. Protection for such refugees may cease pursuant to the cessation clauses of the 1951 Convention or as a result of the availability of a durable solution that does not necessarily involve local settlement.

If a mass influx occurs in a state party to the 1951 Convention, a leap toward temporary protection may be questionable. When the causes of flight are likely to endure and the migrants have no concrete prospect of resettlement in third states, instituting a TP regime may involve a significant dilution in the standards of treatment under the 1951 Convention. A mass influx may include many persons who are fleeing persecution. Experience with the flight from Bosnia suggests that states may engage in wishful thinking with respect to the prospects for rapid and safe repatriation, and may implement TP when ordinary refugee status determination remains feasible.

* * *

Duration

Temporary protection should last until a durable solution is found, which may involve repatriation after the crisis has ceased. The same is logically true under the 1951 Convention, whose cessation clauses, definition of refugee, and provision on non-refoulement all suggest that international protection may be temporary. Political asylum may constitute a relatively brief interlude in a refugee's existence. Thus, the fact that the duration of TP is linked to the continuation of risk does not set it apart from the existing refugee regime.

Whether nonpersecutory causes of flight are inherently more ephemeral than persecution is disputable. While some data suggest that internal armed conflicts in the latter half of the twentieth century are generally brief (e.g., lasting five years), many conflicts persist for decades. Repatriation to postconflict societies poses severe challenges, owing to damaged infrastructure, pervasive violence, lack of economic opportunity, and distrust or lingering hatred between communities.

At the same time, victims of forced displacement often strongly desire to return and may self-repatriate before conditions are safe or settled. TP regimes may be consciously structured to cultivate this natural desire for repatriation and to encourage the recipients to conceive of exile as limited in time. TP recipients may be repatriated more commonly than successful asylum applicants.

States have adopted a variety of approaches to limit the duration of TP. These have included (1) the eventual restructuring of protection toward in-country processing (for example, the institution of orderly-departure programs for Vietnamese asylum seekers and the shift in U.S. policy toward Cubans from offshore refuge to processing in Havana); (2) deadlines for the distant resettlement of TP beneficiaries housed in camps; (3) the transition of TP beneficiaries into a more durable status following the passage of a set period; (4) termination of group-based TP in light of changed conditions in the state of origin, with the simultaneous opening of access to individualized procedures for refugee status determination; (5) periodic extensions or terminations of TP on the basis of assessments of conditions in the state of origin; and (6) repatriation under pressure of refugees on the basis of claimed changed circumstances.

Cessation of TP has a dual aspect. First, TP may be terminated, and its beneficiaries repatriated, when conditions in the state of origin permit return in safety and with dignity. Second, TP should be terminated, and a solution not involving involuntary repatriation provided, when danger persists in the state of origin and TP beneficiaries can no longer tolerably be maintained in uncertainty or under standards of treatment that fall substantially short of the 1951 Convention.

* * *

Standards of Treatment

TP programs instituted in various states encompass a striking variety of standards of treatment. Diverse approaches are taken to such matters as employment, education, housing, social benefits, and family unity. In some cases, TP beneficiaries receive treatment similar to that offered to recognized refugees. In others, states of refuge make conscious efforts to retard assimilative tendencies, or to limit the economic impact by such measures as restrictions on access to the labor market.

Harmonization of standards of treatment is a significant animating influence for EU action on TP. Disparity in standards of treatment not only can prompt secondary movements, but also implicates concerns about equity, consistency with basic human rights norms, and responsibility sharing. * * *

* * *

Family unity is a crucial issue. While the European Commission's draft limits family reunification to spouses and minor or dependent children, this guarantee is actually more generous than the practice of some European states during the crisis in the former Yugoslavia. * * *

When TP is withdrawn, beneficiaries should be given access to the system for determining refugee status prior to their removal. Where cessation of refugee protection is ordered on a class basis, recognized refugees are generally permitted to establish that a general change in conditions has not eliminated their individual well-founded fear. Since a mass influx may have included persons fleeing persecution, and access to status determination may have been delayed during the period of temporary protection, belated consideration of individual claims will ensure that no one is returned in violation of the 1951 Convention. The savings enjoyed by states substituting TP for Convention status may thereby be diminished, unless conditions have changed so dramatically that most TP beneficiaries embrace the opportunity for voluntary repatriation.

* * *

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. As this article makes abundantly clear, refugee advocates and governments of states of refuge tend to view TP in markedly different ways. Explain (a) precisely what attracts refugee advocates to TP and what concerns them; and (b) what attracts governments of destination states to TP and what concerns them.

2. What do you think are the effects of TP on the countries of origin? Among other things, consider Professor Fitzpatrick's discussion of ethnic cleansing.

3. After reading this article, do you think that either a regional or a universal convention specifying minimum standards for TP is desirable, or is the subject best left to each state?

4. Professor Fitzpatrick refers to a "formalized" regime of temporary protection. What does she mean by this, and how does it differ from what she calls "responsibility-sharing?"

5. One crucial question raised by this article is what the substantive criteria for TP ought to be. Should TP be granted only in cases of mass influx? Only to non-Convention refugees? Only when there are both mass influx and non-Convention refugees? Only when there is either mass influx or non-Convention refugees?

6. Should TP be an onshore program (i.e., for people who have already made their way to the territory of the destination state), an offshore program (for people who are still in their countries of origin or temporarily in third countries), or both?

7. Considering both ideal goals and political realities, what package of rights should TP beneficiaries have? Consider here whether there should be a right to permanent resident status in the event safe repatriation proves impossible for a prescribed number of years, as well as social and economic rights. Should the rights of TP beneficiaries resemble those of LPRs? Of asylees? Of nonimmigrants? None of these?

8. In 2001 the Council of the European Union issued Council Directive 2001/55/EC on Minimum Standards for giving protection in the event of a mass influx of displaced persons and on measures promoting a balance of efforts between Member States in receiving such persons and bearing the consequences thereof (20 July 2001) (binding on all Member States). For the full text, see http://www.ecre.org/eu_developments/tpdir.pdf.

9. The International Law Association (ILA), a private nonprofit association of scholars, practitioners, and judges interested in international law, does most of its work through an elaborate network of committees. After several years of work on the subject of TP, the Committee on Refugee Procedures of the ILA released an interim report that included a draft declaration proposed for ILA adoption. The report was prepared by Professor Walter Kälin of the University of Berne. The internationally and ideologically diverse committee members reached consensus on some things but not others. Here is a summary excerpt:

* * * There seems to be a consensus that temporary protection should be provided in situations where large numbers of persons arrive because they have to flee generalized violence or civil war and other forms of armed conflict. There is also agreement that temporary protection should make it possible for States to protect such persons without having to go into full-fledged status determination procedures by suspending asylum proceedings for some time; at the same time, it is considered necessary to examine and accommodate, at some point, the claims of those who turn out to be genuine refugees in the sense of 1951 Convention Relating to the Status of Refugees (CSR51). Finally, the members of the Committee agree that temporary protection is a return-oriented concept although, in certain circumstances, it might turn out that return would not become a viable option for prolonged periods of time. There is also agreement that any temporary protection regime has to be framed in a way that is compatible with the [1951 Convention].

A certain disagreement exists regarding the rights that should be granted to those receiving temporary protection. Should these rights gradually improve and finally be assimilated to those of refugees under [the 1951 Convention] or should they be reduced to a minimum as to make it easier for receiving States to grant temporary protection? There is also a certain disagreement among the members of the Committee as to whether temporary protection should be limited in time.

Finally, some members of the Committee stressed the need to address the issue of burden-sharing among States.

Walter Kälin, Committee on Refugee Procedures, International Law Association, Third Interim Report on Temporary Protection, in International Law Association, Report of the Sixty-Ninth Conference at 902 et seq. (2000).

10. Several other international law sources have been invoked to support a right to temporary protection. Here are three:

a. In 1969 the Organization of African Unity (OAU) adopted a convention that defines "refugee" to include not only those who fall within the 1951 Convention definition, but also "every person who, owing to external aggression, occupation, foreign domination or events seriously disturbing public order in either part or the whole of his country of origin or nationality, is compelled to leave his place of habitual residence in order to seek refuge." Organization of African Unity Convention on Refugee Problems in Africa, 1001 U.N.T.S. 45, art. I, para. 2 (Sept. 10, 1969). The 1984 Cartagena Declaration, by several Latin American countries, incorporates a similar principle. UNHCR, 2 Collection of International Instruments and Other Legal Texts Concerning Refugees and Displaced Persons 206 (1995). One commentator has gone a step further, arguing for international protection of those who flee specified forms of economic deprivation.¹³³

b. A second source that some have argued provides a right not to be returned to a country in which armed conflict would threaten one's life is the Geneva Convention Relative to the Protection of Civilian Persons in 133. See Francis A. Gabor, Reflections on the Freedom of Movement in Light of the Dismantled "Iron Curtain," 65 Tulane L. Rev. 849, 863-66 (1991); Francis A. Gabor, The Immigration Reform and Control Act of 1986: An Analysis in the Light of Contemporary International Law, 23 Internat'l Lawyer 485, 492-99 (1989).

Time of War, Geneva Convention No. IV, 6 U.S.T. 3516, T.I.A.S. No. 3365, 75 U.N.T.S. 287 (Aug. 12, 1949, entered into force for United States Feb. 2, 1956) [the Fourth Geneva Convention]. As its name implies, that convention bestows various protections on civilians endangered by war. In Matter of Medina, 19 I. & N. Dec. 734 (BIA 1988), a Salvadoran national argued that the Fourth Geneva Convention prohibited the United States from deporting her to El Salvador while civil war was raging. The Board rejected her claim. It held that the Convention creates no right not to be returned to countries beset by civil war. The Board observed that all the provisions of that Convention except one were expressly limited to international, rather than civil, conflicts. The one exception, article 3, requires each "Party" to a civil conflict to treat non-combatants humanely. Since the United States was not a party to the conflict, the Board reasoned, article 3 was inapplicable. Accord, Echeverria-Hernandez v. United States INS, 923 F.2d 688, 693 (9th Cir.1991).

c. A third possibility is customary international law. In The Paquete Habana, 175 U.S. 677, 20 S.Ct. 290, 44 L.Ed. 320 (1900), the Supreme Court said:

International law is part of our law, and must be ascertained and administered by the courts of justice of appropriate jurisdiction as often as questions of right depending upon it are presented for their determination. For this purpose, where there is no treaty and no controlling executive or legislative act or judicial decision, resort must be had to the customs and usages of civilized nations.

175 U.S. at 700, 20 S.Ct. at 299, 44 L.Ed. at 328-29 (emphasis added). To establish a customary norm of international law, one must ordinarily demonstrate (a) that states generally follow a particular practice and (b) that they do so out of a sense that the practice is legally obligatory. Perluss & Fitzpatrick, above, at 555-56. The latter requirement is captured by the shorthand term "opinio juris." Id. at 556.

Is there a customary norm of international law that prohibits states from forcibly returning individuals to countries in which their lives are threatened by armed conflict? Arguing yes are Perluss & Fitzpatrick, above; cf. Gunning [Modernizing Customary International Law], above (arguing that practices of trans-national and nongovernmental organizations should also be considered relevant evidence of international custom and that, if they are, there is a customary norm prohibiting forcible return to dangerous wartime conditions); see generally Guy S. Goodwin-Gill, Non-Refoulement and the New Asylum Seekers, 26 Virginia J. Internat'l L. 897 (1986). More skeptical, particularly about the application of opinio juris, is Kay Hailbronner, Non-Refoulement and "Humanitarian" Refugees: Customary International Law or Wishful Legal Thinking?, 26 Virginia J. Internat'l L. 857 (1986).

The BIA and at least one court have rejected arguments based on customary international law, finding the evidence inadequate to demonstrate opinio juris. Matter of Medina, 19 I. & N. Dec. 734, 744 (BIA 1988); Echeverria-Hernandez v. United States INS, 923 F.2d 688, 693 (9th Cir. 1991). The BIA in Medina further doubted that either immigration judges or the BIA would have the statutory authority to grant relief on the basis of customary international law even if a norm could be established. Observing that the Paquete Habana formulation assumes the absence of preemptive domestic legislation or executive action, the Board found the detailed provisions of the Refugee Act of 1980 and the accompanying regulations preemptive. Id. at 745–46. The enactment of TPS in 1990 seemingly strengthens that conclusion.

Immigration Judge Paul Nejelski, in Matter of Santos-Gomez, No. A29 564 781 (unpub'd decision, Aug. 24, 1990), reached a contrary conclusion. He held that the existence of a customary norm of international law was a question of fact. After taking detailed expert testimony and reviewing documentary evidence, he found a norm prohibiting forcible return to dangerous conditions of armed conflict. Judge Nejelski read Medina as resting narrowly on its readings of the various Geneva Conventions rather than on application of general “humanitarian law.” The former INS appealed to the BIA, but the respondents were Salvadorans who later became eligible for statutory TPS; administrative closure of the case thus prevented a BIA decision on the merits.

3. OTHER INTERNATIONAL LAW PROTECTION MECHANISMS

Other international law mechanisms have played little or no role in the U.S. protection system. See, e.g., Martinez-Lopez v. Gonzales, 454 F.3d 500 (5th Cir. 2006). There the court rejected claims based on the Convention on the Rights of the Child (because the U.S. has not ratified it), the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights (because the U.S., while a party, regards it as non-self-executing and has not passed the necessary implementing legislation), and the Universal Declaration of Human Rights (because statutes were held to prevail over customary international law).

The Council of Europe is an association of (at this writing) 41 European states. It is the sponsor of one of the world’s most effective human rights regimes, the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms, 213 U.N.T.S. 222, European T.S. No. 5 (signed at Rome, Nov. 4, 1950), as reconfigured by Protocol No. 11, European T.S. No. 155 (entered into force Nov. 1, 1998). Article 3 of the Convention reads: “No one shall be subjected to torture or to inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment.”

Articles 19–51 of the Convention establish a permanent European Court of Human Rights. Under article 46, the signatory states agree to be bound by the Court’s judgments in any cases in which they are parties. In the following case, the Court interprets and applies article 3 (and other articles not discussed here) in the context of an unsuccessful asylum claim.

T.I. v. United Kingdom

European Ct. of Human Rights, 2000.
Decision as to the Admissibility of Application No. 43844/98.

[T.I., a Sri Lankan man, applied for asylum in Germany. There he testified in detail about his imprisonment and repeated torture first by Tamil terrorists and later by government soldiers. Two German courts denied asylum, in the first instance because the court would not recognize persecution by non-State actors and did not regard the soldiers' actions as those of the state, and in the second instance because his story was not believed. He fled Germany and made his way to the United Kingdom, where he again applied for asylum. Under the Dublin Convention, signatory States in Europe had agreed on rules for determining which state is responsible for deciding asylum cases when the applicants have traveled through more than one state. (A regulation of the Council of the European Union has now superseded the Dublin regime. See Council Reg. (EC) No. 343/2003, establishing the criteria and mechanisms for determining the Member State responsible for examining an asylum application lodged in one of the Member States by a third-country national (18 Feb. 2003)). The U.K. and Germany agreed that the present case was Germany's responsibility. Consequently, the U.K. ordered T.I. removed to Germany. T.I. sought review of that decision in the U.K. courts, mainly on the ground that Germany was not a safe country because its laws permitted refoulement to non-State persecutors. [NB: German law has since been amended. As of January 1, 2005, it recognizes persecution by non-State actors. See page — above.] While his request for judicial review was pending, T.I. gathered expert medical evidence concluding that his many physical scars and psychological symptoms show "very little doubt" that his injuries had been caused in the way he described. The U.K. domestic courts ultimately denied relief and approved the removal order to Germany. He then applied to the European Court of Human Rights, alleging, among other things, a violation of article 3 of the European Convention.—Eds.]

* * *

3. United Kingdom case-law

The domestic courts' approach under Section 2 of the Asylum and Immigration Act 1996 prior to July 1999 was summarised as:

(i) The Secretary of State cannot simply rely upon the fact that the third country is a signatory to the Geneva Convention [meaning the 1951 U.N. Refugee Convention—Eds.]; he must be satisfied that in practice it complies with its obligations.

(ii) The issue is whether the third country adopts an approach within the range of responses of a Contracting State acting in good faith to implement its obligations under the Geneva Convention.

(iii) The Secretary of State must be satisfied that there is no real risk that the third country would send the applicant elsewhere in breach of the Geneva Convention.

In its judgment of 23 July 1999 in the case of R. v. Secretary of State for the Home Department ex parte Adan, Subaskaran and Aitsegeur, the Court of Appeal examined as a question of general importance whether the Secretary of State was entitled to return asylum seekers to France and Germany under section 2(2)(c) of the Asylum and Immigration Act 1996, as being countries which did not recognise as refugees those who feared persecution from non-State agents. Adan was a citizen of Somalia who had been refused asylum in Germany prior to her arrival in the United Kingdom; Subaskaran was a Sri Lankan national who claimed asylum in the United Kingdom on account of his ill-treatment by both the LTTE [the Tamil guerrillas—Eds.] and the Sri Lankan army but whose claims had been rejected by the German authorities; and Aitseguer was a citizen of Algeria whose asylum application had been rejected by French authorities. The Court of Appeal held that the Geneva Convention extended protection to persons who feared persecution by non-State agents, where, for whatever cause, the State was unwilling or unable to offer protection itself. As the German and French authorities subscribed to the ‘accountability theory’—i.e. refugee status was limited to those who feared persecution emanating from State or quasi-State authorities or persecution from non-State agents where it was shown that it was tolerated or encouraged by the State, or at least the State was unwilling to offer protection—the Secretary of State could not as a matter of law certify the claimants for return to these countries as safe third countries because these countries did not give effect to the Convention’s core values:

‘If a party to the Geneva Convention were to take a position which was at a variance with the Convention’s true interpretation, and act upon it, it could not be regarded as a safe third country; not merely because the ‘real risk’ test is not breached (though certainly it would be) but because in the particular case the Convention was not being applied at all.’

[The House of Lords has since affirmed the decision of the Court of Appeal. See R. v. Secretary of State for the Home Department ex parte Adan and Aitseguer, [2001] 2 W.L.R. 143 (U.K. House of Lords)—Eds.]

* * *

4. German law concerning asylum-seekers and persons claiming protection

* * *

According to the constant case-law of the German Constitutional Court, recognition as a political refugee requires a risk of persecution emanating from a State or quasi-State like authority. Persecution by private organisations or persons qualifies only if it can be attributed to the State in that the State supports or passively tolerates the persecution by private groups or exceptionally if the State does not provide adequate protection due to its inability to act as a consequence of existing political or social structures. This does not cover situations where a State has factually lost control of parts of its territory.

* * *

If an asylum claim for protection against political persecution does not meet the necessary requirements under [German law], the Federal Office is obliged to examine whether an applicant faces a serious risk of treatment contrary to Article 3 of the [European Convention on Human Rights] if he were returned. [German law] prohibits expulsion in such circumstances.

* * *

If the preconditions for the application of section 53(4) [of Germany's Aliens Act] are not met, protection may be granted under section 53(6) of the Aliens Act, which grants a discretion to the authorities to suspend deportation in case of a substantial danger for life, personal integrity or liberty of an alien. This applies to concrete individual danger resulting from either State or private action. It does not require an intentional act, intervention or State measure and covers risks for life resulting from adverse living conditions, lack of necessary medical treatment, etc. This provision has also been applied to civil war or war situations where the threat derived from a non-State source. Persons afforded protection under this provision are granted temporary permission to remain for periods of three months, renewable by the authorities.

In the first six months of 1999, section 53(6) was applied to 24 Sri Lankan nationals in respect of serious individual risks of ill-treatment which could not be attributed to the Sri Lankan State. This included the case of a Tamil whose scars placed him in real danger of being apprehended by the security forces and submitted to renewed torture as a person suspected of LTTE involvement.

* * *

Concerning article 3 of the Convention

The applicant complains his expulsion to Germany by the United Kingdom would be in breach of Article 3 of the Convention, which provides that:

'No one shall be subjected to torture or to inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment.'

* * *

The United Kingdom Government submit that the substance of the applicant's asylum claim should be assessed in Germany, where his allegations that he risks ill-treatment if returned to Sri Lanka would be assessed by the competent authorities in accordance with their obligations under the 1951 Geneva Convention and article 3 of the [European Convention]. * * *

They submit that there is no real risk that the applicant would suffer treatment contrary to Article 3 if he was removed to Germany. They point out that the substance of his asylum claim has already been assessed by the German authorities in support of his claim. They reject the applicant's arguments that German law does not provide proper protection against removal, pointing out that, even if the authorities apply a different approach to non-State agent risks or the actions of rogue officers, the applicant would be entitled to remain in Germany under section 53(6) of the Aliens Law if he could show a serious risk of torture or inhuman treatment in Sri Lanka from whatever source. They refer to the large number of individuals granted protection under this provision and to the lack of any complaints before the court as to the alleged gap in protection in German law.

They further argue that this Court should be slow to find that the removal of a person from one Contracting State to another would infringe Article 3 of the Convention, as in this case, the applicant would be protected by the rule of law in Germany and would have recourse, if any problems arose, to this Court, including the possibility of applying for a Rule 39 indication to suspend his deportation. * * *

* * *

The applicant rejects the assertion that this position is remedied by the section 53(6) provision. He submits that this is an entirely discretionary and temporary measure and that there are no known cases of failed asylum seekers being afforded protection under this provision. In these circumstances, the United Kingdom Government cannot escape their obligations under Article 3 by relying on Germany's status as a Contracting State and the theoretical possibility that the applicant could apply to the Court from Germany to prevent a real risk of removal from Germany to Sri Lanka.

* * *

The German Government, which made written and oral submissions at the request of the Court, submitted that German law and practice fully complied with the Convention. They emphasise that, while the Federal Administrative Court has interpreted Article 3 somewhat differently from this Court, this did not result in any 'protection gap', as risks for life and personal integrity were covered under section 53(6). * * * Even though section 53(6) was framed in discretionary terms, the case-law of the German courts made it clear that an applicant would be entitled to protection if he was facing a grave danger involving a serious risk to life and personal integrity. * * * If the applicant was not satisfied with the review by the courts, he could file a complaint with this Court. * * *

* * *

The Court * * * notes that the right to political asylum is not contained in either the Convention or its Protocols. It is however well-established in its case-law that the fundamentally important prohibition against torture and inhuman and degrading treatment under Article 3, read in conjunction with Article 1 of the Convention to 'secure to everyone within their jurisdiction the rights and freedoms defined in [the] Convention', imposes an obligation on Contracting States not to expel a person to a country where substantial grounds have been shown for believing that he would face a real risk of being subjected to treatment contrary to Article 3.

The Court's case-law further indicates that the existence of this obligation is not dependent on whether the source of the risk of the treatment stems from factors which involve the responsibility, direct or indirect, of the authorities of the receiving country. Having regard to the absolute character of the right guaranteed, Article 3 may extend to situations where the danger emanates from persons or groups of persons who are not public officials, or from the consequences to health from the effects of serious illness. * * *

In the present case, the applicant is threatened with removal to Germany, where a deportation order was previously issued to remove him to Sri Lanka. It is accepted by all parties that the applicant is not, as such, threatened with any treatment contrary to Article 3 in Germany. His removal to Germany is however one link in a possible chain of events which might result in his return to Sri Lanka where it is alleged that he would face the real risk of such treatment.

The Court finds that the indirect removal in this case to an intermediary country, which is also a Contracting State, does not affect the responsibility of the United Kingdom to ensure that the applicant is not, as a result of its decision to expel, exposed to treatment contrary to Article 3 of the Convention. Nor can the United Kingdom rely automatically in that context on the arrangements made in the Dublin Convention concerning the attribution of responsibility between European countries for deciding asylum claims. Where States establish international organisations, or mutatis mutandis international agreements, to pursue co-operation in certain fields of activities, there may be implications for the protection of fundamental rights. It would be incompatible with the purpose and object of the Convention if Contracting States were thereby absolved from their responsibility under the Convention in relation to the field of activity covered by such attribution. The Court notes the comments of the UNHCR that, while the Dublin Convention may pursue laudable objectives, its effectiveness may be undermined in practice by the differing approaches adopted by Contracting States to the scope of protection offered. * * *

* * *

Before the Court, the applicant has provided two medical reports which strongly support his claims that he was tortured. He has also provided photographs of scars of his injuries on his arm, leg and head. These materials were not before the German authorities and it is not apparent that the German authorities gave any consideration to this aspect of the case. The applicant has also given further clarifications of events in Sri Lanka which explain to some extent the difficulties which the Bavarian Administrative Court found in his account.

The Court has also given consideration to the reports concerning Sri Lanka published by Amnesty International, the United Nations Special Rapporteur and the United States Department of State. This shows that torture and ill-treatment by the LTTE and government forces is a serious problem. Tamils, particularly young men, are at serious risk of detention and ill-treatment by security forces looking for Tamil Tigers. Young men, who bear scars, are at particular risk of being suspected of being involved with the Tamil Tigers.

* * *

Nonetheless, the Court notes that the apparent gap in protection resulting from the German approach to non-State agent risk is met, to at least some extent, by the application by the German authorities of section 53(6). It appears that this provision has been applied to give protection to persons facing risk to life and limb from non-State agents, including groups acting in opposition to the Government, in addition to persons threatened by more general health and environmental risks. It has also been applied to a number of Tamils, including a young male Tamil at risk of ill-treatment from security forces due to the presence of scars on his body. The applicant has emphasised the discretionary nature of this provision. The German Government, while accepting that it is phrased in discretionary terms, submit that the courts' interpretation makes it clear that there is an obligation to apply its protection to persons who have shown that they are in grave danger. This submission is supported by the case-law materials referred to. * * *

* * *

In these circumstances, the Court finds that it is not established that there is a real risk that Germany would expel the applicant to Sri Lanka in breach of Article 3 of the Convention. Consequently, the United Kingdom have not failed in their obligations under this provision by taking the decision to remove the applicant to Germany. * * *

* * *

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. More detailed discussion of the application of article 33 of the 1951 Convention (nonrefoulement) to non-State actors can be found in the materials on pages 974–85 above. As noted there, Germany now recognizes non-State persecutors. For present purposes, recall the language of article 33.1 of the 1951 Convention:

No contracting State shall expel or return (“refouler”) a refugee in any manner whatsoever to the frontiers of territories where his life or freedom would be threatened on account of his race, religion, nationality, membership of a particular social group or political opinion.

Now compare the language of article 3 of the European Convention:

No one shall be subjected to torture or to inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment.

Do any of the textual differences in these provisions explain how Germany and France could interpret article 3 as applicable to non-State actors but article 33 as inapplicable?

2. Jennifer Moore has examined some of the implications of divergent practices by European states on the non-State actor issue. See generally Jennifer Moore, Whither the Accountability Theory: Second-Class Status for Third-Party Refugees as a Threat to International Refugee Protection, 13

Internat'l J. Refugee L. 32 (2001). Do you think the decisions in Adan and T.I. will have any practical effects on the success of the Dublin Convention and its successor regime? Will the decisions influence the strategic decisions of future asylum claimants in Europe?

3. In T.I., the applicant pointed out that section 53(6) of Germany's Aliens Act is discretionary. Thus, even if the German courts ultimately accepted that he was telling the truth and that he would again be tortured in Sri Lanka, there was no guarantee that section 53(6) would prevent his return. The Court permitted the U.K. to remove him to Germany nonetheless, finding that for various reasons there was no "real risk" of Germany's returning him to Sri Lanka under those circumstances. Professor Moore, in the article cited in item 2 above, objected to that result. What is your reaction? Should the Court have held that the European Convention prohibits states parties from sending asylum claimants who allege persecution by non-State actors to any state whose law permits refoulement to non-State persecutors?

4. Suppose T.I. had been able to demonstrate empirically that, apart from the non-State actor issue, the German government and courts have been disproportionately prone to dismiss Sri Lankan claims on credibility grounds. Should article 3 of the European Convention bar his removal to Germany?

5. Subject to several limitations, article 8 of the European Convention guarantees "the right to respect for private and family life . . ." This provision has been read to limit the power of states parties to exclude or deport noncitizens in some situations where family relationships are at stake. See generally H el ene Lambert, The European Court of Human Rights and the Right of Refugees and Other Persons in Need of Protection to Family Reunion, 11 Internat'l J. Refugee L. 427 (1999).

6. The European Union has been increasingly active on the refugee and asylum front. You have already seen reference to the proposed EU directive on the subject of temporary protection. As a preliminary to abolishing internal frontiers (i.e., border controls between member states), the EU has also been keen to harmonize the external immigration criteria for third-country nationals.

7. The Organization of American States (OAS) has also assembled a body of case law on the general subject of human rights. The United States is a member state and, as such, is bound by the OAS Charter, 119 U.N.T.S. 3 (signed Apr. 30, 1948). The OAS has adopted the American Declaration of the Rights and Duties of Man, OAS Res. XXX, adopted in 1948 by the 9th International Conference of American States, Bogot a, OEA/Ser.L/V/I.4 Rev (1965), as well as the American Convention on Human Rights, O.A.S. Treaty Series No. 36 at 1, O.A.S. Off. Rec. OEA.Ser.L/V/II.23 doc.rev.2 (signed Nov. 22, 1969). All OAS states are bound by the Charter, and there is some authority for the proposition that all OAS states are similarly bound by the American Declaration. See Louis Henkin, Gerald L. Neuman, Diane F. Orentlicher & David W. Leebron, Human Rights 343 (1999). In contrast, only some of the OAS states (and not the United States) are parties to the American Convention. Id. at 342–44, 523–51. Thus far, none of the OAS organs have had major impact on United States immigration or refugee law, although as noted earlier the Inter-American Commission on Human Rights—an OAS organ—has suggested that the United States Supreme Court decision in Sale (the interdiction case explored on pages 1065–85 above) violated the American Declaration. See Henkin et al., id. at 426.

8. The Organisation of African Unity in 1969 adopted the Convention Governing the Specific Aspects of Refugee Problems in Africa. The Convention was a response to the huge refugee flows spurred by a combination of decolonization and South African apartheid. This convention remains the foundation of the various regimes for protecting refugees and other displaced persons in Africa. See generally UNHCR, 20 Refugee Survey Q., issue #1 (2001).

9. In addition to UNHCR, to which you have seen repeated references in this chapter, the United Nations has an extensive network of organs and instruments devoted generally to the promotion of human rights. The leading work is Philip Alston (ed.), The United Nations and Human Rights—A Critical Appraisal (1992); see also Institute for Global Legal Studies, The UN and the Protection of Human Rights, 5 Washington Univ. J. Law & Policy (2001).

10. For a provocative argument that the statelessness of the Palestinian refugees should trigger the combined protections of statelessness conventions and other international treaties, see Susan M. Akram, Reinterpreting Palestinian Refugee Rights Under International Law, in Naseer Aruri (ed.), Palestinian Refugees—The Right of Return, ch. 10 (2001).

11. Amidst the growing enthusiasm for international law solutions, some commentators caution against overemphasizing international human rights law as the source of noncitizens' rights.¹³⁴

134. See, e.g., Laura S. Adams, Divergence and the Dynamic Relationship Between Domestic Immigration Law and International Human Rights, 51 Emory L.J. 983 (2002); Hiroshi Motomura, Federalism, International Human Rights, and Immigration Exceptionalism, 70 Univ. Colorado L. Rev. 1361, 1375–92 (1999).

UNDOCUMENTED IMMIGRANTS

You have now explored the legal criteria and procedures that govern whether noncitizens may enter, and whether they may remain in, the United States. That material is the stuff of traditional immigration law, the core of this book, and the thrust of most law school courses on immigration.

As you have seen, however, the immigration laws are not always obeyed. Each year a certain number of individuals enter the United States unlawfully, overstay their nonimmigrant visas, or otherwise violate either the specific terms of their admission or some more general provision of the immigration laws.

The Terminology

One hears constantly of “illegal aliens.” Whatever one’s reaction to the word “alien,” see chapter 1, § A of this book, the term “illegal alien” is controversial. From a lawyer’s point of view, it is both ambiguous and imprecise. Some people use the term to describe those noncitizens who have entered the country surreptitiously. Others mean to encompass also those who entered lawfully but then overstayed. Still others have in mind all deportable individuals, whether the deportability grounds stem from unlawful entry, overstay, or any other events. Even if the context makes the intended meaning clear, calling a person illegal because he or she has broken a law is surely imprecise and more surely dehumanizing, notwithstanding that the particular violation accounts for the person’s very presence in the United States. Moreover, culpability should not be prejudged. Just as we do not declare someone “guilty” of a crime before the entry of a valid final conviction, so too we should not brand a person’s conduct “illegal” until removal or other applicable proceedings have run their course. This last point has practical modern significance because even people who concede deportability often have valid claims to asylum or other legal remedies.

Even when the phrase “illegal aliens” is used in the abstract to refer to those individuals who in actual fact are both deportable and ineligible for asylum and all other discretionary relief, and even if both the imprecision and the syntactical problems are overlooked, the choice of terminology has social and political connotations of which you should be aware. As discussed in the Overview chapter of this book, many people find the statutory word “alien” a disturbing way to describe human beings who are not United States nationals.¹ Still, from a legal standpoint, the word “alien” is correct; it is used consistently throughout the INA to denote a person who is not a U.S. national. See INA § 101(a)(3). The same cannot be said of the phrase “illegal alien,” which the INA almost entirely avoids.² More important, many feel, the phrase “illegal aliens” produces an image far more sinister than is warranted either by the degree of culpability or by the degree of social harm involved. For a sensitive portrayal of the human face of this population, see James F. Smith, United States Immigration Law As We Know It: El Clandestino, The American Gulag, Rounding Up the Usual Suspects, 38 U.C. Davis L. Rev. 747 (2005).

Those who hold these views prefer the term “undocumented immigrants,” a reference to the lack of valid immigration documents, or “unauthorized immigrants.” Others dismiss “undocumented immigrants” as a euphemism. They object that the term wrongly implies that the transgression was merely a technical, documentary omission rather than a substantive wrong. Anti-immigrant lobbying organizations take this view and in their advocacy materials routinely refer to “illegal aliens” or “illegals,” even when referring to asylum claimants. In this book, the term “undocumented immigrants” will be used to describe any non-U.S. citizens who are present in the United States without valid documentation of lawful immigration status.

The Origins

One leading demographer describes the historical origins of today’s undocumented immigrant population:

The roots of contemporary illegal immigration to the United States can be found in the “Bracero Program” which brought several million Mexican men to the United States as temporary farmworkers in southwestern states from 1942 until 1965. Although the Bracero Program served its purpose of providing growers with a substantial and inexpensive labor force, its lasting impact came from the access to U.S. labor markets it afforded Mexican laborers. The braceros gained familiarity with U.S. labor markets, made contacts with employers, and acquired U.S.-specific work skills (e.g., a small, working knowledge of English). The end of the official program was supposed to mean a shift by growers to a native labor force and more mechanized agriculture. However,

1. See, e.g., Kevin R. Johnson, “Aliens” and the U.S. Immigration Laws: The Social and Legal Construction of Nonpersons, 28 Univ. Miami Inter-Amer. L. Rev. 263 (1996-97); Gerald L. Neuman, Aliens as Outlaws: Government Services, Proposition 187, and the Structure of Equal Protection Doctrine, 42 UCLA L. Rev. 1425, 1428 (1995); Victor C. Romero, The Congruence Principle Applied: Rethinking Equal Protection Review of Feder- al Alienage Classifications after Adarand Constructors, Inc. v. Pena, 76 Oregon L. Rev. 425, 426 n.4 (1997).

2. At this writing, the only apparent usage of this term in the more-than-500-page INA is in a set of provisions relating to federal reimbursement of small portions of certain expenses incurred by states. See INA § 286(r)(3)(ii); 8 USC §§ 1365, 1366(1, 2).

the easy access to former braceros meant that growers substituted illegal labor for the formerly legal bracero labor.

Immigration between Mexico and the United States, especially illegal migration, then followed a pattern, still evident today for Mexican and other flows. The migration starts with “pioneer” immigrants, usually young males, often working in agriculture or other low-wage, low-skill jobs. Over time, these pioneers make multiple trips and accumulate experience in the U.S. labor force and knowledge of the new country. With this experience, more of these illegal migrants settle in the United States and become illegal immigrants.

After the pioneer males settle in the United States, family unification proceeds as they bring wives, children, and more distant relatives to the United States. The maturation of the migrant stream also opens it to friends and acquaintances as the benefits of migration become apparent to a larger circle in the migrants’ home cities and towns. Some of the migration is legal, some illegal; but for many, illegal entry is simply a prelude to legal migration.³

The literature on undocumented immigrants is vast, and there are important social, economic, and demographic issues on which consensus is lacking. There are, first, differences in emphasis over the root causes of unauthorized migration. Some stress the so-called “push” factors—i.e., those factors that impel people to leave their homelands. These include poverty, persecution, armed conflict, family separation, and a host of other hardships. Others stress the “pull factors”—i.e., positive attractions of the receiving country. These include economic opportunity, political freedom, personal safety, and family unification. As the excerpt from Passel illustrates, the Bracero program also encouraged the flow of labor from Mexico to the United States.⁴ Social scientists Alejandro Portes and Rubén Rumbaut emphasize that “[t]he penetration of capitalist institutions from the developed world into less developed lands has played a major role” in stimulating migration, concluding that “migration flows can become self-sustaining and virtually unstoppable.” See Alejandro Portes & Rubén G. Rumbaut, Immigrant America: A Portrait 18 (2006).

3. Jeffrey S. Passel, Recent Efforts to Control Illegal Immigration to the United States 3 (unpublished paper, presented to OECD Working Party on Migration, Paris, June 13–14, 1996); see also Bill Ong Hing, Immigration Policy: Thinking Outside the (Big) Box, 39 Connecticut L. Rev. 1401, 1410–29 (2007). Historian Mai Ngai traces the roots of illegal immigration further back, all the way to the national origins system that was first made permanent in 1924. See Mai Ngai, Impossible Subjects: Illegal Aliens and the Making of Modern America (2004); Leti Volpp, Book Review, Impossible Subjects: Illegal Aliens and the Making of Modern America, 103 Michigan L. Rev. 1595 (2005).

4. See also Congressional Research Service, Illegal Aliens: Analysis and Background, U.S. House Comm. on the Judiciary, 95th Cong., 1st Sess. (1977); David W. Haines & Karen E. Rosenblum (eds.), Illegal Immigration in America—A Reference Handbook (1999).

The Scale

A precise count of the undocumented population in the United States is impossible, of course, but demographers have come up with ways to arrive at reasonable estimates.⁵ The 2005 Passel study, note 5 above, contains useful data. By his estimate, the number of undocumented immigrants in the United States as of March 2005 was just under 11 million. This represents a jump from 8.4 million five years earlier. The average annual increase in the undocumented population during that period was about 485,000 per year (with very little variance from year to year). That figure reflects the annual number of new arrivals (700,000 to 800,000), minus those who leave the country, die, or achieve lawful status. Similar estimates appear in U.S. Dept. of Homeland Security, Estimates of the Unauthorized Immigrant Population Residing in the United States: January 2006 (Aug. 2007). It now appears, however, that the undocumented immigrant population either leveled off or dropped slightly during calendar year 2008, from approximately 12.4 million to approximately 11.9 million. Jeffrey S. Passel & D'Vera Cohn, Trends in Unauthorized Immigration: Undocumented Inflow Now Trails Legal Inflow (Oct. 2, 2008), <http://pewhispanic.org/files/reports/94.pdf>. The latter report does not speculate about the causes, which could include some combination of the U.S. economic slowdown, economic growth in Mexico and Latin America, and increased enforcement. Id. at ii.

Undocumented immigrants make up about 29% of the foreign born residents of the United States.⁶ Moreover, within the foreign-born population, the percentage who are undocumented has risen dramatically in recent years—from 13% in 1994 to 28% in 2000. Michael F. Fix, Wendy Zimmerman & Jeffrey S. Passel, The Urban Institute, The Integration of Immigrant Families in the United States 12 (2001), http://www.urban.org/UploadedPDF/immig_integration.pdf.

Approximately 57% of today's undocumented immigrants are from Mexico (a figure that has also remained relatively constant over the past ten years), 24% from other Latin American countries, 9% from Asia, 6% from Europe and Canada, and 4% from other regions. As for geographic dispersal within the United States, 68% of all undocumented immigrants live in 8 states. California houses by far the largest number (24% of the total), followed by Texas, Florida, New York, Arizona, Illinois, New Jersey, and North Carolina. These figures reflect increasing dispersal. From 1990 to 2004, the proportion of undocumented immigrants who reside in the top 6 states dropped from 88% to 61%. One-sixth of the undocumented resi-

5. See generally Anna Marie Gallagher, The Situation of Undocumented Immigrants in the United States, June 2005 Immigration Briefings; Jeffrey S. Passel, Estimates of the Size and Characteristics of the Undocumented Population (Mar. 21, 2005) (using various sources to estimate the total foreign born U.S. population and the total number of legal residents, the difference being the undocumented population).

6. Passel 2005, note 5 above; see also Regina Germain, Perspectives on the Bush Administration's New Immigrant Guestworker Proposal, 32 Denver J. Internat'l L. & Policy 747, 748 n.9 (2004).

dents of the United States are children. As of 2002, about 70% were workers; they made up approximately 5% of the U.S. labor force. Passel 2005, note 3 above.

The Impact

Particularly contested is the economic impact of undocumented immigrants. A lively debate persists among economists over the impacts of low-wage immigrants on the U.S. economy and American workers. Roger Lowenstein writes:

You can find economists to substantiate [either] position, but the consensus of most is that, on balance, immigration is good for the country. Immigrants provide scarce labor, which lowers prices in much the same way global trade does. And overall, the newcomers modestly raise Americans' per capita income. But the impact is unevenly distributed; people with means pay less for taxi rides and household help while the less-affluent command lower wages and probably pay more for rent.⁷

Economist Gordon Hanson has argued that stopping illegal immigration, in particular, would result in a net drain on the U.S. economy, and that illegal immigration is economically efficient, in large part because undocumented immigrants are particularly responsive to changes in labor market conditions. See Gordon H. Hanson, The Economic Logic of Illegal Immigration, Council Special Report No. 26, Council on Foreign Relations (April 2007).

On the subject of the costs imposed by illegal immigration, the relevant questions economists address include: to what extent, if any, do undocumented immigrants either displace American workers or adversely affect the wages or working conditions of American workers? To what extent are the migrants themselves victims of exploitation, and how does the level of exploitation they suffer compare to the alternatives they would have faced at home? To what extent do undocumented immigrants use government-provided services—public assistance, highways, schools, hospitals?⁸

7. Roger Lowenstein, The Immigration Equation, N.Y. Times Mag., July 9, 2006, at 36.

8. For literature demonstrating that low-skilled immigration depresses wages and that low-wage immigrants displace American workers and draw from the public fisc, see George J. Borjas, Heaven's Door: Immigration Policy and the American Economy (1999). For a study demonstrating that the effect of immigration from 1990–2004 on the wages of native workers has been positive and significant, see Gianmarco I.P. Ottaviano & Giovanni Peri, Rethinking the Effects of Immigration on Wages, NBER Working Paper 12497 (Aug. 2006) (finding immigrants to be “imperfect substitutes” for U.S.-born workers within the same education group, because the two groups choose different occupations and have different skills). For older summaries of the economic literature on these and other controversial questions concerning undocumented immigrants, see Bill Ong Hing, The Economic Impact of Immigration: A Brief Survey of the Literature (1989); Peter H. Schuck, The Emerging Political Consensus on Immigration Law, 5 Georgetown Immigration L.J. 1, 13–18 (1991); Julian L. Simon, The Economic Consequences of Immigration, chap. 15 (2d ed. 1999).

With respect to the benefits of illegal immigration, the questions worth exploring include: how much do undocumented immigrants contribute in federal, state, and local taxes, both directly and indirectly? How do these revenues compare to what undocumented immigrants receive in services? To what extent do undocumented immigrants create jobs, by consuming goods and services, by sustaining marginal enterprises that also employ Americans, and by keeping labor costs down, thereby enabling employers to expand their operations and thus create more jobs? How many of the jobs that undocumented immigrants take are ones that Americans simply would not accept in adequate numbers, or at the wages the market will sustain? Do undocumented immigrants, by supplying needed labor, help keep down consumer costs? Professor Lenni Benson argues that the contributions of undocumented workers tend to go unnoticed, both because the workers themselves try not to be noticed and because native observers tend not to see the workers in nuanced ways. See Lenni Benson, The Invisible Worker, 27 North Carolina J. Internat'l L. & Commercial Regulation 483 (2002).

As for fiscal impact, undocumented immigrants both pay taxes and increase government expenditures. Like any other workers, they are required to pay federal and state income taxes. Francine J. Lipman, Taxing Undocumented Immigrants: Separate, Unequal and Without Representation, 59 Tax Lawyer 813 (2006), reproduced, 9 Harvard Latino L. Rev. 1 (2006). The Internal Revenue Service has estimated that about 75% of undocumented workers file their required tax returns. U.S. Cong. Budget Office, The Impact of Undocumented Immigrants on State/Local Budgets, at 7 (Dec. 2007). They also pay social security taxes even though they are ineligible for the retirement benefits that those contributions will fund. Id. at 6. And they pay sales taxes and (usually indirectly) property taxes. U.S. Cong. Research Service, Cost Estimates of Unauthorized (Illegal) Immigration (Aug. 11, 2005), at 8. On the other side of the ledger, as you will see shortly, undocumented immigrants are ineligible for almost all the major federal and state welfare programs. They are, however, entitled to public elementary and secondary education and to emergency medical care, and like any other residents they add to the general infrastructure costs—roads, bridges, etc.

According to a recent survey conducted by the Congressional Budget Office, the empirical social science literature on the fiscal impacts of immigration reveals a general consensus that undocumented immigrants' tax contributions exceed the costs of their use of government services, in the aggregate and over the long term. See U.S. Cong. Budget Office, The Impact of Undocumented Immigrants on State/Local Budgets (Dec. 2007).⁹ At the state and local level, however, the costs of government services for the undocumented sometimes exceed tax revenues. That happens partly deficit of $2 billion per year (about $7 per American). Jeffrey S. Passel & Rebecca L. Clark, How Much Do Immigrants Really Cost? A Reappraisal of Huddle's "The Cost of Immigrants" (Feb. 1994).

9. See also U.S. Cong. Research Service, Cost Estimates of Unauthorized (Illegal) Immigration (Aug. 11, 2005). The Lipman study cited above, which cites numerous other studies, finds a net budget surplus. Another study—this one older—finds a net budget

because federal law limits the authority of states to withhold public benefits from undocumented immigrants, and partly because state and local governments have primary responsibility for institutions used heavily by undocumented immigrants, such as the public schools. But studies also show that the amount spent by state and local governments to provide services represents a small percentage of overall budgets. Id.

The impact of illegal immigration is not, of course, solely economic. Undocumented immigrants are, with distressingly increased frequency, easy prey for violent criminals in the border regions, as discussed below. A certain number of undocumented immigrants will themselves turn to crime in the United States, though at present there is no evidence that undocumented immigrants are any more disposed to crime than analogous age-sex cohorts in the native population and some evidence to suggest that they commit fewer crimes per capita than native-born Americans.¹⁰ Human trafficking also arises when the incentives to enter the United States without authorization increase—an issue considered in section A.1 below. Some commentators speculate that large scale evasion of immigration restrictions fosters a more general climate of disrespect for law and for national sovereignty. And the underground subculture in which many undocumented immigrants live out their daily lives can give rise to serious violations of labor protections and civil rights laws.

All of these factors account for much of the negative public reaction to undocumented immigrants, but undoubtedly other factors are also at work. Various commentators have emphasized racism and xenophobia,¹¹ general economic insecurity,¹² and environmental concerns.¹³

Professors Adam Cox and Eric Posner suggest that the government might affirmatively prefer illegal immigration to a legal guest worker system. The former, they argue, is a species of tacit ex post screening—i.e., lax border controls followed by screening that takes place only after entry in the form of deportation proceedings, and then only if some event precipitates screening. A legal guest worker system, in contrast, entails pre-entry (ex ante) screening. There are both pros and cons to these two screening strategies, as the authors acknowledge, but they argue that the government might well prefer the illegal immigration system because it poses fewer constitutional obstacles to removal. See Adam B. Cox & Eric A. Posner, The Second-Order Structure of Immigration Law, 59 Stanford L. Rev. 809 (2007).

10. See, e.g., Ruben G. Rumbaut & Walter A. Ewing, Amer. Immigration Lawyers Assoc., The Myth of Immigrant Criminality and the Paradox of Assimilation, at 1, 3, 6–8 (2007); see also the studies cited by Simon, note 8 above, at 109–10.

11. Ronald Takaki, Strangers from a Different Shore: A History of Asian Americans (1989); Kevin R. Johnson, Public Benefits and Immigration: The Intersection of Immigration Status, Ethnicity, Gender, and Class, 42 UCLA L. Rev. 1509, 1544–49 (1995).

12. Richard A. Boswell, Restrictions on Noncitizens' Access to Public Benefits: Flawed Premise, Unnecessary Response, 42 UCLA L. Rev. 1475, 1477 (1995).

13. Peter L. Reich, Environmental Metaphor in the Alien Benefits Debate, 42 UCLA L. Rev. 1577 (1995).

Professor Cristina Rodríguez points to the “brute fact” of illegal immigration as evidence that U.S. citizens and lawmakers, for at least a decade, have “tolerated an arrangement that is economically beneficial both to immigrants and to the United States,” but have made no effort as a nation “to treat the immigrants on whom we clearly depend” as entitled to legal status. See Cristina M. Rodríguez, The Citizenship Paradox in a Transnational Age, 106 Mich. L. Rev. 1111, 1123–24 (2008). She attributes this tolerance to an “admissions-status trade-off,” or a dynamic prevalent throughout the history of U.S. immigration policy according to which “more immigration translates into diminished support for immigrants’ rights, and more robust immigrants’ rights translate into less support for immigrant admissions.” Id. at 1122.

The Responses

If there is fundamental ambivalence about the impact of illegal immigration, there is even sharper disagreement about how to address the phenomenon. See generally David A. Martin, Eight Myths about Immigration Enforcement, 10 NYU J. Legislation & Public Policy 525 (2007) (rejecting common arguments made on both sides of the enforcement debate). A variety of responses have been devised and debated, and they vary as widely as one would expect of policy proposals in an ideologically charged arena. Most of the commonly discussed policy responses to illegal immigration fall loosely within four categories. Some are strictly enforcement initiatives focused on either fortifying the border or policing the interior. Others call for legalizing the status of at least some of the undocumented immigrants currently present in the U.S. Still other strategies, reflecting immigration restrictionists’ recognition that mass deportations are impractical, aim to encourage undocumented immigrants to “self-deport” by making their daily lives in the United States unsustainable. Some of these measures conflict with the established statutory and constitutional rights of the undocumented. A final set of strategies aims to reduce the “future flow” of undocumented immigrants by affording noncitizens more attractive alternatives to illegal immigration. These strategies either expand the channels for legal entry or strive to improve economic and social conditions in the main source countries. Sections A, B, C, and D of this chapter will examine these four sets of issues. Section E will address the constitutional allocation of responsibility for policies on illegal immigration as between the federal government and the states.

A. ENFORCEMENT OF THE IMMIGRATION LAWS

You have already seen one of the principal devices for combating violations of the immigration laws—removal proceedings. You have also seen that certain violations can destroy a noncitizen’s eligibility for discretionary relief from removal, e.g., INA §§ 208(d)(6), 240(b)(7), 240B(c), or for future readmission, see INA § 212(a)(9)(B).

As DHS itself has publicly acknowledged, however, it is now clear that any attempt to deport the entire undocumented population would be cost-prohibitive. One recent study, even using conservative assumptions, estimated the cost at more than $200 billion over five years. See Rajeev Goyle & David A. Jaeger, Center for American Progress, Deporting the Undocumented—A Cost Assessment (July 2005). Consequently, debate has shifted to other possible responses.

One of those other responses has been increased reliance on criminal and civil sanctions as a deterrent to immigration violations. Congress has created more and more immigration-related criminal and civil offenses and has generally increased the penalties for existing offenses. Federal prosecutors are much more inclined to bring criminal charges for immigration violations. The details are in sections A.1 and A.2 below. Civil forfeitures of vehicles and other property used in the commission of immigration offenses are another weapon in the government's arsenal, and they are controversial too.¹⁴

In the past several years a higher priority has also been placed on devoting resources to enforcement. There has been a particular focus on the border with Mexico. Even before IIRIRA, the former INS began transferring enforcement personnel from the interior to the border. See generally 73 IR 101 (Jan. 22, 1996). "Linewatch" hours (total person-hours at the border) steadily rose from 1993 to 1995. Jeffrey S. Passel, Recent Efforts to Control Illegal Immigration to the United States (unpublished paper, presented to OECD Working Party on Migration, Paris, June 13–14, 1996), at 13. At the two busiest ports of entry from Mexico—El Paso and San Diego—the INS launched two ambitious initiatives. In El Paso, instead of concentrating resources at places where undocumented immigrants tended to congregate after entering, the INS in 1993 undertook Operation "Hold the Line." Border Patrol officers saturated the border in an attempt to deter people from entering clandestinely in the first place. A year later, in San Diego, the INS began "Operation Gatekeeper," a multi-faceted approach that emphasized more formidable physical barriers—higher fences, high-intensity lights, etc.

Whether these efforts actually reduced total illegal entries or simply diverted the entries to other border points is not clear. See id. at 14–17. Based on empirical research conducted by the Mexican Migration Project at Princeton University, Douglas Massey, Jorge Durand, and Nolan J. Malone have observed that, as the result of the fortification of the Tijuana–San Diego corridor in the mid-1990s, "traffic simply shifted eastward into empty desert, rugged mountains, and lonely ranch country." See Douglas Massey, Jorge Duran, & Nolan J. Malone: Beyond Smoke and Mirrors: Mexican Immigration in an Era of Economic Integration 108 (2003).

14. See Robert Pauw & Greg Boos, Immigration Briefings (Apr. 1996); Robert Pauw, Gete v. INS: Vehicle Seizure Class Action, 4 BIB 844 (Aug. 15, 1999).
Conveyance Seizures and Forfeitures: Constitutional Limits on Agency Decision-Making,

In 1996, IIRIRA endorsed the strategy of heightened border enforcement (as well as other strategies). IIRIRA § 101 increased the size of the Border Patrol, and section 102 required the building of a triple fence in the San Diego area. In response to the terrorist attacks of September 11, 2001, Congress in the USA PATRIOT Act of 2001, §§ 402 and 403, tripled the Border Patrol resources along the Canadian border and facilitated intelligence-sharing among the relevant federal agencies. Subsequent statutes continued to bolster the number of Border Patrol officers, other law enforcement personnel, technology, and other physical resources. See, e.g., Intelligence and Terrorism Prevention Act of 2004, Pub. L. 108-458, 118 Stat. 3638 (Dec. 17, 2004), especially Title V and §§ 7206-15. The REAL ID Act of 2005 authorizes the Secretary of Homeland Security to waive “all legal requirements such Secretary, in such Secretary’s sole discretion, determines necessary to ensure expeditious construction of the barriers and roads” required by IIRIRA. REAL ID Act, § 102. The same provision bars all judicial review of the Secretary’s decision except for constitutional claims. Id. The Secure Fence Act of 2006, Pub. L. 109-367, 120 Stat. 2638 (Oct. 26, 2006), authorized 700 miles of additional fencing along the Mexican border, required fencing in several specific locations, and required the Administration to construct more vehicle barriers and install more border control technology.

Drownings and other accidental deaths are a common fate for individuals who attempt to cross the Rio Grande, see 24 Migration World Magazine No. 3 at 10 (1996), and there is rising concern that Operation Gatekeeper has exacerbated the tragedy. By deliberately rerouting undocumented immigrants to crossing points that are more difficult “due to harsh terrain and weather conditions,” critics say, the Border Patrol has drastically increased the number of deaths. During the first five years of Operation Gatekeeper (1994-99), border deaths rose 600%, to an average of over 100 per year. Report, U.S.-Mexico Border Project, American Friends Service Committee (Nov. 1999). The operation prompted a 1999 border visit by then UN High Commissioner for Human Rights Mary Robinson. Id. From 2000 to 2005, border deaths averaged 410 per year, mainly from dehydration, heatstroke, and drowning.¹⁵ The Border Patrol reports border deaths for fiscal years 2005 through 2007 to be 494, 453, and 400, respectively. Immigrant Deaths Near Border Fall, AP (Nov. 8, 2007). The news release attributed the deaths primarily to “exposure to heat,” and indicated that other causes included “vehicle and train accidents, drownings, fatigue and banditry.” Id. In addition to the deaths along the land border, of course, are those that occur at sea, discussed in chapter 11, section B.7.b.12 above.

15. Wayne A. Cornelius, Controlling ‘Unwanted’ Immigration: Lessons from the United States, 1993-2004, 31 J. Ethnic & Migration Studies 775, 783 (2005); see also Wayne A. Cornelius, Impacts of Border Enforcement on Unauthorized Mexican Migration to the United States, 11 BIB 1135 (Oct. 1, 2006); Bill Ong Hing, The Dark Side of Operation Gatekeeper, 7 U.C. Davis J. Internat’l L. & Policy 121 (2001); Jorge A. Vargas, U.S. Border Patrol Abuses, Undocumented Mexican Workers, and International Human Rights, 2 San Diego Internat’l L.J. 1 (2001).

Border deaths of undocumented immigrants are not unique to the United States. In 2004, some 289 North Africans and others trying to cross the Mediterranean in small boats bound for Spain died en route. Asociación pro Derechos Humanos de Andalucía, www.apdha.org. In Greece, 74 migrants have been killed by land mines near the Turkish border since 1994. (Greece mined the border after Turkey's 1974 invasion of northern Cyprus.) Agence France Presse, Greece pledges to accelerate mine clearing along Turkish border (Apr. 15, 2005). Sixty Zimbabweans died (by either drowning or crocodiles) trying to cross into South Africa without inspection. Andrew Meldrum, 60 Migrants Feared Drowned Fleeing from Zimbabwe, The Guardian (Jan. 20, 2006).

Accidental deaths are not the only risks of clandestine entry. Violent criminals in the border area often find undocumented immigrants to be easy prey. They are often helpless and in no position to summon the authorities.

Costs aside, some scholars have suggested that tightened border control is ineffectual and possibly even counter-productive. Massey, Durand, and Malone have demonstrated that the border enforcement strategy adopted in the 1990s ultimately reduced the odds that unauthorized crossers would be apprehended, in large part because the strategy forced migrants to cross in more remote areas where enforcement resources were scarce. See Massey, Durand, & Malone, above at 109. The trend to fortify the border also has had the counter-intuitive consequence of increasing the undocumented population. For migrants who have entered unlawfully, the costs of attempting re-entry are high, and so those who succeed in entering the United States stay for longer periods instead of traveling back and forth in what otherwise would be a cyclical pattern. Id. at 128–32.

Professor Wayne Cornelius demonstrates empirically, through law enforcement data and the results of personal interviews, that since 1993 intensified border enforcement has not slowed illegal immigration. Even after they are apprehended, he says, “the vast majority (92–97%) keep trying until they succeed.” See Cornelius 2006, note 15 above. Instead, he adds, “migrants have turned increasingly to people-smugglers (coyotes), which in turn has enabled smugglers to charge more for their services. With clandestine border crossing an increasingly expensive and risky business, U.S. border enforcement policy has unintentionally encouraged undocumented immigrants to remain in the U.S. for longer periods and settle permanently in this country in much larger numbers.” Id. at 1135. And not only have high smuggling fees raised the cost of re-entry, they also have forced undocumented immigrants into large debts that they can frequently repay only through involuntary servitude to their smugglers. Jennifer M. Chacón, Misery and Myopia: Understanding the Failures of U.S. Efforts to Stop Human Trafficking, 74 Fordham L. Rev. 2977, 3023, 3027 (2006); see also Wayne A. Cornelius, Controlling ‘Unwanted’ Immigration: Lessons from the United States, 1993–2004, 31 J. Ethnic & Migration Studies 775, 783 (2005).

The “Minuteman” project, a private initiative begun in April 2005, has generated considerable controversy. Its goal was to organize a volunteer corps of hundreds of private citizens, armed with weapons, to patrol the border and either capture suspected undocumented immigrants or report them to the Border Patrol. Criticized by President Bush and others as “vigilantes,” they called for 1000 volunteers to appear in Arizona along the border in early April 2005. Although only an estimated 200 “Minutemen” actually materialized, the Border Patrol deployed an extra 500 agents in the area to prevent violence, and the Minutemen succeeded in attracting 200 journalists to cover the story.¹⁶

In the light of these and other problems, Professor David Leopold and others have vigorously urged less reliance on border control as a response to illegal immigration. See, e.g., David Leopold, A Broken Immigration System, Toledo Blade (Jan. 20, 2006). Professor Isabel Medina argues that border policies should reflect the cultural realities of the border region. She offers a creative suggestion for establishing a bi-national border area that would comprise the border communities of both the U.S. and Mexico.¹⁷

In a set of recommendations to DHS published in 2009, Doris Meissner and Donald Kerwin emphasize the importance of well designed and implemented border enforcement strategies. See DHS and Immigration: Taking Stock and Correcting Course, Report for the Migration Policy Institute (February 2009), available at http://www.migrationpolicy.org/pubs/DHS_Feb09.pdf (last visited March 9, 2009). They recommend that CBP conduct a review of its border enforcement technology, including the effectiveness of fencing and other physical barriers, and that new projects not be pursued until the review has been completed. They emphasize that “successive, ambitious technology initiatives have been oversold, rushed because of political pressure, mishandled by contractors, or poorly managed. As a result, hundreds of millions have been wasted.” Id. at 12. But they frame their recommendations with the basic insight that “to harness the advantages of immigration, it is necessary to ‘close the back door,’ so the front door can stay open,” concluding that border enforcement is vital to a healthy immigration system. Id. at 5 (citing Select Commission on Immigration and Refugee Policy, Final Report to Congress and the White House, at 3 (1981)).

At any rate, whatever its impact on the number and nature of clandestine entries, border enforcement cannot address the problem of overstayers. To apprehend overstayers, and also to apprehend those who managed to enter surreptitiously despite border controls, Congress and DHS have bolstered their enforcement efforts in the interior. IIRIRA § 132

16. See David Kelly, Border Watchers Capture Their Prey—the Media, Los Angeles Times (Apr. 5, 2005), at A1; Editorial, Amateurs on the Border, Chicago Tribune (Apr. 5, 2005), at C22.

17. See M. Isabel Medina, At the Border: What Tres Mujeres Tell Us about Walls and Fences, 10 J. Gender, Race & Justice 245 (2007); see also Natsu Taylor Saito, Border Constructions: Immigration Enforcement and Territorial Presumptions, 10 J. Gender, Race & Justice 193 (2007) (questioning the very premises of border control).

increased the number of authorized overstay investigators. Section 131 bolstered the ranks of employer sanctions investigators (more on that in a moment). Section 204 increased the number of federal prosecuting attorneys to enforce immigration-related criminal laws.

More recently, ICE has made increased use of workplace and home raids.¹⁸ Professor David Thronson has forcefully demonstrated the severe collateral effects of the home raids on the arrestees' children, both citizen and undocumented.¹⁹ Workplace raids have been accompanied by stepped-up enforcement of the laws that punish employers for knowingly hiring unauthorized workers or for failing to follow the verification steps required by statute. Employer sanctions are taken up separately below. At the time of this writing, a lawsuit filed by the "Danbury 11," a group of day laborers arrested in a 2006 round-up by police and ICE agents in Danbury, Connecticut, had survived a motion to dismiss. The plaintiffs brought Bivens claims alleging the violation of Fourth and Fifth Amendment rights; Federal Tort Claims Act claims, alleging false arrest, abuse of process, and intentional infliction of emotional distress; and state constitutional claims. See Barraera, et al. v. Voughton, et al., 3:07-cv-01436-RNC, Dkt. No. 129 (D. Conn. 2009).

The September 11 attacks gave rise to a new set of strategies aimed specifically at particular classes of noncitizens. Unlike the traditional strategies, the central target of which has been illegal immigration, some of the new programs are focused principally on national security, with particular attention to counter-terrorism. The two objectives are hard to separate, since many of the new programs have multiple rationales and multiple consequences. Of the post-September 11 enforcement initiatives, those most relevant here are the increased reliance on preventive detention of noncitizens, the various intelligence-gathering operations, and the addition of vast new resources, technologies, and personnel to enhance border enforcement operations. See chapter 10 above.

Secure documentation is an additional ingredient of immigration enforcement strategy. IIRIRA §§ 656 and 657 took steps to make birth certificates and social security cards, respectively, more counterfeit-resistant. In addition, the government continues to develop and operationalize

18. See, e.g., U.S. Dept. of Homeland Security, Estimates of the Undocumented Immigrant Population Residing in the United States: January 2006 Population Estimates (Aug. 2007) (showing workplace arrests increased tenfold from 2002 to 2007); Erik Camayd-Freixes, Interpreting After the Largest ICE Raid in US History: A Personal Account (June 13, 2008), <http://graphics8.nytimes.com/images/2008/07/14/opinion/14ed-camayd.pdf> (last visited Aug. 6, 2008) (relating the enormity of the Postville, Iowa meat packing worksite raid and its effects).

19. See David B. Thronson, Creating Crisis: Immigration Raids and the Destabilization of Immigrant Families, 43 Wake Forest L. Rev. 391 (2008); accord, James D. Kremer, Kathleen A. Moccio & Joseph W. Hammel, Severing a Lifeline: The Neglect of Citizen Children in America's Immigration Enforcement Policy, A Report by Dorsey & Whitney LLP to the Urban Institute (2009). See also Raquel Aldana, Of Katz and "Aliens": Privacy Expectations and the Immigration Raids, 41 Univ. Calif. Davis L. Rev. 1081 (2008) (raising privacy concerns with respect to interior raids).

several comprehensive databases. They have been spurred on by September 11 and are discussed in chapter 10, section B above and in section A.2 below.

State and local governments in recent years have claimed a substantially greater role both in direct enforcement of the federal immigration laws and in regulating the everyday activities of their undocumented residents. State and local officials cite reducing the size of the undocumented population and diminishing the incentives for illegal immigration as their goals. These developments are the subject of section E below.

The remainder of this section examines the immigration offenses. Subsection 1 considers the range of immigration-related conduct that Congress has criminalized (or in some cases made into at least civil offenses). Subsection 2 examines in detail one especially important set of offenses—employer sanctions—and an accompanying program that prohibits certain forms of job discrimination.

1. IMMIGRATION OFFENSES GENERALLY²⁰

In addition to making specified immigration-related misconduct a basis for removal or a barrier to discretionary relief, Congress has directly prohibited some such acts and has imposed penalties. In some instances Congress has made the conduct a crime. In others, Congress has chosen instead to make the conduct a civil offense and attach generally milder penalties.

In recent years the trend in Congress has been to expand the list of criminal and civil penalties for immigration-related misconduct. The details appear in a rapidly expanding literature that is cited on page 549 above. Perhaps more striking has been the government's dramatically increased resort to criminal prosecutions for immigration violators, mainly for garden-variety entries without inspection under INA §§ 275 and 276, discussed below. In fiscal year 2008, some 51% of all federal criminal prosecutions were for immigration offenses. TRAC Reports, <http://trac.syr.edu/tracreports/crim/201/>.

You know presence without admission as a ground for removal, but entry without inspection is also a criminal offense. Indeed, it is by far the most common immigration-related basis for criminal convictions. INA § 275(a) forbids several types of entries and attempted entries—those that occur at unauthorized places, those in which the person eludes inspection, and those that are accomplished by fraud. Additional civil penalties are now also possible. INA § 275(b). The crime is generally a misdemeanor, but any person who has once been removed, and who then reenters or attempts to reenter or is found in the United States without the consent of the Secretary of Homeland Security is guilty of a felony. INA § 276. In United States v. Mendoza-Lopez, 481 U.S. 828, 107 S.Ct. 2148, 95 L.Ed.2d 772

²⁰. See generally David Weissbrodt & Laura Danielson, Immigration Law and Procedure in a Nutshell, ch. 14 (5th ed. 2005).

(1987), the Supreme Court held that a person could not constitutionally be convicted under section 276 without having had, at some point, a meaningful opportunity to contest the validity of the underlying removal order. See also INA § 266 (criminal penalties for failing to register and for related offenses).

Another group of offenses, overlapping those just discussed, deals with fraud. The broadest provision in this group is 18 U.S.C. § 1001, which generally makes it a felony to defraud the United States government. Other provisions of the United States Criminal Code specifically cover frauds and related offenses concerned with citizenship, 18 U.S.C. §§ 1421–1429, passports, 18 U.S.C. §§ 1541–1545, and other immigration documents, 18 U.S.C. § 1546. The last-cited provision is supplemented by INA § 274C, which expands the range of document-related violations and imposes civil penalties after administrative proceedings. See generally Linton Joaquin & Charles Wheeler, Document Fraud Enforcement the Second Time Around: Will the Right Lessons Be Learned?, 78 IR 473 (Mar. 12, 2001). There are also provisions that specifically prohibit certain forms of marriage fraud and entrepreneurship fraud. INA § 275(c, d).

Of modern significance is the group of offenses defined by INA § 274(a)(1). That subsection prohibits various means of facilitating illegal immigration. Sections 274(a)(1)(A, B, C, and D) generally cover, respectively, bringing noncitizens to the United States other than at designated ports of entry; transporting, within the United States, noncitizens who are present in violation of law (the transportation must be “in furtherance of such violation”); harboring such persons; and inducing illegal entry. The various subsections impose different mens rea requirements. See also INA §§ 277 (importing noncitizen criminals), 278 (importing noncitizen prostitutes).

None of the preceding provisions expressly bars the employment of undocumented immigrants. In fact, from the 1952 enactment of the INA until the passage of IRCA in 1986, section 274(a) concluded with this language:

Provided, however, That for the purpose of this section, employment (including the usual and normal practices incident to employment) shall not be deemed to constitute harboring.

(Emphasis in original.) That wording, known as the Texas Proviso after the state most prominently associated with its enactment, was repealed by IRCA § 112(a), amending INA § 274(a). Even without the Texas Proviso it is unclear whether employment alone could constitute harboring. The interpretation of the former INS was that it does not. See 52 Fed.Reg. 16216, 16217 (May 1, 1987); 63 IR 1181 (1986) (no intent to prosecute employers under harboring provision). IRCA did, however, enact a new program specifically prohibiting the employment of any noncitizens who are not authorized to work. The details of that program are the subject of subsection A.2 below. As you will see, the IRCA penalties for employment are generally much less severe than the section 274 penalties for harboring; the harboring-as-employment issue, therefore, is not moot.

One of the more important modern phenomena arising out of section 274 has been the sanctuary movement. In chapter 11 you read about United States asylum laws and the widespread belief that Salvadorans, Guatemalans, and other individuals fleeing governments strongly allied with the United States were wrongly denied asylum during the 1980s. Many churches, other private institutions, and even some state and local governments responded by declaring themselves “sanctuaries” in which undocumented immigrants who asserted eligibility for asylum would be free to remain. See Jorge L. Carro, Municipal and State Sanctuary Declarations: Innocuous Symbolism or Improper Dictates?, 16 Pepperdine L. Rev. 297 (1989).

Using INA § 274, the government prosecuted members of the sanctuary movement. Some interesting case law resulted. Among the defenses asserted were (a) the shielded individuals were in fact eligible for asylum, even though it had been wrongly denied, and thus were not here in violation of law; (b) the defendants believed, rightly or wrongly, that the individuals were eligible for asylum, and thus the defendants lacked the necessary mens rea; (c) the defendants were acting out of necessity, with the lives of others at stake; (d) the government’s conduct—particularly the planting of informants in church congregations—impermissibly obstructed the free exercise of religion; (e) the government was selectively prosecuting those defendants who were politically prominent; and (f) the defendants’ actions were consistent with U.S. treaty obligations. Those arguments generally failed to produce dismissals, see, e.g., United States v. Aguilar, 883 F.2d 662 (9th Cir.1989); United States v. Merkt, 764 F.2d 266 (5th Cir.1985); United States v. Elder, 601 F.Supp. 1574 (S.D.Tex.1985), although in some cases juries ultimately acquitted particular defendants. See JoAnne C. Adlerstein, Immigration Crimes: A Practitioner’s Guide, January 1989 Immigration Briefings at 5.

The sanctuary movement has attracted a great deal of thoughtful and sometimes passionate commentary.²¹ Since the overwhelming proportion of those who received sanctuary were Salvadorans and Guatemalans, and since both groups came within the ABC settlement (and Salvadorans within the Temporary Protected Status program as well, see pages 1033 and 1118 above), the significance of the sanctuary movement diminished in the 1990’s. The turmoil in Colombia triggered a brief resurgence. See Hernan Rozemberg, Sanctuary Ready to Help, The Arizona Republic (Mar. 26, 2002). In some jurisdictions, these sanctuary laws evolved into general ordinances that prohibit local law enforcement from conveying information to federal officials about individual immigrants’ legal status. Cities with no ties to the original sanctuary movement also began adopting such non-

21. See especially Rose Cuisson Villazor, What Is a “Sanctuary”?, 61 Southern Methodist Univ. L. Rev. 133 (2008) (dissecting both the public and private sector usages of “sanctuary”); see also Ignatius Bau, This Ground is Holy—Church Sanctuary and Central American Refugees (1985); Carro, above; cooperation laws in the 1990s. The details of this phenomenon are discussed in more detail in Part E below.

Jorge L. Carro, Sanctuary: The Resurgence of an Age-Old Right or a Dangerous Misinterpretation of an Abandoned Ancient Privilege?, 54 Univ. Cincinnati L. Rev. 747 (1986); Barnaby W. Zall, Asylum and Sanctuary—the American Dilemma, 72 A.B.A.J. 66 (Aug. 1, 1986).

Today both the federal and some state and local governments have been invoking the harboring provisions in a variety of new contexts. In United States v. Ozelik, 527 F.3d 88 (3d Cir. 2008), the defendant was a CBP agent who had counseled an undocumented immigrant to lie low, stay out of trouble, and live at a different address from the one he had reported to the then INS. The court held that harboring requires an intent to “substantially facilitate” remaining illegally and an intent “to prevent government authorities from detecting the alien’s unlawful presence.” Applying that test, the court found the defendant’s conduct insufficient to “substantially” facilitate unlawful presence and therefore reversed the conviction for attempted harboring (but affirmed a bribery conviction).

Some state and local governments have relied on the federal harboring statute to justify laws that would (a) require landlords to investigate their tenants’ immigration statuses and (b) criminalize the renting of accommodations to undocumented immigrants, even without an intent to facilitate the person’s unlawful presence or an intent to conceal the person from the federal authorities. See generally Sophie Alcorn, Landlords Beware, You May be Renting Your Own Room . . . in Jail: Landlords Should Not Be Prosecuted for Harboring Aliens, 7 Washington Univ. Global Studies L. Rev. 289 (2008) (arguing against construing simple rental of housing as “harboring”).

Many unauthorized workers obtain employment by presenting false social security cards. Some of the cards contain nonexistent names and social security numbers, while other cards contain the names and social security numbers of actual people. Often the card is supplied by a smuggler, and the undocumented immigrant does not know that the name and number belong to someone else. In cases involving other individuals’ names and numbers, federal prosecutors sometimes bring criminal charges for “aggravated identity theft.” 18 U.S.C. § 1028A(a)(1). In the Postville, Iowa meatpacking raids of 2008, for example, the prosecutors threatened to bring that charge, which carries a mandatory two-year prison sentence, against the vast majority of the apprehended workers, unless those workers agreed to plead guilty to the lesser offense of knowingly using a false social security number and to serve five months in jail. See Camayd-Freixes, note 18 above. In Flores-Figueroa v. United States, 129 S.Ct. 1886 (2009), a unanimous Supreme Court interpreted the statute to require knowledge that the means of identification belonged to another person. The Court’s decision is likely to have a major impact on ICE’s criminal prosecution strategies in cases involving undocumented immigrants. For an informative description of the Postville investigation, raid, and prosecutions, as well as a careful argument for interpreting section 1028A(a)(1) to require knowledge that the means of identification belong to another person, see Peter R. Moyers, Butchering Statutes: The Postville Raid and the Misinterpretation of Federal Criminal Law, 32 Seattle L. Rev. 651 (2009).

Perhaps the darkest side of illegal immigration is the growing trade in young girls and women, an adjunct of the increased use of professional smugglers and traffickers. The emerging trend has been one of international cooperation in addressing the related problems of “human smuggling” and “human trafficking.” The latter term generally signifies an element of coercion or at least exploitation, frequently involving prostitution, slavery, or indentured servitude.²²

Recent years have witnessed several international agreements to combat various forms of slavery and trafficking. The most important agreement is the so-called Palermo Protocol, officially the “Protocol to Prevent, Suppress and Punish Trafficking in Persons, Especially Women and Children, Supplementing the United Nations Convention against Transnational Organized Crime,” adopted by U.N.G.A. Res. A/RES/55/25 (Nov. 15, 2000, entered into force 2003), http://www.unodc.org/unodc/en/crime_cicp_convention.html. It requires states to take a number of enforcement, educational, and other cooperative measures, but most of the requirements are worded flexibly enough to be more precatory than binding. A subsequent report of the UN High Commissioner for Human Rights to the UN Economic and Social Council, U.N. Doc. E/2002/68/Add.1 (distributed May 20, 2002), recommends a number of ways to concretize the prescriptions of the Palermo Protocol and otherwise resist trafficking. The United States ratified both the Convention and the Palermo Protocol, effective December 3, 2005. See 82 IR 1835 (Nov. 14, 2005). The United States Congress has passed the Trafficking Victims Protection Act of 2000, described more fully in chapter 4, section E above (allowing limited numbers of nonimmigrant “T” and “U” visas for trafficking victims). Like other countries, the United States sees the problem as not only a humanitarian issue, but also one of crime and border control.

22. For thoughtful studies, see David Kyle & Rey Koslowski (eds.), Global Human Smuggling: Comparative Perspectives (2001); Jennifer M. Chacón, Misery and Myopia: Understanding the Failures of U.S. Efforts to Stop Human Trafficking, 74 Fordham L. Rev. 2977 (2006); Marisa Silenzi Cianciarulo, Modern-Day Slavery and Cultural Bias: Proposals for Reforming the U.S. Visa System for Victims of International Human Trafficking, 7 Nevada L.J. 826 (2007); Nora V. Demleitner, The Law at a Crossroads: The Construction of Migrant Women Trafficked into Prostitution, in Kyle & Koslowski, above, ch.10; Anna Marie Gallagher, Triply Exploited: Female Victims of Trafficking Networks—Strategies for Pursuing Protection and Legal Status in Countries of Destination, 19 Georgetown Immigration L.J. 99 (2004); Dina Francesca Haynes, (Not) Found Chained to a Bed in a Brothel: Conceptual, Legal, and Procedural Failures to Fulfill the Promise of the Trafficking Victims Protection Act, 21 Georgetown Immigration L.J. 337 (2007); Dina Francesca Haynes, Used, Arrested and Deported: Extending Immigration Benefits to Protect the Victims of Trafficking and to Secure the Prosecution of Traffickers, 26 Human Rights Q. 221 (2004); Institute for the Study of International Migration of Georgetown University & European Forum for Migration Studies of Univ. of Bamberg, Transatlantic Workshop on Human Smuggling, 15 Georgetown Immigration L.J. 167 (2001); Lisa Raffonelli, INS Final Rule to Assist Victims of Trafficking, 23 Refugee Reports 1 (Apr. 2002); Jayashri Srikantiah, Perfect Victims and Real Survivors: The Iconic Victim in Domestic Human Trafficking Law, 87 Boston Univ. L. Rev. 157 (2007); United States Dept. of State, Trafficking in Persons Report (June 14, 2004), digested in 81 IR at 910 (July 12, 2004), followed by congressional hearings, 81 IR 931 (July 19, 2004).

One last kind of immigration penalty relevant here is imposed on commercial carriers. If you have flown internationally, you have probably noticed that the airline ticketing agent at the departure airport always asks to see your passport and any required visa. In case you were wondering what business it is of theirs, the answer is that the immigration laws of most countries require common carriers (airlines, shipping lines, railroads, bus companies, etc.) to check for the necessary entry documents. If the arriving passenger somehow shows up at the port of entry without them, the carrier will generally be liable to civil fines and responsible for transporting the person back at its own expense. See, e.g., INA §§ 271–73; see generally Robert M. Jarvis, Rusting in Drydock: Stowaways, Shipowners and the Administrative Penalty Provision of INA Section 273(d), 13 Tulane Maritime L.J. 25 (1988). There are, in addition, provisions authorizing the civil forfeiture of vehicles used to assist the commission of specified immigration offenses. INA § 274(b).

2. IRCA AND EMPLOYER MISCONDUCT

a. EMPLOYER SANCTIONS

After many years of debate and study by researchers, academics, non-governmental organizations, and bi-partisan congressional committees,²³ Congress in 1986 enacted the Immigration Reform and Control Act, Pub.L. 99–603, 100 Stat. 3359 (IRCA). The central target of IRCA was illegal immigration, which the statute attacked on several fronts. Congress adopted a trio of legalization programs, focused on the undocumented immigrant population generally, agricultural workers, and Cuban and Haitian entrants. See section B below. These programs reduced the undocumented population—then estimated to be between four and six million—by permitting nearly three million people to acquire a new temporary-resident status that established eligibility for permanent status. At the same time, Congress sought to shrink the incentive for future unlawful migration by drying up the job opportunities that it saw as the principal magnet. To that end, Congress added a new section 274A to the INA. That section imposes civil fines, and in certain instances criminal punishment, on those who knowingly hire anyone not authorized to work (or who do certain other things described below). The same section also requires employees and certain others to take specified affirmative steps to verify work authorization.

Employer sanctions became permanently etched in the American consciousness in early 1993, when it was reported that President Clinton's choice for Attorney General, Zoe Baird, had been employing an undocumented couple as domestic workers. The resulting uproar doomed her nomination. See Michael Kelly, Settling In: The President's Day; Clinton Cancels Baird Nomination for Justice Dept., New York Times (Jan. 22,

²³ See especially U.S. Immigration Commission on Immigration and Refugee Policy and the National Interest: The Final Policy with Supplemental Views by Commissioners, 97th Cong., 1st Sess. (Mar. 1, 1981). Report and Recommendations of the Select 1993), at A1. After it became known that the new President's second choice, Judge Kimba Wood, had also employed an undocumented immigrant, the political climate persuaded Judge Wood to withdraw from consideration—even though her actions (unlike Baird's) had been entirely legal under the then existing law. New York Times (Feb. 6, 1993), at A-2. That the Attorney General was then responsible for enforcing the immigration laws served only to heighten the sensitivity of the issue. Still, the controversy renewed a broader discussion of what kinds of conduct ought to disqualify people from public office, as well as a debate about child care, gender, and double standards.

The pre-IRCA debates reflected sharp differences of opinion about the wisdom of employer sanctions. Proponents emphasized the problems associated with undocumented immigrants and portrayed employer sanctions as a promising way to deter both surreptitious entries and overstays. They also argued that no plausible alternative was apparent. Opponents expressed doubts that employer sanctions would achieve their stated goal, concerns about the administrative burdens on employers, and fears that employer sanctions would lead to various forms of job discrimination. To mitigate that last concern, Congress added INA § 274B, which prohibits certain discriminatory acts. How well employer sanctions have worked and what the negatives have been are discussed below. For now, it is enough to note that this package of employer sanctions, prohibitions on discrimination, and legalization was able to command majorities in both Houses of Congress and to become law. For a clear and thorough analysis of the statute as a whole, see Maurice A. Roberts & Stephen Yale-Loehr, Understanding the 1986 Immigration Law (1987).

The employer sanctions provision, INA § 274A, proscribes several acts. Subsection a(1)(A) makes it unlawful "to hire, or to recruit or refer for a fee, for employment in the United States an alien knowing the alien is an unauthorized alien . . ." Under subsection a(2), it is unlawful "to continue to employ [an] alien in the United States knowing the alien is (or has become) an unauthorized alien . . ." To be authorized to work, a noncitizen must be an LPR, or fall within one of the other categories of noncitizens for whom the INA automatically authorizes employment, or be a person who has received individual work authorization from USCIS. INA § 274A(h)(3). Of continuing importance, IRCA § 101(a)(3) provided:

(3) GRANDFATHER FOR CURRENT EMPLOYEES.

(A) Section 274A(a)(1) of the Immigration and Nationality Act shall not apply to the hiring, or recruiting or referring of an individual for employment which has occurred before the date of the enactment of this Act.

(B) Section 274A(a)(2) of the Immigration and Nationality Act shall not apply to continuing employment of an alien who was hired before the date of the enactment of this Act.

There has been some concern about the applicability of IRCA to casual domestic employment. The literal statutory language contains no exemption for innocuous employment, but the regulations define employment not to include “casual employment by individuals who provide domestic service in a private home that is sporadic, irregular, or intermittent.” 8 C.F.R. § 274a.1(h) (2008).

What “knowing” means has been the subject of some controversy. The issue arises most commonly when ICE does a routine check of an employer’s records, discovers that the identification number that appeared on the green card that the person displayed to the employer either does not exist in the DHS computer database or belongs to someone else, and consequently notifies the employer that it suspects the employee is not authorized to work. If the employer does nothing, is it guilty of continuing to employ, “knowing” that the person is not authorized to work?

In Mester Manufacturing Co. v. INS, 879 F.2d 561 (9th Cir.1989), the court held, first, that “constructive” knowledge was enough. The court meant only that “deliberate failure to investigate suspicious circumstances imputes knowledge.” Id. at 567 (emphasis added). Accord, New El Rey Sausage Co. v. United States INS, 925 F.2d 1153, 1157–58 (9th Cir.1991).

In Collins Foods International, Inc. v. INS, 948 F.2d 549 (9th Cir. 1991), the Chief Administrative Law Judge (see the procedural description below) had found an employer guilty of knowingly hiring an unauthorized migrant. Unbeknownst to the personnel officer, the social security card that the employee presented to establish work authorization was counterfeit. The ALJ found “constructive” knowledge because the personnel officer, after examining the document, had not compared the back of it to a sample social security card illustrated in a manual of the former INS.²⁴ The court reversed, observing that the statute requires only that the employer verify that the document on its face appear genuine; comparison with samples displayed in a government manual is not necessary.

Importantly, the court cited Mester and New El Rey as the only two federal cases finding constructive knowledge; the court emphasized that in both cases the employer had retained the employees after being notified by the INS that the employees’ green card numbers were false. The court in Collins Foods then observed that both those cases had relied on United States v. Jewell, 532 F.2d 697, 704 (9th Cir. 1976), where constructive knowledge of a particular fact had been interpreted (in a different context) to require awareness that the fact was highly probable and a conscious decision to “avoid enlightenment”—in other words, wilful blindness.

Nonetheless, the regulations interpret “knowing” to include “knowledge that may fairly be inferred through notice of certain facts and

24. The ALJ had also relied on the fact that the personnel officer had made the initial job offer over the phone (because the employee had been working for an affiliated company in another city), without examining the employee’s documents. As the court pointed out, it is perfectly proper to make the offer by phone as long as the employer inspects the documents at or before the hiring. INA § 274A(a)(1)(B). Hiring, in turn, is defined as the “actual commencement of employment.” 8 C.F.R. § 274a.1(c) (2008). Since the employer performed all the required tasks before the employee started work, there was no violation.

circumstances that would lead a person, through the exercise of reasonable care, to know about a certain condition.” 8 CFR § 274a.1(1) (2008). That formulation goes beyond wilful blindness; it appears also to encompass what tort lawyers sometimes call “reason to know.”

There still remains the question of when the employer’s inaction in the face of such notice amounts to “continu[ing] to employ.” In both Mester Manufacturing and New El Rey Sausage Co., the Ninth Circuit made clear that the employer could not be found guilty for failing to fire or suspend an employee immediately upon receiving notice of the government’s suspicion. Rather, the court said, the government “must provide an employer with a reasonable amount of time for compliance after the employer acquires knowledge that an employee is unauthorized.” New El Rey Sausage Co., 925 F.2d at 1156.

The development of a government database with which employers can determine whether an individual is authorized to work in the United States, now called “E-Verify,” prompted ICE, in 2007, to publish formal instructions to employers for responding to notices, known as “no-match” letters, that employees are not authorized to work. The database and the ICE instructions to employers are discussed below.

The subsections discussed up to this point define substantive prohibitions. In contrast, subsection a(1)(B) creates a separate, procedural offense. It imposes on the employer an affirmative obligation to perform certain paperwork before hiring any individual—whether a citizen or not. The specific requirements, which are designed to verify that the employee may lawfully be hired, are all laid out in section 274A(b). A good faith attempt to comply with the verification procedures will excuse “a technical or procedural” failure. INA § 274A(b)(6). And actual good faith compliance with those requirements is also an automatic defense to the charge of violating the substantive provisions. INA § 274A(a)(3).

The verification system described in section 274A(b) consists of several steps. First, the employer must examine certain documents furnished by the prospective employee. The statute lists examples of three categories of documents—those that simultaneously establish the employee’s identity and his or her employment authorization, those that establish only the latter, and those that establish only the former. See subsections b(1)(B, C, and D) respectively. The employer must examine either a document listed in (B) or two separate documents—one listed in (c) and one listed in (D)—and assure that the documentation “reasonably appears on its face to be genuine.” INA § 274A(b)(1)(A).

After examining the relevant documents, the employer must attest under penalty of perjury, on a standardized form, that it has performed the required verification. Id. On the same form the employee must then attest that he or she is either a United States citizen or otherwise authorized to work. INA § 274A(b)(2). The employer must retain the form for a specified time period, during which certain enforcement officials have the right to inspect it. INA § 274A(b)(3). Nothing in the statute requires the employer to keep copies of the inspected documents, but many employers do so voluntarily to prove that they performed the required inspection.

The Secretary of Homeland Security (originally the Attorney General) is the official charged with investigating and prosecuting suspected violations of the employer sanctions provisions. INA § 274A(e). A variety of enforcement techniques are applied toward that end. An early one, which has come under criticism, has been to arrange for the Labor Department to forward to the immigration officials copies of labor certification applications that appear to reveal past or ongoing employment of the undocumented beneficiaries. The information on those application forms is sometimes used to initiate sanctions proceedings against the employer and/or removal proceedings against the employee. Consider the pros and cons of that policy. See 70 IR 291–92 (Mar. 8, 1993).

Any person with knowledge of a potential violation of section 274A may file a complaint with ICE. 8 C.F.R. § 274a.9(a) (2008). ICE may investigate the complaint or investigate a suspected violation on its own initiative. If ICE finds a violation, it serves on the alleged violator either a Notice of Intent to Fine or a Warning Notice. Id. § 274a.9(b). The party then has the right to request a formal hearing before an administrative law judge (ALJ). INA § 274A(d)(ii)(c). The regulations spell out the details. See 28 C.F.R. § 68 (2008). In particular, they establish within the Executive Office for Immigration Review (the same agency that houses the immigration judges and the BIA) a separate Office of the Chief Administrative Hearing Officer (OCAHO). The ALJ's are situated within OCAHO. Id. § 68.2. ICE must prove its case by a preponderance of the evidence. INA § 274A(e)(3)(c). If it does, the ALJ imposes civil fines, which are higher for substantive violations than for paperwork violations. INA § 274A(e)(4, 5). Criminal proceedings, in which the sentence can include imprisonment for up to six months, are possible when there has been a "pattern or practice" of violating the substantive provisions. INA § 274A(f)(1). The sentence can be as long as five years if, within a twelve-month period, the employer hired ten or more unauthorized workers with actual knowledge of their status. INA § 274(a)(3).

Under the Justice Department's regulations, the Chief Administrative Hearing Officer has the discretion to review the decision of the ALJ. 28 C.F.R. § 68.54(a) (2004); see also INA § 274A(e)(7). Judicial review of the final administrative decision is available by petition for review in the court of appeals. INA § 274A(e)(8).

The OCAHO decisions in these cases (and also in the anti-discrimination cases discussed in the next subsection) are sometimes accompanied by full opinions. Selected opinions of ALJ's and of the Chief Administrative Hearing Officer are now published in Administrative Decisions under the Employer Sanctions and Unfair Immigration-Related Employment Practices Laws. They can also be accessed through the EOIR website. Visit <http://www.usdoj.gov/eoir> and click on "Virtual Law Library" and then "OCAHO."

Federal enforcement of employer sanctions peaked in the mid 1990's. From then until the early 2000's, enforcement was lax until public opinion spurred a resurgence of enforcement activity that continues as of this writing. Julia Preston, U.S. Puts Onus on Employers of Immigrants, New York Times (July 31, 2006), at A1, A16. The government has made particularly increased use of the criminal penalties. See Stanley Mailman & Stephen Yale-Loehr, Criminalizing Employer Sanctions: Employers Walk a Tightrope, 11 BIB 1089 (Sept. 15, 2006).

The verdict is still out on employer sanctions. Have they deterred illegal immigration? Have the burdens imposed on business been justified or too costly? Have employer sanctions, despite the simultaneous enactment of prohibitions on certain discriminatory practices (more on those in subsection A.2 below), in fact caused significant levels of discrimination? Should the employer sanctions provisions be retained as is, modified, or repealed? If they are either retained or modified, what changes in administration and enforcement, if any, would be beneficial?

Opinion on these questions is divided.²⁵ The AFL-CIO has urged a full repeal of employer sanctions. See 79 IR 39 (Jan. 7, 2002). Professor Michael J. Wishnie argues that because IRCA has "led to increased workplace exploitation of undocumented immigrants, strengthened the jobs magnet that sanctions aimed to weaken, encouraged illegal immigration, and eroded wages and working conditions for U.S. workers," as well as increased workplace discrimination and compromised national security by driving immigrants into the "shadows of civic life," it is time to abandon employer sanctions. See Michael J. Wishnie, Prohibiting the Employment of Unauthorized Immigrants: The Experiment Fails, 2007 Univ. of Chicago Legal Forum 193. He also cites evidence that government enforcement of the sanctions provisions has declined since the early 1990s. See id. at 209. Though the Bush administration initiated high-profile worksite raids in its final years, Wishnie is skeptical that worksite enforcement priorities will shift dramatically, in part because amendments to IRCA have strengthened

25. For a good sampling, see Robert L. Bach & Doris Meissner, Employment and Immigration Reform: Employer Sanctions Four Years Later [hereafter Bach & Meissner] 4-5 (1990); Howard F. Chang, Immigration and the Workplace: Immigration Restrictions as Employment Discrimination, 78 Chicago-Kent L. Rev. 291 (2003) (characterizing employer sanctions as government-mandated employment discrimination against noncitizens); Cecelia M. Espenosa, The Illusory Provisions of Sanctions: The Immigration Reform and Control Act of 1986, 8 Georgetown Immigration L.J. 343 (1994); Michael Fix & Paul T. Hill, Enforcing Employer Sanctions: Challenges and Strategies [hereafter Fix & Hill] 11-15 (1990); Stephen H. Legomsky, Employer

Sanctions: Past and Future, in Peter Duignan & Lewis H. Gann (eds.), The Debate in the United States over Immigration, chap. 6 (1998) (identifying benefits and costs of employer sanctions); Stanley Mailman, The Employer as Immigration Inspector, 1 BIB #8 at 20-25 (July 1996); M. Isabel Medina, Wal-Mart, Immigrant Workers and the U.S. Government: A Case of Split Personality?, 39 Connecticut L. Rev. 1443 (2007) (urging repeal); M. Isabel Medina, The Criminalization of Immigration Law: Employer Sanctions and Marriage Fraud, 5 George Mason L. Rev. 669, 678-96 (1997); United States Commission on Immigration Reform, U.S. Immigration Policy: Restoring Credibility [hereafter CIR] 50-76 (Sept. 1994).

employer defenses, and because the government has committed limited resources to interior enforcement. See id. at 209–11.

Professor Stephen Lee makes the novel point that the lax enforcement of IRCA—rather than IRCA itself—has effectively converted employers from enforcement targets into enforcement partners of the federal government. He argues that employers flout the hiring prohibition and then, as soon as their undocumented employees organize or complain, request ICE to raid the worksite, secure in the knowledge that ICE will not penalize a cooperative employer. See Stephen Lee, Private Immigration Screening in the Workplace, 61 Stanford L. Rev. 1103 (2009). Citing the ineffectiveness and dangers of employer sanctions, Professor Huyen Pham has argued that similar problems can result from other attempts to rely on the private sector to enforce the immigration laws through constraints on housing, education, health care, transportation, and the like. See Huyen Pham, The Private Enforcement of Immigration Laws, 96 Georgetown L. Rev. 777 (2008).

Recognizing the need for evaluation, Congress included in IRCA a provision that required the Comptroller General, who heads the General Accountability [formerly Accounting] Office, to prepare a series of three annual reports, beginning one year after enactment, reviewing the implementation of IRCA. Congress asked the GAO to determine whether

- (A) [the employer sanctions] provisions have been carried out satisfactorily;
- (B) a pattern of discrimination has resulted against citizens or nationals of the United States or against eligible workers seeking employment; and
- (C) an unnecessary regulatory burden has been created for employers hiring such workers.

INA § 274A(j)(1). The statute also created an inter-agency task force that, in the event the GAO found a pattern of national origin discrimination, would be charged with recommending remedies. INA § 274A(k). Importantly, the Act provides that, if the GAO reports “a widespread pattern of discrimination has resulted * * * solely from the implementation of” employer sanctions, expedited procedures would be permitted in both the House and the Senate to decide whether employer sanctions should be repealed. INA § 274A(l)(1); see also id. § 274A(m, n).

The third and final GAO report utilized various statistical methods, including pairs of fake job applicants of contrasting ethnicities and accents. In its detailed 162-page report, GAO found that employer sanctions appeared to have reduced illegal immigration without unnecessarily burdening employers, had generally been successfully implemented by the government, and had not generated frivolous discrimination complaints. But the report also found “a serious pattern of discrimination” and identified employer sanctions as the cause:

United States General Accounting Office, Immigration Reform—Employer Sanctions and the Question of Discrimination

Pages 3–8 (March 1990).

* * * GAO estimates that 461,000 (or 10 percent) of the 4.6 million employers in the survey population nationwide began one or more practices that represent national origin discrimination. * * *

An estimated 227,000 employers reported that they began a practice, as a result of IRCA, not to hire job applicants whose foreign appearance or accent led them to suspect that they might be unauthorized aliens. Also, contrary to IRCA, an estimated 346,000 employers said that they applied IRCA's verification system only to persons who had a "foreign" appearance or accent. Some employers began both practices.

* * *

GAO estimates that an additional 430,000 employers (9 percent) said that because of the law they began hiring only persons born in the United States or not hiring persons with temporary work eligibility documents. These practices are illegal and can harm people, particularly those of Hispanic and Asian origin.

Adding these employers to those who began national origin discrimination, GAO estimates that 891,000 (19 percent) of the 4.6 million employers in the survey population nationwide began one or more discriminatory practices as a result of the law.

Not all the GAO's conclusions are universally shared. One study viewed the reduced number of border apprehensions as "consistent with the possibility that some dampening effect on illegal crossings may have occurred" but cautioned that legalization might be responsible for that decrease and added that in any event more information is needed. Frank D. Bean, George Vernez & Charles B. Keely, Rand Corp. & Urban Institute, Opening and Closing the Doors—Evaluating Immigration Reform and Control 109 (1989). See generally id., chaps. 5, 6. Since then, as you saw earlier, the undocumented population in the U.S. has grown steadily. That, of course, does not prove employer sanctions have been ineffective, since no one knows how large the increases would have been without employer sanctions. Another empirical study found widespread violations of IRCA, argued that Congress saw illegal immigration as economically beneficial and thus did not really wish to deter it, suggested that Congress enacted employer sanctions only because it felt pressure to satisfy the public, and concluded that Congress had known the law it passed would be easy to circumvent with fraudulent documents. Kitty Calavita, Employer Sanctions Violations: Toward a Dialectical Model of White-Collar Crime, 24 L. & Society Rev. 1041 (1990).

As you have just read, the GAO found that both the former INS and the Labor Department had satisfactorily performed their education and enforcement missions. Another study added that “[t]he INS has averted significant complaints about unfair or overzealous employer sanctions enforcement” and “has generally stayed within the bounds of administrative law.” Michael Fix & Paul T. Hill, Enforcing Employer Sanctions: Challenges and Strategies iii (1990); see also id. at 104–05. The GAO also found that the burden on employers had not been unreasonable, GAO Report, ch. 6, and the study by Fix and Hill observed that the national business community had not mobilized any major opposition, Fix and Hill, above, at 104. Still, there remains a difficult line for employers to walk between observing the employer sanctions provisions and avoiding the kinds of discrimination that section 274B, examined below, prohibits. For a good discussion, see Maurice A. Roberts & Stephen Yale-Loehr, Employers as Junior Immigration Inspectors: The Impact of the 1986 Immigration Reform and Control Act, 21 Internat’l Lawyer 1013 (1987).

The most volatile of the GAO’s conclusions was its finding that employer sanctions had caused widespread discrimination, both in hiring decisions and in decisions whether to demand documentation. Prior studies had reached similar results.²⁶ Some critics, however, have questioned that finding. An internal GAO memo from its chief methodologist stated that the data did not conclusively trace the “widespread” discrimination to employer sanctions. See Robert L. Bach & Doris Meissner, Employment and Immigration Reform: Employer Sanctions Four Years Later 16 & 44 n. 19 (Sept. 1990). Senator Alan Simpson, who led the congressional fight for sanctions, denounced the GAO report, arguing that the statute did not require expedited congressional action on a repeal resolution unless the GAO found the widespread pattern of discrimination resulted “solely” from the implementation of employer sanctions. See INA § 274A(l)(1)(A); Bach & Meissner, above, at 16. (If the statute is interpreted literally, could such a fact ever be found? See Martha F. Davis, Lucas Guttentag & Allan H. Wernick, Report of the Committee on Immigration and Nationality Law of the Association of the Bar of the City of New York: An Analysis of Discrimination Resulting from Employer Sanctions and a Call for Repeal, 26 San Diego L. Rev. 711, 733–35 (1989).

To reduce discrimination, the GAO report also suggested enhanced efforts to educate employers and the development of a more effective document system. Some other researchers agree, but at the same time call

26. See, e.g., U.S. Comm’n on Civil Rights, The Immigration Reform and Control Act: Assessing the Evaluation Process iv (Sept. 1989) (finding “no doubt that the employer sanctions have caused many employers to implement discriminatory hiring practices”); New York State Inter-Agency Task Force on Immigration Affairs, Workplace Discrimination Under the Immigration Reform and Control Act of 1986: A Study of Impacts on New Yorkers 10 (Nov. 4, 1988) (“‘widespread pattern of discrimination’ has been documented in New York”); Martha F. Davis, Lucas Guttentag & Allan H. Wernick, Report of the Committee on Immigration and Nationality Law of the Association of the Bar of the City of New York: An Analysis of Discrimination Resulting from Employer Sanctions and a Call for Repeal, 26 San Diego L. Rev. 711, 717–23 (1989).

for more strenuous enforcement of the employer sanctions provisions. Bach & Meissner, above, at 34–39; Fix & Hill, above, at iii–iv, 107–09. And in 1991 the former INS consciously began shifting resources from education to enforcement. See 68 IR 429–31 (1991). Congress has taken some limited measures on the education front, such as mandating the dissemination of information on the anti-discrimination provisions, discussed in subsection 2 below. See INA § 274B(l). The GAO findings led several members of Congress to introduce resolutions and bills that would have repealed sanctions entirely. For a list, see Bach & Meissner, above, at 41 nn. 2, 3. None of the resolutions or bills passed.

Of all the implementation problems that have beset employer sanctions, however, the one that has garnered by far the most attention has been the proliferation of counterfeit and fraudulently obtained documents. Especially common have been false social security cards and false immigration documents. Of particular concern have been the so-called “breeder” documents, like birth certificates, that in turn are used to procure drivers’ licenses, social security cards, and passports. See generally United States Comm’n on Immigration Reform, U.S. Immigration Policy: Restoring Credibility 54 (Sept. 1994) [hereafter CIR].

In response to the problem of document fraud, the CIR proposed, on a pilot basis, a national computerized registry of authorized workers and telephonic employer access. The idea was to create a centralized data bank with the name and social security number of every authorized worker in the United States—citizen and noncitizen alike. The employer would phone the data bank to verify that a job applicant’s social security number is valid. The system would then either confirm that the named individual has that number or inform the employer that the name and the number do not match. See CIR, above, at 60–62.

In IIRIRA § 401, Congress obliged, creating a “Basic Pilot Program” along those lines (as well as two other pilot programs no longer in operation). In October 2008, President Bush signed a continuing resolution (H.R. 2638) to authorize the extension of the program until March 6, 2009. As of this writing, the debate over whether and how long to continue the program’s operation continues.

The program originally existed only for employers in a few designated states, but, effective December 1, 2004, USCIS extended it to all 50 states and the District of Columbia. 69 Fed. Reg. 75997 (Dec. 20, 2004). Now web-based rather than dial-in, the program enables participating employers to confirm a job applicant’s work authorization, usually “within seconds.” Id. The CIR and Congress have hoped these programs would eliminate both document fraud and IRCA-related discrimination (the latter because employers could simply punch in a name and number rather than have to distinguish citizens from noncitizens). To date, however, the program (now re-named “E-Verify”) has been beset by errors and inaccuracies. See, e.g., Westat, Findings of the Web Basic Pilot Evaluation, Report to DHS (Sept. 2007). Common problems have been misspellings of surnames, inconsistent transliterations of surnames from other alphabets, changes of name upon marriage or divorce, and the long delays in incorporating new information. The result has been that “no-match” responses are too often sent in error. The Social Security Administration itself estimates that approximately 17.8 million of the 430 million entries in its database contain errors; about 3.3 million entries mis-classify foreign-born U.S. citizens as noncitizens. See Congressional Response Report: Accuracy of the Social Security Administration’s NUMIDENT File (Dec. 2006), available at <http://www.socialsecurity.gov/oig/ADOBEPDF/audittxt/A-08-06-26100.htm>.

To deal with that problem, ICE published procedures in August 2007 for employers to follow when they are told that the name and social security number of a prospective or current employee do not match. See 72 Fed. Reg. 45611 (Aug. 15, 2007), amending 8 CFR § 274a. The employer is instructed to take “reasonable” steps, in a “timely” fashion, to further investigate the employee’s authorization to work. More specifically, the employer is expected first to check its own internal records, within thirty days, to look for possible clerical errors. If that does not resolve the problem, the employer is to ask the employee to confirm that the employer’s records are correct. If the employee says the records are not correct, the employer should request the employee to have either the Social Security Administration or DHS, as the case may be, correct its records, and the employer should then confirm the correction directly with the agency. If all this is satisfactorily completed within 90 days, the rule’s “safe-harbor” provision precludes DHS from using the employer’s receipt of a no-match letter as evidence of constructive knowledge that the employee was not authorized to work. (Of course, the employer will still be in violation if it had actual knowledge.) If the employer cannot resolve the discrepancy within 90 days, he or she must complete a new I-9 form for the employee. Query: Do you think most employers will utilize the procedure prescribed by this regulation, or will they find it safer and cheaper to simply fire or not hire the employee once a no-match message is received?

In October 2007, the United States District Court for the Northern District of California preliminarily enjoined the government from enforcing the new regulations, on the ground that DHS did not conform to the requirements of the APA and other congressional mandates. See American Federation of Labor v. Chertoff, 552 F.Supp.2d 999 (N.D. Cal. 2007). Of note was the district court’s observation that the receipt of a no-match letter does not, under the regulations, trigger a finding of constructive knowledge in every instance, because the regulation defines constructive knowledge as depending on the “totality of relevant circumstances.” See 8 C.F.R. § 274a.1(l)(1) (2008). Upon the government’s request, the district court stayed further proceedings until March 28, 2008, pending a new rulemaking. DHS proposed to repromulgate the regulation without change and ended the comment period on April 26, 2008. See Safe-Harbor Procedures for Employers Who Receive a No-Match Letter: Clarification; Initial Regulatory Flexibility Analysis, 73 Fed.Reg. 15944, 15955 (March 26, 2008). In response to a new TRO, ICE has now issued a supplemental final rule on no-match letters. 73 Fed. Reg. 63843-67 (Oct. 28, 2008). For more detail on the lawsuit and the final rule, see 85 IR 2877, 2902 (Nov. 3, 2008).

The Ninth Circuit has addressed the constructive knowledge issue as well, in a different case reviewing an arbitration award involving an employer's receipt of a no-match letter. Upon receiving the letter, Aramark Facility Services gave listed employees three days to correct the mismatches. Seven to ten days later, the company fired the 33 employees who did not comply. The workers' union filed a grievance on their behalf, and an arbitrator awarded the workers back-pay and reinstatement. The district court vacated the award on the ground that it violated the public policy interest in compliance with IRCA. The Ninth Circuit reversed, observing that the public policy interest, though well defined, did not justify reversing the arbitrator's award. The court found that, contrary to Aramark's claim, the award would not have forced the company to reinstate and provide back-pay to undocumented workers, thus exposing Aramark to liability under IRCA for employing workers with "constructive knowledge" that they were undocumented. For the purposes of IRCA, the court emphasized, "constructive knowledge" is to be construed narrowly. Because the no-match letters were not intended by the SSA to contain "positive information" of immigration status, as required by Collins Foods, New El-Rey, and Mester, the letters without more did not provide constructive knowledge of the workers' undocumented status. See Aramark Facility Services v. SEIU, 530 F.3d 817 (9th Cir. 2008).

Andrew Strojny, the former Acting Special Counsel for Immigration-Related Unfair Employment Practices (the official in charge of investigating and prosecuting claims arising under IRCA's antidiscrimination provisions) has other concerns. He fears that the practical implementation of a national computerized registry would lead not only to unacceptably frequent errors, but also to improper use of information by government officials and a loss of personal privacy.²⁷

What do you think? Will an electronic national registry and a program like E-Verify make employer sanctions more effective and/or reduce job discrimination? Precisely how might it bring about the harms described by Strojny? (The CIR report and the Strojny article provide much more detail.)

Employer sanctions laws have been enacted in several western countries. Some interesting comparative studies have resulted.²⁸

27. Andrew M. Strojny, Papers, Papers ... Please: A National ID or an Electronic Tattoo, 72 IR 617 (May 8, 1995); see also Juan P. Osuna, The 1996 Immigration Act: Employer Sanctions, Antidiscrimination and Work Verification, 73 IR 1749 (Dec. 20, 1996). Professor Daniel Steinbock suggests that a national identity card system compatible with the Fourth Amendment, the self-incrimination clause, and other constitutional guarantees could be designed, but that the Constitution would significantly limit the uses to which the system could be put. See Daniel J. Steinbock, National Identity Cards: Fourth and Fifth Amendment Issues, 56 Florida L. Rev. 697 (2004), reproduced, 10 BIB 1467 (Oct. 1, 2005); see also Julie Lam, Note, Show Me the Green: Civil RICO Actions against Employers Who Knowingly Hire Undocumented Workers, 84 Washington Univ. L. Rev. 717 (2006).

28. See United States GAO, Illegal Aliens—Information on Selected Countries' Employment Prohibition Laws, No. GAO/GGD-86-17BR (Oct. 1985); M. Isabel Medina, Employer Sanctions in the United States, Canada and Mexico: Exploring the Criminalization of Immigration Law, 3 Southwestern

PROBLEMS 1-7

To do these Problems, you will need to consult the actual text of INA § 274A. Assume all hirings occurred after the enactment of IRCA (November 1986) unless specified otherwise.

Problem 1. A hired a noncitizen student who was authorized to work off campus up to 20 hours per week. A was aware of that limitation and initially respected it. As things got busier in the office, however, A occasionally asked the student to put in 30-hour weeks. The student obliged. Has A violated INA § 274A?

Problem 2. B, about to hire a noncitizen applicant, asks to see the documents required by IRCA. The applicant displays identification and says that he has a green card, but adds apologetically that he absentmindedly left it at home and would be glad to bring it in the next day. B believes the applicant and allows him to start work but tells him to be sure to remember to bring the green card. In fact the applicant is undocumented. B forgets that he has not verified the person's work authorization, and the employee continues on the job. What charges might be brought against B?

Problem 3. A B-1 business visitor with no employment authorization applies to C for a job. She displays proper identification and a document that shows she has been admitted as a business visitor. The document says nothing either way about employment. C's personnel officer, mistakenly believing that business visitors are allowed to work, attests to having examined the appropriate documents. What charges might be brought against C?

Problem 4. D, a homeowner, knows she will be out of town for the summer. She therefore hires Justin, a high school student who lives next door, to mow D's lawn throughout the summer. Justin, a United States citizen, agrees. He ends up mowing the lawn five times, for which D pays him $100 upon her return. D has known Justin since Justin was born and does not ask him to display any documents. Has D violated section 274A?

Problem 5. Benito was admitted to the United States in 1984 (before IRCA) on what was then an H-1 ("distinguished merit and ability") nonimmigrant visa, which permits employment. E hired him that year. Although Benito's authorized stay finally expired in 1990 (as E knew), he remained in the United States longer than that, all the time working for E. In January 1991 Benito left the United States for a three-month visit with family. He returned to the United States without inspection in April 1991, at which time he resumed the work he had been doing for E. He has remained on the job ever since. What charges might be brought against E?

J. L. & Trade in the Americas 333 (1996) (finding employer sanctions counterproductive); Mark J. Miller, Employer Sanctions in Western Europe (1987); Francesco Isgro, Italy Enacts Law to Protect Basic Human Rights of Foreign Workers, 1 Georgetown Im- migration L.J. 693 (1986). In New Zealand, in fact, the law punishes not only one who employs unauthorized migrants, see Immigration Act 1987, § 39, but also anyone who provides education to them, id. § 40.

Problem 6. F, the President of a small company, and Helen, a noncitizen employee, together consult you for legal advice. When Helen first applied to the company for a job, she showed the personnel officer a driver's license and a social security card. The latter bore a special message to the effect that it did not authorize employment. As Helen had hoped, the personnel officer did not notice that message. After three years on the job Helen has become a highly valued and respected employee. Two days ago she confessed to F that she was a noncitizen without work authorization and asked whether he would help her "become legal" by applying for labor certification. F would like to keep her on his staff, and your opinion is that her occupational skills would probably qualify her for labor certification. Having studied the material in this section, what advice would you give? In framing your answer, consider the substantive law, the practical consequences for all concerned, and the applicable ethical constraints.

Problem 7. G, a small company, hires John, a United States citizen, in 1985. In 1995, John formally and effectively renounces his United States citizenship. (That makes him a noncitizen. And since he has not been granted LPR status or permission to work, it also leaves him without authorization to work.) The manager of the company knows all this but keeps John as an employee because John is extremely good at what he does. It is now 2012. Is G subject to employer sanctions?

b. PROHIBITIONS ON DISCRIMINATION²⁹

As the preceding section shows, concerns that employer sanctions would trigger discrimination against "foreign-looking" workers played a prominent part in the debates leading up to IRCA. The greatest fear was that employers would reject Latinos, Asians, and others in order to reduce the risk of inadvertently hiring an unauthorized worker. To break the stalemate, Representative Barney Frank offered a compromise. Employer sanctions would be coupled with provisions that expressly prohibited designated forms of job discrimination and established new administrative machinery for enforcing those prohibitions. The anti-discrimination program was enacted as IRCA § 102, which added a new section 274B to the INA.

Section 274B was itself controversial. The Reagan Administration and some others disputed, first, that employer sanctions would lead to discrimination. They argued that employers would have no motive to discriminate, since, to avoid sanctions, they would need only to do the required paperwork and to refrain from knowingly hiring unauthorized workers. Opponents of employer sanctions responded that that position requires an unrealistic assumption that employers will know enough about the immigration laws to realize they can avoid liability without discriminating (and,

²⁹ Unlike the other programs explored in this chapter, the anti-discrimination provisions of IRCA are inapplicable to undocumented immigrants. They appear in this chapter because they are immigration offenses and because they are a necessary adjunct to the employer sanctions provisions, which directly concern undocumented immigrants.

presumably, an assumption that employers will have enough confidence in their knowledge of the law to be willing to act on the basis of it.)

The reaction of the Reagan Administration was that, even if employer sanctions increase job discrimination, a new anti-discrimination program was unnecessary because existing civil rights laws already prohibited national origin discrimination. A new program, therefore, would simply add one more layer of bureaucracy.

Proponents of the anti-discrimination provisions responded by identifying various gaps in existing coverage. Title 7 of the Civil Rights Act of 1964, for example, prohibits employment discrimination on the basis of "race, color, religion, sex, or national origin." 42 U.S.C. § 2000e-2(a)(1). But that prohibition extends only to those who employ at least fifteen people, id. § 2000e(b), and even then it does not bar discrimination in favor of United States citizens against LPRs. See Espinoza v. Farah Manufacturing Co., 414 U.S. 86, 94 S.Ct. 334, 38 L.Ed.2d 287 (1973). Post-Civil War legislation, 42 U.S.C. § 1981, provides that "[a]ll persons within the jurisdiction of the United States shall have the same right in every State and Territory to make and enforce contracts * * * as is enjoyed by white citizens * * *." That provision bars private discrimination based on race, see Patterson v. McLean Credit Union, 491 U.S. 164, 109 S.Ct. 2363, 105 L.Ed.2d 132 (1989), but at this writing the courts are divided over whether section 1981 bars private "alienage" discrimination. The Fifth Circuit held en banc, by a vote of 7-6, that section 1981 does not bar private "alienage" discrimination. Bhandari v. First National Bank, 829 F.2d 1343 (5th Cir.1987), cert. granted and case remanded for reconsideration in the light of Patterson, June 26, 1989, reaffirmed on remand, 887 F.2d 609 (5th Cir.1989). The Second Circuit later disagreed, finding in section 1981 a cause of action for private "alienage" discrimination. Anderson v. Conboy, 156 F.3d 167 (2d Cir. 1998). For a good analysis, see Irene Scharf, Commentary by Irene Scharf on Anderson v. Conboy, 3 BIB 1102 (Nov. 1, 1998).

The discussion that follows will describe INA § 274B as it now stands. One commentator has called for broader legal prohibitions on discrimination against actual or perceived immigrants. See Ruben J. Garcia, Across the Borders: Immigrant Status and Identity in Law and LatCrit Theory, 55 Fla. L. Rev. 511 (2003).

The core of INA § 274B is subsection a(1), which reads:

It is an unfair immigration-related employment practice for a person or other entity to discriminate against any individual [other than an alien not authorized to work] with respect to the hiring, or recruitment or referral for a fee, of the individual for employment or the discharging of the individual from employment

(A) because of such individual's national origin, or

(B) in the case of a protected individual * * *, because of such individual's citizenship status.

Under INA § 274B(a)(6), asking for more or different documents than are required for compliance with the employer sanctions provisions, or scrutinizing them more carefully, can also amount to discrimination. IIRIRA § 421 later restricted the latter provision to cases in which the complainant can prove purposeful or intentional discrimination. Some believe that the new requirement will be almost impossible to meet. See Juan P. Osuna, The 1996 Immigration Act: Employer Sanctions, Antidiscrimination and Work Verification, 73 IR 1749, 1752 (Dec. 20, 1996).

Section 274B(a)(2) creates three exemptions. One of them, subsection a(2)(A), exempts entirely those who employ fewer than four persons. Another clause, INA § 274B(a)(2)(B), bars national origin discrimination claims that are already covered by 42 U.S.C. § 2000e-2, which is the analogous provision of the Civil Rights Act of 1964. And the third provision authorizes citizenship status discrimination whenever the law requires citizenship either as a condition of employment or as a condition of the employer contracting with federal, state, or local governments. INA § 274B(a)(2)(C).

As section 274B(a)(1) makes clear, only a "protected individual" may claim citizenship status discrimination. The term "protected individual" is defined to include United States citizens or nationals, LPRs, IRCA legalization beneficiaries (including certain agricultural workers), and refugees and asylees. INA § 274B(a)(3). The definition excludes, however, any LPR who did not apply for naturalization within six months after becoming eligible (or within six months after the November 1986 enactment of IRCA if later), or who did not complete the naturalization process promptly enough. Id. Moreover, an employer is allowed to hire a United States citizen or national over an equally qualified noncitizen. INA § 274B(a)(4).

Violations of section 274B are punishable by civil fines that, like those for employer sanctions, are graduated to reflect the number of prior offenses. Until 1990 the ranges of possible fines under section 274B were systematically lower than those under section 274A. The Immigration Act of 1990, § 536, responded by raising the penalty ranges under section 274B to match those under section 274A. See INA §§ 274A(e)(4)(A), 274B(g)(2)(B)(iii)(I, II, III). One exception is that the provision prohibiting unnecessary zealotry in document-checking establishes lesser fines. INA § 274B(g)(2)(B)(iii)(IV). Another exception is that, unlike section 274A, section 274B contains no criminal penalties for pattern and practice violations.

To implement section 274B, Congress established, within the Justice Department, the Office of the Special Counsel for Immigration-Related Unfair Employment Practices (OSC). That office investigates and prosecutes charges that arise under section 274B. See INA § 274B(c)(1, 2). The Special Counsel is appointed by the President and confirmed by the Senate "to serve for a term of four years." INA § 274B(c)(1). In his written statement accompanying his signing of IRCA, President Reagan, an outspoken opponent of the anti-discrimination provisions, announced:

I understand this subsection to provide that the Special Counsel shall serve at the pleasure and with the policy guidance of the President, but for no longer than for a four-year term (subject to reappointment by the President with the advice and consent of the Senate).

Statement on Signing S. 1200 into Law, 22 Weekly Comp. Pres. Doc. 1534, 1535 (Nov. 6, 1986). Do you agree with President Reagan that “to serve for a term of four years” means “to serve at the pleasure of the President for a term not to exceed four years?” Do you agree with him that the Special Counsel is to serve “with the policy guidance of the President?” The interpretation issues will not be definitively resolved unless either dismissal or Presidential influence in decisionmaking actually occurs or at least is threatened. Still, it takes little imagination to foresee that such a pronouncement could chill the Special Counsel’s exercise of independent judgment. Is independence beneficial in this context?

The process begins when the party who alleges discrimination—the direct victim, another person “adversely affected,” or an ICE officer—files a “charge” with the Office of the Special Counsel (OSC). See INA § 274B(b)(1). One may not file a charge both with the Special Counsel under IRCA and with the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission under Title 7 of the Civil Rights of 1964 based on the same facts, unless one of those agencies has dismissed the charge as outside the scope of the applicable statute. INA § 274B(b)(2). The 274B charge must be filed within 180 days of the discriminatory act. INA § 274B(d)(3). The same time period governs Title 7 claims. 42 U.S.C. § 2000e-5(e). The EEOC and the OSC have entered into a memorandum of understanding that makes each agency an agent of the other “for the sole purpose of allowing charging parties to file charges to satisfy the statutory time limits.” The memorandum also permits the agencies to refer charges to each other when appropriate. 63 Fed. Reg. 5518, 5519 (Feb. 3, 1998).

Once a 274B charge is filed, the OSC notifies the alleged violator and investigates the case. Id. The Special Counsel is supposed to decide, within 120 days after receiving the charge, whether “there is reasonable cause to believe the charge is true.” If there is, the OSC may file a “complaint” with an ALJ who has received special training in the subject of employment discrimination. INA §§ 274B(d)(1), 274B(e)(2). If the charges allege “knowing and intentional discriminatory activity or a pattern or practice of discriminatory activity,” the OSC must either file a complaint with an ALJ within 120 days after the filing of the charge or notify the charging party of its decision not to file a complaint during that period. In the latter event, the charging party may initiate a “private action” by filing his or her own complaint with the ALJ within 90 days after receiving the notice. INA § 274B(d)(2).

Once the complaint has been properly filed, the ALJ conducts a recorded evidentiary hearing. INA § 274B(e, f). If the ALJ ends up finding by a preponderance of the evidence that the charged party has violated section 274B, the ALJ orders that party to cease the violation and to pay a civil fine within the applicable statutory range. The ALJ has the discretion to order certain additional sanctions. See INA § 274B(g)(2). If the ALJ does not find a violation, the complaint is dismissed. INA § 274B(g)(3).

There is no administrative review, but either side may obtain judicial review in the court of appeals. INA § 274B(I). Strictly speaking, an unappealed decision of the ALJ is not directly enforceable; either the charging party or the OSC, however, may petition a federal district court to order the charged party to comply, presumably under penalty of contempt. INA § 274B(j)(1). The statute specifies that in such a proceeding the ALJ's order "shall not be subject to review," INA § 274B(j)(2), which leaves the question of whether the district judge has any actual decision to make. If yes, what? If no, why not make the ALJ order directly enforceable? (Perhaps Congress simply felt more comfortable vesting the contempt power, with its attendant broad discretion, in the courts rather than in the ALJ's.) In all three types of proceedings—the administrative hearing, court of appeals review, or district court enforcement action—a prevailing party other than the government may recover attorney fees from the losing party if the latter's arguments were "without reasonable foundation in law and fact." INA §§ 274B(h), 274B(j)(4).

Civil rights law distinguishes "disparate treatment" from "disparate impact." In the former, the complainant is alleging that the employer has intentionally treated members of one race, religion, etc., more favorably than others. See generally McDonnell Douglas Corp. v. Green, 411 U.S. 792, 93 S.Ct. 1817, 36 L.Ed.2d 668 (1973). In the latter, the complainant is alleging that, even if the employer lacks the intent to discriminate, and even if the challenged policy is facially neutral, the policy has a substantial disproportionate impact upon members of a particular race, religion, etc. See generally Griggs v. Duke Power Co., 401 U.S. 424, 91 S.Ct. 849, 28 L.Ed.2d 158 (1971). Title 7 of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 covers both types of claims. In cases in which the plaintiff has established disparate impact, the employer may defend by producing evidence of a "business necessity" for the challenged policy. Wards Cove Packing Co. v. Atonio, 490 U.S. 642, 109 S.Ct. 2115, 104 L.Ed.2d 733 (1989).

Whether IRCA similarly authorizes "disparate impact" claims has been hotly debated. President Reagan argued in his signing statement that it does not. He asserted, first, that the language of INA § 274B(a)(1) (unlawful to "discriminate * * * because of such individual's national origin") parallels the phrase in Title 7 of the Civil Rights Act that has served as the basis for disparate treatment claims, 42 U.S.C. § 2000e-2(a)(1). In contrast, the Civil Rights Act language on which disparate impact claims are generally based, 42 U.S.C. § 2000e-2(a)(2) (unlawful to "adversely affect [an employee's status] because of such individual's race, * * *"), lacks a counterpart in IRCA.

Second, the President observed, INA § 274B(d)(2) authorizes private actions only by those who allege "knowing and intentional discriminatory activity" (which expressly requires intent) or "a pattern or practice of discriminatory activity" (a phrase the President argued had been taken from the Supreme Court's disparate treatment cases). Statement on Signing S. 1200 Into Law, 22 Weekly Comp.Pres.Doc. 1534, 1535 (Nov. 6, 1986). Accordingly, the President said, an employer might impose an English language requirement even if English was not needed to perform the job. Indeed, the President added, “unless the plaintiff presents evidence that the employer has intentionally discriminated on proscribed grounds, the employer need not offer any explanation for his employee selection procedures.” Id. (emphasis in original). English-only employment cases have been rising sharply in the last several years; the EEOC and reported court decisions have generally found them violative of Title 7 in the absence of valid job-related reasons. See 77 IR 1551–52 (Oct. 30, 2000). Whether they also violate IRCA is not yet clear.

Representative Barney Frank, the author of the provision, reacted angrily to the President’s statement, calling it not just wrong, but “intellectually dishonest, mean-spirited.” See 63 IR 1049, 1055 (1986). The language quoted by President Reagan in subsection d(2), it might be noted, is expressly limited to private actions; it does not extend to complaints filed by the Special Counsel. Congress might plausibly have drawn that distinction in order to discourage frivolous claims; the Special Counsel’s stamp of approval reduces the chance that the claim is frivolous. Even for private actions, it is not clear that the phrase “pattern or practice of discriminatory activity” requires an intent to discriminate. Besides, if that phrase is interpreted to require such an intent, it is not clear what ground the resulting provision would cover that is not already covered by the phrase “knowing and intentional discriminatory activity.”

At any rate, rightly or wrongly, dicta from ALJ decisions have consistently deferred to President Reagan’s interpretation. In United States v. Marcel Watch Corp., 1 OCAHO 988 (ALJ Morse, 1990), the ALJ stated that liability under IRCA’s antidiscrimination provisions “is proven by a showing of deliberate discriminatory intent.” For this proposition, the sole explanation was a citation to President Reagan’s signing statement. Id. at 1001. The ALJ then said: “The complainant must establish intentional discrimination by a preponderance of the evidence, i.e., ‘knowing and intentional discrimination,’” citing only INA § 274B(d)(2). The latter citation is puzzling, since it refers only to private actions filed after the Special Counsel decides not to file a complaint. (In Marcel Watch, the Special Counsel had found reasonable cause and therefore had filed the complaint!) The complainant prevailed anyway, since the ALJ ultimately found intentional discrimination based on citizenship status. (The interviewer had insisted that the applicant produce a green card even though the applicant had acquired United States citizenship by virtue of birth in Puerto Rico, and even though the interviewer’s supervisor had explained to the interviewer that people born in Puerto Rico are U.S. citizens.)

Later OCAHO cases then relied on Marcel Watch, on subsequent cases that in turn had relied on Marcel Watch, and on President Reagan’s signing statement, for the proposition that all IRCA discrimination claims require a showing of intentional discrimination. See, e.g., Wije v. Barton Springs/Edward Aquifer Conservation District, 5 OCAHO No. 785 at 21 (ALJ McGuire, July 21, 1995); Yefremov v. NYC Dept. of Transportation, 3 OCAHO No. 562 at 22 (ALJ Morse, Sept. 21, 1993).

Recall that IIRIRA § 421 amended INA § 274B(a)(6) (the provision that bars employers from insisting on more documentation than is necessary) to require a showing of purposeful or intentional discrimination. Does the amendment provide any clues on the issue of whether IRCA generally requires a showing of intentional discrimination? Should a court read significance into the contrast between (a) an express requirement of intentional discrimination both for document discrimination claims and for private claims under section 274B(d)(2) versus (b) congressional silence with respect to the other IRCA discrimination claims?

Given what you now know about Congress's reasons for enacting section 274B, which interpretation makes more sense as a policy matter?

PROBLEMS 8–12

To do this Problem set, you will need to consult the actual text of INA § 274B. Assume all events occurred after enactment (November 1986) unless specified otherwise. Assume also that every employer has more than three workers.

Problem 8. Employer A, who has ten employees, has a firm policy of hiring only United States citizens of Italian extraction—citizens because he wants to do his part to encourage naturalization, ethnic Italians because he is of Italian ancestry himself and enjoys the cultural bonds that he shares with his employees. A acknowledges that neither requirement has anything to do with the employee's ability to perform the job.

X (who happens to be of Italian descent) was lawfully admitted as an LPR in 2002. She became eligible for naturalization in 2007 and formally applied in December 2009. In January 2010, while her naturalization application was pending, she applied to A for a job and was turned down because she was not a citizen. Y, a United States citizen, applied at the same time and was rejected because he was not of Italian descent. Z, a United States citizen of Italian descent, got the job.

Does either X or Y have a claim under INA § 274B? As a policy matter, what is your reaction to the results?

Problem 9. Employer B, who has also adopted a citizens-only policy, fires W because W is an LPR. Unbeknownst to B, W had just applied for naturalization, a few days after becoming eligible. W tells B about his pending application, but B says "I wish you had told me that earlier. I would have hired you back immediately, but now I can't because I've just given your job to someone else." Does W have a claim against B?

Problem 10. Employer C has a workforce of ten employees and a personnel manager who will hire only those who can show either proof of United States citizenship or a green card (possessed by LPRs). V, a nonimmigrant with work authorization, is rejected because of that policy. Does she have a claim under INA § 274B?

Problem 11. An applicant of Latino appearance, qualified for the job, displays his green card to the personnel officer of employer D. The officer thinks the card looks a little bit odd but can't quite put her finger on what is bothering her about it. What should she do?

Problem 12. Employer E rejects job applicant T because T does not meet E's minimum height requirements. T can see no particular job-related reason for the height policy and believes it is a pretext for rejecting Latino applicants, whose average height is less than that of Anglo workers. Four months later T learns that both Title 7 of the Civil Rights Act and IRCA prohibit national origin discrimination. To complicate matters, T believes E had a workforce of somewhere between 13 and 17 employees at the time of the alleged discrimination, but T is not sure of the precise number. What advice would you give T?

B. LEGALIZATION

Another means of addressing illegal immigration is to acknowledge the practical impossibility of apprehending and removing those undocumented immigrants who are already in the United States and to "legalize" the status of at least some of them. As noted, the September 11, 2001, terrorist attacks brought the then-thriving legalization drive to a screeching halt, partly because the national trauma aggravated public fear of foreigners and partly because the dominant priority became terrorism and the resulting war effort. The legalization debate has since resumed, however, and at this writing remains under serious consideration in Congress.

The most ambitious legalization programs in U.S. history were enacted in 1986, as part of IRCA. Coupled with the employer sanctions program that you have already studied, the 1986 legalizations allowed certain noncitizens who had been residing unlawfully in the United States for several years to acquire lawful temporary, and then lawful permanent resident status. The programs came about for several reasons—compassion for people who had become part of American society, a realistic appreciation that the millions of immigrants living underground would never be apprehended and removed, the social harms that inevitably flow from the existence of a huge underground subculture, and the political judgment that a coalition with legalization proponents was crucial to the enactment of employer sanctions.

In some ways, the word "legalization," popularly known as "amnesty," is an imprecise label for the 1986 IRCA programs commonly called by those names. Other remedies—cancellation of removal part B and registry—are also analytically "legalization" or "amnesty" programs. Like IRCA, they legalize, or forgive, noncitizens who are here unlawfully, and like IRCA they provide a means to attain LPR status. Moreover, IRCA actually created not just one, but three different legalization programs—a general legalization plan, a special program for agricultural workers, and a special program for Cubans and Haitians.

Although the three programs legalized millions of people and raised interesting and difficult questions of law and policy, detailed coverage is unnecessary³⁰ because all three programs were ad hoc opportunities for which the statutory application deadlines have long since passed. Several court decisions, however, invalidated former INS interpretations of the eligibility criteria and remedied the errors by permitting certain adversely affected noncitizens to apply after the statutory deadline. Following protracted litigation, final settlements now appear to have produced closure. See 9 BIB 89 (Feb. 1, 2004), 339 (Mar. 15, 2004).

In total, almost 2.7 million people acquired LPR status through IRCA's various legalization programs. Of those, approximately 1.6 million benefited from the general legalization program, 1.1 million from the program for agricultural workers, and about 38,000 from the special program for Haitians and Cubans. INS 1994 Statistical Yearbook, Table 4, at 32. Over 90% of the legalized immigrants completed the process by the end of fiscal year 1991; after that, the various programs ground almost to a halt. Id.

Over the course of the program, about 94% of all applications were eventually approved. INS, Immigration Reform and Control Act: Report on the Legalized Alien Population (1992), digested in 69 IR 844-45 (July 13, 1992). The INS Report provides some interesting profile information. Seventy percent of the successful applicants were from Mexico. Fifty-five percent settled in California; another 31% settled in Texas, Illinois, and New York. Some 84% lived in metropolitan areas. The median age was 30. About 58% were men. Id.

Since IRCA, Congress has occasionally enacted ad hoc legalization programs for specific nationalities. In 1997, for example, NACARA established a legalization program for certain Nicaraguan and Cuban nationals. In 1998, Congress passed a legalization program for certain Haitian nationals. See the Haitian Refugee Immigration Fairness Act of 1998, Pub. L. 105-277, Div. A, § 101(h), Title IX, 112 Stat. 2681 (Nov. 2, 1998).

As this book goes to press, legalization remains the subject of intense public debate, usually in the context of proposals for a broader package of "comprehensive" immigration reform that would also include stepped-up border and interior enforcement. The flavor of the debate is captured in the excerpt that follows:

Stephen H. Legomsky, Portraits of the Undocumented Immigrant: Epiphany Through Dialectic

44 Georgia L. Rev. — (forthcoming, fall 2009).

[Fictional Professors Clement and Stern are debating the general subject of illegal immigration. The discussion has turned to legalization.—Eds.]

30. For more detail, see, e.g., Maurice A. Roberts & Stephen Yale-Loehr, Understanding the 1986 Immigration Law, chs. 3, 4 (1987); The Simpson-Rodino Act Analyzed: Part II—Legalization, 63 IR 1021-29 (1986). For a comparative perspective, see Francesco

Isgro, Italy Enacts Law to Protect Basic Human Rights of Foreign Workers, 1 Georgetown Immigration L.J. 693, 698-99 (1986); David S. North, Alien Legalization and Naturalization: What the United States can Learn from Down Under (1984).

Clement: * * * We should acknowledge reality and enact a generous legalization program for the vast majority of those undocumented immigrants who are already here.

Stern: * * * [T]he program you're referring to is not "legalization." It's "amnesty." These politically correct euphemisms are getting downright silly.

* * *

Clement: The proposals I favor are not "amnesties" in any sense in which that word is commonly used. I advocate a program that, like the ones recently introduced in Congress, imposes heavy fines on the beneficiaries as a condition of eligibility. A fine of several thousand dollars for a low-income family is not a slap on the wrist; it's a serious punishment. Can you cite a single example of an "amnesty" in which the violators are punished for their offenses?

Stern: No, but this is different. Once they pay their fines, they will be allowed to retain, permanently, the fruits of their unlawful acts—the U.S. residence that they acquired illegally. It's like letting a thief keep the $20,000 stolen car as long as he or she is willing to pay a $5,000 fine.

Clement: A better analogy would be that it's like allowing a motorist who is caught speeding to pay a fine and then continue driving—which we do all the time. Would you call that an "amnesty?"

Stern: In the immigration context, amnesty is still a better term. To me, it implies forgiveness, which in turn implicitly acknowledges that there was some wrongful act to forgive in the first place. "Legalization" is an antiseptic term. It cleans the stain so thoroughly that it avoids any admission of wrongdoing.

Clement: I disagree. Legalization implies that the current status is not legal, so it too recognizes the initial illegality. The heavy punishment reinforces the notion that there was an initial wrong. So nothing is swept under the rug. In the meantime, however, the term "legalization" is positive and forward-looking. It says: "Now that the person has been punished for the previous transgression, we'll start again with a clean slate."

Stern: I'm still not convinced, but rather than get any further bogged down in semantics, I'll humor you and use the term * * * "legalization," even though I find that language grating.

Clement: We're making progress. Just for the record, though, I think you're agreeing because you know I'm right, not because you just want to avoid semantical disputes.

Stern: Don't push it.

Clement: All right. Then let's talk about the merits of legalization.

Stern: How, exactly, is legalization going to reduce future illegal immigration?

Clement: It won't. Nor will it cure cancer or halt nuclear proliferation. Those aren't its purposes. But legalization will provide a sensible short-term resolution for the twelve million undocumented immigrants who are already here and who have been living and working productively in our communities.

Stern: You sound as if you think that undocumented immigrants are somehow entitled to legalization as a reward for their illegal work.

Clement: I frankly have mixed feelings about whether at least some undocumented immigrants have acquired a moral "right" to legalization. As residents of the community, their interests in remaining here grow with the passage of time. Their roots grow stronger, and their ties to local, state, and national communities become correspondingly more extensive. It might well be that at some point those interests so outweigh society's interests in deporting them as to ripen into a moral right to remain. Some have analogized to adverse possession in property law. For various reasons, we recognize a legal right to possess land, even when the occupation was initially wrongful, as time passes and as the occupier's activities lend added value to that land. One can plausibly argue that the same reasoning applies to long-residing undocumented immigrants. Another analogy would be statutes of limitations for criminal offenders.

Stern: You're not describing true "rights." You can't just break the law, evade apprehension for some period of time, and then proclaim a right to remain. The property possessions that you're describing are merely individual interests that for policy reasons we choose to make legally enforceable. The same is true for statutes of limitations. You might feel that analogous policy interests favor legalization of undocumented immigrants, but you have to make an affirmative case for those policies.

Clement: I'll make that case, but before I do, I want to respond to your suggestion that these are not true "rights." The European Court of Human Rights on several occasions has held that states are legally bound to balance adverse immigration consequences, including deportation, against such important individual interests as family unity; at least one commentator has suggested that the same logic might dictate a "right" to legalization for at least some undocumented immigrants.

Stern: Even if the United States were a party to the European Convention on Human Rights, I would have to disagree. Whatever balancing one might think is morally required, and however one might personally come out once the competing interests are balanced, I still maintain this is a matter of the state's policy discretion, not a matter of right.

Clement: Then let me suggest a second possible route to a moral right to legalization: The United States government's own conduct has created and nurtured the phenomenon of illegal immigration. The government is therefore morally bound to accommodate the individual interests that have arisen as a result.

Stern: What government conduct are you referring to?

Clement: I'm thinking of two things. Today's undocumented population has its origins in the Bracero guest worker program, which ultimately spawned a whole network of family and labor relationships that in turn have triggered and sustained illegal immigration. In addition, the United States for decades has consciously adopted a visible policy of lax immigration enforcement. Generations of prospective undocumented immigrants have reasonably interpreted that policy as a signal that their presence would be effectively tolerated as long as they behaved themselves once they were here. That was the unspoken deal. One could argue that the government is morally bound to give at least some effect to that reasonable reliance.

Stern: I don't buy either of those arguments. Why should the government's decision, several decades ago, to import guest workers under a legal program be viewed as creating a "right" for others to enter or remain unlawfully many decades later? As for the lax enforcement, I understand you to be suggesting that the government in effect has given a wink and a nod to prospective undocumented immigrants and therefore should not be allowed to punish them for their reasonable reliance on that practice. That argument doesn't persuade me either. Just a moment ago, you yourself extolled the virtues of prosecutorial discretion. Police discretion is equally unavoidable. Governments always have to exercise some judgment as to how much to invest in the enforcement of various laws. To make those judgments, governments have to weigh the degree of harm from violations of the particular law, any offsetting benefits that the conduct produces even though unlawful, the cost to the government of specific enforcement measures, the likely effectiveness of those measures, and any countervailing compassionate circumstances. The fact that the government elects to invest finite enforcement resources only at level X rather than at some higher level Y doesn't create a "right" to violate that law, much less a right to a remedy.

Clement: Rights aside, I favor legalization as a matter of grace, partly out of compassion and partly out of pragmatism. Just to put those arguments in proper perspective, let's keep in mind that Americans have always felt a certain ambivalence toward illegal immigration. Even when condemning it, they usually recognize that in many ways they benefit from it. Professor Linda Bosniak has argued, for example, that this ambivalence is evidenced by our selective recognition of undocumented immigrants' legal rights. She observes that we freely grant them many of the rights enjoyed by U.S. citizens while withholding certain other rights.

Stern: The fact that undocumented immigrants enjoy some rights and not others doesn't help your case. It simply reflects two realities. One is that different people have different views as to what rights undocumented immigrants should have. The other is that there is no realistic alternative to granting some of the rights that citizens enjoy while denying others. Almost all would agree that even lawfully admitted immigrants should not have the same bundle of rights as citizens; a fortiori, undocumented immigrants aren't entitled to the same package of rights. And at the other end of the spectrum, of course undocumented immigrants have some of the same rights that citizens and any other human beings do—the right not to be tortured, the right to procedural due process, etc. So for present purposes I attach no significance to the fact that U.S. law grants undocumented immigrants some rights and not others.

Clement: At any rate, there are both compassionate and pragmatic reasons to offer legalization to a large share of the undocumented population. The most compelling reason is that they live here now, in many cases for a long time. They've sunk deep roots. For compassionate reasons alone, there comes a point at which the decent thing to do is overlook the legal transgression when strict enforcement would destroy people's lives.

Stern: You're painting with too broad a brush. When you say that "they" live here now and that "they" have sunk deep roots, you're ignoring distinctions within the group. Not all undocumented immigrants have sunk deep roots or, for that matter, any roots at all. Do you mean to treat the person who entered the United States without inspection an hour ago the same as the undocumented immigrant who came here twenty years ago as a child?

Clement: Let's distinguish between definition and treatment. For definitional purposes, the person who entered without inspection an hour ago, with the intent to remain for a substantial time, became an undocumented immigrant at the moment of entry. By law, despite his or her unlawful entry and presence, that individual is an immigrant, and obviously an undocumented one. I would go so far as to define this person as not just an undocumented immigrant, but also a resident of the United States—a new one, admittedly, and one who is unlawfully present as well—but a resident nonetheless. Except for the illegality, he or she is no less a resident of the United States than the U.S. citizen who moved from one state to another an hour ago with similar intentions is a resident of his or her new state. And just as United States citizens and other lawful state residents range widely from recent arrivals to long-term fixtures, the same is true of undocumented immigrants.

Stern: You say "except for the illegality," as if that were a trivial caveat.

Clement: Don't misunderstand me. My previous comment goes only to the question of definition. I have acknowledged the relevance—indeed, the importance—of illegality in the policymaking phase. We routinely, and rightly, subject those residents who violate the law to consequences that we don't impose on those who obey it. That is why I conceded earlier that deportation is a legitimate instrument of government and that undocumented immigrants do not, and should not, have the same rights as citizens or other lawfully present residents. Nor do I suggest that the duration of one's residence is morally irrelevant. Legalization, for example, might reasonably be limited to those individuals who have resided in the United States for some specified time. So we can and should regard even recently arrived undocumented immigrants as residents and still leave room for treatment that varies, within that group, according to duration of residence.

Stern: Even with those qualifications, I find it hard to muster compassion for people who know from the time they first arrived that their very presence is unlawful.

Clement: Even if you feel that strongly about the adults, you can't possibly hold similar feelings about the children. They are innocent victims. There's mounting evidence that the constant threat of deportation has induced stress levels that have affected their mental health.

Stern: For the young children, I confess I do feel real sadness. But their plight is not the fault of the United States. It's the fault of the parents who came or remained here illegally and either brought the children here illegally or gave birth to them here, knowing all along that the parents' own future deportations were a real possibility. If they're concerned about the mental health problems that their children are experiencing because of the constant fear of deportation, there is an easy remedy: Stop violating the law, and return home.

Clement: Then forget about compassion and just think about the practicalities. There's no way they are going to leave voluntarily, and there's no possibility of identifying, apprehending, arresting, detaining, prosecuting, and deporting 12 million people. Legally or illegally, this population is here to stay.

Stern: I don't share your premise that there is no way to get them to leave. I'll return to that point in a moment. But if you really believe that they're going to remain here no matter what we do, then what difference does it make whether we legalize them?

Clement: It makes an obvious difference for them and for their families. No more hiding in constant fear from the authorities. No more need for subterfuge to get work. No more exploitative wages or working conditions. No more exclusions from a variety of daily activities. A possibility of bringing in close family members. An eventual path to naturalization and full participation in the civic and political life of their new homeland.

Stern: That's nice for them, but I'm not inclined to support legalization solely because it will benefit the lawbreakers themselves. I want to know how the larger society would benefit.

Clement: An underground shadow population isn't healthy for anyone. Upon legalization, people can operate transparently and above board. The government learns the names and addresses of the community's, and the nation's, inhabitants. By ending their vulnerability to exploitation we raise the market wages and working conditions for everyone. We provide educational opportunities for their children, including their U.S. citizen children.

More generally, legalization would be the single most effective vehicle for integrating undocumented immigrants into American life. If people are going to live in the United States for substantial durations, we should want them to participate in the political life of the community. They can do this by becoming lawful permanent residents and eventually naturalized citizens. They also become a part of the social, educational, and economic fabric of the nation. All these things help them to be more productive. It's a win-win situation. The alternative is a lose-lose situation in which they continue to live here but remain vulnerable to ruthless employers, professional smugglers, dealers in false documents, and violent criminals.

Stern: What is our message to those immigrants who have been playing by the rules, waiting patiently in the queue for years on end to reunite with their American family members—that they would have been better off entering clandestinely?

Clement: Like the legalization provisions that Congress has been recently considering, the program I favor would require legalization beneficiaries to wait at the end of the line. The grant of residence to those already in line would not be delayed in the least and at any rate would occur before the legalization of those who are present unlawfully.

Stern: Even if I accepted all that, there is still one remaining problem. Granting legalization cannot help but incentivize future illegal entries. A certain number of people who are otherwise unwilling to take the risk will now do so in the hope that they will qualify for a future legalization.

Clement: They have no reason to expect one legalization program to follow right on the heels of another one. There has not been a major legalization program since 1986. One program every 20 years is hardly a meaningful additional incentive.

Stern: Look at how the undocumented population has grown since 1986. Is that just coincidence?

Clement: Surely you're not attributing that to hopes being fanned by the 1986 legalization program.

Stern: There's no reason to think it hasn't been at least a contributing factor.

Clement: The same incentives for illegal immigration that existed before 1986 have remained in place, and always will as long as the economic opportunities in the United States are so dramatically greater than those in Mexico and other source countries. But let me come back to something you hinted at a moment ago. If we don't have legalization, then what exactly do you propose we do with this population of twelve million people living in the United States without valid immigration status? I've already told you why I think the status quo is unhealthy, and I suspect you will concede that even the stepped-up enforcement measures that you were advocating earlier would never enable us to round up, arrest, detain, prosecute, and remove more than a small fraction of these twelve million people whose addresses we don't even know.

Stern: Yes, I will concede the impossibility of eliminating this huge population through mass apprehension efforts. But I believe that the combination of enhanced enforcement and other measures would dramatically reduce the undocumented population.

[At this point Professor Stern begins a discussion of what some have called the “third way,” or “attrition by enforcement.” The theory is that tougher enforcement, combined with a series of measures designed to make daily life unbearable for undocumented immigrants, will induce them to leave voluntarily. These strategies are taken up in section C below.—Eds.]

QUESTIONS

1. What do you see as the general pros and cons of legalization?³¹
2. The final step of the 1986 general legalization process required, among other things, a demonstration of English language proficiency and knowledge of American history and government. INA § 245A(b)(1). What are the pros and cons of imposing those requirements?
3. The 1986 legalization programs contained no provisions for the family members of those who legalized. If there is another legalization, should it include the spouses and children (and/or other family members)? Argue both ways.
4. In 2005 Spain granted legalization to approximately 700,000 undocumented immigrants. For a good description and critique, see María Pabón López, Immigration Law Spanish-Style: A Study of Spain's Normalización of Undocumented Workers, 2007 Univ. of Chicago Legal Forum 571. In recent years, Italy and other EU states have followed suit. See Lauren Gilbert, National Identity and Immigration Policy in the U.S. and the European Union, 14 Columbia J. European L. 99 (2007). Some of the northern EU member states worry that large numbers of the legalized immigrants will eventually re-immigrate to their territories under the EU's free movement provisions. See Jason DeParle, Spain, Grappling with Illegal Immigrants, Tries Forgiveness, New York Times, at 1 (June 10, 2008).
5. In the United States, for a brief period before September 11, 2001, legalization was a hot topic. High-level talks between President Bush and Mexican President Vicente Fox, combined with a growing appreciation of the importance of Latino votes in the United States, appeared to make legalization politically viable. Even the AFL-CIO, a traditional foe of legalizing undocumented workers, urged a broad legalization program in 2000 and repeated that call in 2002. See 77 IR 237 (Feb. 28, 2000); 79 IR 39 (Jan. 7, 2002). Public opinion was sharply divided.³² September 11 quickly

31. In addition to the above excerpt, see Bill Ong Hing, The Case for Amnesty, 3 Stanford Journal of Civil Rights & Civil Liberties 233 (2007); Donald Kerwin & Charles Wheeler, The Case for Legalization, Lessons from 1986, Recommendations for the Future, 12 BIB 138 (Feb. 1, 2007); L.A. Times (Feb.

21, 2007) (opposing positions of Mark Krikorian (against) and Tamar Jacoby (in favor)).

32. Compare, e.g., A New Compact on Immigration, Chicago Tribune, Aug. 16, 2001 (editorial favoring amnesty) with Peter Skerry, Why Amnesty is the Wrong Way to Go, Washington Post, Aug. 12, 2001 at B1.

undermined the prospects for legalization, but with the passage of time the legalization issue has re-surfaced, usually as a component of “comprehensive” immigration reform.

C. THE RIGHTS OF UNDOCUMENTED IMMIGRANTS AND THE SELF-DEPORTATION STRATEGY

In recent years, those who prioritize reducing the undocumented population have begun urging what they have called a “third way,” or “attrition by enforcement.”³³ Acknowledging the practical impossibility of finding, rounding up, arresting, detaining, and forcibly removing a population of some 12 million people, but at the same time opposing legalization, this strategy entails making life in the United States so unbearable for undocumented immigrants that they voluntarily return to their countries of origin. The means typically advocated for accomplishing that end are enhanced enforcement to increase undocumented immigrants’ fears of apprehension, detention, and removal, combined with further restrictions on public benefits and the rights and privileges enjoyed by undocumented immigrants. Some advocates have urged, as a further deterrent, the adoption of a constitutional amendment that would deny birthright citizenship to children born in the United States of undocumented parents. You will see more on this in chapter 13. This section explores the various restrictions that have been imposed on undocumented immigrants and considers the extent to which the Constitution or statutory law protects the undocumented against such measures.

Many of these efforts have taken place at the state and local levels. The measures adopted by states and localities have focused principally on law enforcement, employment, public benefits, identification documents, education, and drivers’ licenses. Because the state and local actions raise both policy and constitutional questions relating to federalism, they are explored separately in section E below. See also Anil Kalhan, The Fourth Amendment and Privacy Implications of Interior Immigration Enforcement, 41 U.C. Davis L. Rev. 1137 (2008) (urging recognition of an immigration status privacy interest and arguing that demanding verification of immigration status in an ever wider variety of daily transactions has underappreciated social costs).

1. THE LEGAL AND SOCIAL IDENTITIES OF UNDOCUMENTED IMMIGRANTS

What place do undocumented immigrants occupy in the public mind, and what, exactly, are their rights? The following commentary speaks to those issues:

33. See, e.g., Kris W. Kobach, Attrition through Enforcement: A Rational Approach to Illegal Immigration, 15 Tulsa J. Comparative & Internat’l L. 155 (2008); Mark Krikorian, Downsizing Illegal Immigration—A Strategy of Attrition through Enforcement, CIS Backgrounder (May 2005).

Linda S. Bosniak, Exclusion and Membership: The Dual Identity of the Undocumented Worker Under United States Law

1988 Wisconsin L. Rev. 955, 977-87.

* * *

Much of the identity and experience of the undocumented person in this country derives from her status as boundary violator, as physically present outsider. But the relationship between the undocumented immigrant and the state is not fully described by reference to government immigration regulation and its constraints. The undocumented immigrant has a second legal identity, often ignored by theoretical and policy literature on clandestine immigration: she inhabits a sphere of circumscribed, but real, civil and social membership. In certain formal and practical spheres, the undocumented alien functions as an acknowledged member of the national community.

State and federal courts, for instance, have held that undocumented aliens may sue in tort and contract. * * * Undocumented aliens' access to the courts has been interpreted to include the right to divorce, to bring suits on employment contracts to recover lost wages, and to sue for workmen's compensation. In one workmen's compensation case, the court emphasized that violation of immigration law did not make illegal the employment contract on which the workmen's compensation claim was based. The appropriate penalty for an immigration offense was deportation, not loss of employment benefits.

The individual states have also acknowledged that aliens have certain rights. Many states affirmatively empower any alien to serve as trustee for fiduciary trusts. Most states permit undocumented aliens to own real property, and "[t]here are almost no restrictions on the alien's right, regardless of his status under the immigration laws, to acquire and convey personal property." Moreover, prior to the passage of IRCA, an undocumented alien and her employer were free to enter into an employment relationship.

In short, until the implementation of employer sanctions, immigration law directly regulated border and entry only; the "private" relationships that the undocumented person might form with any other social member once she has entered the country were not the object of exclusionary regulation. Indeed, the undocumented alien was usually permitted to avail herself of the courts in order to enforce her bargains.

Certain constitutional rights beyond the immigration regulatory context have also attached to the undocumented alien by virtue of her personhood alone. In 1886, the Supreme Court established that all aliens are "persons" within the meaning of the fourteenth amendment. Ten years later, the Court declared that any person within the territorial jurisdiction of the United States was entitled to due process under the fifth and fourteenth amendments and that the fourteenth amendment's equal protection clause was universal in its application. Since then, the Court has required fourth, fifth, and sixth amendment rights for undocumented aliens in criminal proceedings. * * *

Courts have used equal protection analysis to strike down certain state laws or regulations depriving undocumented aliens of access to state services or benefits. In the most famous and far-reaching of these cases, Plyler v. Doe, the Supreme Court held that states cannot deny the provision of public education to undocumented children. * * * [That case is taken up below.—Eds.]

Since Plyler, many states have extended the protections of state programs to undocumented aliens. For instance, in response to a class action suit in 1985, California rescinded a policy that excluded the severely handicapped and medically needy children of undocumented immigrants from certain health services. Also in 1985, a California court held that the state attorney general's policy of precluding undocumented aliens from eligibility for resident tuition status at the state's universities was unconstitutional.

* * *

Finally, courts have held that undocumented workers are covered by the terms of federal labor protection statutes. In a 1984 opinion, the Supreme Court held that undocumented workers are "employees" within the meaning of the National Labor Relations Act, and thus protected under its provisions. * * * Coverage by the NLRA means, among other things, that undocumented workers may vote in union elections and may file unfair labor practice complaints. [NB: This article was written before Hoffman Plastic, discussed in subsection 4 below—Eds.]

Courts and administrative law judges have similarly held that undocumented workers are protected under the Fair Labor Standards Act. * * *

The law's protection and recognition of undocumented immigrants in certain contexts demonstrates that these immigrants have a legal identity distinct from that of alien—distinct, that is, from that defined by the nation's exclusionary project. This identity derives from their personhood and their territorial presence, and it demarcates a certain sphere of formally protected activity accorded to acknowledged community members. It is within this protected sphere that large numbers of undocumented workers have constructed lives that are often extensively integrated into the United States at both the economic and community levels. It is also within this sphere that the "equities," including "community ties," are established—equities that are required for eligibility for certain forms of discretionary relief from deportation.

While it is important to recognize the existence of this sphere of protected membership for undocumented aliens, the denial to them of a broad range of other membership rights and their subjection to the state's exclusionary project directly and indirectly nullify many of the protections they formally enjoy. Although undocumented aliens may be persons within the protection of the due process and equal protection clauses, courts have permitted the federal and state governments to discriminate against all aliens for some purposes and to distinguish between permanent resident aliens and undocumented aliens for others. * * * The undocumented are deprived of a range of services and benefits in many states which could not be legally denied to legally present aliens.

* * *

Finally, even where formal rights exist, the ability of the undocumented to exercise these rights in practice is limited. Undocumented aliens often fear exposing themselves to the exclusionary powers of the state and will often forego the exercise of membership rights in order to avoid such an eventuality. Undocumented immigrants commonly decline to report private or official abuse and are frequently unwilling to pursue civil claims in court or to step forward to receive benefits to which they are entitled. The undocumented are also part of a larger group of Americans whose lack of access to power in the form of money and information severely constrains their ability to obtain the protections and benefits to which they are formally entitled.

This analysis of the undocumented immigrant's status in the United States creates a more complex picture than many observers allow. The undocumented immigrant is not the unmitigated victim of government exclusionary policies. She is directly protected from aspects of the state's exclusionary powers and is granted certain independent membership rights. At the same time, the incidents of membership she enjoys are severely circumscribed by her status as outsider, constrained directly and indirectly by the state's exclusionary powers. The experience and identity of the undocumented worker are thus defined along two matrices, exclusion and membership. It is this duality that has characterized her existence in United States society.

* * *

NOTES

1. In Portraits of the Undocumented Immigrant: Epiphany through Dialectic, Professor Stephen Legomsky studies the arguments commonly made in debates on both the factual impact of illegal immigration and the appropriate policy responses. He distills two fundamental patterns. On practically every issue, he suggests, those who advocate the stricter position invariably start by envisioning undocumented immigrants en masse and by focusing on the perceived collective impact of that group on the host society—an impact they usually assume to be negative. Legomsky calls that phenomenon “aggregation.” In contrast, the arguments for lenity are more likely to start with a mental image of the individual undocumented immigrant and, consequently, to emphasize the impact of proposed policies on that individual or his or her family. A second pattern is that arguments for the stricter position almost always emphasize the “lawbreaker” element of the undocumented immigrant's identity, while the arguments for more lenient treatment almost always focus on the “resident” (and not just the human) component of identity. Stephen H. Legomsky, Portraits of the Undocumented Immigrant: Epiphany through Dialectic, 44 Georgia L. Rev. — (forthcoming, fall 2009).

2. In Immigration Outside the Law, Professor Hiroshi Motomura explores three themes that thread through most legal and political debates about how we should understand, frame, and address illegal immigration. First, “is immigration outside the law a matter of egregious lawbreaking, or does it represent an invited contribution to the U.S. economy and society that the government tolerates?” Second, what role is appropriate for cities and states to play in either repelling or welcoming undocumented immigrants—a question explored in detail in section E below. Third, should undocumented immigrants be allowed to participate in society’s institutions and be made eligible for legal status or citizenship? To explore these questions, Motomura uses the Supreme Court’s decision in Plyler v. Doe, discussed below, in which the Court held that the Equal Protection Clause protected undocumented immigrant children from being excluded from the public schools. See Hiroshi Motomura, Immigration Outside the Law, 108 Colum. L. Rev. 2037, 2039 (2008).

3. At present, for purposes of legislative apportionment, undocumented immigrants are included in the United States Census count. See U.S. Const. art. I, § 2, cl. 3, as amended by Amend. XIV, § 2 (referring to number of “persons,” unlike other constitutional provisions that refer to “citizens”); U.S. Bureau of the Census, Enumeration and Residence Rules for the 1990 Census, 1990 Decennial Census Policy Memorandum No. 12 (1987). But see Charles Wood, Losing Control of America’s Future—The Census, Birthright Citizenship, and Illegal Aliens, 22 Harvard J. L. & Pub. Policy 465 (1999) (arguing undocumented immigrants should be excluded from census count). It is usually assumed, however, that undocumented immigrants, being necessarily less visible, are systematically undercounted. The use of sampling techniques to supplement actual head counts, particularly for individuals who do not respond to initial surveys, would clearly enhance the accuracy of the count. But in a 5–4 decision that will have major implications for states with large undocumented populations, the Supreme Court has now construed the applicable statute as barring the use of even supplemental sampling for purposes of congressional apportionment. The Court’s reading of the statute mooted the analogous constitutional question. Department of Commerce v. United States House of Representatives, 525 U.S. 316, 119 S.Ct. 765, 142 L.Ed.2d 797 (1999).

4. For a framework for calculating money damages awards for undocumented plaintiffs in tort cases, see Jagdeep S. Bhandari, Strange Visions of Alien Shadows, 13 Southwestern J. of Law & Trade in the Americas 63 (2006).

5. Professor David Thronson observes that the attention devoted to the impact of family relationships on immigration opportunities can obscure the converse impact that immigration status often has on family relationships. He demonstrates that family courts are frequently prone to favor U.S. citizen and LPR parents over undocumented parents in child custody disputes, even in cases where the latter would otherwise be the better choice. David B. Thronson, Of Borders and Best Interests: Examining the Experiences of Undocumented Immigrants in U.S. Family Courts, 11 Texas Hispanic J. L. & Policy 45, 53–71 (2005), reproduced and updated, 11 BIB 7 (Jan. 1, 2006).

6. For a thorough and thoughtful account of Australia's treatment of undocumented immigrants, see Mary Crock, Immigration and Refugee Law in Australia, chs. 9, 10 (1998).

2. UNDOCUMENTED IMMIGRANTS AND PUBLIC ASSISTANCE

Noncitizens' eligibility for public benefits has always been a contentious subject.³⁴ The issue came to a head during the 1996 Presidential election campaigns. Through a combination of welfare reform legislation and IIRIRA, Congress imposed sweeping new restrictions on public benefits for LPRs (discussed in chapter 13) and additional restrictions on the few public benefits available to undocumented immigrants (discussed in this section). The comprehensive welfare reform bill formally entitled the Personal Responsibility and Work Opportunity Reconciliation Act of 1996, Pub.L. 104–193, 110 Stat. 2105 (Aug. 22, 1996) [hereafter the Welfare Act], contained one part (Title IV) dealing specifically with noncitizens. The immigration reform statute, IIRIRA, contained one part (Title V) dealing specifically with public benefits. While LPRs bore the brunt of the impact, undocumented immigrants were also affected.

Undocumented immigrants are now ineligible for all “federal public benefits,” a term defined broadly to include any contracts, loans, professional or commercial licenses, retirement benefits, welfare, health or disability benefits, food assistance, housing, post-secondary education, or any other “similar” benefits provided by the federal government. Welfare Act, § 401(a, c). Limited exceptions include emergency medical care; short-term, non-cash emergency disaster relief; and certain treatment for communicable diseases. Id. § 401(b). Undocumented immigrants are also ineligible to receive social security payments, regardless of how much they have contributed. IIRIRA § 503.

Undocumented immigrants are further ineligible for state or local public benefits (defined by, and subject to exceptions similar to, the provision governing federal benefits), unless the state passes post-Welfare Act legislation to the contrary. Welfare Act, § 411. States are authorized to restrict or prohibit payment of general cash public assistance to noncitizens, as long as the restrictions are not broader than those imposed in any analogous federal programs. IIRIRA § 553.³⁵ Even prior to the 1996 re-

34. See generally David Carliner, Lucas Guttentag, Arthur C. Helton & Wade Henderson, The Rights of Aliens and Refugees (2d ed. 1990); A. Peter Mutharika, The Alien under American Law (2 vols. 1980, 1981, with 1985 Supplement).

35. For two excellent accounts of noncitizens' access to health care, see Janet M. Calvo, Immigrant Status and Legal Access for Health Care (1993); and Cindy Chang, Note, Health Care for Undocumented Immigrant forms, states and localities sought on occasion to limit both legal and undocumented noncitizens' access to public benefits. Perhaps the most notorious example of such an effort was California's Proposition 1987, passed in 1994, which would have denied undocumented immigrants access to a broad range of services. These efforts are discussed in detail in section E below. Commentators have generally favored welfare eligibility for immigrants,³⁶ usually regardless of status.

3. UNDOCUMENTED IMMIGRANTS AND PUBLIC EDUCATION

One of the most volatile issues concerning state resources for undocumented immigrants in recent years has been eligibility for free public elementary and secondary education. Proposition 187, passed by the voters of California in 1994, barred all public school districts from enrolling undocumented children (among other things). Is Proposition 187 constitutional? The details of the referendum are discussed below, in section E. For now, note two separate but related constitutional constraints on states' powers to deny public education to undocumented children—the equal protection clause and the doctrine of federal preemption.

Ordinarily, under equal protection law, either the federal government or a state may treat two groups of people differently as long as there is some rational basis for the distinction. Over the years, however, the Supreme Court has given heightened review to laws that target so-called suspect classes or infringe fundamental rights. Such laws give rise to “strict scrutiny,” under which the Court insists that the distinction be “necessary” to achieve a “compelling” governmental interest. Race is the paradigm suspect classification. Certain other classifications, such as gender and legitimacy, have generated an intermediate level of scrutiny that requires something more than rationality but less than strict scrutiny—e.g., an “important” governmental interest and a “substantial” relationship between that interest and the means used to achieve it. See generally Gerald Gunther & Kathleen M. Sullivan, Constitutional Law 840–916 (13th ed. 1997).³⁷

In a line of cases that you will explore in chapter 13, the Court has held that state laws discriminating against noncitizens (but not analogous federal laws) will trigger strict scrutiny, with some exceptions not pertinent here. In all those cases, however, the individuals in question were LPRs. What if a state discriminates against undocumented immigrants? The following landmark case addresses that question:

Children: Special Members of an Underclass, 83 Washington Univ. L.Q. 1271 (2005).

36. See, e.g., Peter L. Reich, Jurisprudential Tradition and Undocumented Alien Entitlements, 6 Georgetown Immigration L.J. 1 (1992); Peter L. Reich, Public Benefits for Undocumented Aliens: State Law into the Breach Once More, 21 New Mexico L. Rev. 219 (1991); see also Stephen H. Legomsky, Immigration, Federalism, and the Welfare State, 42 UCLA L.Rev. 1453 (1995).

37. Preemption in the context of immigration law is discussed in detail in section E.

Plyler v. Doe

Supreme Court of the United States, 1982.
457 U.S. 202, 102 S.Ct. 2382, 72 L.Ed.2d 786.

■ JUSTICE BRENNAN delivered the opinion of the Court.

The question presented by these cases is whether, consistent with the Equal Protection Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment, Texas may deny to undocumented school-age children the free public education that it provides to children who are citizens of the United States or legally admitted aliens.

I

Since the late 19th century, the United States has restricted immigration into this country. Unsanctioned entry into the United States is a crime, and those who have entered unlawfully are subject to deportation. But despite the existence of these legal restrictions, a substantial number of persons have succeeded in unlawfully entering the United States, and now live within various States, including the State of Texas.

In May 1975, the Texas Legislature revised its education laws to withhold from local school districts any state funds for the education of children who were not "legally admitted" into the United States. The 1975 revision also authorized local school districts to deny enrollment in their public schools to children not "legally admitted" to the country. Tex. Educ. Code Ann. § 21.031 (Vernon Supp. 1981). These cases involve constitutional challenges to those provisions.

This is a class action, filed in the United States District Court for the Eastern District of Texas in September 1977, on behalf of certain school-age children of Mexican origin residing in Smith County, Tex., who could not establish that they had been legally admitted into the United States. The action complained of the exclusion of plaintiff children from the public schools of the Tyler Independent School District. The Superintendent and members of the Board of Trustees of the School District were named as defendants; the State of Texas intervened as a party-defendant. After certifying a class consisting of all undocumented school-age children of Mexican origin residing within the School District, the District Court preliminarily enjoined defendants from denying a free education to members of the plaintiff class. In December 1977, the court conducted an extensive hearing on plaintiffs' motion for permanent injunctive relief.

In considering this motion, the District Court made extensive findings of fact. The court found that neither § 21.031 nor the School District policy implementing it had "either the purpose or effect of keeping illegal aliens out of the State of Texas." Respecting defendants' further claim that § 21.031 was simply a financial measure designed to avoid a drain on the State's fisc, the court recognized that the increases in population resulting from the immigration of Mexican nationals into the United States had created problems for the public schools of the State, and that these problems were exacerbated by the special educational needs of immigrant Mexican children. The court noted, however, that the increase in school enrollment was primarily attributable to the admission of children who were legal residents. It also found that while the “exclusion of all undocumented children from the public schools in Texas would eventually result in economies at some level,” funding from both the State and Federal Governments was based primarily on the number of children enrolled. In net effect then, barring undocumented children from the schools would save money, but it would “not necessarily” improve “the quality of education.” The court further observed that the impact of § 21.031 was borne primarily by a very small subclass of illegal aliens, “entire families who have migrated illegally and—for all practical purposes—permanently to the United States.” Finally, the court noted that under current laws and practices “the illegal alien of today may well be the legal alien of tomorrow,” and that without an education, these undocumented children, “[already] disadvantaged as a result of poverty, lack of English-speaking ability, and undeniable racial prejudices, . . . will become permanently locked into the lowest socio-economic class.”

The District Court held that illegal aliens were entitled to the protection of the Equal Protection Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment, and that § 21.031 violated that Clause. Suggesting that “the state’s exclusion of undocumented children from its public schools . . . may well be the type of invidiously motivated state action for which the suspect classification doctrine was designed,” the court held that it was unnecessary to decide whether the statute would survive a “strict scrutiny” analysis because, in any event, the discrimination embodied in the statute was not supported by a rational basis. * * *

The Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit upheld the District Court’s injunction. The Court of Appeals held that the District Court had erred in finding the Texas statute pre-empted by federal law. With respect to equal protection, however, the Court of Appeals affirmed in all essential respects the analysis of the District Court, concluding that § 21.031 was “constitutionally infirm regardless of whether it was tested using the mere rational basis standard or some more stringent test”. We noted probable jurisdiction.

[Here the Court describes similar litigation with which Plyler has been consolidated.—Eds.]³⁸

* * *

II

The Fourteenth Amendment provides that “[no] State shall . . . deprive any person of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law; nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws.” Appellants argue at the outset that undocumented aliens, because of their immigration status, are not “persons within the jurisdiction” of the State

38. [Footnote 8 in original] Appellees in both cases continue to press the argument that § 21.031 is pre-empted by federal law and policy. In light of our disposition of the Fourteenth Amendment issue, we have no occasion to reach this claim.

of Texas, and that they therefore have no right to the equal protection of Texas law. We reject this argument. Whatever his status under the immigration laws, an alien is surely a "person" in any ordinary sense of that term. Aliens, even aliens whose presence in this country is unlawful, have long been recognized as "persons" guaranteed due process of law by the Fifth and Fourteenth Amendments. Indeed, we have clearly held that the Fifth Amendment protects aliens whose presence in this country is unlawful from invidious discrimination by the Federal Government. Mathews v. Diaz, 426 U.S. 67, 77 (1976).

Appellants seek to distinguish our prior cases, emphasizing that the Equal Protection Clause directs a State to afford its protection to persons within its jurisdiction while the Due Process Clauses of the Fifth and Fourteenth Amendments contain no such assertedly limiting phrase. In appellants' view, persons who have entered the United States illegally are not "within the jurisdiction" of a State even if they are present within a State's boundaries and subject to its laws. Neither our cases nor the logic of the Fourteenth Amendment supports that constricting construction of the phrase "within its jurisdiction." * * *

* * *

Our conclusion that the illegal aliens who are plaintiffs in these cases may claim the benefit of the Fourteenth Amendment's guarantee of equal protection only begins the inquiry. The more difficult question is whether the Equal Protection Clause has been violated by the refusal of the State of Texas to reimburse local school boards for the education of children who cannot demonstrate that their presence within the United States is lawful, or by the imposition by those school boards of the burden of tuition on those children. It is to this question that we now turn.

III

* * * In applying the Equal Protection Clause to most forms of state action, we thus seek only the assurance that the classification at issue bears some fair relationship to a legitimate public purpose.

But we would not be faithful to our obligations under the Fourteenth Amendment if we applied so deferential a standard to every classification. The Equal Protection Clause was intended as a restriction on state legislative action inconsistent with elemental constitutional premises. Thus we have treated as presumptively invidious those classifications that disadvantage a "suspect class,"³⁹ or that impinge upon the exercise of a "fundamen-

39. [Footnote 14 in original] Several formulations might explain our treatment of certain classifications as "suspect." Some classifications are more likely than others to reflect deep-seated prejudice rather than legislative rationality in pursuit of some legitimate objective. Legislation predicated on such prejudice is easily recognized as incompatible with the constitutional understanding that each person is to be judged individually and is entitled to equal justice under the law. Classifications treated as suspect tend to be irrelevant to any proper legislative goal. Finally, certain groups, indeed largely the same groups, have historically been "relegated to such a position of political powerlessness as tal right." With respect to such classifications, it is appropriate to enforce the mandate of equal protection by requiring the State to demonstrate that its classification has been precisely tailored to serve a compelling governmental interest. In addition, we have recognized that certain forms of legislative classification, while not facially invidious, nonetheless give rise to recurring constitutional difficulties; in these limited circumstances we have sought the assurance that the classification reflects a reasoned judgment consistent with the ideal of equal protection by inquiring whether it may fairly be viewed as furthering a substantial interest of the State. We turn to a consideration of the standard appropriate for the evaluation of § 21.031.

A

Sheer incapability or lax enforcement of the laws barring entry into this country, coupled with the failure to establish an effective bar to the employment of undocumented aliens, has resulted in the creation of a substantial "shadow population" of illegal migrants—numbering in the millions—within our borders. This situation raises the specter of a permanent caste of undocumented resident aliens, encouraged by some to remain here as a source of cheap labor, but nevertheless denied the benefits that our society makes available to citizens and lawful residents. The existence of such an underclass presents most difficult problems for a Nation that prides itself on adherence to principles of equality under law.⁴⁰

* * *

Of course, undocumented status is not irrelevant to any proper legislative goal. Nor is undocumented status an absolutely immutable characteristic since it is the product of conscious, indeed unlawful, action. But § 21.031 is directed against children, and imposes its discriminatory burden on the basis of a legal characteristic over which children can have little to command extraordinary protection from the majoritarian political process." The experience of our Nation has shown that prejudice may manifest itself in the treatment of some groups. Our response to that experience is reflected in the Equal Protection Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. Legislation imposing special disabilities upon groups disfavored by virtue of circumstances beyond their control suggests the kind of "class or caste" treatment that the Fourteenth Amendment was designed to abolish.

40. [Footnote 19 in original] We reject the claim that "illegal aliens" are a "suspect class." No case in which we have attempted to define a suspect class has addressed the status of persons unlawfully in our country. Unlike most of the classifications that we have recognized as suspect, entry into this class, by virtue of entry into this country, is the product of voluntary action. Indeed, entry into the class is itself a crime. In addition, it could hardly be suggested that undocumented status is a "constitutional irrelevancy." With respect to the actions of the Federal Government, alienage classifications may be intimately related to the conduct of foreign policy, to the federal prerogative to control access to the United States, and to the plenary federal power to determine who has sufficiently manifested his allegiance to become a citizen of the Nation. No State may independently exercise a like power. But if the Federal Government has by uniform rule prescribed what it believes to be appropriate standards for the treatment of an alien subclass, the States may, of course, follow the federal direction. See De Canas v. Bica, 424 U.S. 351 (1976).

control. It is thus difficult to conceive of a rational justification for penalizing these children for their presence within the United States. Yet that appears to be precisely the effect of § 21.031.

Public education is not a “right” granted to individuals by the Constitution. But neither is it merely some governmental “benefit” indistinguishable from other forms of social welfare legislation. Both the importance of education in maintaining our basic institutions, and the lasting impact of its deprivation on the life of the child, mark the distinction. * * * “[As] . . . pointed out early in our history, . . . some degree of education is necessary to prepare citizens to participate effectively and intelligently in our open political system if we are to preserve freedom and independence.” * * * In sum, education has a fundamental role in maintaining the fabric of our society. We cannot ignore the significant social costs borne by our Nation when select groups are denied the means to absorb the values and skills upon which our social order rests.

In addition to the pivotal role of education in sustaining our political and cultural heritage, denial of education to some isolated group of children poses an affront to one of the goals of the Equal Protection Clause: the abolition of governmental barriers presenting unreasonable obstacles to advancement on the basis of individual merit. Paradoxically, by depriving the children of any disfavored group of an education, we foreclose the means by which that group might raise the level of esteem in which it is held by the majority. But more directly, “education prepares individuals to be self-reliant and self-sufficient participants in society.” Illiteracy is an enduring disability. The inability to read and write will handicap the individual deprived of a basic education each and every day of his life. The inestimable toll of that deprivation on the social, economic, intellectual, and psychological well-being of the individual, and the obstacle it poses to individual achievement, make it most difficult to reconcile the cost or the principle of a status-based denial of basic education with the framework of equality embodied in the Equal Protection Clause. * * *

B

These well-settled principles allow us to determine the proper level of deference to be afforded § 21.031. Undocumented aliens cannot be treated as a suspect class because their presence in this country in violation of federal law is not a “constitutional irrelevancy.” Nor is education a fundamental right; a State need not justify by compelling necessity every variation in the manner in which education is provided to its population. But more is involved in these cases than the abstract question whether § 21.031 discriminates against a suspect class, or whether education is a fundamental right. Section 21.031 imposes a lifetime hardship on a discrete class of children not accountable for their disabling status. The stigma of illiteracy will mark them for the rest of their lives. By denying these children a basic education, we deny them the ability to live within the structure of our civic institutions, and foreclose any realistic possibility that they will contribute in even the smallest way to the progress of our Nation.

In determining the rationality of § 21.031, we may appropriately take into account its costs to the Nation and to the innocent children who are its victims. In light of these countervailing costs, the discrimination contained in § 21.031 can hardly be considered rational unless it furthers some substantial goal of the State.

IV

It is the State's principal argument, and apparently the view of the dissenting Justices, that the undocumented status of these children vel non establishes a sufficient rational basis for denying them benefits that a State might choose to afford other residents. The State notes that while other aliens are admitted "on an equality of legal privileges with all citizens under non-discriminatory laws," the asserted right of these children to an education can claim no implicit congressional imprimatur. Indeed, in the State's view, Congress' apparent disapproval of the presence of these children within the United States, and the evasion of the federal regulatory program that is the mark of undocumented status, provides authority for its decision to impose upon them special disabilities. Faced with an equal protection challenge respecting the treatment of aliens, we agree that the courts must be attentive to congressional policy; the exercise of congressional power might well affect the State's prerogatives to afford differential treatment to a particular class of aliens. But we are unable to find in the congressional immigration scheme any statement of policy that might weigh significantly in arriving at an equal protection balance concerning the State's authority to deprive these children of an education.

The Constitution grants Congress the power to "establish an uniform Rule of Naturalization." Drawing upon this power, upon its plenary authority with respect to foreign relations and international commerce, and upon the inherent power of a sovereign to close its borders, Congress has developed a complex scheme governing admission to our Nation and status within our borders. The obvious need for delicate policy judgments has counseled the Judicial Branch to avoid intrusion into this field. But this traditional caution does not persuade us that unusual deference must be shown the classification embodied in § 21.031. The States enjoy no power with respect to the classification of aliens. This power is "committed to the political branches of the Federal Government." Although it is "a routine and normally legitimate part" of the business of the Federal Government to classify on the basis of alien status, and to "take into account the character of the relationship between the alien and this country," only rarely are such matters relevant to legislation by a State.

As we recognized in De Canas v. Bica, 424 U.S. 351 (1976), the States do have some authority to act with respect to illegal aliens, at least where such action mirrors federal objectives and furthers a legitimate state goal. In De Canas, the State's program reflected Congress' intention to bar from employment all aliens except those possessing a grant of permission to work in this country. In contrast, there is no indication that the disability imposed by § 21.031 corresponds to any identifiable congressional policy.

The State does not claim that the conservation of state educational resources was ever a congressional concern in restricting immigration. More importantly, the classification reflected in § 21.031 does not operate harmoniously within the federal program.

To be sure, like all persons who have entered the United States unlawfully, these children are subject to deportation. But there is no assurance that a child subject to deportation will ever be deported. An illegal entrant might be granted federal permission to continue to reside in this country, or even to become a citizen. In light of the discretionary federal power to grant relief from deportation, a State cannot realistically determine that any particular undocumented child will in fact be deported until after deportation proceedings have been completed. It would of course be most difficult for the State to justify a denial of education to a child enjoying an inchoate federal permission to remain.

We are reluctant to impute to Congress the intention to withhold from these children, for so long as they are present in this country through no fault of their own, access to a basic education. In other contexts, undocumented status, coupled with some articulable federal policy, might enhance state authority with respect to the treatment of undocumented aliens. But in the area of special constitutional sensitivity presented by these cases, and in the absence of any contrary indication fairly discernible in the present legislative record, we perceive no national policy that supports the State in denying these children an elementary education. The State may borrow the federal classification. But to justify its use as a criterion for its own discriminatory policy, the State must demonstrate that the classification is reasonably adapted to "the purposes for which the state desires to use it." We therefore turn to the state objectives that are said to support § 21.031.

V

Appellants argue that the classification at issue furthers an interest in the "preservation of the state's limited resources for the education of its lawful residents."⁴¹ Of course, a concern for the preservation of resources standing alone can hardly justify the classification used in allocating those resources. * * * [W]e discern three colorable state interests that might support § 21.031.

41. [Footnote 22 in original] Appellant School District sought at oral argument to characterize the alienage classification contained in § 21.031 as simply a test of residence. We are unable to uphold § 21.031 on that basis. Appellants conceded that if, for example, a Virginian or a legally admitted Mexican citizen entered Tyler with his school-age children, intending to remain only six months, those children would be viewed as residents entitled to attend Tyler schools. It is thus clear that Tyler's residence argument amounts to nothing more than the assertion that illegal entry, without more, prevents a person from becoming a resident for purposes of enrolling his children in the public schools. A State may not, however, accomplish what would otherwise be prohibited by the Equal Protection Clause, merely by defining a disfavored group as nonresident. And illegal entry into the country would not, under traditional criteria, bar a person from obtaining domicile within a State. * * *

First, appellants appear to suggest that the State may seek to protect itself from an influx of illegal immigrants. While a State might have an interest in mitigating the potentially harsh economic effects of sudden shifts in population, § 21.031 hardly offers an effective method of dealing with an urgent demographic or economic problem. There is no evidence in the record suggesting that illegal entrants impose any significant burden on the State's economy. To the contrary, the available evidence suggests that illegal aliens underutilize public services, while contributing their labor to the local economy and tax money to the state fisc. The dominant incentive for illegal entry into the State of Texas is the availability of employment; few if any illegal immigrants come to this country, or presumably to the State of Texas, in order to avail themselves of a free education. Thus, even making the doubtful assumption that the net impact of illegal aliens on the economy of the State is negative, we think it clear that "[charging] tuition to undocumented children constitutes a ludicrously ineffectual attempt to stem the tide of illegal immigration," at least when compared with the alternative of prohibiting the employment of illegal aliens.

Second, while it is apparent that a State may "not . . . reduce expenditures for education by barring [some arbitrarily chosen class of] children from its schools," appellants suggest that undocumented children are appropriately singled out for exclusion because of the special burdens they impose on the State's ability to provide high-quality public education. But the record in no way supports the claim that exclusion of undocumented children is likely to improve the overall quality of education in the State. As the District Court in No. 80-1934 noted, the State failed to offer any "credible supporting evidence that a proportionately small diminution of the funds spent on each child [which might result from devoting some state funds to the education of the excluded group] will have a grave impact on the quality of education." * * * Of course, even if improvement in the quality of education were a likely result of barring some number of children from the schools of the State, the State must support its selection of this group as the appropriate target for exclusion. In terms of educational cost and need, however, undocumented children are "basically indistinguishable" from legally resident alien children.

Finally, appellants suggest that undocumented children are appropriately singled out because their unlawful presence within the United States renders them less likely than other children to remain within the boundaries of the State, and to put their education to productive social or political use within the State. Even assuming that such an interest is legitimate, it is an interest that is most difficult to quantify. The State has no assurance that any child, citizen or not, will employ the education provided by the State within the confines of the State's borders. In any event, the record is clear that many of the undocumented children disabled by this classification will remain in this country indefinitely, and that some will become lawful residents or citizens of the United States. It is difficult to understand precisely what the State hopes to achieve by promoting the creation and perpetuation of a subclass of illiterates within our boundaries, surely adding to the problems and costs of unemployment, welfare, and crime. It is thus clear that whatever savings might be achieved by denying these children an education, they are wholly insubstantial in light of the costs involved to these children, the State, and the Nation.

VI

If the State is to deny a discrete group of innocent children the free public education that it offers to other children residing within its borders, that denial must be justified by a showing that it furthers some substantial state interest. No such showing was made here. Accordingly, the judgment of the Court of Appeals in each of these cases is Affirmed.

* * *

■ JUSTICE BLACKMUN, concurring.

* * *

In my view, when the State provides an education to some and denies it to others, it immediately and inevitably creates class distinctions of a type fundamentally inconsistent with those purposes, mentioned above, of the Equal Protection Clause. Children denied an education are placed at a permanent and insurmountable competitive disadvantage, for an uneducated child is denied even the opportunity to achieve. And when those children are members of an identifiable group, that group—through the State's action—will have been converted into a discrete underclass. Other benefits provided by the State, such as housing and public assistance, are of course important; to an individual in immediate need, they may be more desirable than the right to be educated. But classifications involving the complete denial of education are in a sense unique, for they strike at the heart of equal protection values by involving the State in the creation of permanent class distinctions. In a sense, then, denial of an education is the analogue of denial of the right to vote: the former relegates the individual to second-class social status; the latter places him at a permanent political disadvantage.

* * *

■ CHIEF JUSTICE BURGER, with whom JUSTICE WHITE, JUSTICE REHNQUIST, and JUSTICE O'CONNOR join, dissenting.

Were it our business to set the Nation's social policy, I would agree without hesitation that it is senseless for an enlightened society to deprive any children—including illegal aliens—of an elementary education. I fully agree that it would be folly—and wrong—to tolerate creation of a segment of society made up of illiterate persons, many having a limited or no command of our language.⁴² However, the Constitution does not constitute

42. [Footnote 1 in original] It does not follow, however, that a state should bear the costs of educating children whose illegal presence in this country results from the default of the political branches of the Federal Government. A state has no power to prevent unlawful immigration, and no power to deport illegal aliens; those powers are reserved us as “Platonic Guardians” nor does it vest in this Court the authority to strike down laws because they do not meet our standards of desirable social policy, “wisdom,” or “common sense.” We trespass on the assigned function of the political branches under our structure of limited and separated powers when we assume a policymaking role as the Court does today.

* * *

The Court’s holding today manifests the justly criticized judicial tendency to attempt speedy and wholesale formulation of “remedies” for the failures—or simply the laggard pace—of the political processes of our system of government. The Court employs, and in my view abuses, the Fourteenth Amendment in an effort to become an omnipotent and omniscient problem solver. That the motives for doing so are noble and compassionate does not alter the fact that the Court distorts our constitutional function to make amends for the defaults of others.

I

In a sense, the Court’s opinion rests on such a unique confluence of theories and rationales that it will likely stand for little beyond the results in these particular cases. Yet the extent to which the Court departs from principled constitutional adjudication is nonetheless disturbing.

I have no quarrel with the conclusion that the Equal Protection Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment applies to aliens who, after their illegal entry into this country, are indeed physically “within the jurisdiction” of a state. However, as the Court concedes, this “only begins the inquiry.” The Equal Protection Clause does not mandate identical treatment of different categories of persons.

The dispositive issue in these cases, simply put, is whether, for purposes of allocating its finite resources, a state has a legitimate reason to differentiate between persons who are lawfully within the state and those who are unlawfully there. The distinction the State of Texas has drawn—based not only upon its own legitimate interests but on classifications established by the Federal Government in its immigration laws and policies—is not unconstitutional.

A

The Court acknowledges that, except in those cases when state classifications disadvantage a “suspect class” or impinge upon a “fundamental right,” the Equal Protection Clause permits a state “substantial latitude” in distinguishing between different groups of persons. Moreover, the Court expressly—and correctly—rejects any suggestion that illegal aliens are a suspect class, or that education is a fundamental right. Yet by patching together bits and pieces of what might be termed quasi-suspect-class and exclusively to Congress and the Executive. If the Federal Government, properly chargeable with deporting illegal aliens, fails to do so, it should bear the burdens of their presence here. Surely if illegal alien children can be identified for purposes of this litigation, their parents can be identified for purposes of prompt deportation.

quasi-fundamental-rights analysis, the Court spins out a theory custom-tailored to the facts of these cases.

In the end, we are told little more than that the level of scrutiny employed to strike down the Texas law applies only when illegal alien children are deprived of a public education. If ever a court was guilty of an unabashedly result-oriented approach, this case is a prime example.

(1)

The Court first suggests that these illegal alien children, although not a suspect class, are entitled to special solicitude under the Equal Protection Clause because they lack “control” over or “responsibility” for their unlawful entry into this country. Similarly, the Court appears to take the position that § 21.031 is presumptively “irrational” because it has the effect of imposing “penalties” on “innocent” children.⁴³ However, the Equal Protection Clause does not preclude legislators from classifying among persons on the basis of factors and characteristics over which individuals may be said to lack “control.” Indeed, in some circumstances persons generally, and children in particular, may have little control over or responsibility for such things as their ill health, need for public assistance, or place of residence. Yet a state legislature is not barred from considering, for example, relevant differences between the mentally healthy and the mentally ill, or between the residents of different counties, simply because these may be factors unrelated to individual choice or to any “wrongdoing.” The Equal Protection Clause protects against arbitrary and irrational classifications, and against invidious discrimination stemming from prejudice and hostility; it is not an all-encompassing “equalizer” designed to eradicate every distinction for which persons are not “responsible.”

The Court does not presume to suggest that appellees’ purported lack of culpability for their illegal status prevents them from being deported or otherwise “penalized” under federal law. Yet would deportation be any less a “penalty” than denial of privileges provided to legal residents? Illegality of presence in the United States does not—and need not—depend on some amorphous concept of “guilt” or “innocence” concerning an alien’s entry. Similarly, a state’s use of federal immigration status as a basis for legislative classification is not necessarily rendered suspect for its failure to take such factors into account.

* * *

43. [Footnote 4 in original] Both the opinion of the Court and JUSTICE POWELL’s concurrence imply that appellees are being “penalized” because their parents are illegal entrants. However, Texas has classified appellees on the basis of their own illegal status, not that of their parents. Children born in this country to illegal alien parents, including some of appellees’ siblings, are not excluded from the Texas schools. Nor does Texas discriminate against appellees because of their Mexican origin or citizenship. Texas provides a free public education to countless thousands of Mexican immigrants who are lawfully in this country.

The second strand of the Court's analysis rests on the premise that, although public education is not a constitutionally guaranteed right, "neither is it merely some governmental 'benefit' indistinguishable from other forms of social welfare legislation." Whatever meaning or relevance this opaque observation might have in some other context, it simply has no bearing on the issues at hand. Indeed, it is never made clear what the Court's opinion means on this score.

The importance of education is beyond dispute. Yet we have held repeatedly that the importance of a governmental service does not elevate it to the status of a "fundamental right" for purposes of equal protection analysis. In San Antonio Independent School Dist., JUSTICE POWELL, speaking for the Court, expressly rejected the proposition that state laws dealing with public education are subject to special scrutiny under the Equal Protection Clause. Moreover, the Court points to no meaningful way to distinguish between education and other governmental benefits in this context. Is the Court suggesting that education is more "fundamental" than food, shelter, or medical care?

The Equal Protection Clause guarantees similar treatment of similarly situated persons, but it does not mandate a constitutional hierarchy of governmental services. JUSTICE POWELL, speaking for the Court in San Antonio Independent School Dist., put it well in stating that to the extent this Court raises or lowers the degree of "judicial scrutiny" in equal protection cases according to a transient Court majority's view of the societal importance of the interest affected, we "[assume] a legislative role and one for which the Court lacks both authority and competence." Yet that is precisely what the Court does today.

The central question in these cases, as in every equal protection case not involving truly fundamental rights "explicitly or implicitly guaranteed by the Constitution," is whether there is some legitimate basis for a legislative distinction between different classes of persons. The fact that the distinction is drawn in legislation affecting access to public education—as opposed to legislation allocating other important governmental benefits, such as public assistance, health care, or housing—cannot make a difference in the level of scrutiny applied.

B

Once it is conceded—as the Court does—that illegal aliens are not a suspect class, and that education is not a fundamental right, our inquiry should focus on and be limited to whether the legislative classification at issue bears a rational relationship to a legitimate state purpose.

The State contends primarily that § 21.031 serves to prevent undue depletion of its limited revenues available for education, and to preserve the fiscal integrity of the State's school-financing system against an ever-increasing flood of illegal aliens—aliens over whose entry or continued presence it has no control. Of course such fiscal concerns alone could not justify discrimination against a suspect class or an arbitrary and irrational denial of benefits to a particular group of persons. Yet I assume no Member of this Court would argue that prudent conservation of finite state revenues is per se an illegitimate goal. Indeed, the numerous classifications this Court has sustained in social welfare legislation were invariably related to the limited amount of revenues available to spend on any given program or set of programs. The significant question here is whether the requirement of tuition from illegal aliens who attend the public schools—as well as from residents of other states, for example—is a rational and reasonable means of furthering the State's legitimate fiscal ends.

Without laboring what will undoubtedly seem obvious to many, it simply is not “irrational” for a state to conclude that it does not have the same responsibility to provide benefits for persons whose very presence in the state and this country is illegal as it does to provide for persons lawfully present. By definition, illegal aliens have no right whatever to be here, and the state may reasonably, and constitutionally, elect not to provide them with governmental services at the expense of those who are lawfully in the state. In De Canas v. Bica, we held that a State may protect its “fiscal interests and lawfully resident labor force from the deleterious effects on its economy resulting from the employment of illegal aliens.” And only recently this Court made clear that a State has a legitimate interest in protecting and preserving the quality of its schools and “the right of its own bona fide residents to attend such institutions on a preferential tuition basis.” The Court has failed to offer even a plausible explanation why illegality of residence in this country is not a factor that may legitimately bear upon the bona fides of state residence and entitlement to the benefits of lawful residence.⁴⁴

It is significant that the Federal Government has seen fit to exclude illegal aliens from numerous social welfare programs, such as the food stamp program, the old-age assistance, aid to families with dependent children, aid to the blind, aid to the permanently and totally disabled, and supplemental security income programs, the Medicare hospital insurance benefits program, and the Medicaid hospital insurance benefits for the aged and disabled program. Although these exclusions do not conclusively demonstrate the constitutionality of the State's use of the same classification for comparable purposes, at the very least they tend to support the rationality of excluding illegal alien residents of a state from such programs so as to preserve the state's finite revenues for the benefit of lawful residents.

The Court maintains—as if this were the issue—that “barring undocumented children from local schools would not necessarily improve the quality of education provided in those schools.” However, the legitimacy of barring illegal aliens from programs such as Medicare or Medicaid does not depend on a showing that the barrier would “improve the quality” of medical care given to persons lawfully entitled to participate in such

44. [Footnote 12 in original] * * * [T]he analogies to Virginians or legally admitted Mexican citizens entering Texas are spurious. A Virginian's right to migrate to programs. Modern education, like medical care, is enormously expensive, and there can be no doubt that very large added costs will fall on the State or its local school districts as a result of the inclusion of illegal aliens in the tuition-free public schools. The State may, in its discretion, use any savings resulting from its tuition requirement to "improve the quality of education" in the public school system, or to enhance the funds available for other social programs, or to reduce the tax burden placed on its residents; each of these ends is "legitimate." The State need not show, as the Court implies, that the incremental cost of educating illegal aliens will send it into bankruptcy, or have a "grave impact on the quality of education;" that is not dispositive under a "rational basis" scrutiny. In the absence of a constitutional imperative to provide for the education of illegal aliens, the State may "rationally" choose to take advantage of whatever savings will accrue from limiting access to the tuition-free public schools to its own lawful residents, excluding even citizens of neighboring States.

Texas, without penalty, is protected by the Constitution, and a lawfully admitted alien's right to enter the State is likewise protected by federal law.

Denying a free education to illegal alien children is not a choice I would make were I a legislator. Apart from compassionate considerations, the long-range costs of excluding any children from the public schools may well outweigh the costs of educating them. But that is not the issue; the fact that there are sound policy arguments against the Texas Legislature's choice does not render that choice an unconstitutional one.

* * *

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. Perhaps the single most important decision the Court had to make in this case was what standard of review to select. Both the majority and the dissent purport to apply a rationality test, but they differ over what it should take to satisfy that test. The majority ends up invoking an intermediate level of scrutiny, requiring that the legislation "further some substantial goal of the State." (See the last sentence of section III of the Court's opinion.) The dissent argues that to adopt that level of scrutiny "only when illegal alien children are deprived of a public education" is "an unabashedly result-oriented approach." Do you agree with that characterization? And what do you make of the Chief Justice's dissent? He acknowledges that the policy in question is "senseless" and "folly" but ultimately finds it "rational." Are his two conclusions compatible?

2. More generally, what level of scrutiny should a Court employ when state legislation discriminates against undocumented immigrants? See especially original footnotes 14 and 19 of the majority opinion.

3. Consider now the various interests asserted by the State of Texas to justify the exclusion of undocumented children from public schools. First, the State argued that undocumented immigrants have an adverse economic impact on the State and that the statute in question would dissuade some from coming. The Court rejects both premises. It finds no evidence in the record to suggest that the net economic impact of undocumented immigrants on Texas is negative. (In fact, the evidence suggested the opposite). At any rate, the Court found, undocumented immigrants generally come for employment, not for education; thus, the statute would not provide the hoped-for deterrence anyway. As counsel for the State of Texas, how would you respond to both arguments? If the facts change (or if the empirical evidence of those facts changes), would Plyler v. Doe become inapplicable? (This is not an academic question, as you will see when you examine California Proposition 187 and accompanying materials, below).

4. The Court also rejects the State's argument that the cost of educating undocumented children was diminishing the quality of education the State could afford to provide for lawfully resident children. Was the Court right to reject that argument?

5. What legitimate state interest could Texas assert to justify treating those of its residents who are undocumented differently from those of its residents who are either (a) LPRs or (b) United States citizens who came to Texas from other states? Why, in other words, should the State of Texas care which of its residents lack a valid federal immigration status?

6. Because of its centrality to the vigorous political debates over undocumented immigrants, Professor Olivas calls Plyler the Roe v. Wade of this subject area. Michael A. Olivas, Lawmakers Gone Wild? College Residency and the Response to Professor Kobach, 61 Southern Methodist Univ. L. Rev. 99 (2008). After Plyler v. Doe, can a state constitutionally treat its undocumented residents differently from its other residents? For example, is it constitutional for a state to disqualify undocumented immigrants from welfare (food benefits, cash assistance, medical services, etc.)? In analyzing these questions, decide (a) whether the reasons given in Plyler for intermediate scrutiny would extend to welfare; (b) whether the specific rationales offered by the State of Texas to explain the statutory classification would still apply; and, if so, (c) whether the Court would have as much reason to reject those rationales in the welfare context as in the education context.

7. Would the Supreme Court strike down a federal law that prohibited the free public elementary and secondary education of all undocumented children? Before answering, think about the plenary power doctrine that you studied in chapter 2, and read original footnote 19 of the Court's opinion. Consider also whether the degree of judicial deference should vary depending on whether the particular federal law is an "immigration" law or some other federal regulation of noncitizens.⁴⁵

8. The House version of the bill that eventually became IIRIRA contained a controversial amendment introduced by Rep. Elton Gallegly (R-Cal.). The Gallegly amendment would have authorized states to deny

45. On this last point, see Linda S. Bosniak, Membership, Equality, and the Difference that Alienage Makes, 69 NYU L. Rev. 1047 (1994); Michael Scaperlanda, Partial Membership: Aliens and the Constitutional Community, 81 Iowa L. Rev. 707 (1996); Margaret H. Taylor, Detained Aliens Challenging Conditions of Confinement and the Porous

Border of the Plenary Power Doctrine, 22 Hastings Constitutional L.Q. 1087 (1995). See also Adam B. Cox, Immigration Law's Organizing Principles, 157 U. Penn. L. Rev. 1101 (2008) (arguing that the entire distinction between immigrant selection and immigrant regulation is fundamentally misconceived).

free public education to undocumented children. The House and Senate conferees agreed to drop the amendment when it became clear that it was jeopardizing the passage of IIRIRA. See 73 IR at 1281–82 (Sept. 30, 1996). Future efforts to enact the substance of the Gallegly amendment are always possible. Given Plyler v. Doe, would the Gallegly amendment or any state legislation enacted pursuant to it be constitutional?

9. In Plyler v. Doe the only constitutional challenge that the Court had to adjudicate was the one based on equal protection. The Court did not have to decide whether the Texas statute unconstitutionally intruded into federally preempted subject matter. The two types of challenges turn on some common issues and will be considered in section E. For an argument that the denial of education to undocumented children violates the 13th amendment rights of their undocumented parents, see Maria L. Ontiveros & Joshua R. Drexler, The Thirteenth Amendment and Access to Education for Children of Undocumented Workers: A New Look at Plyler v. Doe, 42 Univ. of San Francisco L. Rev. 1045 (2008).

10. Does Plyler v. Doe reveal the Supreme Court's view of what constitutes membership in the national community, or is the meaning of this case less profound?⁴⁶

11. German law supplies an interesting twist. In Germany, the children (including lawfully resident children) of foreigners are required to attend public schools, rather than private schools. The stated purposes of the law are to prevent parallel societies from developing and to prepare the children for life in a German cultural environment. See Foreigners' children told to attend public schools, F.A.Z. Weekly (Germany) (Oct. 8, 2004).

POST-SECONDARY EDUCATION

Some states have considered legislation that bars undocumented students from enrolling in public colleges, universities, and other educational institutions, and at the time of this writing, one state has passed such a law. See item 4 of the Notes and Questions below. Section 8 of California's Proposition 187, which never went into effect, would also have taken such a step. A district court has upheld the constitutionality of the Virginia Attorney General's recommendation that public colleges and universities

46. See Peter H. Schuck, The Transformation of Immigration Law, 84 Columbia L. Rev. 1, 58 (1984), and consider again the excerpts, reproduced above, from Linda S. Bosniak, Exclusion and Membership: The Dual Identity of the Undocumented Worker under United States Law, 1988 Wisconsin L. Rev. 955, 977–87. For some thoughtful contemporary responses to Plyler v. Doe, see Tom Gerety, Children in the Labyrinth: The Complexities of Plyler v. Doe, 44 Univ. Pittsburgh L. Rev. 379 (1983); Michael A. Olivas, Plyler v. Doe, Toll v. Moreno, and Post-sec- ondary Admissions: Undocumented Aliens and Enduring Disability, 15 J.L. & Education 19 (1986). For an interesting history of the Plyler litigation, see Michael A. Olivas, Plyler v. Doe, the Education of Undocumented Children, and the Polity, in David A. Martin & Peter H. Schuck (eds.), Immigration Stories (2005), chap. 8. See also María Pabón López, Reflections on Educating Latino and Latina Undocumented Children: Beyond Plyler v. Doe, 35 Seton Hall L. Rev. 1373 (2005) (describing the educational obstacles faced by Latino/a children even after Plyler).

deny admission to undocumented immigrants. See Equal Access Education v. Merten, 305 F. Supp. 2d 585 (E.D. Va. 2004).

But even when undocumented immigrants are not statutorily barred from attending state colleges and universities, they frequently face insurmountable financial barriers. Given the combination of skyrocketing college tuition, legal ineligibility for most governmental grant, loan, and work assistance programs, see 20 U.S.C. § 1091(a)(5), and laws that declare undocumented immigrants not to be state residents for purposes of in-state tuition rates (discussed below), these high school students—no matter how talented—confront uncertain futures. In 2003, demographer Jeffrey Passel estimated that each year about 65,000 undocumented students who have lived in the United States five years or more graduate from U.S. high schools. He further found that approximately 7,000 to 13,000 undocumented students who have lived in the United States five years or more are enrolled in public colleges and universities. See Jeffrey Passel, unpublished work (Oct. 21, 2003), cited in Congressional Research Service, Unauthorized Alien Students: Issues and “DREAM Act” Legislation, at 2 (Jan. 30, 2007). There have been many sensitive portrayals of the problems.⁴⁷

IIRIRA § 505(a) provides:

Notwithstanding any other provision of law, an alien who is not lawfully present in the United States shall not be eligible on the basis of residence within a State (or a political subdivision) for any post-secondary education benefit unless a citizen or national of the United States is eligible for such a benefit (in no less an amount, duration, and scope) without regard to whether the citizen or national is such a resident.

The vast majority of states deny in-state resident tuition status to undocumented students. Despite IIRIRA § 505, however, at least ten states have enacted legislation to enable undocumented students to qualify for in-state resident status. See Nat’l Immigration Law Ctr., Basic Facts About In-State Tuition for Undocumented Students (2009), available at http://www.nilc.org/immlawpolicy/DREAM/in-state_tuition_basicfacts_041706.pdf. The majority of undocumented immigrants in the U.S. live in these ten states, and several other states with large undocumented populations have

47. See Michael A. Olivas, Storytelling Out of School: Undocumented College Residency, Race, and Reaction, 22 Hastings Const. L.Q. 1019 (1995); Victor C. Romero, Noncitizen Students and Immigration Policy Post-9/11, 17 Georgetown Immigration L.J. 357 (2003), § IV; Victor C. Romero, Post-secondary School Education Benefits for Undocumented Immigrants: Promises and Pitfalls, 27 North Carolina J. Internat’l L. & Commercial Regulation 393 (2002); Ragini Shah, Sharing the American Dream: Towards Formalizing the Status of Long-Term Resident Undocumented Children in the United States, 39 Columbia Human Rights L. Rev. 637 (2008) (going further than DREAM Act and legalizing undocumented children generally); Andrew Stevenson, DREAMing of an Equal Future for Immigrant Children: Federal and State Initiatives to Improve Undocumented Students’ Access to Post-secondary Education, 46 Arizona L. Rev. 551 (2004); Laura S. Yates, Plyler v. Doe and the Rights of Undocumented Immigrants to Higher Education: Should Undocumented Students Be Eligible for In-State College Tuition Rates?, 82 Washington Univ. L.Q. 585 (2004).

considered similar legislation. To conform with IIRIRA, all ten of these states require undocumented students to have attended a school in the state for a certain number of years, graduated from a high school in the state, and signed an affidavit pledging to apply for lawful permanent residence at the earliest opportunity. Id.

Professor Michael Olivas has led the charge in favor of such policies for many years. In Michael A. Olivas, A Rebuttal to FAIR: States Can Enact Residency Statutes for the Undocumented, 7 BIB 652 (June 1, 2002), he argued that these state laws are compatible with IIRIRA § 505. Among his arguments were the following: (1) In-state residency determinations are a matter for the states, not the federal government. (2) The terms of IIRIRA § 505 restrict, at most, the granting of “post-secondary education benefits” (emphasis added); based on other provisions of IIRIRA, it appears Congress intended the word “benefits” to mean monetary benefits, not a state decision to classify a person as a resident. (3) Consistently with IIRIRA § 505, the state laws do not treat undocumented residents more favorably than U.S. citizens who are not residents of the state; to the contrary, the former are subjected to additional restrictions. To these arguments, one might add another: IIRIRA § 505 says only that an undocumented student may not, under certain circumstances, “be eligible on the basis of residence within a State” [emphasis added]. By hinging eligibility not on residence but on other criteria (for example, graduation from a high school in the state, attendance at a high school in the state for a specified duration, the signing of an affidavit), the state laws therefore respect the limitations in IIRIRA § 505. A California state trial court upheld the state statute on precisely that basis, although the court of appeals reversed, and the case was pending before the Supreme Court of California at the time of this writing. See Martinez v. Regents of the University of California, 83 Cal. Rptr. 3d 518 (Cal. App. 2008).

Professor Kris Kobach disagrees that these state laws conform with federal law. He believes that in IIRIRA § 505 Congress specifically intended to bar states from extending in-state resident tuition rates to their undocumented residents unless they did the same for out-of-state U.S. citizens. He argues that the term “educational benefits” is broad enough to include eligibility for in-state resident tuition, that Congress would not have wanted to treat undocumented state residents more favorably than citizen non-residents, and that a contrary interpretation encourages illegal entry by treating undocumented residents of a state more favorably than F-1 students from overseas. See Kris W. Kobach, Immigration Nullification: In-State Tuition and Lawmakers Who Disregard the Law, 10 NYU J. Legislation & Public Policy 473 (2007). For Professor Olivas’s response, see Michael A. Olivas, Lawmakers Gone Wild? College Residency and the Response to Professor Kobach, 61 Southern Methodist Univ. L. Rev. 99 (2008).

But apart from the question of how best to interpret IIRIRA § 505, recent years have witnessed a flurry of advocacy and proposed bills to repeal the provision. Some of the bills would also allow certain undocumented students to adjust to lawful permanent residence, require states to classify certain undocumented students as state residents for purposes of in-state college tuition (as a condition to the state continuing to receive federal educational funding), or some combination. These bills are known generically as the DREAM Act. See generally Michael A. Olivas, IIRIRA, the DREAM Act, and Undocumented College Student Residency, 30 J. College & University L. 435 (2004). Proponents of the DREAM Act emphasize that the students were typically brought to the United States at an early age, that they cannot be held responsible for their parents' violations of the immigration laws, that a college education is important to many of them, that their ineligibility for almost all federal and state financial aid otherwise puts the costs of college beyond their reach, that the slim hopes of attending college destroy their incentive to succeed in high school, that the country and the nation lose out when talented high school graduates who are likely to remain here are unable to develop and contribute their talents, and that their parents are required to pay the same state and federal taxes as all other residents.

In contrast, a few scholars have opposed the DREAM Act.⁴⁸ Opponents generally argue that allowing undocumented residents to pay in-state tuition fees would reward their illegality, encourage further illegal immigration, and unfairly require U.S. citizen and lawfully resident noncitizen students to subsidize their education.

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. As a policy matter, should undocumented residents of a state qualify for in-state resident tuition rates at public colleges and universities?

2. IIRIRA § 505 above disqualifies undocumented students from post-secondary education benefits based on residence, but only if U.S. citizens from other states are similarly ineligible.⁴⁹ What do you think of that linkage?

3. In Plyler v. Doe, the Court was considering a Texas law that allowed local school districts to bar undocumented students from public elementary and secondary schools. Suppose the Texas law had extended that bar to state colleges and universities (as California Proposition 187 did). In the absence of federal legislation on the subject (this was pre-IIRIRA), does either the language or the logic of the Court's opinion suggest what the Court would have done?

48. For an exception, see Kris W. Kobach, Immigration Bill Rewards Lawbreaking, Human Events Online (Aug. 15, 2006), <http://www.humanevents.com/article.php?id=16505> (last visited 5/19/09) (author was Attorney General Ashcroft's main immigration advisor).

49. Out-of-state U.S. citizens sued Kansas for charging less tuition for undocumented residents of Kansas than for non-Kansas-resident U.S. citizens. The court held the plaintiffs lacked standing because they could not show their tuition was affected. Day v. Bond, 500 F.3d 1127, rehearing denied, 511 F.3d 1030 (10th Cir. 2007).

4. In 2008, the North Carolina Attorney General took the debate over tuition rates for undocumented residents a step further. He interpreted the Welfare Act as prohibiting states entirely from enrolling undocumented students in post-secondary educational institutions. Professor Hans Christian Linnartz strongly disagrees. See Hans Christian Linnartz, Misinterpreting 'Public Benefits', News & Observer (May 15, 2008). See also Franco Ordonez, Charlotte Observer (May 15, 2008) (reporting that the North Carolina community college system has now become the first statewide system to bar all undocumented students). Soon thereafter, the South Carolina legislature became the first to enact a total bar on enrollment of undocumented students at state colleges and universities. South Carolina Act 280, 117th Sess., § 17 (June 4, 2008).

4. UNDOCUMENTED IMMIGRANTS AND LABOR LAW

Another source of debate surrounding undocumented immigrants has been the extent to which they are protected by the labor laws, and whether application of the labor laws to undocumented immigrants perpetuates or reduces illegal immigration. Professor Peter Margulies argued in the early years after IRCA that extending labor law protection to undocumented immigrants would deter employers from luring them here. Peter Margulies, Stranger and Afraid: Undocumented Workers and Federal Employment Law, 38 DePaul L. Rev. 553 (1989). Other forceful pleas for protecting undocumented workers from unfair labor practices have followed.⁵⁰ The AFL-CIO endorses workplace protection for undocumented employees. See 79 IR 39 (Jan. 7, 2002). Professor Jennifer Chacón has argued that lax enforcement of U.S. labor laws (and other policies) have unwittingly contributed to human trafficking. See Jennifer M. Chacón, Misery and Myopia: Understanding the Failures of U.S. Efforts to Stop Human Trafficking, 74 Fordham L. Rev. 2977 (2006). And Professor Michael Wishnie, drawing on constitutional history, argues that many of the practices that now discourage undocumented workers from reporting labor abuses violate the first amendment right “to petition the Government for a redress of grievances.” See Michael J. Wishnie, Immigrants and the Right to Petition, 78 NYU L. Rev. 667 (2003); see also Christine N. Cimini, Ask Don't Tell: Ethical Issues Surrounding Undocumented Workers' Status in Employment Litigation, 61 Stan. L. Rev. 355 (2008) (helpfully analyzing ethical dilemmas unique to representation of undocumented clients in labor cases).

In Sure-Tan, Inc. v. NLRB, 467 U.S. 883, 104 S.Ct. 2803, 81 L.Ed.2d 732 (1984) (decided before IRCA prohibited employers from knowingly hiring unauthorized workers, as discussed in section A.2 above), the Supreme Court made clear that the NLRA prohibits employers from contacting the immigration authorities in retaliation for an employee's union organizing activities. In Hoffman Plastic Compounds v. NLRB, 535 U.S. 137, 122 S.Ct. 1275, 152 L.Ed.2d 271 (2002), the Supreme Court appears to confirm that ruling. The novel question addressed by the Court in Hoffman was whether undocumented immigrants could be awarded backpay upon a finding of unlawful discharge under the NLRA. Consider the Court's reasoning:

50. E.g., Ruben J. Garcia, Ghost Workers in an Interconnected World: Going Beyond the Dichotomies of Domestic Immigration and Labor Laws, 36 Univ. Michigan J. L. Reform 737 (2003); M. Isabel Medina, Wal-Mart, Immigrant Workers and the U.S. Government: A Case of Split Personality?, 39 Connecticut L. Rev. 1443 (2007); Lori A. Nessel, Undocu- mented Immigrants in the Workplace: The Fallacy of Labor Protection and the Need for Reform, 36 Harvard Civil Rights—Civil Liberties L. Rev. 345 (2001); Maria L. Ontiveros, Immigrant Workers' Rights in a Post-Hoffman World—Organizing Around the Thirteenth Amendment, 18 Georgetown Immigration L.J. 651 (2005).

Hoffman Plastic Compounds, Inc. v. National Labor Relations Board

Supreme Court of the United States, 2002.
535 U.S. 137, 122 S.Ct. 1275, 152 L.Ed.2d 271.

■ JUSTICE REHNQUIST delivered the opinion of the Court.

The National Labor Relations Board (Board) awarded backpay to an undocumented alien who has never been legally authorized to work in the United States. We hold that such relief is foreclosed by federal immigration policy, as expressed by Congress in the Immigration Reform and Control Act of 1986 (IRCA).

Petitioner Hoffman Plastic Compounds, Inc. (petitioner or Hoffman), custom-formulates chemical compounds for businesses that manufacture pharmaceutical, construction, and household products. In May 1988, petitioner hired Jose Castro to operate various blending machines that "mix and cook" the particular formulas per customer order. Before being hired for this position, Castro presented documents that appeared to verify his authorization to work in the United States. In December 1988, the United Rubber, Cork, Linoleum, and Plastic Workers of America, AFL-CIO, began a union-organizing campaign at petitioner's production plant. Castro and several other employees supported the organizing campaign and distributed authorization cards to co-workers. In January 1989, Hoffman laid off Castro and other employees engaged in these organizing activities.

Three years later, in January 1992, respondent Board found that Hoffman unlawfully selected four employees, including Castro, for layoff "in order to rid itself of known union supporters" in violation of § 8(a)(3) of the National Labor Relations Act (NLRA).⁵¹ To remedy this violation, the Board ordered that Hoffman (1) cease and desist from further violations of the NLRA, (2) post a detailed notice to its employees regarding the remedial order, and (3) offer reinstatement and backpay to the four affected employees. Hoffman entered into a stipulation with the Board's General Counsel and agreed to abide by the Board's order.

In June 1993, the parties proceeded to a compliance hearing before an Administrative Law Judge (ALJ) to determine the amount of backpay owed

51. [Footnote 1 in original] Section 8(a)(3) of the NLRA prohibits discrimination "in regard to hire or tenure of employment or any term or condition of employment to encourage or discourage membership in any labor organization."

to each discriminatee. On the final day of the hearing, Castro testified that he was born in Mexico and that he had never been legally admitted to, or authorized to work in, the United States. He admitted gaining employment with Hoffman only after tendering a birth certificate belonging to a friend who was born in Texas. He also admitted that he used this birth certificate to fraudulently obtain a California driver's license and a Social Security card, and to fraudulently obtain employment following his layoff by Hoffman. Neither Castro nor the Board's General Counsel offered any evidence that Castro had applied or intended to apply for legal authorization to work in the United States. Based on this testimony, the ALJ found the Board precluded from awarding Castro backpay or reinstatement as such relief would be contrary to Sure-Tan, Inc. v. NLRB, 467 U.S. 883, 104 S.Ct. 2803, 81 L.Ed.2d 732 (1984), and in conflict with IRCA, which makes it unlawful for employers knowingly to hire undocumented workers or for employees to use fraudulent documents to establish employment eligibility.

In September 1998, four years after the ALJ's decision, and nine years after Castro was fired, the Board reversed with respect to backpay. Citing its earlier decision in A.P.R.A. Fuel Oil Buyers Group, Inc., the Board determined that "the most effective way to accommodate and further the immigration policies embodied in [IRCA] is to provide the protections and remedies of the [NLRA] to undocumented workers in the same manner as to other employees." The Board thus found that Castro was entitled to $66,951 of backpay, plus interest. It calculated this backpay award from the date of Castro's termination to the date Hoffman first learned of Castro's undocumented status, a period of 4 ½ years. * * *

Hoffman filed a petition for review of the Board's order in the Court of Appeals. A panel of the Court of Appeals denied the petition for review. After rehearing the case en banc, the court again denied the petition for review and enforced the Board's order. We granted certiorari, and now reverse.

This case exemplifies the principle that the Board's discretion to select and fashion remedies for violations of the NLRA, though generally broad, is not unlimited. Since the Board's inception, we have consistently set aside awards of reinstatement or backpay to employees found guilty of serious illegal conduct in connection with their employment. In [N.L.R.B. v. Fansteel Metallurgical Corp. (1939)], the Board awarded reinstatement with backpay to employees who engaged in a "sit down strike" that led to confrontation with local law enforcement officials. We set aside the award, saying:

We are unable to conclude that Congress intended to compel employers to retain persons in their employ regardless of their unlawful conduct,—to invest those who go on strike with an immunity from discharge for acts of trespass or violence against the employer's property, which they would not have enjoyed had they remained at work.

Though we found that the employer had committed serious violations of the NLRA, the Board had no discretion to remedy those violations by awarding reinstatement with backpay to employees who themselves had committed serious criminal acts. Two years later, in [Southern S.S. Co. v. NLRB (1942)], the Board awarded reinstatement with backpay to five employees whose strike on shipboard had amounted to a mutiny in violation of federal law. We set aside the award, saying:

It is sufficient for this case to observe that the Board has not been commissioned to effectuate the policies of the Labor Relations Act so single-mindedly that it may wholly ignore other and equally important [c]ongressional objectives.

Although the Board had argued that the employees' conduct did not in fact violate the federal mutiny statute, we rejected this view, finding the Board's interpretation of a statute so far removed from its expertise merited no deference from this Court. Since Southern S.S. Co., we have accordingly never deferred to the Board's remedial preferences where such preferences potentially trench upon federal statutes and policies unrelated to the NLRA. Thus, we have precluded the Board from enforcing orders found in conflict with the Bankruptcy Code, rejected claims that federal antitrust policy should defer to the NLRA, and precluded the Board from selecting remedies pursuant to its own interpretation of the Interstate Commerce Act.

Our decision in Sure Tan followed this line of cases and set aside an award closely analogous to the award challenged here. There we confronted for the first time a potential conflict between the NLRA and federal immigration policy, as then expressed in the Immigration and Nationality Act (INA). Two companies had unlawfully reported alien-employees to the Immigration and Naturalization Service (INS) in retaliation for union activity. Rather than face INS sanction, the employees voluntarily departed to Mexico. The Board investigated and found the companies acted in violation of §§ 8(a)(1) and (3) of the NLRA. The Board's ensuing order directed the companies to reinstate the affected workers and pay them six months' backpay.

We affirmed the Board's determination that the NLRA applied to undocumented workers, reasoning that the immigration laws "as presently written" expressed only a "peripheral concern" with the employment of illegal aliens. "For whatever reason," Congress had not "made it a separate criminal offense" for employers to hire an illegal alien, or for an illegal alien "to accept employment after entering this country illegally." Sure-Tan. Therefore, we found "no reason to conclude that application of the NLRA to employment practices affecting such aliens would necessarily conflict with the terms of the INA."

With respect to the Board's selection of remedies, however, we found its authority limited by federal immigration policy. For example, the Board was prohibited from effectively rewarding a violation of the immigration laws by reinstating workers not authorized to reenter the United States. Sure Tan, 467 U.S., at 903, 104 S.Ct. 2803. Thus, to avoid "a potential conflict with the INA," the Board's reinstatement order had to be conditioned upon proof of "the employees' legal reentry." "Similarly," with respect to backpay, we stated: “[T]he employees must be deemed ‘unavailable’ for work (and the accrual of backpay therefore tolled) during any period when they were not lawfully entitled to be present and employed in the United States.” “[I]n light of the practical workings of the immigration laws,” such remedial limitations were appropriate even if they led to “[t]he probable unavailability of the [NLRA’s] more effective remedies.”

* * *

* * * The parties and the lower courts focus much of their attention on Sure-Tan, particularly its express limitation of backpay to aliens “lawfully entitled to be present or employed in the United States.” All agree that as a matter of plain language, this limitation forecloses the award of backpay to Castro. Castro was never lawfully entitled to be present or employed in the United States, and thus, under the plain language of Sure-Tan, he has no right to claim backpay. The Board takes the view, however, that read in context, this limitation applies only to aliens who left the United States and thus cannot claim backpay without lawful reentry. The Court of Appeals agreed with this view. Another Court of Appeals, however, agrees with Hoffman, and concludes that Sure-Tan simply meant what it said, i.e., that any alien who is “not lawfully entitled to be present and employed in the United States” cannot claim backpay. See Del Rey Tortilleria, Inc. v. NLRB (7th Cir. 1992). We need not resolve this controversy. For whether isolated sentences from Sure-Tan definitively control, or count merely as persuasive dicta in support of petitioner, we think the question presented here better analyzed through a wider lens, focused as it must be on a legal landscape now significantly changed.

The Southern S.S. Co. line of cases established that where the Board’s chosen remedy trenches upon a federal statute or policy outside the Board’s competence to administer, the Board’s remedy may be required to yield. Whether or not this was the situation at the time of Sure-Tan, it is precisely the situation today. In 1986, two years after Sure-Tan, Congress enacted IRCA, a comprehensive scheme prohibiting the employment of illegal aliens in the United States. As we have previously noted, IRCA “forcefully” made combating the employment of illegal aliens central to “[t]he policy of immigration law.” It did so by establishing an extensive “employment verification system,” designed to deny employment to aliens who (a) are not lawfully present in the United States, or (b) are not lawfully authorized to work in the United States. This verification system is critical to the IRCA regime. To enforce it, IRCA mandates that employers verify the identity and eligibility of all new hires by examining specified documents before they begin work. If an alien applicant is unable to present the required documentation, the unauthorized alien cannot be hired.

Similarly, if an employer unknowingly hires an unauthorized alien, or if the alien becomes unauthorized while employed, the employer is compelled to discharge the worker upon discovery of the worker’s undocumented status. Employers who violate IRCA are punished by civil fines, and may be subject to criminal prosecution. IRCA also makes it a crime for an unauthorized alien to subvert the employer verification system by tendering fraudulent documents. It thus prohibits aliens from using or attempting to use “any forged, counterfeit, altered, or falsely made document” or “any document lawfully issued to or with respect to a person other than the possessor” for purposes of obtaining employment in the United States. Aliens who use or attempt to use such documents are subject to fines and criminal prosecution. There is no dispute that Castro’s use of false documents to obtain employment with Hoffman violated these provisions.

Under the IRCA regime, it is impossible for an undocumented alien to obtain employment in the United States without some party directly contravening explicit congressional policies. Either the undocumented alien tenders fraudulent identification, which subverts the cornerstone of IRCA’s enforcement mechanism, or the employer knowingly hires the undocumented alien in direct contradiction of its IRCA obligations. The Board asks that we overlook this fact and allow it to award backpay to an illegal alien for years of work not performed, for wages that could not lawfully have been earned, and for a job obtained in the first instance by a criminal fraud. We find, however, that awarding backpay to illegal aliens runs counter to policies underlying IRCA, policies the Board has no authority to enforce or administer. Therefore, as we have consistently held in like circumstances, the award lies beyond the bounds of the Board’s remedial discretion.

The Board contends that awarding limited backpay to Castro “reasonably accommodates” IRCA, because, in the Board’s view, such an award is not “inconsistent” with IRCA. The Board argues that because the backpay period was closed as of the date Hoffman learned of Castro’s illegal status, Hoffman could have employed Castro during the backpay period without violating IRCA. The Board further argues that while IRCA criminalized the misuse of documents, “it did not make violators ineligible for back pay awards or other compensation flowing from employment secured by the misuse of such documents.” This latter statement, of course, proves little: The mutiny statute in Southern S.S. Co., and the INA in Sure-Tan, were likewise understandably silent with respect to such things as backpay awards under the NLRA. What matters here, and what sinks both of the Board’s claims, is that Congress has expressly made it criminally punishable for an alien to obtain employment with false documents. There is no reason to think that Congress nonetheless intended to permit backpay where but for an employer’s unfair labor practices, an alien-employee would have remained in the United States illegally, and continued to work illegally, all the while successfully evading apprehension by immigration authorities.⁵² Far from “accommodating” IRCA, the Board’s position, recognizing employer misconduct but discounting the misconduct of illegal

52. [Footnote 4 in original] Justice BREYER contends otherwise, pointing to a single Committee Report from one House of a politically divided Congress, which is a rather slender reed. Even assuming that a Committee Report can shed light on what Congress intended in IRCA, the Report cited by Justice BREYER says nothing about the Board’s authority to award backpay to illegal aliens.

alien employees, subverts it. Indeed, awarding backpay in a case like this not only trivializes the immigration laws, it also condones and encourages future violations. The Board admits that had the INS detained Castro, or had Castro obeyed the law and departed to Mexico, Castro would have lost his right to backpay. Similarly, Castro cannot mitigate damages, a duty our cases require, without triggering new IRCA violations, either by tendering false documents to employers or by finding employers willing to ignore IRCA and hire illegal workers. The Board here has failed to even consider this tension.

We therefore conclude that allowing the Board to award backpay to illegal aliens would unduly trench upon explicit statutory prohibitions critical to federal immigration policy, as expressed in IRCA. It would encourage the successful evasion of apprehension by immigration authorities, condone prior violations of the immigration laws, and encourage future violations. However broad the Board's discretion to fashion remedies when dealing only with the NLRA, it is not so unbounded as to authorize this sort of an award.

Lack of authority to award backpay does not mean that the employer gets off scot-free. The Board here has already imposed other significant sanctions against Hoffman-sanctions Hoffman does not challenge. These include orders that Hoffman cease and desist its violations of the NLRA, and that it conspicuously post a notice to employees setting forth their rights under the NLRA and detailing its prior unfair practices. We have deemed such "traditional remedies" sufficient to effectuate national labor policy regardless of whether the "spur and catalyst" of backpay accompanies them. Sure-Tan. As we concluded in Sure-Tan, "in light of the practical workings of the immigration laws," any "perceived deficienc[y] in the NLRA's existing remedial arsenal" must be "addressed by congressional action," not the courts. In light of IRCA, this statement is even truer today.⁵³

The judgment of the Court of Appeals is reversed.

It is so ordered.

■ JUSTICE BREYER, with whom JUSTICE STEVENS, JUSTICE SOUTER, and JUSTICE GINSBURG join, dissenting.

I cannot agree that the backpay award before us "runs counter to," or "trenches upon," national immigration policy. As all the relevant agencies (including the Department of Justice) have told us, the National Labor Relations Board's limited backpay order will not interfere with the implementation of immigration policy. Rather, it reasonably helps to deter

53. [Footnote 6 in original] Because the Board is precluded from imposing punitive remedies, it is an open question whether awarding backpay to undocumented aliens, who have no entitlement to work in the United States at all, might constitute a prohibited punitive remedy against an employer. Because we find the remedy foreclosed on other grounds, we do not address whether the award at issue here is "'punitive' and hence beyond the authority of the Board." Sure-Tan.

unlawful activity that both labor laws and immigration laws seek to prevent. Consequently, the order is lawful.

The Court does not deny that the employer in this case dismissed an employee for trying to organize a union—a crude and obvious violation of the labor laws. And it cannot deny that the Board has especially broad discretion in choosing an appropriate remedy for addressing such violations. Nor can it deny that in such circumstances backpay awards serve critically important remedial purposes. Those purposes involve more than victim compensation; they also include deterrence, i.e., discouraging employers from violating the Nation's labor laws.

Without the possibility of the deterrence that backpay provides, the Board can impose only future-oriented obligations upon law-violating employers—for it has no other weapons in its remedial arsenal. And in the absence of the backpay weapon, employers could conclude that they can violate the labor laws at least once with impunity. . . . Hence the backpay remedy is necessary; it helps make labor law enforcement credible; it makes clear that violating the labor laws will not pay.

Where in the immigration laws can the Court find a “policy” that might warrant taking from the Board this critically important remedial power? Certainly not in any statutory language. The immigration statutes say that an employer may not knowingly employ an illegal alien, that an alien may not submit false documents, and that the employer must verify documentation. They provide specific penalties, including criminal penalties, for violations. But the statutes' language itself does not explicitly state how a violation is to effect the enforcement of other laws, such as the labor laws. What is to happen, for example, when an employer hires, or an alien works, in violation of these provisions? Must the alien forfeit all pay earned? May the employer ignore the labor laws? More to the point, may the employer violate those laws with impunity, at least once—secure in the knowledge that the Board cannot assess a monetary penalty? The immigration statutes' language simply does not say.

Nor can the Court comfortably rest its conclusion upon the immigration laws' purposes. For one thing, the general purpose of the immigration statute's employment prohibition is to diminish the attractive force of employment, which like a “magnet” pulls illegal immigrants toward the United States. H.R.Rep. No. 99-682, pt. a, p. 45 (1986), U.S.Code Cong. & Admin.News 1986, p. 5649. To permit the Board to award backpay could not significantly increase the strength of this magnetic force, for so speculative a future possibility could not realistically influence an individual's decision to migrate illegally.

To deny the Board the power to award backpay, however, might very well increase the strength of this magnetic force. That denial lowers the cost to the employer of an initial labor law violation (provided, of course, that the only victims are illegal aliens). It thereby increases the employer's incentive to find and to hire illegal-alien employees. Were the Board forbidden to assess backpay against a knowing employer—a circumstance not before us today—this perverse economic incentive, which runs directly contrary to the immigration statute's basic objective, would be obvious and serious. But even if limited to cases where the employer did not know of the employee's status, the incentive may prove significant—for, as the Board has told us, the Court's rule offers employers immunity in borderline cases, thereby encouraging them to take risks, i.e., to hire with a wink and a nod those potentially unlawful aliens whose unlawful employment (given the Court's views) ultimately will lower the costs of labor law violations. The Court has recognized these considerations in stating that the labor laws must apply to illegal aliens in order to ensure that "there will be no advantage under the NLRA in preferring illegal aliens" and therefore there will be "fewer incentives for aliens themselves to enter." Sure-Tan. The Court today accomplishes the precise opposite.

The immigration law's specific labor-law-related purposes also favor preservation, not elimination, of the Board's backpay powers. As I just mentioned and as this Court has held, the immigration law foresees application of the Nation's labor laws to protect "workers who are illegal immigrants." And a policy of applying the labor laws must encompass a policy of enforcing the labor laws effectively. Otherwise, as Justice KENNEDY once put the matter, "we would leave helpless the very persons who most need protection from exploitative employer practices." That presumably is why those in Congress who wrote the immigration statute stated explicitly and unequivocally that the immigration statute does not take from the Board any of its remedial authority. H.R.Rep. No. 99-682, at 58, U.S.Code Cong. & Admin.News 1986, p. 5649, 5662 (IRCA does not "undermine or diminish in any way labor protections in existing law, or . . . limit the powers of federal or state labor relations boards . . . to remedy unfair practices committed against undocumented employees").

Neither does precedent help the Court. [The dissent distinguishes the two cases upon which the Court relies, pointing out that in both of them the employees had responded to their employers' unfair labor practices with unlawful acts of their own, namely a sit-in and a mutiny.—Eds.]

* * *

By way of contrast, the present case concerns a discharge that was not for "good cause." The discharge did not sever any connection with an unfair labor practice. Indeed, the discharge was the unfair labor practice. Hence a determination that backpay was inappropriate in the former circumstances (involving a justifiable discharge) tells us next to nothing about the appropriateness as a legal remedy in the latter (involving an unjustifiable discharge), the circumstances present here.

The Court also refers to the statement in Sure-Tan that "employees must be deemed 'unavailable' for work (and the accrual of backpay therefore tolled) during any period when they were not lawfully entitled to be present and employed in the United States." The Court, however, does not rely upon this statement as determining its conclusion. And it is right not to do so. Sure-Tan involved an order reinstating (with backpay) illegal aliens who had left the country and returned to Mexico. In order to collect the backpay to which the order entitled them, the aliens would have had to reenter the country illegally. Consequently, the order itself could not have been enforced without leading to a violation of criminal law. Nothing in the Court's opinion suggests that the Court intended its statement to reach to circumstances different from and not at issue in Sure-Tan, where an order, such as the order before us, does not require the alien to engage in further illegal behavior.

Finally, the Court cannot reasonably rely upon the award's negative features taken together. The Court summarizes those negative features when it says that the Board "asks that we . . . award backpay to an illegal alien [1] for years of work not performed, [2] for wages that could not lawfully have been earned, and [3] for a job obtained in the first instance by a criminal fraud." The first of these features has little persuasive force, given the facts that (1) backpay ordinarily and necessarily is awarded to a discharged employee who may not find other work, and (2) the Board is able to tailor an alien's backpay award to avoid rewarding that alien for his legal inability to mitigate damages by obtaining lawful employment elsewhere.

Neither can the remaining two features—unlawfully earned wages and criminal fraud—prove determinative, for they tell us only a small portion of the relevant story. After all, the same backpay award that compensates an employee in the circumstances the Court describes also requires an employer who has violated the labor laws to make a meaningful monetary payment. Considered from this equally important perspective, the award simply requires that employer to pay an employee whom the employer believed could lawfully have worked in the United States, (1) for years of work that he would have performed, (2) for a portion of the wages that he would have earned, and (3) for a job that the employee would have held—had that employer not unlawfully dismissed the employee for union organizing. In ignoring these latter features of the award, the Court undermines the public policies that underlie the Nation's labor laws.

Of course, the Court believes it is necessary to do so in order to vindicate what it sees as conflicting immigration law policies. I have explained why I believe the latter policies do not conflict. But even were I wrong, the law requires the Court to respect the Board's conclusion, rather than to substitute its own independent view of the matter for that of the Board. The Board reached its conclusion after carefully considering both labor law and immigration law. In doing so the Board has acted "with a discriminating awareness of the consequences of its action" on the immigration laws. The Attorney General, charged with immigration law enforcement, has told us that the Board is right. And the Board's position is, at the least, a reasonable one. Consequently, it is lawful. Chevron U.S.A. Inc. v. Natural Resources Defense Council, Inc. (1984) (requiring courts to uphold reasonable agency position).

For these reasons, I respectfully dissent.

* * *

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. Does the holding in Hoffman Plastic advance or compromise the goals of IRCA? Is Justice Breyer correct that the Court's holding undermines the purposes of the NLRA by giving employers one bite at the apple, so to speak? Assuming that the Court's holding promotes the goals of IRCA at the expense of the NLRA, what justifies the Court in making that choice?

2. Left open in Hoffman Plastic are the questions of whether the Board may order as a remedy unpaid wages for work actually performed, and whether backpay may be awarded, even for the period after discharge, when the employer knowingly employs an unauthorized worker. Does Hoffman Plastic permit either of these remedies? See Michael J. Wishnie, Emerging Issues for Undocumented Workers, 6 Univ. Pennsylvania J. Labor & Employment L. 497 (2004), reproduced in 9 BIB 1289, 1296–98 (Nov. 1, 2004). Professor Wishnie suggests that threatening deportation in retaliation for union organizing might even constitute the criminal offense of inducing involuntary servitude.⁵⁴

3. What is the effect of Hoffman Plastic on state labor laws? Can states now pass any laws that provide rights and remedies to undocumented workers, or are those laws preempted by IRCA?

In the wake of Hoffman Plastic, a number of state courts considered whether state labor law remedies and workers compensation laws applied to undocumented workers. In Balbuena v. IDR Realty LLC, 6 N.Y.3d 338, 845 N.E.2d 1246 (2006), the New York Court of Appeals held that IRCA did not preempt state regulation of occupational health and safety or limit the types of damages that undocumented immigrants injured on the job could recover under state tort law. The court cited De Canas v. Bica, 424 U.S. 351, 96 S.Ct. 933, 47 L.Ed.2d 43 (1976)—discussed below in Part E—and the U.S. Supreme Court's recognition that, notwithstanding the federal government's exclusive control over immigration, the states have broad police power to regulate employment to protect workers in the state. See id. at 356. The court concluded that “limiting a lost wages claim by an injured undocumented alien would lessen an employer's incentive to comply with the Labor Law and supply all of its workers the safe workplace that the Legislature demands,” id. at 358. This effect on employers, coupled with the fact that undocumented immigrants are “willing to work jobs that are more dangerous and undesirable . . . than their legal immigrant and citizen counterparts,” would actually increase illegal immigration. See id. at 360.

The court emphasized, however, that the plaintiffs in the case, unlike the plaintiffs in Hoffman Plastic, did not present fraudulent papers to their

54. 9 BIB at 1293 (quoting the majority opinion of Justice O'Connor in United States v. Kozminski, 487 U.S. 931, 948, 108 S.Ct. 2751, 101 L.Ed.2d 788 (1988)). For a history of the Hoffman case, see generally Catherine L. Fisk & Michael J. Wishnie, Hoffman Plas- tic Compounds, Inc. v. NLRB: The Rules of the Workplace for Undocumented Immigrants, in David A. Martin & Peter H. Schuck (eds.), Immigration Stories (2005), chap. 12.

employers or commit criminal acts under IRCA. See id. Should this fact affect the outcome of the case?

For other cases addressing the potential preemption of state tort and labor law remedies for undocumented workers, see, e.g., Design Kitchen and Baths v. Lagos, 388 Md. 718, 882 A.2d 817 (Md. Ct. App. 2005) (finding state's workers compensation law applicable to all persons within the state's borders regardless of legal status); Farmers Bros. Coffee v. Workers' Compensation Appeals Bd., 133 Cal.App.4th 533, 35 Cal.Rptr.3d 23 (Ct. App. 2005) (same).

4. Professor Wishnie contends that many of these labor practices also violate international legal standards. He suggests use of both the domestic Alien Tort Claims Act and the North American Agreement for Labor Cooperation (a side agreement to NAFTA) as strategies to expose and redress the violations. See Michael J. Wishnie, Immigrant Workers and the Domestic Enforcement of International Labor Rights, 4 Univ. Pennsylvania J. Labor & Employment L. 529 (2002). In 2003, the Inter-American Court of Human Rights, at the request of Mexico, issued a non-binding opinion disapproving of the Hoffman Plastics rule.⁵⁵

5. In 2003, the Convention on the Protection of the Rights of all Migrant Workers and Members of their Families, adopted by U.N. General Assembly resolution in 1990, see UNGA A/Res/45/158 annex, 45 UN GAOR Supp. (No. 49A) at 262 (Dec. 18, 1990), gathered enough ratifications to enter into force. The Convention lays out a variety of labor rights for migrant workers, including those workers who are undocumented. To date, however, neither the United States nor any of the other major immigrant-receiving nations have become parties to the Convention. At any rate, the protections it affords are highly qualified. Professor Linda Bosniak, writing after the Convention had been adopted but before it had gone into force, criticized the international community for elevating state sovereignty above the humane treatment of undocumented workers.⁵⁶

6. Professor Ruben Garcia traces the Hoffman Plastic Compounds decision partly to fears generated by the then recent 9/11 attacks. See Ruben J. Garcia, Labor's Fragile Freedom of Association Post-9/11, 8 Univ. Penn. J. Labor & Employment L. 283, 318-25 (2006). And Professor Maria Pabón López contrasts some of the adverse labor law consequences of the Hoffman Plastic Compounds decision with analogous but more forgiving policies in Argentina. Maria Pabón López, The Place of the Undocumented Worker in the United States Legal System After Hoffman Plastic Com-

55. See Ruling backs rights of migrant workers, The Associated Press (Sept. 26, 2003). See also Maria Pabón López, The Intersection of Immigration Law and Civil Rights Law: Noncitizen Workers and the International Human Rights Paradigm, 44 Univ. Louisville Brandeis L.J. 611 (2006) (predicting that the future civil rights of undocumented workers are most likely to come from international human rights law).

56. See Linda S. Bosniak, Human Rights, State Sovereignty and the Protection of Undocumented Immigrants under the International Migrant Workers Convention, 25 Internat'l Migration Rev. 737 (1991); see also Guadalupe T. Luna, "Agricultural Underdogs" and International Agreements: The Legal Context of Agricultural Workers within the Rural Economy, 26 New Mexico L. Rev. 9 (1996).

pounds: An Assessment and Comparison with Argentina's Legal System, 15 Indiana Internat'l & Comparative L. Rev. 301 (2005).

7. As discussed in detail in Section E, states and localities have adopted various strategies to regulate or suppress undocumented labor. One such strategy has been to pass anti-solicitation ordinances that prohibit congregation in public spaces for the purposes of securing employment. These ordinances are directed at day laborers, many of whom are undocumented immigrants. Day laborers tend to gather in parking lots and on street corners to wait for employers with offers of a day's work, usually in the construction and landscaping industries. Localities justify these ordinances by citing public health and safety concerns, such as the laborers' interruption of traffic flow, threat to driver and pedestrian safety, and reduction of the general quality of life. The courts that have considered constitutional challenges to these ordinances have found them to be a violation of the First Amendment's free speech guarantee. Though the courts generally have characterized the regulations as restrictions only on the time, place, and manner of speech, they have concluded that the localities' failure to provide alternative fora for labor solicitation renders the ordinances unconstitutional. See, e.g., Comite de Jornaleros de Redondo Beach v. City of Redondo Beach, 475 F. Supp. 2d 952, 962 (C.D. Cal. 2006) (finding that private parking lots were not an adequate channel of communication for soliciting employment); Comite de Jornaleros de Glendale v. City of Glendale, No. CV 04-3521-SJO (C.D. Cal. May 16, 2005) (permanently enjoining anti-solicitation ordinance on First Amendment grounds).

What do you think would be a viable alternative forum for labor solicitation? Some localities have, in fact, provided alternative fora for day laborers, opening hiring halls, day labor centers, or more modest shelters in Home Depot parking lots where workers can congregate to connect with employers in a semi-regulated fashion. These centers have been enormously controversial in some communities, but some of these centers also provide services such as English language classes. For a discussion of the different approaches localities have taken to the day labor phenomenon, see Cristina M. Rodríguez, The Significance of the Local in Immigration Regulation, 106 Michigan L. Rev. 567, 596-600 (2008).

5. UNDOCUMENTED IMMIGRANTS AND DRIVERS' LICENSES

Since September 11, 2001, drivers' licenses have been the subject of fervent debate. Several of the 9/11 hijackers, it is frequently noted, used state drivers' licenses to board the airplanes on that fateful day. (Those who offer that observation do not always candidly acknowledge that, even without drivers' licenses, the same terrorists could easily have boarded by displaying their passports.)

At the center of the debate are philosophical differences over the very purposes of drivers' licenses. Are they primarily a road safety device, a way of assuring that drivers achieve a minimal level of knowledge and proficiency before taking to the highways? Or have they also become de facto ID cards, for use by government and private actors in verifying the bearer's identity? Should they be designed to perform a third function—immigration enforcement?

The REAL ID Act clearly reflects the latter two philosophies. The law was passed in 2005 without any committee hearings or other debates. (The House of Representatives attached it to must-pass appropriations legislation for troops support and Tsunami relief, the Senate rejected it, and a conference committee accepted it with some modifications.) With respect to drivers' licenses, the Act was scheduled to go into force three years after enactment (which would have been May 11, 2008). DHS has extended the deadline to December 31, 2009 for states that request extensions, and it will phase in certain of the requirements from 2008 through 2017. See 85 IR 1072 (Apr. 7, 2008). The Act does two sorts of things.

First, it provides that no federal agency may accept a state-issued driver's license or identification card as identification unless the state has implemented a number of prescribed reliability measures. REAL ID Act, § 202(a)(1). The Secretary of Homeland Security must periodically determine whether each state is meeting those requirements. Id. § 202(a)(2).

Some of the security requirements relate to the document itself. The document must include a digital photograph, must be machine-readable, and must contain features designed to prevent tampering, counterfeiting, and duplication. Id. § 202(b). Other provisions require the state to take several precautions before issuing the driver's license or identification card. For example, the state must require every applicant to present four documents—a photo ID (or a document that shows the person's full legal name and date of birth); a document that shows the person's date of birth; proof of the applicant's social security number (or proof of ineligibility for it); and documentation of the applicant's name and principal address. Id. § 202(c)(1). For this purpose, the only acceptable foreign document is a passport. Id. § 202(c)(3)(B). The state must then "verify, with the issuing agency, the issuance, validity, and completeness of" each of these documents. Id. § 202(c)(3)(A). On the first occasion that a given individual seeks a driver's license or identification card after the Act goes into force, this process will normally require the state DMV to check with the Social Security Administration, the local entity that issued the person's birth certificate, and local officials who can confirm the person's address. For applications to renew drivers' licenses or identification cards that are originally issued after the Act goes into force, the process is not yet clear; the statute says only that the state's procedure must be "effective," id. § 202(d)(4), though it appears the state may rely on paper copies of the documents it originally accepted (and which it is required to store for seven years, id. § 202(d)(2)). One who already has a driver's license issued by another state must supply proof that the previous license was or is being terminated. Id. § 202(d)(6). The state must also take specified steps to secure the physical facilities where the licenses are produced and the materials used to produce them, and it must subject all relevant state employees to security checks. Id. § 202(d)(7, 8). Finally, the state must establish and maintain an electronic database that contains all the information on each person's driver's license or identification card, as well as information on each person's driving history, and it must share that database with each of the other states. Id. § 202(d)(12, 13).

Those provisions apply to citizens and noncitizens alike. A separate question, of more relevance here, is whether noncitizens should have to be in lawful immigration status in order to receive a state-issued driver's license or identification card. On that subject, debate has raged for several years. The topic has been especially volatile in California, and particularly for Latinos, even influencing gubernatorial elections. See, e.g., Kevin R. Johnson, Driver's Licenses and Undocumented Immigrants: The Future of Civil Rights Law?, 5 Nevada L.J. 213, 232–35 (2004). Even before the REAL ID Act, a majority of states made undocumented immigrants ineligible for drivers' licenses. Id. at 217.

Under the REAL ID Act, § 202(c)(2)(B), a state may not issue a driver's license or identification card without proof that the applicant is a United States citizen or national; a noncitizen with some type of valid immigration status; a person with a pending application for asylum, temporary protected status, or adjustment of status; or a person for whom deferred action has been approved. If the applicant falls within one of the above temporary categories, then the state may issue only a temporary driver's license or identification card, good only until the expiry of the person's authorized stay or, if the authorized stay does not have a definite ending time, one year. To renew the document, the person must demonstrate that his or her status has been extended. Id. § 202(c)(2)(C). To determine the applicant's immigration status, each state is required to use the Department of Homeland Security's electronic database (known as the "Systematic Alien Verification for Entitlements," or "SAVE"). Id. § 202(c)(3)(C). In theory, a state may issue drivers' licenses and identification cards that do not comply with all these requirements. If it does, however, then any such documents may not be used, and must clearly indicate that they may not be used, for any federal identification purposes—including boarding a commercial aircraft. Id. §§ 201(3), 202(a)(1), 202(d)(11)(A). As a practical matter this means that, unless a state is willing to disable its residents from boarding commercial aircraft in the United States (or willing to require all its residents to obtain and carry passports when they fly), no state will be able to opt out. States have expressed growing opposition to the Act's requirements, mainly out of concerns related to privacy, identity theft, and the fiscal costs of implementation. See 84 IR 352 (Feb. 12, 2007).

What is the rationale for prohibiting each state from issuing drivers' licenses or identification cards to those of its residents who are out of status? Proponents appear to argue that drivers' licenses make it easier for terrorists to function in society and to get access to resources and places. Thus, by denying drivers' licenses and other identification to at least those terrorists who are undocumented, a federal ban is hoped to make terrorism more difficult to perpetrate.

But many arguments have been arrayed against such prohibitions. The most common arguments have been based on safety. The assumption is that undocumented residents of the United States will continue to drive out of practical necessity, with or without licenses. Therefore, it is argued, the only effect of the prohibition will be to put millions of untested, unlicensed, and uninsured drivers on the roads. See, e.g., Johnson, above, at 220–22. Professor Johnson’s main concern, however, is with the civil rights implications. After reviewing the historical link in California between racial politics and the subject of drivers’ licenses for undocumented immigrants, and emphasizing the disparate impact that the drivers’ licenses restrictions have had on people of Mexican ancestry, he cautions that the law must be vigilant “to ensure that it does not serve as a proxy for race.” Id. at 215. Because thousands of DMV employees nationwide will now have access to each state’s electronic database, and because those shared databases will now contain a great detail of personal information, there is the additional fear of identity theft. The fiscal costs and logistical problems for the state DMVs have also been a major concern. Some states are contemplating legal challenges to the drivers’ licenses provisions (or even civil disobedience) on the ground that they constitute an unlawful unfunded mandate.⁵⁷ Some of the security precautions also pose special difficulties for military personnel stationed abroad.⁵⁸

These concerns aside, the REAL ID Act has some interesting implications for law enforcement and national security. The following article, written (shortly before enactment of the REAL ID Act) by Colonel Margaret Stock, a law professor at the U.S. Military Academy at West Point, takes up that question.

Margaret D. Stock, Driver Licenses and National Security: Myths and Reality

10 Bender’s Immigration Bulletin 422 (March 1, 2005).

* * *

The collective DMV databases are the largest law enforcement databases in the country, with records on more individual adults than any other law enforcement databases. The collective DMV databases are the only comprehensive internal security database. * * * Even DHS admits that its own databases are inferior to the DMV databases: When DHS wants to find someone, the primary government database it relies upon is the driver license database.

57. See, e.g., Suzanne Gamboa, States May Disobey Driver’s License Rules, Assoc. Press (May 10, 2005); Al Swanson, Analysis: ‘Real ID Act’ Scrutinized, United Press Internat’l (May 10, 2005).

58. See Margaret D. Stock, The ‘REAL ID’ Act—A Real Nightmare for DoD, The Officer (Apr. 2005), at 12–13. For a survey of pre-REAL ID Act state practices and a thoughtful analysis of the constitutional and moral questions, see María Pabón López, More than a License to Drive: State Restrictions on the Use of Driver’s Licenses by Non-citizens, 29 Southern Illinois Univ. L.J. 91 (2004).

When a person appears at a state DMV and applies for a driver license, that person voluntarily provides the DMV with a variety of valuable personal information—including a key identifier, the digital photo.⁵⁹ DMV databases thus contain biometric information, and a wealth of other valuable information that is updated on a regular basis, voluntarily, by the individual who has the license. It is easy to see how valuable this data is by comparing the data available in a DMV database to other available government databases. The state birth certificate databases, for example, contain information only on those born or adopted in the United States, usually have no usable biometric information, and rarely have updated information, since most people do not notify vital statistics bureaus when they move. The federal Social Security databases contain records only on those persons who have Social Security numbers, have no biometric information, and may or may not have current address information; furthermore, their usefulness in providing information on the adult population is dropping rapidly as Social Security has tightened rules regarding the issuance of numbers. Internal Revenue Service databases contain information only on those persons who pay taxes; these databases have no biometric information at all, and no updated information unless the person files a tax return. The State Department's passport database contains biometric record, but only on US citizens and nationals who have applied for passports.

* * *

Those who are opposed to illegal immigration view the granting of driver licenses to illegal immigrants as a sort of reward and acknowledgment of complicity in their violation of the law. In fact, their opposition to granting licenses (and identification documents) to illegal immigrants is quite puzzling if one views the matter from a law enforcement and security perspective. * * * If those who oppose granting driver licenses and state identification documents to illegal immigrants have their way, only US citizens and legal aliens will be in the largest law enforcement database in the country. Thus, when a law enforcement official needs to find someone who happens to be an illegal immigrant, she will have no government database in which to look. Such a policy is likely to make it harder to enforce laws, not easier.

* * *

What happens when people can't get US driver licenses or state identification cards? If they are illegal migrants, they do not go home. They stay in the United States. They take public transportation; they walk; they hitch a ride. They use fake licenses; they use foreign licenses; they pay money to corrupt DMV employees to get real licenses when they are not legally entitled to them.⁶⁰ Sometimes they steal someone else's identity in

59. [Footnote 4 in original] American Ass'n of Motor Vehicle Administrators, Access to Drivers License & Identification Card Data by Law Enforcement, October 2003 ("Typically, the digital images (signature and photograph) are reliable, of good quality and in most cases provide the most recent image of a criminal suspect." * * *

60. [Footnote 8 in original] In states that have instituted policies to bar licenses to order to obtain a license; this corrupts the existing database information, but also makes it difficult to locate them and prosecute them. They give their data to private entrepreneurs who sell them so-called “international drivers licenses;” when they purchase such nongovernmental identification, their data does not end up in the government’s DMV database system, and cannot be accessed by US law enforcement officials.

Anyone even slightly familiar with US immigration law knows how complicated it is * * *. It is not possible today for a state or local law enforcement official to pick up the telephone and find out immediately if a given person is “legal;” it can take hours or even days to figure this out, and often the immediate information provided by DHS about a person’s status can be wrong. Because state DMV officials are not immigration experts, when they cannot issue a license or identification document without confirming someone’s status, they will inevitably issue some licenses to people who should not have them, and deny licenses to others who are entitled to them. In addition to harming security by making it harder for law enforcement to find and identify people, such a policy will inevitably lead to an increase in lawsuits brought by people who are entitled to have a license but are wrongfully denied one. Given the level of misinformation in some immigrant communities, it is also highly likely that fewer migrants will apply for a license, even if they are legally entitled to them.

A policy of denying licenses and state identification documents to illegal migrants will inevitably hurt law enforcement. A multitude of state, local, and federal law enforcement agencies access this data on a daily basis to investigate crimes, track down suspects, and prove crimes.⁶¹ Immigration enforcement authorities rely on this data heavily. For example, driver license data is frequently used to prosecute illegal immigrants for such things as criminal reentry after deportation. DMV data is also used to confirm aliens’ eligibility for government benefits, as when an alien must prove that he was present in the United States at a particular point in time. * * *

Here are five myths about driver licenses and security:

Myth #1: Terrorists can’t get on airplanes if they don’t have drivers licenses.

Reality: A potential terrorist could get on an airplane today using a wide variety of government-issued identification documents, including a US or foreign passport.

illegal immigrants, the incidence of DMV employees selling licenses to unauthorized persons has increased significantly. * * *

61. [Footnote 11 in original] Law enforcement agencies that rely on DMV databases daily include the US Department of State; the US Department of Justice; the US Department of Homeland Security; the Postal Inspection Service; the Department of Defense; the US Secret Service; the Department of the Army; the US Coast Guard; the National Center for Missing and Exploited Children; the Department of the Interior; the Veterans Administration; the National Insurance Crime Bureau; the Federal Protective Service; the Royal Canadian Mounted Police; Amtrak; and many others. * * *

Myth #2: The 9/11 terrorists were able to obtain a total of 63 drivers licenses between them.

Reality: According to a Staff Report of the 9/11 Commission, the 19 hijackers had 13 driver licenses. * * * One hijacker had neither a state ID nor a drivers license, and he boarded his target airplane with his foreign passport. It is important to note that information from the driver license records of the hijackers was invaluable after 9/11 in tracking where the terrorists had been in the United States and with whom they had associated. This information was also used to prosecute many individuals who would not have been discovered otherwise.

Myth #3: Our illegal immigrant problem will be solved if we just deny driver licenses to people who can't prove that they are lawfully in the United States.

Reality: Illegal immigrants do not leave the United States because they cannot get a driver license.

Myth #4: It's easy for state DMVs to determine whether someone is legal or illegal.

Reality: It's difficult even for DHS to tell whether someone is legal or illegal at any given moment. Immigration law is extremely complicated, and immigration status is a moving target. A person can be legal one day and illegal the next; illegal one day and legal the next. DHS often tries to deport US citizens under the mistaken belief that these US citizens are illegal immigrants. If DHS can't figure out whether someone is a citizen or an alien, or whether someone is legal or illegal, how is a state DMV employee going to do so?

Myth #5: Denying driver licenses to illegal immigrants will improve our national security.

Reality: Denying drivers licenses to illegal immigrants will hurt our national security by depriving law enforcement officials of critical information on substantial numbers of adults who are physically present in the United States. Law enforcement officials will be less able to find persons who may be security threats, and will have less information with which to prevent and solve crimes. When a terrorist incident happens, it will be harder afterwards to determine what happened, and when.

* * *

QUESTIONS

1. As discussed above, one provision of the REAL ID Act, section 202(d)(11), allows states to issue drivers' licenses or identification cards that do not comply with the requirements in the Act, but only if the documents are specially color-coded and display warnings that they may not be used for federal identification purposes. If a state offers that option, do you think its undocumented residents are likely to apply for such documents? What would be the strategic considerations for the applicants?

2. How would you expect this law to affect noncitizen terrorists (a) if they are in valid immigration status; and (b) if they are not?

3. Now that you have studied the various immigrant and nonimmigrant statuses, how easy do you think it will be for state DMV employees to decide which drivers' license applicants are in lawful immigration status and, for those who are, the durations of their authorized stays?

D. REDUCING FUTURE FLOW BY CREATING ALTERNATIVES TO ILLEGAL IMMIGRATION

A final set of strategies aims to diminish the incentive for illegal immigration by offering alternatives to illegal immigration. Here we consider three such possibilities: enhancing life opportunities in the source countries through economic development, liberalizing the criteria for permanent immigration to the United States, and adopting a large-scale legal guest worker program.

Many scholars and policymakers believe that, as long as the wage differential between the United States and Mexico remains high, the Mexican economy does not provide adequate employment opportunities for the citizens of Mexico, and the U.S. labor market continues to experience shortages of various kinds, no fortification of law enforcement capabilities within economically and politically plausible limits—and no attempt to enforce employer sanctions—will appreciably diminish illegal immigration. For those who hold this view, the question becomes what mechanisms other than enforcement are available to either prevent or channel the “future flow” of immigrant workers.

One strategy that would reduce the need for illegal immigration would be to support measures that would stimulate the Mexican economy and create jobs. Douglas Massey and Jorge Durand have argued that the integration of Spain and Portugal into the European Union provides a model worth emulating. They contend that substantial investment by the United States in the development of Mexico represents a long-term strategy for reducing illegal immigration. The investment of wealthy Northern European nations in the upgrading of transportation, communication, and other networks of less-well-off European countries ensured a successful European integration and virtually eliminated out-migration from countries such as Spain and Portugal. See Jorge Durand & Douglas Massey, Borderline Sanity, The Am. Prospect (Sept. 23, 2001).

Free trade between the United States and Mexico has long been seen by many as an essential component of this development strategy.⁶² As you saw earlier, NAFTA went into force in 1994. Most observers predicted that reduced farm subsidies in Mexico would cause economic dislocations that, in turn, would spur higher rates of illegal migration to the United States in the short-term. Since the reductions in agricultural subsidies were phased in slowly, that effect was expected to be small. Now that substantial time has elapsed, it remains impossible to isolate cause and effect. In the long term, NAFTA was expected to reduce illegal migration, principally by stimulating the Mexican economy, thereby creating jobs, raising wages, and lessening the incentive to migrate north. 70 IR 1472, 1473 (Nov. 8, 1993). Former INS Commissioner Doris Meissner added that NAFTA might well have been essential to Mexico's continued cooperation with United States border enforcement efforts.⁶³ But the effects of NAFTA, including its environmental and labor protection shortcomings, remain controversial, and the integration of North American markets has yet to reduce the incentive for illegal immigration. Indeed, among the criticisms of NAFTA is that officials in the United States failed to see that the creation of a zone for free trade of goods and capital and the attendant development of transportation networks and other linkages would also lead to "the transnational movement of people." For an excellent discussion of this tension and the relationship of NAFTA to the levels of illegal immigration, see Douglas Massey, Jorge Durand, & Nolan Malone, Beyond Smoke and Mirrors: Mexican Immigration in an Era of Economic Integration 73-104 (2002).

62. See, e.g., Rpt. of the Comm'n for the Study of Int'l Migration and Cooperative Economic Development, Unauthorized Migration: An Economic Development Response (July 1990).

Both an EU-style investment program and a re-evaluation of NAFTA to better promote economic development in Mexico offer, at best, long-term mechanisms of reducing illegal immigration. Other scholars, therefore, focus on devising means of channeling the inevitable future flow of migration legally. Professor Kevin R. Johnson has vigorously advocated a kind of open-borders policy, whereby the immigration system would be oriented toward facilitating immigration and monitoring crossing, rather than toward preventing immigrants from entering. Enforcement resources, he argues, could then be better targeted at real security threats, such as drug trafficking and terrorism. See Kevin R. Johnson, Opening the Floodgates: Why America Needs to Rethink Its Borders and Immigration Laws (2007). Less ambitiously, Professor Stephen Legomsky has urged Congress to loosen the constraints on the family reunification program. See Stephen H. Legomsky, Testimony before the Subcomm. on Immigration, Citizenship, Refugees, Border Security, and International Law, Comm. on the Judiciary, U.S. House of Reps. (Apr. 19, 2007).

Another idea that has gained traction in reform debates in Congress and among immigration law scholars has been the adoption of a large-scale guest worker program that would admit noncitizens, on a temporary basis, to meet the needs of the U.S. labor market. While in office, President Bush advocated a program to "create a legal path for foreign workers to enter our country in an orderly way, for a limited period of time.”⁶⁴ Scholars from the Mexican Migration Project also have been vocal proponents of a temporary worker scheme. Though they suggest increasing the number of permanent visas available for Mexican workers as well, they write:

63. 70 IR at 1474; see also Kevin R. Johnson, Free Trade and Closed Borders: NAFTA and Mexican Immigration to the United States, 27 U.C. Davis L. Rev. 937 (1994); cf. James F. Hollifield & Thomas Osang, Trade and Migration in North America: The Role of NAFTA, 11 Law & Business Rev. of the Americas 327 (2005).

To a great extent, Mexicans seek permanent resident visas because it is the only door left open to them. If another option were available—such as temporary worker visas—more people would opt for it. Evidence of the desire of Mexicans to return home is abundant. Rather than making it more difficult for migrants to come and go, a more enlightened policy would facilitate it by creating a visa that permits Mexicans to enter, live, and work in the United States without restriction for a period of two years. The visa would be renewable once in the lifetime of a migrant, but only after he or she had returned home for at least a year. The visas would be distributed by a binational agency managed by the U.S. and Mexican governments, to which aspiring migrants would apply directly, thus getting employers and middlemen out of the self-serving business of labor recruitment and limiting the possibilities for corruption. To ensure the labor rights of migrants, visas would not be tied to specific employers or jobs but issued directly to the migrants themselves. A work visa tied to a particular job leaves the migrant vulnerable to exploitation.

See Massey, Durand, & Malone, above, at 159.

Professor Jennifer Gordon also advocates a type of guest worker policy, based on a model she terms “transnational labor citizenship.” She writes:

I propose an opening up of the fortress of labor and of the nation-state to accommodate a constant flow of new migrants through a model that would tie immigration status to membership in organizations of transnational workers rather than to a particular employer. These memberships would entitle migrants to services, benefits, and rights that cross borders, just as the workers do. In exchange for the authorization to work that they would receive as members, migrant workers would commit to the core values of labor citizenship: solidarity with other workers in the United States, expressed as a commitment to refuse to work under conditions that violate the law or labor agreements.

See Jennifer Gordon, Transnational Labor Citizenship, 80 Southern Calif. L. Rev. 503, 509 (2007). As Professor Gordon has personally proved, immigrant groups can successfully organize and bargain for rights, even if many in their ranks are undocumented. She herself led a remarkable and highly successful effort to do precisely that. Jennifer Gordon, Suburban 64. See Jim Rutenberg, David S. Cloud, and Carl Hulse, The Immigration Debate: The Overview; President Calls for Compromise on Immigration, N.Y. Times, at A1 (May 16, 2006) (quoting speech by President Bush).

Sweatshops—The Fight for Immigrant Rights, especially chs. 2–5 (2005) (describing the Workplace Project, in Hempstead, New York).⁶⁵

Philosopher Michael Walzer has famously criticized guest worker programs, analogizing guest workers to live-in servants who have been hired to perform tasks rejected as beneath the family they serve. See Michael J. Walzer, Spheres of Justice: A Defense of Pluralism and Equality 60 (1983). He contends that the treatment of immigrants must be governed by principles of justice, which require permitting immigrants to have control over the decision whether to remain in the United States or to leave. Id. His liberal critique of guest worker programs stems from the premise that, though membership is a good that members of an existing society have the right to distribute however they wish (subject only to the limitations imposed by the duties of “mutual aid”), once admitted, immigrants must be treated equally to citizens. “Members must be prepared to accept, as their own equals in a world of shared obligation, the men and women they admit,” he writes, and “immigrants must be prepared to share the obligation.” See id. at 52.

Professor Cristina Rodríguez argues that we should resist the temptation of a large-scale guest worker program, despite its clear appeal as a means of satisfying our labor needs and sending societies’ development needs. She writes:

[A guest worker program] will fail to achieve the short-term objectives supporters claim for it, and it will thwart what should be the long-term goal of our immigration policy—the goal of integration. On the first count, the implicit promise of the guest worker program is that it will satisfy the United States’ labor needs while reducing illegal immigration, thus restoring the rule of law to the system. . . . As studies of guest worker programs consistently reveal, however, though a guest worker program may address labor market demands, it will do so at the risk of compounding the illegal immigration problem and perpetuating the poor treatment of migrant workers. . . .

But second, and more important . . . , in the long term it will compromise our ability to integrate immigrants effectively into the body politic because it will fail to prevent the emergence of a new undocumented population. This insight has not been clearly articulated in the debate over the guest worker idea, but it should be central to the discussion. Important participants in the current immigration debate have emphasized that the United States can no longer do without a meaningful integration policy to complement our immigration control measures. But whether the U.S. should adopt a separate integration policy or not, it is critical that the system of immigrant admissions and controls itself reflect integrationist aspirations. Proposed reforms should be judged in part by whether they will facilitate the incorporation of immigrants and their descendants into American social and civic life.

65. See also Sameer M. Ashar, Public Interest Lawyers and Resistance Movements, 95 California L. Rev. 1879 (2007) (exploring progressive public interest lawyers’ use of resistance movements in the context of globalization and immigrant labor).

Cristina M. Rodríguez, Guest Workers and Integration: Toward a Theory of What Immigrants and Americans Owe One Another, 2007 Univ. Chicago Legal Forum 219, 222–223. She concludes that temporary worker programs thwart the incorporationist objective because they erect obstacles to the two key mechanisms of integration—mobility and reciprocity, or the ability of immigrants to move freely in society and the willingness of society to accept immigrants as long-term stakeholders and thus to adapt to the immigrant presence. Id. at 223.

[Guest worker programs] impose bureaucratic requirements that constrain immigrant mobility in the economy and therefore in society at large. Indeed, guest worker programs historically have compounded immigrant isolation and resulted in serious exploitation, both in the U.S. and in other societies. These restraints are exacerbated by the uncertainty guest workers experience regarding their long-term prospects in the United States. What is more, by treating the immigrant as a temporary fix for the domestic economy's current labor needs, guest worker programs encourage the receiving society to treat immigrants as mere means to an end rather than as potentially permanent members of their communities. . . . Temporary worker programs thus give the receiving society no incentive to adapt to demographic changes or to incorporate immigrants into mainstream institutions.

Id. at 224. Of course, the very point of guest worker programs might be to channel immigration without creating permanent members. But because such programs traditionally fall short of that objective,⁶⁶ they end up channeling migration in ways that threaten to create unintegrated networks and communities of immigrants. In addition, there are serious civil society implications to permitting a population of workers to reside temporarily in the United States without an incentive to promote that society's long-term health or prosperity. See id. at 264–265.

Professor Howard Chang contends that guest worker programs provide a second best solution in a world in which the alternative is exclusion. See Howard F. Chang, Liberal Ideals and Political Feasibility: Guest Worker Programs as Second-Best Politics, 27 N.C. J. Int'l. Law and Commercial Regulation, 465, 469 (2002). The ideal policy for immigrants, and from the perspective of social justice, might be permanent status and access to citizenship—a conclusion Massey, Durand, & Malone, above, contest, at least with respect to the interests of migrants. Id. at 469. But the “optimal

66. Historically, guest worker programs in the United States and elsewhere have grown larger and lasted longer than anticipated, given rise to additional illegal immigration, and resulted in wide-spread labor violations. See Martin Ruhs, Temporary for- eign worker programmes: Policies, adverse consequences, and the need to make them work, 6 Perspectives on Labour Migration 10–15 (2003), available at <http://www.ilo.org/public/english/protection/migrant/download/pom/pom6e.pdf> (last visited March 3, 2009).

policy” from the perspective of natives departs from liberal principles, because “unskilled alien workers are likely to have a net negative fiscal impact if granted ready access” to permanent membership. Id. at 466. As a result, a liberalized guest worker program offers a politically viable option for better channeling migration.

Professor Rodríguez acknowledges that a temporary worker program represents a better alternative than illegal immigration, and possibly also better than exclusion. This political reality makes the question of institutional design crucial. Massey, Durand, and Malone, as well as Gordon and Rodríguez, all argue that guest worker programs, at the very least, must be designed to provide immigrants with mobility. Guest worker visas must be portable from one employer to another. If guest workers are free to move, employers lose the power to exploit them. See also Andrew J. Elmore, Egalitarianism and Exclusion: U.S. Guest Workers Programs and a Non-Subordination Approach to the Labor-Based Admission of Nonprofessional Foreign Nationals, 21 Georgetown Immigration Law Journal 521 (2007) (arguing that, to prevent the subordination of workers, the role of employers in recruitment should be minimized).

Professor Rodríguez also emphasizes that the design of guest worker programs must account for the possibility of migrants’ changed intent. She writes: “Whether migrants set out with the intent to relocate permanently, many migrants develop the intent to remain in the United States Despite the fact that migration always has been cyclical or transnational in nature, sizeable populations of immigrants made up of people who initially possessed temporary intent nonetheless consistently have maintained a semi-permanent residence in the United States. Guest worker programs have remained temporary only when accompanied by harsh enforcement measures.” Rodríguez, above, at 267. See also David A. Martin, What Lures Them Here: Changes to Immigration Law Should Focus Less on the Border and More on the Job, Legal Times 58 (May 29, 2006) (contending that Mexico’s claims that migration is largely circular and the accompanying poll data of migrants might be misleading, particularly in light of the historical track record of temporary worker programs). The best way to acknowledge changed intent, Professor Rodríguez argues, would be to provide at least some workers a clear path to citizenship. This design feature would simultaneously help prevent exploitation by providing guest workers with some long-term security; ensure that legal guest workers do not eventually become undocumented workers; and acknowledge that workers who contribute their labor to American society have a claim to membership.⁶⁷

67. For contemporary documentation of the exploitation of guest workers in the United States, see Southern Poverty Law Center, Close to Slavery: Guest Worker Programs in the United States 5 (2007), available at <http://www.splcenter.org/pdf/static/SPLCguestwork> er.pdf (last visited March 10, 2009). For a historical perspective on the pathologies of guest worker programs in the United States, see Mae Ngai, Impossible Subjects: Illegal Immigrants in the Making of Modern America 127–166 (2004).

QUESTIONS

1. Can the dysfunctions attributed historically to guest worker programs be addressed through institutional design? What can be done to ensure that guest workers return home when their visas expire? Should a path to citizenship be made available to guest workers and under what conditions?
2. Is it a sufficient safeguard against exploitation that employers not be the sponsors of guest worker visas?
3. Will a guest worker program be politically viable? In what form? What constituencies are likely to line up for and against a guest worker program?
4. Will a transnational labor visa reduce illegal immigration and protect the rights of immigrant and citizen workers? Would increasing the availability of permanent resident visas be a better alternative?
5. Is the cost of a so-called second-best solution—a guest worker program—higher in the long-run than accepting the status quo of high levels of illegal immigration?

E. FEDERALISM AND THE REGULATION OF UNDOCUMENTED IMMIGRANTS

Perhaps the most conventional of all wisdom in the field of immigration law is the proposition that immigration regulation is exclusively a federal responsibility. That assumption, however, has never been fully consistent with practice. In 2007, the legislatures of the fifty states considered over 1000 pieces of immigration-related legislation. At least 167 of these bills and resolutions were enacted into law.⁶⁸ In 2008, state legislators introduced over 1300 immigration-related bills, and 41 legislatures passed a total of 206 laws designed to regulate immigrants in various ways.⁶⁹ Since 2006, local governments across the country also have been actively debating similar ordinances and regulations.

This legislative and regulatory activity addresses both legal and illegal immigration and covers an extremely broad range of subject areas. The two largest categories of proposed legislation have been the regulation of employers' hiring of immigrants and enlistment of state and local law enforcement in the policing of immigration.⁷⁰ But many of the measures debated—over 300 of the bills considered in 2007, for example—seek to expand the rights and protections afforded noncitizens. These measures

68. See Laureen Laglagaron, Cristina M. Rodríguez, Alexa Silver, and Sirithon Thanasombat, Regulating Immigration at the State Level, Migration Policy Institute Paper (2008), available at <http://www.migrationpolicy.org/pubs/2007methodology.pdf>.

69. See National Conference of State Legislatures, State Laws Related to Immigrants and Immigration (2008), available at <http://www.ncsl.org/print/immig/immigreportapril2008.pdf>.

70. See Laglagaron, et al., supra note 67, at 2–3.

range from efforts to crack down on human trafficking and exploitation and fraud by immigration service providers, to extending in-state college tuition and other benefits to immigrants, to establishing task forces and regulatory offices to promote the work of immigrant integration.

The activity we have been witnessing in states and localities in recent years has arguably been responsive to several important demographic developments of the last two decades. First, since 1990, immigrants have been arriving in the United States in record numbers. Second, approximately 11–12 million of those immigrants are undocumented. And third, the distribution of migrants differs today from in the past. Though the majority of immigrants remain in the traditional gateway states of California, Texas, New York, Florida, New Jersey, and Illinois, increasingly migrants have settled in the Southeast and other pockets of the country unaccustomed to integrating newcomers.⁷¹ In addition, as Professor Jennifer Gordon has described, immigrants have increasingly moved away from the cosmopolitan city and into the suburbs. She writes:

While this country's manufacturing base has withered, calls have increased for lawns to be mowed, bedrooms to be cleaned, pools and homes to be built, and office park floors to be swabbed.

* * *

Long Island, New York, mother of all suburbs, typifies the trend. Today it is home to over 300,000 Latino immigrants.

Jennifer Gordon, Suburban Sweatshops—The Fight for Immigrant Rights at 1 (2005). The unprecedented scope and distribution of immigration today are ultimately heightening the social, cultural, and economic challenges—as well as opportunities—faced by the local communities where immigrants work and live.

That said, sub-federal immigration regulation is hardly a new phenomenon. In 1994, California voters passed the still infamous Proposition 187, which would have barred undocumented immigrant children from the public schools and denied a broad range of services to undocumented immigrants. As is discussed in detail in this chapter, in the 1970s and 1980s, many states sought to regulate immigrants' access to public benefits and to penalize employers who hired undocumented workers.

Professors Gerald Neuman and Stephen Legomsky have both demonstrated the deep historical roots of this activity, uncovering how states used their police powers to regulate the movement of people across borders in the decades before Congress passed the Chinese Exclusion Acts and began regulating immigration comprehensively in the 1890s. See Gerald L. Neuman, Strangers to the Constitution: Immigrants, Borders, and Fundamen-

71. For a discussion of how immigration has affected these "new immigration" states, see State and Local Immigration Policy Activism in the U.S.: Interdisciplinary Perspectives (Monica Varsanyi, ed., 2009); New Faces in New Places: The Changing Geogra- phy of American Immigration (Douglas Massey, ed., 2008); Immigration's New Frontiers: Experiences from the Emerging Gateway States (Greg Anrig, Jr. & Tova Andrea Wang, eds., 2006).

tal law 23 (1996); Stephen H. Legomsky, Immigration and the Judiciary: Law and Politics in Britain and America 180–83, 189–90 (1987). In this pre-Chinese Exclusion period, the states employed their inspection, quarantine, and taxation laws to indirectly restrict immigrant movement, and some states even expressly prohibited the entry of criminals and free blacks into their territory. See Neuman, supra, at 21–23, 31–37. As you saw in chapter 2, the Supreme Court invalidated some of these state measures as interferences with international commerce. In Chae Chan Ping v. United States, 130 U.S. 581, 9 S.Ct. 623, 32 L.Ed. 1068 (1889), the Supreme Court upheld the Chinese Exclusion Acts and explicitly declared the power to regulate immigration exclusively federal.

In light of the history leading up to Chae Chan Ping, Professors Legomsky and Neuman have both suggested that federal exclusivity in immigration is not inevitable. See Legomsky, Immigration and the Judiciary, above, at 187–92; Gerald L. Neuman, The Lost Century of American Immigration Law (1776–1875), 93 Colum. L. Rev. 1833, 1840 n.34 (1993). Indeed, current events have forced courts and scholars to consider the formal allocation of the power to regulate immigration with renewed precision. Proposition 187 first heightened scholarly interest in immigration federalism, and the activity of recent years has sustained attention to two basic questions: to what extent is state and local immigration regulation constitutional, and to what extent is it a good idea? The constitutional question will be explored in some detail below, but consider the following policy arguments (which in turn shape the constitutional arguments) on either side of the debate.

Most scholars who have written about immigration federalism have focused on whether the federal government or the states are better suited to managing immigration and/or to protecting the rights of immigrants. Professor Peter Spiro, for example, has argued that, in an age where the fifty states frequently take actions that affect foreign relations, states should have far greater latitude to regulate noncitizens than has traditionally been thought to be appropriate. See Peter J. Spiro, The States and Immigration in an Era of Demi-Sovereignities, 35 Virginia J. Internat'l L. 121 (1994); see also Peter J. Spiro, Learning to Live with Immigration Federalism, 29 Connecticut L. Rev. 1627 (1997). He has articulated a steam-valve theory, according to which “states desiring stricter enforcement of immigration laws could pursue that objective without imposing their preference on states in which immigration might be considered a neutral or positive force,” contending also that some states will inevitably be more generous, and some less generous, than the federal government. Spiro, supra, Learning to Live with Immigration Federalism, at 1635–36. Professor Anil Kalhan, discussing state and local participation in immigration enforcement, has observed that “non-U.S. citizens are seeking and in some instances are finding greater receptiveness for the protection of rights and liberties in state capitals and local city halls, rather than in Washington. In this context, the traditional assumptions concerning immigration, citizenship, and federalism may be incomplete.” Anil Kalhan, Immigration Enforcement and Federalism After September 11, 2001, in Immigration, Integration, and Security: America and Europe in Comparative Perspective (Ariane Chebel d'Appollonia & Simon Reich, eds., 2008).

Professor Peter Schuck contends that immigration regulation is not a zero-sum game. He argues that states can play a greater role in immigration enforcement, at least to the extent that their actions "mirror" federal objectives and thus provide the federal government with assistance. See Peter H. Schuck, Taking Immigration Federalism Seriously, 2007 Univ. of Chicago Legal Forum 57. He advocates enlisting states in the enforcement of employer sanctions provisions, as well as in immigration policing.

On the side of the debate skeptical of immigration federalism, Professor Michael Wishnie directly challenges Spiro's steam valve claim, contending that history does not support his account of restrictionist immigration legislation. He further contends that devolving immigration authority to the states would unleash states to violate the equal protection rights of immigrants. He writes:

[D]evolution would erode the antidiscrimination and anticaste principles that are at the heart of our Constitution and that long have protected noncitizens at the subfederal level. The plenary power doctrine of immigration law inevitably shields governmental action from the level of judicial scrutiny that ordinarily would be applied, distorting constitutional jurisprudence and countenancing what otherwise would be invalidated as arbitrary or discriminatory government behavior. Permitting devolution would amplify this distortion, privileging the plenary power doctrine over equal protection norms at the state and local level. Given the choice, one should reject a constitutional theory that endorses the creation of state and local laboratories of bigotry against immigrants.

If devolution were permissible, the corrosive effects of the plenary power doctrine on equality norms would not necessarily be limited to the realm of welfare rules. These same norms generally have invalidated state anti-immigrant employment restrictions, although as with the welfare cases, identical employment classifications have been upheld at the federal level. Devolution of the immigration power might enable Congress by statute to authorize the states to restrict the employment opportunities of legal immigrants, by barring access to public jobs and commercial licenses necessary for private employment. Immigrant access to education, largely a matter of state and local concern, also might be at risk were devolution permissible, as equal protection norms have invalidated state or local restrictions on immigrant access to student financial aid and free primary and secondary education.

Michael J. Wishnie, Laboratories of Bigotry? Devolution of the Immigration Power, Equal Protection, and Federalism, 76 N.Y.U. L. Rev. 493, 554-55, 558 (2001).

Professor Neuman has defended centralized control over immigration on the grounds that "local anti-foreign movements" will be muted at the national level, and that immigrants' interests are more likely to be protected in Washington because of the presence of the foreign affairs establishment. Gerald L. Neuman, Aliens as Outlaws: Government Services, Proposition 187, and the Structure of Equal Protection Doctrine, 42 UCLA L. Rev. 1425, 1436-37 (1995). Professor Michael Olivas has strongly doubted the need for more state regulation of immigrants, arguing that globalization has expanded the international repercussions of immigration policy decisions, thus requiring centralization. He also has likened contemporary state and local ordinances to racially discriminatory state laws of the past. See, e.g., Michael A. Olivas, Immigration-Related State and Local Ordinances: Preemption, Prejudice, and the Proper Role for Enforcement, 2007 Univ. Chicago Legal Forum 27; Michael A. Olivas, Preempting Preemption: Foreign Affairs, State Rights and Alienage Classifications, 35 Virginia J. Internat'l L. 217 (1994).

Professor Cristina Rodríguez contends that the focus on the question of which level of government is either better suited to enforce immigration law or more likely to advance immigrants' rights has been distracting, particularly given the mixed empirical evidence on the latter question. Missing from the debate, she claims, is a "functional account that explains why state and local measures have arisen with increasing frequency over the past five to ten years, and how this reality on the ground should reshape our conceptual and doctrinal understandings of immigration regulation." See Cristina M. Rodríguez, The Significance of the Local in Immigration Regulation, 106 Michigan L. Rev. 567, 571 (2008). Consider her conclusion:

I argue that the federal government, the states, and localities form part of an integrated regulatory structure that helps the country as a whole to absorb immigration flows and manage the social and cultural change that immigration inevitably engenders. The primary function states and localities play in this structure is to integrate immigrants, legal and illegal alike, into the body politic. By demonstrating how states play this role, I establish the simple proposition that immigration regulation should be included in the list of quintessentially state interests, such as education, crime control, and the regulation of health, safety, and welfare, not just because immigration affects each of those interests, but also because managing immigrant movement is itself a state interest.

The federal exclusivity principle, on its surface, is not inconsistent with the proposition that states help immigrants integrate, to be sure. But I demonstrate that the integration challenge sometimes requires states and localities to take steps that resemble immigration controls [by regulating immigrant movement through measures that both repel and attract immigrants]. In fact, the process of immigrant integration sometimes depends on entities like states and localities adopting positions in tension with federal immigration policy, particularly in relation to unlawful immigration. In other words, managing migration writ large de-depends on policy experimentation that sometimes produces contradictory results. The uniformity called for by actors on both sides of the debate is not only difficult to achieve, it is also often counterproductive. Once we see state and local regulation in [this] perspective, it becomes clear that the federal exclusivity principle obscures our structural need for federal, state, and local participation in immigration regulation. Today's realities suggest different structural imperatives—namely the need for subfederal regulation.

Id. at 571–72. For further argumentation that immigration regulations fall within the parameters of the state police power, see Rick Su, A Localist Reading of Local Immigration Regulations, 86 No. Car. L. Rev. 1619 (2008) (justifying local immigration ordinances as concerned with traditional local objectives other than immigration itself); Juliet P. Stumpf, States of Confusion: The Rise of State and Local Power over Immigration, 86 No. Car. L. Rev. 1557 (2008) (arguing that the perceptions of immigration as linked less to foreign affairs and more to traditional state regulatory areas of crime, welfare, and employment have made policymakers and courts more accepting of growing state and local roles).

Of course, even if state and local participation in immigration regulation were desirable, as Professors Spiro and Schuck have argued, it might still be unconstitutional, as Professors Wishnie and Olivas have contended. What exactly constitutes immigration regulation (as distinguished from regulation that simply affects immigrants) will be explored in detail in this section. For now, it is enough to take note of the standard assumption that the authority of states and localities over immigration is constitutionally circumscribed, and to know that a number of scholars have challenged this conventional view. Professor Rodríguez, for example, argues for abandoning the constitutional exclusivity principle, emphasizing that its structural underpinnings have eroded over time, as scholars such as Peter Spiro and Clare Huntington also have shown. Rodríguez, above, at 611–17. Huntington makes a strong case that federal exclusivity is not constitutionally required and that federalism, or a concept of shared federal-state authority, provides a “fine tool for determining the proper allocation of immigration authority among levels of government.” Clare Huntington, The Constitutional Dimension of Immigration Federalism, 61 Vanderbilt L. Rev. 787, 795 (2008) (describing constitutional exclusivity as “structural preemption” and rejecting it even for “pure” immigration laws). Professor Rodríguez also urges that statutory preemption doctrine be narrowed to permit greater latitude for state and local involvement in this area, particularly with respect to integration measures, but even with respect to employer sanctions laws. Rodríguez, above, at 620–28.

At any rate, even if one accepts the general principle of federal constitutional exclusivity in immigration, the questions remain: What makes a law a regulation of immigration, and when does federal statutory law prevent states from acting?

1. THE GENERAL LEGAL FRAMEWORK

Much of the state and local activity cited above, particularly the integration task forces and efforts to prevent human trafficking, fit well within states' traditional regulatory authority. But state and local regulation of employers' hiring of noncitizens and the participation of state and local police in immigration enforcement stand in considerable tension with the principle of exclusive federal control. The Court crystallized the principle in Chae Chan Ping with the declaration that, on immigration and like issues, "the American people are one; and the government which is alone capable of controlling and managing their interests in all these respects is the government of the Union." Chae Chan Ping, 130 U.S. at 604. In 1976, the Supreme Court characterized exclusive federal control over immigration as "about as firmly imbedded in the legislative and judicial tissues of our body politic as any aspect of our government." Galvan v. Press, 347 U.S. 522, 531, 74 S.Ct. 737, 98 L.Ed. 911 (1954). In its strongest formulation, this exclusivity principle now means that "'where the federal government, in the exercise of its superior authority in this field, has enacted a complete scheme of regulation states cannot, inconsistently with the purpose of Congress, conflict or interfere with, curtail or complement, the federal law, or enforce additional or auxiliary regulations.'" Hines v. Davidowitz, 312 U.S. 52, 61 S.Ct. 399, 85 L.Ed. 581 (1941) (striking down a Pennsylvania alien registration statute).

These statements are highly general, and the policing of the line between federal and state authority in the immigration context has been much more complicated than they seem to suggest. Over time, the Supreme Court has evaluated state regulation related to immigration using two frameworks, both of which have been shaped by the federal exclusivity principle. One of those frameworks is alienage jurisprudence, which considers whether state laws that discriminate against noncitizens violate the Equal Protection Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. The other framework reflects federalism concerns. It has two prongs. One is the question of constitutional federal exclusivity discussed above. The other, anchored in the Supremacy Clause, U.S. Const. Art. VI, cl. 2, concerns statutory preemption, according to which state laws that are incompatible with federal statutes are invalid. Within each framework, the Supreme Court has attempted to preserve Congress's exclusive authority to regulate immigration without impairing the states' police power.

In Graham v. Richardson, the Supreme Court sets out the Equal Protection framework and explores the federalism dimension of immigration regulation. As you read the Court's opinion, consider how the Equal Protection and preemption frameworks inter-relate.

Graham v. Richardson

Supreme Court of the United States, 1971.
403 U.S. 365, 91 S.Ct. 1848, 29 L.Ed.2d 534.

■ JUSTICE BLACKMUN delivered the opinion of the Court.

These are welfare cases. They provide yet another aspect of the widening litigation in this area. The issue here is whether the Equal Protection Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment prevents a State from conditioning welfare benefits either (a) upon the beneficiary's possession of United States citizenship, or (b) if the beneficiary is an alien, upon his having resided in this country for a specified number of years. The facts are not in dispute.

I

This [first] case, from Arizona, concerns the State's participation in federal categorical assistance programs. These programs originate with the Social Security Act of 1935. They are supported in part by federal grants-in-aid and are administered by the States under federal guidelines.

* * *

Appellee Carmen Richardson, at the institution of this suit in July 1969, was 64 years of age. She is a lawfully admitted resident alien. She emigrated from Mexico in 1956 and since then has resided continuously in Arizona. She became permanently and totally disabled. She also met all other requirements for eligibility for [state-administered Medicaid benefits] except the 15-year residency specified for aliens by s. 46-233(a)(1). She applied for benefits but was denied relief solely because of the residency provision.

Mrs. Richardson instituted her class action in the District of Arizona against the Commissioner of the State's Department of Public Welfare seeking declaratory relief, an injunction against the enforcement [of the state law, claiming that it violated the Equal Protection Clause and the constitutional right to travel, and that it was preempted by the Social Security Act and by Congress's regulation of aliens.]

* * *

This [second] case, from Pennsylvania, concerns that portion of a general assistance program that is not federally supported. The relevant statute . . . provides that those eligible for assistance shall be (1) needy persons who qualify under the federally supported categorical assistance programs and (2) those other needy persons who are citizens of the United States. Assistance to the latter group is funded wholly by the Commonwealth.

Appellee Elsie Mary Jane Leger is a lawfully admitted resident alien. She was born in Scotland in 1937. She came to this country in 1965 at the age of 28 under contract for domestic service with a family in Havertown. She has resided continuously in Pennsylvania since then and has been a taxpaying resident of the Commonwealth. In 1967 she left her domestic employment to accept more remunerative work in Philadelphia. She entered into a common-law marriage with a United States citizen. In 1969 illness forced both Mrs. Leger and her husband to give up their employment. They applied for public assistance. Each was ineligible under the federal programs. Mr. Leger, however, qualified for aid under the state program. Aid to Mrs. Leger was denied because of her alienage. The monthly grant to Mr. Leger was less than the amount determined by both federal and Pennsylvania authorities as necessary for a minimum standard of living in Philadelphia for a family of two.

* * *

[In each case, a three-judge district court panel ruled that the state law in question violated the Equal Protection Clause. The Supreme Court noted probable jurisdiction in both cases.—Eds.]

* * *

II

The appellants argue initially that the States, consistent with the Equal Protection Clause, may favor United States citizens over aliens in the distribution of welfare benefits. It is said that this distinction involves no ‘invidious discrimination’ . . . for the State is not discriminating with respect to race or nationality.

The Fourteenth Amendment provides, ‘(N)or shall any State deprive any person of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law; nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws.’ It has long been settled, and it is not disputed here, that the term ‘person’ in this context encompasses lawfully admitted resident aliens as well as citizens of the United States and entitles both citizens and aliens to the equal protection of the laws of the State in which they reside. Nor is it disputed that the Arizona and Pennsylvania statutes in question create two classes of needy persons, indistinguishable except with respect to whether they are or are not citizens of this country. Otherwise qualified United States citizens living in Arizona are entitled to federally funded categorical assistance benefits without regard to length of national residency, but aliens must have lived in this country for 15 years in order to qualify for aid. United States citizens living in Pennsylvania, unable to meet the requirements for federally funded benefits, may be eligible for state-supported general assistance, but resident aliens as a class are precluded from that assistance.

Under traditional equal protection principles, a State retains broad discretion to classify as long as its classification has a reasonable basis. This is so in ‘the area of economics and social welfare.’ But the Court’s decisions have established that classifications based on alienage, like those based on nationality or race, are inherently suspect and subject to close judicial scrutiny. Aliens as a class are a prime example of a ‘discrete and insular’ minority for whom such heightened judicial solicitude is appropriate. Accordingly, it was said in Takahashi v. Fish and Game Commission, that ‘the power of a state to apply its laws exclusively to its alien inhabitants as a class is confined within narrow limits.’

Arizona and Pennsylvania seek to justify their restrictions on the eligibility of aliens for public assistance solely on the basis of a State's 'special public interest' in favoring its own citizens over aliens in the distribution of limited resources such as welfare benefits. It is true that this Court on occasion has upheld state statutes that treat citizens and noncitizens differently, the ground for distinction having been that such laws were necessary to protect special interests of the State or its citizens. Thus, in Truax v. Raich (1915), the Court, in striking down an Arizona statute restricting the employment of aliens, emphasized that '(t)he discrimination defined by the act does not pertain to the regulation or distribution of the public domain, or of the common property or resources of the people of the state, the enjoyment of which may be limited to its citizens as against both aliens and the citizens of other states.'

* * *

Takahashi, however, cast doubt on the continuing validity of the special public-interest doctrine in all contexts. There the Court held that California's purported ownership of fish in the ocean off its shores was not such a special public interest as would justify prohibiting aliens from making a living by fishing in those waters while permitting all others to do so. It was said: 'The Fourteenth Amendment and the laws adopted under its authority thus embody a general policy that all persons lawfully in this country shall abide 'in any state' on an equality of legal privileges with all citizens under nondiscriminatory laws.'

Whatever may be the contemporary vitality of the special public-interest doctrine in other contexts after Takahashi, we conclude that a State's desire to preserve limited welfare benefits for its own citizens is inadequate to justify Pennsylvania's making noncitizens ineligible for public assistance, and Arizona's restricting benefits to citizens and longtime resident aliens. First, the special public interest doctrine was heavily grounded on the notion that '(w)hatever is a privilege, rather than a right, may be made dependent upon citizenship.' But this Court now has rejected the concept that constitutional rights turn upon whether a governmental benefit is characterized as a 'right' or as a 'privilege.'

Second, as the Court recognized in Shapiro v. Thompson:

(A) State has a valid interest in preserving the fiscal integrity of its programs. It may legitimately attempt to limit its expenditures, whether for public assistance, public education, or any other program. But a State may not accomplish such a purpose by invidious distinctions between classes of its citizens. The saving of welfare costs cannot justify an otherwise invidious classification.

Since an alien as well as a citizen is a 'person' for equal protection purposes, a concern for fiscal integrity is no more compelling a justification for the questioned classification in these cases than it was in Shapiro.

[The Court then rejects the states' argument that Shapiro does not apply to this case because the right to travel recognized in that case extended only to citizens, emphasizing that the Court had not yet decided that question.—Eds.]

* * *

We agree with the three-judge court in the Pennsylvania case that the ‘justification of limiting expenses is particularly inappropriate and unreasonable when the discriminated class consists of aliens. Aliens like citizens pay taxes and may be called into the armed forces. Unlike the short-term residents in Shapiro, aliens may live within a state for many years, work in the state and contribute to the economic growth of the state.’ There can be no ‘special public interest’ in tax revenues to which aliens have contributed on an equal basis with the residents of the State.

Accordingly, we hold that a state statute that denies welfare benefits to resident aliens and one that denies them to aliens who have not resided in the United States for a specified number of years violate the Equal Protection Clause.

III

An additional reason why the state statutes at issue in these cases do not withstand constitutional scrutiny emerges from the area of federal-state relations. The National Government has ‘broad constitutional powers in determining what aliens shall be admitted to the United States, the period they may remain, regulation of their conduct before naturalization, and the terms and conditions of their naturalization.’ Pursuant to that power, Congress has provided, as part of a comprehensive plan for the regulation of immigration and naturalization, that ‘(a)liens who are paupers professional beggars, or vagrants’ or aliens who ‘are likely at any time to become public charges’ shall be excluded from admission into the United States, and that any alien lawfully admitted shall be deported who ‘has within five years after entry become a public charge from causes not affirmatively shown to have arisen after entry. Admission of aliens likely to become public charges may be conditioned upon the posting of a bond or cash deposit. But Congress has not seen fit to impose any burden or restriction on aliens who become indigent after their entry into the United States. Rather, it has broadly declared: ‘All persons within the jurisdiction of the United States shall have the same right in every State and Territory to the full and equal benefit of all laws and proceedings for the security of persons and property as is enjoyed by white citizens.’ The protection of this statute has been held to extend to aliens as well as to citizens. Moreover, this Court has made it clear that, whatever may be the scope of the constitutional right of interstate travel, aliens lawfully within this country have a right to enter and abide in any State in the Union ‘on an equality of legal privileges with all citizens under nondiscriminatory laws.’

State laws that restrict the eligibility of aliens for welfare benefits merely because of their alienage conflict with these overriding national policies in an area constitutionally entrusted to the Federal Government. And in Takahashi it was said that the States can neither add to nor take from the conditions lawfully imposed by Congress upon admission, naturalization and residence of aliens in the United States or the several states. State laws which impose discriminatory burdens upon the entrance or residence of aliens lawfully within the United States conflict with this constitutionally derived federal power to regulate immigration, and have accordingly been held invalid.

Congress has broadly declared as federal policy that lawfully admitted resident aliens who become public charges for causes arising after their entry are not subject to deportation, and that as long as they are here they are entitled to the full and equal benefit of all state laws for the security of persons and property. The state statutes at issue in the instant cases impose auxiliary burdens upon the entrance or residence of aliens who suffer the distress, after entry, of economic dependency on public assistance. Alien residency requirements for welfare benefits necessarily operate, as did the residency requirements in Shapiro, to discourage entry into or continued residency in the State. Indeed, in No. 727 the parties stipulated that this was so.

In Truax the Court considered the 'reasonableness' of a state restriction on the employment of aliens in terms of its effect on the right of a lawfully admitted alien to live where he chooses:

It must also be said that reasonable classification implies action consistent with the legitimate interests of the state, and it will not be disputed that these cannot be so broadly conceived as to bring them into hostility to exclusive Federal power. The authority to control immigration—to admit or exclude aliens—is vested solely in the Federal Government. The assertion of an authority to deny to aliens the opportunity of earning a livelihood when lawfully admitted to the state would be tantamount to the assertion of the right to deny them entrance and abode, for in ordinary cases they cannot live where they cannot work. And, if such a policy were permissible, the practical result would be that those lawfully admitted to the country under the authority of the acts of Congress, instead of enjoying in a substantial sense and in their full scope the privileges conferred by the admission, would be segregated in such of the states as chose to offer hospitality.

The same is true here, for in the ordinary case an alien, becoming indigent and unable to work, will be unable to live where, because of discriminatory denial of public assistance, he cannot 'secure the necessities of life, including food, clothing and shelter.' State alien residency requirements that either deny welfare benefits to noncitizens or condition them on longtime residency, equate with the assertion of a right, inconsistent with federal policy, to deny entrance and abode. Since such laws encroach upon exclusive federal power, they are constitutionally impermissible.

IV

[The Court rejects Arizona's final claim that its 15-year residency requirement is authorized by a provision of the Social Security Act, which the Court concludes is ambiguous but does not on its face authorize or command states to apply residency requirements. The Court applies the constitutional avoidance canon to interpret the statute as not authorizing the Arizona law.—Eds.]

* * *

Although the Federal Government admittedly has broad constitutional power to determine what aliens shall be admitted to the United States, the period they may remain, and the terms and conditions of their naturalization, Congress does not have the power to authorize the individual States to violate the Equal Protection Clause. Under Art. I, s 8, cl. 4, of the Constitution, Congress' power is to 'establish an uniform Rule of Naturalization.' A congressional enactment construed so as to permit state legislatures to adopt divergent laws on the subject of citizenship requirements for federally supported welfare programs would appear to contravene this explicit constitutional requirement of uniformity.⁷² Since 'statutes should be construed whenever possible so as to uphold their constitutionality,' we conclude that s 1402(b) does not authorize the Arizona 15-year national residency requirement.

* * *

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. In section II of its opinion, the Court declares noncitizens to be the kind of "discrete and insular" minority that triggers strict scrutiny. What might make a minority "discrete and insular," and do you agree that noncitizens as a class qualify?

2. Though the Court treats noncitizens as constituting a suspect class for the purposes of state regulation in Graham, the Court in the same year applies rational basis review to a federal alienage classification. In Mathews v. Diaz, 426 U.S. 67, 84–85, 96 S.Ct. 1883, 48 L.Ed.2d 478 (1976), the Court upholds a federal law that denies noncitizens access to welfare benefits, distinguishing the case from Graham on the ground that "it is the business of the political branches of the Federal government, rather than that of either the States or the Federal Judiciary, to regulate the conditions of entry and residence of aliens." Id. at 84–85. See also City of Chicago v. Shalala, 189 F.3d 598, 603–05 (7th Cir. 1999) (applying rational basis review and upholding Congress's 1996 Welfare Reform Act, which denied noncitizens access to SSI and Food Stamps). Is the Court's justification for applying a more lenient standard of review to the federal government defensible? Are not noncitizens subject to the same disadvantages and disabilities—namely lacking the franchise but being subject to taxation and conscription—before the federal government as they are before the state?

72. [Footnote 14 in original.] We have no occasion to decide whether Congress, in the exercise of the immigration and naturalization power, could itself enact a statute imposing on aliens a uniform nationwide residency requirement as a condition of federally funded welfare benefits.

3. Graham v. Richardson deals with discrimination against lawful immigrants. Does the Court's reasoning apply with equal force to undocumented immigrants? In Plyler v. Doe, discussed above in section C, the Court declines to apply strict scrutiny to classifications of undocumented immigrants but explains its decision only by suggesting that legal status is "relevant." "Relevant" to what and in what ways? Why isn't status as a legally present noncitizen also "relevant?" Would the preemption analysis differ as between the regulation of documented versus undocumented immigrants?

4. In Graham, the Court establishes that: "Although the Federal Government admittedly has broad constitutional power to determine what aliens shall be admitted to the United States, the period they may remain, and the terms and conditions of their naturalization, Congress does not have the power to authorize the individual States to violate the Equal Protection Clause." Is this statement consistent with the Court's later suggestion, in Plyler v. Doe, that had the federal government authorized the Texas state law at issue in that case, the outcome might have been different? 457 U.S. 202, 226, 102 S.Ct. 2382, 72 L.Ed.2d 786 (1982). Does this statement in Graham preclude the federal government from giving states power to deny noncitizens access to Medicaid? To use their state or local police forces to enforce federal immigration law?

In the following case, the Supreme Court directly addresses a state statute targeting illegal immigration, outlining the doctrinal framework for assessing whether federal law preempts state law. The Court unequivocally declares the regulation of immigration to be an exclusive federal responsibility, but this case raises the question of what exactly it means to regulate immigration.

De Canas v. Bica

Supreme Court of the United States, 1976.
424 U.S. 351, 96 S.Ct. 933, 47 L.Ed.2d 43.

■ JUSTICE BRENNAN delivered the opinion of the Court.

California Labor Code Ann. s 2805(a) provides that "(n)o employer shall knowingly employ an alien who is not entitled to lawful residence in the United States if such employment would have an adverse effect on lawful resident workers." The question presented in this case is whether s 2805(a) is unconstitutional either because it is an attempt to regulate immigration and naturalization or because it is pre-empted under the Supremacy Clause, Art. VI, cl. 2, of the Constitution, by the Immigration and Nationality Act (INA), the comprehensive federal statutory scheme for regulation of immigration and naturalization.

Petitioners, who are migrant farmworkers, brought this action pursuant to s. 2805(c) against respondent farm labor contractors in California

Superior Court. The complaint alleged that respondents had refused petitioners continued employment due to a surplus of labor resulting from respondents' knowing employment, in violation of s. 2805(c), of aliens not lawfully admitted to residence in the United States. Petitioners sought reinstatement and a permanent injunction against respondents' willful employment of illegal aliens.

The Superior Court, in an unreported opinion, dismissed the complaint, holding "that Labor Code 2895 is unconstitutional . . . (because) (i)t encroaches upon, and interferes with, a comprehensive regulatory scheme enacted by Congress in the exercise of its exclusive power over immigration . . ." The California Court of Appeal, Second Appellate District, affirmed. The Court of Appeal held that s. 2805(a) is an attempt to regulate the conditions for admission of foreign nationals, and therefore unconstitutional because, "in the area of immigration and naturalization, congressional power is exclusive." The Court of Appeal further indicated that state regulatory power over this subject matter was foreclosed when Congress, "as an incident of national sovereignty," enacted the INA as a comprehensive scheme governing all aspects of immigration and naturalization, including the employment of aliens, and "specifically and intentionally declined to add sanctions on employers to its control mechanism." The Supreme Court of California denied review. We granted certiorari. We reverse.

I

Power to regulate immigration is unquestionably exclusively a federal power. But the Court has never held that every state enactment which in any way deals with aliens is a regulation of immigration and thus per se pre-empted by this constitutional power, whether latent or exercised. For example, Takahashi v. Fish & Game Comm'n (1948) and Graham v. Richardson (1971) cited a line of cases that upheld certain discriminatory state treatment of aliens lawfully within the United States. Although the "doctrinal foundations" of the cited cases, which generally arose under the Equal Protection Clause, "were undermined in Takahashi," they remain authority that, standing alone, the fact that aliens are the subject of a state statute does not render it a regulation of immigration, which is essentially a determination of who should or should not be admitted into the country, and the conditions under which a legal entrant may remain.

Indeed, there would have been no need, in cases such as Graham, Takahashi, or Hines v. Davidowitz, even to discuss the relevant congressional enactments in finding pre-emption of state regulation if all state regulation of aliens was ipso facto regulation of immigration, for the existence vel non of federal regulation is wholly irrelevant if the Constitution of its own force requires pre-emption of such state regulation. In this case, California has sought to strengthen its economy by adopting federal standards in imposing criminal sanctions against state employers who knowingly employ aliens who have no federal right to employment within the country; even if such local regulation has some purely speculative and indirect impact on immigration, it does not thereby become a constitutionally proscribed regulation of immigration that Congress itself would be powerless to authorize or approve. Thus, absent congressional action, s. 2805 would not be an invalid state incursion on federal power.

II

Even when the Constitution does not itself commit exclusive power to regulate a particular field to the Federal Government, there are situations in which state regulation, although harmonious with federal regulation, must nevertheless be invalidated under the Supremacy Clause. As we stated in Florida Lime & Avocado Growers v. Paul (1963):

(F)ederal regulation . . . should not be deemed preemptive of state regulatory power in the absence of persuasive reasons either that the nature of the regulated subject matter permits no other conclusion, or that the Congress has unmistakably so ordained.

In this case, we cannot conclude that pre-emption is required either because "the nature of the . . . subject matter (regulation of employment of illegal aliens) permits no other conclusion," or because "Congress has unmistakably so ordained" that result.

States possess broad authority under their police powers to regulate the employment relationship to protect workers within the State. Child labor laws, minimum and other wage laws, laws affecting occupational health and safety, and workmen's compensation laws are only a few examples. California's attempt in s. 2805(a) to prohibit the knowing employment by California employers of persons not entitled to lawful residence in the United States, let alone to work here, is certainly within the mainstream of such police power regulation. Employment of illegal aliens in times of high unemployment deprives citizens and legally admitted aliens of jobs; acceptance by illegal aliens of jobs on substandard terms as to wages and working conditions can seriously depress wage scales and working conditions of citizens and legally admitted aliens; and employment of illegal aliens under such conditions can diminish the effectiveness of labor unions. These local problems are particularly acute in California in light of the significant influx into that State of illegal aliens from neighboring Mexico. In attempting to protect California's fiscal interests and lawfully resident labor force from the deleterious effects on its economy resulting from the employment of illegal aliens, s. 2805(a) focuses directly upon these essentially local problems and is tailored to combat effectively the perceived evils.

Of course, even state regulation designed to protect vital state interests must give way to paramount federal legislation. But we will not presume that Congress, in enacting the INA, intended to oust state authority to regulate the employment relationship covered by s. 2805(a) in a manner consistent with pertinent federal laws. Only a demonstration that complete ouster of state power including state power to promulgate laws not in conflict with federal laws was "the clear and manifest purpose of Congress" would justify that conclusion. Respondents have not made that demonstration. They fail to point out, and an independent review does not reveal, any specific indication in either the wording or the legislative history of the INA that Congress intended to preclude even harmonious state regulation touching on aliens in general, or the employment of illegal aliens in particular.

Of course, even absent such a manifestation of congressional intent to “occupy the field,” the Supremacy Clause requires the invalidation of any state legislation that burdens or conflicts in any manner with any federal laws or treaties. However, “conflicting law absent repealing or exclusivity provisions, should be pre-empted . . . ‘only to the extent necessary to protect the achievement of the aims of’ ” the federal law, since “the proper approach is to reconcile ‘the operation of both statutory schemes with one another rather than holding (the state scheme) completely ousted.’ ”

Nor can such intent be derived from the scope and detail of the INA. The central concern of the INA is with the terms and conditions of admission to the country and the subsequent treatment of aliens lawfully in the country. The comprehensiveness of the INA scheme for regulation of immigration and naturalization, without more, cannot be said to draw in the employment of illegal aliens as “plainly within . . . (that) central aim of federal regulation.” This conclusion is buttressed by the fact that comprehensiveness of legislation governing entry and stay of aliens was to be expected in light of the nature and complexity of the subject.

* * *

Little aid can be derived from the vague and illusory but often repeated formula that Congress ‘by occupying the field’ has excluded from it all state legislation. Every Act of Congress occupies some field, but we must know the boundaries of that field before we can say that it has precluded a state from the exercise of any power reserved to it by the Constitution. To discover the boundaries we look to the federal statute itself, read in the light of its constitutional setting and its legislative history.”

It is true that a proviso to 8 U.S.C. s. 1324, making it a felony to harbor illegal entrants, provides that “employment (including the usual and normal practices incident to employment) shall not be deemed to constitute harboring.” But this is at best evidence of a peripheral concern with employment of illegal entrants, and [we have] admonished that “due regard for the presuppositions of our embracing federal system, including the principle of diffusion of power not as a matter of doctrinaire localism but as a promoter of democracy, has required us not to find withdrawal from the States of power to regulate where the activity regulated was a merely peripheral concern of the (federal regulation). * * *

Finally, rather than evidence that Congress “has unmistakably . . . ordained” exclusivity of federal regulation in this field, there is evidence in the form of the 1974 amendments to the Farm Labor Contractor Registration Act that Congress intends that States may, to the extent consistent with federal law, regulate the employment of illegal aliens. Section 2044(b) authorizes revocation of the certificate of registration of any farm labor contractor found to have employed "an alien not lawfully admitted for permanent residence, or who has not been authorized by the Attorney General to accept employment." Section 2045(f) prohibits farm labor contractors from employing "an alien not lawfully admitted for permanent residence or who has not been authorized by the Attorney General to accept employment." Of particular significance to our inquiry is the further provision that "(t)his chapter and the provisions contained herein are intended to supplement State action and compliance with this chapter shall not excuse anyone from compliance with appropriate State law and regulation." Although concerned only with agricultural employment, the Farm Labor Contractor Registration Act is thus persuasive evidence that the INA should not be taken as legislation by Congress expressing its judgment to have uniform federal regulations in matters affecting employment of illegal aliens and therefore barring state legislation such as s. 2805(a).

Hines v. Davidowitz, and Pennsylvania v. Nelson (1956), upon which respondents rely, are fully consistent with this conclusion. Hines held that Pennsylvania's Alien Registration Act of 1939 was pre-empted by the federal Alien Registration Act. Nelson held that the Pennsylvania Sedition Act was pre-empted by the federal Smith Act. Although both cases relied on the comprehensiveness of the federal regulatory schemes in finding pre-emptive intent, both federal statutes were in the specific field which the States were attempting to regulate, while here there is no indication that Congress intended to preclude state law in the area of employment regulation. And Nelson stated that even in the face of the general immigration laws, States would have the right "to enforce their sedition laws at times when the Federal Government has not occupied the field and is not protecting the entire country from seditious conduct." Moreover, in neither Hines nor Nelson was there affirmative evidence, as here, that Congress sanctioned concurrent state legislation on the subject covered by the challenged state law. Furthermore, to the extent those cases were based on the predominance of federal interest in the fields of immigration and foreign affairs, there would not appear to be a similar federal interest in a situation in which the state law is fashioned to remedy local problems, and operates only on local employers, and only with respect to individuals whom the Federal Government has already declared cannot work in this country. Finally, the Pennsylvania statutes in Hines and Nelson imposed burdens on aliens lawfully within the country that created conflicts with various federal laws.

III

There remains the question whether, although the INA contemplates some room for state legislation, s. 2805(a) is nevertheless unconstitutional because it "stands as an obstacle to the accomplishment and execution of the full purposes and objectives of Congress" in enacting the INA. We do not think that we can address that inquiry upon the record before us. The Court of Appeal did not reach the question in light of its decision, today reversed, that Congress had completely barred state action in the field of employment of illegal aliens. Accordingly, there are questions of construction of s. 2805(a) to be settled by the California courts before a determination is appropriate whether, as construed, s. 2805(a), “can be enforced without impairing the federal superintendence of the field” covered by the INA.

* * *

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. According to the Court in De Canas, states cannot regulate immigration. State efforts to regulate immigration, the Court seems to be saying, are constitutionally preempted. But the Court also emphasizes that not everything that affects immigrants constitutes a regulation of immigration. “Regulation of immigration” is thus a term of art. What does it mean? In the aftermath of De Canas, how would you define the “regulation of immigration” that is the exclusive responsibility of the federal government?⁷³

2. Preemption arguments of the kind advanced in De Canas have both constitutional and statutory components. The parties challenging the California statute argued that, by enacting comprehensive immigration legislation, Congress had intended to occupy the field, thus preempting states adopting regulations of the kind adopted in California. Ultimately, therefore, the issue was one of statutory interpretation. This preemption argument, which requires a showing of preemptive congressional intent, differs from the federal exclusivity argument also deployed by the Court in De Canas and that you saw in Henderson, Chy Lung, and other early cases in chapter 2, § A.4 above. In those cases, you might recall, state action in the field of immigration was held unconstitutional even though Congress had not acted. The Constitution itself—not an Act of Congress—prohibited state regulation of immigration. For an excellent preemption typology, see Huntington, above, at 808–25. Scholars have observed that even though the Court repeatedly invokes federal exclusivity, the Court’s modern holdings in immigration federalism cases all turn on statutory preemption. See Rodríguez, note 73 above, at 620 (observing that “federal exclusivity is more bark than bite”). Why do you think the Court’s practice has evolved this way over time?

3. A district court in Virginia, evaluating the state’s decision to deny undocumented immigrants admission to its public colleges and universities, considered what constitutes a regulation of immigration. The Court held that, after De Canas, the question under the first preemption test is “whether defendants’ * * * policies simply adopt federal standards, in which case they are not invalid under the Supremacy Clause, or instead create and apply state standards to assess the immigration status of applicants, in which case the policies may run afoul of the Supremacy Clause." Equal Access Educ. v. Merten, 305 F. Supp. 2d 585, 601, 607 (E.D. Va. 2004); accord League of United Latin American Citizens v. Wilson, 908 F.Supp. 755, 772 (C.D. Cal. 1995) [LULAC] (finding that because California's Proposition 187 creates its own scheme for who is and who is not entitled to be in the United States, it is preempted). The court in Merten ultimately concluded that Congress had not ousted states' authority to deny undocumented immigrants admission to public colleges and universities; Congress's silence on the matter made it clear that "Congress has left the states to decide for themselves whether or not to admit illegal aliens into their public post-secondary institutions." Merten, 205 F.Supp. at 607. The same question of what constitutes a regulation of immigration has surfaced in cases involving state and local employer licensing laws and regulation of landlords, both of which are discussed in detail below.

73. For an argument that it is conceptually difficult, if not impossible, to distinguish between laws that regulate immigration, defined as the movement of people across domestic and international borders, and laws that have the effect of regulating immigrants but are not immigration laws, per se, see Rodríguez, The Significance of the Local, above, at 618–20. See also Linda S. Bosniak, Immigrants, Preemption and Equality, 35 Virginia J. Internat’l L. 179 (1994); Adam B. Cox, Immigration Law’s Organizing Principles, 157 Univ. Penn. L. Rev. 1101 (2008); Hiroshi Motomura, Immigration and Alienage, Federalism and Proposition 187, 35 Va. J. Int’l L. 201, 203 (1994).

4. The Court in De Canas remanded the case on the conflict preemption question. In what ways might the state statute have interfered with then existing federal law?

5. De Canas was decided before Congress enacted IRCA and the scheme of employer sanctions, discussed above in section B. What remains of De Canas post-IRCA? IRCA contains a clause explicitly preempting state authority to sanction employers, and so the specific California law at issue in De Canas clearly was preempted by IRCA. But does the passage of IRCA preempt all state regulation of the employment of noncitizens? Does the case for "conflict" or "obstacle" preemption become stronger in light of IRCA? These questions are considered in more detail below in relation to some recently enacted state laws that would revoke the business licenses of companies that hire unauthorized workers.

6. In Toll v. Moreno, 458 U.S. 1, 102 S.Ct. 2977, 73 L.Ed.2d 563 (1982), the Supreme Court considered a Maryland state law that denied in-state college tuition benefits to children of holders of G-4 (employees of international organizations) nonimmigrant visas. The Court held that the state law was preempted, reasoning that it frustrated federal policies embodied in the special tax exemptions afforded G-4 aliens by various treaties, international agreements, and federal statutes. In so doing, the Court underscored its conclusion in De Canas that states have no power to add or take away "from the conditions lawfully imposed by Congress upon admission, naturalization and residence of aliens in the United States or the several states," and that "[s]tate laws which imposed discriminatory burdens upon the entrance or residence of aliens lawfully within the United States conflict with this constitutionally derived federal power to regulate immigration." Toll, 458 U.S., at 11. Is the Court suggesting that state laws that affect immigrants in some way might be invalid, even if they do not directly conflict with or frustrate federal policy? Does this dictum mean that states cannot treat immigrants more favorably than the federal government by extending benefits that the federal government does not?

7. In Toll, the Court also emphasized its observation in De Canas that evidence existed, “in the form of the Farm Labor Contractor Registration Act,” that Congress intended for states to be able to regulate, consistent with federal law, “the employment of illegal aliens.” The Court in Toll thus suggested that it had rejected the preemption challenge in De Canas, not because of the absence of congressional intent to preempt, but because of this affirmative evidence of congressional intent not to preempt. Does Toll thus narrow De Canas by expanding the reach of immigration preemption? Consider the relationship between these two cases as you study the preemption jurisprudence developing in the lower courts, discussed immediately below.

2. STATE REGULATION OF EMPLOYERS AND LANDLORDS

The state and local laws that require employers, recipients of government contracts, and landlords to verify the legal status of potential employees or renters have been litigated nationwide. As De Canas v. Bica underscores, state governments have a history of invoking their police powers to penalize employers who hire unauthorized workers. Indeed, when Congress enacted IRCA in 1986, twelve states had laws on their books that imposed fines on such employers.⁷⁴ The landlord provisions, however, represent novel efforts in the history of sub-federal immigration-related legislation and have been enacted almost entirely at the local level. This subsection discusses each of these types of laws in turn.

Since 2006, states such as Arizona, Colorado, Georgia, Oklahoma, and Mississippi have passed laws regulating employers in order to crack down on illegal immigration.⁷⁵ Their precise terms vary from state to state, and the application of preemption principles to each of these laws will depend on some of these details. But the employment measures all contain one or more of three key features: (1) a declaration that it is unlawful to knowingly recruit or hire an undocumented worker; (2) a requirement that city or state agencies and/or employers doing business in the state participate in the federal E-Verify program, discussed in section B above; and (3) authorization of a city or state official to suspend or revoke an employer’s license to do business in the state upon a finding that the employer has violated the prohibition on hiring undocumented workers.

When Congress enacted IRCA in 1986, it appears to have been well aware of the state employer sanctions laws then on the books. As noted above, IRCA contains an express preemption clause that reads: “the provisions of this section preempt any State or local law imposing civil or criminal sanctions (other than through licensing and similar laws) upon

74. For a list of these laws, see Cristina M. Rodriguez, Muzzaffar Chishti, and Kimberly Nortman, Testing the Limits: A Framework for Assessing the Legality of State and Local Immigration Measures, Migration Policy Institute Paper 11 n. 46 (2007), available at www.migrationpolicy.org/pubs/NCIIP_As sessing% 20the% 20Legality% 20of% 20State% 20and% 20Local% 20Immigration% 20Measures121307.pdf.

75. For a detailed list and description of the various employment laws, see id. at 8–20.

those who employ, or recruit or refer for a fee for employment, unauthorized aliens.” INA § 274A(h)(2). This provision might seem straightforward at first glance, but what exactly constitutes a sanction? The civil and criminal fines imposed by states like California pre-IRCA are clearly sanctions, but what about provisions that require recipients of state and local contracts to attest that they do not hire unauthorized workers? May states require employers to participate in the federal E-Verify program? At least one court has explicitly found that IRCA’s express preemption clause applies only to civil fines and criminal sanctions imposed by state law. See Balbuena v. IDR Realty, L.L.C., 845 N.E.2d 1246, 1256 (N.Y. Ct. App. 2006).

Even less apparent than the full meaning of the term “sanction,” however, is the scope of IRCA’s so-called “savings” clause, “other than through licensing or similar laws.” What does this mean? Most of the states that have passed laws requiring employers to verify the legal status of their workers have sought to rely on this savings clause; instead of imposing monetary or criminal sanctions on employers who hire undocumented workers, laws such as Arizona’s threaten to rescind an employer’s license to do business in the state if the employer violates the hiring prohibition. Is this sort of regulation what Congress had in mind when it authorized the use of licensing and similar laws to regulate employers?

In Chicanos por la Causa v. Napolitano, 544 F.3d 976 (9th Cir. 2008), the Ninth Circuit held that the Arizona licensing provision falls within IRCA’s savings clause. The Court begins its analysis by noting that it will apply a presumption against preemption, because the Arizona law regulates in an area of traditional state activity. The court finds this conclusion supported by De Canas, which it contends remains applicable even after the enactment of IRCA. Id. at 983. The court then rejects appellants’ argument that the term “licensing” applies only to professional licenses, such as the license to practice medicine or law. The court finds instead that the state’s broad definition of license is consistent with the traditional or ordinary meaning of the term. Id. at 984–85.

As the following case demonstrates, not all courts agree.

Lozano v. City of Hazleton

Middle District of Pennsylvania, 2007.
496 F. Supp.2d 477.

■ JUDGE MUNLEY delivered the opinion of the court.

This case addresses Defendant City of Hazleton’s authority to enact ordinances that regulate the presence and employment of illegal aliens.

* * *

Background including findings of fact

Defendant City of Hazleton is located in Luzerne County in northeastern Pennsylvania. The city’s executive is a mayor and the city’s legislature is a city council. Under Pennsylvania law, Hazleton is a City of the Third Class and operates under an Optional Plan B form of government.

At the time of the 2000 census, Hazleton's population was 23,000. Since 2000, Hazleton's population has increased sharply, and now has an estimated 30,000 to 33,000 residents.

The increase in Hazleton's population can be explained largely by a recent influx of immigrants, most of whom are Latino. After the September 11, 2001 terrorist attacks, many Latino families moved from New York and New Jersey to Hazleton seeking a better life, employment and affordable housing. Those moving to Hazleton included United States citizens, lawful permanent residents and undocumented immigrants.

The number of undocumented immigrants in Hazleton is unknown. Immigrants, both legal and undocumented, support the local economy through consumer spending, paying rent and paying sales taxes.

Beginning on July 13, 2006, the City of Hazleton enacted numerous ordinances aimed at combating what the city viewed as the problems created by the presence of "illegal aliens."

* * *

[The City ordinance in question (IIRA)] defines "illegal alien" as an "alien who is not lawfully present in the United States, according to the terms of [the INA]. The INA provides no definition for the term "illegal alien" or the term "lawfully present."

[The court here provides a detailed account of legal status under federal law, a description of the procedural posture of the case, extensive discussion of its holding that all plaintiffs, including landlords, business owners, and potential tenants, had standing, and a holding giving permission for certain plaintiffs to proceed anonymously.—Eds.]

* * *

Federal Pre-emption

Plaintiffs' Amended Complaint asserts that Hazleton's ordinances violate the Supremacy Clause of the United States Constitution, which provides that federal law is the supreme law of the land. In particular, the Constitution provides:

This Constitution, and the Laws of the United States which shall be made in Pursuance thereof; and all Treaties made, or which shall be made, under the Authority of the United States, shall be the supreme Law of the Land . . . anything in the Constitution or Laws of any State to the Contrary notwithstanding.

U.S. CONST. art. VI, cl. 2.

Accordingly, "[t]he Supremacy clause of the United States Constitution invalidates state laws that 'interfere with or are contrary to' federal law." This invalidation is termed federal pre-emption. Federal preemption can be either express or implied. We will discuss each in turn. As the ordinances at issue have two distinct provisions, one directed to employment issues and one aimed at landlord/tenant issues, we will discuss each topic separately with regard to pre-emption beginning with the employment provisions.⁷⁶

1. Employment provisions of IIRA

a. Express pre-emption

Initially, plaintiffs assert that the federal law expressly pre-empts IIRA. Under federal law, "Congress can define explicitly the extent to which its enactments pre-empt state law." Preemption is "express" when a statute explicitly commands that state law be displaced.

Plaintiffs assert that [IRCA], which deals with the employment of unauthorized aliens, contains an express pre-emption clause that pre-empts the employer portions of IIRA. Defendant argues that IIRA does not fall within IRCA's express pre-emption clause. After a careful review, we agree with the plaintiffs that IIRA's employment provisions are expressly pre-empted.

IRCA is a "comprehensive scheme" that prohibits the employment of unauthorized workers in the United States. "IRCA 'forcefully' made combating the employment of illegal aliens central to '[t]he policy of immigration law.'"

The law prohibits the employment of aliens who are 1) not lawfully present in the United States; and 2) not lawfully authorized to work in the United States. In order to prevent the employment of unauthorized workers, IRCA requires that employers verify the identity and eligibility for work of all new hires. This verification is accomplished with the employer's review of specified documents. An employer cannot hire an alien who is unable to present proper documentation.

Under IRCA, where an employer unknowingly hires an unauthorized alien or if an employee becomes unauthorized, the employer must discharge the employee when his status becomes known. Violations of IRCA by employers is punishable by civil fines and criminal prosecution. Prospective employees are subject to criminal prosecutions and fines for providing fraudulent documents.

⁷⁶. [Footnote 41 in original.] Defendant contends that we should apply a presumption that the Congress does not intend to supersede state law. In support of this proposition, defendant cites Medtronic, Inc. v. Lohr (1996). Medtronic does set forth such a presumption; however, it also states that this presumption applies "particularly . . . in a field which the States have traditionally occupied." The presumption is inapplicable "when the State regulates in an area where there has been a history of significant federal presence." Immigration is an area of the law where there is a history of significant federal presence and where the States have not traditionally occupied the field. In fact, as set forth more fully below, immigration is a federal concern not a state or local matter. Therefore, we do not apply the presumption against pre-emption. If, however, we were to apply the presumption, our ultimate conclusion would not change as Congress has made it sufficiently clear and manifest that federal law pre-empts state law in the area covered by Hazleton's ordinances.

IRCA contains an express pre-emption clause that pre-empts State or local laws dealing with the employment of unauthorized aliens. The pre-emption clause provides: "The provisions of this section preempt any State or local law imposing civil or criminal sanctions (other than through licensing and similar laws) upon those who employ, or recruit or refer for a fee for employment, unauthorized aliens."

* * *

According to Hazleton, it has "eschewed the imposition of criminal or civil penalties and has instead taken those actions expressly permitted by Congress." Instead of criminal and civil sanctions, IIRA penalizes a business for employing an unauthorized alien by suspending its business permit. Such a business permit suspension amounts to "licensing and similar laws" as provided by the IRCA preemption section according to the defendant. * * *

We reject Hazleton's interpretation of the express pre-emption provision. Under Hazleton's interpretation of the provision, a state or local municipality properly can impose any rule they choose on employers with regard to hiring illegal aliens as long as the sanction imposed is to force the employer out of business by suspending its business permit—what we could call the "ultimate sanction." This interpretation is at odds with the plain language of the express pre-emption provision, which is concerned with state and local municipalities creating civil and criminal sanctions against employers. It would not make sense for Congress in limiting the state's authority to allow states and municipalities the opportunity to provide the ultimate sanction, but no lesser penalty. Such an interpretation renders the express preemption clause nearly meaningless.

In addition to being counterintuitive to the plain language of the provision, Hazleton's interpretation is contrary to its legislative history. In House Report No. 99-682(I), the United States Congress provides its interpretation of the type of "licensing" permitted under the statute. The "licensing" that the statute discusses refers to revoking a local license for a violation of the federal IRCA sanction provisions, as opposed to revoking a business license for violation of local laws.

The Report authored by the House Committee on the Judiciary states:

The penalties contained in this legislation are intended to specifically preempt any state or local laws providing civil fines and/or criminal sanctions on the hiring, recruitment or referral of undocumented aliens. They are not intended to preempt or prevent lawful state or local processes concerning the suspension, revocation or refusal to reissue a license to any person who has been found to have violated the sanctions provisions in this legislation. Further, the Committee does not intend to preempt licensing or "fitness to do business laws," such as state farm labor contractor laws or forestry laws, which specifically require such licensee or contractor to refrain from hiring, recruiting or referring undocumented aliens.

Therefore, the express pre-emption clause applies generally, except for state or local laws dealing with “suspension, revocation or refusal to reissue a license” to an entity found to have violated the sanction provisions of IRCA.

In the instant case, Hazleton suspends the business permit of those who violate its Ordinance, not those who violate IRCA. Thus, the licensing exception to State and local pre-emption is not applicable.

The other express pre-emption exception is for “fitness to do business laws” such as state farm labor contractor laws or forestry laws. Hazleton’s ordinances are not “fitness to do business laws such as state farm labor contractor laws or forestry laws.” Fitness to do business laws generally deal with a person’s character as it relates to his or her ability to be engaged in a certain business activity. An example of such a law is the California statute describing the prerequisites for issuance or renewal of a farm labor contractor license. This statute requires that those seeking such a license must, inter alia: provide a statement that they possess the character, competency and responsibility to conduct the operations of the business; provide a bond based upon the amount of their payroll; take part in certain training; and not be found in violation of certain laws and regulations. By way of comparison, IIRA is aimed at preventing employers from hiring undocumented aliens. Thus, they are not fitness to do business laws. Therefore, this exception to pre-emption does not apply.

[The court also finds that the IIRA’s creation of a cause of action for discharged employees constitutes a sanction that falls within the express preemption clause.—Eds.]

* * *

b. Implied pre-emption

Although we find IIRA is expressly preempted, for purposes of completeness we will also discuss implied pre-emption. * * * Implied pre-emption can be found where the scope of the federal law at issue “indicates that Congress intended federal law to occupy the field exclusively” or where state or local laws conflict with federal laws. Implied pre-emption thus includes two separate concepts, field preemption and conflict preemption. We will discuss each.

i. Field pre-emption

Field pre-emption occurs where Congress has occupied a given subject area to the preclusion of State or local laws. Where field preemption is present “the subject matter of the federal and local laws is such that the two laws or regulatory schemes must inherently either conflict or be duplicative”. That is, under this test it is impossible to have local regulation in the subject area that does not conflict with or duplicate federal regulation. Field preemption exists where the federal regulatory scheme is “so pervasive as to make reasonable the inference that Congress left no room for the States to supplement it.” Field pre-emption is present where 1) “the pervasiveness of the federal regulation precludes supplementation by the States"; 2) "the federal interest in the field is sufficiently dominant" or 3) "the object sought to be obtained by the federal law and the character of obligations imposed by it reveal the same purpose."

In the instant case, the first two of these situations are met, and we shall discuss them separately.

aa. Federal interest in the field

The first factor we will consider is the dominance of the federal interest in the field of immigration. The history of federal regulation of immigration is one of the creation of an intricate and complex bureaucracy that restricted who could immigrate to the United States and under what terms. Those immigration regulations have also come to define the conditions under which aliens can find employment in the country. The creation of this complex federal bureaucracy not only altered the role of the federal government in relation to immigration. It also transformed the status of immigrants in American society. A foreign-born person in the United States in 1870 had a presumptively legal status; no careful legal inquiry was required to determine whether that person had a right to reside in the country. By 1990, however, determining whether a foreign-born person enjoyed a legal right to remain in the United States demanded a detailed legal examination that involved numerous federal status, several adjudicatory bodies, and a number of appeals and exceptions. More than one hundred years of federal regulation have made the federal supremacy over immigration an intricate affair. We provide here a general summary of the nature of federal immigration regulation since the first such regulation appeared at the end of the nineteenth century. * * *

The federal government possesses an especially strong interest in immigration matters. * * *

Conversely, the individual states, or municipalities located in those states, do not have a strong interest in immigration. The Supreme Court has explained that "[t]he States enjoy no power with respect to the classification of aliens".

Bearing in mind the interests of the local government versus the federal government in the areas of immigration, we proceed to our analysis of whether the federal government has pervasively regulated this field.

bb. Pervasiveness of regulations

The second factor we consider is the pervasiveness of the federal regulations. Congress has occupied the field of employment of unauthorized aliens with IRCA. The Supreme Court has noted that IRCA is "a comprehensive scheme prohibiting the employment of illegal aliens in the United States."

* * *

IRCA occupies the field to the exclusion of State or local laws regarding employers hiring, employing, recruiting or referring for a fee for employment unauthorized aliens. Congress has indicated that one of the central features of federal immigration policy is controlling the employment of unauthorized workers. IRCA provides for the prohibition of employing unauthorized workers and explains the manner in which an employer may be found liable for violating the statute and also how the employer can seek review of adverse decisions. * * *

Thus, IRCA is a comprehensive scheme. It leaves no room for state regulation. As explained more fully below, where we discuss conflict pre-emption, any additions added by local governments would be either in conflict with the law or a duplication of its terms—the very definition of field pre-emption.

Accordingly, we conclude that the Ordinance as it applies to employers is field pre-empted. Immigration is a national issue. The United States Congress has provided complete and thorough regulations with regard to the employment of unauthorized aliens including anti-immigration discrimination provisions. Allowing States or local governments to legislate with regard to the employment of unauthorized aliens would interfere with Congressional objectives.

The case that defendant primarily relies upon as controlling precedent is De Canas v. Bica. De Canas addressed a California statute that provided “(n)o employer shall knowingly employ an alien who is not entitled to lawful residence in the United States if such employment would have an adverse effect on lawful resident workers.”

The Supreme Court disagreed with the California courts [which found the statute preempted]. It concluded that the “[p]ower to regulate immigration is unquestionably exclusively a federal power.” The Court explained, however, that just because a statute touches upon immigration, does not make it an impermissible regulation of immigration. Not “every state enactment which in any way deals with aliens is a regulation of immigration and thus per se pre-empted.” A “regulation of immigration . . . is essentially a determination of who should or should not be admitted into the country, and the conditions under which a legal entrant may remain.”

* * *

Since, De Canas, however, Congress has passed IRCA. Instead of employment being only addressed in a proviso to one section of the INA, a complete statutory scheme has now been enacted that addresses the employment of unauthorized workers. Therefore, defendant’s reliance on De Canas is misplaced.

ii. Conflict pre-emption

The final form of pre-emption is conflict pre-emption. Conflict pre-emption exists where either (1) the state law “stands as an obstacle to the accomplishment and execution of the full purposes and objectives of Congress” or (2) it is “impossible for a . . . party to comply with both state and federal law.”

IIRA and IRCA have similar purposes in that both address the employment of unauthorized aliens. For example, IRCA makes it unlawful “to hire, or to recruit or refer for a fee for employment in the United States an alien knowing the alien is an unauthorized alien (as defined in subsection (h)(3)) with respect to such employment” or to hire for employment an individual without first complying with the act’s verification requirements.

Likewise, IIRA provides: “It is unlawful for any business entity to recruit, hire for employment, or continue to employ, or to permit, dispatch, or instruct any person who is an unlawful worker to perform work in whole or part within the City [of Hazleton].”

Although the federal and local laws have a similar goal, the means to reach that goal are different. Under federal law, to establish that they are not hiring unauthorized workers, employers can utilize the I-9 Employment Eligibility Verification Form. In addition to completing this form prospective employees must present documents to establish both their identity and their employment eligibility. The employer must examine these documents to determine if they reasonably appear on their face to be genuine.

Under the Hazleton Ordinance, an employer must collect from the employee “identification papers” and provide them to the Hazleton Code Enforcement Office. The Code Enforcement Office then verifies with the federal government whether the employee is an unauthorized worker. The primary conflict in this area is that under federal law, the employer has the responsibility to review the documents, and in the Hazleton Ordinance, the employer is required to present the documents to the Code Enforcement Office, which contacts the federal government to determine the status of the worker. The Hazleton Ordinance, therefore, supplements the requirements of federal law.

IIRA also conflicts with federal law in that under federal law, employers need not verify the immigrant status of certain categories of workers. For example, casual domestic workers and independent contractors are not covered by the federal requirements. IIRA contains no such exclusions.

* * *

IIRA also conflicts with IRCA in its treatment of the Basic Pilot Program [now called E-Verify—Eds.]. “The Basic Pilot Program is a voluntary, experimental program created by Congress to permit employers to electronically verify workers’ employment eligibility with the U.S. Dep. Of Homeland Security and the Social Security Administration.” Under federal law, participation in the Basic Pilot Program is not mandatory. Under IIRA, participation in the Basic Pilot Program is at times mandatory. * * *

Another conflict exists in the time frames utilized by each enactment. Under IRCA, an employee can contest a nonconformance (that is an initial finding that he is unauthorized to work) by the Basic Pilot Program within eight (8) days. The Social Security Administration and federal immigration officials have ten (10) federal work days to respond. The employer may not terminate the employee or take other adverse action against him based upon his employment eligibility status during this time period. Under IIRA, no appeal right is provided to the employee, and in fact, the employer must terminate the employee within three (3) business days. Thus, in direct conflict with IRCA, Hazleton seeks to force an employer to terminate an employee where under federal law the employer is prohibited from terminating that employee. Additionally, under the Hazleton Ordinance, the only appeal right appears to be held by the employer who may toll the three (3) day termination period. Without providing any appeal rights to the employee, IIRA is in conflict with the federal law.

* * *

[I]n the instant case, although it appears that the goals of the two laws may be similar, a different balance between the rights of businesses and workers and the goal of preventing illegal employment is struck and IIRA ultimately ignores one of IRCA's main objectives.

* * *

IRCA and IIRA share a similar purpose: to prevent the employment of persons not authorized to work in the United State while not overburdening the employer in determining whether an employee or perspective employee is an authorized worker. The two laws, however, strike a different balance between these interests. The laws, therefore, conflict.

IRCA also seeks to prevent discrimination against legally admitted immigrants. The law makes it an unfair immigration-related employment practice to discriminate against a person with respect to hiring, recruitment or referral for a fee because of a person's national origin or because of an individual's citizenship status. IIRA has no anti-discriminatory provisions, and this omission represents another conflict.

* * *

Defendant seems to argue that the law is constitutional because it is aimed at illegal aliens who have no right to be in the United States. Defendant's position fails to acknowledge that the law will affect more than illegal aliens. It will affect every employer, every employee who is challenged as an illegal alien and every prospective employee especially those who look or act as if they are foreign. As noted above, the Ordinance, unlike its superior federal counterpart, contains no antidiscrimination provisions.

* * *

In conclusion, the employment provisions of IIRA differ from and conflict with IRCA. It is thus in violation of the Supremacy Clause of the United States Constitution.

2. Tenancy provisions

The Hazleton ordinances contain two sets of provisions affecting tenancy in the city. The first is a "harboring" provision of the IIRA that prohibits the housing of certain aliens. The second is the Tenant Registration Ordinance, (hereinafter "RO"), which requires all occupants of rental units to obtain an occupancy permit. In order to receive such a permit, an applicant must provide "proof of legal citizenship and/or residency." We will discuss the provisions of these two laws separately and then analyze the pre-emption arguments.

a. Housing illegal aliens

Plaintiffs assert that the "harboring" portion of IIRA is conflict preempted because it is directly at odds with the federal immigration system. It prohibits landlords from "harboring" "illegal aliens." "Harboring" is defined as letting, leasing or renting a dwelling unit to an illegal alien or permitting the occupancy of a dwelling unit by an "illegal alien" knowingly or in reckless disregard of the fact that the alien has come to, entered or remains in the United States in violation of the law.

Generally, IIRA provides a complaint procedure where a Hazleton official, business entity or resident can file a written complaint that a landlord is harboring an "illegal alien." The Code Enforcement Office next obtains "identity data" from the owner regarding the tenant. The Code Enforcement Office then consults with the federal government to determine the tenant's immigration status. If the verification reveals that the owner is in violation of the harboring provisions, he must correct the violation or face fines and suspension of his rental license.

* * *

b. Tenant registration ordinance

The second housing provision at issue, RO, requires, inter alia, that each person who seeks to occupy a rental dwelling obtain an "occupancy permit" from Hazleton. In order to obtain a permit, a potential tenant must supply to the Code Enforcement Office "proper identification showing proof of legal citizenship and/or residency." A landlord is prohibited from allowing occupancy of a rental unit unless all the occupants have obtained an occupancy permit.

If a landlord allows a tenant who does not have an occupancy permit to occupy a rental unit he faces a $1,000.00 fine "for each Occupant that does not have an occupancy permit and $100 per Occupant per day for each day that the Owner or Agent continues to allow each such Occupant to occupy the Rental Unit without an occupancy permit after Owner or Agent is given notice of such violation."

If a tenant has an occupancy permit, but he allows other occupants to reside at the premises who do not have permits, he is in violation of the ordinance and faces the same $1,000.00/$100 per occupant per day fine.

* * *

Plaintiffs assert that the IIRA and RO are in direct conflict with federal law because they are based upon the assumption that: 1) the federal government seeks the removal of all aliens who lack legal status and 2) "a conclusive determination by the federal government that an individual may not remain in the United States can somehow be obtained outside of a formal removal hearing." After a careful review, we agree.

Initially, we note that it is completely within the discretion of the federal officials to remove persons from the country who are removable. Indeed, the federal government permits several categories of persons who may not be technically lawfully present in the United States to work and presumably live here.⁷⁷ For example, the following can receive permission from the federal government to work in the United States: 1) aliens who have completed an application for asylum or withholding of removal; 2) aliens who have filed an application for adjustment of status to lawful permanent resident; 3) aliens who have filed an application for suspension of deportation; 4) aliens paroled into the United States temporarily for emergency reasons or reasons deemed strictly in the public interest; 5) aliens who are granted deferred action "an act of administrative convenience to the government which gives some cases lower priority." Additionally, aliens who have a final order of deportation against them but are released on an order of supervision may obtain permission to work. In addition, aliens who have final orders of removal against them may be ordered released from detention by the courts if there is no likelihood of their removal in the foreseeable future. Although these aliens are permitted to work and implicitly to remain in the United States, they would be denied housing in Hazleton under the IIRA and RO. The ordinances thus conflict with federal law.

Furthermore, changing status from authorized to unauthorized [sic] is complex. For example, some individuals can affirmatively apply for regularization of status. In other instances, regularization of status is only available after an individual has been placed in removal proceedings by the federal government (even if the operative facts justifying relief predate the commencement of the removal hearing). It may take months or years for an applicant to adjust status, obtain relief or otherwise regularize status. Submitting an application does not change an individual's immigration status, even if the application is bona fide and will ultimately be approved. A person who is proceeding through the procedure to adjust his immigration status but who currently lacks immigration status frequently will not have any documents to indicate whether he has a valid claim to remain in the country.

The ordinances also conflict with federal law in that they assume that the federal government seeks the removal of all undocumented aliens. As the Supreme Court has noted: "An illegal entrant might be granted federal permission to continue to reside in this country, or even to become a citizen." The United States government, however, determines whether to remove an alien only through formal procedures set forth in the Immigra-

77. [Footnote 56 in original.] In fact at trial, Stephen Yale-Loehr, an expert in immigration law, testified that the federal government frequently exercises its discretion not to try to remove persons from the country even though they may lack lawful immigration status.

tion and Nationality Act and related regulations. Furthermore, the federal process provides procedural safeguards that include administrative appeal and judicial review.

Even if an alien is deemed removable after removal proceedings, they may nonetheless be allowed to stay in the United States. [The court here provides a detailed description of the relief provisions in the INA.—Eds.]

* * *

Hence, the federal immigration rules and the decision whether an alien should be removed are very complex. More than resorting to the Basic Pilot Program or the Systematic Alien Verification for Entitlements (“SAVE”)⁷⁸ is necessary to determine if federal government seeks the removal of an individual from the United States.

As Supreme Court Justice Blackmun noted: “[T]he structure of the immigration statuses makes it impossible for the State to determine which aliens are entitled to residence, and which eventually will be deported.” Additionally, Supreme Court Justice Lewis F. Powell stated: “Until an undocumented alien is ordered deported by the Federal Government, no State can be assured that the alien will not be found to have a federal permission to reside in the country.”

Hazleton’s ordinances burden aliens more than federal law by prohibiting them from residing in the city although they may be permitted to remain in the United States. The ordinances are thus in conflict with federal law and pre-empted.

RO is additionally in conflict with federal law because it calls upon the employees of the Hazleton Code Enforcement Office to examine the paperwork of those seeking permits and determine if they are properly in the country. This procedure is in direct conflict with federal law. Immigration status can only be determined by an immigration judge. Further, the proceeding before the immigration judge is the “sole and exclusive procedure for determining whether an alien may be admitted to the United States or, if the alien has been so admitted, removed from the United States.”

Thus, for all the reasons set forth above, the housing provisions of the IIRA and the Tenant Registration Ordinance are preempted by federal law and are unconstitutional.

* * *

78. [Footnote 58 in original.] SAVE “is an existing federal eligibility system used to verify status for various federal-state cooperative programs such as the Aid to Families with Dependent Children (‘AFDC’), Food Stamps, Medicaid and Unemployment Compensation programs under which eligibility is dependent on lawful immigration status. Defendant’s brief indicates that the United States Bureau of Citizenship and Immigration Services at the Department of Homeland Security confirmed with defendant’s counsel that it intended to use SAVE when responding to verification requests regarding Hazleton tenants.

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. The court in Lozano, in section 1.a, construes the IRCA savings clause as limited to those licensing actions that are taken against employers who have been found to “have violated the sanctions provisions of IRCA.” Does the House Committee report quoted in the same section of the opinion support that interpretation?

2. In Chicanos por la Causa, the Ninth Circuit rejected appellants’ conflict preemption claim. The court found that because the case was before it on a facial challenge, the claim that an employer could be faced with conflicting liability determinations from state and federal tribunals was purely hypothetical. The court thus left open the possibility of future as-applied challenges. 544 F.3d at 980. At the time of this writing, the Arizona law challenged in Chicanos por la Causa has yet to be enforced against an employer.

3. At the time the court decided Lozano, the Hazleton ordinance had not been applied to any employer or landlord. Was the district court in that case wrong to find conflict preemption in the context of a facial challenge? What do you make of the Lozano court’s conflict preemption analysis? Is the fact that the Hazleton statute differs in its details from federal law legally significant? In other words, is the fact that state and federal law regulate on the same subject using different mechanisms sufficient to show conflict, even if the state law adopts federal standards of lawful status? Could states ever regulate concurrently with the federal government if that were the standard?

4. In Chicanos por la Causa, the Ninth Circuit also concluded that the Arizona law’s requirement that all employers participate in E-Verify was not preempted. The fact that the E-Verify program was voluntary at the national level did not demonstrate Congress’s clear intent to prevent states from making participation mandatory at the state level. The court reasoned that Congress could have, but did not, prevent states from requiring employers within their jurisdictions to participate in the program. Perhaps even more significantly, the court found Arizona’s law to be consistent with Congress’s intent to strongly encourage the expansion of the use of E-Verify to all fifty states. Id. at 986.

In 2007, the state of Illinois passed a law prohibiting employers from enrolling in E-Verify until the Social Security Administration could certify that it could resolve 99% of the findings of no authorization within three days. In 2009, a federal district court struck down the law as preempted, concluding that the statute frustrated the purposes and objectives of Congress. The court found that Congress had adopted E-Verify to assist employers by providing them with a means of electronically determining whether a potential employee was authorized to work under federal law, and that Congress intended employers in all 50 states to be able to use the database. See United States v. Illinois, 2009 WL 662703 (C.D. Ill. 2009). Are these two preemption holdings consistent with one another?

5. Do landlord ordinances call for the same preemption analysis as employer ordinances? No comprehensive federal regulatory scheme related to housing and comparable to IRCA's employer sanctions exists. What is the significance of this difference between the two contexts? INA § 274 does make it a crime to "conceal, harbor, or shield from detection" undocumented immigrants. There have been scattered prosecutions of employers and landlords under this harboring provision, but they generally have involved individuals with knowledge of a person's undocumented status, particularly persons who run safe houses for undocumented immigrants. See, e.g., United States v. Ramirez, 250 Fed. Appx. 80 (5th Cir. 2007) (unpub. slip op.) (upholding harboring conviction in light of substantial evidence that defendant concealed undocumented immigrants and noting that harboring statute requires knowledge or reckless disregard that noncitizens entered or remained in the U.S. in violation of the law). Does this harboring provision preempt the landlord ordinances?

6. The other courts that have considered the constitutionality of local landlord ordinances also have found them preempted. See, e.g., Garrett v. City of Escondido, 465 F. Supp. 2d 1043 (S.D. Cal. 2006) (blocking enforcement of ordinance that penalized owners of "dwelling units" who "harbor an illegal alien" knowing or in reckless disregard of the aliens' status). In Villas at Parkside Partners v. City of Farmers Branch, 577 F. Supp.2d 858 (N.D. Tex. 2008), the district court, on a motion for summary judgment, permanently enjoined the implementation of a city ordinance approved by the voters of Farmers Branch, Texas. The ordinance required potential tenants to submit evidence of citizenship or eligibility for lawful residence in the United States before entering into a lease. The City claimed that it adopted the ordinance pursuant to its police powers and in order to promote public health and safety. Id. at 862. The court held that the ordinance constituted a regulation of immigration and was therefore preempted by the INA.

In addition to requiring landlords to check the immigration status of potential tenants, the ordinance prohibited landlords from allowing the occupancy of any unit by any family that had not submitted the required evidence of citizenship or eligible immigration status. The court observed that "although it is not spelled out in black and white," the overriding purpose of the Ordinance was "to prevent illegal immigrants from renting apartments in Farmers Branch; otherwise, there would be no need to verify immigration status as a prerequisite for entering into a lease." This purpose underscored for the court the city's intent to regulate immigration.

The court's holding that the ordinance amounted to a regulation of immigration ultimately turned on the standards the city used to implement its scheme. After emphasizing that the Supreme Court has repeatedly held, in cases from Fong Yue Ting to De Canas v. Bica, that the power to regulate immigration is unquestionably an exclusively federal power, id. at 867, the district court observed that the ordinance classified noncitizens according to their eligibility for federal housing subsidies. Its effect, therefore, was to deny local housing to individuals who were authorized to reside in the United States but not authorized to receive HUD subsidies. Id. at 868. Accordingly, the court holds that the ordinance is an impermissible “regulation of immigration.” Id. at 871.

7. In reaching its conclusion, the court in Villas at Parkside distinguishes the Farmers Branch ordinance from other state laws that require state determination of immigration status, such as voter registration and driver’s license laws, on the ground that those state programs wholly adopt federal standards. Id. at 872. Should this distinction be sufficient to save such state laws from preemption? In other words, was Farmers Branch’s only error a drafting one? On the one hand, it stands to reason that if states and localities adopt and apply federal eligibility standards, creating no new standards of their own, they are not regulating immigration per se. But can state and local officials accurately determine that an employer has violated federal law, or can only the federal government make such a conclusive determination? If the state or local law requires employers to use the federal E-Verify database to determine whether a potential employee is authorized to work, must the state or local law provide the same opportunities provided by federal law to contest an E-Verify determination?

8. The City of Farmers Branch also appears to have argued that the housing ordinance was a “licensing law” that fell within the parameters of the IRCA savings clause discussed above. Id. at 865. The court rejected this claim on the ground that it was not properly raised. On the merits, would it be possible for a city to defend a housing ordinance on these grounds? The court also distinguishes the housing ordinance from the law upheld in Chicanos por la Causa on the ground that the latter provision required employers to use E-Verify to determine potential workers’ status, whereas the Farmers Branch Ordinance relied upon property owners and managers to review immigration documents. Id. at 865. Why should this distinction matter?

9. Plaintiffs challenging these employer and landlord sanctions laws also have made due process claims with varying degrees of success, arguing that the laws deprive them of property interests without an adequate opportunity to be heard. The Arizona statute at issue in Chicanos por la Causa afforded employers hearings in superior court, at which they had the opportunity to rebut the state’s evidence that they had hired undocumented workers. The Ninth Circuit held that these hearings provided sufficient process for the statute to survive a facial challenge. 544 F.3d at 987.

By contrast, the courts in Lozano and Villas at Parkside held that the ordinances at issue violated due process. In Lozano, the court found at least three due process defects in the employment ordinance. The ordinance did not require the employer to give employees notice upon the filing of a claim against the employer, thus enabling employers to fire employees without notice or the opportunity for the employee to establish his authorization to work; the law did not set forth the documents necessary to prove an employee’s identity; and the law’s provision of a hearing in Pennsylvania state court was inadequate, because state courts do not have the power to determine immigration status—perhaps the most consequential of the due process holdings, given that it could not be easily fixed through redrafting. See Lozano, 496 F.Supp., at 537. The court came to the same basic conclusions with respect to the landlord ordinance. Id. at 538.

In Villas at Parkside, the district court concluded that the ordinance failed to sufficiently define the offense that would subject a landlord to criminal penalties. It wrote:

A landlord, subject to criminal liability for violation of the Ordinance, relying on the city's documents, would not know whether he was criminally liable for renting to a noncitizen legally residing in the country who lacked the documents listed on the HUD declaration. A landlord must also, as a prerequisite to entering a lease with a noncitizen, determine whether that potential tenant has a "form designated by ICE as acceptable evidence of immigration status." The city maintains that it will provide training to landlords, but the evidence provided by the city itself demonstrates that it will use the HUD documents as its examples, creating confusion and uncertainty for landlords who desire to rent to individuals legally in the country but ineligible for federal housing assistance. The Ordinance, applied in a criminal context to landlords with no training or expertise in federal immigration law, fails to put these landlords on sufficient notice of what acts may be punished by the city.

477 F.Supp.2d at 877.

10. As this book goes to press, the City of Hazleton's appeal to the Third Circuit remains pending.

3. STATE AND LOCAL PARTICIPATION IN IMMIGRATION POLICING

Thus far, our discussions of immigration enforcement have focused on the federal government's regime and priorities, both at the border and in the interior. This section takes up the question of whether it is constitutional for state and local police to participate in the enforcement of immigration law and, if so, whether such participation is a good idea as a policy matter. Among the questions you should consider are: Do state and local police have inherent authority to enforce federal immigration law, given their recognized authority to enforce federal criminal law? Or, does the exclusivity principle mean that states have no power to arrest or detain individuals for immigration violations? Even if states do not have inherent authority to enforce immigration law, can Congress authorize states and localities to participate in immigration enforcement? What should the terms of that devolution of power be? What are the potential benefits and dangers of enlisting state and local law enforcement in immigration policing?

The issue of state and local participation in immigration enforcement emerged in a significant way in 1996, when Congress added section 287(g) to the INA. This provision authorizes state and local law enforcement to enter into cooperative agreements, known as Memoranda of Agreement

(MOA) with the Attorney General (now the Secretary of DHS) to designate select officers to perform certain federal immigration functions. Pursuant to an MOA, state or local employees may be authorized to investigate, apprehend, and detain persons suspected of federal immigration violations; utilize federal immigration databases in the process of their investigations; initiate removal proceedings by filing a notice to appear; and transport arrestees to ICE detention facilities for further proceedings. ICE has developed two basic models of cooperation under the 287(g) framework. The jail model permits corrections officials to screen persons in their custody for their immigration status. The task force model authorizes state and local officials who are participating in criminal law task forces—primarily task forces related to drug trafficking and gang enforcement—to screen arrested individuals for their legal status. Some state and local officials combine these two models in their MOAs. See U.S. General Accounting Office, Better Controls Needed Over Program Authorizing State and Local Enforcement of Federal Immigration Laws 7–8 (January 2009), available at <http://www.gao.gov/new.items/d09109.pdf>.

The statute itself does not provide extensive detail about how these agreements are to be structured, but it does require ICE to conduct background checks on participating officers, and to train state and local officials in immigration enforcement. Though the federal government funds the federal officials involved in such training, the statute specifies that states and localities must bear the cost of training and utilizing their own officials pursuant to an MOA, though state and local government may apply to the federal government for reimbursement of certain costs, including the detention and transportation of noncitizens. Importantly, the statute makes clear that state and local police may communicate with ICE regarding the immigration status of persons in their custody, even absent a 287(g) agreement.

The Clinton Administration maintained a policy of not entering into these agreements. Since September 11, 2001, however, the number of states and localities seeking entry into the program has grown dramatically, and the Bush Administration authorized the first 287(g) agreement in 2002. As of this writing, DHS has entered into approximately 67 different MOAs, mostly after 2007. In an audit of the program released in February 2009, the General Accounting Office estimated that, as of October 2008, 951 officers had been trained. Twenty-five of the twenty-nine programs the GAO studied closely had resulted in the arrest of 43,000 individuals, 34,000 of whom were detained by ICE. Of those detained, 41% were placed in removal proceedings, 44% voluntarily departed, and 15% were granted humanitarian release, sent to prison, or released because of the minor nature of their crimes. See General Accounting Office, above, at 5.

Given the Court's dictum in Graham v. Richardson that the federal government cannot authorize states to violate the Constitution, do you think these 287(g) agreements are constitutional? Does this dictum mean that the federal government cannot devolve its enforcement power to state and local police?

The answers to these questions depend in part on a threshold matter—whether state and local police possess inherent authority to enforce the immigration laws. Few courts have addressed this question, and those that have dealt with the subject have not answered it completely.

In Gonzales v. City of Peoria, 722 F.2d 468 (9th Cir. 1983), eleven persons of Mexican descent claimed city police had arrested and detained them without probable cause, solely on the basis of their racial appearance. One of the issues in the case was whether state and local police had inherent power to enforce federal immigration laws. After the suit was filed, the chief of police issued a letter stating that the police department was bound by federal law to detain and arrest undocumented immigrants for the Border Patrol. See 722 F.2d, at 473. But testimony at trial revealed substantial confusion among local police as to the official policy of the department. See id. at 474. The court wrote:

Appellants contend that enforcement of the immigration laws is a matter of exclusive federal concern, and that the doctrine of preemption therefore precludes any state or local enforcement. They view the Immigration and Naturalization Act as a comprehensive regulatory scheme that delegates enforcement duties to the Immigration and Naturalization Service, through the Attorney General, but makes no concurrent delegation authorizing the states to prevent illegal entry into the United States.

The general rule is that local police are not precluded from enforcing federal statutes. Where state enforcement activities do not impair federal regulatory interests, concurrent enforcement activity is authorized. Therefore, federal regulation of a particular field should not be presumed to preempt state enforcement activity ‘in the absence of persuasive reasons — either that the nature of the regulated subject matter permits no other conclusion, or that the Congress has unmistakably so ordained.’

Although the regulation of immigration is unquestionably an exclusive federal power, it is clear that this power does not preempt every state activity affecting aliens. The plaintiffs’ reference to exclusive federal authority over immigration matters thus does not resolve this question. Instead, we must define precisely the challenged state enforcement activity to determine if “the nature of the regulated subject matter permits no other conclusion.”

The City’s claim of authority is limited. It asserts only the power to enforce the criminal provisions of the federal immigration laws. There is nothing inherent in that specific enforcement activity that conflicts with federal regulatory interests. Federal and local enforcement have identical purposes—the prevention of the misdemeanor or felony of illegal entry. The subject matter of the regulation thus does not require us to find that state enforcement is preempted.

* * *

Plaintiffs correctly assert that an intent to preclude local enforcement may be inferred where the system of federal regulation is so pervasive that no opportunity for state activity remains. We assume that the civil provisions of the Act regulating authorized entry, length of stay, residence status, and deportation, constitute such a pervasive regulatory scheme, as would be consistent with the exclusive federal power over immigration. However, this case does not concern that broad scheme, but only a narrow and distinct element of it—the regulation of criminal immigration activity by aliens. The statutes relating to that element are few in number and relatively simple in their terms. They are not, and could not be, supported by a complex administrative structure. It therefore cannot be inferred that the federal government has occupied the field of criminal immigration enforcement.

* * *

We therefore hold that federal law does not preclude local enforcement of the criminal provisions of the Act.

Id. at 474-476. Since the enactment of section 287(g) in 1996, courts have expressed uncertainty as to the scope of inherent state and local authority. See, e.g., Mena v. City of Simi Valley, 332 F.3d 1255, 1265 n. 15 (9th Cir. 2003); Carrasca v. Pomeroy, 313 F.3d 828, 827 (3d Cir. 2002).⁷⁹

A 2002 memorandum from the Office of Legal Counsel (OLC) in the Department of Justice (which came to light in 2004 as the result of litigation) concluded that states and localities do have inherent authority to enforce both the civil and criminal provisions of the INA and therefore do not require delegated authority from the federal government. See Memorandum from Jay S. Bybee, Assistant Attorney General, Office of Legal Counsel, to Attorney General John Ashcroft, Non-preemption of the Au-

⁷⁹ As the court notes in Gonzales v. Peoria, the INA contains both civil and criminal provisions. Two of the criminal provisions appear to authorize state and local officials to enforce criminal provisions of the Act. Section 274 prohibits the smuggling, transporting, or harboring of illegal immigrants and authorizes all officials with power to enforce criminal laws to make arrests for violations of the provision. Section 276 establishes criminal penalties for illegal re-entry after removal. Professor Michael Wishnie has argued that these sections amount to express authorizations of state and local enforcement power, thus indicating Congress's intent to limit the authority of state and local officials to the enforcement of these two provisions alone. Michael J. Wishnie, State and Local Police Enforcement of Immigration Laws, 6 U. Pennsylvania Journal of Const. Law 1084 (2004). The Ninth Circuit in Gonzales v. Peoria rejects a version of this claim. See 722 F.2d at 476. Similarly, one could argue that Congress intended 287(g) agreements to be the sole source of authority for state and local enforcement of the provisions of the INA. See Rodríguez, et al., Testing the Limits, above, at 34 (arguing that 287(g) indicates Congress's intent to superintend state and local enforcement of federal civil immigration law).

thority of State and Local Law Enforcement to Arrest Aliens for Immigration Violations (April 3, 2002), available at, <http://www.aclu.org/FilesPDFs/ACF27DA.pdf>. This memo generated considerable controversy, because it reversed DOJ policy reflected in three previous memoranda. The 2002 memo reasoned that states are sovereign entities, that state and local police possess power to make arrests under federal criminal laws, and that it would not make sense for the federal government to be deprived of state and local assistance in immigration enforcement.

The 2002 OLC position remains controversial to this day, but the scholarly opinion on the inherent authority questions is divided. An emerging trend challenges the conventional wisdom that favors exclusivity. Professor Wishnie has argued that state and local authorities do not possess inherent authority, and that any sub-federal enforcement of immigration law is preempted in any case. See Michael J. Wishnie, State and Local Police Enforcement of Immigration Laws, 6 U. Pennsylvania Journal of Con. Law 1084, 1088–95 (2004). Professor Huntington, by contrast, observes that neither constitutional text nor structure, nor historical practice, demands federal exclusivity, concluding that:

[d]espite the traditional narrative of federal exclusivity over immigration, there is room for an alternative narrative. Instead of establishing a constitutional mandate for exclusive federal authority over immigration law, Supreme Court precedent embodies the tension between the national interest in a uniform rule and the states' interest in exercising their police power to protect their citizens.

Huntington, above, at 823. She then argues that rejecting “structural preemption” (her terms for federal constitutional exclusivity) would “open the door” to a debate concerning whether state and local enforcement makes for good policy, based on the values of federalism. Whereas efficiency and effectiveness might be invoked to justify state and local involvement, the protection of individual rights and concern for racial profiling might weigh against enforcement. Id. at 842–44.⁸⁰

80. For other scholarly treatments of the constitutionality of 287(g) agreements and the question of state and local enforcement, see Huyen Pham, The Inherent Flaws in the Inherent Authority Position: Why Inviting Local Enforcement of the Immigration Laws Violates the Constitution, 31 Florida State Univ. L. Rev. 965 (2004) (arguing that constitutional federal exclusivity in the immigration sphere (not just congressional preemption) prohibits these arrangements); Kris Kobach, Reinforcing the Rule of Law: What States Can and Should Do to Reduce Illegal Immigration, 22 Georgetown Immigration Law Journal 459, 478 (2008) (noting that the inherent authority of state and local police is merely the power to arrest undocumented immigrants and to detain them temporarily before transferring them to federal custody—a power that has been recognized by numerous federal courts); Rodriguez, The Significance of the Local, above, at 592, 627 (arguing that the erosion of the structural foundations of federal exclusivity implies that state and local police have inherent authority to enforce immigration law, but that federal statutes have preempted much of this authority), and Peter H. Schuck, Taking Immigration Federalism Seriously, 2007 Univ. Of Chicago Legal Forum 57, 75 (concurring that inherent authority to arrest preceded and was enforced by the adoption of 287(g)).

But even if state and local police do possess inherent authority—a debatable proposition—and even if 287(g) agreements are constitutional—the likely correct conclusion—state and local enforcement of immigration law might still be a bad idea. Sheriff Joseph Arpaio of Maricopa County, Arizona, has attracted infamy for his use of 287(g) authority. He has allegedly engaged in racial profiling of Latinos while implementing a policy of arresting individuals for minor traffic infractions, such as broken tail-lights, in order to apprehend undocumented immigrants; housed immigrant detainees in tents in the Arizona desert; and paraded detainees in public dressed in striped prison jumpsuits and shackled to one another for media consumption. See, e.g., Editorial, Arpaio's America, N.Y. Times (February 5, 2009). On March 10, 2009, the Department of Justice announced an investigation into the Maricopa County Sheriff's Office pursuant to federal civil rights law and the Violent Crime Control and Law Enforcement Act of 1994, 42 U.S.C. § 14141. See Letter from Loretta King, Acting Assistant Attorney General, to Sheriff Joseph Arpaio, Re: Investigation of the Maricopa County Sheriff's Office, March 10, 2009 (“Our investigation will focus on alleged patterns or practices of discriminatory police practices and unconstitutional searches and seizures conducted by MCSO, and on allegations of national origin discrimination, including failure to provide meaningful access to MCSO services for limited English proficient individuals.”).

A number of police chiefs and professional associations have come out strongly against 287(g) agreements and state and local involvement in immigration policing. See, e.g., Int'l Ass'n of Chiefs of Police, Police Chiefs Guide to Immigration Issues 13 (2007) and Major Cities Chiefs Immigration Committee, Recommendations for Enforcement of Immigration Law by Local Police Agencies 5–6 (2006). Why do you think some state and local law enforcement officials have strongly objected to taking on immigration responsibilities? What effects might 287(g) agreements have on the effectiveness of criminal law enforcement and community policing? A 2005 empirical study conducted for the Migration Policy Institute presented a reason for caution in the expansion of state and local enforcement. The study documented that, when police entered the names of people they had stopped into the National Crime Information Center law enforcement database, a high number of false positives for outstanding removal orders occurred. See Hannah Gladstein, Annie Lai, Jennifer Wagner, & Michael J. Wishnie, Blurring the Lines: A Profile of State and Local Police Enforcement of Immigration Law Using the National Crime Information Center Database, 2002–2004 (Migration Policy Institute 2005).

Despite the concerns engendered by Sheriff Arpaio's behavior, what are the policy arguments in favor of involving state and local police directly in immigration enforcement? What would the federal interest in such cooperation be? What would the state and local interest be? Is it a problem if those interests diverge? Put differently, how much authority should state and local police have to determine enforcement priorities under the program? Is it possible to prevent local law enforcement clothed with 287(g) authority from following Arpaio's lead?

Because the profusion of 287(g) agreements is a relatively new phenomenon, not a great deal is known about how they operate in practice, or whether the concerns expressed by skeptics are emerging on a large scale. A 2009 GAO study, however, concluded that the program suffered from lack of supervision by ICE, as well as the failure to coordinate state and local activity with ICE enforcement goals, despite the fact that ICE had adopted some management controls. The GAO summarized its findings:

[W]hile ICE officials have stated that the main objective of the 287(g) program is to enhance the safety and security of communities by addressing serious criminal activity committed by removable aliens, they have not documented this objective in program-related materials consistent with internal control standards. As a result, some participating agencies are using their 287(g) authority to process for removal aliens who have committed minor crimes, such as carrying an open container of alcohol. While participating agencies are not prohibited from seeking the assistance of ICE for aliens arrested for minor offenses, if all the participating agencies sought assistance to remove aliens for such minor offenses, ICE would not have detention space to detain all of the aliens referred to them.

* * *

Second, ICE has not consistently articulated in program-related documents how participating agencies are to use their 287(g) authority. For instance, although the processing of individuals for possible removal is to be conducted in connection with a conviction of a state or federal felony offense, this issue is not mentioned in 7 of the 29 MOAs we reviewed. Internal control standards state that the government programs should ensure that significant events are authorized and executed only by persons acting within the scope of their authority. Defining and consistently communicating how this authority is to be used would help ICE ensure that immigration activities undertaken by participating agencies are in accordance with ICE policies and program objectives. Third, ICE has not described the nature and extent of the agency's supervision over participating agencies' implementation of the program. This has led to wide variation in the perception of the nature and extent of supervisory responsibility among ICE field officials and officials from the 23 participating agencies that provided information on ICE supervision. Internal control standards require an agency's organizational structure to define key areas of authority and responsibility. Given the rapid growth of the program, defining the nature and extent of the agency's supervision over this large and growing a program would strengthen ICE's assurance that management's directives are being carried out. Finally, while the MOAs state that participating agencies are responsible for tracking and reporting data to ICE, in 20 of 29 MOAs we reviewed, ICE did not define what data should be tracked or how it should be collected and reported. Internal control standards call for pertinent information to be recoded and communicated to management in a form and within a time frame that enables them to carry out internal control responsibilities. Communicating to participating agencies what data is to be collected and how it should be gathered and reported would help ensure that ICE management has the information needed to determine whether the program is achieving its objectives.⁸¹

Assuming that DHS will continue to enter into 287(g) agreements, what should be the agency's goal in enlisting state and local police? What should be the objective of the states and localities? What should be the scope of arrest and detention authority given to the states? Should it include any kind of immigration arrest, or should it be focused on security threats and noncitizens who have committed dangerous crimes—the focus thought by some to be the original purpose of the program? Professor Orde Kittrie has made an innovative proposal to address the danger that 287(g) agreements will discourage undocumented immigrants from cooperating with police. He suggests that a noncitizen victim who reports a crime should receive use immunity, whereby enforcement authorities would be prohibited from sharing any of the information derived from that report with the immigration authorities. The latter, in turn, would be prohibited from using the information in removal proceedings. See Orde F. Kittrie, Federalism, Deportation, and Crime Victims Afraid to Call the Police, 91 Iowa L. Rev. 1449, 1502–07 (2006).

In addition to entering into 287(g) agreements, some states and localities have adopted policies that direct law enforcement and other county officials to inquire into the immigration status of persons who come into their custody. Georgia, Oklahoma, Colorado, New Jersey, and Prince William County, Virginia, all have adopted versions of this policy. See Rodríguez, et al. Testing the Limits, above, at 36–37. Most of these laws also require police to report suspected undocumented immigrants to ICE. Do these policies amount to immigration enforcement, or are they legitimate measures ancillary to routine policing? The argument for the latter is that, during an otherwise lawful investigatory stop or detention, police may question individuals with respect to any matter, including immigration status. As long as the questioning does not prolong the stop or detention beyond what would be necessary for the police officer's law enforcement

81. U.S. General Accounting Office, Better Controls Needed Over Program Authorizing State and Local Enforcement of Federal Immigration Laws 7–8 (January 2009), at 4–5, available at <http://www.gao.gov/new.items/do9109.pdf>. For examinations by scholars of the policy pros and cons of state and local police involvement in the enforcement of immigration laws, compare the views of former Attorney General John Ashcroft's chief immigration strategist, Kris W.

Kobach, The Quintessential Force Multiplier: The Inherent Authority of Local Police to Make Immigration Arrests, 69 Albany L. Rev. 179 (2005) (in favor), with those of Daniel Kanstroom, Criminalizing the Undocumented: Ironic Boundaries of the Post-September 11th "Pale of Law", 29 North Carolina J. Internat'l L. & Commercial Regulation 639 (2004) (against), and Kalhan, Immigration Enforcement and Federalism, above (discussing both sides of the issue).

purpose, the questioning is within the police power. Id. In addition, as noted earlier, section 287(g) specifies that a formal agreement is not necessary for police to report undocumented immigrants to ICE. What would be the argument that these policies are tantamount to immigration enforcement and are therefore permissible only pursuant to a 287(g) agreement, if at all?

As noted above, many state and local officials resist the idea of enlisting their law enforcement officials in immigration enforcement, for fear that such cooperation with federal authorities will undermine immigrant communities' trust in police, and thereby deter cooperation with police investigations. Some local jurisdictions have gone so far as to bar local police and other public officials from releasing information on suspected immigration violators to the federal government. The motivations for the state and local restrictions usually include protecting privacy, preventing race discrimination by the police, encouraging people to apply for benefits to which they are legally entitled, and reserving finite enforcement resources for higher local priorities. See Rodríguez, above, at 600–605 (exploring the rationales behind non-cooperation laws); see also Huyen Pham, The Constitutional Right Not to Cooperate? Local Sovereignty and the Federal Immigration Power, 74 Univ. Cincinnati L. Rev. 1373 (2006).

But these so-called non-cooperation laws are in tension with federal law. In 1996, Congress responded to the emergence of these laws by prohibiting any federal, state, or local entities or officials from restricting the exchange of information with the former INS concerning an individual's immigration status. See 8 U.S.C. §§ 1373, 1644. In the mid-1990s, Mayor Rudolph Giuliani challenged the constitutionality of this provision. New York City had long had an executive order in place prohibiting city employees from voluntarily giving information to federal officials about individuals' immigration status, with some exceptions. The policy clearly violated the 1996 laws, but the City argued that the federal provision violated the 10th amendment. In City of New York v. United States, 179 F.3d 29 (2d Cir. 1999), the court of appeals upheld the constitutionality of the federal non-cooperation provision.

In 2003 New York City Mayor Michael Bloomberg responded with Executive Order No. 41, City-Wide Privacy Policy and Amendment of Executive Order No. 34 Relating to City Policy Concerning Immigrant Access to City Services (Sept. 17, 2003). The new Executive Order declares that its goal is to encourage use of city services by promoting an expectation of confidentiality. Id., Preamble. The Order prohibits the disclosure of "confidential information" (which includes information concerning immigration status) by City officers and employees, except in certain situations. The exceptions include when disclosure is "required by law," id. § 2(b), and, with respect to information relating to immigration status, when a person is suspected of "engaging in illegal activity, other than mere status as an undocumented alien," or in investigations of potential terrorist activity [emphasis added], id. § 2(e). With some narrow exceptions, the Executive Order also prohibits City employees (including police officers) from inquiring about a person's immigration status. Id. § 4. For an analysis of Chicago's analogous restrictions, see Craig B. Mousin, A Clear View from the Prairie: Harold Washington and the People of Illinois Respond to Federal Encroachment of Human Rights, 29 Southern Illinois Univ. L. Rev. 285 (2005) (analyzing analogous Chicago restrictions).

Do you think that a citywide privacy policy brings local law into line with federal law? The Second Circuit in City of New York v. United States suggested it might, recognizing the interest of state and local governments in protecting confidentiality. 179 F.3d, at 36. Why do you think that the Second Circuit upheld the federal statute in the first place? For an argument that Congress (as well as states) should exercise restraint when preempting local non-cooperation laws, see Rodríguez, above, at 630–32. For an argument that state governments should enact legislation to prevent their localities from adopting non-cooperation laws, including by denying any form of state funding to cities that adopt such laws, see Kobach, Reinforcing the Law, note 79 above, at 479–80.

Why do you think some states and localities line up to sign 287(g) agreements while others either resist participation in the program or resist cooperation with federal immigration authorities altogether?

4. STATE REGULATION OF PUBLIC BENEFITS

As Graham v. Richardson elucidates, states long have sought to exclude immigrants from their public benefits programs. Graham struck down state laws that denied LPR's access to state benefits. Would similar measures applied to undocumented immigrants also be invalid?

On November 8, 1994, the voters of California passed Proposition 187,⁸² thus testing the scope of Graham and the Court's other immigration federalism precedents. Although litigation and a settlement permanently enjoined enforcement of most of Proposition 187's provisions, the initiative remains to this day an infamous example of a state's efforts to crack down on illegal immigration, all the more salient because of California's status as home to the largest immigrant population in the United States.

The best-known provision of Proposition 187 was its section 7, which would have prohibited every public elementary and secondary school in the state from allowing any undocumented child to attend school, in apparent defiance of Plyler v. Doe. By January 1, 1996, each school was to have verified the immigration status of every student and the parents or guardians of every student. In addition to expelling those students whom they found not to be in lawful status, the schools would have been required to report to the former INS the identities of any students, parents, or guardians suspected of being out of status. The practical consequence of the parent or guardian provision was that even U.S. citizen children would have been unable to attend school if their parents were undocumented, unless the children were willing to have their parents turned in to the INS.

⁸². The full text is reproduced in Wilson, 908 F.Supp. 755, 787–91 (App. A) League of United Latin American Citizens v. (C.D.Cal. 1995).

Other sections of Proposition 187 prohibited publicly funded health facilities from serving undocumented immigrants except in medical emergencies, and similarly prohibited public social services from serving undocumented immigrants. These agencies were required to assess the immigration status of each patient or applicant and report to the INS the identities of those suspected to be out of status.

Immediately after its passage, opponents of Proposition 187 filed both federal and state lawsuits challenging its legality and seeking injunctive relief. A combination of federal and state preliminary injunctions promptly issued. The complaints alleged several constitutional deficiencies, including equal protection and federal preemption.

In 1995, a federal district court preliminarily enjoined enforcement of most of the central provisions of Proposition 187. League of United Latin American Citizens v. Wilson, 908 F.Supp. 755 (C.D.Cal. 1995) [hereafter cited as LULAC]. Citing Plyler v. Doe, the court specifically enjoined the bar on undocumented children attending public elementary and secondary schools. The court also struck down, on grounds of federal preemption, all the provisions that required state and local employees to investigate the immigration statuses of their patients, clients, or students, to instruct suspected undocumented immigrants to leave the country, and to report their names to the INS.

While the preliminary injunction was in force, Congress in 1996 passed the Welfare Act. In its opinion rendering final judgment, 997 F.Supp. 1244 (C.D. Cal. 1997), the court held that the Welfare Act reflects “the intention of Congress to occupy the field of regulation of government benefits to aliens.” Id. at 1253. Accordingly, it entered a final summary judgment invalidating almost all of Proposition 187. Only sections 2 and 3, which penalize specified forms of document fraud, and section 10, a “severability” clause that allows some sections to withstand the invalidation of others, survived.

Then things got interesting. The State of California appealed to the Ninth Circuit. While the appeal was pending, Governor Pete Wilson, one of the chief proponents of Proposition 187, completed his term of office. His successor, Gray Davis, had opposed Proposition 187. Everyone wondered: Would Governor Davis drop the appeal? To do so, he feared, would be a breach of his gubernatorial duty to uphold California law. To do otherwise, though, would jeopardize the educations of hundreds of thousands of schoolchildren in ways that he (and the district court) believed were unconstitutional.

Governor Davis’s solution was to request the court of appeals to invoke its special mediation procedure, in which the opposing parties attempt to negotiate a settlement. That request was itself controversial. Backers of Proposition 187 objected that the two “opposing” parties in fact were of the same mind on Proposition 187—that it should be invalidated. They suggested that true negotiation was impossible. Opponents of Proposition 187 were also taken aback. They wanted Governor Davis simply to drop the appeal. In April 1999, the court granted the Governor's request for mediation.⁸³ And in July 1999, as expected, a settlement that accepted the district court's judgment was announced.⁸⁴

Recall the discussion above concerning the difficulty of drawing a line between immigration regulation and state legislation that regulates noncitizens. The LULAC case illustrates the problem. Is Proposition 187 just a regulation of noncitizens, and thus constitutionally permissible as long as Congress has not preempted the field (and subject to equal protection or any other affirmative constitutional restraint)? Or is Proposition 187 an immigration regulation that Congress could not delegate to the states even if it wanted to? Exactly which issues either the Constitution or the Congress bars the states from deciding is difficult to say. States commonly regulate noncitizens, as you have seen in this chapter and will also see in chapter 13. Only when it thinks "immigration" is involved has the Supreme Court struck down state legislation on the ground that the Constitution mandated federal exclusivity. Again, though, how does a court draw the line between immigration legislation and other regulation of noncitizens?

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. As a policy matter, what do you think of Proposition 187 or other efforts to deny undocumented immigrants access to public benefits, including public education?

2. The Supreme Court cases discussed in chapter 2, § A.4, as well as in § E.1 of this chapter, offered two distinct reasons for interpreting the Constitution to bar state regulation of immigration. In Henderson, the Court emphasized the importance of uniform immigration restrictions. In Chy Lung, the Court sought to prevent one state from taking action that could antagonize other nations and thus create foreign relations problems for the United States. Do those rationales apply to Proposition 187? As for uniformity, what would happen if some states passed (and could enforce) 187-style legislation, and other states did not? As for embroilment, could Proposition 187 have foreign policy repercussions?

3. As for preemption (as opposed to constitutional exclusivity), two different themes emerged from the plaintiffs' arguments in LULAC. One objection concerned procedure. To determine that particular individuals were undocumented, various state employees—school officials, welfare officials, and social workers—would have to interpret and apply principles of federal immigration law, just as employers do under IRCA and landlords would be required to do under the local housing ordinances discussed above. First, is that good policy? Second, do you think that, as the state

83. See Bob Egelko, Court to Mediate California Proposition, Assoc. Press (April 26, 1999); Dave Leshner, Los Angeles Times (May 21, 1999).

84. Patrick J. McDonnell, Davis Won't Appeal Prop. 187 Ruling, Ending Court Battles, L.A. Times (July 29, 1999).

argued, Congress meant to leave open the possibility of state officials determining people's immigration statuses?

4. The preemption issue concerns substantive decisionmaking as well. Who should decide which noncitizens are entitled to free public education—the federal government, or the state and local governments?

5. Suppose California had argued in LULAC that one of the goals of the challenged legislation was to divert to neighboring states a portion of the undocumented population that California was disproportionately absorbing. Would that be a valid goal?

6. The House version of the bill that eventually became IIRIRA contained a controversial amendment introduced by Rep. Elton Gallegly (R-Cal.). The Gallegly amendment would have authorized states to deny free public education to undocumented children. The House and Senate conferees agreed to drop the amendment when it became clear that it jeopardized the passage of IIRIRA. See 73 IR at 1281–82 (Sept. 30, 1996). Yet the same Congress did specifically authorize states to withhold various welfare benefits from undocumented immigrants, as discussed earlier. As counsel for plaintiffs in LULAC, how might you argue that the contrast between those two developments vindicates your position?

7. By now you have probably noticed that, when the subject matter involves noncitizens, the equal protection argument that you saw in Plyler and the preemption argument that you saw in LULAC tend to overlap. For the state to defeat an equal protection argument, it has to identify some legitimate state interest to which the challenged classification is (at least) rationally related. If the only interests it can come up with to justify the challenged discrimination are interests that either the Constitution or the Congress has reserved for federal regulation, then the equal protection challenge will succeed. Recall the arguments made by scholars and discussed at the outset of this chapter that immigration should be understood as a state interest. What would be the implications of this conceptual shift for equal protection analysis? For one argument, see Rodríguez, The Significance of the Local in Immigration Regulation, above, at 628–29.

8. Having read Plyler, do you think the education provisions of Proposition 187 would have survived Supreme Court review? If you were representing the State of California in LULAC, what arguments might you make to the Supreme Court? Is Proposition 187 different from the Texas statute? Have any other relevant circumstances changed since Plyler?

9. Several states have sued the federal government to recover costs they allege they have incurred as a result of the federal government's failure to adequately enforce the immigration laws. All such suits have been dismissed for lack of a justiciable issue—i.e., an issue suitable for judicial, rather than legislative, resolution.⁸⁵

Nonetheless, Congress in recent years has taken limited measures to reimburse states for at least a portion of the cost associated with undocumented immigrants. In IRCA § 204, Congress in 1986 authorized the award of “state legalization impact-assistance grants” to selected states to help offset any costs the states might incur as a result of the federal decision to legalize millions of undocumented immigrants. Crime legislation enacted in 1994, the Violent Crime Control and Law Enforcement Act of 1994, Pub.L. 103-322, § 20301, 108 Stat. 1796, 1823 (Sept. 13, 1994), authorized federal reimbursement to states for the costs of incarcerating undocumented immigrants who commit state crimes. And state public health facilities that provide free emergency medical care to indigent undocumented immigrants can be reimbursed by the federal government if—and it’s a big “if”—Congress appropriates sufficient funds. IIRIRA § 562.

85. See, e.g., New Jersey v. United States, 82 F.3d 23 (2d Cir. 1996); United States v. States, 91 F.3d 463 (3d Cir. 1996); Padavan v. United States, 82 F.3d 23 (2d Cir. 1996); United States v. States, 91 F.3d 463 (3d Cir. 1996); Padavan v. United States, 82 F.3d 23 (2d Cir. 1996).

Suppose a state can convincingly demonstrate that, as a result of a particular federal policy, it has suffered a disproportionate adverse impact that can be roughly quantified. Should the federal government reimburse the state for the amount lost? If California can show such an effect from illegal immigration, should the federal government pick up part (or all) of the tab?

10. For a while, support for 187-style initiatives began building in several other states. Those initiatives and their contemporary analogs, which require proof of lawful status in order to gain access to public services, including access to public libraries and parks,⁸⁶ raise a broad array of questions—legal, political, economic, sociological, and ethical.⁸⁷ What is to be gained by requiring proof of lawful status to obtain public services and benefits? If the requirements apply only to services to which undocumented immigrants are not entitled by law, are there nonetheless costs to such laws?

Chiles v. United States, 69 F.3d 1094 (11th Cir. 1995).

86. For a discussion of identification ordinances passed in recent years, see Rodríguez et al., Testing the Limits, above, at 47-51.

87. See especially Peter H. Schuck, The Message of Proposition 187, 26 Pacific L.J. 989 (1995) (criticizing 187 on policy grounds, examining likelihood of Supreme Court invalidating it, and blaming both restrictionists and expansionists for the climate that made it possible). For other helpful articles, see, e.g., Linda S. Bosniak, Opposing Prop. 187: Undocumented Immigrants and the National Imagination, 28 Connecticut L. Rev. 555 (1996); Kevin R. Johnson, Something Old, Something New, Something Borrowed, Something Blue, in Juan F. Perea (ed.), Immigrants Out! The New Nativism and the Anti-Immigrant Impulse in the United States at 165 et seq., 177-80 (1997); see also the UCLA symposium containing several articles on noncitizens’ eligibility for public benefits generally and Proposition 187 in particular: Evangeline G. Abriel, Rethinking Preemption for Purposes of Aliens and Public Benefits, 42 UCLA L. Rev. 1597 (1995); Richard A. Boswell, Restrictions on Non-Citizens’ Access to Public Benefits: Flawed Premise, Unnecessary Response, 42 UCLA L. Rev. 1475 (1995); Lolita K. Buckner Inniss, California’s Proposition 187—Does It Mean What It Says? Does It Say What It Means? A Textual and Constitutional Analysis, 10 Georgetown Immigration L.J. 577 (1996); Kevin R. Johnson, Public Benefits and Immigration: The Intersection of Immigration Status, Ethnicity, Gender, and Class, 42 UCLA L. Rev. 1509 (1995); Stephen H. Legomsky, Immigration, Federalism, and the Welfare State, 42 UCLA L. Rev. 1453 (1995); Gerald L. Neuman, Aliens as Outlaws: Government Services, Proposition 187, and the Structure of Equal Protection Doctrine, 42 UCLA L. Rev. 1425 (1995); Peter L. Reich, Environmental Metaphor in the Alien Benefits Debate, 42 UCLA L. Rev. 1577 (1995).

CHAPTER 13

CITIZENSHIP

You probably haven't thought much about citizenship since taking civics and social studies in grade school. After all these years, it might feel strange to come to law school and spend class time on "what citizenship means to me." But the law of citizenship, in addition to being a crucial part of the immigration lawyer's work, is at the heart of modern debates about personal autonomy, nationhood, membership, pluralism, and the nature of individual and collective responsibility.

Canadian Nobel Laureate Gerhard Herzberg once said, "A citizen is nothing more than an immigrant with seniority." Inscription on the Pier 21 Tribute to Immigrants, Halifax, Nova Scotia. U.S. President Franklin Delano Roosevelt, speaking at a meeting of the Daughters of the American Revolution, expressed a similar sentiment when he greeted his audience with the words "My fellow immigrants."

Here is what an even more authoritative source had to say on the subject:

And if a stranger sojourn with thee in your land, ye shall not vex him.

*But the stranger that dwelleth with you shall be unto you as one born among you, and thou shalt love him as thyself; for ye were strangers in the land of Egypt: I am the Lord your God.*¹

Despite the italicized words, the laws of the United States—like those of other countries—do not treat the "stranger" who lives among us the same as the native-born citizen. As you have seen throughout this book, immigration restrictions apply only to noncitizens. To be sure, those laws can profoundly affect the lives of citizens, both individually and collectively. And certain provisions, including many of the offenses examined in chapter 12, regulate citizens directly. But the immigration laws do not, and constitutionally cannot, restrict the movement of citizens.²

1. The Holy Bible, Leviticus, ch. 19, verses 33–34 (authorized King James version) (emphasis added). For more about the Biblical view of hospitality, see Stephen H. Legomsky, Emigration, Obligation, and Evil, 83 Univ. Detroit Mercy L. Rev. 849, 855–56 (2006); Elizabeth McCormick & Patrick McCormick, Hospitality: How a Biblical Virtue Could Transform United States Immigra- tion Policy, 83 Univ. Detroit Mercy L. Rev. 857 (2006).

2. See Mathews v. Diaz, 426 U.S. 67, 80, 96 S.Ct. 1883, 48 L.Ed.2d 478 (1976). But see Leti Volpp, Citizenship Undone, 75 Fordham L. Rev. 2579, 2579–82 (2007) (arguing that no-fly rules selectively imposed on Muslim citizens are tantamount to denying entry).

Nor are the legal distinctions between citizens and noncitizens confined to migration. Both the federal and state governments regulate the lives of noncitizens while they remain in the United States. As you will see presently, noncitizens are subject to various legal disabilities not imposed on citizens.

Should our law treat noncitizens who reside among us as well as it treats citizens? Or is the Biblical view outdated?

Before taking on that ponderous question, you should be aware of one technical point. In addition to citizens and “aliens,” United States law recognizes a third category of persons—noncitizen nationals. Neither “citizens” nor “aliens,” see INA § 101(a)(3),³ this small group today consists mainly of those born in American Samoa and Swains Island. See INA §§ 308(1) (persons born in “outlying possessions” of United States), 101(a)(29) (defining “outlying possessions” as American Samoa and Swains Island). Except for their more limited capacity to help transmit United States citizenship to their children, compare INA §§ 301, 308, noncitizen nationals now have virtually the same rights as citizens. The inadmissibility and deportability grounds, for example, refer only to “aliens,” see INA §§ 212(a), 237(a); thus, noncitizen nationals are free from immigration controls. Because so few nationals are noncitizens, and because at any rate the rights of noncitizen nationals differ so slightly from those of citizens, it is common for courts and commentators to use the terms “citizen” and “national” as if they were interchangeable. For the same reasons, this chapter will say nothing more about noncitizen nationals and will confine its remaining focus to the differences between citizens and “aliens.”

In doing so, this chapter will address two broad subjects—the rules for attaining (and keeping) citizenship and the importance of citizenship. From a normative standpoint, these subjects raise mutually dependent issues. Whether important legal rights and obligations should turn on citizenship depends on what one has to do to be a citizen. Conversely, what the rules for becoming and remaining a citizen ought to be depends on the consequences of citizenship. There is no obvious escape from this chicken-and-egg problem, but we have to start somewhere. Thus the first two sections will examine, both descriptively and normatively, the substantive criteria and procedures for acquiring citizenship (section A) and for losing it (section B). Section C will then describe the existing legal consequences of citizenship and explore whether citizenship ought to have significant legal effects.

A. ACQUIRING CITIZENSHIP⁴

Long before the enactment of permanent federal laws restricting immigration, Congress passed the nation’s first citizenship statute. Act of

3. This provision defines the word “alien” as “any person not a citizen or national of the United States.” The reference to “citizen” is redundant because, under INA § 101(a)(22), citizens are a subset of nationals.

4. See generally 7 Gordon, Mailman & Yale-Loehr, chs. 91–98.

March 26, 1790, ch. 3, 1 Stat. 103. Today numerous paths to United States citizenship are available. They can be organized under two headings, differentiated solely by timing—citizenship acquired at birth and citizenship acquired at some later time.

1. CITIZENSHIP ACQUIRED AT BIRTH

Throughout the world, two venerable principles have accorded citizenship at the moment of birth. As proof that these principles are venerable, they have Latin names. One is jus soli, literally “right of the land.” Traditionally associated with the English common law and historically rooted in feudalism, the jus soli principle generally confers a nation’s citizenship on persons born within that nation’s territory. The other principle is jus sanguinis. This means “right of the blood.” Long associated with European and other civil law systems, jus sanguinis generally bestows a nation’s citizenship on the children of its existing citizens, regardless of where the children were born. Sometimes jus sanguinis is called “citizenship by descent.” Today, as is true in most countries, see 7 Gordon, Mailman & Yale-Loehr, § 91.02[2], United States law combines both basic principles.

a. JUS SOLI

Until the Declaration of Independence the residents of the original thirteen colonies were British subjects. When independence was declared, each inhabitant who did not affirmatively choose to retain British nationality became a citizen of the particular state in which he or she lived. Upon the ratification of the Constitution, the citizens of the individual states all became citizens of the United States. As new states were admitted, the pertinent enactments generally made similar provision for designated inhabitants. See generally 7 Gordon, Mailman & Yale-Loehr, § 92.02.

But what about those who would later be born in the United States? Neither the original Constitution nor the 1790 Act said whether they would become citizens at birth. The Constitution did attach several consequences to citizenship and did require also that the President be not merely a citizen but a “natural born citizen.” Nowhere, however, did the original Constitution say who the citizens are,⁵ and nowhere does even the amended Constitution explain what “natural born” means. See Charles Gordon, Who Can Be President of the United States: The Unresolved Enigma, 28 Maryland L. Rev. 1 (1968). The term “natural born” clearly includes those born in the United States and clearly excludes those who acquired their citizenship by naturalization, but the status of those who were born overseas and inherited U.S. citizenship from their parents is not clear. Id.

The presidential issue has been a live one in recent years, fueled initially by the possible future presidential candidacy of California Governor Arnold Schwarzeneger, a foreign-born, naturalized U.S. citizen. His supporters once spoke of amending the Constitution to delete the “natural-born” requirement. “Natural born” became an issue again during the 2008 Presidential campaign. Republican nominee John McCain had been born in the Canal Zone to two U.S. citizens; his father had been serving in the U.S. military. Professor Gabriel Chin, examining the relevant law and history, argued that McCain did not become a U.S. citizen until Congress passed a Canal Zone citizenship law one year later and, therefore, was not a “natural-born” citizen, as the Constitution requires. See Gabriel J. Chin, Why Senator John McCain Cannot Be President: Eleven Months and a Hundred Yards Short of Citizenship, 107 Michigan L. Rev. First Impressions 1 (2008).

5. But see U.S. Const. art. 1, § 8, cl. 4 (Congress may establish “uniform Rule of Naturalization”).

Perhaps these omissions by the framers were deliberate attempts to avoid such controversial issues as the status of the slaves and the relation between state citizenship and federal citizenship.⁶ Whatever the explanation, it was widely assumed, consistently with the English common law principle of jus soli, that persons born in the United States would generally acquire citizenship at birth. 7 Gordon, Mailman & Yale-Loehr, § 92.03[1][b].

The citizenship of the slaves could not be put off forever. Dred Scott, a slave, sued in federal court for his freedom. Federal jurisdiction hinged on whether Scott was a “citizen” of the State of Missouri. The Supreme Court, in Scott v. Sandford, 60 U.S. (19 How.) 393, 15 L.Ed. 691 (1856), held that neither slaves nor the free descendants of slaves were “citizens” within the framers’ understanding of that term.

The aftermath of the Civil War included three constitutional amendments intended in principal part to foster racial equality. The Thirteenth Amendment abolished slavery. The Fifteenth Amendment prohibited the denial of the vote on racial grounds. The Fourteenth Amendment did a number of things. Section 1, which includes both the due process clause and the equal protection clause, also responded specifically to the holding of Dred Scott:

All persons born or naturalized in the United States, and subject to the jurisdiction thereof, are citizens of the United States and of the State wherein they reside.

That constitutional command has been codified into the statutory law. See INA § 301(a).

There was no doubt that the Fourteenth Amendment enabled African-Americans born in the United States to acquire citizenship at birth. The applicability of the Fourteenth Amendment to certain other groups was not so clear. The ambiguity lay in the qualifying phrase “subject to the jurisdiction thereof.” In Elk v. Wilkins, 112 U.S. 94, 5 S.Ct. 41, 28 L.Ed. 643 (1884), the Supreme Court held that an Indian born in the United 6. See Rogers v. Bellei, 401 U.S. 815, 829, 91 S.Ct. 1060, 1068, 28 L.Ed.2d 499, 508 (1971); Charles Gordon, The Citizen and the State: Power of Congress to Expatriate American Citizens, 53 Georgetown L. Rev. 315, 318 (1965).

States but within tribal authority was not born “subject to the jurisdiction” of the United States and thus did not acquire United States citizenship at birth. (Nor would such a person attain citizenship later by leaving Indian territory and severing all relations with the tribe, although his or her children, if born in the United States outside Indian territory, presumably would acquire United States citizenship at birth.) By subsequent statute, “a person born in the United States to a member of an Indian, Eskimo, Aleutian, or other aboriginal tribe” now becomes a United States citizen at the moment of birth, INA § 301(b), but under Elk that statutory grant is not constitutionally compelled.

The last several decades of the nineteenth century saw significant immigration from China. As described earlier, see pages 127–30 above, both federal and state action discriminating against the Chinese, and eventually against Asians generally, became commonplace. Among those efforts were various statutes that generally made non-whites (interpreted to include Asians) ineligible for naturalization. You will see more on that subject shortly. One specific issue was whether a person born in the United States would become a citizen if his or her parents were LPRs who were themselves racially ineligible for naturalization. In United States v. Wong Kim Ark, 169 U.S. 649, 18 S.Ct. 456, 42 L.Ed. 890 (1898), the Supreme Court answered that question in the affirmative. More broadly, the Court added in dictum that the real purpose of the phrase “subject to the jurisdiction thereof” was to exclude * * * [besides Indians] the two classes of cases,— children born of alien enemies in hostile occupation, and children of diplomatic representatives of a foreign state—both of which * * * had been recognized exceptions to the fundamental rule of citizenship by birth within the country.⁷

As the years passed, that narrow reading of “subject to the jurisdiction thereof” became generally noncontroversial. It remained so until the publication of Peter H. Schuck & Rogers M. Smith, Citizenship Without Consent—Illegal Aliens in the American Polity (1985). The authors argued that the phrase should be reinterpreted to permit Congress to withhold citizenship from the United States-born children of noncitizens who were not LPRs. In the early 1990’s, a serious movement to amend the Constitution to eliminate birthright citizenship for the children of undocumented migrants began to build. That subject is taken up on page 1333 below.

One technical point on jus soli: The Fourteenth Amendment does not define the phrase “United States,” and issues have sometimes arisen concerning birth in territorial possessions. The current statute makes clear that persons born in Puerto Rico, Guam, and the United States Virgin Islands are United States citizens. INA § 101(a)(38). The only territorial possessions in which birth does not confer United States citizenship are 7. 169 U.S. at 682, 18 S.Ct. at 469, 42 L.Ed. at 902; see also Lucy E. Salyer, Wong Kim Ark: The Contest over Birthright Citizen- ship, in David A. Martin & Peter H. Schuck (eds.), Immigration Stories (2005), chap. 3.

American Samoa and Swains Island; as mentioned earlier, persons born there become noncitizen nationals. INA §§ 101(a)(29), 308(1).

b. JUS SANGUINIS

The Constitution has never mandated citizenship by descent, but the concept has been part of United States statutory law since 1790. See Act of March 26, 1790, ch. 3, 1 Stat. 103–04. The precise requirements have changed frequently over the years.

As you will soon see, citizenship by descent requires that one or both parents be citizens at the time of the child's birth. The law does not differentiate according to the method by which the parent(s) acquired citizenship. Consequently, one who acquires citizenship by descent can in turn pass such citizenship to his or her child, who can then pass it on to his or her child, and so on. If there were no restrictions, United States citizenship could thus be transmitted to successive generations in perpetuity, even if none of the recent descendants had ever set foot in the United States.

To prevent those results, Congress has attached two kinds of limits. First, it has generally insisted that the citizen parent(s) meet some specified residence or physical presence requirement in the United States before the child's birth. Second, at various times Congress has imposed conditions subsequent, also known as "retention requirements," decreeing that citizenship by descent terminates automatically if the child does not come to the United States and remain for a certain number of years between certain specified ages. In 1978 Congress abolished the retention requirement, but not retroactively; thus, people who had already lost citizenship by descent for failure to reside in the United States for the applicable periods did not benefit from the change. Act of Oct. 10, 1978, Pub.L. 95–432, § 1, 92 Stat. 1046. In 1994, however, Congress enacted legislation permitting anyone who had lost his or her citizenship because of the retention requirement (except for certain people ineligible on ideological grounds, see INA § 313) to regain citizenship simply by taking an oath of allegiance to the United States. See INA § 324(d), added by Pub.L. 103–416, § 103(a), 108 Stat. 4305, 4307–08 (Oct. 25, 1994).

The current provisions contain requirements concerning the parent's residence or physical presence but no longer impose any condition subsequent on the child. The two main provisions are INA §§ 301(c) and 301(g). The former subsection sets out the required elements of citizenship by descent when the child was born abroad to two United States citizen parents; the latter applies when the child was born abroad to one citizen parent and one noncitizen parent. You should now read both subsections in full.

Probably the greatest source of complexity in the descent laws is that the various statutory amendments have been given little retroactive effect. The descent law that was in force at the time of one's birth ordinarily determines whether one acquired citizenship by descent. Under that law, in turn, the claim often hinges on whether the claimant's parent was a citizen at the time of the claimant's birth. Unless the parent's citizenship changed, therefore, the claimant's citizenship might hinge on the law that had been in effect at the time of that parent's birth. Thus, the lawyer who seeks to ascertain a client's citizenship must sometimes consult laws that were repealed several decades ago.

One immigration attorney, Robert Mautino, has written a useful article describing how repealed citizenship laws continue to affect modern-day clients. Robert A. Mautino, Acquisition of Citizenship, Immigration Briefings (April 1990). After summarizing in tabular form the requirements for citizenship by descent for children born in wedlock during various time periods,⁸ Mr. Mautino presents a series of fact Problems based on actual cases he has handled. Some of those Problems are reproduced below in the forms in which they appear in Mautino's article, with occasional modifications noted. Refer to his chart as you work through the Problems. In doing so, assume you are the immigration lawyer and look for ways to establish the client's United States citizenship. Failing that, see whether anyone else's United States citizenship might be a basis for the client's admission as an LPR on family grounds.

Robert A. Mautino, Acquisition of Citizenship

Immigration Briefings (April 1990), pp. 5, 8, 12-13.

* * *

Date of Birth of Child	Residence Required of Parent(s) to Transmit Citizenship	Residence Required of Child to Retain Citizenship
Before 5/24/34	[Parent] is citizen who resided in U.S. before birth.	None
On or after 5/24/34 and before 1/13/41	a. Both parents are citizens, one with prior residence. b. One parent is citizen with prior residence.	None Same as immediately below
On or after 1/13/41 and before 12/24/52	a. One parent is citizen with 10 years of prior residence in U.S., at least 5 of which were after age 16. b. Both parents are citizens, one with prior residence in U.S.	2 years continuous presence in U.S. between ages 14-28, except no retention requirement if born on or after 10/10/52. None

8. An analogous table summarizes the statutory changes affecting children born out of wedlock. See id., Chart 2, at 6.

Date of Birth of Child	Residence Required of Parent(s) to Transmit Citizenship	Residence Required of Child to Retain Citizenship
On or after 12/24/52	a. Both parents are citizens, one with prior residence in U.S. b. One citizen parent with 10 years of prior physical presence in U.S., at least 5 of which were after age 14 (for births 12/24/52 to 11/13/86) or One citizen parent with 5 years of prior physical presence in U.S., at least 2 of which were after age 14 (for births on or after 11/14/86).	None None. The retention requirement was abolished effective 10/10/78. Persons still citizens on that date have no retention requirements.

[In this chart, all references to "prior" residence or physical presence mean residence or physical presence prior to the birth of the citizenship claimant.—Eds.]

PROBLEMS 1-3⁹

Problem 1. Frank Alvarez and his sister Maria have just come to your office on a passport matter. Frank was denied a passport by the State Department's Passport Agency in Los Angeles, and he does not understand why—he has always considered himself a U.S. citizen. * * * You question Frank and Maria about their ancestry and learn the following facts. Frank was born in Mexico on May 3, 1941. Maria was born in Mexico on June 25, 1934. Their mother was born in the U.S. in 1917, and she is still a U.S. citizen. The mother went to Mexico in 1933 where she married their father and where she resided until 1942. At that time, she separated from the father and took the children to the U.S. where [Frank has] since resided. [Maria returned to Mexico on December 20, 1949 to stay with her father. She came back to the United States on December 20, 1960 and has lived here ever since.]¹⁰ The father was born in Mexico in 1913. However, his father (their paternal grandfather) was born in [the United States]¹¹ in 1867. He moved to Mexico in 1875 and resided there for the rest of his life. The paternal grandmother was born in [the United States] in 1870 and moved to Mexico in 1876. * * *

9. Problems 1-3 are modifications of Mautino's Problems 1, 9, and 10, respectively.

10. The bracketed sentences were added by the editors and are fictitious.—Eds.

11. The original Problem, as it appears in Immigration Briefings, states that the paternal grandfather was born in New Mexico. That fact has been deleted here in order to eliminate complications concerning the effect of birth in a place that had not yet achieved, but soon would achieve, statehood.—Eds.

[First, is either Frank or Maria a United States citizen? Second, try to figure out what assumptions the Passport Office probably made and why those assumptions might have prompted it to deny a passport to Frank. Third, on those same assumptions, do you think the Passport Office would have issued a passport to Maria?]

* * *

Problem 2. Guillermo Schmidt, a Mexican citizen, was referred by a lawyer who was handling his business arrangements. Guillermo wanted to open a business in the communications field in the Los Angeles area. Included in his plans was the possible purchase of a Spanish-language radio station plus other similar investments. Guillermo came to us to see how he could arrange his immigration status to accomplish his business objectives. He was ready to present us with a pound or two of business and financial documents, but we first asked him questions about his ancestors. We learned the following.

Guillermo was born in Mexico in 1937. He had been in the U.S. on countless occasions, but apart from two years when he attended high school in Michigan he never lived in the U.S. His father was born in northwestern Mexico in 1901, and his mother was born in central Mexico. His paternal grandfather was born in New York in 1850, but he lived most of his youth in Sacramento and San Francisco, California. When the paternal grandfather married a Mexican national in 1890, his family disavowed him, and he moved with his wife to northern Mexico where he worked in the mining business. The paternal grandfather died suddenly in 1905, leaving his wife with five small children and one on the way. The wife then moved to the town of Nogales, Arizona, where she raised her children. She lived in Nogales the rest of her life, and died there in 1940.

* * *

Problem 3.¹² In 1988 David contacted our office. * * * [H]e wanted to apply for permanent residence. [He and his wife, Mary, had spent their entire lives in Canada. Mary is there now, and David is here in the United States on a temporary work visa. Mary's paternal great-grandfather was born in Pennsylvania in 1842 and moved to Canada as a small child. His son (Mary's paternal grandfather) was born in Canada, where he remained his entire life except for a three-year stay in the United States from 1889 to 1892. In 1930 Mary's father was born, also in Canada. Mary was born in Canada in 1953. In 1975, Mary's parents left Canada for the first time ever and moved permanently to the United States, where they continue to reside. What advice would you give David?]

JUS SANGUINIS AND THE CONSTITUTION

As noted earlier, nothing in the Constitution mandates citizenship by descent. That doesn't mean that Congress is constitutionally free to subject citizenship by descent to any conditions it wishes. But what are the limits?

¹². This Problem has been both substantively modified and paraphrased.—Eds.

These questions arose in Rogers v. Bellei, 401 U.S. 815, 91 S.Ct. 1060, 28 L.Ed.2d 499 (1971). Bellei, born abroad, had acquired United States citizenship at birth by virtue of having one United States citizen parent who had resided for a specified period in the United States before Bellei's birth. The applicable statute, however, provided that Bellei would eventually lose his citizenship if he himself did not reside continuously in the United States for certain lengths of time between certain ages. Having failed to meet that condition subsequent, he argued it violated, among other provisions, both fifth amendment due process and the constitutional dictate that "[a]ll persons born or naturalized in the United States, and subject to the jurisdiction thereof, are citizens of the United States * * *." U.S. Const. amend. XIV, § 1.

The Supreme Court upheld the statute by a 5-4 vote. The Court assumed, first, that Congress's power to confer citizenship by descent was part of its constitutionally delegated power to "establish an uniform Rule of Naturalization." U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 4. To support that assumption, the Court observed that "[t]he very first Congress * * * implement[ed] its power [under the naturalization clause], by producing the [1790] Act," which included a grant of citizenship by descent. 401 U.S. at 823, 91 S.Ct. at 1065, 28 L.Ed.2d at 505. (Note this interpretation of "naturalization" is broader than the present statutory definition, which is limited to nationality conferred "after birth." INA § 101(a)(23)).

Still, the Court held, Bellei was naturalized abroad, not "in the United States" as the Fourteenth Amendment citizenship clause requires. 401 U.S. at 827, 91 S.Ct. at 1067, 28 L.Ed.2d at 507. Thus, nothing in that clause required Congress to make his citizenship permanent. The dissenters argued that "born or naturalized in the United States" means "born in the United States or naturalized by the laws thereof," citing an earlier draft of the citizenship clause. 401 U.S. at 843, 91 S.Ct. at 1075, 28 L.Ed.2d at 516-17.

Having generally approved the use of statutory conditions subsequent, the Court had to assess "the constitutionality" of this particular condition subsequent. 401 U.S. at 831, 91 S.Ct. at 1069, 28 L.Ed.2d at 510. (The Court did not specify which constitutional limitation it was interpreting, but substantive due process is a good bet.) The Court assumed without explanation that the constitutional test was whether the condition was "unreasonable, arbitrary or unlawful." Id. Citing Congress's concern with the problems of dual citizenship (see section A.3 below), the Court then held that the subsequent residence condition met the constitutional test.

Several cases have raised questions concerning the constitutionality of gender-based classifications in provisions that confer citizenship by descent. By statute, individuals who were born outside the United States before 1934 could derive citizenship from their citizen fathers but not from their citizen mothers. See generally 7 Gordon, Mailman & Yale-Loehr, § 93.02[4]. In Villanueva-Jurado v. INS, 482 F.2d 886 (5th Cir.1973), the government brought deportation proceedings against a person who had been born abroad, before 1934, to a United States citizen mother and a noncitizen father. The respondent claimed citizenship, arguing the statutory distinction was “invidious” and therefore unconstitutional, presumably based on the fifth amendment due process equivalent of equal protection. Citing Bellei, the respondent argued that the court should at least inquire whether the distinction was “unreasonable, arbitrary, or unlawful.” The court refused. It observed that an “alien has no constitutional right to citizenship which is a privilege conferred as a matter of grace by Congress * * *.” Id. at 887. It added that “Congress has a completely free hand in defining citizenship as it relates to persons born abroad.” Id. The court distinguished Bellei as concerned solely with conditions subsequent rather than conditions precedent. Id. at 887–88.

In Elias v. United States Dept. of State, 721 F.Supp. 243 (N.D.Cal. 1989), a district court took the opposite view. The plaintiff, also born abroad before 1934 to a citizen mother and a noncitizen father, applied for a United States passport. The State Department denied it on the ground that under the applicable statute she was not a United States citizen. She made two distinct equal protection arguments—that the gender classification violated her own right to equal protection, and that it violated her mother’s right to equal protection by allowing men but not women to transmit citizenship to their children.

The court declined to address the plaintiff’s first argument. It acknowledged that constitutional review of “immigration” legislation was limited but suggested that even under a narrow standard of review the plaintiff’s first argument was “plausible” and that a court might disapprove the rationale of Villanueva-Jurado. The court preferred, however, to rest its decision on the plaintiff’s second argument. After concluding she had standing to assert the equal protection rights of her deceased mother, the court turned to the merits. The government argued that the statute was essentially unreviewable, emphasizing first that there exists no constitutional right to transmit citizenship to one’s children. The court pointed out that that fact does not avoid the need to obey the commands of equal protection when the government elects to permit the transmission of citizenship. Id. at 247–48.

The government then argued that the principle of plenary congressional power over immigration, which you studied in chapter 2, prohibited “judicial reevaluation” of this statute. Id. at 247. Citing Kleindienst v. Mandel, 408 U.S. 753, 92 S.Ct. 2576, 33 L.Ed.2d 683 (1972) (discussed on pages 179–80 above), the court held that, when United States citizens are affected by “immigration legislation,” the government must show “at least a facially legitimate and bona fide reason for its action.” 721 F.Supp. at 248.

Applying that test, the court in Elias noted the government had offered “no rationale at all” to support the statutory distinction. Id. at 249. Emphasizing also the “suspect” nature of the class (actually gender classifications have generally been held to trigger only intermediate scrutiny rather than the strict scrutiny applicable to suspect classes) and the important individual interest in family living arrangements, the court held the statutory discrimination against women unconstitutional.

Despite that decision, the State Department, quite concerned to establish that passport issuance is solely a Department prerogative, announced it would continue to deny passports in Elias-type fact situations and eventually to litigate the issue in another court. See Gary Endelman, Mother Knows Best: A New Look at an Old Law, 13 Immigration J. 29, 30 (Apr.-June 1990). Ultimately, the Department did not get its way. After another court followed Elias, see Wauchope v. USDOS, 985 F.2d 1407 (9th Cir. 1993), Congress in 1994 granted citizenship to people who had been born overseas before 1934 to United States citizen mothers. See INA § 301(h).

Even in Elias, the court characterized the jus sanguinis provision as “immigration legislation” and therefore subject to exceptionally limited review for constitutionality. And the availability of even that limited review seemed to rest on the court’s conclusion that the rights of United States citizens (there, the plaintiff’s mother) were adversely affected. That the classification was disfavored might also have contributed to the result. Do you think the arguments for exceptional deference to Congress on matters concerning admission and expulsion apply with equal force to matters that concern citizenship? In framing your answer, consider the various theories of special deference that you encountered in chapter 2. See also Price v. INS, 962 F.2d 836 (9th Cir.1991) (amended opinion) (displaying similar deference).

Gender discrimination in citizenship by descent has triggered other equal protection issues in recent years. INA § 309(a) has been especially difficult. It grants citizenship by descent to children born out of wedlock to United States citizen mothers, but not to children born out of wedlock to United States citizen fathers unless additional hurdles are cleared. The additional requirements in the father cases include a showing of biological parentage by “clear and convincing evidence” and further requirements concerning, among other things, parental financial responsibility. In numerous cases either the children or the fathers have challenged this statutory classification on equal protection grounds, observing that none of these requirements are imposed when an out-of-wedlock child claims citizenship through his or her mother. In Miller v. Albright, 523 U.S. 420, 118 S.Ct. 1428, 140 L.Ed.2d 575 (1998), a fractured Supreme Court was unable to forge a majority position. For a thoughtful critique, see Linda Kelly, The Alienation of Fathers, 6 Michigan J. Race & L. 181 (2000). Three years later, however, in Nguyen v. INS, 533 U.S. 53, 121 S.Ct. 2053, 150 L.Ed.2d 115 (2001), the Supreme Court upheld the constitutionality of section 309(a) by a vote of 5-4. As discussed on pages 175–76 above, the majority in Nguyen concluded that the statute withstood even the intermediate level of scrutiny generally applicable to gender-based classifications. Thus, the Court said, it was unnecessary to decide whether citizenship provisions warrant the exceptional deference to Congress that the plenary power doctrine prescribes for immigration statutes. See M. Isabel Medina, Real Differences and Stereotypes—Two Visions of Gender, Citizenship, and International Law, 7 N.Y. City L. Rev. 315 (2004).

2. CITIZENSHIP ACQUIRED AFTER BIRTH

The United States Constitution authorizes Congress to “establish an uniform Rule of Naturalization.” U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 4.¹³ The word “naturalization” usually conjures up heartwarming images of courtroom scenes in which judges confer citizenship on proud and thankful immigrants. That type of naturalization, which until 1990 required the applicant to complete an administrative agency process and then to appear in court, has been by far both the most common and the most familiar form of naturalization. In everyday parlance the word “naturalization” is typically used to describe that particular process.

For two reasons, however, that depiction is not entirely accurate. First, the Immigration Act of 1990, § 401, amending INA § 310(a), transferred from the courts to the Attorney General (now the Secretary of Homeland Security, delegated to USCIS) the authority to grant naturalization. The judicial role has not been entirely eliminated, however, since the applicant may elect, and in many cases may be required, to take the final oath in court. In addition, the courts have jurisdiction to review naturalization denials de novo. See INA §§ 310(b), (c). The procedures are discussed in section A.2.a.ii below in more detail.

Second, the technical meaning of “naturalization” is nationality conferred after birth. See INA § 101(a)(23). Several miscellaneous laws that award nationality (which normally includes citizenship) after birth, therefore, are also forms of naturalization. To make the distinction, the immigration literature used to use the phrase “judicial naturalization” to describe the familiar type of naturalization discussed above. In the light of the 1990 amendments, a more appropriate name is “administrative naturalization,” see Imm. Act 1990, § 401, and that term will be used here. The bulk of the coverage in this section will address the substantive criteria and procedures for receiving administrative naturalization. The other miscellaneous processes will be mentioned briefly below.

a. ADMINISTRATIVE NATURALIZATION

Congress wasted little time in enacting a naturalization statute. The Act of March 26, 1790, ch. 3, 1 Stat. 103–04, made eligible any applicant who was free, white (amended after the Civil War to add African-Americans), resident at least two years in the United States and at least one year in the state in which he or she applied, and of good moral character. The person had only to apply to “any common law court of record,” prove the necessary facts, and take an oath of allegiance to the United States. Id.

¹³ The word “uniform” was inserted to prohibit the kinds of state-by-state variations that had been in force before ratification of the Constitution—not to prohibit other distinctions Congress might wish to draw. See generally 7 Gordon, Mailman & Yale-Loehr, § 94.01[1].

Since then the substantive requirements have frequently been either tightened or loosened in response to changing national attitudes toward immigration generally. At the same time, the corresponding procedures became steadily more elaborate, at least until the 1990 reforms.

After a three-year period of rapid rise (roughly five years after the large number of legalizations to LPR status in 1990 and 1991 as a result of IRCA), naturalizations for the most part reverted to levels approximating those of earlier years, though more recently they have rebounded. The chart below demonstrates how quickly the numbers can change:

Year	Petitions Filed	Persons Naturalized
1991	206,668	307,394
1992	342,238	239,664
1993	521,866	313,590
1994	543,353	429,173
1995	959,963	485,720
1996	1,277,403	1,040,991
1997	1,412,712	596,210
1998	932,957	461,169
1999	765,346	837,418
2000	460,916	886,026
2001	501,643	606,259
2002	700,649	573,646
2003	523,370	462,435
2004	662,796	537,151
2005	602,972	604,280
2006	730,642	702,589
2007	1,383,275	660,477

2007 Yearbook of Immigration Statistics, Table 20. (The differences between filings and naturalizations do not represent denials. USCIS cannot complete all applications in the fiscal years in which they are filed; thus, naturalizations include approvals of applications that were filed in prior years.)

Of concern to many is the fact that immigrants from different countries have markedly different inclinations to naturalize. Inclinations are complex to assess because there are long gaps between admission for permanent residence and naturalization—generally a five-year minimum under current law, see INA § 316(a), considered shortly. Among those people who were admitted as immigrants in 1977, about 41.5% had naturalized by September 30, 1993. Within that 1977 cohort, the naturalization percentages varied considerably by country of nationality. Immigrants and refugees from the Soviet Union and Asia were by far the most likely to have naturalized. Mexicans and Canadians were among the least likely, but Mexican naturalization rates have increased significantly since 1993, for reasons you will encounter in a moment. Here are some selected naturalization rates from the 1977 cohort:

Country of Nationality	Percentage Naturalized
Soviet Union	63.3
Philippines	62.0
China	60.9
Korea	55.8
India	53.7
Cuba	39.8
Haiti	38.2
United Kingdom	19.3
Mexico	17.6
Italy	16.7
Germany	14.7
Canada	14.5

INS 1994 Statistical Yearbook, Table K.

By 2001, the naturalization rate for Mexicans had risen to 34% (again, for reasons considered below), and the corresponding rates for those born in other Latin American countries ranged from 40% to 58%. Michael Fix, Jeffrey S. Passel, & Kenneth Sucher, Trends in Naturalization, 80 IR 1473, 1475 (Oct. 27, 2003). In 2007, Mexico was the leading country of birth among persons naturalizing; India was a distant second. 2007 Yearbook of Immigration Statistics, Table 21.

CITIZENSHIP USA

Jana Mason, U.S. Committee for Refugees, Citizenship Under Attack: Congress Investigates Motives Behind INS Initiative

17 Refugee Reports, No. 11, at 1-4 (Nov./Dec. 1996).

Motherhood, apple pie, and citizenship. It used to be that these three were invoked together, as unassailable symbols of what it meant to be American. Until recently, immigration and refugee advocates believed that no matter how much immigration came under attack * * * the effort to naturalize new Americans would be held harmless. After all, what could there be to criticize about the process by which persons who come to this country for reasons of family, work, or freedom become fully participating members of society? In an election year, advocates found out, there can be much to criticize.

* * *

The reasons for th[e] dramatic increase [in naturalization petitions in the mid 1990s] are several-fold.¹⁴ Perhaps the most important is the large

14. Observers generally share the views expressed in the excerpted article concerning the causes of the upsurge. In addition to those causes, however, one researcher suggests others—economic and political instability in Mexico, an INS program requiring LPRs to replace their green cards if they wish to remain, and community-based naturalization drives. Rob Paral, Naturalization: New Demands and New Directions at the INS, 72 IR 937, 937-39 (July 17, 1995).—Eds.

number of immigrants who legalized their status under a 1986 law and have thus become eligible for citizenship. In addition, many advocates believe that the recently enacted welfare and immigration reform laws are providing an extra incentive for persons to change their status from "permanent resident" to U.S. citizen. * * * [See section C of this chapter for more detail on the 1996 welfare reform legislation.—Eds.]

* * *

While the conventional wisdom is that the specific impact of these laws is spurring permanent residents to become citizens, some observers also say that many immigrants are reacting to an increasingly hostile anti-immigrant mood in general. * * *

The rush to naturalize, however, did not start with the passage of these bills. The 1986 law, refugee admissions, and other factors had led to steady increases in the number of citizenship applications filed during the past several years and created large backlogs in processing as well as delays in swearing in those approved. In many cities, applicants often waited for a year or longer for an INS interview and then, once approved, had to wait again to be sworn in as citizens. * * *

* * *

In an effort to respond to both the backlogs and the growing criticism by advocates who contended that the naturalization process was unnecessarily confusing and intimidating, INS in August 1995 initiated Citizenship USA, an effort to reduce the naturalization waiting periods significantly by increasing staff, enhancing technology, streamlining procedures, and using community-based organizations to assist applicants with each stage of the process. INS also began exploring additional changes such as a standardized oral interview.

Initially concentrating on the five cities that account for 75 percent of all citizenship applications, Citizenship USA resulted in unprecedented increases in the numbers of immigrants processed for citizenship and became viewed by some observers as one of the much-criticized agency's most successful initiatives. * * *

Congress Probes Initiative, Calls for Independent Counsel. As Citizenship USA progressed and as the election neared, several members of Congress expressed concerns that the effort to naturalize large numbers of immigrants was a Clinton Administration strategy to increase the number of registered Democrats going to the polls. At the same time, allegations began to surface about two aspects of the initiative that would become the subject of Congressional hearings.

First, the use of community-based agencies as testing centers for the citizenship exam came under attack. * * * Although each applicant must be interviewed by an INS examiner, at which time spoken English ability is assessed, the knowledge of written English and history/civics is demonstrated through a written test that can be taken either at an INS office or at an approved test center location. Many advocates believe that the ability to take the written test outside of INS offices reduces the anxiety of many immigrants. * * *

In early July, the television show 20/20 aired a story about a testing company that helped immigrants pass the naturalization exam through fraud. In particular, proctors were accused of giving immigrants the answers to questions. In response, Rep. Zeff and other members of Congress charged that a number of test centers were likely responsible for fraud or at least lax security. * * * (Although the vast majority of test centers are nonprofit agencies, a few are not.)

The second and more explosive allegation was the charge that INS had naturalized persons without completing the process of FBI fingerprint checks, which reveals whether the immigrant is in the FBI database and may have been convicted of an offense that makes the immigrant ineligible to naturalize. (A database match does not necessarily mean a conviction, however, because anyone who has ever been fingerprinted and whose prints have been sent to the FBI would be in the database.)

These allegations, particularly those related to the fingerprint checks, led some members of Congress and groups such as the Federation for American Immigration Reform (FAIR), which wants immigration reduced, to charge that the INS, under direct orders from the White House, was intentionally rushing the naturalization process to get as many new immigrants as possible through the process before the election. Although reliable data on the voting preferences of new immigrants is unavailable, some observers had speculated that welfare reform and the general anti-immigrant mood would cause new citizen voters to "punish" those responsible.

These concerns were aired and defended at Capitol Hill hearings held by [Rep. Bill Zeff (R-N.H.), Senator Alan Simpson (R-Wyoming)], and House immigration subcommittee Chair Lamar Smith (R-Tex.). * * *

* * * The results of the investigation have since yielded little hard data, with naturalization proponents and critics debating both the numbers and the significance of the FBI records. Zeff wrote to the governors of six states with large immigrant populations, saying the FBI records confirmed his worst fears and including examples of "the most egregious" cases of criminal aliens. Immigration officials have countered that only a small number of immigrants with felony convictions have slipped through the cracks, and that not all technical felonies are "egregious." In her own letter to all 50 governors, INS Commissioner Doris Meissner said, "INS deports criminal aliens; we do not naturalize them."

* * *

On November 1, Zeff and four fellow committee Republicans wrote to the Attorney General requesting the appointment of an independent counsel to investigate "criminal fraud and abuse" in Citizenship USA. The letter charged that the program was "corrupted by a reckless drive for political gain" in the upcoming elections.

* * * A month later, on December 4, Attorney General Reno denied the request for an independent counsel. In a letter addressed to Zeff, the Justice Department said there is "no specific and credible evidence" that senior Administration officials covered by the Independent Counsel Act participated in criminal activity related to Citizenship USA. "To the extent that there are allegations of wrongdoing that may warrant criminal investigation," said the letter, "at this time they relate only to low-ranking officials and private companies" and do not present a conflict of interest for the Justice Department in investigating and prosecuting them. The letter noted that one prosecution has already occurred.

On the same day, the Justice Department and INS publicly announced new initiatives, some of which had already begun, to improve the naturalization process. * * *

* * *

The former INS, with quality assurance review by the EOIR, later studied the granted cases in which criminal issues were present. The GAO then reviewed both studies and reported its (minor) recommendations. See U.S. General Accounting Office, Naturalized Aliens: Efforts to Determine If INS Improperly Naturalized Some Aliens, GAO/GGD-98-62 (March 1998). A subsequent investigation by the Justice Department's Inspector General found flaws in the naturalization process but no political motivations. The report is digested in 77 IR at 1198 (Aug. 21, 2000).

Post-election surveys revealed an irony. Republicans were accusing Democrats of seeking to naturalize people liberally and speedily out of a belief that naturalized voters were disproportionately likely to vote for President Clinton. Yet Republican Candidate Bob Dole ended up doing better among foreign-born voters (receiving 46%) than he did among native-born voters (receiving 42%). AILA, Immigration Policy Report No. 26 (1997) (citing CNN/Time exit poll). That study, however, does not reveal how the candidates fared among recently naturalized voters.

One interesting study sought to learn more about what motivates people to apply for naturalization and what obstacles they encountered. The authors interviewed 526 LPRs living in Texas who had at least taken preliminary steps toward naturalization. The study found the most important motivations to be "perceptions of the life chances they, their children, and extended family members will have in the U.S. as compared to the country of origin or to those available to them as non-citizen permanent residents." Susan González-Baker et al., Tomás Rivera Institute, The Making of Americans—Results of the Texas Naturalization Survey, Policy Brief (Aug. 2000). Other considerations, such as welfare benefits and dissatisfaction with their home governments, were found to be only "minor" motivating factors. Id. Few obstacles were reported; the most significant was the English language requirement, id., discussed below.

i. Substantive Criteria

As already noted, only a "free white person" could qualify for naturalization under the 1790 Act. Over time, statutes created limited exceptions to the racial disqualification. African-Americans were made eligible after the Civil War.¹⁵

In the 1920's the Supreme Court rendered a series of decisions holding various groups to be nonwhite.¹⁶ To express support for a World War II ally, Congress exempted the Chinese. Act of December 17, 1943, ch. 344, § 3, 57 Stat. 600, 601. The INA, enacted in 1952, finally abolished all racial restrictions on naturalization. INA § 311.

At one time women faced analogous statutory discrimination. On the theory that a husband and wife were one person (namely, the husband), and that they should therefore share the husband's nationality, women married to noncitizens were ineligible for naturalization. The Act of Sept. 22, 1922, ch. 411, § 1, 42 Stat. 1021-22, removed that bar, and the present statute expressly prohibits sex discrimination in naturalization. INA § 311.

Although detailed examination of all the current naturalization criteria is not possible here,¹⁷ a sketch of the basic requirements is worthwhile:

(1) Lawful permanent residence. Naturalization applicants (except for certain armed forces personnel discussed below) must first be "lawfully admitted to the United States for permanent residence in accordance with all applicable provisions of [the INA]." INA § 318. Obviously, this language disqualifies those who have been admitted only as nonimmigrants and those who have not been admitted at all. Perhaps less obviously, the word "lawfully" leaves out those who were admitted as LPRs on the basis of fraudulent documents or while otherwise inadmissible. See generally 7 Gordon, Mailman & Yale-Loehr, § 95.02[2][a]. INA § 318 also specifies that naturalization may not be conferred while removal proceedings are pending or while a final finding of deportability is outstanding.

(2) Residence and Physical Presence. The applicant must "reside" continuously in the United States during the five-year period immediately preceding the filing of the application, all after admission as an LPR; must be "physically present" in the United States for at least half that period; and must "reside" continuously in the United States from the filing of the application to the grant of naturalization. INA § 316(a).¹⁸ These requirements are waived, however, if the petitioner "has been living in marital union" with a United States citizen during the applicable three-year period. INA § 319(a). Other relaxations of these and of other substantive requirements apply to children of United States citizens. INA § 322.

15. Act of July 14, 1870, ch. 254, § 7, 16 Stat. 254, 256. See George A. Martínez, Immigration and the Meaning of United States Citizenship: Whiteness and Assimilation, 46 Washburn L.J. 335 (2007).

16. See Takao Ozawa v. United States, 260 U.S. 178, 43 S.Ct. 65, 67 L.Ed. 199 (1922) (Japanese); United States v. Thind, 261 U.S. 204, 43 S.Ct. 338, 67 L.Ed. 616 (1923) (Hindus); Toyota v. United States, 268 U.S. 402, 410, 45 S.Ct. 563, 565, 69 L.Ed. 1016, 1019 (1925) (Filipinos).

17. See generally 7 Gordon, Mailman & Yale-Loehr, ch. 95.

18. Periods of conditional residence under INA § 216 (applicable to certain immigrants who achieve permanent residence through marriage) count as continuous residence. INA § 216(e).

As of November 2006, some 30,000 noncitizens (about one-third of them from Mexico and Central America) were serving in the U.S. armed forces. They have generally been successful, with attrition rates lower than those of their U.S. citizen counterparts. See David McLemore, Immigrant Soldiers Serve the U.S., Dallas Morning News (Nov. 28, 2006). As a reward for their service, they receive several concessions concerning naturalization. The various durational residency requirements are waived for anyone who “has served honorably” in the U.S. armed forces for one year in total (and who, if discharged, was discharged honorably). The details are in INA § 328. Moreover, if the person has served honorably in either active service or the Ready Reserve at a time of “military operations involving armed conflict with a hostile force,” then the statute waives not only the durational residency requirements but also the LPR requirement. See INA § 329. On February 23, 2009 this latter provision assumed added significance, as the Defense Department began implementing a pilot program called Military Accessions Vital to National Interest (MAVNI). Under that program, certain nonimmigrants, refugees, asylees, and miscellaneous others are permitted to enlist in the Army if they have any of certain critical skills. In exchange, these enlistees become eligible to apply for naturalization (skipping the LPR step) within six months. To be eligible for the pilot program, the enlistee must be a doctor, nurse, or person who is proficient in one of several designated languages. The minimum terms of commitment vary by category. The program was to continue until December 31, 2009 or until 1000 had enlisted, whichever occurred first. After that, the Department was to announce whether the program would be continued, terminated, or modified. For the details, see Margaret D. Stock, Ten Things that Immigration Lawyers Should Know about the Army’s New Non-Citizen Recruiting Program, 14 BIB 347 (Mar. 15, 2009).

(3) Good Moral Character. During all the periods for which residence and physical presence are required, the petitioner must demonstrate good moral character. INA § 316(a)(3). The meaning of the phrase “good moral character” was explored earlier in a different context. See page 604 above. As you might recall, the statute lists specific characteristics that automatically preclude a showing of good moral character but cautions that those preclusions are not exhaustive. INA § 101(f); see generally 7 Gordon, Mailman & Yale-Loehr, § 95.04[1].

(4) Age. Only those age 18 and older may apply for administrative naturalization. INA § 334(b). Children are often eligible for derivative naturalization, discussed below.

(5) English Language. The petitioner must generally demonstrate “an understanding of the English language, including an ability to read, write, and speak words in ordinary usage.” INA § 312(a)(1). There are exceptions based on physical disability and on combinations of age and long-term United States residence. Id. Professor Angela McCaffrey, in Hmong Veterans’ Naturalization Act: Precedent for Waiving the English Language Requirement for the Elderly, 19 Georgetown Immigration L.J. 495 (2005), invokes special legislation for Hmong veterans to argue that Congress should waive the English language requirement for all those who have been LPRs for five years and are over age 50. That specific issue aside, do you approve of the English language requirement? What if the applicant intends to reside permanently in Puerto Rico? Professor Peter Spiro has advocated repealing this requirement. See Peter J. Spiro, Questioning Barriers to Naturalization, 13 Georgetown Immigration L.J. 479 (1999).

(6) Knowledge of Civics. Also required is “a knowledge and understanding of the fundamentals of the history, and of the principles and form of government, of the United States.” INA § 312(a)(2). Professor Spiro similarly urged repealing this requirement. See Spiro, item 5 above.

(7) Political Requirements. In previous chapters you encountered the wide range of political beliefs, statements, and associations that render noncitizens inadmissible and, until 1990, deportable. See chapter 5, § B above (exclusion) and chapter 7, § E above (deportation). The 1990 reforms do not extend to naturalization. INA § 313 disqualifies all applicants who, either during the ten-year period immediately preceding the filing of the application or during the interval between the filing and the taking of the final oath of citizenship, fell within any of the several related classes. The ineligible classes include advocates of opposition to organized government, members of the Communist Party, see INA § 313(a)(1, 2), and several others.

In addition to the absence of political disqualifications, the petitioner must affirmatively demonstrate an attachment to the principles of the United States Constitution. INA § 316(a). Along the same lines, the petitioner must swear under oath that he or she supports the Constitution, renounces all foreign allegiances, will defend all federal laws against all enemies, will bear true allegiance to those laws, and, subject to certain conscientious objector exceptions, will bear arms for the United States if required by law. INA § 337(a); see generally 7 Gordon, Mailman & Yale-Loehr, § 95.04[2]. The words of the required oath are laid out in 8 CFR § 337.1(a) (2008). As noted in the discussion of dual citizenship, section A.3 below, not all countries give effect to the renunciation portions of such oaths.

The citizenship oath contains some archaic language (e.g., references to foreign princes and potentates). In 2003 USCIS floated a proposal (not published in the Federal Register) for modernizing the language and for expressly recognizing the multiple options of promising to defend the Constitution by “military, noncombatant or civilian service.” The proposal encountered fierce resistance from traditionalists and was quietly shelved. See Shweta Govindarajan, Criticism Puts Citizenship Oath Revision on Hold, L.A. Times (Sept. 18, 2003), at A13.

In re Petition for Naturalization of Vafaei-Makhsoos

United States District Court, District of Minnesota, 1984.
597 F.Supp. 499.

■ MACLAUGHLIN, DISTRICT JUDGE.

* * *

The facts in this case are undisputed. Petitioner, a resident of Burnsville, Minnesota, was born in Iran on May 14, 1946 and is a citizen of that country. His last permanent address prior to coming to the United States was in Teheran, Iran. Petitioner entered the United States in June 1968 as a student. Petitioner's status was adjusted to that of lawful permanent resident alien, pursuant to INA § 245, on December 22, 1977.

Petitioner left the United States in July, 1978 and remained outside the country until May of 1979. He left the United States again on or about June 26, 1979 in order to attend his mother's funeral in Iran and to take care of related family matters. Petitioner was accompanied by his wife, a citizen of Iran, and their child, a United States citizen. The American Embassy in Teheran was taken over by pro-revolutionary students in November of 1979, and the Iranian government banned all travel to the United States during the ensuing hostage crisis. Petitioner was therefore unable to return to the United States until June 1, 1981, at which time the Iranian government had lifted the travel ban.

When the petitioner attempted to reenter the United States, the immigration inspector refused to admit him as a lawful permanent resident because his reentry permit had expired. Petitioner was admitted to the country under "parole status," which meant that he could physically enter the United States despite his failure to comply with the legal requirements for entry. INS subsequently began deportation proceedings against him. A hearing was held before an immigration judge on January 20, 1982 and July 21, 1982. The issue at this hearing was whether the petitioner had abandoned his lawful permanent resident status due to his absence. The immigration judge held that petitioner had not abandoned this status, and allowed petitioner to remain in the United States as a lawful permanent resident.

Petitioner filed the instant petition for naturalization on June 9, 1983.

* * *

The INS has recommended that the instant petition be denied because it is barred by section 316(b) of the Immigration and Nationality Act of 1952, as amended. That section provides, in pertinent part, that:

Absence from the United States for a continuous period of one year or more during the period for which continuous residence is required for admission to citizenship (whether preceding or subsequent to the filing of the petition for naturalization) shall break the continuity of such residence. . . .

The period of continuous residence that is required for naturalization is five years; the petitioner must be physically present in the country for periods totaling at least half of that time. Id. § 316(a). The statutory bar in section 316(b) for those persons absent for more than one year provides exceptions only for individuals employed by the United States government, by an American corporation engaged in foreign trade, by a public international organization, or by an American research institution recognized by the Attorney General.

The petitioner in the instant case clearly falls within the language of section 316(b). Petitioner was outside of the United States for almost two years during the five year period preceding his naturalization petition. Moreover, he does not fall within one of the specific narrow exceptions to section 316(b). The issue raised by the instant petition is whether petitioner's involuntary absence constitutes "absence" within the meaning of section 316(b). The statutory language itself draws no distinction between voluntary and involuntary absences. Moreover, the INS correctly cites two decisions which have held that a voluntary departure from the United States, followed by an involuntary absence of more than one year, precludes naturalization. * * * There is no authority to the contrary.¹⁹

While the strict interpretation * * * yields a harsh result, the reasoning of these cases is persuasive. The statute provides for several specific exceptions to the one year absence rule; the involuntary character of the petitioner's absence is not included within these exceptions. The conclusion that Congress meant to erect an absolute bar in cases of absences greater than one year is strengthened by the fact that the statute specifically allows petitioners the opportunity to demonstrate that they did not abandon their United States residence in cases of shorter absences (from six months to one year). INA § 316(b). Finally, the * * * purpose of the five year continuous residence requirement * * * was presumably to ensure that petitioners for citizenship have been considerably exposed to American institutions. An exception for involuntary absences would undercut this purpose.

Petitioner's argument is essentially that since the immigration judge has found that petitioner did not abandon his lawful permanent residence status due to the time he spent in Iran, this period should not be considered as an absence for the purposes of naturalization. This argument is without merit. The issues before the immigration judge at petitioner's deportation hearing are entirely distinct from the issue presently before the Court in connection with the instant petition for naturalization. At the deportation hearing, the critical issues were whether petitioner intended to abandon his permanent resident status when he left for Iran and whether he had a valid excuse for his failure to secure valid reentry documents. The immigration judge accepted petitioner's arguments that he did not intend to abandon his status because he planned only a temporary visit, and that the takeover of the United States Embassy constituted sufficient justification for his lack of reentry documents. The above determinations, which are highly relevant to the question of deportability, simply have nothing to do with whether petitioner has met the statutory requirements for naturalized citizenship.

19. [Footnote 2 in original] In In re Yarina, 73 F. Supp. 688 (N.D. Ohio 1947), the district court granted a petition for naturalization filed by an individual whose absence for greater than a year was the result of his capture by the Japanese during World War II. The instant case is clearly distinguishable, since the petitioner voluntarily departed from the United States. The court in In re Yarina acknowledged that it might have reached a different result if the petitioner's initial departure had been voluntary.

Accordingly, the Court must deny the petition for naturalization at this time since the petitioner was continuously absent from the United States for a period of more than one year during the five year period prior to the date on which his petition was filed. The Court notes that petitioner will be allowed to remain in this country as a lawful permanent resident, and that he will be eligible to become a naturalized citizen in June of 1985.

* * *

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. INA § 316(a), which you should read now, actually imposes three different residence requirements and one physical presence requirement. Be sure you can spot them. Although in other areas of the law residence usually requires an intent to remain permanently, the immigration law defines it as a person's "principal, actual dwelling place in fact, without regard to intent." INA § 101(a)(33). The former INS acknowledged that statutory definition but maintained that a naturalization petitioner nonetheless must establish the "continuing intention to reside permanently in the United States, following a lawful admission for such purpose." INS Interp. 316.1(b)(2)(iii). Is the interpretation of the former INS consistent with the statute?

2. Consider the requirement of five years continuous residence. The court construes section 316(b) to mean that even an involuntary absence (of a year or more) breaks the continuity of one's residence. At least five considerations lead the court to that interpretation:

a. The literal language of section 316(b) refers simply to "absence;" it makes no distinction between voluntary and involuntary absences. (How, then, could the court in In re Yarina, cited in footnote 2, have permitted an exception for involuntary departures?)

b. The court points out that the pertinent paragraph of section 316(b) contrasts sharply with the preceding paragraph, which permits a person who was absent more than six months but less than a year to establish continuity by showing "he did not in fact abandon his residence." In the court's view, the contrast was deliberate and evidences a congressional intent "to erect an absolute bar in cases of absences greater than one year." This technique, which enables a court to infer the meaning of one statutory provision by contrasting it with others, is common and often quite useful. As counsel for the petitioner, however, how might you respond?

c. The court observes that Congress went to the trouble of laying out several specific exceptions to the one-year rule, yet did not list involuntary absences among them. The inference is that involuntary absences were not intended to be exceptions. This interpretation technique is common enough to have its own name: "Expressio unius est exclusio alterius." (The expression of one thing implies the exclusion of another.) See generally Edgar Bodenheimer et al., An Introduction to the Anglo-American Legal System 145-47 (2d ed. 1988). How might petitioner's counsel respond?

d. The court notes that its interpretation coincides with the only other reported decisions on point.

e. The court asserts that its interpretation gives effect to the congressional purpose of ensuring that naturalization petitioners “have been considerably exposed to American institutions.” The former INS identified two other purposes. One of them, related to but slightly different from the purpose posited by the court, was that residence enables the petitioner to learn English and United States history and government. INS Interp. 316.1(b). In addition, the INS pointed out, residence affords a test of the petitioner’s ability to obey the law. Id.

All these purposes seem rational enough, but they generate some difficult questions. First, can any of those rationales support Congress’s decision to require residence rather than just physical presence? (The latter concept will be considered shortly.) Second, can any of those rationales support the distinction between involuntary departures, which do not destroy continuity, and involuntary absences, which do?

3. The immigration judge’s conclusion that Vafaei-Makhsoos did not abandon his permanent residence does not, in the court’s view, mean that he had not destroyed the continuity of his residence for naturalization purposes. As a policy matter, why would Congress make the rules that define abandonment of residence for purposes of readmission and expulsion more lenient than the rules that govern continuous residence for purposes of naturalization?

4. The court observes that Vafaei-Makhsoos would become eligible for naturalization in June 1985. From the facts given, explain how the court came up with that date. Accord, INS Interp. 316.1(b)(4).

5. What would you assume is the consequence of an absence of six months or less?

6. Why would Congress require three months residence in the state or the USCIS district in which the naturalization petition is filed? See Petition for Naturalization of Castrinakis, 179 F.Supp. 444, 445 (D.Md. 1959), where the court held that the state residence requirement, like the other requirements of INA § 316(a)(1), applies to the period immediately preceding the filing of the application. (Before the 1990 Act, the statute required six months of state residence. See INA § 316(a) (pre-1990 version)).

7. The court at one point states that the “[p]etitioner was outside of the United States for almost two years during the five-year period preceding his naturalization petition” (emphasis added). From the facts given, is the court’s statement correct? Is this some kind of new math, or did the court simply forget about the first trip? After answering that question, look again at the physical presence requirement of section 316(a). Is that requirement satisfied? Isn’t the whole continuous residence issue in this case moot?

8. Like the requirements for citizenship by descent, the requirements for naturalization raise some constitutional questions. Given what you have read about the scope of the congressional powers to admit and expel noncitizens, and set citizenship criteria, which of the following naturalization requirements do you think would be upheld today?

- a. The former racial limitations?
- b. Limitations based on country of nationality?
- c. The present disqualification of past members of the Communist Party?²⁰

9. One leading citizenship scholar has written a thoughtful article examining how one should evaluate naturalization criteria. As he demonstrates, the assessment of any particular requirement depends on one's more general view of what the criteria for selecting citizens should strive to accomplish. He considers four normative models, which he calls unilateral liberalism, bilateral liberalism, thin republicanism, and thick communitarianism, and he then tries those models out on three different naturalization requirements—the ideological requirements, knowledge of the English language, and renunciation of foreign allegiance.²¹

ii. Procedure

What used to be called “judicial” naturalization proceeded in two phases. There was first an administrative phase in which the former INS made “recommendations” to a court. In practice those recommendations were seldom rejected. Second, there was a judicial phase in which a court formally granted or denied naturalization.

In the late 1980's, large backlogs began to form in some judicial districts, including the New Jersey district of Rep. Peter Rodino, then chair of the House Judiciary Committee (the parent of the immigration subcommittee). See Robert A. Mautino, Naturalization Changes Effected by Immigration Act of 1990, in AILA, Understanding the Immigration Act of 1990, at 277, 278 (1991). These delays were serious, since, as you saw earlier, several legal consequences flow from citizenship—including the opportunity to begin the process of sponsoring the immigration of a family member. Reform finally came in section 401(a) of the Immigration Act of 1990, amending INA § 310(a). That section gave the Attorney General “the sole authority to naturalize persons.” Under that provision, most cases were expected to proceed without any judicial involvement. The former INS was to do virtually everything. The applicant could elect to wait for a judicial ceremony, and the district courts at any rate retained the jurisdiction to 20. The authors thank Professor Gerald Neuman for raising these constitutional questions as well as some others that have found their way into this chapter.

21. See Gerald L. Neuman, Justifying U.S. Naturalization Policies, 35 Virginia J. Internat'l L. 237 (1994). For a response that considers the possible purposes that citizenship itself is meant to serve, see Stephen H. Legomsky, Why Citizenship?, 35 Virginia J. Internat'l L. 279 (1994). See also Irene Scharf, The Case for Naturalization, 12 BIB 853 (July 1, 2007) (urging the federal government to ease naturalization requirements to encourage citizenship).

review INS denials of naturalization de novo. INA § 310(c). Still, the assumption was that the typical applicant would never see a courtroom.

But nostalgia set in. Many people expressed sadness over the elimination of mandatory judicial ceremonies. The judicial ritual can be both meaningful and moving, a poignant reminder of the enormous step the new citizens have taken. Even though every successful applicant had the option to experience that ritual, some believed that it should have remained a required event. See, e.g., Ronald A. Taylor, Citizenship Process Loses Luster, Washington Times, Mar. 14, 1991, at A3.

That sentiment largely prevailed in Congress a year later. Persuaded that the judicial ceremony supplies dignity and solemnity, but still intent on eliminating long delays, Congress compromised. It allowed the federal district courts and most state courts of general jurisdiction to notify the Attorney General that they will assert exclusive authority to administer oaths of allegiance in naturalization cases. Pub.L. 102-232, § 102(a), 105 Stat. 1733 (Dec. 12, 1991), amending INA § 310(b). That exclusive jurisdiction, however, expired 45 days after the Attorney General certified that the applicant is eligible for naturalization. (The applicant could still elect to wait longer for a judicially administered oath.) Note that the 1991 amendment did not alter INA § 310(a), which gave the Attorney General the “sole authority to naturalize.” Only the ceremonial function of administering the oath of allegiance was affected. With the enactment of the HSA in 2002, the functions of the Attorney General and the former INS are now performed by the Secretary of Homeland Security and USCIS, respectively.

The current regulations offer one other option. An applicant who is not subject to the judicial exclusivity rule (either because the court declines to assert exclusive jurisdiction or because the 45-day period has expired) may elect to have the oath administered by an immigration judge.²²

The process officially begins when the person files an application for naturalization with USCIS. INA § 334(a). A USCIS examiner interviews the applicant and conducts whatever further investigation he or she thinks necessary. INA § 335(a). The questioning, which is under oath or affirmation, includes examination of the applicant’s English language skills. 8 CFR § 335.2(c) (2008). USCIS asks the relevant law enforcement agencies for a criminal background check. Id. §§ 335.1, 335.2(b). The record of the interview may be stenographic, mechanical, electronic, videotaped, or contained in an affidavit executed by the examiner. Id. § 335.2(c).

Eventually, the examiner either grants or denies the application; before doing so, he or she may grant a continuance to give the applicant a chance to cure possible deficiencies. 8 CFR § 335.3(b) (2008). If the examiner does not announce his or her decision within 120 days, the applicant may request a hearing in the district court. INA § 336(b). In that event, the court may either decide the case itself or remand it to USCIS

²². For the details, see 8 CFR § 337.2 (2008). For a history and critique of the judicial role in naturalization cases, see Nancy Morawetz, Citizenship and the Courts, 2007 Univ. of Chicago Legal Forum 447 (2007).

“with appropriate instructions.” Id. If the determination is favorable, the applicant takes an oath of allegiance to the United States.

If the USCIS examiner denies the application, the applicant may request an evidentiary hearing before an “immigration officer.” INA § 336(a, c). If that hearing results in a denial, the applicant may seek review in the district court for the district in which he or she resides. INA § 310(c). The court makes its own independent findings of fact and conclusions of law and, at the applicant’s request, conducts a de novo trial. Id.

What procedural changes, if any, would you make?²³

b. THE CHILD CITIZENSHIP ACT AND OTHER MISCELLANEOUS FORMS OF NATURALIZATION

The process you have just read about is, as noted earlier, the usual way in which a person acquires United States citizenship after birth. There are a number of other miscellaneous ways. While the details are beyond the scope of this book,²⁴ you should be aware that such alternatives exist and that, unlike administrative naturalization, they mostly occur by operation of law rather than by individual initiative. Through ad hoc legislation, Congress from time to time has also naturalized the inhabitants of newly acquired territories. That process is called “collective naturalization.” See 7 Gordon, Mailman & Yale–Loehr, § 98.04. Private bills to naturalize named individuals have also occasionally passed, but they are far less common than private immigration bills.²⁵

The most important of these other post-birth citizenship mechanisms are two measures included in the Child Citizenship Act of 2000.²⁶ The first of the two measures automatically confers United States citizenship on any child who (a) has a United States citizen parent; (b) is under age 18; and (c) resides in the United States as an LPR, in the legal and physical custody of the citizen parent. INA § 320. As soon as there is any point in time at which all these conditions are met, citizenship attaches by operation of law; there is no need to apply for it. (It is prudent, however, to obtain a passport

23. See generally Arnold Rochvarg, Report to the Administrative Conference—Reforming the Administrative Naturalization Process: Reducing Delays While Increasing Fairness, 9 Georgetown Immigration L.J. 397 (1995) (recommending a range of procedural reforms to improve both the accuracy and the efficiency of the naturalization process). For two comparative studies of naturalization procedure, see David S. North, The Long Gray Welcome: A Study of the American Naturalization Program (1985) ch. 5 (Canada); David S. North, Alien Legalization and Naturalization: What the United States Can Learn from Down Under (1984), chs. 3,4 (Australia and New Zealand).

24. See generally 7 Gordon, Mailman & Yale–Loehr, ch. 98.

25. See id. § 98.06. President Grant’s daughter, who had lost her citizenship by marrying a noncitizen, regained it by special Act of Congress. Id.

26. Pub. L. 106–395, 114 Stat. 1631 (Oct. 30, 2000); see generally Daniel Levy, The Child Citizenship Act of 2000, 6 BIB 293 (Mar. 15, 2001); see also Victor C. Romero, The Child Citizenship Act and the Family Reunification Act: Valuing the Citizen Child as Well as the Citizen Parent, 55 Fla. L. Rev. 489 (2003) (applauding the Child Citizenship Act but urging additional steps to assure family reunification).

or some other government-issued documentation confirming one's citizenship.) The provision applies to both biological and adopted children. Id. By way of example, any child who is admitted to the United States as an immediate relative while under age 18, and in the legal and physical custody of his or her citizen parent, becomes a United States citizen immediately upon admission. Similarly, if an LPR naturalizes while his or her LPR child is under age 18, the child will automatically acquire citizenship as well (assuming legal and physical custody). This provision is not retroactive; individuals who attained age 18 before the enactment date of October 30, 2000 therefore do not benefit. See Matter of Rodriguez-Tejedor, 23 I. & N. Dec. 153 (BIA 2001).

For children who do not qualify for automatic citizenship under section 320, the Child Citizenship Act contains a second measure that permits a United States citizen parent to apply affirmatively for citizenship on behalf of the child, when certain conditions are met. This provision amends INA § 322. To understand it, recall first that a child born overseas, today, automatically acquires citizenship by descent if he or she has one citizen parent who before the child's birth was physically present in the United States for five years, at least two years of which were after the parent was age 14. INA § 301(g). The amendment to section 322 benefits children born abroad who do not satisfy the requirements for automatic acquisition of citizenship under either section 301(g) (citizenship at birth) or section 320 (citizenship after birth but before age 18). Under section 322, the child may be naturalized as long as (1) he or she has one United States citizen parent (who must file the application); (2) either the citizen parent or the citizen parent's citizen parent (i.e., the child's grandparent) has been physically present in the United States for at least five years, at least two of which were after that parent's or grandparent's age 14; (3) the child is under age 18; and (4) the child resides outside the United States in the legal and physical custody of the citizen parent but is temporarily present in the United States after a lawful admission. Note two things about the five year/two year requirement. First, unlike section 301(g) (the provision for automatic citizenship by descent at birth), section 322 allows either the citizen parent or citizen parent's citizen parent to meet the requirement. Second, again unlike section 301(g), section 322 requires only that the five years/two years requirement be satisfied before the child turns 18; it is not necessary to satisfy these requirements before the child's birth. Section 322 makes clear that the parent must file the application before the child turns 18; though less clear, it appears that in addition the entire process must be completed before the child turns 18. See Levy, note 26 above, at 297.

c. A SWISS PERSPECTIVE

You saw in chapter 3 that the United States imposes stringent requirements for admission as an LPR. You have now seen, however, that once a person clears those hurdles the requirements for subsequent naturalization are rather liberal.

At the other end of the naturalization spectrum is Switzerland. Swiss law requires naturalization applicants to clear three hurdles—national law, canton law (Switzerland is a federation composed of cantons), and local law. At the national level, the main requirement is 12 years of residence in Switzerland. At the cantonal and local levels, the requirements vary widely. The canton of Zermatt requires 30 years residence. Many cantons impose exorbitant fees, some as high as 6,000 U.S. dollars. See Fiona Fleck, Swiss Under Fire for Ballot on Citizenship, Sunday Telegraph (London), Mar. 19, 2000.

But the most controversial element of Swiss naturalization law is the requirement of local approval. The municipality of Emmen, a suburb of Lucerne, used to require a town referendum on each individual applicant. In 2000, Emmen made world news by voting to reject the applications of 48 of the 56 long-term residents recommended for naturalization by the local authority. Each voter in Emmen had received from the local authority a 100-page brochure that contained each applicant's photograph and information on each applicant's age, nationality, education, work, hobbies, taxable income, and assets. The Sunday Telegraph article, above, featured one of the rejected applicants, a Hungarian refugee who had lived and worked in Switzerland for 43 years and who felt particularly stung by the repudiation of his neighbors.

The larger story, however, was the likely influence of race on the Emmen vote. All 48 of the eastern Europeans were rejected. Councillor Urs Ischi, a member of the far-right Swiss People's Party, defended the result by saying, "Voters feel the mentality of people from western Europe suits our mentality, while that of people from eastern Europe does not." Id. In 2003, Switzerland's highest court prohibited the practice of local referenda on naturalization applications. The Swiss People's Party, growing rapidly in Switzerland, then campaigned for a national initiative that would have overturned the court's decision. In June 2008, the voters overwhelmingly defeated that initiative. See Eliane Engeler, Assoc. Press, Swiss Voters Reject Anti-Immigration Initiative, June 2, 2008.

3. DUAL NATIONALITY²⁷

Although no one has been able to estimate the number of dual nationals in the world, a combination of anecdotal evidence and theories based on other known trends leaves no doubt that that number has soared in recent years. Dual nationality is the product of three fundamental principles. Principle #1, which is subject to some (expanding) exceptions described below, is that every sovereign state decides who its own nationals are. Hague Convention on Certain Questions Relating to the Conflict of Nationality Laws, 179 L.N.T.S. 101, arts. 1, 2 (done at the Hague, April 12, 1930). Principle #2 is that the typical law provides alternative, multiple

27. The simultaneous retention of more than one nationality should probably be called "multiple" nationality rather than "dual," since one can hold more than two nationalities. But the term "dual nationality" is in common usage and will be employed here to mean two or more simultaneous nationalities.

routes to nationality.²⁸ These alternative paths frequently confer nationality by virtue of birth in the state's territory ("jus soli"), by descent from one or both of one's parents ("jus sanguinis"), and by naturalization. Principle #3 is that in actual practice the rules vary from state to state. See note 28 above.

Thus, a person born in jus soli country X to a mother of citizenship Y and a father of citizenship Z might well acquire all three citizenships at birth if countries Y and Z recognize jus sanguinis. (Contrary to public perception, nothing in United States law requires a person born abroad to United States citizen parents to "elect" one of the citizenships later in life. See generally H. Ansgar Kelly, Dual Nationality, the Myth of Election, and a Kinder, Gentler State Department, 23 Univ. Miami Inter-American L.Rev. 421 (1991-92)).

Because of principle #1, it is possible, and today quite common, for dual nationality to result also from naturalization. Even though United States law requires naturalization applicants to take an oath swearing to renounce all former allegiances, INA § 337(a)(2), only the country whose nationality the applicant purports to renounce can ultimately decide whether to give effect to that renunciation. On that issue, actual practices of the world's nations vary. See Charles Roth, Worldwide Liberalization of Dual Citizenship Rules and Potential Side Effects on U.S. Citizenship, 83 IR 2529, especially App. I at 2551 et seq. (Nov. 20, 2006).

Conversely, a United States citizen who applies for naturalization in another country might not be required to take an oath renouncing United States citizenship, because not all countries require such oaths. And even if such an oath is required and taken, the person will not lose his or her United States citizenship unless it is found that he or she subjectively intended to relinquish it, INA § 349(a)(1), an intent that the State Department has become increasingly hesitant to find. You will see more on that issue in section B.2 below.

Dual nationality has skyrocketed in recent years, particularly in the immigrant-receiving countries of North America and Western Europe.²⁹ There are several reasons for the increase: Greater migration means increases in the number of LPRs who bear children; liberalizations in citizenship laws (for example, allowing citizenship by descent through the maternal line) have increased the number of people who acquire the citizenship of their parents at birth; international marriages (and, thus, opportunities for the acquisition of dual citizenship by the offspring) have been on the increase; and, finally, many States are easing their legal restrictions on dual citizenship, especially in the naturalization context.³⁰

28. For examples, see the website of the Defense Security Agency, a component of the United States Department of Defense, <http://www.dss.mil/training/adr/forpref/forprefF.htm>, and click on "Citizenship of 206 Foreign Countries."

29. See Tomas Hammar, Democracy and the Nation State, chs. 5-7 (1990); Tomas Hammar, State, Nation, and Dual Citizenship, in William R. Brubaker (ed.), Immigration and the Politics of Citizenship in Europe and North America, at 81 et seq. (1989).

30. Hammar, in Brubaker, note 29 above, at 81-83. There is now a wealth of excellent literature on dual nationality. In Until fairly recently, the nearly unbroken scholarly tradition has been to tolerate dual citizenship but not to applaud it. See generally Nissim Bar-Yaacov, Dual Nationality (1961). The literature cited above recounts the concerns that have been expressed about dual nationality. Three themes seem to recur. One theme emphasizes the problem of divided loyalty. Dual nationality is analogized to bigamy; having two countries is compared to having two spouses. A second set of concerns appears to rest on a belief that the dual national is unjustly enriched, receiving legal benefits from a state to which he or she feels no meaningful personal attachment and to which he or she owes no significant binding obligations. The objection to allowing double voting might fall within this category. The objection to allowing otherwise unaffiliated individuals to "buy" citizenship in Dominica or other tax havens is another illustration. A third set of concerns focuses on the practical problems associated with dual nationality. These include double taxation, difficulties in diplomatic and consular intervention, greater physical maneuverability for those engaged in transnational crime, and complications in delineating military service eligibility and obligations. See generally Stephen H. Legomsky, Dual Nationality and Military Service: Strategy Number Two, in Martin & Hailbronner, above, at 79–126. For an extreme example of the conflict to which a dual national can be exposed, see Kawakita v. United States, 343 U.S. 717, 72 S.Ct. 950, 96 L.Ed. 1249 (1952) (dual United States and Japanese national in Japan during World War II, charged with committing treason against United States). Barriers to extradition of a country's own nationals have also been problematic. See Yaffa Zilbershats, Extraditing Israeli Citizens to the United States—Extradition and Citizenship Dilemmas, 21 Michigan J. Internat'l L. 297 (2000).

Most modern analysts, however, have counseled calm, concluding that the problems associated with dual nationality are small ones. Swedish Professor Tomas Hammar believes the problems have been exaggerated and that, if anything, the restrictions on dual citizenship should be eased in addition to the Hammar and Kelly writing—sexcellent literature on dual nationality. In addition to the Hammar and Kelly writings noted above, see Nissim Bar-Yaacov, Dual Nationality (1961); Randall Hansen & Patrick Weil, Dual Nationality, Social Rights and Federal Citizenship in the U.S. and Europe (2002); David A. Martin & Kay Hailbronner (eds.), Rights and Duties of Dual Nationals: Evolution and Prospects (2003); Linda Bosniak, Multiple Nationality and the Postnational Transformation of Citizenship, 42 Virginia J. Internat'l L. 979 (2002); T. Alexander Aleinikoff, Between Principles and Politics: The Direction of U.S. Citizenship Policy 25–40 (1998); Thomas M. Franck, Clan and Superclan: Loyalty, Identity and Community in Law and Practice, 90 Amer. J. Internat'l L. 359 (1996); David A. Martin,

New Rules on Dual Nationality for a Democratizing Globe: Between Rejection and Embrace, 14 Georgetown Immigration L.J. 1 (1999); Kim Rubenstein & Daniel Adler, International Citizenship: The Future of Nationality in a Globalized World, 7 Indiana J. Global Legal Studies 519 (2000); Peter H. Schuck, Plural Citizenships, in Peter H. Schuck, Citizens, Strangers, and In-Betweens: Essays on Immigration and Citizenship, ch. 10 (1998); Peter J. Spiro, Dual Nationality and the Meaning of Citizenship, 46 Emory L.J. 1411 (1997); Jorge Vargas, Dual Nationality for Mexicans, 35 San Diego L. Rev. 823 (1998); cf. Linda Bosniak, Citizenship Denationalized, 7 Indiana J. Global Legal Studies 447 (2000) (examining range of possible citizenship links to entities broader than a single state).

order to encourage long-term LPRs to naturalize. Hammar, in Brubaker, note 29 above, at 83–95. At least one commentator, Peter Spiro, has explicitly embraced dual nationality as a positive good. By eliminating the need to give up one's original nationality, he argues, states can encourage LPRs to naturalize and, hence, integrate. He also argues dual nationality can afford beneficial legal protections to the individual and expedite international travel.³¹ Thomas Franck, note 30 above, suggests that the increased tolerance of dual nationality is in keeping with a more general embrace of multiple allegiances in international law and in daily life.

There have been three major international conventions on dual nationality and a multitude of bilateral treaties. These conventions mirror the academic trend. The first one, open to all nations of the world, was adopted in 1930. The Convention on Certain Questions Relating to the Conflict of Nationality Laws, 179 League of Nations Treaty Series 101 (done at the Hague, Apr. 12, 1930), viewed dual nationality as highly problematic and sought ways to reduce it. The second one, a regional agreement open only to European states, was the 1963 Convention on the Reduction of Cases of Multiple Nationality and on Military Obligations in Cases of Multiple Nationality, European Treaty Series No. 043 (done at Strasbourg, June 5, 1963). As its name implies, it too reflected a desire to curb dual nationality. By the time the third major multinational agreement was adopted, the 1997 European Convention on Nationality, European Treaty Series No. 166 (done at Strasbourg, Nov. 6, 1997), attitudes had changed markedly, and the result was a consensus that dual nationality could be tolerated easily in most situations. The bilateral treaties take a wide variety of approaches that reflect not only shifting reactions to dual nationality, but also variations in the relationships among states. See Legomsky, in Martin & Hailbronner, above.

What is your reaction to dual nationality?

4. STATELESSNESS

The same principles that give rise to dual nationality can give rise to the opposite problem of statelessness. The combination of each state deciding who its own nationals are and state practices actually varying can cause some unfortunate individuals to fall through the gaps. For example, a person born in jus sanguinis country X to parents who are both citizens of jus soli country Y could end up with no nationality at all. It is more common, however, for statelessness to develop later—perhaps because of expulsion or flight, perhaps because of international developments that affect the sovereignty of one's country of birth, or perhaps because of voluntary renunciation of citizenship. See 7 Gordon, Mailman & Yale-Loehr, § 91.01[3][e]. Statelessness is a more pressing concern than dual nationality because the stateless person lacks a sovereign government from whom he or she can expect protection if maltreated. International conferences and agreements have sought to address the issue, but the problem remains serious.³²

31. Spiro, note 30 above; see also Gerald L. Neuman, Justifying U.S. Naturalization Policies, 35 Virginia J. Internat'l L. 237, 268–77 (1994) (exploring consequences of renunciation requirement from multiple philosophical perspectives).

Is there an international human right to have at least one citizenship? For a thoughtful analysis and a description of the current international regulation of statelessness, see Yaffa Zilbershats, The Human Right to Citizenship (2002).

5. WHO SHOULD BE A UNITED STATES CITIZEN?

Peter H. Schuck & Rogers M. Smith, Citizenship Without Consent—Illegal Aliens in the American Polity

Pages 4–5, 116–21, 128–37 (1985).

* * *

* * * [T]his book will elaborate an important but previously neglected dichotomy between two radically different conceptions of political community, which we call the “ascriptive” and the “consensual.” In its purest form, the principle of ascriptive holds that one’s political membership is entirely and irrevocably determined by some objective circumstance—in this case, birth within a particular sovereign’s allegiance or jurisdiction. According to this conception, human preferences do not affect political membership; only the natural, immutable circumstances of one’s birth are considered relevant.

The principle of consent advances radically different premises. It holds that political membership can result only from free individual choices. In the consensualist view, the circumstances of one’s origins may of course influence one’s preferences for political affiliation, but they need not do so and in any event are not determinative.

In light of these contrasts, this book will propose and defend an essentially consensual ideal of citizenship. Such a citizenship, we shall argue, would be more legitimate in theory, more flexible in meeting practical policy problems, and more likely to generate a genuine sense of community among all citizens than the existing scheme, while protecting the established human rights of aliens. To those ends, we shall advocate a combination of measures to render American citizenship law more consensual than it has previously been and to ameliorate what is the greatest contemporary threat to a consensually based political community—the massive presence of illegal aliens. * * *

* * *

³². See, e.g., Convention Relating to the Status of Stateless Persons, U.N.T.S. No. 5158 (done at New York, Sept. 28, 1954); Convention Relating to the Status of Stateless Persons (entered into force June 6, 1960); Convention on the Reduction of Statelessness (in force Dec. 13, 1975), 17 Refugee Survey Q. 101, 103 (1998); Carol A. Batchelor, Stateless Persons: Some Gaps in International Protection, 7 Internat’l J. Refugee L. 232 (1995).

Three basic steps are required to achieve a law of citizenship at birth that is theoretically consistent, practical for addressing current policy problems, and consonant with the nation's fundamental claim that its government rests on the consent of the governed. The first step requires a reinterpretation of the Citizenship Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. Its guarantee of citizenship to those born "subject to the jurisdiction" of the United States should be read to embody the public law's conception of consensual membership, and therefore to refer only to children of those legally admitted to permanent residence in the American community—that is, citizens and legal resident aliens.

* * *

On our consensualist reading, those born "subject to the jurisdiction" of the United States would be citizens at birth provisionally, in the sense that they would have the opportunity upon attaining majority to renounce that citizenship if they so desired. At no time, however, would they be vulnerable to any denial of consent to their membership on the part of the state. Their parents would be understood to have obtained for the children, as a condition of the parents' own consent to citizenship, the guarantee that their children would enjoy all the rights of citizenship during their minority (with the usual age restrictions) and would possess an absolute right to assume full citizenship at their majority if they wished. While it is obviously a fiction to assign parents any conscious decision to insist on citizenship for their children as a condition of their own membership, it is much more improbable to suppose that parents would wish things to be otherwise should the choice be presented to them. And since children are as yet incapable of consent, reliance on the parent's preferences until a child reaches maturity is the only way that citizenship can plausibly be said to rest on actual personal volition.

Native-born children of legal resident aliens would also be provisional citizens at birth and during their minority and would enjoy the same right to expatriation. As we have seen, the public-law tradition was admittedly divided on whether resident aliens should be treated as having obtained a guarantee of citizenship for their children upon entry, or as having received merely the promise of their own resident alien status for them. The abstract principle of consent alone, moreover, yields no obvious answer to this question. But in light of America's long-standing grant of citizenship to resident alien children, its historic tradition of openness, and the likelihood that the vast majority of such alien children could eventually acquire citizenship in other ways, we propose (following Burlamaqui but not Vattel) to treat the children of resident aliens equally with those of citizens in this regard.

In this view, however, citizenship at birth would not be guaranteed to the native-born children of those persons—illegal aliens and "nonimmigrant" aliens—who have never received the nation's consent to their permanent residence within it. The nation cannot plausibly be said to have guaranteed to such persons citizenship for their children even tacitly, as a condition of the parents' entry into the polity. It either did not approve their entry at all (in the case of illegal aliens), or it did so on the understanding that they and their dependents would depart at some set time (in the case of nonimmigrants). In this connection, it is of some interest that even the citizenship law of the United Kingdom, from whose antecedents our common law of citizenship was originally derived, and which continues to adhere to the birthright citizenship principle, does not extend it to the native-born children of either illegal aliens or temporary resident aliens. The same is true of other Western European countries.

* * *

In any event, Congress bears the ultimate responsibility for fashioning the structure of our immigration policy, and the role of birthright citizenship for the children of illegal and nonimmigrant aliens—the decision either to grant or withhold it—is obviously only a small piece of that structure. Congress must carefully weigh the moral claims of these children to membership relative to the claims of other groups, assessing the likely effects on illegal immigration of eliminating their present guarantee of citizenship, and considering how such a change should relate to the more comprehensive, systematic measures for reducing illegal immigration that we and others have proposed, including employer sanctions, enhanced border enforcement, and enlarged legal admissions quotas. Then, and only then, can Congress responsibly resolve the birthright citizenship question.

In the current state of knowledge, it is not at all obvious what the outcome of such a policy assessment would be. * * *

* * *

Our emphasis upon congressional power to define the contours of birthright citizenship is important. To insist on an automatic inclusiveness (in reality, *over*inclusiveness) by perpetuating the ascriptive principle in the Constitution, instead of by fully exposing immigration policies to public choice, is to betray a lack of confidence in the justice of consensual political self-definition that we believe is unwarranted today. It is doubtless true that if Americans gain full power to decide through normal democratic processes which aliens should be admitted to the national community, public debate over the issue will ventilate some of the mean-spirited nativistic sentiments that have always blighted American life. But we believe that after the issues are fully explored, contemporary Americans will decide generously, and that those so admitted and naturalized will be treated as full and equal citizens.

* * *

In general, * * * we believe that the nation's policy should be to make citizenship an option guaranteed to all children of an American parent, whether born in or out of the United States. Admittedly, it may seem incongruous to guarantee citizenship to someone who lives his entire life outside the United States, while denying it to someone who resides for the same period of time within it, albeit illegally. That incongruity, however, is only apparent; the consent principle permits, even if it does not require, differential treatment of these two situations. Thus, a concern to implement the community's choice to exclude some groups is perfectly consistent with a consensual decision to accept the children of all existing members, whether or not those children subsequently decide to remain abroad. Under our proposal, moreover, any remaining incongruity would result only if the current American community chose it. Congress would have the power, if it wished, to require positive affirmations of membership on the part of those born to American parents residing overseas. Their continued citizenship would then be no more incongruous than allowing continued citizenship for native-born Americans who live abroad without renouncing their nationality. Finally, as we have emphasized, Congress would also have the right to admit all those living in the United States illegally or without citizenship to full political membership. The relevant point, once again, is that the consensualist interpretation and policies that we propose would make the boundaries of the political community, for better or for worse, matters of self-conscious public choice.

Several plausible objections to our proposal for a more consensual citizenship law may be anticipated and deserve responses. Although there is something to be said for each of them, none seems decisive.

The first objection is textual in nature. It argues that the words of the Citizenship Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment literally preclude denying birthright citizenship to any individual who was "born in the United States" and is subject to its "jurisdiction." In this view, the clause's words are clear and comprehensive; they represent a deliberate constitutional decision to bestow citizenship on all who are native-born; they say nothing explicit about the parents' legal status or congressional consent, and they should not be interpreted as if they did.

This broad reading of the clause is not obviously incorrect or illegitimate; indeed, the Supreme Court seems to have endorsed this reading in its recent Plyler decision. Yet a number of considerations undermine this objection, and we think that they must be decisive in the end. First, it is simply wrong to assert that there has ever been a conscious deliberate decision, by the framers of the Fourteenth Amendment or its judicial interpreters, to accord birthright citizenship under the clause to children of illegal aliens. We saw [earlier] * * * that the issue was not before the original framers of the Citizenship Clause; that the phrase "subject to the jurisdiction thereof," while ambiguous at best, suggests that they intended to grant the clause a scope narrower than universal citizenship for mere birth within the geographic United States; and that this phrase gave the clause a political and consensual meaning, not simply a legal and geographical one, that excluded several categories of individuals whom a purely geographic reading would have covered. Subsequently, as we saw in chapter 4, no Supreme Court decision—*Wong Kim Ark*³³ and *Plyler*³⁴ included—has 33. In United States v. Wong Kim Ark, 169 U.S. 649, 18 S.Ct. 456, 42 L.Ed. 890 (1898), the Court held that children born in the United States to LPR parents acquire citizenship at birth.—Eds.

34. In Plyler v. Doe, 457 U.S. 202, 102 S.Ct. 2382, 72 L.Ed.2d 786 (1982), the Court struck down on equal protection grounds a state statute that denied undocumented children a free public education. See pages 1194-1209 above.—Eds.

ever faced the precise question posed by our proposal to limit birthright citizenship. Any claim that the nation has chosen to limit its consensual authority over political membership by constitutionally guaranteeing universal birthright citizenship must therefore proceed not from an appeal to the text, from explicit aims of the framers, or from authoritative judicial decisions, but rather from the hazier notion of "tacit consent."

This suggests a second line of criticism. It would accept the primacy of the consent principle in American political life but would argue that the long-standing acceptance of a broad birthright citizenship rule, coupled with the manifest ineffectiveness of current immigration enforcement efforts, should be understood as the political community's tacit consent to membership for the children born here of illegal alien parents. That tacit consent, it might be argued, creates a moral obligation to continue a policy of universal birthright citizenship today.

We believe, however, that any argument from tacit consent should be viewed with skepticism, and that this application of that argument is especially unconvincing. First, the inadequacy of immigration enforcement is not an unambiguous datum; it can only be properly evaluated in context. That context includes the inherent difficulty of the task (given the number of aliens who come and the ease of entering without detection) and the recent substantial increases in the INS's enforcement budget and in its apprehensions along the southern border. All law enforcement is ineffective in that it is neither designed nor funded to bring each and every offender to justice. But that certainly does not mean—except in the most trivial sense—that society tacitly consents to those offenses that are not detected or prosecuted.

A second, more important defect in the argument from tacit consent is that it amounts to a reflexive acceptance and legitimation of the status quo. * * * Instead of a consent defined by hypothesis and tautology, a democratic society should insist upon a consent exemplified by deliberate, self-conscious political choice. * * *

A third objection might invoke the special character of constitutionally protected rights. It would insist that even if the nation, in adopting the Fourteenth Amendment, did not consciously or tacitly limit its future choices concerning citizenship, the definition of political membership remains so crucial to the nature of any polity that it should nevertheless be treated as an issue of constitutional dimension, one not subject to the whims and prejudices of transient majorities. Sustaining birthright citizenship for all native-born as a constitutional guarantee might be seen as a way to safeguard basic national values against temporary aberrations, as is done for free speech and other basic rights.

The weakness in this argument is that it ignores the basic difference between a right that a community decides to safeguard for members and nonmembers against popular majorities, and a claimed right to become a member. The latter claim, if recognized, would limit a nation's very power to determine what it will be—and also to determine who will decide that question—in the future. The current dilemma created by the influx of illegal aliens suggests that if these choices cannot be made on a flexible, ongoing basis, they cannot be made at all.

Furthermore, insofar as the Constitution does explicitly indicate how questions of membership are to be decided, it does so by granting Congress power over immigration, naturalization, and expatriation. These powers establishing congressional authority over which individuals may enter the United States can best be understood as expressing the framers' concern to ensure that all individuals "born in the United States" will be born to parents who are present with the consent of the nation. These powers therefore imply an open-ended, consensual process permitting the redefinition of the nation's membership. Because our constitutional system thus generally remits questions of admission to membership to majoritarian processes, and because this course is most consistent with the nation's fundamental commitment to consent, we believe that the Citizenship Clause should be read in that spirit.

* * *

Fifth, it may be argued that the proposal is not as inclusive as the current rule, and that inclusiveness, like administrative simplicity, is a great advantage in a citizenship test. There can be no doubt that inclusiveness is especially important for a society that prides itself on its openness to immigrants and its liberality of spirit toward all those in need. We share that pride and are strongly committed to a genuinely inclusive political community. Again, we recognize that, over and above the formalities of consent, those who have been born and grown up within the United States often become in fact part of the actual, organic community that is produced by shared experiences, so that refusing them membership in the only community they really know may seem objectionable on grounds of liberal humanitarianism or territoriality. That is why we have proposed admission for all those who have been born in the United States under the current interpretation of the Citizenship Clause, and why we call for Congress to assess the value of such a change to an effective immigration policy.

We are convinced, however, that not even the most ardent advocates of a liberal immigration policy favor universal inclusiveness; few would dispute that the citizens of a nation have some right to shape their collective futures by controlling admissions. The real question, therefore, is what the appropriate principle of inclusion (or exclusion) ought to be, recognizing that a less-than-universal principle of inclusion must inevitably also exclude, and that exclusion must inevitably nullify some individuals' choices for membership. By confining citizenship at birth to children of citizens or legal permanent residents, levels of illegal immigration might be reduced, thereby lessening the problem of what to do about those who have long been in the midst of the community, albeit illegally. This reduction in illegal migration seems particularly likely if our birthright citizenship proposal were part of a broader program to discourage illegal immigration. If the nation adopted these measures but found that they did not diminish the number of children born of illegal alien parents who had spent most of their lives here and had acquired humanitarian claims to membership, Congress would retain the power to extend a generous amnesty or naturalization policy toward them.

That residual power, of course, would not guarantee as inclusive a policy as the existing birthright citizenship rule does. But the current rule achieves an inclusiveness that is both spurious and uncontrolled. It is spurious because it is based upon a purely geographical coincidence—literally an accident of birth—rather than upon a principle, such as consent, that can legitimate citizenship by making it conform to the moral and political presuppositions of the national community. Birthright citizenship's inclusiveness of membership is also uncontrolled because it abdicates what is perhaps the most fundamental question of our political life—who shall constitute "we the people"? Rather than squarely addressing that question as one that should be decided deliberately on moral and policy grounds by the national community, it leaves it to the self-interested decisions of those over whom we have no effective control.

Our proposal, in contrast, promises a more genuine inclusiveness. Being grounded in actual, explicit consent, the inclusiveness would be more legitimate, more truly reflective of national sentiment, than the current rule. It would be as generous (or as niggardly) as Americans self-consciously decided to make it. As suggested earlier, an immigration and citizenship policy that is widely perceived as being under the nation's direction and rooted in its consent seems far more likely to be generously inclusive than a policy, like the present one, that is viewed as abdicating control and violating national will. * * *

Sixth, it may be argued, in a somewhat similar vein, that the proposal does little to address the problem of the influx and status of illegal aliens. Indeed, by eliminating birthright citizenship for their native-born children, the proposal could (depending upon the magnitude of its countervailing disincentives to illegal migration) actually increase the number of individuals in illegal status. In this view, the current birthright citizenship rule has at least one virtue that our proposal lacks. It recognizes that in fact (due largely to ineffective immigration enforcement) many native-born children of illegal aliens, along with their parents, will successfully elude detection or avoid deportation and remain here indefinitely. Denying birthright citizenship to those children would add one more obstacle and disadvantage, one more source of stigma and discrimination, to those they must endure as they continue living in American society, as many will be able to do. This dilemma is compounded by the fact that these children's life prospects would be clouded by the action of others over whom they have no control—in this case, the illegal entry of their parents. Better (so defenders of the current rule might argue) to eliminate their cruel disability at the moment of birth than to maintain it thereafter.

Although superficially appealing, this argument from life prospects is ultimately unpersuasive. Our proposal to make one's national status turn, at least provisionally, on the national status of one's parents seems more morally acceptable and less determinative of one's life prospects than many other contingent factors—such as inherited wealth, upbringing, or genetic endowment—that are far more likely to shape those prospects in fundamental ways. Indeed, our proposal seems less arbitrary in terms of life prospects than the fundamental concept of birthright citizenship itself, which bases national status wholly upon the accident of geographical location at birth. And even if the innocence of the child and allied concern for his life prospects are accepted as morally or legally relevant, it does not follow that citizenship, as distinguished from mere nondiscrimination, should be the prize for that innocence. Nondiscrimination does not necessarily imply the same rights and benefits that citizenship or legal residence status confers. These children and their parents, by being denied birthright citizenship, would not be treated as the Dred Scott decision treated blacks; they would not be denied the law's protection. They would merely be required to choose among continuing to live in illegal status, with more limited equal protection and due process rights; seeking to obtain legal status; or returning to their home countries.

* * *

Gerald L. Neuman, Book Review [of Schuck and Smith], Back to Dred Scott?

24 San Diego L. Rev. 485, 489-500 (1987).

* * *

I regard the authors' recommendation as resting upon a tragic moral misjudgment, but I do not intend to address the proposal as a simple matter of public policy. To do so would concede their argument more ground than it deserves. Before they can balance the claims of undocumented children against the interests of the nation, Schuck & Smith must demonstrate that the Constitution leaves the issue open to the ordinary political process. They have failed to do this.

* * *

The authors' argument for a "consensual" interpretation of the citizenship clause rests on a feat of legerdemain. * * * They observe that in the course of the Senate debates, the amendment's framers sought to exclude from its scope a few groups (identifiable as not subject to the jurisdiction of the United States) whom they did not regard as part of their society. Based on the Senate debates the authors conclude that the framers subscribed to a consensual approach to citizenship, and that jurisdiction for citizenship clause purposes can be equated with "a more or less complete, direct power by government over the individual, and a reciprocal relationship between them at the time of birth, in which the government consented to the individual's presence and status and offered him complete protection". They conclude that the phrase "subject to the jurisdiction thereof" authorizes further specification of groups whose children can be denied citizenship. Ultimately, the authors describe Congress as having continuing authority to decide which native-born persons, other than those born to citizens or to permanent resident aliens, shall be eligible for citizenship.

This reliance on the legislative history of the citizenship clause is crucial to Schuck & Smith's argument. The word "jurisdiction" has various meanings in American law, but it has never been defined in terms remotely resembling the elaborate construct that Schuck & Smith have fashioned.

* * *

The gap spanned by this interpretive trick is a wide one. True, the drafters of the citizenship clause understood that they were free to decide who would receive citizenship. It was, after all, a constitution they were amending. But once one accepts that citizenship can be defined by positive law, there is an inherent ambiguity in the notion of a "consensual" approach to citizenship. Any freely adopted rule of citizenship expresses the consent of the society that adopts it. That consent can be embodied in a constitution as easily as in a statute, and it may define the relevant classes by using traditional "ascriptive" categories as well as those that Schuck & Smith would approve as "consensual." A constitution that identifies the category of persons who are citizens need not confer on a court or legislature discretion to reject citizens on the basis of its own views regarding the appropriate objects of consent.

* * * Schuck & Smith * * * argue that it is inappropriate to treat the qualifications for birthright citizenship as an issue of constitutional dimension. The framers of the fourteenth amendment had strong reason to believe otherwise. They had just overthrown a system founded on denial of full membership to an alien race. Furthermore, the citizenship clause was designed to forestall future controversies, not only to stabilize the resolution of the African slavery question. For example, Senator Cowan, a vehement opponent of both the Civil Rights Act and the fourteenth amendment, predicted increasing difficulty over the Chinese on the Pacific coast. In response the supporters of the citizenship clause expressly confirmed their intent to recognize the American citizenship of children born there to Chinese parents. They refused the invitation to create an hereditary caste of voteless denizens, vulnerable to expulsion and exploitation. While Schuck & Smith appear to view this danger as exaggerated, others do not, and it is at least defensible as a matter of political theory to guard against such a possibility by constitutionally requiring citizenship for all children born within the community.

The legislative history and the received judicial construction of the citizenship clause confirm that the framers of the fourteenth amendment did deny constitutionally mandated citizenship to a few categories of children, whom they regarded as not "subject to the jurisdiction" of the United States. These were the common law exceptions for aliens closely associated with a foreign government, and an American addition—Indians living under tribal quasi-sovereignty. The common law exceptions concern children born on foreign public vessels or to ambassadors of foreign nations, both situations in which comity principles of international law restrain the state's exercise of lawmaking power, and children born to parents accompanying an invading army, which was not physically subject to the power of the state at all. Denial of citizenship to Indians living within their own self-governing quasi-sovereign societies reflects the framers' view that such Indians were not fully subject to the legislative power of the United States, as evidenced by the practice of negotiating treaties with Indian tribes as sovereign powers. The effective independence of many Indian tribes from state or federal governance made the notion of Indian tribes as separate, though domestic, nations more realistic in 1866 than it subsequently became. Thus, "jurisdiction" can be given a natural reading as actual subjection to the lawmaking power of the state; this interpretation fulfills the framers' intentions and echoes the common law notion of the king's "protection."

* * *

Schuck & Smith shrug off Wong Kim Ark as an "[e]xpansive, but not universal," use of ascriptive citizenship in the fourteenth amendment, and would limit it to children of lawfully admitted permanent resident aliens. This compromise ignores the havoc that Wong Kim Ark wreaks upon their theory of citizenship. The Court's courageous recognition of citizenship for Americans of Chinese descent was an extreme illustration of the irrelevance of "consent;" not only were affirmative manifestations of consent outside the citizenship clause itself unnecessary, but the Court overrode strong indications of unwillingness to admit the Chinese to the American polity. The United States had wanted Chinese labor, and had not yet perfected the technique of importing temporary workers. It denied the immigrants any opportunity for citizenship, then attempted to prevent more laborers from arriving, forbade their reentry if they left the country, and began expelling those who had not secured certificates demonstrating the legality of their presence. If the phrase "subject to the jurisdiction" left Congress any flexibility for consent-based restrictions at all, surely the Court could have read it as leaving aliens whose reception was so chilly still "subject to the jurisdiction" of their native land, and not of the United States. The result, not just the reasoning, of Wong Kim Ark is incompatible with the authors' "consensual" interpretation.

Nor could Wong Kim Ark have turned on some supposedly fundamental distinction between permanent residents and temporary residents. The modern status of "alien lawfully admitted for permanent residence" did not even exist at the time of the fourteenth amendment or of Wong Kim Ark. Until the twentieth century, federal immigration statutes did not distinguish between admission of aliens for temporary residence and admission as permanent residents. Aliens were either admitted or not. * * *

* * *

Failure to address the details of nineteenth century immigration law undermines the authors' argument in other respects as well. Schuck & Smith claim that the framers of the fourteenth amendment could not have contemplated conferring citizenship on children of illegal aliens "for the simple reason that no illegal aliens existed at that time, or indeed for some time thereafter". They paint a picture of an era of wholly unrestricted immigration, with the attendant implication that the fourteenth amendment could have nothing relevant to say about the children of aliens whose entry into the country was unlawful. The authors have the facts wrong.

First of all, the authors dismiss too quickly the regulation of immigration by the states. Several states with international seaports imposed inspection, taxation, and bond-posting schemes, targeted at paupers and other aliens who were likely to prove unable to support themselves. * * *

More importantly, Schuck & Smith overlook the problem of the citizenship of children of illegally imported African slaves. Although Congress had promptly exercised its constitutional power to forbid all further importation of slaves as of 1808, the shameful traffic continued. Congress was forced to legislate repeatedly for its suppression up through the time of the Civil War. But the borders of the United States proved as hard to patrol then as they are said to be today. * * *

Here, then, was a notorious category of "illegal aliens" whose presence in the United States was without the federal government's consent. If, as Schuck & Smith insist, "consent" does not extend to children of parents not lawfully admitted to the United States, then the fourteenth amendment did not constitutionally mandate American citizenship for the children of illegally imported slaves. Yet there can be no doubt how a court in 1868 should have resolved any attack on the citizenship of former slaves whose parents or grandparents had been illegally imported. Illegally imported slaves are not mentioned in the debates, but the framers made it clear that guaranteeing citizenship to all native-born blacks was their central purpose. * * *

* * *

The campaign for "control of our borders" is partly a struggle over the future racial, linguistic and cultural development of American society. Our nation has faced such a struggle before, and has concluded that it should not be waged through the high-stakes weapon of manipulating the citizenship of the native-born. Under provocation, the author of the citizenship clause expressed its purpose as "to put this question of citizenship and the rights of citizens and freedmen under the civil rights bill beyond the legislative power of such gentlemen as the Senator from Wisconsin." Before we throw off that wise restraint and even consider sacrificing the undocumented children, greater justification will have to be shown than the complaint of "Citizenship Without Consent."

One of the co-authors of Citizenship Without Consent, Professor Rogers Smith, wrote a letter to Professor Neuman responding to some of Neuman's criticisms. The letter focused on the history of the fourteenth amendment citizenship clause. Here are some excerpts:

The heart of our argument centers on [the views of the framers of the 14th Amendment concerning] the status of Indians, and I do not think you really come to grips with that argument. You say "jurisdiction" should be read as "actual subjection to the lawmaking power of the state," but all the tribes WERE ultimately subject to U.S. lawmaking power, both in legal theory and actual practice. On your interpretation the tribes' members should all be constitutional citizens. But they weren't then, and as you note in a footnote, they aren't now; they are citizens only by congressional statute.

How do we explain this? We argue they relied not on the common law understanding of membership, but the public law, more consensual understanding developed by Vattel and Burlamaqui, whom the Court explicitly cited in its Indian cases. The tribes had the Vattelian status of dependent nations—ultimately subject to U.S. law, but having retained by mutual consent a measure of sovereignty, which included the assignment to the tribe of the (alterable) nationality provided at birth to children born to their tribal members. * * *

You next mention state regulation of immigration, but understandably make little of it, since those laws did not result in persons residing in the U.S. in violation of U.S. law. You do stress the status of children born to slaves imported illegally after 1808, and it's an interesting point. But again I believe it is settled in our favor if you look closely at the versions of consensual theory we claim the framers were employing, Vattel and Burlamaqui. They call us to consider the status of the parent. What is that status? I think Vattel and Burlamaqui would classify the slaves as conquered subjects of American citizens. It is true that this conquest was wholly unjust, and if Americans had followed Locke on the subject of conquest, that conquest would have no bearing on their legal status. But Vattel and Burlamaqui, whom we suggest the framers followed, were less idealistic: they held international law should recognize that the nationality of persons subject to enduring conquest had been changed, even if that conquest was originally unjust and they were now subject to their conquering peoples. Marshall's Indian decisions, which set American law, follow Vattel's views of rights of conquest, not Locke's. Therefore, the nationality of the * * * conquered subjects of U.S. citizens was viewed on Vattelian and Burlamaquian grounds to be American, "subject to the jurisdiction thereof", and the children follow suit.

I certainly do not view this position as the fullest realization of consensually-based citizenship, which should refuse to give any recognition to unjust conquest. But we do not claim the 14th Amendment embodies the fullest such realization; only a move in that direction, away from common law ascription to the public law position of Vattel and Burlamaqui. This reading is consistent with that claim, which also takes into account the status of Indians and Wong Kim Ark. Your reading does not account for the status of Indians or the sources relied on in discussing them in American courts.

Children of contemporary illegal aliens are obviously not children of conquered subjects of U.S. citizens. Their parents are still recognized by municipal and international law as members of their original nations (if they are not, we urge their admission to the U.S. and its citizenship). Thus while your analogy is interesting, I do not think it is in point.

Finally, let me observe that while our book has inspired (inflamed!) some people to think again about the basis of citizenship, a fact of which I'm proud, there appears to be no prospect that Congress will try to adopt a policy of denying citizenship to children of illegal aliens. That fact makes me even happier than I expect it does you.

* * *

Letter from Prof. Rogers M. Smith to Prof. Gerald L. Neuman, July 9, 1987 (on file with authors).

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. The issue on which Schuck and Smith differ from Neuman is not an academic one. In the past several years, there has been a growing movement to withhold citizenship from children born in the United States to undocumented parents (and sometimes even documented but non-LPR parents). In the 104th Congress, both proposed constitutional amendments and proposed legislation were introduced, albeit unsuccessfully. See generally 73 IR 97-99 (Jan. 22, 1996). The 1996 Republican Party Platform stated: "We support a constitutional amendment or constitutionally valid legislation declaring that children born in the United States of parents who are not legally present in the United States or who are not long-term residents are not automatically citizens." <http://www.convention96.rnc.org/platform.htm>, at 14. (Query what the phrase "or who are not long-term residents" means.) As of January 1, 2006, New Zealand law no longer confers citizenship on all who are born there; it is necessary to have at least one parent who is either a citizen of New Zealand or a person entitled to remain indefinitely in New Zealand or certain specified islands. News Talk ZB (New Zealand) (Jan. 1, 2006), <http://www.newstalkzb.co.nz/newsdetail1.asp?storyID=87139>.

2. Articulate what Schuck and Smith, on the one hand, and Neuman, on the other hand, say "subject to the jurisdiction thereof" means. Both agree that the Fourteenth Amendment mandated citizenship for the United States-born children of illegally imported African slaves, but not for American Indians born within tribal authority. Based on what you have seen of their debate, does the general formulation of Schuck and Smith produce those two results and the conclusion that the Constitution does not require citizenship for the United States-born children of undocumented aliens? Does Neuman's general formulation produce those first two results and the conclusion that the Constitution does require citizenship for the United States-born children of undocumented parents?

3. In explaining why the consent principle permits the automatic grant of citizenship to those children who are born in the United States to citizen parents, Schuck and Smith invoke what they acknowledge is a legal fiction—that the parents, upon accepting their own citizenship, insisted on citizenship for their children (present and future). They defend the use of that fiction by observing that parents would not wish otherwise if given the choice. Do you find that explanation convincing?

4. Going a step further, Schuck and Smith argue that the consent principle permits a similar result when the parents of the United States-born children are LPRs rather than citizens. They cite as reasons “America’s long-standing grant of citizenship to resident alien children, its historic tradition of openness, and the likelihood that the vast majority of such alien children could eventually acquire citizenship in other ways.” To what extent would those arguments really be any less forceful if applied to the United States-born children of undocumented parents?

5. The authors also support citizenship by descent, for children born abroad to United States citizens. They acknowledge that “it may seem incongruous to guarantee citizenship to someone who lives his entire life outside the United States, while denying it to someone who resides for the same period of time within it, albeit illegally” (emphasis added). Is the italicized phrase, which qualifies their concession, accurate? If not, is the inaccuracy peripheral or central to their refutation of this apparent anomaly?

6. An important element of the disagreement is captured by the third objection that Schuck and Smith anticipate and answer. The objection is that decisions concerning political membership are fundamental enough to dictate constitutionalizing them rather than subjecting them to shifting political winds. The analogy is to free speech and other basic rights.

Arguably, Schuck and Smith should not have described the basic choice as being between “ascription” and “consent.” The consent that they read the Fourteenth Amendment to require is a congressional decision to confer citizenship (and the individual’s decision to accept it). So defined, the consent principle would be satisfied, for example, by a congressional decision to bestow citizenship on all children of United States citizens. Yet, if citizenship were based solely on parentage, citizenship would then be “entirely and irrevocably determined by some objective circumstance;” “only the natural, immutable circumstances of one’s birth [would be] considered relevant.” And that, you might recall, is the authors’ definition of "ascription." The actual choice of constitutional interpretations, then, might more easily be expressed as simply an automatic constitutional rule versus a statutory rule; a rule of either stature could be either ascriptive or non-ascriptive.

However phrased, the basic question is whether, as a matter of constitutional interpretation, birthright citizenship for (almost) all who are born in the United States should be held automatic. Responding to the third objection, Schuck and Smith emphasize the distinction between rights that the community assures for its members (and nonmembers) against the majority, and the "claimed right to become a member" (emphasis in original). They maintain that recognition of the latter "would limit a nation's very power to determine what it will be—and also to determine who would decide that question—in the future." First, do you agree such recognition would limit the nation's power to decide those questions? Second, do you agree that limiting the nation's power in that way (not eliminating the power entirely) would be undesirable?

7. In responding to the fifth objection—that inclusiveness is a positive quality when it comes to membership decisions—Schuck and Smith say that under the current rule the inclusiveness is "spurious because it is based upon a purely geographical coincidence—literally an accident of birth," rather than a principle legitimated by conformity to the prevailing national philosophy. Is that criticism consistent with their clear approval of statutory citizenship by descent?

8. The sixth objection that Schuck and Smith anticipate includes concern for the welfare of the affected children and the injustice of maltreating them because of the sins of their parents. They respond by arguing that, in terms of its actual impact on one's life prospects, inherited citizenship is at least as morally acceptable as "inherited wealth, upbringing, or genetic endowment;" that "citizenship, as distinguished from mere nondiscrimination," need not be "the prize for [the children's] innocence" (emphasis in original); and that the children, rather than being denied all legal protection, would merely have to make some difficult choices. How would you expect Neuman to respond to each of those arguments?

9. Suppose a terrorist group blows up a U.S. embassy overseas, killing 100 United States citizens and other members of the embassy staff in the process. Suppose further that U.S. agents capture the ringleader and bring her to the United States, and she gives birth to a child while awaiting her criminal trial. Is the child a United States citizen? Should the child receive U.S. citizenship? (Thanks to Peter Schuck for formulating this issue.)

10. The existing wording of the Fourteenth Amendment obviously places some limits on Congress's power to withhold citizenship; the debate here goes only to what those limits are. Yet the authors do not propose a constitutional amendment deleting the citizenship clause entirely. Given their preference for consensual citizenship (by which they mean citizenship that the people's representatives in Congress consent to confer), why don't they propose such an amendment? Why would they want even those children who are born in the United States to United States citizen parents to receive citizenship without congressional approval?

11. The book by Schuck and Smith has stimulated some intriguing debate.³⁵

B. LOSING CITIZENSHIP

With the repeal of conditions subsequent (also known as retention requirements) for derivative citizens, see page 1270 above, there are today only two ways in which United States citizenship can be lost. The first is revocation of naturalization, more commonly known as “denaturalization.” As its name suggests, that consequence can befall only those who acquired their citizenship by naturalization. It arises when certain defects in the original naturalization process later come to light. It can now occur through either of two procedural routes discussed in subsection 1 below. The second way to lose citizenship, known as expatriation, applies to naturalized citizens and other citizens alike. As you will see in subsection 2, expatriation today requires a showing of intentional renunciation.

1. REVOCATION OF NATURALIZATION

INA § 340(a) requires the revocation of any naturalization order that was “illegally procured or * * * procured by concealment of a material fact or by willful misrepresentation.” The procedure is a court action that may be brought only by the United States attorneys. Id. The Supreme Court, recognizing the enormity of the individual interests at stake in denaturalization cases, held in Schneiderman v. United States, 320 U.S. 118, 63 S.Ct. 1333, 87 L.Ed. 1796 (1943), that the government must prove the statutory grounds by “clear, unequivocal, and convincing” evidence (rather than by a

35. In addition to Neuman’s critique, which focuses on the constitutional interpretation issue, see David A. Martin, Membership and Consent: Abstract or Organic?, 11 Yale J. Internat’l L. 278 (1985), which emphasizes the philosophical basis and policy consequences of consensual citizenship. See also Peter H. Schuck & Rogers M. Smith, Membership and Consent: Actual or Mythic?, 11 Yale J. Internat’l L. 545 (1986), in which the authors clarify that their book called only for the recognition of a congressional power rather than for a congressional decision to exercise that power in a particular way. See especially Peter H. Schuck & Rogers M. Smith, Citizenship Without Consent—Illegal Aliens in the American Polity 119–20 (1985) (not obvious what decision Congress should reach); Peter H. Schuck, Whose Membership Is It, Anyway? Comments on Gerald Neuman, 35 Virginia J. Internat’l L. 321, 323 (1994) mere preponderance of the evidence). 320 U.S. at 125, 63 S.Ct. at 1336–37, 87 L.Ed.2d at 1802. This type of “judicial” denaturalization is the more traditional variety.

(stressing that he and Smith, while requiring consent of polity to citizenship criteria, recognize liberalism as limit on kinds of conditions polity may impose). See generally Christopher L. Eisgruber, Birthright Citizenship and the Constitution, 72 NYU L. Rev. 54 (1997) (arguing government should be responsive to, and thus 14th Amendment citizenship clause should be construed to cover, all people over whom government exercises jurisdiction); John W. Guendelsberger, Access to Citizenship for Children Born within the State to Foreign Parents, 40 Amer. J. Comparative L. 379 (1992) (favoring retention of jus soli); Dan Stein & John Bauer, Interpreting the 14th Amendment: Automatic Citizenship for Children of Illegal Immigrants?, 7 Stanford L. & Policy Rev. #2 at 127–31 (1996) (favoring either constitutional amendment or legislation to withhold jus soli from children of undocumented parents).

A second and more controversial method of revoking naturalization has recently emerged. INA § 340(h) used to allow a court to reopen proceedings in which it had granted naturalization and decide the case anew. Typically this would occur on motion of the former INS after discovery of fraud, mistake, or new and previously unavailable evidence. As you will recall, the Imm. Act 1990, § 401, transferred the sole power to naturalize from the courts to the Attorney General (now the Secretary of Homeland Security). INA § 310(a). In a conforming amendment, Imm. Act 1990, § 407(d)(18), Congress transferred from the courts to the Attorney General (again, now the Secretary of Homeland Security) the power “to correct, reopen, alter, modify, or vacate an order naturalizing the person.” INA § 340(h). In this book, that type of revocation will be called “administrative denaturalization,” to distinguish it from the traditional “judicial denaturalization” discussed above.

To implement its new statutory power, the former INS in 1996 issued a final rule. 61 Fed.Reg. 55550–55 (Oct. 28, 1996). That regulation, which can be found at 8 CFR § 340.1 (2008), purports to authorize the INS (now USCIS) to reopen naturalization proceedings itself (rather than seek a court order), and revoke naturalization, under certain circumstances. According to the regulation, USCIS must have clear, convincing, and unequivocal evidence which: (1) Shows that [USCIS] granted the application by mistake; or (2) Was not known to the [USCIS] Officer during the original naturalization proceeding; and—(i) Would have had a material effect on the outcome of the original naturalization; and (ii) Would have proven that: (A) The applicant’s application was based on fraud or misrepresentation or concealment of a material fact; or (B) The applicant was not, in fact, eligible for naturalization.

8 CFR § 340.1(a) (2008). The regulation also provides that USCIS may exercise this power only by serving a “notice of intent to reopen naturalization proceedings and to revoke naturalization” within two years of the naturalization order. Id. § 340.1(b).

The regulations give the “applicant” (as they call the person whose naturalization they seek to revoke) the right to a hearing before an immigration officer and, if unsuccessful, an appeal to the USCIS Administrative Appeals Unit. 8 CFR §§ 340.1(b)(3)(ii), 340.1(e) (2004). Under INA § 310(c), an original denial of naturalization is reviewable in the district court, which conducts a hearing de novo. The regulations interpret INA § 310(c) as also covering decisions revoking naturalization after reopening. 8 CFR § 340.1(f) (2008). That interpretation is not surprising, since the underlying rationale for allowing USCIS to bypass the usual judicial procedures is that USCIS is merely readjudicating the original application.

In Gorbach v. Reno, 219 F.3d 1087 (9th Cir. en banc 2000), the court affirmed a preliminary injunction restraining enforcement of 8 CFR § 340.1(a). The court concluded that only the courts have the statutory power to revoke a person's citizenship. It declined to decide whether Congress could constitutionally authorize an administrative agency to revoke naturalization orders that the agency had granted. The district court subsequently made the injunction permanent. Gorbach v. Reno, No. C-98-0278R (W.D. Wash. 2001), digested in 77 IR at 442 (Mar. 5, 2001).

The substantive meanings of the various criteria for denaturalization have been the subjects of a long-running debate within the Supreme Court. In form, the debate has been about highly technical issues of statutory interpretation. Beneath those differences, however, lurk fundamentally differing conceptions of the theory for revoking naturalization. The following decision is the Court's most recent attempt to dispel the confusion:

Kungys v. United States

Supreme Court of the United States, 1988.
485 U.S. 759, 108 S.Ct. 1537, 99 L.Ed.2d 839.

■ JUSTICE SCALIA announced the judgment of the Court and delivered the opinion of the Court as to Parts I, II-A, and III-A, and an opinion as to Parts II-B and III-B in which the CHIEF JUSTICE and JUSTICE BRENNAN joined and in Parts III-B of which JUSTICE O'CONNOR joined.

Juozas Kungys seeks our review of a judgment and opinion of the Third Circuit remanding his case for the completion of denaturalization proceedings. The issues presented are: first, whether certain misrepresentations or concealments made by Kungys in connection with his naturalization proceeding were material within the meaning of INA § 340(a) and Chaunt v. United States, 364 US 350, 5 LEd2d 120, 81 SCt 147 (1960); and second, whether those misrepresentations, made under oath and in the form of forged documents, rendered Kungys' citizenship "illegally procured" under INA §§ 101(f)(b), 316(a)(3), and 340(a), because they established that he lacked the requisite good moral character when he was naturalized 34 years ago.

I

Petitioner applied for an immigration visa in Stuttgart, Germany, in 1947. In 1948, the visa was issued, and he came to the United States; he was naturalized as a citizen in 1954. In 1982, the United States, acting through the Office of Special Investigations of the Department of Justice, filed a complaint pursuant to INA § 340(a) to denaturalize him. The United States advanced three grounds. First, it attempted to show that Kungys had participated in executing over 2,000 Lithuanian civilians, most of them Jewish, in Kedainiai, Lithuania, between July and August 1941. As proof of this claim, the United States offered in evidence three videotaped depositions taken for use in this case in the Soviet Union. After determining that for numerous reasons the Soviet—source depositions were inherently unreliable, the District Court admitted them only for the limited purpose of showing that the atrocities actually occurred. The District Court then held that the admissible evidence was insufficient to sustain the charges that Kungys had participated in the Kedainiai atrocities.

Second, the United States attempted to show that, in applying for his visa and in his naturalization petition, Kungys had made false statements with respect to his date and place of birth, wartime occupations, and wartime residence. The District Court found that these misrepresentations had been made but held them not to be material within the meaning of INA § 340(a), as illuminated by language in Chaunt v. United States, supra.

Third, the United States argued that Kungys' citizenship had been "illegally procured" under § 340(a) because when he was naturalized he lacked the good moral character required of applicants for citizenship by INA § 316(a). In support of this theory, the United States asserted that Kungys' false representations, whether or not material, were sufficient to show that he had given false testimony to obtain immigration or naturalization benefits, which INA § 101(f)(6) makes determinative of lack of good moral character. The District Court ruled that the false statements at issue were not covered by § 101(f)(6) because they were not material.

Having rejected each of the three asserted grounds for denaturalization, the District Court entered judgment for Kungys. The United States appealed. The Third Circuit declined to pass on the United States' submission that the first asserted ground (participation in the Kedainiai atrocities) was wrongfully rejected because of error in failing to admit unqualifiedly the Soviet—source depositions. It reversed, however, the District Court's rejection of the second ground, concluding that Kungys' willful misrepresentation of the date and place of his birth in connection with his applications for visa and naturalization (which was no longer disputed), was material for purposes of the "concealment or misrepresentation" provision of § 340(a). Finally, the Third Circuit upheld the District Court's rejection of the third asserted ground for denaturalization agreeing that in order to establish "illegal procurement" under § 340(a) on account of lack of good moral character under § 101(f)(6), false testimony must be shown to have been material.

* * *

II

A

As noted above, INA § 340(a) provides for the denaturalization of citizens whose citizenship orders and certificates of naturalization "were procured by concealment of a material fact or by willful misrepresentation" This Court has previously suggested, and the parties do not dispute, that this requires misrepresentations or concealments that are both willful and material. See Fedorenko v. United States, 449 US 490, 507-508, n 28, 66 LEd2d 686, 101 Sct 737 (1981). So understood, the provision plainly contains four independent requirements: the naturalized citizen must have misrepresented or concealed some fact, the misrepresentation or concealment must have been willful, the fact must have been material, and the naturalized citizen must have procured citizenship as a result of the misrepresentation or concealment. It is no longer in dispute that the first two of these requirements were met here, since petitioner now concedes that he willfully misrepresented the date and place of his birth in his naturalization proceeding in 1954 as well as in applying for his visa in 1947.³⁶

* * * In Chaunt v. United States, we held that a naturalized citizen who had willfully and falsely stated during the naturalization process that he had never been arrested could nevertheless not be denaturalized pursuant to § 340. A year later, in Costello v. United States, we held that a naturalized citizen who had willfully and falsely stated during the naturalization process that his occupation was “real estate,” when in fact it would more accurately have been described as “bootlegging,” could be denaturalized pursuant to § 340. In neither case did the Court’s opinion purport to announce a conclusive judicial test to guide the determination whether a given misrepresentation or concealment was “material” and whether it “procured” a naturalization certificate. Indeed, in neither case did the opinion clearly differentiate between these two separate requirements. Nevertheless, it has been thought that a test for materiality can profitably be derived from certain language in Chaunt. That language comes at the end of the opinion, where the Court, in summarizing its holding, states that “the Government has failed to show by ‘clear, unequivocal, and convincing’ evidence either (1) that facts were suppressed which, if known, would have warranted denial of citizenship or (2) that their disclosure might have been useful in an investigation possibly leading to the discovery of other facts warranting denial of citizenship.” The efforts to make this formulation the test for materiality have not met with notable success. Not only have the Courts of Appeals failed to arrive at a single interpretation, but our one attempt to dispel their confusion, Fedorenko, seemingly produced at least three variants on this Court.

With the wisdom of experience, we now conclude that the attempts to construct a standard from the Chaunt dicta have been both unnecessary

36. [Footnote 5 in original] The Government asserted that the purpose of the misrepresentations was to distance Kungys from Kedainiai, where atrocities had occurred, and to make it more difficult to identify him as one of the perpetrators. Kungys contended that even greater atrocities had occurred in the city he falsely listed as his birthplace; and that the age difference (two years) was of little consequence for identification purposes. Kungys asserted that he had lied concerning his date and place of birth in obtaining identity documents from the Nazis to go from Lithuania to Germany—the purpose of the dissembling at that time being to place him above the age of conscription and to avoid the risk of persecution for his participation in the Lithuanian resistance movement. (Vydaudas Vidiekunas, a leader of the resistance movement, validated Kungys’ account of his participation.) Kungys asserted that in applying for his visa he simply repeated the information contained on his identity documents, believing the falsities inconsequential for United States immigration purposes; and that with similar belief he conformed his naturalization petition to his visa application.

and unfortunate. The term "material" in § 340(a) is not a hapax legomenon.³⁷ Its use in the context of false statements to public officials goes back as far as Lord Coke, who defined the crime of perjury [to require a "material" statement.] * * *

* * * Given these common-law antecedents, it is unsurprising that a number of federal statutes criminalizing false statements to public officials use the term "material." * * * The federal courts have long displayed a quite uniform understanding of the "materiality" concept as embodied in such statutes. The most common formulation of that understanding is that a concealment or misrepresentation is material if it "has a natural tendency to influence, or was capable of influencing, the decision of" the decision-making body to which it was addressed. While we have before us here a statute revoking citizenship rather than imposing criminal fine or imprisonment, neither the evident objective sought to be achieved by the materiality requirement, nor the gravity of the consequences that follow from its being met, is so different as to justify adoption of a different standard. "Where Congress uses terms that have accumulated settled meaning under either equity or the common law, a court must infer, unless the statute otherwise dictates, that Congress means to incorporate the established meaning of these terms."

One might perhaps view the Chaunt test as not a repudiation of the established meaning of "material," but as an attempt to craft a more precise test for what constitutes "a natural tendency to influence" a naturalization decision. Surely, however, there is no less need for precision in the criminal context than in the denaturalization context. The more general formulation is preferable there, as we think it is here, because the judgment in question does not lend itself to mechanical resolution. The disagreement between the District Court and the Court of Appeals in Fedorenko turned on whether the Chaunt test required that, had the truth been told, an investigation would have resulted which would have disclosed disqualifying facts, or rather that an investigation would have resulted which might have disclosed disqualifying facts. But if the ultimate question is "natural tendency to influence," it would seem to make little difference whether the probabilities of investigation and resulting disclosure, respectively, are 100%–20%, 20%–100%, 51%–51%, or even 30%–30%. It has never been the test of materiality that the misrepresentation or concealment would more likely than not have produced an erroneous decision, or even that it would more likely than not have triggered an investigation. Thus, while the Chaunt formulation may be an adequate explanation of why the misrepresentation in that case was judged not to have had a natural tendency to influence the decision, it does not necessarily facilitate judgment in the infinite variety of other factual patterns that may emerge—which is perhaps why we did not employ it in Costello a year later. We think it safer in the naturalization context, as elsewhere, to fix as our guide the central object of the inquiry: whether the misrepresentation or concealment was predictably capable of affecting, i.e., had a natural tendency to affect, the official decision. The official decision in question, of course, is whether the applicant meets the requirements for citizenship, so that the test more specifically is whether the misrepresentation or concealment had a natural tendency to produce the conclusion that the applicant was qualified. This test must be met, of course, by evidence that is clear, unequivocal, and convincing. See, e.g., Schneiderman v. United States, 320 US 118, 158, 87 LEd 1796, 63 SCt 1333 (1943). Though this formulation may seem less verbally precise than Chaunt, in application it may well produce greater uniformity, since judges are accustomed to using it, and can consult a large body of case precedent.

37. No relation to editor.—Eds.

[The Court next concludes that the question whether a fact is material is one of law.—Eds.]

* * *

B

We turn, then, to whether the one misrepresentation on which the trial court's finding was considered and upheld by the Third Circuit—misrepresentation of the date and place of Kungys' birth—was material under the foregoing test. As discussed earlier, Kungys made that misrepresentation in both the 1947 visa proceeding and the 1954 naturalization proceeding. But insofar as application of the "concealment or misrepresentation" clause of § 340(a) is concerned, we find it improper to address the 1947 episode. Unlike § 101(f)(6), which covers false testimony "for the purpose of obtaining any benefits" under the immigration and naturalization laws, the "concealment or misrepresentation" clause of § 340(a) applies only where the "order and certificate of naturalization . . . were procured by concealment of a material fact or by willful misrepresentation." Procurement of other benefits, including visas, is not covered. Especially in light of this contrast with § 101(f)(6), we are unpersuaded by the Government's argument that a misrepresentation in the visa proceeding "procures" the naturalization because it obtains United States residence, which in turn is a prerequisite to naturalization. The same argument could be made with respect to a misrepresentation that effects free enrollment in a reading course, which produces the prerequisite of English literacy.³⁸ Such analysis stretches the "concealment or misrepresentation" clause of § 340(a) beyond its intent, which we think is limited to falsehoods or deceptions in the naturalization proceeding.³⁹

38. [Footnote 7 in original] JUSTICE WHITE considers the prospect of such coverage "foolish." As a policy matter it assuredly is, which is precisely why we use it as an example. JUSTICE WHITE fails to establish, however, how language requiring that the "order and certificate of naturalization [be] . . . procured by . . . misrepresentation" can conceivably be interpreted to exclude this example while yet including the misrepresentation at the visa stage which (we concede) would not as a policy matter be foolish. It is not our function to construct prudent policy except within the confines of the statutory text.

39. [Footnote 8 in original] It is a quite different question, not argued here, whether, under the statutes governing the issuance of visas in 1947, Kungys' misrepresentations or concealments at that time rendered his visa invalid, thus causing his United States resi-

Looking, therefore, solely to the question whether Kungys' misrepresentation of the date and place of his birth in his naturalization petition was material within the meaning of § 340(a), we conclude that it was not. There has been no suggestion that those facts were themselves relevant to his qualifications for citizenship. Even though they were not, the misrepresentation of them would have a natural tendency to influence the citizenship determination, and thus be a misrepresentation of material facts, if the true date and place of birth would predictably have disclosed other facts relevant to his qualifications.⁴⁰ But not even that has been found here. The Third Circuit merely held:

[H]ad [Kungys] told the truth at the time he applied for his citizenship, the discrepancies between the truth and his visa materials would have resulted in either a field investigation or an outright denial of the petition. * * *

* * * [But section 340(a)] imposes denaturalization for "concealment of a material fact" (emphasis added); and the materiality requirement implicit in the misrepresentation provision likewise relates to misrepresentation of a material fact. Thus, for purposes of determining the natural tendency of a misrepresentation to affect a decision under § 340(a), what is relevant is what would have ensued from official knowledge of the misrepresented fact (in this case, Kungys' true date and place of birth), not what would have ensued from official knowledge of inconsistency between a posited assertion of the truth and an earlier assertion of falsehood. On the basis of the Third Circuit's reasoning, a misrepresentation that, in and of itself, is utterly immaterial both in the visa proceeding and in the naturalization proceeding, becomes material simply because it is repeated in both. That is not what the statute intends. What must have a natural tendency to influence the official decision is the misrepresentation itself, not the failure to create an inconsistency with an earlier misrepresentation; the failure to state the truth, not the failure to state what had been stated earlier. The Government has failed to establish clearly, unequivocally, and convincingly that Kungys' misrepresentation of the date and place of his birth had this natural tendency.

We leave it to the Third Circuit on remand to determine whether the other misrepresentations or concealments that the District Court found to have been made in 1954 were supported by the evidence and material to the naturalization decision under the standard we have described—bearing in mind the unusually high burden of proof in denaturalization cases. If so, dence to be unlawful, and (since lawful residence is a requirement of naturalization) his naturalization to be "illegally procured" under that separate provision of § 316(a).

40. [Footnote 9 in original] JUSTICE STEVENS minimizes the substance of what we require by describing it as no more than a showing "by clear and convincing evidence that the true facts would have led to further investigation." But further investigation would not occur—and its predictability could assuredly not be clear and convincing—if the facts at issue were not such as gave cause to believe that the applicant was not qualified. We are not talking about investigations by detective hobbyists, but by public officials seeking only evidence concerning citizenship qualifications.

it will have to reach the fourth § 340(a) issue described in our earlier analysis: whether Kungys “procured” his citizenship by means of those misrepresentations or concealments. That requirement demands, first of all, that citizenship be obtained as a result of the application process in which the misrepresentations or concealments were made. The difficult question, and that on which we part company with Justice Stevens’ opinion concurring in the judgment, is what it demands beyond that. We do not agree with petitioner’s contention that it requires the Government to establish that naturalization would not have been granted if the misrepresentations or concealments had not occurred. If such a “but for” causation requirement existed in § 340(a), it is most unlikely that a materiality requirement would have been added as well—requiring, in addition to distortion of the decision, a natural tendency to distort the decision. Moreover, the difficulty of establishing “but for” causality, by clear, unequivocal, and convincing evidence many years after the fact, is so great that we cannot conceive that Congress intended such a burden to be met before a material misrepresentation could be sanctioned. We do think, however, that the “procured by” language can and should be given some effect beyond the mere requirement that the misrepresentation have been made in the application proceeding. Proof of materiality can sometimes be regarded as establishing a rebuttable presumption. Though the “procured by” language of the present statute cannot be read to require proof of disqualification, we think it can be read to express the notion that one who obtained his citizenship in a proceeding where he made material misrepresentations was presumably disqualified. The importance of the rights at issue leads us to conclude that the naturalized citizen should be able to refute that presumption, and avoid the consequence of denaturalization, by showing, through a preponderance of the evidence, that the statutory requirement as to which the misrepresentation had a natural tendency to produce a favorable decision was in fact met. Such a construction gives ample meaning to both the “materiality” and “procured by” requirements.

■ JUSTICE STEVENS’ concurrence would adopt a requirement of “but for” causality, emphasizing the necessity that the Government establish, at least, that the misrepresenting applicant was in fact not qualified to be naturalized. This emphasis highlights another difficulty with “but for” causality: that requirement is simply not a conceivable construction of the “procured by misrepresentation” provision of § 340(a) if one adheres, as JUSTICE STEVENS’ concurrence purports to do, to our holding in Fedorenko that even without any misrepresentation the applicant’s failure to meet a statutory requirement for naturalization subjects him to denaturalization under the “illegally procured” provision of § 340(a). Thus, JUSTICE STEVENS’ concurrence’s construction violates the cardinal rule of statutory interpretation that no provision should be construed to be entirely redundant. It makes nonsense of the statute to say that its misrepresentation provision can only be the basis of denaturalization if the Government establishes in addition a factor that is itself, without misrepresentation, a basis for denaturalization anyway. On JUSTICE STEVENS’ concurrence’s reading, the law says, in effect: Citizenship you obtain by lying may be revoked, but only for a reason other than lying. This is likely to have the congressionally desired deterrent effect upon only the most dim-witted of prevaricators. But worse than making an enigma of the statute, JUSTICE STEVENS' concurrence's position makes a scandal of the results the statute achieves: Proof that an applicant lied when he said he was not an SS officer at Dachau would not suffice for denaturalization without clear, unequivocal, and convincing proof—after 40 years of disappearing evidence—that he was guilty of war crimes.

III

A

The United States argues, as an alternative basis for affirming the Third Circuit's upholding of denaturalization, that Kungys' misrepresentations, made under oath and in the form of forged documents, rendered his citizenship "illegally procured" under INA §§ 101(f)(6), 316(a)(3), and 340(a). As discussed earlier, the alleged ground of "illegal procurement" is that Kungys lacked the requisite good moral character in 1954, at the time of his naturalization, because he had given false testimony for the purpose of obtaining benefits in both the visa and naturalization proceedings, in violation of § 101(f)(6). In connection with this aspect of the judgment, we address only the issue considered (and resolved in the affirmative) by the Third Circuit: whether § 101(f)(6) contains a materiality requirement for false testimony. We hold that it does not.

Under INA § 101(f)(6), a person shall be deemed not to be of good moral character if he "has given false testimony for the purpose of obtaining" immigration or naturalization benefits. On its face, § 101(f)(6) does not distinguish between material and immaterial misrepresentations. Literally read, it denominates a person to be of bad moral character on account of having given false testimony if he has told even the most immaterial of lies with the subjective intent of obtaining immigration or naturalization benefits. We think it means precisely what it says.

The absence of a materiality requirement in § 101(f)(6) can be explained by the fact that its primary purpose is not (like § 340(a)) to prevent false pertinent data from being introduced into the naturalization process (and to correct the result of the proceedings where that has occurred), but to identify lack of good moral character. The latter appears to some degree whenever there is a subjective intent to deceive, no matter how immaterial the deception. A literal reading of the statute does not produce draconian results, for several reasons. First, "testimony" is limited to oral statements made under oath. The United States concedes that it does not include "other types of misrepresentations or concealments, such as falsified documents or statements not made under oath." Second, § 101(f)(6) applies to only those misrepresentations made with the subjective intent of obtaining immigration benefits. As the Government acknowledges:

It is only dishonesty accompanied by this precise intent that Congress found morally unacceptable. Willful misrepresentations made for other reasons, such as embarrassment, fear, or a desire for privacy, were not deemed sufficiently culpable to brand the applicant as someone who lacks good moral character.

Obviously, it will be relatively rare that the Government will be able to prove that a misrepresentation that does not have the natural tendency to influence the decision regarding immigration or naturalization benefits was nonetheless made with the subjective intent of obtaining those benefits. This is especially so since the invalidating intent, like all other factual matters necessary to support denaturalization, must be proved by “‘clear, unequivocal, and convincing’ evidence which does not leave ‘the issue in doubt.’” Third, unlike the misrepresentation clause of § 340(a), the false testimony provisions of § 101(f)(6) do not apply to “concealments.” With all these built-in limitations, and given the evident purpose of the provision, we see no reason for straining to avoid its natural meaning.

* * *

B

Accordingly, it is clear that the Third Circuit erred in importing a materiality requirement into § 101(f)(6). Nevertheless, we cannot affirm denaturalization under that section because the question whether any misrepresentation made by Kungys constituted “false testimony for the purpose of obtaining” immigration or naturalization benefits cannot be answered without resolving an additional question of law and an additional question of fact. The former, which we choose not to resolve ourselves, since the case must be remanded in any event, is whether Kungys’ misrepresentations constituted “testimony.” The latter, which must be resolved by the trier of fact, is whether in making the misrepresentations Kungys possessed the subjective intent of thereby obtaining immigration or naturalization benefits. * * *

For the reasons stated, the judgment of the Third Circuit is reversed, and the case remanded for further proceedings consistent with this opinion.

* * *

■ JUSTICE KENNEDY took no part in the consideration or decision of this case.

■ JUSTICE BRENNAN, concurring.

I join the Court’s opinion. I write separately, however, to spell out in more detail the showing I believe the Government must make to raise a presumption of ineligibility. * * *

* * * [In] my view a presumption of ineligibility does not arise unless the Government produces evidence sufficient to raise a fair inference that a statutory disqualifying fact actually existed. It is this fair inference of ineligibility, coupled with the fact that the citizen’s misrepresentation necessarily frustrated the Government’s investigative efforts, that in my mind justifies the burden-shifting presumption the Court employs. * * *

Because nothing in the Court’s opinion is inconsistent with this standard, I join it.

■ JUSTICE STEVENS, with whom JUSTICE MARSHALL and JUSTICE BLACKMUN join, concurring in the judgment.

* * *

In this case the Government maintains that petitioner is subject to denaturalization because it has proved that he made certain misrepresentations in his 1947 Application for Immigration Visa (Quota), which he repeated in his October 23, 1953, Petition for Naturalization. He stated that his date of birth was October 4, 1913, when it in fact was September 21, 1915; he stated that his place of birth was Kaunas, Lithuania, when it was in fact Reistru. He asserted that he resided in Kedainiai, Lithuania, only through July 1941, when in fact he did not leave Kedainiai until October 1941. He failed to disclose that he had been a bookkeeper-clerk in a Kaunas brush and broom establishment during the war. The Government failed in its efforts to prove that petitioner would have been denied a visa if he had disclosed the true facts in his application. It also failed to prove that truthful responses would have led to a more complete investigation of petitioner's background before granting him a visa or that an investigation would have revealed any fact that would have disqualified petitioner from obtaining a visa. Indeed, the Government failed to prove the existence of any fact that, if known, would have led to the denial of petitioner's visa application or disqualified him from later becoming an American citizen.

In support of its position that petitioner's false statements in 1947 and 1953 justify his denaturalization the Government makes two separate legal arguments. First, it argues that the misrepresentations were "material" within the meaning of § 340(a) and that they procured petitioner's citizenship. Second, the Government urges that petitioner's citizenship was "illegally procured," because his misrepresentations—even if not material—demonstrate that he lacked the requisite good moral character at the time of his application for citizenship. Neither argument is tenable.

I

Over a quarter of a century ago, in Chaunt v. United States, the Court considered a case in which the District Court found that petitioner had concealed his membership in the Communist Party as well as three arrests that, had they been disclosed, would have led to further investigation by the Immigration and Naturalization Service. Although the dissenting Justices thought that Chaunt's failure to tell the truth about his arrest record was sufficient reason to revoke his citizenship, the majority came to the contrary conclusion. It held that the Government had failed to prove "either (1) that facts were suppressed which, if known, would have warranted denial of citizenship or (2) that their disclosure might have been useful in an investigation possibly leading to the discovery of other facts warranting denial of citizenship." Thus we announced a test for whether citizenship was procured by a material misrepresentation that required the Government to prove the existence of a disqualifying fact. This result was compelled both by the statute's requirement that the misrepresentation be material and by the requirement that it procure citizenship. * * *

“Material” means “having real importance” or “great consequences.” Webster’s Ninth New Collegiate Dictionary 733 (1983). The adjective “material” is widely used to distinguish false statements that are actionable at law from those that are not. * * *

In all of these contexts, the use of the word “material” serves to distinguish the trivial from the substantive, drawing the line between statements that appear to be capable of influencing an outcome and those that do not. It is reasonable to assume that the term serves the same role in the denaturalization statute. It guarantees that trivial misstatements do not result in the loss of citizenship by making actionable only those that are capable of influencing the decision whether to confer citizenship. This principle may be stated more specifically. Unlike the decision to enter a contract or to do some act in detrimental reliance on the assertion of another, the decision whether to grant citizenship is an objective one. The applicant either does or does not possess the requisite qualifications. The process relies on facts, not hunches or intuitions. Thus, in the denaturalization context, the only statements that are capable of influencing the outcome are those that conceal disqualifying facts or that prevent or hinder the discovery of disqualifying facts. Our statement in Chaunt was not a rejection of the traditional definition of materiality, it was merely an acknowledgment of the realistic consequences of that term’s use in the context of an objective decisionmaking process.

Our holding in Chaunt is also supported by the statutory requirement that there must be a causal connection between the misrepresentation and the award of citizenship. Section 340(a) provides that the Government must demonstrate that the misrepresentation “procured” citizenship. That is, the statute requires that the Government demonstrate that it relied on the misrepresentation in deciding whether to allow the applicant to become a citizen. * * *

* * *

Thus the Government cannot prevail in a denaturalization action based on a false statement in an application for a naturalization certificate unless it can prove by clear, unequivocal, and convincing evidence the existence of a disqualifying fact. To prove that a misrepresentation was material, the Government must prove that the statement concealed a disqualifying fact or hindered the discovery of a disqualifying fact. Further, the existence of a disqualifying fact is a necessary element of the Government’s proof of reliance. Unless a disqualifying fact existed, it cannot be said that a misrepresentation “procured” citizenship. * * *

* * *

In my opinion, the wisdom of experience has provided firm support for Chaunt’s holding. Our construction of the denaturalization statute must be animated by our longstanding recognition of the severity of the sanction being sought. I firmly believe that denaturalization is far too heavy a sanction to impose on an otherwise innocent citizen for making false statements in 1948 and 1953. Without evidence of any wrongdoing before he came to the United States in 1948 or after he acquired his citizenship in 1954, the revocation of petitioner's citizenship—a punishment that is tantamount to exile or banishment—is patently excessive.

* * *

Virtually ignoring the foregoing settled law, today the Court announces a new burden-shifting presumption that lowers the standard of proof required for the Government to prevail in a denaturalization proceeding. Under the Court's test, a misrepresentation or concealment is material if it concerned a fact that was relevant to the naturalization decision or if the true facts "would predictably have disclosed other facts relevant to [the citizen's] qualifications." A fact may be relevant if it would have led to an investigation. Thus the Government becomes entitled to the presumption that the citizen was not qualified to become a citizen, that is, to the presumption that citizenship was "procured by" the misrepresentation, if it shows by clear and convincing evidence that the true facts would have led to further investigation. The citizen then bears the burden of "showing, through a preponderance of the evidence, that the statutory requirement as to which the misrepresentation had a natural tendency to produce a favorable decision was in fact met." Since under the Court's test the Government is never required to identify a specific disqualifying fact, apparently the citizen must refute the existence of every disqualifying fact that might have been revealed by an investigation. The Government need not introduce any proof whatsoever suggesting the existence of a disqualifying fact.

Though joining the Court's opinion, Justice Brennan would require more. He would not allow the Government the benefit of the presumption unless it first produced "evidence sufficient to raise a fair inference that a statutory disqualifying fact actually existed." Although Justice Brennan imposes a burden of production on the Government, he agrees with the majority that the burden of ultimate persuasion rests with the defendant. Under Justice Brennan's approach, however, the defendant at least has the benefit of knowing specifically what disqualifying fact must be rebutted. Both approaches require the defendant to rebut the existence of the presumed disqualifying fact—even demonstrating that there is a completely innocent explanation for the misrepresentation would not be sufficient to rebut the presumption.

Neither the majority's nor Justice Brennan's formulation of shifting burdens is faithful to our previous recognition of the special burden the Government must bear when it seeks to denaturalize an American citizen or to our previous rejection of default judgments in denaturalization proceedings. * * * The use of burden-shifting presumptions to reduce the Government's burden of proof in criminal cases has been consistently rejected by this Court without regard to whether the presumptions were rebuttable. Such presumptions are equally objectionable in the denaturalization context.

II

The reasons why the Court has required the Government to carry a heavy burden of proof in denaturalization cases apply equally to the argument that petitioner is subject to denaturalization because his false statements demonstrate that he lacked good moral character in 1953.

As amended in 1961, § 340(a) allows the Government to revoke the citizenship of anyone whose citizenship was “illegally procured.” In Fedorenko, we held that citizenship had been illegally procured because the petitioner, a former armed concentration camp guard, was ineligible for the visa he had been issued under the Displaced Persons Act of 1948 (DPA). Because the naturalization statutes required applicants to be lawfully admitted to the United States for permanent residence, petitioner had failed to “satisfy a statutory requirement which Congress has imposed as a prerequisite to the acquisition of citizenship by naturalization.” One prerequisite to naturalization is that the applicant be of “good moral character.” INA § 316(a). Certain minimum standards for being deemed in possession of good moral character are set out in INA § 101(f). Subsection 6 of § 101(f) provides that no person shall be deemed to be of good moral character if he or she “has given false testimony for the purpose of obtaining any benefits under this chapter.” The Government contends that it is not necessary for it to establish that petitioner’s false statements were material to denaturalize him under this provision. Under the Government’s theory, the mere fact that the statements were false is sufficient to compel petitioner’s denaturalization if they were made under oath and with the subjective intention of obtaining a benefit—any benefit, no matter how trivial⁴¹—under the naturalization laws. Because I am convinced that a materiality requirement is implicit in § 101(f)(6), I reject this contention.

* * *

41. [Footnote 8 in original] At oral argument, the Counsel for Government made the following remarks in response to questioning by a Member of the Court:

“QUESTION: You know, there are a lot of people that came to this country who were given different names at Ellis Island. The immigration officer couldn’t pronounce the name, and they said, well, Sam, is that okay? Yeah, that’s my name Sam. Now his name wasn’t Sam.

“Did he give that name to procure the visa, or to procure admission to the United States, falsely to procure?”

“MR. KLONOFF [Assistant to the Solicitor General]: That’s a factual question in each case, we would submit.

“QUESTION: He just wants to facilitate the thing. The guy will never learn how to spell Salvator, or whatever the name is, and the officer—it’s happened very often.

“MR. KLONOFF: It has to be a question of fact. If the person had adopted a false I.D. many, many years earlier for a totally different purpose—“QUESTION: No, no, there is no evil purpose except to facilitate getting in. I don’t want to be here, you know, trying to straighten out what the proper spelling of my name is. He says Sam, what do I care; Sam is fine.

“MR. KLONOFF: If he adopted a false identity to facilitate getting in and jumped ahead of the pack—“QUESTION: Do you consider that facilitating getting in?”

“MR. KLONOFF: We would.

It is obvious that there is some overlap between the scope of the misrepresentation and illegally-procured clauses of § 340(a).⁴² That the Government may in some cases be able to choose one of two available paths for denaturalizing a citizen for essentially the same conduct, however, does not suggest that either of the paths should be made more lenient than Congress intended.

* * *

■ JUSTICE O'CONNOR, concurring in part and dissenting in part.

I join Parts I, II-A, and III of Justice Scalia's opinion in this case. For the reasons given in Part II of Justice White's opinion, however, I dissent from Part II-B of Justice Scalia's opinion. In my view, when the correct standard of materiality is applied to the facts of this case, the misrepresentations made by petitioner are properly viewed as material.

■ JUSTICE WHITE, dissenting.

* * *

"QUESTION: Just to facilitate—to make it quicker so the fellow doesn't have to figure out how to spell Salvator.

"MR. KLONOFF: That would be our position. That's consistent with the statutory—

"QUESTION: Wow, that's a tough position, and I think there are probably a lot of people that are excludable."

The observation that a lot of people would be excludable (and a lot of Americans put at risk of losing their citizenship) under the Government's interpretation is, of course, correct. The example instructs that misrepresentations as to matters that are immaterial to the decisions being made by immigration officials simply do not reflect the lack of good moral character § 101(f)(6) seeks to identify.

42. [Footnote 11 in original] * * * Although the illegally-procured provision may reach some of the conduct encompassed within the material misrepresentation provision, the illegally-procured provision has an independent and broader reach.

Further, the material misrepresentation provision reaches some conduct not assailable under the illegally-procured provision. The Government contends that construing the material misrepresentation provision to require proof of a disqualifying fact renders that provision meaningless since the Government could always seek denaturalization under the illegally-procured provision if it could prove a disqualifying fact. The Government apparently construes our holding on the facts in Fedorenko that citizenship may be considered illegally procured if it is discovered that the applicant failed at the time citizenship was conferred to meet a statutory prerequisite of citizenship as warranting the conclusion that every newly discovered noncompliance, no matter how insignificant, would warrant a subsequent finding that citizenship had been illegally procured. Thus, for example, an innocent miscalculation of the applicant's period of physical presence within the United States or residence within a particular State would place a naturalized citizen's status in permanent jeopardy. I disagree. I do not construe the illegally-procured provision to reach such trivialities despite the reality that an individual who submitted an application for citizenship one day before fulfilling the residency requirements would technically have failed to "satisfy a statutory requirement which Congress has imposed as a prerequisite to the acquisition of citizenship by naturalization." However, if the Government could establish that a naturalized citizen had willfully misrepresented his or her time of residence and that he or she would have been denied citizenship if the true duration of residency had been known, that person would be subject to denaturalization under § 340(a).

* * * Although I agree with Parts I, II-A, and III-A of the Court's opinion, I disagree with other parts and with the result it reaches. I therefore dissent.

I

I would affirm the judgment below and grant the Government's petition for denaturalization. The Court holds, and I agree, that there was error in the holding below that petitioner's misrepresentations must be material in order to constitute sufficient grounds for finding that petitioner lacks "good moral character" under § 101(f)(6). * * *

* * * [W]e must bear in mind the necessity of striking an appropriate balance between the serious consequences that attend loss of citizenship and the need for "strict compliance with all the congressionally imposed prerequisites to the acquisition of citizenship." We need not decide in this case whether § 101(f)(6) would bar naturalization of an individual who offered a single piece of false testimony in only one instance or who later offered a reasonable explanation for why misstatements were made; we also need not decide whether such a construction of the statute would be inconsistent with a proper balancing of the two important but opposing considerations set out above. There may well be cases in which a single willful but immaterial misrepresentation would be insufficient to establish lack of good character, but would constitute grounds for denaturalization if it were material. Similarly, there are cases like this one in which repeated and numerous willful misrepresentations justify a finding of lack of good moral character notwithstanding that the misrepresentations may not involve material facts.

Here, petitioner's false testimony was not confined to one occasion, nor did it concern only a single piece of evidence. And at no time before or during the naturalization process did petitioner voluntarily step forward and attempt to explain the reasons for his various misrepresentations. To the contrary, the facts as found by the District Court demonstrate clearly, unequivocally, and convincingly that petitioner engaged in a pattern of repeated misrepresentations and nondisclosures at both the visa application stage and during his naturalization proceedings. * * * The congressional mandate expressed in § 101(f)(6) speaks clearly to such a pattern of falsehoods, and that statute would have precluded a determination in 1954 that petitioner possessed "good moral character." Accordingly, petitioner lacked an essential prerequisite to becoming a naturalized citizen, and he is now subject to denaturalization for having "illegally procured" his citizenship.

Despite its recognition that materiality is not required by § 101(f)(6), the Court declines to uphold the judgment below, and remands the case for further consideration of one point of law and one point of fact. Neither point is at all substantial. The point of law is whether petitioner's misrepresentations constituted "testimony" within the meaning of the statute. As the Court notes, the term "testimony" in § 101(f)(6) has been construed as referring only to oral evidence, and thus as excluding the written documents submitted by petitioner in his naturalization petition. Yet petitioner in this case did make oral misrepresentations: he testified falsely when he swore under oath before a naturalization examiner that the contents of his naturalization forms were true. Furthermore, he had testified falsely in order to obtain his visa into this country.

The point of fact is whether petitioner made these misrepresentations “for the purpose of obtaining any benefits” under the immigration and naturalization laws. There is no difficulty about this point either. The willful misrepresentations at issue here were made in the context of petitioner’s naturalization petition and were made earlier at the visa stage. The fact that the misrepresentations were willful, coupled with the fact that they were made during proceedings and on documents required for immigration and naturalization purposes—indeed, the very proceedings and documents that petitioner was required to complete in order to “obtai[n]” the “benefits” he sought of gaining naturalization—satisfies the elements of § 101(f)(6). The District Court itself found that petitioner’s naturalization petition was false in particular because it “stated that defendant had not previously given false testimony to obtain benefits under the immigration and naturalization laws.” In light of this specific finding by the District Court, there is no justification for remanding this issue to be resolved again by the trier of fact.

II

Because the Court declines to affirm the decision below on the basis of § 101(f)(6), it finds it necessary to revisit the definition of the term “material” as it is used in § 340(a). The Court today holds that the proper test of materiality is whether the misrepresentations “had a natural tendency to influence the decisions of the Immigration and Naturalization Service.” I do not disagree with this definition, but the Court’s application of the definition in this case is flawed.

To begin with, the Court finds it proper under § 340(a) to consider only the misrepresentations petitioner made in his naturalization proceedings but not those made in his earlier visa proceedings. The view of the United States is much more persuasive: the misrepresentations made by petitioner at the visa stage were instrumental to his procuring naturalization, for by obtaining the visa petitioner obtained lawful admission to residence in this country, which is one requirement for naturalization under § 318. The Court responds that by that logic, any misrepresentation that helps an individual to obtain any prerequisite to naturalization, such as English literacy, would be considered material. These two things, however, are not the same, and the Court’s supposed extension of its logic is merely foolish. The visa proceedings and the naturalization proceedings are intimately related not only because they both are proceedings governed by the same provisions of the immigration and naturalization laws, but also because the visa and the certificate of naturalization are obtained as part of the same process for obtaining citizenship, and both must be lawfully procured. For example, it is not mere residence in this country that is a prerequisite to naturalization, but residence after being “lawfully admitted.” § 318. It makes no sense, on the other hand, to speak of proceedings to attain “lawful” literacy skills or a “lawful” understanding of American history and government, as required under § 312, and the statute does not speak in these terms but instead manifests complete and understandable indifference as to how the individual came by those proficiencies. Thus the visa proceedings can accurately be regarded as one crucial stage in the naturalization proceedings themselves, yet the time spent acquiring literacy skills or an understanding of American history and government obviously cannot be regarded as a stage in those proceedings.

Even if I were to accept the proposition that we should consider only the materiality of the misrepresentations that petitioner made in the naturalization proceedings, those misrepresentations surely had a natural tendency to influence the decisions of the INS. As an initial matter, there is no requirement that the Court focus only on petitioner’s misrepresentations about his date and place of his birth and leave aside his other potentially more significant misrepresentations that were also identified by the District Court.⁴³ But even limiting the focus as the Court does, I would find these statements to be material. In reaching this conclusion I would ask not only whether these misrepresentations of fact would have a natural tendency to influence the decisions of the INS, but also whether the fact of these misrepresentations itself would have had such a tendency. In other words, the proper inquiry is not only whether the true date and place of birth, in isolation, would have aroused suspicion, but also whether an investigation would have ensued had petitioner revealed the true facts and thereby disclosed the discrepancy between them and the false statements in his supporting documents. * * *

* * *

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. Before going any further, map out the points on which the Justices agree and those on which they differ. Be sure you understand to which of the three denaturalization grounds each point is relevant.

2. Consider first the charge that Kungys’s naturalization was “illegally procured.” The Court accepts the Fedorenko view that naturalization was illegally procured whenever the applicant was in fact ineligible for it. Here the main problem is whether, at the time of his naturalization, Kungys was ineligible for lack of “good moral character.” INA § 316(a)(3). Good moral character is precluded by INA § 101(f)(6) if Kungys gave “false testimony for the purpose of obtaining any benefits under” the INA. As to that, the principal issue is whether section 101(f)(6) should be read to require testimony that is materially false. Justice Scalia clearly says no.

43. [Footnote 4 in original] The District Court found as a matter of fact that petitioner also misrepresented his residence and employment during the time in which the atrocities occurred at Kedainiai. The correctness of those factual findings has not been challenged. * * *

Justice Stevens clearly says yes. But what, exactly, is Justice White saying? He begins section I of his opinion by agreeing with Justice Scalia that misrepresentations need not be material "to constitute sufficient grounds for finding that petitioner lacks 'good moral character' under § 101(f)(6)." Later, however, he urges that the serious consequences of denaturalization for the individual be balanced against the need to assure compliance with the requirements for obtaining naturalization. Applying that philosophy, he says:

There may well be cases in which a single willful but immaterial misrepresentation would be insufficient to establish lack of good moral character, but would constitute grounds for denaturalization if it were material.

Is Justice White's position internally consistent? Is his a valid interpretation of section 101(f)(6)?

3. Apart from "illegally procured" naturalization, INA § 340(a) prescribes two other grounds for denaturalization: Naturalization was procured by (a) "concealment of a material fact" or (b) "willful misrepresentation." Without much discussion, the Court reads a willfulness requirement into (a) and a materiality requirement into (b). Neither requirement appears in the literal language. Moreover, one might have expected Justice Scalia to cite the contrast between these two adjacent and related phrases as evidence of a clear congressional intent to treat affirmative misrepresentations differently from concealments. He employed precisely such reasoning later in his opinion when he interpreted the language "order and certificate of naturalization * * * were procured by * * *" (emphasis in original) not to extend to procurement of visas or other benefits. He relied on the contrast between that phrase and the broader statutory language of INA § 101(f)(6) (false testimony "for the purpose of obtaining any [INA] benefits") (emphasis in original).

Selective usage of statutory interpretation techniques is nothing unusual. In this case, though, why would Justice Scalia want to read the additional requirements into the phrase "concealment of a material fact or * * * willful misrepresentation?"

4. Probably the most important issue the Court addresses in Kungys is what "material" means. Justice Stevens believes the Court already answered that question in Chaunt. There the Court suggested a misrepresentation would be material if the true facts either (a) would themselves have warranted a denial of naturalization or (b) might, if known, "have been useful in an investigation possibly leading to the discovery of other facts warranting denial" of naturalization. Justice Scalia does not read Chaunt as prescribing a fixed test. Writing for a majority on this issue in Kungys, he holds that a misrepresentation was material if it "had a natural tendency to produce the conclusion that the applicant was qualified." What does "natural tendency" mean, and how significant is the difference between the two formulations? How can a misrepresentation have a natural tendency to produce a favorable decision unless the true facts either would have constituted grounds for denial or at least might have triggered an investigation that might have led to other facts warranting denial? Can you devise a hypothetical in which the two tests would produce different outcomes?

5. Justices Scalia and White both accept the “natural tendency” test, but they apply it in different ways and reach different results on the facts of Kungys. Whose application of that test do you find more persuasive?

6. Assuming a misrepresentation was material, was naturalization “procured by” it? Justice Stevens would require the government to prove that the applicant would not have received naturalization but for the misrepresentation. Justice Scalia rejects that interpretation, arguing it would render the misrepresentation prong superfluous. First, explain why he believes that is so. Second, what do you think of Justice Stevens’s explanation, contained in original footnote 11 of his concurring opinion, of why his interpretation would not make the misrepresentation prong redundant? Third, what is your reaction to the whole idea of attaching such weight to the avoidance of redundancy? Are there other responses that Justice Stevens could have offered?

7. The divergent opinions in Kungys do illustrate the Justices’ differing uses of statutory construction principles, but they seem to reflect deeper policy differences as well. At the most general level, it might be that the Justices simply vary in the priorities they would assign to the competing goals of protecting the individual interest in secure citizenship and preserving the integrity of the naturalization process. At a more specific level, while all the Justices appear to recognize actual ineligibility for naturalization as a basis for denaturalization, they display different degrees of enthusiasm for recognizing dishonesty as an independent ground. Justice White seems to stress the dishonesty factor the most, Justice Stevens the least. Justice Scalia is somewhere in between. That theme figures in the debates over whether section 101(f)(6) requires materially false testimony, what makes a willful misrepresentation material, and what it means for naturalization to be “procured by” misrepresentation. See also Michael G. Heyman, Language and Silence: The Supreme Court’s Search for the Meaning of American Denaturalization Law, 5 Georgetown Immigration L.J. 409, 425–29 (1991) (identifying a different kind of values differential).

As a policy matter, what should the grounds for denaturalization be? Should they differ from the grounds for denying naturalization? Cf. Heyman, above, at 429–31 (arguing that the lenient standards for granting naturalization should have influenced the standard for revoking it).

8. The remand in Kungys culminated in a consent decree. Kungys accepted denaturalization in exchange for the government’s promise not to institute deportation proceedings. The government defended its decision to settle by asserting that, even if Kungys were found deportable, he would be eligible for discretionary relief. 66 IR 1287–88 (1988). The editors of Interpreter Releases quite rightly questioned, however, whether Kungys would have been eligible for any relief if found deportable as a Nazi persecutor and whether, even if eligible, Kungys would have received the favorable exercise of discretion. Id. at 1288.

2. EXPATRIATION

The previous subsection described the criteria and procedures for revoking naturalization orders. United States law now recognizes only one other way to lose one's citizenship—expatriation. Unlike denaturalization, expatriation applies without regard to the circumstances under which citizenship was originally acquired; it does not matter, in other words, whether the individual acquired citizenship by birth in the United States, by descent, or by naturalization. Also unlike denaturalization, expatriation today requires the consent of the individual, manifest in ways that will be examined below. It is that feature which distinguishes expatriation from a concept known in international law as "denationalization." The latter is usually defined to mean "the deprivation of nationality"⁴⁴ by unilateral fiat of the State." See, e.g., Marjorie M. Whiteman, 8 Digest of Internat'l L. at 98 (1967).

At common law, allegiance to a country was perpetual. One could not renounce citizenship without the consent of the sovereign. See Shanks v. Dupont, 28 U.S. (3 Pet.) 242, 246, 7 L.Ed. 666 (1830). Thus, when British subjects became naturalized United States citizens and purported to renounce their British nationality in the process, the British government refused to recognize such renunciation. And when the British government enforced that view by seizing British-born, naturalized United States citizens on the high seas and impressing them into military service, their actions hastened the War of 1812. See Charles Gordon, The Citizen and the State: Power of Congress to Expatriate American Citizens, 53 Georgetown L.Rev. 315, 319 (1965).

After the Civil War, other events began to shape the direction of citizenship law in the United States and elsewhere. The Fourteenth Amendment, section 1 of which confers citizenship on all who were "born or naturalized in the United States, and subject to the jurisdiction thereof," was approved in 1868. To avoid the perceived problems of dual citizenship, the United States in that same year began entering into reciprocal treaties with a number of other nations. Known as the Bancroft Treaties, these agreements recognized an individual right to renounce citizenship upon naturalization in a foreign country.⁴⁵ Finally, in response to British arrests of politically active naturalized Americans in Ireland, Congress passed the Expatriation Act of 1868, Act of July 27, 1868, ch. 249, 15 Stat. 223. In the Preamble to that Act, Congress proclaimed for the first time that "the right of expatriation is a natural and inherent right of all people." See generally Gordon, above, at 322-23.

44. INA § 349 refers to loss of "nationality," rather than to loss of citizenship. Since citizenship is a subcategory of nationality, however, INA § 101(a)(22), loss of United States nationality will always entail loss of citizenship. In this section, the terms "nationality" and "citizenship" are used interchangeably. See page 1289 above.

45. "Even Great Britain, the arch exponent of the principle of indissoluble allegiance, joined this movement and executed such a treaty with the United States in 1870." Gordon, above, at 322.

The 1868 Act did not, however, spell out the manner in which United States citizenship could be renounced. Congress took that step when it passed the Act of March 2, 1907, Pub.L. 193, ch. 2534, 34 Stat. 1228. But the 1907 Act went further than recognizing the right to renounce one's citizenship; it also enumerated several courses of conduct that would result in a loss of citizenship whether the individual intended to renounce or not. See id. §§ 2, 3. In one fell swoop, Congress had established specific grounds not only for expatriation but also for denationalization.

One provision of the 1907 Act, section 3, automatically denationalized any American woman who, by the act of marrying a noncitizen, acquired a foreign nationality. One victim of that provision challenged its constitutionality, arguing that Congress had no power to take away United States citizenship against one's will. In Mackenzie v. Hare, 239 U.S. 299, 36 S.Ct. 106, 60 L.Ed. 297 (1915), the Supreme Court upheld the statute. The Court found an implied congressional power, related to the regulation of foreign affairs, to withdraw citizenship in response to voluntary transactions (such as marriage) even when the individual had not intended to renounce citizenship. As Professor Leti Volpp has shown, the laws that often stripped married women of their U.S. citizenship assumed even greater significance when they intersected with laws that made most East Asians ineligible for citizenship. That story is told in Leti Volpp, Divesting Citizenship: On Asian American History and the Loss of Citizenship through Marriage, 53 UCLA L. Rev. 405 (2005).

The Nationality Act of 1940, Act of Oct. 14, 1940, ch. 876, §§ 401–10, 54 Stat. 1137, 1168–71, expanded the list of activities that would result in loss of citizenship. The INA added further to the list. See Act of June 27, 1952, Pub.L. 414, ch. 477, §§ 349–57, 66 Stat. 163, 267–72. Not until 1958, however, did any of the denationalization grounds meet any serious constitutional resistance.

Suddenly, in one day, the Supreme Court handed down three landmark decisions. In Perez v. Brownell, 356 U.S. 44, 78 S.Ct. 568, 2 L.Ed.2d 603 (1958), the Court upheld by a 5–4 vote a provision that denationalized any United States citizen who voted in a foreign political election. For the majority, it was enough that the conduct (voting in a foreign election) was voluntary and that Congress could reasonably perceive a nexus between that conduct and a potential embarrassment to United States foreign policy.

The second case in the trilogy was Trop v. Dulles, 356 U.S. 86, 78 S.Ct. 590, 2 L.Ed.2d 630 (1958). The challenged provision purported to denationalize anyone convicted of deserting the military in time of war. The same four Justices who had dissented in Perez joined in a plurality opinion. They believed not only that Congress had no power to take away one's citizenship involuntarily, but also that this particular denationalization ground was punitive and, in the light of the consequences of loss of citizenship, "cruel and unusual" and therefore violative of the Eighth Amendment. Justice Brennan, who had voted with the majority in Perez, continued to believe that Congress had the power to denationalize but found this particular provision lacked a rational relation to the war power. By a 5-4 vote, therefore, the provision was struck down.

The third decision announced that day was Nishikawa v. Dulles, 356 U.S. 129, 78 S.Ct. 612, 2 L.Ed.2d 659 (1958). The Court decided no constitutional issues in that case, but it did interpret the statute as imposing on the government the burden of proving the expatriating acts by clear, unequivocal, and convincing evidence. (We shall return to the proof issues presently.)

Later cases struck down other provisions that had purported to remove the citizenship of those who engaged in specified activities. See, e.g., Kennedy v. Mendoza-Martinez, 372 U.S. 144, 83 S.Ct. 554, 9 L.Ed.2d 644 (1963) (invalidating, as punishment imposed without procedural safeguards required for criminal proceedings, provision that divests citizenship of one who leaves or remains outside United States during wartime to evade military service) (5-4 vote); Schneider v. Rusk, 377 U.S. 163, 84 S.Ct. 1187, 12 L.Ed.2d 218 (1964) (invalidating, on equal protection grounds, provision that naturalized citizens, but not other citizens, lose citizenship by returning to native country and living there three years) (5-3 vote).

In none of those cases, however, did a majority go so far as to hold that citizenship cannot constitutionally be taken away without the individual's assent. The Court took that plunge, albeit by a 5-4 vote, in Afroyim v. Rusk, 387 U.S. 253, 87 S.Ct. 1660, 18 L.Ed.2d 757 (1967). As in Perez, the challenge was to the provision that denationalized anyone voting in a foreign political election. Expressly overruling Perez and striking down the statutory provision, the Court interpreted section 1 of the Fourteenth Amendment as giving every citizen "a constitutional right to remain a citizen * * * unless he voluntarily relinquishes that citizenship." 387 U.S. at 268, 87 S.Ct. at 1668, 18 L.Ed.2d at 767.⁴⁶ See Peter J. Spiro, Afroyim: Vaunting Citizenship, Presaging Transnationality, in David A. Martin & Peter H. Schuck (eds.), Immigration Stories (2005), chap. 6.

As the preceding summary illustrates, the United States law on loss of nationality has traveled a long road: from perpetual allegiance, to a combination of denationalization and expatriation, to expatriation alone.⁴⁷

46. Four years after Afroyim, the Court decided Rogers v. Bellei, 401 U.S. 815, 91 S.Ct. 1060, 28 L.Ed.2d 499 (1971), which you have already encountered. Despite Afroyim, the Court in Bellei upheld the withdrawal of citizenship from one who had acquired citizenship by descent but who had then failed to satisfy the statutory conditions for retaining residence in the United States. The Court limited Afroyim to Fourteenth Amendment, section 1 citizens, held that citizens by descent do not come within that description because they were not born or naturalized "in the United States," and proceeded to find the particular conditions reasonable.

47. That progression has spawned some fine commentary that includes more detailed descriptions and analyses of how the modern law evolved. For a small sampling, see T. Alexander Aleinikoff, Theories of Loss of Citizenship, 84 Michigan L. Rev. 1471, 1475-84 (1986); Donald K. Duvall, Expatriation Under United States Law, Perez to Afroyim: The Search for a Philosophy of American Citizenship, 56 Virginia L. Rev. 408, 411-30 (1970); Gary Endelman, Saying Goodbye to Uncle Sam: Formal Renunciation of U.S. Citizenship, 73 IR 709 (May 24, 1996); Charles Gordon, The Citizen and the State: Power of Congress to Expatriate American Citizens, 53

In Afroyim the Court insisted on individual consent. But what kind of consent did it have in mind? The case that follows explores that issue and some related questions of proof.

Vance v. Terrazas

Supreme Court of the United States, 1980.
444 U.S. 252, 100 S.Ct. 540, 62 L.Ed.2d 461.

■ MR. JUSTICE WHITE delivered the opinion of the Court.

Section 349(a)(2) of the Immigration and Nationality Act provides that “a person who is a national of the United States whether by birth or naturalization, shall lose his nationality by . . . taking an oath or making an affirmation or other formal declaration of allegiance to a foreign state or a political subdivision thereof.” The Act also provides that the party claiming that such loss of citizenship occurred must “establish such claim by a preponderance of the evidence” and that the voluntariness of the expatriating conduct is rebuttably presumed. § 349(c).⁴⁸ The issues in this case are whether, in establishing loss of citizenship under § 349(a)(2), a party must prove an intent to surrender United States citizenship and whether the United States Constitution permits Congress to legislate with respect to expatriation proceedings by providing the standard of proof and the statutory presumption contained in § 349(c).

I

Appellee, Laurence J. Terrazas, was born in this country, the son of a Mexican citizen. He thus acquired at birth both United States and Mexican citizenship. In the fall of 1970, while a student in Monterrey, Mexico, and at the age of 22, appellee executed an application for a certificate of Mexican nationality, swearing “adherence, obedience, and submission to the laws and authorities of the Mexican Republic” and “expressly renounc[ing] United States citizenship, as well as any submission, obedience, and loyalty to any foreign government, especially to that of the United States of America, . . .” The certificate, which issued upon this application on April 3, 1971, recited that Terrazas had sworn adherence to the United Mexican States and that he “has expressly renounced all rights inherent to any other nationality, as well as all submission, obedience, and loyalty to any foreign government, especially to those which have recognized him as that national.” Terrazas read and understood the certificate upon receipt.

A few months later, following a discussion with an officer of the United States Consulate in Monterrey, proceedings were instituted to determine whether appellee had lost his United States citizenship by obtaining the certificate of Mexican nationality. Appellee denied that he had, but in December 1971 the Department of State issued a certificate of loss of nationality. The Board of Appellate Review of the Department of State, after a full hearing, affirmed that appellee had voluntarily renounced his United States citizenship. As permitted by § 360(a) of the Act, appellee then brought this suit against the Secretary of State for a declaration of his United States nationality. Trial was de novo.

Georgetown L.J. 315, 317-33 (1965); Elwin Griffith, Expatriation and the American Citizen, 31 Howard L.J. 453, 455-78 (1988).

48. Now INA § 349(b).—Eds.

* * * The District Court concluded that the United States had “proved by a preponderance of the evidence that Laurence J. Terrazas knowingly, understandingly and voluntarily took an oath of allegiance to Mexico, and concurrently renounced allegiance to the United States,” and that he had therefore “voluntarily relinquished United States citizenship pursuant to § 349(a)(2) of the . . . Act.”

In its opinion accompanying its findings and conclusions, the District Court observed that appellee had acted “voluntarily in swearing allegiance to Mexico and renouncing allegiance to the United States,” and that appellee “knew he was repudiating allegiance to the United States through his actions.” The court also said * * * that “the declaration of allegiance to a foreign state in conjunction with the renunciatory language of United States citizenship ‘would leave no room for ambiguity as to the intent of the applicant.’ ”

The Court of Appeals reversed. As the Court of Appeals understood the law—and there appears to have been no dispute on these basic requirements in the Courts of Appeals—the United States had not only to prove the taking of an oath to a foreign state, but also to demonstrate an intent on appellee’s part to renounce his United States citizenship. The District Court had found these basic elements to have been proved by a preponderance of the evidence; and the Court of Appeals observed that, “[a]ssuming that the proper [evidentiary] standards were applied, we are convinced that the record fully supports the court’s findings.” The Court of Appeals ruled, however, that under Afroyim v. Rusk, Congress had no power to legislate the evidentiary standard contained in § 349(c) and that the Constitution required that proof be not merely by a preponderance of the evidence, but by “clear, convincing and unequivocal evidence.” The case was remanded to the District Court for further proceedings.

* * *

II

* * *

In Afroyim v. Rusk, the Court held that § 401(e) of the Nationality Act of 1940, which provided that an American citizen “shall lose his nationality by . . . [v]oting in a political election in a foreign state,” contravened the Citizenship Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. Afroyim was a naturalized American citizen who lived in Israel for 10 years. While in that nation, Afroyim voted in a political election. He in consequence was stripped of his United States citizenship. Consistently with Perez v. Brownell, which had sustained § 401(e), the District Court affirmed the power of Congress to expatriate for such conduct regardless of the citizen’s intent to renounce his citizenship. This Court, however, in overruling Perez, “reject[ed] the idea . . . that, aside from the Fourteenth Amendment, Congress has any general power, express or implied, to take away an American citizen’s citizenship without his assent.” The Afroyim opinion continued: § 1 of the Fourteenth Amendment is “most reasonably . . . read as defining a citizenship which a citizen keeps unless he voluntarily relinquishes it.”

The Secretary argues that Afroyim does not stand for the proposition that a specific intent to renounce must be shown before citizenship is relinquished. It is enough, he urges, to establish one of the expatriating acts specified in § 349(a) because Congress has declared each of those acts to be inherently inconsistent with the retention of citizenship. But Afroyim emphasized that loss of citizenship requires the individual’s “assent,” in addition to his voluntary commission of the expatriating act. It is difficult to understand that “assent” to loss of citizenship would mean anything less than an intent to relinquish citizenship, whether the intent is expressed in words or is found as a fair inference from proved conduct. Perez had sustained congressional power to expatriate without regard to the intent of the citizen to surrender his citizenship. Afroyim overturned this proposition. It may be, as the Secretary maintains, that a requirement of intent to relinquish citizenship poses substantial difficulties for the Government in performance of its essential task of determining who is a citizen. Nevertheless, the intent of the Fourteenth Amendment, among other things, was to define citizenship; and as interpreted in Afroyim, that definition cannot coexist with a congressional power to specify acts that work a renunciation of citizenship even absent an intent to renounce. In the last analysis, expatriation depends on the will of the citizen rather than on the will of Congress and its assessment of his conduct.

* * *

In any event, we are confident that it would be inconsistent with Afroyim to treat the expatriating acts specified in § 349(a) as the equivalent of or as conclusive evidence of the indispensable voluntary assent of the citizen. * * *

* * *

* * * [I]n the case now before us, the Board of Appellate Review of the State Department found that appellee not only swore allegiance to Mexico, but also intended to abandon his United States citizenship: “In consideration of the complete record, we view appellant’s declaration of allegiance to Mexico and his concurrent repudiation of any and all submission, obedience, and loyalty to the United States as compelling evidence of a specific intent to relinquish his United States citizenship.” * * *

As we have said, Afroyim requires that the record support a finding that the expatriating act was accompanied by an intent to terminate United States citizenship. The submission of the United States is inconsistent with this holding, and we are unprepared to reconsider it.

III

With respect to the principal issues before it, the Court of Appeals held that Congress was without constitutional authority to prescribe the standard of proof in expatriation proceedings and that the proof in such cases must be by clear and convincing evidence rather than by the preponderance standard prescribed in § 349(c). We are in fundamental disagreement with these conclusions.

In Nishikawa v. Dulles, an American-born citizen, temporarily in Japan, was drafted into the Japanese Army. The Government later claimed that, under § 401(c) of the Nationality Act of 1940, he had expatriated himself by serving in the armed forces of a foreign nation. The Government agreed that expatriation had not occurred if Nishikawa's army service had been involuntary. Nishikawa contended that the Government had to prove that his service was voluntary, while the Government urged that duress was an affirmative defense that Nishikawa had the burden to prove by overcoming the usual presumption of voluntariness. This Court held the presumption unavailable to the Government and required proof of a voluntary expatriating act by clear and convincing evidence.

Section 349(c) soon followed; its evident aim was to supplant the evidentiary standards prescribed by Nishikawa. * * *

We see no basis for invalidating the evidentiary prescriptions contained in § 349(c). Nishikawa was not rooted in the Constitution. The Court noted, moreover, that it was acting in the absence of legislative guidance. Nor do we agree with the Court of Appeals that, because under Afroyim Congress is constitutionally devoid of power to impose expatriation on a citizen, it is also without power to prescribe the evidentiary standards to govern expatriation proceedings. Although § 349(c) had been law since 1961, Afroyim did not address or advert to that section; surely the Court would have said so had it intended to construe the Constitution to exclude expatriation proceedings from the traditional powers of Congress to prescribe rules of evidence and standards of proof in the federal courts. This power, rooted in the authority of Congress conferred by Art. 1, § 8, cl. 9, of the Constitution to create inferior federal courts, is undoubted and has been frequently noted and sustained.

* * *

We are unable to conclude that the specific evidentiary standard provided by Congress in § 349(c) is invalid under either the Citizenship Clause or the Due Process Clause of the Fifth Amendment. It is true that in criminal and involuntary commitment contexts we have held that the Due Process Clause imposes requirements of proof beyond a preponderance of the evidence. This Court has also stressed the importance of citizenship and evinced a decided preference for requiring clear and convincing evidence to prove expatriation. But expatriation proceedings are civil in nature and do not threaten a loss of liberty. Moreover, as we have noted, Nishikawa did not purport to be [a] constitutional ruling, and the same is true of similar rulings in related areas. Woodby v. INS (deportation);

Schneiderman v. United States (denaturalization). None of these cases involved a congressional judgment, such as that present here, that the preponderance standard of proof provides sufficient protection for the interest of the individual in retaining his citizenship. Contrary to the Secretary's position, we have held that expatriation requires the ultimate finding that the citizen has committed the expatriating act with the intent to renounce his citizenship. This in itself is a heavy burden, and we cannot hold that Congress has exceeded its powers by requiring proof of an intentional expatriating act by a preponderance of evidence.

IV

* * * We also conclude that the presumption of voluntariness provided in § 349(c) is not otherwise constitutionally infirm.

Section 349(c) provides in relevant part that "any person who commits or performs, or who has committed or performed, any act of expatriation under the provisions of this chapter or any other Act shall be presumed to have done so voluntarily, but such presumption may be rebutted upon a showing, by a preponderance of the evidence, that the act or acts committed or performed were not done voluntarily." In enacting § 349(c), Congress did not dispute the holding of Nishikawa that the alleged expatriating act—there, service in a foreign army—must be performed voluntarily, but it did insist that the Government have the benefit of the usual presumption of voluntariness and that one claiming that his act was involuntary make out his claim of duress by a preponderance of the evidence.

It is important at this juncture to note the scope of the statutory presumption. Section 349(c) provides that any of the statutory expatriating acts, if proved, are presumed to have been committed voluntarily. It does not also direct a presumption that the act has been performed with the intent to relinquish United States citizenship. That matter remains the burden of the party claiming expatriation to prove by a preponderance of the evidence. As so understood, we cannot invalidate the provision.

The majority opinion in Nishikawa referred to the "ordinary rule that duress is a matter of affirmative defense" to be proved by the party claiming the duress. Justices Frankfurter and Burton, concurring in the result, also referred to the "ordinarily controlling principles of evidence [that] would suggest that the individual, who is peculiarly equipped to clarify an ambiguity in the meaning of outward events should have the burden of proving what his state of mind was." * * * Yet the Court in Nishikawa, because it decided that "the consequences of denationalization are so drastic" and because it found nothing indicating a contrary result in the legislative history of the Nationality Act of 1940, held that the Government must carry the burden of proving that the expatriating act was performed voluntarily.

Section 349(c), which was enacted subsequently, and its legislative history make clear that Congress preferred the ordinary rule that voluntariness is presumed and that duress is an affirmative defense to be proved by the party asserting it. * * * The rationality of the procedural rule with respect to claims of involuntariness in ordinary civil cases cannot be doubted. To invalidate the rule here would be to disagree flatly with Congress on the balance to be struck between the interest in citizenship and the burden the Government must assume in demonstrating expatriating conduct. It would also constitutionalize that disagreement and give the Citizenship Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment far more scope in this context than the relevant circumstances that brought the Amendment into being would suggest appropriate. Thus we conclude that the presumption of voluntariness included in § 349(c) has continuing vitality.

V

In sum, we hold that in proving expatriation, an expatriating act and an intent to relinquish citizenship must be proved by a preponderance of the evidence. We also hold that when one of the statutory expatriating acts is proved, it is constitutional to presume it to have been a voluntary act until and unless proved otherwise by the actor. If he succeeds, there can be no expatriation. If he fails, the question remains whether on all the evidence the Government has satisfied its burden of proof that the expatriating act was performed with the necessary intent to relinquish citizenship.

The judgment of the Court of Appeals is reversed, and the case is remanded for further proceedings consistent with this opinion.

So ordered.

■ MR. JUSTICE STEWART dissents for the reasons stated in Part II of MR. JUSTICE BRENNAN's dissenting opinion, which he joins.

■ MR. JUSTICE MARSHALL, concurring in part and dissenting in part.

I agree with the Court's holding that a citizen of the United States may not lose his citizenship in the absence of a finding that he specifically intended to renounce it. I also concur in the adoption of a saving construction of INA § 349(a)(2) to require that the statutorily designated expatriating acts be done with a specific intent to relinquish citizenship.

I cannot, however, accept the majority's conclusion that a person may be found to have relinquished his American citizenship upon a preponderance of the evidence that he intended to do so. The Court's discussion of congressional power to "prescribe rules of evidence and standards of proof in the federal courts" is the beginning, not the end, of the inquiry. It remains the task of this Court to determine when those rules and standards impinge on constitutional rights. As my Brother Stevens indicates, the Court's casual dismissal of the importance of American citizenship cannot withstand scrutiny. And the mere fact that one who has been expatriated is not locked up in a prison does not dispose of the constitutional inquiry. As Mr. Chief Justice Warren stated over 20 years ago:

"[T]he expatriate has lost the right to have rights.

"This punishment is offensive to cardinal principles for which the Constitution stands. It subjects the individual to a fate of ever-increasing fear and distress. He knows not what discriminations may be established against him, what proscriptions may be directed against him, and when and for what cause his existence in his native land may be terminated. He may be subject to banishment, a fate universally decried by civilized people. He is stateless, a condition deplored in the international community of democracies. It is no answer to suggest that all the disastrous consequences of this fate may not be brought to bear on a stateless person. The threat makes the punishment obnoxious." Trop v. Dulles (plurality opinion).

For these reasons I cannot understand, much less accept, the Court's suggestion that "expatriation proceedings . . . do not threaten a loss of liberty." Recognizing that a standard of proof ultimately "'reflects the value society places'" on the interest at stake, I would hold that a citizen may not lose his citizenship in the absence of clear and convincing evidence that he intended to do so.

■ MR. JUSTICE STEVENS, concurring in part and dissenting in part.

The Court today unanimously reiterates the principle set forth in Afroyim v. Rusk that Congress may not deprive an American of his citizenship against his will, but may only effectuate the citizen's own intention to renounce his citizenship. I agree with the Court that Congress may establish certain standards for determining whether such a renunciation has occurred. It may, for example, provide that expatriation can be proved by evidence that a person has performed an act that is normally inconsistent with continued citizenship and that the person thereby specifically intended to relinquish his American citizenship.

I do not agree, however, with the conclusion that Congress has established a permissible standard in INA § 349(a)(2). Since we accept dual citizenship, taking an oath of allegiance to a foreign government is not necessarily inconsistent with an intent to remain an American citizen. Moreover, as now written, the statute cannot fairly be read to require a finding of specific intent to relinquish citizenship. * * *

I also disagree with the holding that a person may be deprived of his citizenship upon a showing by a mere preponderance of the evidence that he intended to relinquish it. The Court reasons that because the proceedings in question are civil in nature and do not result in any loss of physical liberty, no greater burden of proof is required than in the ordinary civil case. Such reasoning construes the constitutional concept of "liberty" too narrowly.

* * * In my judgment a person's interest in retaining his American citizenship is surely an aspect of "liberty" of which he cannot be deprived without due process of law. Because the interest at stake is comparable to that involved in Addington v. Texas, essentially for the reasons stated in THE CHIEF JUSTICE's opinion for a unanimous Court in that case, I believe that due process requires that a clear and convincing standard of proof be met in this case as well before the deprivation may occur.

■ MR. JUSTICE BRENNAN, with whom MR. JUSTICE STEWART joins as to Part II, dissenting.

* * * Because I would hold that one who acquires United States citizenship by virtue of being born in the United States, U.S. Const., Amdt. 14, § 1, can lose that citizenship only by formally renouncing it, and because I would hold that the act of which appellee is accused in this case cannot be an expatriating act, I dissent.

I

This case is governed by Afroyim v. Rusk. Afroyim, emphasizing the crucial importance of the right of citizenship, held unequivocally that a citizen has “a constitutional right to remain a citizen . . . unless he voluntarily relinquishes that citizenship.” * * *

* * * Congress has provided for a procedure by which one may formally renounce citizenship. In this case the appellant concedes that appellee has not renounced his citizenship under that procedure. Because one can lose citizenship only by voluntarily renouncing it and because appellee has not formally renounced his, I would hold that he remains a citizen. Accordingly, I would remand the case with orders that appellee be given a declaration of United States nationality.

II

I reach the same result by another, independent line of reasoning. Appellee was born a dual national. He is a citizen of the United States because he was born here and a citizen of Mexico because his father was Mexican. The only expatriating act of which appellee stands accused is having sworn an oath of allegiance to Mexico. If dual citizenship, per se, can be consistent with United States citizenship, then I cannot see why an oath of allegiance to the other country of which one is already a citizen should create inconsistency. One owes allegiance to any country of which one is a citizen, especially when one is living in that country. The formal oath adds nothing to the existing foreign citizenship and, therefore, cannot affect his United States citizenship.

LATER DEVELOPMENTS

INA § 349(a), which you should read now, lists the acts that can result in loss of nationality. The present version reflects some 1986 amendments intended to codify the holding in Terrazas. See Act of Nov. 14, 1986, Pub.L. 99-653, § 18, 100 Stat. 3655, 3658. Note in particular the explicit statutory requirements that the person (a) “voluntarily” perform one of the enumerated acts and (b) do so “with the intention of relinquishing United States nationality.”

The State Department, which decides the vast bulk of all loss of nationality cases (more on that in a moment), made a dramatic announcement in 1990. It declared that individuals will be presumed to “intend to retain United States citizenship when they obtain naturalization in a foreign state, subscribe to routine declarations of allegiance to a foreign state, or accept non-policy level employment with a foreign government.” State Dept. Cable to Diplomatic and Consular Posts (April 16, 1990), reproduced in 67 IR 1092, at 1093 (Oct. 1, 1990). In cases to which the presumption applies, the Department will find there was no intent to relinquish nationality unless the person affirmatively asserts, in a questionnaire provided by a consular officer, that he or she “absolutely and entirely” relinquishes citizenship and all the rights associated with it. See 22 CFR § 50.50 (2008). The Department cautions that the presumption is inapplicable in certain cases, including any in which the statutory expatriating act is “accompanied by conduct which is so inconsistent with retention of U.S. citizenship that it compels a conclusion that the individual intended to relinquish U.S. citizenship.” 67 IR at 1093. The Statement adds, however, that the latter cases “are very rare.” Id.

For the individual who wants to surrender his or her U.S. citizenship, this announcement means it will be necessary either to affirm that intention in writing to a U.S. consular officer or to formally renounce under INA § 349(a)(5).⁴⁹ Importantly, the State Department announcement is retroactive; those who previously lost their U.S. citizenship may request reconsideration by writing to the nearest consulate or to the State Department in Washington, D.C.⁵⁰

The new policy is expected to eliminate most loss of nationality cases. According to the State Department, in a typical year before the new policy approximately 800 people would be found to have lost their nationality. Only about 200 of those cases were based on express renunciations. For the vast majority of the rest, determinations of loss of nationality are now expected to be few. 67 IR at 1094–95. Especially affected by the retroactivity provision will be some 282,000 U.S.-born, naturalized Canadian citizens, including many draft-age males who moved to Canada during the Vietnam War. 67 IR 799, 800 (July 23, 1990).

The State Department’s 1990 announcement reflects the government’s general discomfort with renunciations of United States citizenship—especially, but not only, in cases where renunciation would result in statelessness. In 1995, Secretary of State Warren Christopher announced that the Department would go a step farther, proposing legislation to repeal all the expatriation grounds except the taking of a formal renunciation oath in a U.S. consulate. Endelman, note 49 above, at 715. To date, however, no such legislation has been enacted.

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. Loss of nationality issues can surface in various settings. Any time a legal benefit or sanction turns on a person’s nationality, and there is an

49. See 67 IR at 1094. For some helpful detail on the effectiveness of foreign renunciation oaths, see Gary Endelman, Saying Goodbye to Uncle Sam: Formal Renunciation of U.S. Citizenship, 73 IR 709 (May 24, 1996).

50. See 67 IR at 1094; see also H. Ansagar Kelly, Dual Nationality, The Myth of Election, and a Kinder, Gentler State Department, 23 Univ. Miami Inter-American L.Rev. 421, 442–48 (1991–92).

issue whether nationality has been lost, the official responsible for adjudicating the benefit or sanction generally must make a nationality decision in order to dispose of the case. See, e.g., Mackenzie v. Hare, 239 U.S. 299, 36 S.Ct. 106, 60 L.Ed. 297 (1915) (upholding local election officials' refusal of voter registration upon finding of expatriation).

More commonly, though, an administrative finding that an individual has lost nationality is made by DHS, the Justice Department, or the State Department. The Justice Department (EOIR) becomes involved, for example, when the subject of removal proceedings claims citizenship in removal proceedings and ICE responds that expatriation has occurred. As you have seen, BIA decisions are generally subject to judicial review. Similar issues can arise when USCIS denies a visa petition on the ground that the petitioner has lost his or her United States citizenship. See Gary Endelman, How to Prevent Loss of Citizenship: Part I, Immigration Briefings (Nov. 1989) at 4.

Most other loss of nationality cases come up through the State Department. The Secretary of State is responsible for making loss of nationality decisions when either the person is outside the United States, INA § 104(a)(3), or there is reason to believe the person lost his or her nationality while outside the United States, INA § 358. Both such situations are common. As you read the list of expatriating acts in INA § 349(a), you might have noticed that most are the sorts of acts that would normally occur in foreign countries. When they do, State Department officials (ordinarily diplomatic or consular officers) make the relevant findings. Passport officials also make decisions as to loss of nationality. See generally Endelman, above, at 4–7.

From 1967 (one year after Afroyim) until 2008, these various State Department decisions were appealable internally to a non-statutory tribunal called the Board of Appellate Review (BAR). See generally 22 CFR § 7 (2008); Alan G. James, The Board of Appellate Review of the Department of State: The Right to Appellate Review of Administrative Determinations of Loss of Nationality, 23 San Diego L. Rev. 261 (1986). In 2008, however, the State Department abolished the BAR. There is no longer any formal administrative appeal from a DOS issuance of a Certificate of Loss of Nationality. Instead, there is a discretionary “review” of the decision by the Bureau of Consular Affairs. For that, the person has to show some major change in the law or “substantial new evidence, not previously considered.” The procedure is thus more in the nature of a discretionary motion to reconsider than an appeal. See 73 Fed. Reg. 62196 (Oct. 20, 2008) (final rule).

2. The Court in Terrazas makes clear that in expatriation cases the government must prove a specific intent to renounce citizenship. In a helpful article, Professor Aleinikoff considers four different theories for deciding who should possess citizenship and concludes that none of them supports the Terrazas principle. T. Alexander Aleinikoff, Theories of Loss of Citizenship, 84 Michigan L. Rev. 1471, 1484–98 (1986). The four are (a) the “Rights Perspective” (citizenship is a constitutional right); (b) the “Consent Perspective” (citizenship is the product of mutual consent between the individual and the nation); (c) the “Contractarian Perspective” (citizenship is part of the social contract among the individuals who created the nation); and (d) the “Communitarian perspective” (citizenship reflects the psychological and social bonds that inevitably form between an individual and the society in which he or she is raised or is living).

Consider each of those theories and decide whether you agree with Aleinikoff that they do not lead to the conclusion reached in Terrazas. For some of them, you might need to take into account that the Terrazas doctrine is asymmetrical; that is, the individual may unilaterally end the relationship but the government may not.

3. Having concluded that none of the four citizenship perspectives explains the prohibition on denationalization, Aleinikoff argues that the Court should shift its focus from consent to allegiance. More specifically, Aleinikoff proposes that the government be permitted to denationalize when it can prove the commission of “specific acts that demonstrate lapsed, transferred, or divided allegiance.” Id. at 1500. For more detail, see id. at 1500–03. What dangers do you see in such an approach? Are there ways to minimize those dangers? What activities would you include in the list? What would be the benefits of his proposed change?

4. To illustrate the contrast between an intent-based approach and an allegiance-based approach, Aleinikoff discusses the case of Rabbi Meir Kahane. Kahane, a United States citizen and the founder of the Jewish Defense League, immigrated to Israel. By doing so, he automatically acquired Israeli citizenship under Israel’s Law of Return, which bestows citizenship upon any Jew who settles in that country. He was then elected to the Knesset (the Israeli Parliament). The State Department charged he had lost his United States nationality under INA § 349(a)(4)(A), by the combination of having served in a foreign government and having acquired foreign nationality. All along, however, Kahane had insisted to the State Department that he intended to retain his United States citizenship, which he pointed out he had a motive to preserve—it facilitated his travel to and from the United States. The State Department nonetheless found an intent to renounce, and the BAR affirmed. The Board observed that “actions speak louder than words” and cited also Kahane’s admission that his “primary loyalty is to Israel.” See Aleinikoff, above, at 1471–72.

Aleinikoff criticizes the Board’s analysis. While conceding that words are not conclusive, he notes the absence of any evidence of an intent to renounce and indeed the presence of an affirmative motive to retain United States citizenship. He suggests, convincingly, that the Board in fact based its result solely upon a finding that Kahane had transferred his allegiance—not, as the Board states, upon a finding that Kahane had intended to relinquish his United States citizenship. Id. at 1472–73. A federal district court ultimately reversed the BAR decision, holding that the evidence required a finding of intent to preserve United States citizenship. Kahane v. Shultz, 653 F.Supp. 1486 (E.D.N.Y.1987).

Kahane's victory proved hollow. The following year the Knesset enacted legislation forbidding its members to be citizens of any country but Israel. Kahane responded by appearing before a United States consulate, where, after receiving an explanation of the consequences of losing citizenship, he took a formal oath of renunciation. Because of some technical defects in the form of the oath, he returned to the consulate a month later and executed the renunciation a second time. The State Department issued a Certificate of Loss of Nationality (CLN). About one month later, the Israeli Supreme Court barred Kahane's political party (the Kach Party, which he had founded) from running in the 1988 Parliamentary elections. His Parliamentary career at least temporarily derailed, Kahane then attempted to withdraw his renunciation on the ground it was involuntary. The State Department refused his request. He brought an action to enjoin the State Department from enforcing his CLN and, as part of that action, moved for a preliminary injunction. The district court denied the motion, finding too little likelihood that he would prevail on the merits of the voluntariness issue. Kahane v. Secretary of State, 700 F.Supp. 1162 (D.D.C. 1988).

On November 5, 1990, while giving a speech in the United States, Rabbi Kahane was assassinated. New York Times, Nov. 6, 1990, at A1.

More generally, should acts that clearly demonstrate a lack of allegiance to the United States be ground for expatriation, or should a specific intent to renounce citizenship be required? What if a United States citizen is convicted of perpetrating a large-scale terrorist act, and it is proved that the act was done for the specific purpose of harming the United States? Should the person be stripped of his or her citizenship, either as part of the criminal punishment or in addition to it?

5. The Restatement II of Torts, § 8A, defines an "inten[ded]" consequence as one that the actor either "desires" to cause or "believes is substantially certain to result from his or her act" (emphasis added). The criminal law has traditionally adopted a similar view. See Wayne R. Lafave, Criminal Law § 5.2 (4th ed.2003). What would you think of an approach that adopts the Terrazas requirement of an intent to relinquish citizenship, but defines intent as tort lawyers and criminal lawyers do? Would that approach solve the theoretical problems? Would it be good policy? If a person likes having United States citizenship but is willing to give it up when doing so will help achieve some other objective, why not recognize that choice?

6. Among the common responses to State Department allegations of intent to relinquish citizenship are (a) "I was unaware I had ever acquired United States citizenship in the first place" and (b) "I did not understand that I was giving it up." See generally Gary Endelman, How to Prevent Loss of Citizenship: Part II, December 1989 Immigration Briefings at 12-15.

7. The preceding notes concerned the requirement of an intent to relinquish citizenship. The Court in Terrazas, and now INA § 349(a) itself, make clear that expatriation also requires the voluntary commission of one of the specific acts enumerated in the statute. Justice Brennan believes that these acts, even if performed voluntarily and coupled with an intent to relinquish citizenship, do not suffice; rather, he would hold, one may surrender citizenship only by taking a formal oath of renunciation. That view, as you saw earlier, was also expressed by former Secretary of State Warren Christopher. Do you agree? That question aside, do you agree with Justice Brennan that Terrazas did nothing inconsistent with retention of United States citizenship?

8. You might have noticed from the list of expatriating acts in section 349(a) that it is nearly impossible for a person to give up his or her United States citizenship during peacetime without either leaving the United States or committing a serious crime. Subsection (6) permits renunciation in the United States in time of war, and subsection (7) permits renunciation by treason or other related crimes, but the other subsections encompass conduct that would normally occur abroad (foreign naturalization, oath of allegiance to foreign state, certain foreign military service, certain foreign government employment, renunciation before consular officer). Why do you suppose the law does not allow people to surrender their United States citizenship simply by taking an oath of renunciation before designated officials in the United States? Professors Peter Schuck and Rogers Smith, consistently with their consent-based view of citizenship, have proposed a procedure by which every United States citizen, upon attaining age 18, would receive a form on which the person could make a decision to renounce citizenship. Under their proposal, the form would contain information stressing the implications of that choice, and the default option would be retention.⁵¹

How do you feel (a) about allowing surrender of citizenship by oath of renunciation in the United States; and (b) about the proposal to furnish renunciation forms at age 18?

9. One of the most common issues in expatriation cases is whether the expatriating act was committed under duress. Economic duress is frequently asserted (“I had to acquire Canadian nationality in order to get work”) but seldom successful.⁵²

10. The flip side of the economic duress cases are those in which wealthy Americans formally renounce their United States citizenship and move overseas in order to reduce their United States income taxes. Recently this phenomenon has been occurring often, gathering publicity, and generating anger. In 1996, Congress responded with both barrels. It enact-

51. Peter H. Schuck & Rogers M. Smith, Citizenship Without Consent—Illegal Aliens in the American Polity 122–26 (1985). For a strong criticism of that proposal, see David A. Martin, Membership and Consent: Abstract or Organic?, 11 Yale J. Internat'l L. 278, 288–90 (1985).

52. See Alan G. James, The Board of Appellate Review of the Department of State:

The Right to Appellate Review of Administrative Determinations of Loss of Nationality, 23 San Diego L.Rev. 261, 291–93 (1986). But see the 3–2 decision finding economic duress in the case of controversial writer Margaret Randall, File No. A11 644 708 (BIA, July 27, 1989, unpublished), discussed in 66 IR at 843–44 (1989).

ed various changes to the tax laws, see Alice G. Abreu, Taxing Exits, 29 U.C. Davis L. Rev. 1087 (1996), and it added an inadmissibility ground for former citizens who, after enactment, renounce their citizenship "for the purpose of avoiding taxation by the United States," see IIRIRA § 352(a), adding INA § 212(a)(10). Not all, however, find this expatriation practice objectionable.⁵³

Other sanctions for tax expatriates are also possible. The Internal Revenue Code now requires the posting of the names of citizenship renouncers in the Federal Register. 26 USC § 6039G(e). For a sample, see 64 Fed. Reg. 3339 (Jan. 21, 1999). Another approach is offered in Jeffrey M. Colon, Changing U.S. Tax Jurisdiction: Expatriates, Immigrants, and the Need for a Coherent Tax Policy, 34 San Diego L. Rev. 1 (1997) (advocating "mark-to-market" approach that would tax expatriates on accrued gains and losses).

11. Obtaining naturalization in a foreign state is one of the more important statutory expatriating acts. INA § 349(a)(1). Some foreign nations, like the United States, make oaths of renunciation of all other nationalities a prerequisite to naturalization. Others do not. For examples, see James, note 52 above, at 302-03. The liberalizations announced by the State Department in 1990 will eliminate many problems even for those who obtain naturalization in countries that require renunciation oaths.

12. The Court in Terrazas also addresses two proof problems, both arising under former INA § 349(c) [now 349(b)]. The Court first upholds the "preponderance of the evidence" standard. Refer back, on pages 712-13 above, to Justice Harlan's prescription for determining the appropriate standard of proof. If you apply it to expatriation, how do you personally come out?

13. Do you agree with the Court's decision to uphold the statutory rebuttable presumption that, if the individual committed one of the expatriating acts, the commission was voluntary?

C. THE SIGNIFICANCE OF CITIZENSHIP

In emotional terms, citizenship means different things to different people. For many, citizenship is an element of personal identity, a link either between self and nation or between self and other individuals. The strength and meanings of those bonds vary with the values and experiences of the individual and with the history and culture of the particular nation. For some, citizenship represents a heritage that is as fundamental to

53. See, e.g., Alice G. Abreu, The Difference Between Expatriates and Mrs. Gregory—Citizenship Can Matter, 10 Tax Notes Internat'l 1612 (May 8, 1995) (arguing that U.S. tax laws should respect person's choice to relinquish citizenship, since the person is also giving up many non-tax benefits of citizenship). For a highly useful analysis, see David M. Hudson, Tax Problems for Departing Aliens, March 1997 Immigration Briefings.

personal identity as are family and ethnicity; for others, the meaning of citizenship is less profound.

From a legal standpoint, citizenship is a source of several specific rights. But the differences between citizens' rights and noncitizens' rights typically do not generate serious discussion unless the particular noncitizens are LPRs. Most people accept the legitimacy of treating either undocumented immigrants or temporary visitors differently from citizens. LPRs have a stronger claim to community membership. Thus, when people talk about whether a particular legal right should be reserved for citizens, the hardest policy, and sometimes constitutional, questions usually concern the eligibility of LPRs.

In the United States, the most practically significant legal consequence of citizenship is freedom from the immigration laws. Without the right to be in the United States, most of the other rights provided by American law would be meaningless or at least far less important. As you have also seen, citizenship further enables one to petition for the admission of certain family members as immigrants. LPRs may also petition on behalf of certain family members, but both the range of qualifying relatives and the numerical quotas (and therefore the waiting periods) are much more restrictive than when citizens file analogous petitions.

One much overlooked benefit of citizenship is the (qualified) statutory right to pass it on to one's children. Transmission can occur in various ways that you encountered in section A.

International law has long emphasized the interdependence of allegiance and protection. A citizen is said to owe permanent allegiance to the country of citizenship, which in consequence may protect that individual when he or she is threatened with harm by a foreign nation. See generally Richard B. Lillich, The Human Rights of Aliens in Contemporary International Law 5-17 (1984). Nations have no analogous power to intervene on behalf of their LPRs.

Allegations of illegal foreign contributions to President Clinton's 1996 reelection campaign triggered proposals to ban all noncitizens—including LPRs—from contributing to federal election campaigns. One such bill, H.R. 34 (1998), passed the House of Representatives in 1998 but did not become law.⁵⁴

In the United States, federal and state laws impose a host of other, miscellaneous disabilities on noncitizens. Even LPRs still sometimes find themselves ineligible for certain state professional licenses. See Luis F.B. Plascencia et al., Tomás Rivera Policy Institute, Restricting Immigrant Access to Employment: An Examination of Regulations in Five States, Policy Brief (Aug. 1999). Other common disabilities include ineligibility for

54. See 144 Cong. Rec. H1764 (Mar. 30, 1998). For a comprehensive summary, see Covington & Burling and National Asian Pacific American Legal Consortium, Protecting the Rights of Legal Permanent Residents: A

First Amendment Analysis of Proposals to Prohibit Campaign Contributions and Expenditures by Legal Permanent Residents, 3 BIB 16 (Jan. 1, 1998).

government employment, public benefits, property ownership, and political participation. Many states also restrict gun ownership by noncitizens, see generally Pratheepan Gulasekaram, Aliens with Guns: Equal Protection, Federal Power, and the Second Amendment, 92 Iowa L. Rev. 891 (2007), and many countries (not the United States) insulate their own citizens from extradition, see Yaffa Zilbershats, Extraditing Israeli Citizens to the United States—Extradition and Citizenship Dilemmas, 21 Michigan J. Internat'l L. 297 (2000). Some disabilities extend to all noncitizens, while others disadvantage only some—those who are not LPRs, or those who have lived in the United States for less than a prescribed time, etc.⁵⁵ Recent years have seen an explosion of interest in foreign, comparative, and international citizenship law.⁵⁶

Government action that favors citizens over noncitizens can raise some difficult constitutional issues. In chapter 12, you saw some of the issues that can arise from governmental constraints on undocumented immigrants (mainly actions of state governments). Laws that discriminate against LPRs require a different analysis.

Generally, congressional action that discriminates against noncitizens—even LPRs—has been upheld, in part because of Congress's plenary power to regulate immigration and the assumed similarity between immigration laws and other regulation of noncitizens.⁵⁷ Should federal regulation of noncitizens outside the contexts of admission and expulsion be subjected to the same special judicial deference as federal immigration laws are? If not, how does a court tell the difference between "immigration laws" and "other" citizenship regulation? You saw analogous issues in the context of preemption challenges to state regulatory action.⁵⁸

55. See generally David Carliner et al., The Rights of Aliens and Refugees—The Basic ACLU Guide to Alien and Refugee Rights (2d ed. 1990); A. Peter Mutharika, The Alien Under American Law (rev. ed. 1984); David Weissbrodt & Laura Danielson, Immigration Law and Procedure in a Nutshell, ch. 13 (5th ed. 2005).

56. See, e.g., United States Office of Personnel Management, Investigations Service, Citizenship Laws of the World, <http://www.opm.gov/extra/investigate/IS-01.pdf>; T. Alexander Aleinikoff & Douglas Klusmeyer (eds.), Citizenship Today: Global Perspectives and Practices (2001); T. Alexander Aleinikoff & Douglas Klusmeyer (eds.), From Migrants to Citizens (2000); J. Donald Galloway, The Dilemmas of Canadian Citizenship Law, 13 Georgetown Immigration L.J. 201 (1999); John Guendelsberger, Equal Protection and Resident Alien Access to Public Benefits in France and the United States, 67 Tulane L. Rev. 669 (1993); Atsushi Kondo (ed.), Citizenship in a Global World—Comparing Citizen- ship Rights for Aliens (2001); Kim Rubenstein, Citizenship in Australia: Unscrambling Its Meaning, 20 Melbourne L. Rev. 503 (1995); Ayelet Shachar, Whose Republic?: Citizenship and Membership in the Israeli Polity, 13 Georgetown Immigration L.J. 233 (1999); Gianni Zappalà & Stephen Castles, Citizenship and Immigration in Australia, 13 Georgetown Immigration L.J. 273 (1999).

57. See, e.g., Mathews v. Diaz, 426 U.S. 67, 96 S.Ct. 1883, 48 L.Ed.2d 478 (1976); Flemming v. Nestor, 363 U.S. 603, 80 S.Ct. 1367, 4 L.Ed.2d 1435 (1960). But cf. Hampton v. Mow Sun Wong, 426 U.S. 88, 96 S.Ct. 1895, 48 L.Ed.2d 495 (1976) (Civil Service Commission lacked authority to disqualify all noncitizens from federal employment).

58. For some thoughtful discussion, see Linda S. Bosniak, Membership, Equality, and the Difference that Alienage Makes, 69 NYU L. Rev. 1047 (1994); Pratheepan Gulasekaram, Aliens with Guns: Equal Protection, Federal Power, and the Second Amendment, 92 Iowa L. Rev. 891 (2007) (arguing for tradi-

State laws are another story. Given the wide sweep of the INA, some state laws have been struck down on the ground that federal law preempts them.⁵⁹ More common, however, have been challenges based on equal protection. Generally, state action that discriminates against LPRs has been held “suspect,” a characterization that for equal protection purposes triggers strict scrutiny and as a practical matter almost certain invalidation. A number of Supreme Court decisions have struck down state attempts to disqualify noncitizens from government employment, professional licenses, or public assistance.⁶⁰

There is, also, however, an important exception to the otherwise near prohibition of state discrimination against noncitizens. It is an exception that goes to the heart of modern conceptions of citizenship. The Supreme Court has held that states may favor United States citizens—even over LPRs—when the benefit in question sufficiently implicates the “political function” of the state. The paradigm example is the franchise. Although they did not always do so, all fifty states now limit the vote to United States citizens.⁶¹ Also, as then Justice Rehnquist pointed out, several tional equal protection analysis, including strict scrutiny, of both federal and state non-immigration regulation of noncitizens, but asserting that even strict scrutiny contemplates due regard for the government’s interests in gatekeeping and national security); Victor C. Romero, The Congruence Principle Applied: Rethinking Equal Protection Review of Federal Alienage Classifications after Adarand Constructors, Inc. v. Peña, 76 Oregon L. Rev. 425 (1997) (urging courts to apply to federal citizenship classifications the same strict scrutiny that analogous state regulation would receive); Michael Scaperlanda, Partial Membership: Aliens and the Constitutional Community, 81 Iowa L. Rev. 707 (1996); Margaret H. Taylor, Detained Aliens Challenging Conditions of Confinement and the Porous Border of the Plenary Power Doctrine, 22 Hastings Constitutional L.Q. 1087 (1995). See also Raquel Aldana, On Rights, Federal Citizenship, and the “Alien,” 46 Washburn L.J. 263 (2007) (cautioning that expanded notions of “citizenship” rights can simultaneously enlarge the federal power to restrict the rights of noncitizens even outside the immigration realm); Muneer I. Ahmad, Guantánamo is Here: The Military Commissions Act and Noncitizen Vulnerability, 2007 Univ. of Chicago Legal Forum 1, 14–25 (arguing that Military Commissions Act singles out noncitizens for loss of important rights in ways that could carry over to territorial United States).

^{59.} E.g., Toll v. Moreno, 458 U.S. 1, 102 S.Ct. 2977, 73 L.Ed.2d 563 (1982); Plyler v.

Doe, 457 U.S. 202, 102 S.Ct. 2382, 72 L.Ed.2d 786 (1982); but see De Canas v. Bica, 424 U.S. 351, 96 S.Ct. 933, 47 L.Ed.2d 43 (1976) (approving state penalties on employers of undocumented workers).

^{60.} See, e.g., Bernal v. Fainter, 467 U.S. 216, 104 S.Ct. 2312, 81 L.Ed.2d 175 (1984) (notary public); Nyquist v. Mauclet, 432 U.S. 1, 97 S.Ct. 2120, 53 L.Ed.2d 63 (1977) (educational assistance funds); Examining Board of Engineers, Architects and Surveyors v. Flores de Otero, 426 U.S. 572, 96 S.Ct. 2264, 49 L.Ed.2d 65 (1976) (engineers); In re Griffiths, 413 U.S. 717, 93 S.Ct. 2851, 37 L.Ed.2d 910 (1973) (lawyers); Sugarman v. Dougall, 413 U.S. 634, 93 S.Ct. 2842, 37 L.Ed.2d 853 (1973) (state civil service employment); Graham v. Richardson, 403 U.S. 365, 91 S.Ct. 1848, 29 L.Ed.2d 534 (1971) (welfare benefits).

^{61.} David Weissbrodt & Laura Danielson, Immigration Law and Procedure in a Nutshell 520 (5th ed. 2005). The constitutionality of that limitation has been upheld. See Skaftø v. Rorex, 191 Col. 399, 553 P.2d 830 (1976), appeal dismissed, 430 U.S. 961, 97 S.Ct. 1638, 52 L.Ed.2d 352 (1977). But see Gerald M. Rosberg, Aliens and Equal Protection: Why Not the Right to Vote?, 75 Michigan L. Rev. 1092 (1977) (arguing for allowing LPRs to vote); see also Nora V. Demleitner, The Fallacy of Social “Citizenship,” or the Threat of Exclusion, 12 Georgetown Immigration L.J. 35, 56–64 (1997) (advocating at constitutional provisions expressly require citizenship for designated political office.⁶²

The political function exception has broadened to permit state-decreed citizenship restrictions that are not so clearly tied to political self-definition. Thus, the Supreme Court has upheld state laws that require citizenship for state troopers, Foley v. Connelie, 435 U.S. 291, 98 S.Ct. 1067, 55 L.Ed.2d 287 (1978), for public school teachers, Ambach v. Norwick, 441 U.S. 68, 99 S.Ct. 1589, 60 L.Ed.2d 49 (1979), and for probation officers, Cabell v. Chavez-Salido, 454 U.S. 432, 102 S.Ct. 735, 70 L.Ed.2d 677 (1982). In those cases the Court emphasized the power of the state to confine important sovereign functions to those who make up the political community. The Court rejected arguments that had stressed the absence of significant policymaking responsibilities in the restricted positions.

CITIZENSHIP AND WELFARE REFORM

The eligibility of immigrants for welfare has been a contentious issue. As you saw in chapter 12, undocumented migrants—with some narrow exceptions—have long been disqualified from almost all federal and state welfare programs. Until 1996, however, LPRs were generally eligible for the major welfare programs, though not always on exactly the same terms as United States citizens.

The Personal Responsibility and Work Opportunity Reconciliation Act of 1996, Pub.L. 104-193, 110 Stat. 2105 (Aug. 22, 1996) [hereafter the Welfare Act], changed all that. In this sweeping legislation, Congress made fundamental changes to the law governing public assistance—slashing it generally, eliminating longstanding safety nets, and shifting much of the responsibility for supporting the needy to the states.

Title IV of the Act deals specifically with noncitizens. It classifies all noncitizens as “qualified” or “unqualified.” The “qualified” category includes LPRs, noncitizens who have been admitted under the overseas refugee program or granted asylum or withholding of removal, and certain parolees. Welfare Act, § 431(b).

You saw in chapter 12 that anyone classified as “unqualified” (mainly undocumented migrants and nonimmigrants) is ineligible for almost all public assistance. Benefits for the “qualified” are more favorable, but they too are now quite limited.

“Qualified” noncitizens are ineligible for what are now the two major federal welfare programs—Supplemental Security Income (SSI) and food stamps. The main exceptions are (a) during the first five years after one is least local voting rights for LPRs); contra, Christopher Goddard, Valuing Citizenship: The Case for Retaining a Citizenship-Based Electorate (unpublished student seminar paper, 2005).

62. See Sugarman v. Dougall, 413 U.S. 634, 651-52, 93 S.Ct. 2842, 2862, 37 L.Ed.2d admitted as a refugee or granted asylum or withholding of removal; (b) LPRs who have worked for 40 Social Security Act-qualifying quarter-years without having received any federal means-tested public benefits; and (c) people on active duty in the United States Armed Forces, honorably discharged veterans, and certain of their dependents. Welfare Act, § 402(a)(1, 2). In 1997 and 1998, Congress restored SSI and Food Stamps to certain immigrants who were already living in the United States on August 22, 1996 (the date the Welfare Act was enacted).⁶³ The Farm Security and Rural Investment Act of 2002, Pub. L. 107-171, 116 Stat. 134 (May 13, 2002), § 4401, made certain other “qualified” noncitizens eligible for the Food Stamp program if they have resided in the United States for at least five years since becoming “qualified” or they are children or disabled.

853, 865-66 (1973) (Rehnquist, J., dissenting), citing, among other provisions, U.S. Const. art. I, § 2, cl. 2 (U.S. Representatives); id. § 3, cl. 3 (Senators); id. art. II, § 1, cl. 5 (President must be “natural born citizen”).

The eligibility of “qualified” noncitizens for state benefits, including temporary assistance for needy families (the successor to Aid to Families with Dependent Children) and Medicaid, is now a matter for the individual states to decide, subject to some federal statutory constraints. Welfare Act, §§ 402(b), 412. In 2009, Congress authorized states to permit certain lawfully resident children and pregnant women to qualify for medical assistance. Children’s Health Insurance Program (CHIP) Reauthorization Act of 2009, Pub. L. No. 111-3, 123 Stat. 8, § 214 (Feb. 4, 2009), amending 42 USC § 1396b(v)(4)(A).

Even for a person who fits the “qualified” category, welfare is a dicey proposition. As you saw in chapter 5, section D, most intending immigrants are now required to submit affidavits of support from the petitioners who sponsor them, and those petitioners must demonstrate the financial ability to keep their promises. As you also saw, the assets and the income of the sponsor are “deemed” available to the immigrant, for purposes of determining the immigrant’s financial eligibility for the particular welfare program. As a result, the immigrant’s assets or incomes are likely to be treated as being too great to qualify for welfare. Moreover, an immigrant who does manage to obtain welfare benefits within five years after entry will become deportable unless he or she can affirmatively prove that the circumstances necessitating the welfare arose after entry.

There are, of course, two sides to this debate. The most succinct statement of the arguments in favor of the new restrictions is the one Congress itself provided, in the preamble to Title IV of the Welfare Act:

The Congress makes the following statements concerning national policy with respect to welfare and immigration:

(1) Self-sufficiency has been a basic principle of United States immigration law since this country’s earliest immigration statutes.

(2) It continues to be the immigration policy of the United States that

63. See Balance Budget Act of 1997, Pub. L. 105-33, 111 Stat. 251, §§ 5301-08 (Aug. 5, 1997); Agricultural Research Act of 1998, Pub. L. 105-185, 112 Stat. 523, §§ 503-10 (June 23, 1998).

(A) aliens within the nation's borders not depend on public resources to meet their needs, but rather rely on their own capabilities and the resources of their families, their sponsors, and private organizations, and

(B) the availability of public benefits not constitute an incentive for immigration to the United States.

(3) Despite the principle of self-sufficiency, aliens have been applying for and receiving public benefits from Federal, State, and local governments at increasing rates.

(4) Current eligibility rules for public assistance and unenforceable financial support agreements have proved wholly incapable of assuring that individual aliens not burden the public benefits system.

(5) It is a compelling government interest to enact new rules for eligibility and sponsorship agreements in order to assure that aliens be self-reliant in accordance with national immigration policy.

(6) It is a compelling government interest to remove the incentive for illegal immigration provided by the availability of public benefits.

* * *

The other side of the argument generally focuses on the hardship that the restrictions will cause, the unfairness of denying benefits to people whose tax contributions help fund the programs, and doubts about the need for restrictions. Since the passage of the Welfare Act, there has been particular concern for the survival of elderly immigrants who lack adequate income for food, shelter, and clothing. One syndicated columnist, writing after President Clinton announced he would sign the bill, did not mince words:

They should have included, in this charade called welfare reform, instructions on how you actually get these useless elderly people out of their dwellings—these blind people, and the men and women addled by Alzheimer's, and the ones disabled by strokes or cancer or heart disease. I'm talking about the elderly disabled immigrants who, by the grace of our President and a rabid Congress, are soon to be suddenly destitute. Paying rent will be out of the question, so they will have to be evicted. Do you get stretchers and carry them out of their homes and leave them at the curb, or do you wheel them out, or do you just drag them out?

* * *

Meyer Shumyatsky is 96 years old and lives alone in a small apartment in Menorah Park, a complex for senior citizens and disabled people in San Francisco. Mr. Shumyatsky came to the U.S. from the Soviet Union in 1978. He was a store manager for several years. His wife died 10 years ago. Mr. Shumyatsky is legally blind, has severe hearing loss and a slight mobility problem. He spends most days sitting and talking with neighbors in a courtyard and listening to the radio. His monthly S.S.I. check is his sole income.

* * * Mr. Shumyatsky is in the U.S. legally but is not a citizen. Thus, his S.S.I. checks will cease when the welfare bill becomes law. He will have no money at all. Perhaps he will set up light housekeeping in a park. Maybe he'll curl up on a grate. Maybe he'll do the politicians a favor and just die.

* * *

The catastrophes will come by the hundreds of thousands, from all over the country, and they will come soon. Nursing homes are working on plans to toss out immigrants when the Federal money ends. Even food stamps will be cut off for nearly a million legal immigrants.

Bob Herbert, In America; Throw Them Out, New York Times, Aug. 2, 1996, at A27.

Sadly, those prophecies of doom often proved accurate. After receiving letters informing them that their SSI benefits would soon end, many people committed suicide:

In the fertile farmland of central California, Ignacio Muñoz told friends he would rather die than volunteer names of employers who had hired him when he was young and illegal. On March 17, the 75-year-old Mexican field hand descended a lonely gulch where he shot himself in the head.

In a small Wisconsin town, Chue Tou Vang considered the notice just another betrayal by the nation he fought for in Southeast Asia. On April 3, the 83-year-old Hmong refugee from Laos walked out to his barn and hanged himself.

And in a panorama of grief stretching coast to coast, at least seven elderly immigrants are known to have killed themselves in panic or depression over lost welfare benefits. Many more have attempted suicide, and social workers around the country say they are overwhelmed trying to cope with despondent immigrants contemplating suicide.

* * *

In March, a 75-year-old man in Stockton shot himself in the head and died three weeks after his notification that he might lose his SSI. Yang said his family has heard stories about a man in Yuba City who killed himself because he failed the citizenship test. And stories about another man in Oroville who drank cleaning fluid and an elderly woman elsewhere in Northern California who starved herself to death.⁶⁴

Humanitarian considerations aside, many have questioned the necessity for the 1996 reforms. With just two significant exceptions, LPRs before 1996 received welfare at about the same rate that United States citizens did. The exceptions were refugees (particularly in their first few years) and the elderly, both of whom used welfare more frequently than United States citizens did. See Michael Fix & Wendy Zimmermann, Patterns of Welfare Use Among Immigrants, 23 Migration World, No. 5, at 15-17 (1995). Among the elderly, the higher than average welfare use is almost entirely attributable to SSI, a means-tested federal cash assistance program for the elderly, the blind, and the disabled. (Since many LPRs have not been in the United States long enough to qualify for social security old age payments, elderly immigrants made heavier than usual use of SSI.) Id.; see also 73 IR at 1145-46 (Aug. 26, 1996). Still, there are some indications that, relative to citizens, immigrants generally are slightly heavier welfare users today than they were in former times. See George J. Borjas, Heaven's Door—Immigration Policy and the American Economy, ch. 6 (1999).

The Commission on Immigration Reform opposed the exclusion of lawful LPRs from welfare benefits. United States Commission on Immigration Reform, Becoming an American: Immigration and Immigrant Policy 73-75 (Sept. 1997). The scholarly commentary has generally expressed the same opinion.⁶⁵

QUESTIONS

1. If you had been a member of Congress in 1996, would you have voted for or against the restrictions that the Welfare Act imposed on LPRs?
2. Can Congress constitutionally authorize the states to discriminate against LPRs? Can Congress help its case by declaring in advance that any

64. Nancy Weaver Teichert, Son's Love Leads Dad to Citizenship, Sacramento Bee, May 14, 1997, at B1, reproduced in Bill Ong Hing, The Emma Lazarus Effect: A Case Study in Philanthropic Revitalization of the Immigrant Rights Community, 15 Georgetown Immigration L.J. 47, 50 (2001); see also Audrey Singer (ed.), Immigrants, Their Families, and Their Communities in the Aftermath of Welfare Reform, Research Perspectives in Migration (Carnegie Endowment for International Peace 2001).

65. See, e.g., the UCLA Law Review symposium issue on immigrants and public benefits, which contains articles by Professors Abriel, Boswell, Johnson, Legomsky, Neuman, and Reich. 42 UCLA L. Rev. #6 (1995). (Citations to the individual articles appear on page 1287 n.87 above.) See also Nora V. Demleitner, Power, Perceptions, and the Politics of Immigration and Welfare, 14 Industrial Development & Social Fabric 9 (1998) (exploring link between immigrants' political power and their rights in welfare state); Berta Esperanza Hernandez-Truyol & Kimberly A. Johns, Global Rights, Local Wrongs, and Legal Fixes: An International Human Rights Critique of Immigration and Welfare "Reform," 71 Southern California L. Rev. 547 (1998) (raising human rights objections to 1996 restrictions on public assistance for noncitizens). For a statement of the arguments for and against extending public assistance to immigrants, see Stephen H. Legomsky, Immigration, Federalism, and the Welfare State, 42 UCLA L. Rev. 1453, 1462-70 (1995).

actions the states take within the area of the delegated discretion will be considered necessary to a compelling governmental interest? In the Welfare Act, Congress did exactly that. Section 400(7) says:

With respect to the State authority to make determinations concerning the eligibility of qualified aliens for public benefits in this title, a State that chooses to follow the Federal classification in determining the eligibility of such aliens for public assistance shall be considered to have chosen the least restrictive means available for achieving the compelling governmental interest of assuring that aliens be self-reliant in accordance with national immigration policy.

Based on the case law that you have just read about, do you think the Supreme Court would uphold state legislation that restricts welfare benefits for LPRs in ways that track the language of the Welfare Act? Would the Supreme Court regard the case as more like Graham v. Richardson or more like Mathews v. Diaz (both cited on page 1352 above)?

As for the constitutionality of section 400(7) itself (and any other federal laws that authorize states to disqualify noncitizens from state benefits), commentators differ.⁶⁶

These and other comparisons between the respective rights of citizens and noncitizens have produced discussion of (a) whether under existing law citizenship in fact has important consequences and (b) whether citizenship should be important. Few deny that significant differences do, and should, separate citizens from undocumented immigrants or even from lawful nonimmigrants. The most serious issues have involved the differences between citizens and LPRs. Here are the views of two respected scholars:

Peter H. Schuck, Membership in the Liberal Polity: The Devaluation of American Citizenship, in William R. Brubaker (Ed.), Immigration and the Politics of Citizenship in Europe and North America

Pp. 51, 60–65 (1989).

[reprinted in 3 Georgetown Immigration L.J. 1 (1989)].

[The author first argues that United States citizenship has been relatively easy for LPRs to acquire and hard to lose; that the legal and

66. Doubting the constitutionality of such federal efforts are Gilbert Paul Carrasco, Congressional Arrogation of Power: Alien Constellation in the Galaxy of Equal Protection, 74 Boston Univ. L. Rev. 591 (1994); Michael J. Wishnie, Laboratories of Bigotry? Devolution of the Immigration Power, Equal Protection, and Federalism, 76 NYU L. Rev.

493 (2001). Howard Chang, however, finds it hard to square that conclusion with the policy rationales of Diaz and Graham. See Howard F. Chang, Public Benefits and Federal Authorization for Alienage Discrimination by the States, 58 NYU Ann. Survey Amer. L. 357 (2002).

economic advantages of citizenship over LPR status are few; and that a large number of those who are eligible for naturalization either never apply for it or apply long after becoming eligible.]

* * *

But the devaluation of citizenship only serves to raise a further question: so what? Should we be concerned that American citizenship has manifestly little appeal for many aliens, or should we instead view this development with indifference or even satisfaction?

There are at least four dangers lurking in a devalued citizenship. The first is political: a concern for the quality of both the governmental process and the policy outcomes that it generates. Sound governance demands that those who are affected by the business of government participate in its decisions. The consent that invigorates liberal democracy must be as broad as the society that is coerced and governed in its name. But if millions of adult individuals subject to the exercise of governmental power are noncitizens who are legally disabled from voting, politicians have little incentive to learn about and respond to their claims. Under those conditions, the gap between power and accountability widens and the potential for exploiting noncitizens grows. When vitally affected interests remain voteless and (to that extent) voiceless, policy decisions are seriously deformed.

A second danger of a devalued citizenship is cultural in nature. An effective society—one that can accomplish its common goals, facilitate the private ends of its members, and nourish its system of values—requires that newcomers achieve at least a modest degree of assimilation into its culture. At a minimum, this must involve attaining competence in the common language in which that culture expresses and changes itself, but it also demands some comprehension of the nation's institutions and traditions. If newcomers do not value citizenship, if they fail to acquire the mastery of language and social knowledge that citizenship requires, they jeopardize their own well-being and (if they are sufficiently numerous) that of their adopted society. They create practical obstacles to the success of their own projects, while encouraging others to view them as strangers rather than as collaborators, as outsiders rather than as integrated members of the community.

The third danger created by the devaluation of citizenship is spiritual in nature. Democracy is more than a mechanism for governmental decisions, more than a technology for getting the public's work done well. It is also a normative order, an ethos that legitimates certain process values and nourishes particular ways of thinking about the means and ends of politics. Its success depends upon the discipline of self-restraint; a willingness to sacrifice advantages and share burdens; a concern for the public interest; the capacity to inspire and accept leadership; a reverence for law; and pride in one's political community.

A polity that devalues citizenship may discourage the development and diffusion of these civic virtues. Although citizenship cannot guarantee any of these virtues, it seems to be a necessary or at least instrumental condition for most of them. If noncitizens can claim the same benefits that citizens enjoy without having to bear the obligations of full membership, they may acquire an "entitlement mentality" that can erode those virtues. Most noncitizens are manifestly law-abiding and socially productive; they are presumably no less altruistic than other people. But by withholding their participation in and commitment to our civic life, they decline to be public-spirited in the fullest sense. To that extent, they may impoverish the democratic spirit of their communities.

A final danger concerns the emotional consequences of devalued citizenship. Fred Schauer has noted that citizenship serves as an especially important bond among individuals in a polyglot society like ours in which there are relatively few other effective linkages or commonalities. The ethnic, wealth, gender, religious, and lingual differences that divide us, Schauer points out, are inherently difficult for individuals to control or change. Citizenship, in contrast, is a status that can enable us to transcend these more enduring differences and achieve some common ground. If citizenship is to perform this special office, it must be accessible to all. But if it becomes too readily accessible, it may lose much of its capacity to bind us together in a meaningful, emotionally satisfying community.

Schauer's observation is really a point about how national communities are constituted and kept cohesive. Michael Walzer has hinted at an underlying emotional dynamic of such communities in his assertion that "Neighborhoods can be open only if countries are at least potentially closed." This suggestion, if true, has an important implication for citizenship. If we need the warmth and immediacy of parochial attachments to feel truly human, if there are spatial limits to our capacity for communal spirit, then citizenship may be a way to crystallize those attachments and define their outer boundaries. A liberal society committed to the equality and due process principles seeks to rationalize and bureaucratize relationships among individuals and with the state by appealing to universal, abstract standards. At the same time, its members commonly feel a heightened need for some refuge from that universalizing impulse, some enclave in which they can define themselves and their allegiances more locally and emotionally.

National citizenship is certainly not the only haven from universality, and it has never been the most satisfying one; for most people, that succor is more fully provided by family, friendships, neighborhoods, ethnicity, religion, and other less cosmopolitan attachments. But if, as Bickel showed, citizenship has not been particularly important in American law, it has surely affected how Americans feel about and define themselves and others. As citizenship's value and significance decline, therefore, we should expect that people's more parochial loyalties may loom correspondingly larger and may be asserted with greater intensity. Such a shift may yield neighborly pride, ethnic solidarity, and other emotional satisfactions. But it may also encourage a retreat from civic commitment toward some darker feelings that are never wholly absent from American life: xenophobia, petty localism, intolerance, and privatistic self-absorption.

The existence of these dangers reinforces a point that is often obscured by the liberal, minimalist conception of citizenship celebrated by Bickel and dominant in American law: society's interest in the value of citizenship transcends the valuation that the individuals in that society place upon it. Even if aliens' decisions to forego naturalization were truly voluntary and fully informed—indeed, even if those choices did not expose them to political exploitation or injustice at the hands of citizens—society might be justified in concluding that in the aggregate those choices debase, perhaps even imperil, the quality of its political life. Put another way, the level of political, and hence social, assimilation that aliens find perfectly congenial may seem inadequate from society's point of view.

But there is another side to this ledger. As we have seen, the devaluation of citizenship has been accomplished in part through the medium of the equality and due process principles, which have significantly reduced the differences between the rights of citizens and resident aliens. If this devaluation represents a loss to the distinctiveness of the citizenship status and involves some dangers, it also represents an immense gain for the liberal values of inclusiveness and equal treatment. These values, no less than the civic virtues described earlier, enhance the quality of political life.

* * *

It must also be conceded that the dangers of which I have written are for the most part still theoretical rather than imminent. Only the cultural danger—the risk posed by the failure of many Hispanics to master English and thus to gain the access to the society that only competency in the common language affords—arguably threatens the stability and well-being of American society. The others remain speculative and their potential magnitudes are difficult to assess. Moreover, while a devalued citizenship may plausibly be linked to these dangers, the actual strength of these relationships is not at all clear. The incentive structure that the equality and due process principles have altered is surely relevant to aliens' decisions about whether or not to naturalize (or migrate in the hope of conferring birthright citizenship on their children). But it would be foolish to think that decisions of that kind turn entirely upon these sorts of incentives or even that those decisions are wholly rational ones.

The question, then, of whether and to what extent the devaluation of citizenship constitutes a serious problem has no simple answer. But although there are substantial arguments on both sides, these arguments are not in equipoise. In fact, there are reasons to believe that the devaluation of citizenship is not—on balance—a cause for great concern. As we have just seen, most of the dangers seem remote. And even if these dangers were more proximate than they appear to be, it is not obvious either that altering our citizenship policy would forestall them or that we would know which particular alterations would be effective.

In addition, the devaluation of citizenship is probably irreversible, and necessity here should be seen as a virtue. The constitutional jurisprudence through which the equality and due process principles have helped to devalue citizenship cannot properly be viewed as either a doctrinal sport or a temporary ideological compromise. Rather, that jurisprudence reflects some fundamental dynamics in domestic law and international relations—the growing integration of the United States into the world economy, the emergence of group rights, the invigoration of judicial review—that are reshaping immigration law. These structural changes appear to have widespread support and are likely to be permanent.

Finally, and perhaps most fundamentally, the conception of membership that drives political institutions has steadily grown more fluid, functional, and context-dependent and seems likely to become even more so in the future. Before the rise of the modern nation-state, political membership was usually based upon kinship and ethnic ties. Today, at least in a liberal polity like the United States, membership is a far more complex, variegated, multipurpose idea. For certain purposes, such as voting, citizenship is the crucial status, but for others, such as the attribution of most constitutional rights, mere territorial presence suffices. For still other purposes, such as participation in an economic common market, membership is constituted by supranational groupings such as the recently established United States–Canada free trade zone or the still-evolving European Community.

We live in an increasingly integrated world. Transnational economic relationships are ubiquitous, international travel has become inexpensive, migratory pressures are already enormous and are steadily increasing, environmental problems are global, scientific and cultural exchange are highly valued, and political cooperation among nations is more essential than ever before. Even within our borders, citizenship represents an increasingly hollow ideal. It neither confers a distinctively advantageous status nor demands much of the individuals who possess it.

It would be premature, nonetheless, to conclude that national citizenship today is anachronistic. I have suggested that it provides a focus of political allegiance and emotional energy on a scale capable of satisfying deep human longings for solidarity, symbolic identification, and community. Such a focus may be especially important in a liberal ethos whose centrifugal, cosmopolitan aspirations for global principles and universal human rights must somehow be balanced against the more parochial imperatives of organizing societies dominated by more limited commitments to family, locality, region, and nation.

If the political and emotional aspects of citizenship remain significant, we nevertheless seem resolved as a society that little else of consequence should be allowed to turn upon it. But within that general understanding and social consensus, the precise role that citizenship should play and the special rights and obligations that ought to attach to it are emphatically open, contingent questions. As to these questions, only one proposition seems certain: today's conception of citizenship may not be adequate to meet tomorrow's needs.

In the piece you just read, Professor Schuck outlined the respects in which citizenship had been devalued but cautioned that “[i]t would be premature, nonetheless, to conclude that national citizenship today is anachronistic.” That careful qualification proved prescient. Seven years later Congress enacted the sweeping welfare reforms that you read about earlier. Those reforms and other intervening events prompted Schuck to revise his description; citizenship had made a comeback. In his words, “In a radically altered political environment, the question of citizenship is now both salient and divisive.” Peter H. Schuck, The Re-Evaluation of American Citizenship, 12 Georgetown Immigration L.J. 1, 10 (1997). In the following excerpts, Schuck offers theories as to why citizenship has re-emerged as a hot button issue:

* * * This re-evaluation has been prompted by deep concerns about the unity and coherence of the civic culture in the United States, concerns that flow from five developments in the post-1965 era. * * *

Multicultural Pressures

With the enactment of the 1965 immigration law, the composition of the immigration stream to the United States changed radically. Of the top source countries, only the Philippines and India sent large numbers of English-speaking immigrants. Bilingual education thus became a major issue in public education * * *. With the growing politicization of ethnicity and widespread attacks on the traditional assimilative ideal, anxieties about linguistic and cultural fragmentation increased. * * *

Meanwhile, as genuine racial integration proved elusive, the civil rights movement took a turn towards separatism. Blacks, already severely disadvantaged, were increasingly obliged to cede political and economic influence to more recently arrived Hispanic and Asian voters. * * * Certain economic sectors came to depend almost entirely upon immigrant workers, legal and illegal. Relatively parochial immigrant enclaves grew larger. These multicultural pressures caused many Americans to feel more and more like strangers in their own country.

Loss of Unifying Ideology

The end of the Cold War deprived the United States of an ideology, anti-communism, that had served for many decades as a unifying, coherent force in American political culture and as an obsessive preoccupation and goal in U.S. foreign policy. No alternative ideology has yet emerged to replace it. Only constitutionalism, our civic religion, seems potentially capable of performing the function of binding together a nation of diverse peoples.

Technological Change

Rapid changes in transportation and communication technologies have transformed a world of sovereign nations into a global web of multinational enterprises and interdependent societies.

Migration has become less expensive. Immigrants no longer need to make an irrevocable commitment to their new society; they can more easily retain emotional and other ties to their countries and cultures of origin. On the other hand, there is growing concern that television tends to assimilate second-generation immigrant youths into an underclass culture rather than into the mainstream American culture.

Welfare State Expansion

* * * With [the rapid growth of the welfare state], the behavior, values, and economic progress of immigrants became matters of great fiscal significance and public policy concern. In contrast to the historical pattern, immigration no longer ebbed and flowed with the business cycle—presumably because of the growth of the social safety-net. Immigration increasingly pitted citizens and aliens against one another as they competed for scarce public resources. The perennial debate over how the polity should conceive of community, affinity, and mutual obligation took on a new significance as the stakes in the outcome grew larger. Demands that Americans' obsession with legal rights be balanced by an equal concern for their social and civic responsibilities were increasingly heard in the land.

In August 1996, this long-simmering debate culminated in the radical restructuring of [the major public assistance programs].

* * *

Devaluation of Citizenship

The egalitarian thrust of the welfare state, its nourishing of entitlement as an ideal, and the repeal of the military draft led to a progressive erosion of citizenship as a distinctive status bearing special privileges and demanding special commitments and obligations. The rights of LPRs converged with those of citizens until there was little to separate them but the franchise, citizens' greater immigration sponsorship privileges, and their eligibility for the federal civil service. Americans began to feel that U.S. citizenship had lost much of its value and that it should somehow count for more.

These concerns, which have parallels in other countries, have prompted calls for a revitalization of citizenship. * * *

* * *

Id. at 17–19.

T. Alexander Aleinikoff, Citizens, Aliens, Membership and the Constitution

7 Constitutional Commentary 9, 23–24, 27–32 (1990).

* * *

[In chapter 2 you read about the exceptional deference the courts have accorded Congress when federal immigration statutes are attacked on constitutional grounds. In this article the author maintains that much of this deference can be ascribed to a tendency to think of citizens—and only citizens—as “members” of the national community. Although the author later argues that immigration laws should not be thought of solely in membership terms, he also believes that, if the standard of constitutional review is to rest on membership, LPRs should be considered members too. In making that latter argument, he first demonstrates that the constitutional text does not require the equation of citizenship with membership. He then continues:]

Citizenship-as-membership is also simply out of touch with the current reality of the immigration process. If citizenship constitutes full membership, then the theory should predict a naturalization process that carefully screens candidates acceding to the inner circle. (Consider how much more seriously many faculties and law firms take tenure and partnership decisions in comparison to initial hiring.) In actual practice, however, the immigration system makes its most careful membership decision at the time of entry, not at naturalization. Gaining admission to the United States is extraordinarily difficult. Numerical quotas and detailed grounds of exclusion disqualify the vast majority of the world’s population from entering the United States. But for aliens who attain admission and seek citizenship, naturalization is usually a matter of course.

Furthermore, permanently residing aliens live and function much as citizens. They hold jobs, attend churches, send their children to school, and pay taxes. Children they give birth to here are United States citizens. From this perspective, the fact that aliens are not required by law to apply for citizenship is not surprising; in day-to-day terms, permanently residing aliens and citizens are already virtually indistinguishable.

Thus, both immigration practice and the daily lives of resident aliens suggest that true “membership” in the life of the nation begins at the point of admission for permanent residence. And the Court, in its better moments, seems to recognize this.

In Graham v. [Richardson] * * * the Court struck down statutes that excluded permanent resident aliens from state welfare programs. Justice Blackmun’s majority opinion found the state laws doubly bad. By effectively denying aliens “entrance and abode,” the state laws conflicted with federal immigration policy. This holding is at home in membership theory: the states cannot upset the terms of the federal government’s invitation. The second ground of decision, however, ran quite counter to citizenship-as-membership. Justice Blackmun, with virtually no analysis, designated aliens “a discrete and insular minority,” thereby triggering strict scrutiny of laws that discriminate against them. Labelling aliens “discrete and insular” is an effective way, under prevailing equal protection analysis, to invalidate unfriendly laws. But Justice Blackmun’s invocation of the phrase glides too readily past serious analytical difficulties.

The last paragraph of his discussion of the equal protection claim, however, seems to take a different turn, one that seems to recognize admission for permanent residence as establishing membership:

We agree with the three-judge court . . . that the “justification of limiting expenses is particularly inappropriate and unreasonable when the discriminated class consists of aliens. Aliens like citizens pay taxes and may be called into the armed forces. . . . [A]liens may live within a state for many years, work in the state and contribute to the economic growth of the state.” There can be no “special public interest” [justifying exclusion of aliens from state programs] in tax revenues to which aliens have contributed on an equal basis with the residents [sic.] of the State.

Although Blackmun does not appear to recognize the tension this paragraph creates for his opinion, in these lines he actually flips the justification for invalidating discriminatory state laws. The statutes in Graham should be invalidated not because aliens are a defenseless group needing judicial protection, but rather because—at least from the state’s perspective—they are indistinguishable from other residents of the state. State laws excluding aliens from opportunities should be seen as no more legitimate than laws excluding redheads. Both would be invalid, not because such groups are downtrodden but because the state can offer no legitimate reason for singling them out.

* * *

What can be said against this broader theory of membership? The Court’s concern seems to be that if we slide the membership line we will sap citizenship of any significance. The Court has justified exclusion of aliens from state political positions in part on the ground that it is important that we not “obliterate all the distinctions between citizens and aliens, and thus deprecate the historic value of citizenship.” This justification may reflect deeply held intuitions. Consider the following comment taken from a student exam of several years ago: “Ever since reading Plyler v. Doe I have felt that there was something attractive about the argument that states should be able to deny benefits to aliens. . . . [Otherwise], what is the significance of citizenship?”

As an initial matter, there is something distasteful—if not unconstitutional—about inflicting harm solely to make the non-afflicted feel special. More important, the desire to retain legal disabilities in order to preserve citizenship as a meaningful concept shows the bias of the lawyer. Citizenship, particularly for native-born citizens, is an aspect of identity. Identification with one’s homeland is organic, much as one’s identification with one’s ethnicity or religion. Few of us choose our citizenship, yet for most of us it is an important part of how we define ourselves in the world. Extending constitutional membership will not threaten this difference between citizens and aliens. It is unlikely that a person born a U.S. citizen will feel any less an “American” because a Honduran in the United States is entitled to similar benefits and opportunities, nor is the Honduran likely to feel any less Honduran. Indeed, it is not inconceivable that someday we will understand citizenship as we do ethnicity and religion today—that is, as an important aspect of one's identity but not a characteristic that the government may normally take into account in exercising power over the individual.

A second common defense of citizenship-as-membership is that it is important to emphasize and affirm a "national community" of, and for, Americans. Such a community may be valued for its fostering of a common culture and political system. Seeing aliens as outsiders reaffirms (and helps define) what is inside. It also helps prevent a watering down of commonalities that might occur if membership is defined broadly.

These kinds of claims have been pressed by scholars across the political spectrum. To conservatives, the project is one of assimilation: molding immigrants to the true American identity in order to preserve American traditions and institutions. To liberals, a "national community" is a liberating concept because it overcomes the irrational, tyrannical, constricting aspects of "tribal" loyalties. "Citizenship," representing membership in the national community, is the ticket to universalism and equality; it rejects (or downplays) group identifications and allegiances that cut individuals off from the full range of opportunities in society.

In recent years, the idea of a "national community" has appealed to scholars critical of the liberal tradition. Liberalism has seemed inadequate on both descriptive and normative grounds. The "new communitarianism" rejects liberalism's description of human beings as "unencumbered" selves. "Most of us," writes David Martin, "were simply born into our most basic affiliations—family, religion, nation. Those ties are not only objects of choice; to a significant extent they are constitutive of one's basic identity, anterior to choice." By stressing the social and historical bonds that connect members of a society, communitarianism makes a normative claim that institutions should nurture feelings of attachment that transcend personal self-interest. Pursuit of community goals will promote that which makes us most human (association with others) and will help overcome the anomie and alienation symptomatic of modern life.

Recognizing that we cannot return to a lost golden age of small town life, communitarianism—like the conservative and liberal perspectives—sees great promise in the concept of a "national community." It allows us to imagine an association of human beings who feel special obligations to one another. Once communitarianism reaches the national level, it readily turns to citizenship to demarcate the community. It seems to assume that, in a world of nation-states, citizenship is the appropriate category for the fostering of "ties that bind."

Despite the powerful attractions of the communitarian vision (a vision I share), the new communitarians get off track when they begin to talk about "citizenship as membership in a national community." It is too little noted that the phrase "national community" is either an oxymoron or requires a substantial shift in our usual understanding of the term "community." "A community," writes Thomas Bender, "involves a limited number of people in a somewhat restricted social space or network held together by shared understandings and a sense of obligation. Relationships are close, often intimate, and usually face to face." This conception of "community" poorly describes the United States whose spaciousness and diversity are matters of national pride. It is just wishful thinking to suggest that most Americans feel the kinds of obligations to other Americans that we usually associate with "community." * * *

A communitarian might respond as follows. No one is suggesting that we can replicate at the national level intimate feelings of community. What is wrong, however, with suggesting that members of a state ought to be urged to put the interests of their fellow citizens and the nation ahead of the pursuit of their personal private interests? Did John Kennedy's "ask not . . ." set too high a goal for a civilized polity?

Certainly these are noble goals. But it is never explained why citizenship is the appropriate category for the development of a communitarian ethos. Why wouldn't we seek the formation of a sense of reciprocal obligations among all persons living and working within the territory of the United States? We know, as an empirical matter, that strong bonds between citizens and resident aliens exist. These ties, based on familial relationship, ethnicity, religion, race, or location may be far more powerful than those that can be fostered among citizens who share nothing but American nationality.

* * * More importantly, it is quite doubtful that "citizenship" is a useful category for sorting those who do and do not share an "American Creed." What makes America attractive to immigrants are precisely those values that Americans celebrate: liberty, equality, opportunity, government under law. Indeed, those who have chosen to join us—and to give up a less happy existence elsewhere—may well feel more committed to these values than those of us who happen to have been born here.

Finally, the concept of a national community, by defining who belongs, also defines who does not belong and what one must be in order to belong. In a nation as diverse as the United States, the risk is great that a "national community" will not be all-inviting or all-embracing. Rather, it will reflect the norms and culture of dominant groups. Placing emphasis on membership, in such a world, becomes a basis for excluding outsiders and compelling conformity from insiders. * * *

* * *

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. Although intervening events prompted Professor Schuck to revise both his descriptive account of the role citizenship actually plays and his normative conclusions, his analyses of the dangers and benefits of devaluing citizenship retain their value. He categorizes the dangers of devaluation as political, cultural, spiritual, and emotional. How do you suppose he would respond to each of the following objections?

a. Political danger. If those “who are affected by the business of government” are willing to sacrifice their participation in the political process as the price for retaining their original citizenship, then what’s the problem?

b. Cultural danger.

i. It is true that in the United States naturalization requires some minimum mastery of the English language and understanding of American institutions and traditions. See INA § 312. But the converse is not true; one need not naturalize in order to attain such knowledge.

ii. It is easy to see how newcomers who do not acquire English language skill and a knowledge of American traditions and institutions disadvantage themselves, but how, exactly, do they “jeopardize * * * [the] well-being * * * of their adopted society?”

c. Spiritual danger.

i. Your argument states that “[i]f noncitizens can claim the same benefits that citizens enjoy without having to bear the obligations of full membership, they may require an ‘entitlement mentality’ that can erode [various] virtues” (emphasis added). But United States law imposes no significant obligations on citizens that are not also imposed on LPRs (the only noncitizens generally eligible for naturalization). For both reasons, refusing citizenship should not be seen as a way to avoid citizens’ obligations without giving up any rights.

ii. Citizenship is not an accurate proxy for gauging a person’s willingness to share communal burdens. Such willingness is far more likely to depend on one’s personal values and on personal relationships to others in the community.

d. Emotional danger.

i. There is no empirical evidence that citizenship, if made more difficult to acquire, would provide a realistic basis for emotionally meaningful ties. As you acknowledge, other personal bonds already serve this function.

ii. Nor is there empirical evidence that citizenship affects one’s definition of self. It seems at least as likely that one’s self-image as an “American” stems from exposure to, and experience living in, American society, rather than from the legal abstraction we call “citizenship.”

2. Professor David Abraham’s thoughtful article argues that both the United States and Germany have in fact devalued their citizenships over the past two generations, in part by expanding the legal rights of LPRs. David Abraham, The Good of Banality? The Emergence of Cost-Benefit Analysis and Proportionality in the Treatment of Aliens in the United States and Germany, 4 Citizenship Studies 237 (2000).

3. Professor Aleinikoff believes that the distinction between citizens and LPRs should be accorded less significance than it now has. In Harrisades v. Shaughnessy, 342 U.S. 580, 72 S.Ct. 512, 96 L.Ed. 586 (1952), however, one argument the Supreme Court gave for weighing that distinction heavily was that, “[s]o long as the alien elects to continue the ambiguity of his allegiance, his domicile here is held by a precarious tenure.” Id. at 587, 72 S.Ct. at 518, 96 L.Ed. at 597. What’s wrong with reading significance into an LPR’s decision not to pursue naturalization (at least after the five-year eligibility period, INA § 316, and the other requirements you have studied have been satisfied)? Isn’t that decision an indicator of the person’s investment in the nation? How do you suppose Aleinikoff would respond?

4. Aleinikoff makes some interesting observations about the opinion of Justice Blackmun in Sugarman v. Dougall. On the one hand, Aleinikoff points out, Justice Blackmun stresses the differences between citizens and LPRs and argues that those differences make LPRs a “discrete and insular minority” and therefore justify strict judicial scrutiny. On the other hand, in condemning the discrimination reflected in the statute, Justice Blackmun stresses the similarities between citizens and LPRs. To Aleinikoff, the two arguments are in “tension.”

Does such a tension really exist? The particular similarities Justice Blackmun identifies relate to legal obligations (tax and draft) and economic contributions to society. Those similarities between citizens and LPRs, Justice Blackmun believes, are among the factors that make discrimination irrational. The differences he identifies concern the history of discrimination against noncitizens and their relative lack of political power. Those latter factors, in Justice Blackmun’s view, should raise at least a suspicion that the legislation reflects unacceptable discriminatory motives. Is there anything contradictory about finding similar obligations and contributions while finding different histories of treatment and different degrees of political power? Is there really any contradiction in concluding both that there is reason to be suspicious of discriminatory state action and that a given statutory distinction is in fact irrational?

5. Chief Justice Earl Warren once wrote that citizenship “is nothing less than the right to have rights.” Perez v. Brownell, 356 U.S. 44, 64, 78 S.Ct. 568, 579, 2 L.Ed.2d 603, 617 (1958). Given what you have read up to this point, was he correct?

6. Aleinikoff makes the specific argument that the concept of membership is broad enough to include LPRs. A larger question is the more general one: How broad should membership be? How are we to tell whether some other class of individuals should be regarded as members? At one point, while discussing the applicability of communitarian theory, Aleinikoff asks why “all persons living and working within the territory of the United States” should not be seen as part of the national community (emphasis added). Why would he add the qualifier “and working?” Is it one’s contributions to the economy that create a claim to membership? What about those nonimmigrants who remain lawfully for several years? Should attachments be relevant? Lifestyle? What, in other words, is Aleinikoff’s underlying premise as to the factors that should determine membership? What formulation would you favor?

7. Aleinikoff attacks the exceptional judicial reluctance to protect the constitutional rights of noncitizens. He ascribes that reluctance to a sometimes unspoken assumption that citizenship equals membership. He argues in the portion you read that, if membership is to be the test, LPRs should be considered members. In a later portion of the article, see 7 Constitutional Commentary at 32–34, he argues alternatively that at any rate membership should not be the test. For both reasons, he asserts, citizenship should not be conclusive of the standard of constitutional review.

All this suggests a more fundamental question: Should the law even recognize such a concept as citizenship at all? The value of citizenship is probably most evident in the international context, although even there its value is not obvious. One who accepts the inevitability of a world order based on sovereign states might argue that, as long as people travel across national boundaries, citizenship will be a prerequisite to receiving a passport or other travel document. The nations of the world could, however, create a United Nations or other intergovernmental agency to issue “world” passports without regard to country of citizenship. So is there some other essential international function that citizenship serves? The most compelling answer might be diplomatic protection. As long as nations violate the human rights of foreign nationals, the latter will need protection from someone. National intervention to protect citizens from foreign governments is one form of protection.

But even if one accepts citizenship or nationality as a useful construct in international law, does citizenship play a necessary, or even a desirable, role in a nation’s domestic law? In the United States, one domestic function of citizenship is to provide a convenient shorthand for describing the classes of people who are singled out in a wide variety of state and federal statutes concerned with voting, jury service, immigration, government employment, government benefits, etc. By laying out who is a citizen, Congress has enabled the drafters of all these other laws to incorporate the relevant criteria by reference, rather than reinvent the wheel each time they wish to define eligibility for important rights.

Is that good? The statutes in question determine who may vote, who is subject to immigration control, who may petition for the immigration of close family members, who may work for the government, who is eligible for welfare, who may serve on juries, who is subject to federal income tax liability, who may be drafted, who may own land, etc. The list is endless. Each of these decisions requires the accommodation of competing interests, and those sets of interests vary from one issue to the next. Do we really need—indeed, is it even beneficial to have—a single requirement common to all those rights and obligations? Why not abolish the citizenship concept entirely and redefine, by reference to ultimate facts rather than to a legal abstraction, the criteria on which each of those very different determinations is to be based?

One defense of citizenship appears in another section of the Aleinikoff article:

* * * In a monarchy, sovereignty * * * is external to the subject and the alien alike. In a sense, every alien and every citizen faces the sovereign on a one-to-one basis. But in a democracy, sovereignty is something shared by citizens and citizens alone. Without a notion of citizenship, sovereignty has no home. * * *

Aleinikoff, 7 Constitutional Commentary at 14.

But that argument merely shifts the battleground. Instead of asking why we need a citizenship concept, we now must ask why, for purposes of domestic law, we need a sovereignty concept. The notion of State sovereignty helps explain international rules that govern the powers of nations over their respective territories, but why must the domestic law take any position about which individuals will be considered part of the “sovereign?” Cities, counties, and sewer districts get along fine without “citizens.” Why do countries need them?

The temptation is to answer this question by observing that in a democracy there must be some law defining the people who will select the nation’s leaders. Those individuals, however, need not be called “citizens;” they could simply be called “voters.” The distinction is not merely semantical. The point is that the criteria for voting eligibility need not be the same as those for determining the myriad other rights that under current domestic law turn on citizenship.

For purposes of domestic law, do you think “citizenship” should be abolished? For a more detailed account of the theory and limitations of citizenship, see Stephen H. Legomsky, Why Citizenship?, 35 Virginia J. Internat’l L. 279 (1994).

8. The question whether citizenship should have important legal consequences has received increased attention in recent years. Some emphasize the communal bonding aspects of citizenship,⁶⁷ while others applaud devalued citizenship.⁶⁸ Rogers Smith suggests that United States citizenship law has historically reflected exclusionary impulses. He believes these impulses have had both positive and negative effects, enhancing cohesion but running counter to the civic myths on which the nation was founded. Rogers M. Smith, Civic Ideals: Conflicting Visions of Citizenship in U.S. History (1997). Reviewing the Smith book, Peter Spiro calls this the “citizenship dilemma.” Since return to the days of exclusion seems unac-

67. Frederick Schauer, Community, Citizenship, and the Search for National Identity, 84 Michigan L. Rev. 1504, 1513–17 (1986); Michael Walzer, The Distribution of Membership, in Peter G. Brown & Henry Shue (eds.), Boundaries—National Autonomy and Its Limits, at 1–35 (1981)

68. E.g., Alexander M. Bickel, The Morality of Consent 53–54 (1975) (“gratifying * * * that we live under a Constitution to which the concept of citizenship matters very little”); see also Arnold H. Leibowitz, A Time for Decision: Citizenship at the Millennium (Office of Refugee Resettlement, Nov. 1998) (arguing citizenship rightly holds only a modest place in U.S. history and culture); Judith Lichtenberg, National Boundaries and Moral Boundaries: A Cosmopolitan View, in Boundaries, note 67 above, at 79–100.

ceptable, he argues, the nation-state seems destined to become a less important source of associative identity.⁶⁹

9. Several analysts have tackled the provocative question of what it is, exactly, that a person is a citizen of. The usual assumption has been that one is, or should be, a citizen of a sovereign state. Professor Linda Bosniak, among others, questions that premise. She argues that one might be a citizen of the world (or a citizen of some sub-national entity, as noted below). See Linda Bosniak, Citizenship Denationalized, 7 Indiana J. Global Legal Studies 447 (2000). The growing significance of the European Community has required examination of whether one might be a citizen of an entity smaller than the world but still larger than the nation state. See, e.g., Randall Hansen & Patrick Weil (eds.), Towards a European Nationality—Citizenship, Immigration and Nationality Law in the EU (2001). And for a captivating discussion of the meaning and significance of citizenship at the sub-national level, see Peter H. Schuck, Citizenship in Federal Systems, 48 American J. Comparative L. 195 (2000). Similarly ranging beyond both the statist model that looks to individual states as the main source of law, and the cosmopolitan model that looks to one's obligations to all of humankind, an emerging literature explores the subject of diaspora and the continuing relationships between emigrants and their countries of origin.⁷⁰ Under any of these models, of course, the question arises: Whose interests should determine the citizenship criteria—only the existing members' interests or also those of the individuals who seek that status? Arguing for the latter is J. Donald Galloway, The Dilemmas of Canadian Citizenship Law, 13 Georgetown Immigration L.J. 201, at 201 (1999).

69. Peter J. Spiro, The Citizenship Dilemma, 51 Stanford L. Rev. 597 (1999); see also Peter J. Spiro, Beyond Citizenship—American Identity after Globalization (2008) (reflecting on the meanings and relationships among citizenship, membership, and community in the United States); Linda S. Bosniak, The Citizen and the Alien—Dilemmas of Contemporary Membership (2006); Hiroshi Motomura, Americans in Waiting: The Lost Story of Immigration and Citizenship in the United States (2006) (urging return to the time when LPRs were viewed and treated as future citizens); Jennifer Gordon & R.A. Lenhardt, Citizenship Talk: Bridging the Gap Between Race and Immigration Perspectives, 75 Fordham L. Rev. 2493 (2007) (urging scholars to synthesize immigration and critical race perspectives when analyzing citizenship issues).

70. See generally the symposium issue of 81 NYU L. Rev., issue 1 (2001), and in particular Anupam Chander, Homeward Bound, 81 NYU L. Rev. 60 (2006); Anupam Chander, Diaspora Bonds, 76 NYU L. Rev. 1005 (2001); Peter J. Spiro, Perfecting Political Diaspora, 81 NYU L. Rev. 207 (2006); Spiro, note 69 above, at 621–25.

INDEX

References are to Pages

ADJUSTMENT OF STATUS

Generally, 508, 626
Cuban Adjustment Act of 1966, 168
Discretion to grant or deny, 511
Inadmissibility at time of adjustment, 813
Judicial review of, 511, 788
Overstayers, 627
Policy considerations, 509
Qualifications for, 509
Quota restrictions, 511
Relief from deportation, 626
Rescissions of adjustments, 512, 813

ADMINISTRATIVE LAW

Appeals. Review, administrative, below
Board of Immigration Appeals, this index
Chevron deference, 521, 580
Citizenship
 Administrative review of loss of citizenship, 1369
 Administrative vs judicial revocation of naturalization, 1338
Discretion Standards, this index
Judicial review of administrative decisions generally, 612
Legislative veto of administrative determinations, 201, 204
Procedure Act (APA)
 Due process standards, 662
 Enactment, 662
 Immigration judge standards, 662
 Policy changes, promulgation requirements, 630
 Visa application procedures, 498
Removal periods, 206
Review, administrative
 See also Board of Immigration Appeals, this index
 Affirmances without opinion (AWO), 657, 745, 754
 Citizenship, loss of, 1369
 Deportation proceedings, 515, 744
 Temporary protected status claims, 1117

ADMISSION

Generally, 463 et seq.
Actual admission, 503
Administrative Procedure Act, applicability to visa application procedures, 498

ADMISSION—Cont'd

Administrative review of visa decisions, proposal for, 491
Adverse decisions of petitions, 474
Appeals from immigration judge decisions, 506
Asylum, this index
Automated entry-exit program, 825
Batching of visa applications, 488
Battered immigrant petitions, 473
Border procedures, 503
Burden of proof of admissibility, 505
Conditional, 518, 548
Criminal offenses, 1153
Deportation after, conditional admission theories, 518
Deportation for entry without inspection, 544
Detention authorities, 503
Discretion accorded consular officers, 485, 487, 499
Document deficiencies, 506
Domestic violence applications, 473
Double-check system, 471
Economic stereotyping by consular officers, 485
Enhanced border enforcement measures, 845
Entry while inadmissible, 545
Entry without admission, 514, 522
Entry without inspection, 505, 648
Expedited removal, 503, 506
Expiration of visas, 484
False citizenship claims, 545
Foreign policy cases, 507
Fraud determinations, 506
Frivolous filings, 479
Group processing of visa applications, 488
High seas interdictions of vessels, 1062, 1080
Historical processes, 463
Immigrant admission rates, 355
Immigrant visas (IV), 481
Immigrant vs nonimmigrant, 470
Immigration Inspectors, this index
Immigration Officers, this index
Inadmissible entries, 545
Judicial review of petition denials and revocations, 476
Judicial review of visa denials, 486, 493
Labor condition applications, 470
LPR returns as entries, 529

- ADMISSION—Cont'd
 Modern procedures, 469
 National Security Entry-Exit Registration System (NSEERS), 825
 National security restrictions
 Generally, 463, 507, 832
 Visa waivers, 481
 Nonimmigrants
 Purpose-based policies, 355
 Rate of admissions, 355
 Visas (NIV), 481
 Petition filing dates and priorities, 474
 Policy considerations, 502
 Port of entry procedures, 503
 Preinspection of asylum claimants, 1062
 Presence without admission deportation procedure, 648
 Primary inspections, 503
 Profiling by consular officers, 485, 500
 Racial stereotyping by consular officers, 485
 Reciprocal visa waivers, 481
 Red tape problems, 475
 Reentry, this index
 Removal procedures
 Generally, 504
 Detention for, 503
 Residents, immigrant visa requirements, 508
 Self petitioners, 472
 Shipwrecked immigrants, 526
 Status adjustments, 508
 Student and Exchange Visitor Information System (SEVIS), 827
 Surreptitious entry, 544
 Technological innovations, 842
 Terrorism and procedural safeguards, 832
 Terrorism cases, 508
 Transit without visa (TRWOV) privileges, 524
 US Visitor and Immigration Status Indication Technology System (US VISIT), 828
 Visa applications, 480
 Visa approvals, 470
 Visa denial records, 486
 Visa petitions, 471
 Visa review board proposals, 491
 Visa waiver admissions, 503, 842
 War on Terror precautions, 503, 816
- ADOPTIONS, FOREIGN
 Generally, 298
 Hague Convention, 301
- AGGRAVATED FELONIES
 Generally, 574
 Administrative removal, 809
 Asylum eligibility, 1023
 Crime-related deportation, 574
 Deportation detentions, 225, 239
- AGRICULTURAL WORKERS
 Bracero Programs, this index
 Exploitation problems, 379
 Nonimmigrant guest workers, 377, 1233
 Policy considerations, 378
 Undocumented Immigrants, this index
- ALIEN ACT OF 1798
 Federal immigration powers, 126
- ALIEN AND SEDITION ACTS
 Deportation grounds, 516
- ALIENS
 Terminology of immigration law, 1, 1140
- AMERICANIZATION PROPOSALS
 Generally, 62
- ANTI-DRUG ABUSE ACT
 Detention standards, 225
- ANTITERRORISM AND EFFECTIVE DEATH PENALTY ACT (AEDPA)
 Detention standards, 651
 Enactment, 21
 Expedited removal, 506
 Habeas corpus limitations, 770, 775
 Judicial review of removal orders, 756
 Moral turpitude crimes, sentencing requirements, 571
 Terrorist removal court, 832
 Terrorist removal proceedings, 813
- APPREHENSION
 See also Interdictions, this index
 Highway checkpoints, 650
 Miranda rights, 652
 Removable noncitizens, 649
 State law enforcement, 1275
- ARMED FORCES
 See Military Service, this index
- ARREST
 See Apprehension, this index
- ASIAN IMMIGRANTS
 Chinese Exclusion Act, 15
 Chinese Exclusion Case, 120, 127
 Discriminatory property laws, 109
 Foundation Cases, 134
 History, 24
 Racial issues, 109
- ASSIMILATION
 Bilingual education tensions, 64
 Changing strategies as to, 48
 Diversity and, 48
 Linguistic, 42
 Multiculturalism tensions, 63
- ASYLUM
 Generally, 892 et seq.
 See also Refugees, this index
 Barring applicants, 1044
 Changed conditions affecting asylum claims, 1015
 Child asylum claimants, 1036
 Credibility determinations, 960, 1005
 Criminal offender exceptions to eligibility, 1016, 1021

ASYLUM—Cont'd

Delays in processing, 1033
 Detention of claimants
 Generally, 1056
 Haitian claimants, 168
 Discouraging applicants, 1044
 Discretion, 1025
 Domestic violence and asylum claims, 974
 Economic migrants, 870, 1064
 Eligibility
 Generally, 892 et seq.
 Exceptions to, 1016
 Employment authorization, 1060
 Exceptions to eligibility, 1016
 Expedited removal
 Generally, 506, 507, 1052
 Interview rights, 507
 Firm resettlement exception to eligibility, 1016
 Frivolous claims, 1060
 Haitian claimant detentions, 168
 Hearings, translation rights, 175
 High seas interdictions of vessels, 1062, 1080
 Human rights standards applicable to asylum determinations, 957
 Interview rights, 507
 Judicial review, IIRIRA restrictions, 1044
 Material support to terrorism bar, 447, 449
 Multi-state applicants, 1132
 National origin discrimination, 906
 National security restrictions on procedural safeguards, 834
 Nonrefoulement compared, 892
 Non-state actor persecution, 974, 983
 Officers, asylum, 1030
 Overseas refugees, 872
 Past wrongdoing exception to eligibility, 1017
 Persecution or Fear of Persecution, this index
 Policy considerations, 870, 1036
 Political bias in asylum procedure, 1032
 Preinspection of claimants, 1062
 Probability of actual persecution, 1000
 Procedure
 Generally, 1029 et seq.
 Application fees, 1061
 Asylum officers, 1030
 Attorney-client interview, simulated, 1085
 Barring applicants, 1044
 Child claimants, 1036
 Delays in processing, 1033
 Detention of claimants, 1056
 Discouraging applicants, 1044
 Due process, 1035
 Frivolous actions, 1060
 Grant-or-refer system, 1038
 Political bias, 1032
 Preinspection, 1062
 REAL ID Act, 1037
 Security checks, 1031
 Unfounded claims, 1034
 Withholding of removal procedure compared, 1030
 Proof standards, 999

ASYLUM—Cont'd

Quotas for refugees, 9, 878, 881
 Rape-related asylum claims, 959
 Refouler, 893, 1075
 Refugee status, 9, 907
 Refugees sur place, 929
 Relevant evidence of persecution, 1005
 Safe third country restrictions on asylum, 1046
 Security checks, 1031
 State Department evidence as to persecution conditions, 1011
 Statutory standards for asylum, 897
 Terrorism and procedural safeguards, 834
 Terrorism exclusions of applicants, 445
 Unfounded claims, 1034
 Waivers of terrorism exclusions, 450
 Withholding of removal
 Generally, 892, 1030
 IIRIRA, 1083

ATTORNEY AND CLIENT

Asylum interview, simulated, 1085
 Authorization to practice, 670
 Ethical Practice, this index
 Fees, Equal Access to Justice Act (EAJA), 683
 Immigration matters, general vs specialized practice, 696
 Ineffective assistance of counsel
 Generally, 689
 Malpractice claims, 711
 Private vs appointed counsel, 698
 Malpractice claims, 711
 Monitoring detainee conversations, 824
 National security restrictions on procedural safeguards, 834
 Pro bono legal services, 681
 Professional Responsibility, this index
 Right to Counsel, this index
 Terrorism and procedural safeguards, 834
 Unauthorized Practice, this index

ATTORNEY GENERAL

See Department of Justice, this index

AUTOMATED ENTRY-EXIT SYSTEM

Generally, 825

BATTERED IMMIGRANTS

See also Domestic Violence, this index
 Admission procedures, 473

BILATERAL OPEN BORDER AGREEMENTS

Generally, 36

BILINGUAL EDUCATION

Assimilation tensions, 64
 English-Only, this index

BILL OF RIGHTS

Immigrants, applicability to, 151

BIRTH, CITIZENSHIP BY

See Citizenship, this index

BOARD OF IMMIGRATION APPEALS (BIA)

Generally, 744
 See also Administrative Law, this index
 Affirmances without opinion (AWO), 657, 745, 754
 Appointments, 744
 Case management screening system, 745
 Deportations, 657
 Due process challenges to procedures, 754
 Jurisdiction, 4, 744
 Motion practice
 Generally, 659
 Reopen or reconsider, 754

BOND, RELEASE ON

See Detention, this index

BRACERO PROGRAMS

History of immigration law, 377, 1141

BRITISH LAW

Plenary power doctrine, 247
 Postimperial immigration policy, 49

BURDEN OF PROOF

Admissibility, 505
 Deportation hearings, 514, 655, 732
 Status, McCarran-Walter Act, 17

BUREAU OF HUMAN RIGHTS AND HUMANITARIAN AFFAIRS (BHRHA)

Generally, 1012

BUREAU OF POPULATION, REFUGEES, AND MIGRATION (PRM)

Generally, 4

BUREAUCRACY

See Processing Delay, this index

BUSINESS VISITORS

Nonimmigrant status, 7
 Priorities, 358
 Visa waivers, 481

CALIFORNIA

Chinese immigration discrimination, 127
 Proposition 187 public education restrictions
 Generally, 93, 1193
 Effect of vote on, 21
 Federalism issues, 1283

CANCELLATION OF REMOVAL

Generally, 595 et seq., 652
 Discretionary standards, 623
 Disqualified groups, 623
 Good moral character requirements, 623
 Hardship, 606
 Legislative vetoes of cancellations, 624
 NACARA cancellations, 603, 624
 Part A cancellations, 595
 Part B cancellations, 595, 602
 Prima facie eligibility for suspension, 612
 Quotas, relief, 603
 Relief From Deportability, this index
 Suspension of deportation, 602

CERTIFICATE OF LOSS OF NATIONALITY (CLN)

Generally, 1371

CERTIFYING OFFICERS (CO)

Labor certification, 310

CHANGES OF STATUS

Generally, 418

CHILDREN

See also Families, this index
 Aging out of visa applicants, 264
 Asylum claims, 1036
 Child Naturalization Act, 1315
 Crime-related deportation, child molestation, 569
 Custody and protection laws, language differences, 67
 Detentions of juveniles, 652
 Hardship, children's education factors, 615
 Out-of-wedlock children, 188, 295, 1299
 Quotas and preferences
 Generally, 291
 Child Status Protection Act, 265
 Sibling preferences, 292
 Undocumented immigrants, children of
 Generally, 1333
 Constitutional amendment proposals, 1292

CHINESE EXCLUSION ACT

Generally, 423
 Racial impetus, 244

CHINESE EXCLUSION CASE

Constitutional law, 120
 Public reaction, 127

CITIZENSHIP

Generally, 1288 et seq.
 Acquisition
 Generally, 1289 et seq.
 Birth, citizenship by, 6, 1290
 Children of undocumented immigrants, 1292
 Constitutional amendment proposals, 1292
 Descent, 6, 1293
 Dual nationality, 1317
 Fourteenth Amendment, 1291
 History of citizenship statutes, 1289
 Indian births, 1291
 Jus sanguinis, 1293
 Jus soli, 1290
 Naturalization, below
 Qualifications, 1321
 Who should be a citizen, 1321
 Administrative naturalization, 1300, 1313
 Administrative review of loss of citizenship, 1369
 Administrative vs judicial revocation of naturalization, 1338
 Birth, citizenship by
 Generally, 6, 33, 1290
 Policy considerations, 1333

CITIZENSHIP—Cont'd

Birth—Cont'd
 Undocumented immigrants' children, 1292, 1333
 Certificate of Loss of Nationality (CLN), 1371
 Child Naturalization Act, 1315
 Civic citizenship, 63
 Communist Party membership, 1347
 Consensual renunciation of citizenship, 1360
 Constitutional law, descent acquisition, 1296
 Definition, 6
 Denationalization, 1357
 Denaturalization, 1336
 Descent acquisition
 Generally, 6, 1293, 1296
 Gender discrimination, 188, 1299
 Devaluation of, 1382, 1388
 Disabilities of noncitizens, 1374, 1395
 Discrimination on basis of citizenship status, 1173
 Dual nationality
 Generally, 1317
 Bancroft Treaties, 1357
 Oath of citizenship, 1308
 Emotional significance of citizenship, 1373
 Equal protection analysis of citizenship classifications, 1375
 Exclusion, ineligibility for citizenship as grounds for, 428
 Expatriation
 Generally, 7, 1357
 Acts, expatriating, 1367, 1372
 False citizenship claims, 545
 Fourteenth Amendment, 1291
 History of citizenship statutes, 1289
 Immigrant vs nonimmigrant rights to apply for, 250
 Indian births, 1291
 Intent to renounce, 1361, 1369, 1371
 Intent to surrender, 1360
 Judicial naturalization, 1300, 1313
 Judicial review
 Loss of citizenship, 1369
 Naturalization denials, 1300
 Jus sanguinis acquisition, 1293
 Jus soli acquisition, 1290
 Loss of citizenship
 Generally, 7, 1336
 Administrative review, 1369
 Administrative vs judicial revocation, 1338
 Certificate of Loss of Nationality (CLN), 1371
 Consensual, 1360
 Criminal offense convictions, 1358
 Expatriating acts, 1367, 1372
 Expatriation, 7, 1357
 Intent to renounce, 1361, 1369, 1371
 Intent to surrender, 1360
 Judicial review, 1369
 Judicial revocation, 1338
 Marriage to noncitizen, 1358
 Military service in foreign country, 1363
 Nationality Act of 1940, 1358

CITIZENSHIP—Cont'd

Loss of citizenship—Cont'd
 Secretary of State authority, 1369
 Voting in a foreign election, 1359
 Withdrawal of renunciation, 1371
 LPRs and citizens, constitutional rights compared, 178, 186
 Marriage to noncitizen, 1358
 Military service
 Loss of citizenship through, 1363
 Naturalization through, 1307
 Moral character qualifications
 Generally, 1307
 Revocation of naturalization, 1338, 1354
 Multicultural pressures, 1387
 Nationality Act of 1940, 1358
 Nationality and, 1357
 Nationals distinguished, 6
 Naturalization
 Generally, 6, 7, 1300
 Administrative, 1300, 1313
 Administrative vs judicial revocation, 1338
 Child Naturalization Act, 1315
 Definition, 6
 Denaturalization, 1336
 Fraud, revocation for, 1337
 Illegally procured, 1338, 1354
 Judicial, 1300, 1313
 Military service, 1307
 Moral character qualifications, 1307, 1338, 1354
 Oath of citizenship, 1308
 Physical presence requirements, 1311
 Political influences, 1304
 Political requirements, 1308
 Procedure, 1313
 Residence requirements, 1309
 Revocation, 1336
 Streamlining procedures, 1303
 Oath of citizenship, 1308
 Out-of-wedlock children, 188, 1299
 Physical presence requirements, 1311
 Plenary power doctrine as to rights of, 1375
 Policy considerations, 1321
 Political requirements, 1308
 Qualifications, 1321
 Racial equality and, 56
 Relinquishment of citizenship, 7
 Removal proceedings, citizenship defense, 645
 Renunciation
 Generally, 1357
 Intent to renounce, 1361, 1369, 1371
 Withdrawal of renunciation, 1371
 Residence requirements, 1309
 Revocation of naturalization, 1336
 Rights of citizenship, 7, 1374, 1395
 Significance of citizenship, 1373
 Slavery and, 1291
 State law discriminations against noncitizens, 1376
 Statelessness, 1320
 Swiss citizenship laws, 1316

CITIZENSHIP—Cont'd

Undocumented immigrants' children
 Generally, 1333
 Constitutional amendment proposals,
 1292
 Voting in a foreign election, loss of citizenship by, 1359
 Welfare reform, 1377
 Who should be a citizen, 1321
 Withdrawal of renunciation, 1371

CITIZENSHIP AND IMMIGRATION SERVICES (USCIS)

Generally, 3

CIVIC CITIZENSHIP

Generally, 63

CIVIL RIGHTS LAWS

Discrimination, this index
 English-only work rules, 68
 Immigration and, 25

CLANDESTINE ENTRANTS

Deportation vs exclusion procedures, 174

COMMISSION ON IMMIGRATION REFORM

Creation, 85

COMMUNIST PARTY MEMBERSHIP

Citizenship, 1347
 Deportations, 177
 Exclusion grounds, 429
 First Amendment exclusions challenges, 193
 LPRs, 177

CONSTITUTIONAL LAW

Generally, 113 et seq.
 Bill of Rights applicability to immigrants, 151
 Chinese Exclusion Case, 120, 127
 Citizenship, descent acquisition, 1296
 Commerce clause powers, 116
 Congressional restrictions on judicial review,
 507
 Construction of statute to achieve constitutionality, 209, 218
 Deference of judiciary to Congress in immigration cases, 177, 184
 Deportation challenges, 645
 Deportation power, 136, 147
 Due process
 See also Due Process, this index
 Procedural and substantive, 155
 Entry rights, 161
 Enumerated and unenumerated federal powers, 116
 Equal Protection, this index
 European Convention on Human Rights, constitutional law aspects, 247
 Ex post facto enactments, 181, 194
 Executive vs legislative powers, 587
 Extraterritorial reach of Constitution, 151
 Families, unity rights, 303
 Federalism Issues, this index
 First Amendment, 181

CONSTITUTIONAL LAW—Cont'd

Foreign affairs power, 123, 148
 Foundation Cases, 133
 Future of plenary power doctrine, 242
 Illegally obtained statements, 730
 Implied constitutional powers, 119
 Importation clause, 118
 Inherent sovereign power, 114, 123, 245
 Judicial review
 Generally, 113, 133
 See also Judicial Review, this index
 Congressional jurisdiction restrictions,
 507
 Legislative vetoes of administrative determinations, 201, 204
 Limits to federal immigration power, 132 et seq.
 LPRs and citizens, constitutional rights compared, 178, 186
 Migration clause, 118
 Miranda rights of detainees, 652
 Naturalization clause, 118
 Necessary and proper federal powers, 116
 Official English law challenges, 66
 Out-of-wedlock children, citizenship discrimination, 188, 1299
 Plenary Power Doctrine, this index
 Political questions, nonjusticiability of, 203,
 205
 Procedural and substantive due process
 Generally, 155 et seq.
 Detention cases, 240
 Distinctions, 185
 Strategic considerations, 176
 Removal period detentions, 206
 Residual state powers, 130
 Retroactive deportation, 194
 Right to Counsel, this index
 Rights/privileges distinctions, 154, 166, 187
 Same-sex marriage, 274
 Searches and seizures, 729
 Separation of powers
 See also Separation of Powers, this index
 Policy considerations, 587
 Sources of federal immigration power, 115
 Standing of LPRs, 193
 Stare decisis, 187
 Suspension clause, 169
 Vested rights due process assertions, 178
 War clause, 119

CONSULAR ABSOLUTISM DOCTRINE

Judicial review limitation, 756

CONSULAR OFFICERS

DHS authority in the visa process, 841
 Discretionary authority, 487, 499
 Immigration inspectors and, complementary admissions roles, 508
 Judicial review of actions of, 487, 493, 756
 National security restrictions on procedural safeguards
 Generally, 840
 Waiver restrictions, 842

CONSULAR OFFICERS—Cont'd

Profiling and stereotyping by, 485, 500
 Terrorism and procedural safeguards
 Generally, 840

 Waiver restrictions, 842

Training, 486

CONVENTION AGAINST TORTURE (CAT)

 Generally, 1095 et seq.

 Arbitration of claims, 1111

 Custody requirement, 1106

 Domestic violence, 1108

 Family member protections, 1108

 Foreign Affairs Reform and Restructuring Act, 1103

 Human rights violation, 1099

 Judicial review of claims, 1110

 Nonrefoulement, 1104

 Past persecution, 1107

 Persecution claims compared, 1108

 Ratification, 1097

 REAL ID Act, 1110

 Reservations of US, 1101, 1105

 Safe third countries, 1109

 State vs non-state actors, 1105

 Treaty law, 1097

 Withholding of removal, 1107

COUNSEL

 Attorney and Client, this index

 Right to Counsel, this index

COUNTERTERRORISM LAWS

 Removal grounds, 194

CREW MEMBERS

 Generally, 813

 Entry documents, 813

 Shipwrecked undocumented immigrants, 526

CRIME-RELATED DEPORTATION

 Generally, 548 et seq.

 Administrative removal of aggravated felons, 809

 AEDPA sentencing requirements, 571

 Aggravated felonies, 574

 Burglaries, 582

 Child molestation, 569

 Collateral attacks on convictions, 560

 Conviction questions, 551

 Criminal sentences, judicial removal orders in, 810

 Discretionary relief, 550

 Driving under the influence, 576

 Drug offenses, 573

 Due process, 549

 Exclusion, criminal activities as grounds, 440, 455

 Expungements, 557

 Failure to maintain status, 586

 Finality of conviction, 552

 Firearms violations, 586

 First Offender Act (FFOA), 559

 Five year rule, 570, 591

CRIME-RELATED DEPORTATION

 —Cont'd

 Gang members, 549

 Guilty pleas

 Generally, 553, 556

 Ineffective assistance of counsel, 694

 In absentia removal hearings, 811

 Ineffective assistance of counsel defense

 Generally, 689

 Private vs appointed counsel, 698

 Judicial recommendations against deportation (JRAD), 572

 Judicial removal orders in criminal sentences, 810

 Judicial review, 519, 763

 Manslaughter, 570

 Merits of removing noncitizen criminal offenders, 587

 Moral turpitude crimes

 Generally, 561

 Murder, 519

 Pardons, effect of, 560

 Plea-bargained voluntary departures, 811

 Policy considerations, 587

 Prison removal hearings, 807

 Punitive effect of deportation, 554

 Rape as crime of moral turpitude, 561

 Reentry, this index

 Relief from deportability, 594

 Removal of noncitizen criminal offenders, 807

 Sentenced more than once, 519, 520

 Sentencing requirements, 571

 Smuggling, 590

 Statutory interpretation judicial review, 519

 Terrorism, 589

 Two crimes involving moral turpitude, 571

 Two or more convictions, 521

 Vacated convictions, 558, 560

 Violent crimes, 576, 581

 Withdrawing guilty pleas

 Generally, 553, 556

 Ineffective assistance of counsel, 694

CRIMINAL LAW

 Administrative removal of aggravated felons, 809

 Asylum

 Criminal offender exceptions, 1016, 1021

 Prosecution for political vs criminal activities, 907, 1024

 Borders, immigration law enforcement at, 1147

 Deportation as punishment, 152

 Employers of undocumented immigrants

 Generally, 1158 et seq.

 Alternative strategies, 1232

 E-Verify program, 1161

 State laws, federal preemption, 1251

 Entry without inspection, 1153

 Exclusion, criminal activities as grounds, 440, 455

 Forfeiture enforcement of immigration laws, 1148

 Harboring offenses, 1156

CRIMINAL LAW—Cont'd

Identity theft offenses, 1156
 Immigration law enforcement, 1147
 Immigration Reform and Control Act, 1158
 In absentia removal hearings, 811
 Inspection, entry without, 1153
 Judicial removal orders in criminal sentences, 810
 Loss of citizenship sentences, 1358
 Memoranda of Agreement (MOA) with state law enforcement, 1274
 Overstayers, 716
 Persecution, criminal vs political offenses, 907
 Plea bargain promises of nonremoval, 811
 Plea-bargained voluntary departures, 811
 Prison removal hearings, 807
 Reentry, this index
 Removal of noncitizen criminal offenders, 807 et seq.
 Removal order violations, judicial review, 788
 Seizure enforcement of immigration laws, 1148
 Sentences, judicial removal orders in, 810
 Terrorist removal proceedings, 813
 Trafficking offenses, 1157
 Undocumented immigrants
 Criminal justice system impacts, 1146
 Enforcement of immigration laws generally, 1147
 Harboring offenses, 1156
 Identity theft offenses, 1156
 Immigration offenses, 1153
 Memoranda of Agreement (MOA) with state law enforcement, 1275
 State policing efforts, 1274
 Trafficking offenses, 1157
 Unlawful activities as grounds for exclusion, 440, 455
 Withholding of removal, 1107

CUBAN ADJUSTMENT ACT OF 1966

Generally, 168

CULTURE

Canadian multiculturalism, 63
 Demographic balance, 49
 Diversity Immigrants, this index
 Fertility rates and population growth, 86
 Immigrant self identity, 98
 Immigration policies and, 38 et seq.
 Latino identity, 50, 107
 Multiculturalism, this index
 Nation-state issues, 47
 Nativism, 55

CUSTOMS AND BORDER PROTECTION (CBP)

Actual admission procedures, 503 et seq.
 Apprehension, this index
 Automated entry-exit program, 825
 Creation, 3
 Detention authorities, 503
 Enhanced border enforcement measures, 845
 Immigration inspectors, 503

CUSTOMS AND BORDER PROTECTION (CBP)—Cont'd

National Security Entry-Exit Registration System (NSEERS), 825
 Student and Exchange Visitor Information System (SEVIS), 827
 US Visitor and Immigration Status Indication Technology System (US VISIT), 828

DEFENSE OF MARRIAGE ACT (DOMA)

Same-sex marriage and family immigrant quotas, 274

DEFERENCE

See Judicial Review, this index

DEFINITIONS

See also Terminology, this index

Adjustment of status, 9
 Admission, 514, 522
 AEDPA, 21
 Aging-out, 264
 Alien, 1
 Alien terrorist, 833
 Amnesty, 626
 APA, 498
 AWO, 657
 BHRHA, 1012
 BIA, 4
 Bilateral sham marriage, 283
 Case-by-case detention, 239
 CAT, 1095
 Categorical detention, 239
 CBP, 3
 Citizen, 6
 Citizenship, 1357
 CLN, 1371
 CO, 310
 Conditional permanent residence, 285
 Crew member, 813
 Denationalization, 1357
 Deportable noncitizen, 515
 Deportation, 648
 DHS, 2
 Discretionary detention, 239
 Diversity immigrants, 254
 DOMA, 274
 DOT, 324
 Dual intent nonimmigrant, 413
 EAJA, 683
 Entry, 514, 522
 EOIR, 3
 ESTA, 843
 ETA, 308
 EVD, 637
 Exclusion, 21
 Exclusion order, 501
 Expatriation, 7, 1357
 Extreme hardship, 606
 F-1 and F-2 visas, 356
 FD, 312
 FERPA, 827
 FFOA, 559
 Green card, 250

DEFINITIONS—Cont'd

Hardship, 606
 ICE, 3
 IDP, 869
 IIRIRA, 22
 IJ, 654
 IMFA, 199
 Immigrant, 250
 Immigrant noncitizen, 7
 Inadmissibility, 21
 Individualized detention, 239
 INS, 2
 IRCA, 10
 IV, 481
 JRAD, 572
 LCA, 470
 Legalization, 626
 LIFE, 264
 Lookout list, 441
 LPR, 2
 Mandatory detention, 239
 Material support for terrorism, 449
 MERCOSUR, 36
 MOA, 1275
 NACARA, 254
 Nation, 61
 National, 1, 6
 Nationality, 1357
 Nation-state, 47
 Naturalization, 1300
 Naturalized citizen, 6
 NIV, 481
 NOF, 311
 Noncitizen, 1, 7
 Nonimmigrant noncitizen, 7
 Non-national, 1
 Nonrefoulement, 892
 NSEERS, 825
 NVC, 475
 OAS, 1138
 OCAHO, 4
 OPLA, 654
 Parole, 167
 PERM, 308
 Persecution, 905
 PRM, 4
 Quota, 8, 251
 Refouler, 893
 Refugee, 891, 901
 Removal, 648
 Removal hearing, 3
 Removal order, 501
 Removal period, 206
 Restrictionism, 50
 SEVIS, 827
 Summary exclusion, 506
 Terrorism, 449
 Torture, 1104
 TPS, 1117
 TRWOV, 524
 UNHCR, 12
 US VISIT, 824
 USCIS, 3

DELAY

See Processing Delay, this index

DEMOGRAPHICS

Generally, 85
 Age of immigrants and social security balance, 82
 Baby boom factors, 88
 Balance, demographic, 49
 Balancing equation, 87
 Environmental implications, 89
 Fertility rates and population growth, 86
 Geographic distribution of immigrants, 74
 Latino population, 60
 Migration trends, 12, 22
 Nonimmigrant admissions, 355
 Refugees, 869
 Undocumented immigrants, 1141, 1143
 Urban vs rural distribution of immigrants, 74

DEPARTMENT OF HEALTH AND HUMAN SERVICES

Office of Refugee Resettlement, this index
 Role in immigration matters, 4

DEPARTMENT OF HOMELAND SECURITY (DHS)

See also Homeland Security Act, this index
 Consular officer training, 486
 Creation, 2
 Organization, 3
 Regulation promulgations, 6
 Visa authority, 485
 Visa issuance authority, 4
 Visa process authority, 841

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE

Attorney General
 Appointment controversies, 1158
 Jurisdiction over immigration matters, 4
 Regulation promulgations, 6

DEPARTMENT OF LABOR

Regulation promulgations, 6
 Role in employment matters, 4

DEPARTMENT OF STATE

Bureau of Population, Refugees, and Migration (PRM), 4
 Consular absolutism doctrine, 756
 Consular Officers, this index
 Educational exchange programs, 4
 Human rights country reports, 1011
 Loss of citizenship, Secretary of State authority, 1369
 Persecution conditions, evidence as to, 1011
 Role in immigration matters, 4
 Visa issuance authority, 4

DEPORTABILITY GROUNDS

Generally, 514 et seq.
 See also Relief from Deportability, this index
 Admission, entry without, 514, 522
 Aggravated felonies
 Generally, 574

DEPORTABILITY GROUNDS—Cont'd

Alien and Sedition Acts, 516
 Burglaries, 582
 Burglary convictions, 582
 Citizenship defense to removal, 645
 Clandestine entrants, 174
 Communist Party memberships, 177
 Conditional admission theories of deportation, 518
 Conditional admissions, 548
 Constitutional challenges to deportation, 645
 Counterterrorism laws, 194
 Crime-Related Deportation, this index
 Criminal cases
 Generally, 807 et seq.
 Sentences, judicial removal orders in, 810
 Current grounds, 518
 Discretionary standards
 Generally, 550, 632
 Driving under the influence, 576
 Drug offenses, 573
 Due process, 549
 Economic, 589
 Entry and deportability, 514, 522
 Entry while inadmissible, 545
 Entry without admission, 514, 522
 Entry without inspection, 648
 Exclusion vs deportation
 Generally, 514, 522, 648
 Grounds compared, 420, 514
 Power analysis, 136, 147
 Extended residence, deportation after, 517
 Failure to maintain status, 586
 False citizenship claims, 545
 Federal deportation power, 126, 136, 147
 Firearms violations, 586
 First Offender Act (FFOA), 559
 Gang members, 549
 Health-related, 589
 Hearings. See Removal Hearings, this index
 History of deportation policy, 516
 IIRIRA changes, 420, 522
 Immigration control, 544
 Immigration judge findings, 515
 Inadmissibility and deportability, grounds compared, 10
 Inadmissible entries, 545
 Inspection, entry without, 544
 Judicial deportation, 573
 Judicial recommendations against deportation (JRAD), 572
 LPR returns as entries, 529
 Merits of removing noncitizen criminal offenders, 587
 Moral, 589
 National security
 Generally, 588
 Expansion of ground, 831
 Noncitizens, deportable, 515
 Orders. See Removal Orders, this index
 Policy considerations, 587
 Political, 588
 Public charge, 589
 Punishment, deportation as, 152
 Punitive effect of deportation, 554

DEPORTABILITY GROUNDS—Cont'd

Rape as crime of moral turpitude, 561
 Removal and deportation, use of terms, 648
 Smuggling, 590
 Status, failure to maintain, 586
 Statutory interpretations, 519
 Terrorism related removal, 589, 831
 Theory of deportation
 Generally, 517
 Merits of removing noncitizen criminal offenders, 587
 Time limits, 570, 589
 Violent crimes, 576, 581
 Waivers of specific grounds, 515

DEPORTATION HEARINGS
 See Removal Hearings, this index

DEPORTATION ORDERS
 See Removal Orders, this index

DEPORTATION PROCEDURE
 Generally, 648 et seq., 754
 Removal and deportation, use of terms, 648
 Administrative review of orders, 657, 744
 Authorization to practice, 670
 Border detentions for, 503
 Burden of proof, 732
 Civil vs criminal nature of proceedings, 728
 Closed hearings, 655
 Compelled testimony, 742
 Concessions, detention, 241
 Conditional admissions, 548
 Crime-Related Deportation, this index
 Delay, 607
 Detention pending hearing
 Generally, 650
 Aggravated felony, 225, 239
 Border detentions for deportation, 503
 Deportability concessions, 241
 No realistic chance of deportation, detention and, 208
 Removal period and post-removal period detentions, 206
 Standards, 651, 652
 USA PATRIOT Act standards, 651
 Discipline of immigration practitioners, 684
 Due process
 Exclusion vs deportation cases, 152, 171
 Japanese Immigrant Case, 171
 Effective assistance of counsel, 689, 698
 Egregious procedure, judicial findings of, 729
 Entry without inspection procedure, 648
 Equal Access to Justice Act fee awards, 683
 Evidentiary rules, 712, 728
 Execution of removal orders, 658
 Finding lawyers for the indigent, 672
 Hearings
 Generally, 654 et seq.
 See also Removal Hearings, this index
 Highway checkpoints, 650
 History of deportation policy, 516
 IIRIRA detention standards, 651
 Illegally obtained statements, 730
 Inadmissible vs deportable noncitizens, 648

DEPORTATION PROCEDURE—Cont'd

Ineffective assistance of counsel defense
 Generally, 689
 Private vs appointed counsel, 698
 Judicial recommendations against deportation (JRAD), 572
 Judicial review
 Generally, 657
 Discretionary relief, 594
 Limits of power of deportation, 149
 Miranda rights, 652
 Motion practice
 Generally, 659
 Reopen or reconsider, 754
 National security restrictions on procedural safeguards, 832
 No realistic chance of deportation, detention and, 208
 Notices to appear
 Generally, 653
 Allegations, 805
 Objections to destination, relief from deportation on, 638
 Orders. See Removal Orders, this index
 Procedural due process, 171
 Public hearings, 655
 Reasonable, substantial, and probative evidence, 738
 Refusal to accept a deportee, 643
 Removal and deportation
 Generally, 648
 Removal Hearings, this index
 Removal Orders, this index
 Retroactive deportation, 194
 Right to counsel
 Generally, 654, 668
 Effective assistance, 689, 698
 Sanctions, 684
 Self-incrimination privilege, 730
 Stays of removal, 644
 Suppression of evidence, 712, 728
 Terrorism and procedural safeguards, 832
 Transcripts of hearings, 655
 Translation rights, 174
 Translators at hearings, 656
 Trial attorneys, 654
 Unqualified representation of indigents, 669
 USA PATRIOT Act detention standards, 651
 Warrants, 649
 Withholding of Removal, this index

DESCENT, CITIZENSHIP BY

See Citizenship, this index

DETENTION

Generally, 817 et seq.
 AEDPA standards, 651
 Aggravated felony deportations, 225, 239
 Anti-Drug Abuse Act, 225
 Asylum claimants, 1056
 Attorney and client communications monitoring, 824
 Automatic, 824

DETENTION—Cont'd

Bond appeal detentions, 818, 824
 Border detentions, 503
 Case-by-case detention, 239
 Categorical detention, 239
 Conditional parole, 651
 De novo bond redetermination hearing, 652
 Deportation concessions, effect of, 241
 Deportation of aggravated felons, 225, 239
 Discretionary detention, 239
 Expedited removal, 506
 Haitian asylum claimants, 168
 IIRIRA standards, 651
 Indefinite detention
 Marielitos, 167
 War on Terror, 169
 Individualized detention, 239
 Judicial review
 Generally, 769
 War on Terror effects on, 241
 Juveniles, 652
 Liberty rights, 166
 Mandatory, 239, 818, 824
 Marielitos, 167
 Miranda rights, 652
 National security, 156, 163, 817 et seq.
 No realistic chance of deportation, 208
 Nowhere-to-go detentions, 156, 206
 Parole
 Generally, 163, 167
 Conditional parole, 651
 Marielitos, 167
 Pentagon/Twin Towers Bombing Investigations (PENTTBOM), 819
 Preventive, policy considerations, 864
 Procedural and substantive due process issues, 240
 Redetermination hearing, 652
 Removal period detentions, 206
 Telephonic hearings to review, 652
 Terrorism
 Generally, 817 et seq.
 Indefinite detention, 169
 Judicial review, 241
 USA PATRIOT Act certification program, 822
 USA PATRIOT Act standards, 651
 Vienna Convention on Consular Relations, 653

DISCRETION STANDARDS
 Abuse of discretion claims, judicial review, 631
 Asylum, discretion cases, 1025
 Child asylum claimants, 1036
 Deportation
 Generally, 632
 Cancellation of removal, 623
 Discretionary deferrals of action, 629
 Relief applications, judicial review of, 594
 Extended voluntary departure, 1116
 Formal discretionary relief, policy considerations, 630
 Fraud and, 546

DISCRETION STANDARDS—Cont'd

Hardship, this index
 Humanitarian considerations, 632
 Humanitarian relief from deportation, 646
 Judicial review of exercises
 Generally, 765
 Abuse of discretion claims, 631
 Deportation, 594
 Prosecutorial discretion, 769
 Policy considerations
 Deferrals of action, 630
 Formal discretionary relief, 630
 Priorities, non-priority status, 630
 Prosecutorial discretion, 769
 Registry awards of LPR status, 625
 Removal, cancellation of, 623
 Temporary protected status, 1119
 Unconscionable deportations, 630

DISCRIMINATION

Asylum claims, 906
 Citizenship classifications
 Generally, 1375
 Descent acquisition, 188, 1299
 State laws, 1376
 Citizenship status discrimination, 1173
 Consular officers, profiling and stereotyping by, 485, 500
 Disparate treatment and disparate impact, 1175
 Employment discrimination immigration-related
 Generally, 1173
 Undocumented immigrants, 1171
 English-only employment cases, 1176
 Equal protection challenges to discriminatory classifications, 188
 Immigration policy discrimination, inevitability of, 84
 IRCA anti-discrimination provisions, 1171
 Nondiscrimination principle in international law, 245
 Persecution or Fear of Persecution, this index
 Profiling
 Generally, 846
 Consular officers, 485, 500
 Same-sex marriages, 273
 Segregation and immigration laws, 33
 Undocumented immigrant employment restrictions, 1171

DIVERSITY IMMIGRANTS

Generally, 348
 See also Multiculturalism, this index
 Assimilation and, 48
 Citizenship, multicultural pressures, 1387
 Definition, 254
 Demographic balance and, 49
 Family unity and, 349
 Goals of immigration policy, 39
 NACARA quota adjustments, 349
 Policy considerations, 348
 Quotas and preferences, 253, 348

DOCUMENTS

Admission, document deficiencies, 506
 Crew members' entry documents, 813
 E-Verify program, 1161
 Identity theft offenses, 1156
 Labor Certifications, this index
 LPRs, documentary proof of status, 250
 Passport authenticity standards, 843
 Proof of status, documentary, 250
 REAL ID Act, 1037
 Relief from deportability, document problems, 594
 Undocumented Immigrants, this index
 Visas, this index

DOMESTIC VIOLENCE

Admission procedures, battered immigrant petitions, 473
 Asylum claims, 974
 Asylum law, state-act rule, 978
 Convention Against Torture, 1108
 Extreme hardship cancellations of removal, 606
 Hardship and extreme hardship, 608

DRIVERS' LICENSES

Examinations, language requirements, 67
 REAL ID Act requirements, 1226
 Undocumented immigrants, 1225

DRUG OFFENSES

Deportation, 573

DUAL NATIONALITY

See Citizenship, this index

DUE PROCESS

Generally, 155 et seq.
 See also Equal Protection, this index
 Administrative discretion exercises, 197
 Administrative Procedure Act requirements, 662
 Aggravated felony deportations, 225, 239
 Asylum procedure, 1035
 Board of Immigration Appeals procedures, 754
 Clandestine entrants, deportation vs exclusion procedures, 174
 Closed removal hearings, 836
 Compelled testimony at deportation hearings, 742
 Crime-related deportation, 549
 Cuban cases, 169
 Deference of judiciary to Congress in immigration cases, 177, 184
 Deportation as punishment, 152
 Deportation challenges, 645
 Deportation grounds, 549
 Deportation power, procedural limits of, 149
 Deportation procedure
 Civil vs criminal nature of proceedings, 728
 Exclusionary rule, 712, 728
 Detentions
 Liberty rights, 166

DUE PROCESS—Cont'd

Detentions—Cont'd
 Security grounds, 156, 163
 Egregious procedure findings, 729
 Entry rights, 161
 Equal application of procedural requirements, 185
 Evidentiary problems, national security cases, 507
 Exclusion proceedings, 166
 Exclusion vs deportation cases
 Generally, 152
 Procedural due process, 171
 Expulsion cases, procedural due process, 243
 Extraterritorial reach of Constitution, 151
 Fairness standards, 161
 Future of plenary power doctrine, 242
 Haitian cases, 169
 Hearing rights, 174
 Illegally obtained statements, 730
 Immigration Marriage Fraud Amendments challenge, 199
 Japanese Immigrant Case, procedural due process, 171
 Judicial review of procedure
 Generally, 176
 Visa denials, 487, 493
 Jurisdictional reach of, 169
 Liberty rights of detainees, 166
 Life or liberty scope, 153
 LPR exclusion cases, 243
 Miranda rights of detainees, 652
 National security cases
 Detentions, 156, 163
 Evidentiary problems, 507
 Notice and opportunity to be heard, 174
 Plenary power doctrine and, 176 et seq.
 Procedural
 Generally, 155 et seq.
 Deportation cases, 171
 Detention cases, 240
 Distinctions, 185
 Equal application of procedural requirements, 185
 Exclusion vs deportation cases, 171
 Expulsion cases, 243
 Fairness standards, 161
 Japanese Immigrant Case, 171
 Judicial review, 176
 LPR exclusion cases, 243
 Plenary power doctrine and rights to due process, 176
 Right to counsel, 174
 Strategic considerations, 176
 Substantive compared, 155 et seq.
 Translation rights, 174
 Punishment, deportation as, 152
 Removals in national security cases, evidentiary problems, 507
 Retroactive deportation, 194
 Returning resident exclusions, 164
 Right to counsel, 174, 673, 678
 Secret evidence hearings, 837
 Security exclusions, 156

DUE PROCESS—Cont'd

Selective prosecution claims, 190
 Self-incrimination privilege, 730
 Statutory challenges, 135
 Substantive
 Detention cases, 240
 Distinctions, 185
 Due process and equal protection, 243
 Plenary power doctrine, 177 et seq.
 Procedural compared, 155 et seq.
 Strategic considerations, 176
 Translation rights, 174
 Vested rights assertions, 178
 What process is due, 166
 White witness laws, 136, 150

ECONOMIC MIGRANTS

Policy considerations, 870, 1064

ECONOMICS

Generally, 71
 Deportation on economic grounds, 589
 Equalizing nature of immigration trends, 75
 Equitable considerations, 77
 Exclusion on economic grounds, 457
 General Agreement on Trade in Services (GATS), 76
 Immigration tariff proposals, 77
 Labor market impacts of immigrants, 71
 Net profit approach to immigration strategies, 85
 Skilled vs unskilled immigration, 78, 82

EDUCATION

California Proposition 187
 Generally, 21, 93, 1193
 Federalism issues, 1283
 Exchange programs, Department of State authority, 4
 Family Educational Rights and Privacy Act (FERPA), 827
 IIRIRA monitoring of student activities, 827
 Nonimmigrants, educational
 Generally, 393
 J-1 and J-2 visas, 398
 Students, 393
 Tuition charges, 394
 Optional practical training (OPT) programs, 513
 Public education for undocumented immigrants
 Generally, 93, 1193
 Federalism issues, 1283
 IIRIRA, 1212
 Tuition charges, 1210, 1212
 Student and Exchange Visitor Information System (SEVIS), 827
 Students, nonimmigrant status, 7
 US Visitor and Immigration Status Indication Technology System (US VISIT), 828
 USA PATRIOT Act monitoring of student activities, 827

EMPLOYMENT

Asylees, employment authorizations, 1060
 Bracero Program, 377
 Convention on the Protection of the Rights of all Migrant Workers, 1224
 Department of Labor, 4
 Discrimination concerns, undocumented immigrant regulations, 1171, 1173
 Disparate treatment and disparate impact, 1175
 Displacement question, 71, 81
 Employer sanctions, 1158
 English-only work rules
 Generally, 68
 Discrimination challenges, 1176
 Equalizing nature of immigration trends, 75
 E-Verify program, 1161
 General Agreement on Trade in Services (GATS), 76
 Immigrant vs nonimmigrant rights, 250
 Immigration, employment-based
 Generally, 304 et seq.
 Adverse affect considerations, 327
 Agricultural workers, nonimmigrant, 377
 Athletes, nonimmigrant temporary workers, 372
 B-1 visa business visitors, 358
 Displacement considerations, 310
 Entertainers, nonimmigrant temporary workers, 372
 Goals of quotas and preferences, 342
 Guest workers, nonimmigrant, 371
 H-2 temporary worker nonimmigrant visas, 377
 H-3 trainee worker nonimmigrant visas, 386
 H-1 temporary worker nonimmigrant visas, 372
 Impacts, 332
 L Intra-company transferees, nonimmigrant, 388
 Labor certification, 307
 O visas for temporary nonimmigrant workers, 372
 P visas for temporary nonimmigrant workers, 372
 Policy considerations, 332, 342
 Quotas, 253
 Temporary workers, nonimmigrant, 371
 Immigration, impacts of, 28
 Immigration Reform and Control Act
 Generally, 1158
 Employer sanctions, 10, 1158
 Labor Certification, this index
 Labor law protections, undocumented immigrants, 1213
 Local labor markets impacted by immigration, 74
 Nonimmigrant admissions, 8
 North American Agreement for Labor Cooperation, 1224
 Office of the Chief Administrative Hearing Officer (OCAHO), 4

EMPLOYMENT—Cont'd

Optional practical training (OPT) programs, 513
 Quota preferences, 8
 Refugees, employment authorizations, 1060
 Skilled vs unskilled immigration, 8, 78, 82
 Undocumented immigrants
 Discrimination concerns, 1171, 1173
 Economic impact, 1144
 Employer pull, 1142, 1163
 Employer sanctions
 Generally, 1158 et seq.
 Alternative strategies, 1232
 E-Verify program, 1161
 State laws, federal preemption, 1251
 Labor law protections, 1213

ENGLISH-ONLY

Generally, 65
 See also Language, this index; Nativism, this index
 Constitutional official languages, 65
 History of movement, 66
 Immigration policy, 70
 Policy effects, 65
 Sign ordinances, 68
 Title VII employment discrimination, 1176
 Work rule English requirements, 68

ENTRY

Admission, this index
 Surreptitious, 544

ENVIRONMENTAL MATTERS

Generally, 89
 Demographics and, 89
 Fertility rates and population growth, 86
 Redistribution of populations, 88, 90

EQUAL ACCESS TO JUSTICE ACT (EAJA)

Fee awards, 683

EQUAL PROTECTION

See also Due Process, this index
 Administrative discretion exercises, 197
 Citizenship classifications
 Generally, 1375
 State laws, 1376
 Classifications, discriminatory, 188
 Deportation challenges, 645
 Federal preemption and, 1286
 Federalism issues, undocumented immigrants, 1244
 Judicial review of claims, standard of review, 1207
 Out-of-wedlock children, citizenship discrimination, 188
 Plenary power doctrine, 190
 Profiling practices, 847
 Public assistance rights, undocumented immigrants, 1244
 Rational basis review of statutes, 199
 Same-sex marriages, family relationship quotas, 276

EQUAL PROTECTION—Cont'd

- Scrutiny of legislative classifications, 188
- Substantive due process, and, 243
- Undocumented immigrants
 - Federalism issues, 1244
 - Public assistance rights, 1244
 - Public education rights, 1193
 - Strict scrutiny of classifications, 1250

ESTOPPEL

- Deportation defenses, 646

ETHICAL PRACTICE

- See also Attorney and Client, this index; Professional Responsibility, this index
- Discipline of immigration practitioners, 684
- Labor certification applications, 319
- Marriage status clients, 291
- Nonimmigrants, intent assertions, 415

ETHNICITY

- See also Race, this index
- Balance and ethnic revolution, 44
- Foreignness and ethnicity, 112
- Ideology vs as nation-state bonds, 48
- Nationhood requirements, 60
- Political coalitions, 95
- Restrictionism, 50
- Visible minorities, 52

EUROPEAN CONVENTION ON HUMAN RIGHTS

- Constitutional law aspects, 247

EUROPEAN UNION

- Bilateral open border agreements, 36
- Terrorism countermeasures, 868

E-VERIFY PROGRAM

- Undocumented immigrants employer sanctions, 1161

EXCLUSION

- Chinese Exclusion Act, 423
- Communist party members, 429
- Constitutional entry rights assertions, 161
- Criminal activities as grounds for, 440, 455
- Cuban cases, 169
- Deportation compared
 - Generally, 514, 522, 648
 - Procedural due process, 171
- Document-related grounds for, 432
- Due process applicable to exclusion proceedings, 166
- Due process standards in exclusion vs deportation matters, 152
- Economic grounds for, 457
- Entry without admission, 514, 522
- First Amendment exclusion challenges, 193
- Fraud grounds, 432
- Grounds for
 - Generally, 420 et seq.
 - See also Deportability Grounds, this index
 - Chinese Exclusion Act, 423
 - Communist party members, 429
 - Criminal activities, 440, 455

EXCLUSION—Cont'dGrounds for—Cont'd

- Deportation grounds compared, 420
- Document-related, 432
- Economic, 457
- Exclusion and deportation, 514
- Fraud, 432
- History of excludable classes, 422
- Human rights violations, 439
- Ideological, 436
- IIRIRA changes, 420
- Immigration control grounds, 431
- Inadmissibility grounds, 420
- Ineligibility for citizenship, 428
- Ineligible to receive visas, 420
- Literacy standards, 426
- McCarran-Walter Act, 428
- Mental disorders, 461
- Mental standards, 427
- Morals, 461
- National security grounds, 436
- Physical disorders, 461
- Political, 436
- Prejudicial to public interest, 439
- Public health, 461
- Terrorism exclusions, 443
- Unlawful activities, 440, 455
- Unlawful presence grounds, 432, 434
- Visa ineligibilities, 430
- Waivers, 430, 441, 450
- Haitian cases, 169
- History of excludable classes, 422
- Homosexuality, 271, 280
- Human rights violations grounds, 439
- Ideological grounds for, 436
- IIRIRA changes, 420
- Immigration control grounds, 431
- Inadmissibility
 - Compared, 21
 - Grounds, 420
 - Relief from, 593
- Ineligibility for citizenship as grounds for, 428
- Ineligible to receive visas, 420
- Literacy standards, 426
- Lookout list, 441
- LPRs, procedural due process, 243
- McCarran-Walter Act, 428
- Mental disorder grounds, 461
- Mental standards, 427
- Moral grounds for, 461
- National security grounds
 - Generally, 436
 - Policy problems, 163
- No place to go detainees, 156
- Orders
 - See also Removal Orders, this index
 - Habeas corpus challenges, 501
 - Judicial review, 499, 501
 - Physical disorder grounds, 461
 - Political grounds for, 436
 - Prejudicial to public interest grounds, 439
 - Procedural due process
 - Deportation vs exclusion cases, 171

EXCLUSION—Cont'd

- Procedural due process—Cont'd
 - LPRs, 243
- Public health grounds, 461
- Reentry, this index
- Relief from inadmissibility, 593
- Returning resident exclusions, 164
- Shipwrecked immigrants, 526
- Terrorists
 - Generally, 443
 - In camera procedures, 164
 - Waivers, 450
- Unlawful activities as grounds for, 440, 455
- Unlawful presence grounds, 432, 434
- Visa ineligibilities, 430
- Waivers of exclusion grounds
 - Generally, 430, 441
 - Terrorism exclusions, 450

EXECUTIVE OFFICE FOR IMMIGRATION REVIEW (EOIR)

Creation, 3

EXPATRIATION

See Citizenship, this index

EXPEDITED REMOVAL

- Generally, 9, 506, 806
- Administrative appeal, 507
- AEDPA procedures, 506
- Asylum claims
 - Generally, 506, 1052
 - Interview rights, 507
- Document deficiencies, 506
- Entry while inadmissible, 545
- Fraud determinations, 506
- IIRIRA procedures, 506
- Immigration officers, initiation by, 503
- Inadmissibility/deportability distinction, 807
- Inadmissible entries, 545
- Judicial review, 507
- LPRs, 507
- National security cases, 507
- Orders, judicial review, 768
- Reentry after removal, 812
- Refugees, 507, 1052
- Special removal in terrorism cases, 508
- Summary exclusion, 506
- Terrorism cases, special removal procedures, 508

EXPULSION

- Generally, 10
- Deportability Grounds, this index
- Deportation Procedure, this index
- Relief from Deportability, this index
- Removal Hearings, this index
- Removal Orders, this index

EXTENDED VOLUNTARY DEPARTURE (EVD)

- Generally, 637
- Blanket grants, 1115
- Discretionary standards, 1116
- Foreign policy bias, 1116
- Temporary protected status compared, 1115

EXTREME HARDSHIP

See Hardship, this index

FAMILIES

- Generally, 262 et seq.
 - Aging out of visa applicants, 264
 - Child Status Protection Act, 265
 - Children
 - Generally, 291
 - See also Children, this index
 - Legitimacy issues, 188, 295
 - Conditional permanent residence, 285
 - Convention Against Torture, family member protections, 1108
 - Diversity policy and, 349
 - Ethical issues regarding marital status, 291
 - Exempt and nonexempt applicants, 263
 - Failed marriages, 288
 - Family unification policy, 302
 - Fiancé visas, 407
 - Foreign adoptions, 298
 - Fraudulent marriages, 282
 - Hardship waivers, 286
 - Immediate relative status, 282
 - Immigrant preferences, 255
 - K-3 and K-4 visas, 408
 - Legal Immigration Family Equity Act
 - Generally, 264
 - K-visas, 413
 - LPR spouses, 283
 - Nonimmigrant admissions, 8
 - Nonimmigrant spouse visas, 413
 - Parents, 291
 - Preferences, 255
 - Quotas, sponsored immigrants, 253
 - Removal periods, marriages during, 290
 - Same-sex spouses, 267
 - Sibling preferences, 292
 - Sponsored immigrant quotas, 253
 - Spouses
 - Generally, 267 et seq.
 - See also Marriage, this index
 - Ethical issues regarding marital status, 291
 - Failed marriages, 288
 - Fiancé visas, 407
 - Nonimmigrant spouse visas, 413
 - Removal periods, marriages during, 290
 - Temporary protected status, family unity issues, 1127
 - Unification policy
 - Generally, 302
 - Constitutional unity rights, 303
 - Visa petitions, 8
 - V-visas, 413
- FAMILY EDUCATIONAL RIGHTS AND PRIVACY ACT (FERPA)
- Student privacy rights, 827

FAMILY RELATIONSHIPS

Marriages. See Fraudulent Marriages, this index

FEAR OF PROSECUTION

Persecution or Fear of Persecution, this index

FEDERALISM ISSUES

Generally, 1238 et seq., 1251, 1256
 California Proposition 187 public education restrictions, 1283
 Equal protection claims
 Undocumented immigrants, 1244
 Equal protection rights
 Preemption of state laws, 1286
 Field preemption of state laws, 1263
 Implied preemption of state laws, 1263
 Memoranda of Agreement (MOA) with law enforcement agencies, 1274, 1275
 Preemption of state laws
 Generally, 130, 1251
 Equal protection rights, 1286
 Field preemption, 1263
 Implied preemption, 1263
 IRCA, 1257
 Landlord-tenant law affecting undocumented immigrants, 1258
 Undocumented immigrants, laws affecting, 1251
 State and federal law conflicts generally, 2, 14
 Undocumented immigrants
 Generally, 1238 et seq.
 Equal protection claims, 1244
 Federal/state conflicts, 1146
 IRCA, 1257
 Landlord-tenant law, 1258
 Nativism pressures, 1241
 Preemption of state laws, 1251
 Public assistance, 1239, 1283

FEMALE GENITAL MUTILATION

Persecution or fear of persecution, 905, 934, 959

FIRST AMENDMENT

Brandenburg test, 191, 193
 Communist Party exclusions, 193
 Deportation challenges, 645
 Plenary power doctrine challenges, 195
 Selective prosecution claims, 190

FOREIGN ADOPTIONS

Generally, 298
 Hague Convention, 301

FOREIGN AFFAIRS POWER

Generally, 123, 148

FOREIGN AFFAIRS REFORM AND RESTRUCTURING ACT

CAT policy, 1103

FOREIGN POLICY BIAS

Admission procedures, 507
 Extended voluntary departure, 1116

FOUNDATION CASES

Generally, 133

FRANCE

Language laws, 70

FRAUDULENT MARRIAGES

Generally, 282
 Bilateral sham marriages, 283
 Conditional permanent residence, 285
 Ethical issues regarding marital status, 291
 Factual and legal validity, 282
 Failed marriages, 288
 Genuineness, 282
 Hardship waivers, 286
 Immigration Marriage Fraud Amendments, 20, 199, 284
 Interviews, intrusive, 283
 Legal and factual validity, 282
 LPR spouses, 283

FRIVOLOUS CLAIMS

Admission filings, 479
 Asylum, 1060
 Professional responsibility, 479, 687
 Visa applications, 479

GENDER

Citizenship, descent acquisition discrimination, 188, 1299
 Female genital mutilation, 905, 934, 959
 Persecution, gender and social group, 934, 946
 Race and, 108

GENERAL AGREEMENT ON TRADE IN SERVICES (GATS)

Generally, 76

GERMANY

Language laws, 70

GOALS OF IMMIGRATION POLICY

Generally, 12 et seq.
 Americanization proposals, 62
 Assimilation debate, 48
 Bilingualism, 49
 Conflicting goals of social policies, 73
 Culture and immigration laws, 38 et seq.
 Diversity, 39
 Diversity goals, 39
 Economics, this index
 Employment-based immigration, 342
 Environmental matters, 89
 Ethnic balance and ethnic revolution, 44
 Language and immigration laws, 38 et seq.
 Linguistic assimilation, 42
 Multiculturalism, 38
 National Security, this index
 Open migration proposals, 27, 32
 Politics and Immigration Law, this index
 Race and immigration laws, 38 et seq.
 Restrictionism, 44, 50

GOALS OF IMMIGRATION POLICY

—Cont'd

Social policies with conflicting goals, 73
 Social security and immigration policy, 82
 Yugoslavia, nation-state issues, 47

GREEN CARDS

Generally, 2, 250

GUANTANAMO DETAINEES

Habeas corpus, 169

GUEST WORKER PROGRAMS

Generally, 371

Bracero Programs, this index

Undocumented immigrants compared, policy considerations, 1146

HABEAS CORPUS

AEDPA limitations, 770, 775

Detainees, 157

Exclusion order challenges, 501

Guantanamo detainees, 169

IIRIRA limitations

Generally, 770, 775

Suspension Clause challenge, 782

Judicial review vehicle, 501

Jurisdictional reach of due process, 169

REAL ID Act limitations, 770, 784

Removal orders, review through, 770

Suspension Clause

Generally, 169

IIRIRA limitations, 782

HARDSHIP

See also Discretion Standards, this index

Adjustment factors, 615

Cancellation of removal, 606

Children's education factors, 615

Cumulative evidence of, 615

Extreme hardship

Generally, 606

Domestic violence cases, 608

Economic loss alone, 615

Family separation factors, 615

Financial, 610

Medical, 615

Stays of removal, 644

HEALTH

See Public Health, this index

HIGH SEAS

See also Apprehension, this index

Interdictions of vessels, 1062, 1080

Shipwrecked undocumented immigrants, 526

HISTORY OF IMMIGRATION LAW

Generally, 13

Admission processes, 463

Asian immigration, 24

Bracero Program, 377, 1141

Chinese Exclusion Act, 15

Citizenship statutes, 1289

Deportation policy, 516

English-only movements, 66

HISTORY OF IMMIGRATION LAW

—Cont'd

Excludable classes, 422

Immigration encouragement eras, 126

Immigration judges and predecessors, 660

Indentured servitude, 126

Quotas, 18

Refugees, 872

HOMELAND SECURITY ACT (HSA)

See also Department of Homeland Security, this index

Enactment, 2

HOMOSEXUALITY

See Sexual Orientation, this index

HUMAN RIGHTS

Asylum determinations, 957

Bureau of Human Rights and Humanitarian Affairs (BHRHA), 1012

Documentation of human rights conditions, 1015

Enforcement of immigration laws against undocumented immigrants, 1149

Exclusion of violators, 439

Family unification policy, 302

National security conflicts, 97

Nativism conflicts, 102

Open borders proposals, 27

Organization of American States, human rights cases, 1138

Rights/privileges distinctions, 187

State Department reports, 1011

Undocumented immigrants, enforcement of immigration laws, 1149

United Nations organs, 1139

Violations

Convention Against Torture (CAT), 1099

Exclusion grounds, 439

HUMANITARIAN CONSIDERATIONS

Discretionary standards, 632

Relief from deportation, 646

IDEOLOGY

Ethnicity vs as nation-state bonds, 48

Exclusion grounds, 436

Foreign Policy Bias, this index

Politics and Immigration Law, this index

ILLEGAL IMMIGRATION REFORM AND IMMIGRANT RESPONSIBILITY ACT (IIRIRA)

Admission, entry without, 514, 522

Cancellation of removal, 595 et seq.

Deportation and exclusion, 514

Deportation grounds changes, 420

Deportation vs exclusion, 514, 522

Detention standards, 651

Enactment, 22

Entry without admission, 514, 522

Entry/admission distinction, 537

Exclusion grounds changes, 420

Expedited removal, 506

False citizenship claims, 545

ILLEGAL IMMIGRATION REFORM AND IMMIGRANT RESPONSIBILITY ACT (IIRIRA)—Cont'd

First Offender Act (FFOA), 559

Habeas corpus limitations

Generally, 770, 775

Suspension Clause challenge, 782

Judicial review restrictions

Generally, 176

Asylum cases, 1044

Removal orders, 657, 756

Status adjustments, 511

Motions to reopen or reconsider, 755

Public assistance restrictions, 1192

Public education for undocumented immigrants, 1212

Reopen or reconsider motions, 755

Student activities monitoring, 827

Student and Exchange Visitor Information System (SEVIS), 827

Terrorist removal court, 832

Undocumented immigrants

Enforcement of immigration laws, 1148

Public education, 1212

Withholding of removal, 1083

IMMEDIATE RELATIVES

See Families, this index

IMMIGRANTS

Nonimmigrant and immigrant classifications of noncitizens generally, 7, 250, 355

See also Nonimmigrants, this index

Admission procedures, immigrant vs nonimmigrant, 470

Bill of Rights applicability to, 151

Citizenship, immigrant vs nonimmigrant rights to apply for, 250

Civil rights issues, 25

Definition, 250

Diversity Immigrants, 348

Employment-Based Immigrants, 304

Family member preferences, 255

Family unification policy, 302

Investor immigrants, preferences, 345

Moral dimensions of immigration control, 24

Open borders proposals, 27, 32

Quotas, this index

Special immigrants, preferences, 344

Status, this index

Visas, immigrant (IV), 481

Welfare benefits, immigrant vs nonimmigrant rights, 250

Work, immigrant vs nonimmigrant rights, 250

IMMIGRATION ACT OF 1990

Generally, 20

IMMIGRATION AND CUSTOMS ENFORCEMENT (ICE)

Apprehension, this index

Creation, 3

Criminal Law, this index

Memoranda of Agreement (MOA) with state law enforcement, 1275

IMMIGRATION AND NATIONALITY

ACT OF 1952

Generally, 16

See also McCarran-Walter Act, this index

IMMIGRATION AND NATURALIZATION SERVICE (INS)

Generally, 2

IMMIGRATION CONTROL

Generally, 421

See also Quotas, this index

Constitutionality, 116

Deportation grounds, 544

Diversity concerns, 348

Exclusion grounds, 431

History of, 421, 425

Moral dimensions of, 24

National security, 855 et seq.

Policy considerations, 76

IMMIGRATION INSPECTORS

Generally, 503

See also Immigration Officers, this index

Admission procedures, 503

Asylum claimants, preinspection, 1062

Asylum claims, interview rights, 507

Automated entry-exit program, 825

Consular officers and, complementary admissions roles, 508

Deportation for entry without inspection, 544

Detention authorities, 503

Document deficiencies, 506

Enhanced border enforcement measures, 845

Entry while inadmissible, 545

Entry without inspection

Generally, 505

Deportation procedure, 648

Expedited removals, 503

False citizenship claims, 545

Foreign policy cases, 507

Fraud determinations, 506

Inadmissible entries, 545

National security cases, 507

National Security Entry-Exit Registration System (NSEERS), 825

Preinspection of asylum claimants, 1062

Presence without admission deportation procedure, 648

Primary inspections, 503

Removal proceedings, detention for, 503

Student and Exchange Visitor Information System (SEVIS), 827

Terrorism cases, 508

US Visitor and Immigration Status Indication Technology System (US VISIT), 828

IMMIGRATION JUDGES (IJ)

Generally, 659
 Administrative organization, 3
 APA standards, 662
 Appeals from decisions of, 506
 Appointments, 654, 668
 Credibility determinations, 1009
 De novo bond redetermination hearing, 652
 Decisional independence, 654
 Deportability findings, 515
 Deportation hearings, 654
 Detention review
 Generally, 652
 Telephonic hearings, 652
 History of office, 660
 Judicial review of decisions of, 506
 Motion practice, 659
 Political appointments, 654, 668
 Reentry matters, jurisdiction as to, 813
 Removal hearings, 504
 Telephonic hearings, 652
 Tenure, 654

IMMIGRATION MARRIAGE FRAUD AMENDMENTS (IMFA)

Generally, 20, 284
 See also Fraudulent Marriages, this index
 Due process challenges, 199

IMMIGRATION OFFICERS

See also Immigration Inspectors, this index
 Asylum officers, 1030
 Entry without inspection deportation procedure, 648
 Expedited removal, 506
 National security restrictions on procedural safeguards, 832
 Presence without admission deportation procedure, 648
 Reentry matters, jurisdiction as to, 813
 Terrorism and procedural safeguards, 832

IMMIGRATION REFORM AND CONTROL ACT (IRCA)

Generally, 10
 Amnesty, 626, 1178
 Anti-discrimination provisions, 1171
 Labor law protections, 1223
 Preemption of state laws, 1257
 Undocumented immigrants
 Generally, 1158
 Labor law protections, 1223

IMPACTS OF IMMIGRATION

Generally, 12 et seq.
 Culture and immigration laws, 38 et seq.
 Demographics, this index
 Economics, this index
 Employment-based immigration, 332
 Environmental matters, 89
 Language and immigration laws, 38 et seq.
 National Security, this index
 Nation-state issues, 47
 Politics and Immigration Law, this index
 Race and immigration laws, 38 et seq.

IMPACTS OF IMMIGRATION—Cont'd

Social policies with conflicting goals, 73
 Social security and immigration policy, 82

IN CAMERA PROCEDURES

Exclusions on national security grounds, 164
 National security exclusions, 164
 Terrorist exclusions, 164

INADMISSIBILITY

Deportability distinction, expedited removal, 807
 Deportable noncitizens and, grounds compared, 10
 Exclusion and
 Generally, 21, 420
 See also Exclusion, this index
 Relief from, 593
 Removals and, grounds for compared, 10

INSPECTORS

See Immigration Inspectors, this index

INTERDICTION

Generally, 1062, 1080
 See also Apprehension, this index
 Asylum claimants
 Interview rights, 507
 Preinspection, 1062
 Shipwrecked undocumented immigrants, 526

INTERNATIONAL LAW

Convention Against Torture, 1095
 LPR rights under, 178, 186
 Nondiscrimination principle, 245
 Plenary power doctrine and, 245
 Refugee protection systems, 1131
 Refugees, 878
 Universal Declaration of Human Rights, 1131

INVESTIGATIONS
 Intelligence gathering, 824 et seq.
 Responsible cooperator program, 830
 Snitch visas, 830
 Voluntary interviews in terrorism investigations, 829
 Voluntary interviews of noncitizens, 829

INVESTOR IMMIGRANTS

E-2 visa treaty investors, 369
 Preferences, 345

JUDICIAL RECOMMENDATIONS AGAINST DEPORTATION (JRAD)

Generally, 572

JUDICIAL REVIEW

Abuse of discretion claims, 631
 Adjustment of status procedures, 788
 Administrative decisions, standard of review of, 612
 Administrative review. See Administrative Law, this index
 AEDPA, removal orders, 756
 Citizenship
 Loss of citizenship cases, 1369
 Naturalization denials, 1300

JUDICIAL REVIEW—Cont'd

Class actions removal order challenges, 787
 Classifications in legislation, 188
 Collateral attacks in criminal proceedings, 788
 Congressional restrictions, 507
 Consequences of judicial review, 790
 Constitutional challenges to legislation, 113, 133
 Construction of statute to achieve constitutionality, 209, 218
 Construction vs interpretation of statutes, 535
 Consular absolutism doctrine, 756
 Consular officer actions, 487, 493
 Contextual approach to statutory interpretation, 738
 Convention Against Torture claims, 1110
 Crime-related removal orders, 763
 Deference to administrative agencies
 Generally, 390
 Chevron Deference, 521, 580
 Deference to Congress
 Generally, 177, 184
 See also Plenary Power Doctrine, this index
 Deportation
 Generally, 657
 Discretionary relief, 594
 Statutory interpretations of grounds for, 519
 Detentions
 Generally, 769
 War on Terror influences, 241
 Discretionary relief from deportation, 594
 Due process standards, 176
 En banc circuit court decisions, 616
 Equal protection claims, standard of review, 1207
 Exclusion orders
 Generally, 499
 Habeas corpus challenges, 501
 Expedited removals, 507, 768
 Federal question jurisdiction
 Generally, 499
 Removal order reviews, 786
 Fee awards on review, 683
 Habeas Corpus, this index
 IIRIRA restrictions
 Generally, 176
 Asylum, 1044
 Removal orders, 657, 756
 Status adjustments, 511
 IJ credibility determinations, 1009
 Immigration judge decisions, 506
 Injunctions against removal orders, 787
 Naturalization denials, 1300
 Ninth Circuit jurisprudence, 616, 731
 Petition denials and revocations, 476
 Petitions for review, 757
 Plenary power doctrine as limitation
 Consular absolutism, 756
 Removal orders, 501, 756
 Political questions, 203, 205

JUDICIAL REVIEW—Cont'd

Politics, judicial, 731
 Prosecutorial discretion, 769
 Rational basis review of statutes, 199
 REAL ID Act
 Generally, 500
 Removal orders, 657
 Status adjustments, 511
 Reasonable, substantial, and probative evidence standard of review, 739
 Removal orders
 Generally, 500, 756 et seq.
 AEDPA restrictions, 756
 Class actions, 787
 Consolidating reviewable claims, 789
 Crime-related, 763
 Discretionary actions, 765
 Expedited removal orders, 768
 Federal question jurisdiction, 786
 Habeas Corpus, this index
 IIRIRA restrictions, 657, 756
 Injunctions, 787
 Petitions, 760
 Petitions for review, 757
 Plenary power doctrine as limitation, 501, 756
 Prosecutorial discretion, 769
 REAL ID Act restrictions, 657
 Stays, 760
 Standard of review
 Administrative decisions, 612
 Equal protection claims, 1207
 Standing to seek, 500
 Stare decisis, 187
 Status adjustment decisions, 511, 788
 Statutory interpretation principles
 Generally, 366, 521, 738
 Deportation grounds, 519
 Strict scrutiny of classifications, 1250
 Temporary protected status claims, 1118
 Theory of judicial review, 790
 Undocumented immigrants, strict scrutiny of classifications, 1250
 Vagueness challenges, moral turpitude deportations, 567
 Visa denials, 486, 493
 Voluntary departure regulations, 769
 War on Terror influences, 241

JUSTICE DEPARTMENT

See Department of Justice, this index

JUVENILES

See also Children, this index
 Detentions, 652

LABOR CERTIFICATION

See also Employment, this index
 Adverse affect considerations, 327
 Business necessity requirements, 312, 315
 Certifying Officers, 310
 Dictionary of Occupational Titles, 324
 Displacement considerations, 310
 Employment-based immigration quotas, 307
 Ethical considerations, 319

LABOR CERTIFICATION—Cont'd

Final Determinations, 312
 Fraudulent applications, 319
 Program Electronic Review Management reforms, 308, 342
 Red tape problems, 308

LABOR CONDITION APPLICATIONS (LCA)

Generally, 470

LANGUAGE

Bilingualism strategies of immigration policy, 49
 Child protection law applications, 67
 Constitutional official languages, 65
 Custody law applications, 67
 Driver's license examinations, 67
 El Cenizo ordinance, 68
 English-Only, this index
 Foreign language instruction restrictions, 66
 French language laws, 70
 German language laws, 70
 Job requirements, English-only, 68
 Linguistic assimilation, 42
 Multilingual nations, 70
 Nationhood, 61
 Nation-state issues, 47
 Self-identity and, 100
 Sign ordinances, English requirements, 68
 State official English laws, 66

LAWFUL PERMANENT RESIDENTS (LPR)

Generally, 2, 250
 See also Immigrants, this index
 Abandonment of status, 539
 Citizens and, rights compared, 178, 186, 1374, 1395
 Communist Party memberships, 177
 Conditional permanent residence, 285
 Constitutional standing, 193
 Documentary proof of status, 250
 Dual status conflicts, 178
 Family unification policy, 302
 Food stamps, 1377
 Green card proof of status, 250
 H1-B visa entrants, 373
 International law, rights under, 178, 186
 Personal Responsibility and Work Opportunity Reconciliation Act, 1377
 Procedural due process, exclusion cases, 243
 Public assistance, 1377
 Registry awards of LPR status, 625
 Relinquishment of status, 539
 Returning residents, 529
 Rights/privileges distinctions, 154, 166, 187
 Status adjustments, 509
 Supplemental Security Income (SSI), 1377
 Vested rights due process assertions, 178

LEGAL IMMIGRATION FAMILY EQUITY ACT (LIFE)

Generally, 264
 K-visas, 413

LEGAL SERVICES CORPORATION

Noncitizen representation restrictions, 505

LEGALIZATION

IRCA grant, 626, 1178
 NACARA grant, 1179
 Policy considerations, 1186

LEGISLATIVE VETOES

Generally, 204
 Cancellations of removals, 624
 Constitutionality, 201, 204
 Separation of powers, 204

LINGUISTIC ASSIMILATION

Goals of immigration policy, 42

LOOKOUT LIST

Exclusion practices, 441

MARIELITOS

Indefinite detention, 167

MARRIAGE

Families, this index
 Fraudulent Marriages, this index
 Same-Sex Marriage, this index

MCCARRAN-WALTER ACT

Exclusion grounds, 428
 Quotas, 17

MELTING POT

Mosaic metaphor compared, 60

MENTAL DISORDERS

Grounds for exclusion, 461

MERCOSUR

Open border agreements, 36

MILITARY SERVICE

Discretionary standards, 632
 Loss of citizenship through military service in foreign country, 1363
 Naturalization through, 1307
 Relief from deportation, 632

MORAL CONSIDERATIONS

Immigration control policy, 24

MORAL TURPITUDE CRIMES

Generally, 561
 AEDPA sentencing requirements, 571
 Child molestation, 569
 Crime-Related Deportation, 561
 Criminal sentences, judicial removal orders in, 810
 In absentia removal hearings, 811
 Judicial recommendations against deportation (JRAD), 572
 Judicial removal orders in criminal sentences, 810
 Judicial review of crime-related removal orders, 763
 Manslaughter, 570
 Merits of removing noncitizen criminal offenders, 587

MORAL TURPITUDE CRIMES—Cont'd

Murder, 519
 Policy considerations, 587
 Rape, 561
 Reentry, this index
 Relief from deportability, 594
 Removal of noncitizen criminal offenders, 807
 Sentencing requirements, 571
 Two crimes involving, 571
 Vagueness challenges, 567

MORALS AND MORALITY

Deportation on moral grounds, 589
 Grounds for exclusion, 461
 Naturalization moral character qualifications
 Generally, 1307
 Revocation of naturalization, 1338, 1354
 Relief from deportation, good moral character requirements, 623

MOSAIC

Melting pot metaphor compared, 60

MULTICULTURALISM

See also Culture, this index; Diversity, this index
 Assimilation tensions, 63
 Canadian, 63
 Citizenship, multicultural pressures, 1387
 Goals of immigration policy, 38
 Policy considerations, 63

NATIONAL ORIGIN

Asylum claims discrimination, 906
 Diversity, this index
 Race, this index

NATIONAL SECURITY

Generally, 816 et seq.
 See also Terrorism, this index
 Admission procedure changes, 463, 507
 Alien terrorist defined, 833
 Asylum security checks, 1031
 Automated entry-exit system, 825
 Business visitor visa waiver programs, 481
 Closed removal hearings, 835
 Communist Party memberships, 177
 Country-specific visa restrictions, 840
 Deportation grounds, 588
 Deportation hearings involving, 655
 Detentions, due process claims, 156, 163
 DHS visa process authority, 841
 Due process
 Detentions, 156, 163
 Evidentiary problem tensions, 507
 Security exclusions, 156
 Enhanced border enforcement, 845
 Entry-Exit Registration System (NSEERS), 825
 Evidentiary uses of confidential information, 832
 Exclusion grounds
 Generally, 436
 Due process, 156
 In camera procedures, 164

NATIONAL SECURITY—Cont'd

Exclusion grounds—Cont'd
 Policy problems, 163
 Expansion of removal grounds, 831
 Heightened scrutiny and delay in procedures, 841
 Human rights conflicts, 97
 Immigration control, 855 et seq.
 Intelligence gathering, 824 et seq.
 Lookout list, 441
 NSEERS, 825
 Passport authenticity standards, 843
 Pentagon/Twin Towers Bombing Investigations (PENTTBOM), 819
 Policy considerations
 Generally, 854
 Effects of September 11 attacks, 97, 817
 Preventive detention, 864
 Procedural rights restrictions after September 11 attack, 832
 Profiling, 845
 Refugees, effect of procedural delay on, 844
 Removal hearings involving, 655
 Responsible cooperator program, 830
 Secret evidence hearings, 837
 September 11 attacks, effect on immigration policy, 97, 817
 Snitch visas, 411, 830
 Student and Exchange Visitor Information System (SEVIS), 827
 Technological innovations, 842
 Tourist visa waiver programs, 481
 US Visitor and Immigration Status Indication Technology System (US VISIT), 828
 USA PATRIOT Act certification program, 822
 Visa procedures
 Generally, 840
 Waiver restrictions, 842
 Voluntary interviews of noncitizens, 829
 Withholding of removal, 1107

NATIONALS

Citizens distinguished, 6
 Definition, 6

NATIONHOOD

Ethnicity and, 60
 Language and, 61

NATION-STATES

Impacts of immigration on, 47

NATIVISM

Generally, 47, 55
 English-Only, this index
 Federalism issues, undocumented immigrants, 1241
 Human rights conflicts, 102
 Politics and immigration, 92
 Racism aspects, 62
 Volatile issues, 93

POLICY CONSIDERATIONS—Cont'd

Culture—Cont'd
 Demographic balance, 49
 Nation-state issues, 47
 Demographic balance
 Generally, 85
 Culture and race, 49
 Deportation, relief from, 593, 646
 Deportation vs lesser sanctions
 Generally, 517
 Merits of removing noncitizen criminal offenders, 587
 Discretionary deferrals of action, 630
 Discrimination, inevitability of, 84
 Displacement concerns
 Educational nonimmigrants, 395
 Employment-based immigration, 310
 Diversity
 Generally, 348
 Assimilation, 48
 Goals of immigration policy, 39
 Dual nationality and dual citizenship, 1319
 Economic migrants, 870, 1064
 Employment impacts of immigration, 28
 Employment-based immigration, 332
 English-only movement, 70
 English-only ordinances, 66
 Ethnicity
 Balance and ethnic revolution, 44
 Ideology vs as nation-state bonds, 48
 Nationhood and, 60
 Quotas, 39
 Executive vs legislative powers, 587
 Family unification policy, 302
 Foreign policy powers and, 124
 Formal discretionary relief, 630
 Goals of Immigration Policy, this index
 Guest worker programs vs undocumented immigrant labor, 1146
 History of deportation policy, 516
 Ideology, ethnicity vs as nation-state bonds, 48
 Immigration Act of 1990, 20
 Immigration laws and segregation, 33
 Impacts of Immigration, this index
 Judicial review, 502
 Labor market impacts of immigrants, 71
 Language, 38 et seq.
 Language laws, 70
 Latino immigration and restrictionism, 50
 Linguistic assimilation, 42
 McCarran-Walter Act quotas, 17
 Melting pot and mosaic metaphors, 60
 Moral dimensions of immigration control, 24
 Moral turpitude crimes, 587
 Multiculturalism
 Generally, 38
 Assimilation tensions, 63
 National origin quota system, 39
 National security and immigration, 854, 864
 Nationhood, ethnicity and, 60
 Nation-states, impacts of immigration on, 47
 Nativism, 47

POLICY CONSIDERATIONS—Cont'd

Nonimmigrants, purpose-based admissions policies, 355
 Open borders proposals, 27, 32
 Opinion polls, 94
 Persecution or fear of persecution, 968
 Politics and Immigration Law, this index
 Preferences, 253
 Preventive detention, 864
 Private immigration bills, 628
 Profiling, 850
 Property law analogies, 36
 Quotas
 Generally, 16
 Ethnic goals, 39
 Immigration and Nationality Act of 1952, 16
 McCarran-Walter Act, 17
 National origin system, 39
 Race
 Generally, 38 et seq.
 Demographic balance, 49
 Nation-state issues, 47
 Restrictionism, 50
 Tribalism, 47
 Refugees
 Generally, 870
 Temporary protected status, 21
 World War II, 16
 Relief from deportation, 593, 646
 Restrictionism
 Generally, 44
 Latino immigration, 50
 Race, 50
 Segregation and immigration laws, 33
 Separation of powers, 587
 September 11 attacks, effect on immigration policy, 817
 Skilled vs unskilled immigration, 78, 82
 Status adjustments, 509
 Strategies of Immigration Law, this index
 Temporary protected status, 21, 1114, 1124
 Terminology and policy, 1140
 Terrorism and procedural safeguards, 864
 Treaty investor admissions, 371
 Tribalism, 47
 Undocumented immigrant labor vs guest worker programs, 1146
 Undocumented immigrants
 Amnesty, 1186
 Legalization proposals, 1178
 Visa denials, judicial review, 502
 World War II refugees, 16
 Yugoslavia and multiculturalism, 45
POLITICAL QUESTIONS
 Nonjusticiability of, 203, 205
POLITICS AND IMMIGRATION LAW
 Arab and Muslim discrimination following September 11 attack, 110
 Asylum, prosecution for political vs criminal activities, 907, 1024
 Asylum procedure, political bias in, 1032

POLITICS AND IMMIGRATION LAW
—Cont'd

California Proposition 187
Generally, 93, 1193
Federalism issues, 1283
Child asylum claimants, 1036
Deportation on political grounds
Generally, 588
Border changes and destination objections, 639
Ethnic coalitions, 95
Exclusion on political grounds for, 436
Foreign policy bias
Admission procedures, 507
Extended voluntary departure, 1116
Immigrant power bases, 95
Immigration judge appointments, 654, 668
Judicial politics, 731
Nativism pressures, 92
Naturalization influences, 1304
Opinion polls, 94
Party politics and immigration policies, 96
Private immigration bills, 628
Race and politics, 91
Volatility, 93

POPULATION

See also Demographics, this index
Bureau of Population, Refugees, and Migration (PRM), 4
Environmental implications, 89

PREEMPTION OF STATE LAWS

See Federalism Issues, this index

PREFERENCES, QUOTAS

Generally, 250 et seq.
See also Priorities, Quota, this index
Child Status Protection Act, 265
Children
Generally, 291
Legitimacy issues, 188, 295
Commercial categories, 358 et seq., 391
Diversity immigrants, 348
Employment skill preferences, 254
Employment-based immigration
Generally, 304 et seq.
Adverse affect considerations, 327
Displacement considerations, 310
Labor certification, 307
Policy considerations, 332
Failed marriages, 288
Family immigrants, 255, 262 et seq.
Family-sponsored second preference status, 282
Fifth preference immigrants, 345
Fourth preference immigrants, 344
Fraudulent marriages, 282
Immediate relative status, 282
Immigrants
Generally, 250 et seq.
Child Status Protection Act, 265
Children, above
Policy considerations, 253
Selections within categories, 259

PREFERENCES, QUOTAS—Cont'd

Immigrants—Cont'd
Special immigrants, preferences, 344
Spouses of citizens, 267 et seq.
Investor immigrants, 345
Labor certification, employment-based immigration, 307
Nonimmigrants
Generally, 355 et seq.
Commercial categories, 358 et seq., 391
Occupational skills, 8
Parents, 291
Parole exemptions from quotas, 252
Policy considerations, 253
Quotas, preferences within, 8
Refugees, 878, 881
Second preference status, family-sponsored, 282
Special immigrants, 344
Spouses of citizens
Generally, 267 et seq.
Failed marriages, 288
Fiancé visas, 407
Nonimmigrant spouse visas, 413
Status adjustments, 510

PRIVACY RIGHTS

Family Educational Rights and Privacy Act (FERPA), 827
Fraudulent marriage interviews, intrusive, 283
Search and seizure procedures, 729
Voluntary interviews in terrorism investigations, 829

PRIVATE IMMIGRATION BILLS

Political considerations, 628

PRIVILEGES/RIGHTS DISTINCTIONS

Constitutional law, 154, 166
Human rights law view, 187

PROCESSING DELAY

Admission procedures, 475
Asylum processing, 1033
Child visa applicants, aging out, 264
Labor certification, 308
National security heightened scrutiny and, 841, 844
Naturalization, streamlining procedures, 1303
Refugees, effect of procedural delay on, 844
Removal proceedings delays, 607
Visa applications
Generally, 475
Group processing, 488

PROFESSIONAL RESPONSIBILITY

Generally, 672
See also Attorney and Client, this index
Authorization to practice, 670
Discipline of immigration practitioners, 684
Ethical Practice, this index
Finding lawyers for the indigent, 672
Frivolous behavior

PROFESSIONAL RESPONSIBILITY

- Cont'd
- Frivolous behavior—Cont'd
 - Generally, 687
 - Filings, 479
- Immigration judges, political appointments, 668
- Ineffective assistance of counsel
 - Generally, 689
 - Private vs appointed counsel, 698
- Sanctions, 684
- Unauthorized practice
 - Generally, 478
 - Deportation proceedings, 669

PROFILING

- Generally, 845
- Discrimination and, 846
- Egregious procedure findings, 729
- Equal protection, 847
- National security measures, 845
- Policy determinations, 850
- Voluntary interviews of noncitizens, 829

PROGRAM ELECTRONIC REVIEW MANAGEMENT (PERM)

- Labor certification reforms, 308, 342

PROPERTY LAW

- Asian immigration discrimination, 109
- Immigration law analogies, 36

PROSECUTORIAL DISCRETION

- Generally, 769
- See also Discretion Standards, this index

PUBLIC ASSISTANCE

- Citizenship and welfare reform, 1377
- Deportations, public charge, 589
- Deportations of public charges, 589
- Equal protection claims, undocumented immigrants, 1244
- Food stamps, 1377
- IIRIRA restrictions, 1192
- Immigrant vs nonimmigrant rights, 250
- Personal Responsibility and Work Opportunity Reconciliation Act, 1377
- Supplemental Security Income (SSI), 1377
- Undocumented immigrants
 - Generally, 1192
 - Equal protection claims, 1244
 - Federalism issues, 1239, 1283
- Welfare reform, 1377

PUBLIC HEALTH

- Authority of Public Health Service, 4
- Deportability, health-related, 589
- Deportation on health-related grounds, 589
- Grounds for exclusion, 461
- Mental disorders grounds for exclusion, 461
- Physical disorder grounds for exclusion, 461

QUOTAS

- See Preferences, Quotas, this index

RACE

- Arab and Muslim discrimination following September 11 attack, 110
- Asian immigrants, discrimination against, 109
- Chinese Exclusion Act, racial impetus, 244
- Chinese Exclusion Case, 127
- Citizenship value variations, 56
- Civil rights legislation, effects of, 49
- Demographic balance, 49
- Diversity Immigrants, this index
- Ethnic balances in immigration goals, 44
- Fertility rates and population growth, 86
- Gender and, 108
- Immigration policies and, 38 et seq.
- Nation-state issues, 47
- Nativism and racism, 47, 55, 62
- Opinion polls on immigration policy, 94
- Politics and, 91
- Profiling
 - Generally, 108, 846
 - Egregious procedure findings, 729
- Restrictionism, 50
- Segregation and immigration laws, 33
- Tribalism, 47

REAL ID ACT

- Asylum procedure, 1037
- Convention Against Torture claims, 1110
- Deportations, terrorism, 589
- Drivers' licenses, 1226
- Habeas corpus limitations, 770, 784
- Judicial review
 - Generally, 500
 - Removal orders, 657
 - Status adjustments, 511
- Terrorism deportations, 589
- Undocumented immigrants, drivers' licenses, 1226

RED TAPE

- See Processing Delay, this index

REENTRY

- Criminal reentry, 812
- Discretionary standards and, 195
- Expedited removal, 812
- IIRIRA continuous presence requirement, 604
- IJ vs immigration officer jurisdiction, 813
- Inadmissible at time of, 542
- LPR reentries, 604
- LPR returns as entries, 529
- Permits, reentry, 539
- Voluntary departure, reentry after, 812

REFOULEMENT

- See Nonrefoulement, this index

REFUGEES

- Generally, 869 et seq.
- See also Asylum, this index
- Asylee and refugee status, 907
- Asylum program quotas, 9

REFUGEES—Cont'd

Bureau of Population, Refugees, and Migration (PRM), 4
 Changed conditions affecting asylum claims, 1015
 Child asylum claimants, 1036
 Convention Against Torture, this index
 Credibility determinations, 960, 1005
 Criminal offender exceptions to asylum eligibility, 1016, 1021
 Definition, 891, 901
 Demographics, 869
 Detention of asylum claimants, 1056
 Displaced Persons Act, 16
 Domestic violence and asylum claims, 974
 Economic migrants, 870, 1064
 Eligibility for asylum
 Generally, 892 et seq.
 Exceptions, 1016
 Employment authorizations, 1060
 Expedited removal, 507, 1052
 Firm resettlement exception to asylum eligibility, 1016
 Gender-related claims, 945
 Geneva Convention, 880
 High seas interdictions of vessels, 1062, 1080
 History of immigration law, 872
 Human rights standards applicable to asylum determinations, 957
 Internally displaced persons (IDP), 869
 International law, 878
 National security restrictions on procedural safeguards, 844
 Nonimmigrant status, 8
 Non-state actor persecution, 974, 983
 Office of Refugee Resettlement, this index
 Offshore and onshore, 872, 1095
 Other international law protection systems, 1131
 Overseas refugees
 Generally, 872
 Program quotas, 9
 Past wrongdoing exception to asylum eligibility, 1017
 Persecution or Fear of Persecution, this index
 Policy considerations, 870
 Preferences, 878, 881
 Probability of actual persecution, 1000
 Procedure for claiming asylum
 Generally, 1029 et seq.
 See also Asylum, this index
 Proof standards, 999
 Quotas
 Generally, 878, 881
 Asylum program, 9
 Overseas refugee program, 9
 Rape-related asylum claims, 959
 Refoulement, 893, 1075
 Refugees sur place, 929
 Relevant evidence of persecution, 1005
 Safe third country restrictions on asylum, 1046

REFUGEES—Cont'd

State Department evidence as to persecution conditions, 1011
 Statelessness, 1320
 Statutory standards for asylum, 897
 Temporary protection
 Generally, 21
 See also Temporary Protected Status, this index
 Convention refugees compared, 1122
 Terrorism and procedural safeguards, 844
 UN High Commissioner for Refugees (UNHCR), 12, 880, 1014
 Universal Declaration of Human Rights, 1131
 Withholding of Removal, this index
 World War II, 16

REGISTRY

LPR status awards, 625

RELIEF FROM DEPORTABILITY

Deportation and removal, use of terms, 648
 Generally, 593 et seq., 652
 Adjustment of status, 626
 Border changes and destination objections, 639
 Cancellation of removal, 595 et seq.
 Cancellation of Removal, this index
 Citizenship defense to removal, 645
 Constitutional challenges to deportation, 645
 Criminal convictions, 594
 Deferred action, 629
 Destination objections, 638
 Discretionary standards, 623
 Disqualified groups, 623
 Documentation, 594
 Estoppel defenses, 646
 Evidentiary standards, 594
 Extended voluntary departure (EVD), 637
 Good moral character requirements, 623
 Hardship, 606
 Hearings on applications, 656
 Humanitarian relief, 646
 Ineffective assistance of counsel defense, 689, 698
 Investigations, 594
 IRCA amnesty, 626
 Judicial review of discretionary relief, 594
 Legalization of status, 626
 Legislative vetoes of cancellations, 624
 Limited relief, 629
 NACARA cancellations, 603, 624
 National security restrictions on procedural safeguards, 832
 Objections to destination, 638
 Part A cancellation, 595
 Part B cancellation, 595, 602
 Persecution or Fear of Persecution, this index
 Plea bargain promises of nonremoval, 811
 Policy considerations, 593, 646
 Prima facie eligibility for suspension, 612
 Private immigration bills, 627
 Quotas, relief, 603

RELIEF FROM DEPORTABILITY

—Cont'd

Refusal to accept a deportee, 643
 Registry awards of LPR status, 625
 Stays of removal, 644
 Suspension of deportation, 602
 Temporary protected status (TPS), 637
 Terrorism and procedural safeguards, 832
 Voluntary departure, 633
 Withholding of Removal, this index

REMOVAL GROUNDS

See Deportability Grounds, this index
 See Exclusion, this index

REMOVAL HEARINGS

Generally, 504, 654 et seq.
 Deportation and removal, use of terms, 648
 Administrative removal of aggravated felons, 809
 Admissible evidence, 712, 728
 AEDPA removal proceedings, 813
 Appeals from immigration judge decisions, 506
 Burden of proof, 505, 655, 732
 Closed, 655, 835
 Criminal cases, 807 et seq.
 Definition, 3
 Deportation and removal, use of terms, 648
 Detention
 Generally, 650
 Aggravated felony, 225, 239
 Border detentions for deportation, 503
 Deportability concessions, 241
 No realistic chance of deportation, detention and, 208
 Removal period and post-removal period detentions, 206
 Standards, 651, 652
 USA PATRIOT Act standards, 651
 Evidence
 Confidential information, 832
 Secret evidence hearings, 837
 Terrorism and procedural safeguards, 832
 Expedited removal, 506
 Grounds for removal. See Deportability Grounds, this index
 Illegally obtained statements, 730
 Immigration judges, 654
 In absentia removal hearings, 811
 Mock hearing exercise, 790 et seq.
 National security matters, 655
 National security restrictions on procedural safeguards, 832
 Notices to appear, 504, 515
 Plea-bargained voluntary departures, 811
 Prison removal hearings, 807
 Procedural due process, 243
 Procedures. See Deportation Procedure, this index
 Public access
 Generally, 655
 Closed hearings, 835
 Public attendance, 655

REMOVAL HEARINGS—Cont'd

Reasonable, substantial, and probative evidence, 738
 Reentry, this index
 Relief applications, 656
 Relief From Deportability, this index
 Reopen or reconsider motions, 754
 Right to counsel, 505
 Rules of procedure, 504
 Secret evidence hearings, 837
 Self-incrimination privilege, 730
 Suppression of evidence, 712, 728
 Temporary protected status claims, 1117
 Terrorism and procedural safeguards, 832
 Terrorist removal court, 832
 Terrorist removal proceedings, 813
 Transcripts, 655
 Translations, 174, 656
 Trial attorneys, 654
 Withholding of Removal, this index

REMOVAL ORDERS

Deportation and removal, use of terms, 648
 Administrative removal of aggravated felons, 809
 Administrative review
 Generally, 657
 Consolidating reviewable claims, 789
 BIA review, 506
 Border changes and destination objections, 639
 Cancellation of Removal, this index
 Citizenship defense, 645
 Crime-related orders, judicial review, 763
 Criminal cases, 807 et seq.
 Criminal law violations, judicial review, 788
 Criminal sentences, judicial removal orders in, 810
 Deportation and removal, use of terms, 648
 Discretionary cancellation, 623
 Exclusion orders, 501
 Execution, 658
 Expedited Removal, this index
 Good moral character requirements for cancellation, 623
 Grounds for removal. See Deportability Grounds, this index
 Hardship cancellations, 606
 In absentia removal hearings, 811
 Inadmissibility and removal, grounds for compared, 10
 Judicial removal orders in criminal sentences, 810
 Judicial review
 See Judicial Review, this index
 Marriages during removal periods, 290
 NACARA cancellations of removal, 603, 624
 Periods, removal, 206
 Petitions for judicial review, 760
 Plea-bargained voluntary departures, 811
 Prima facie eligibility for suspension, 612
 Procedures. See Deportation Procedure, this index
 Reentry, this index

REMOVAL ORDERS—Cont'd

Registry awards of LPR status, 625
 Reinstatement of prior orders, 812
 Relief From Deportability, this index
 Reopen or reconsider motions, 754
 Stays
 Generally, 644
 Judicial review, stay pending, 760
 Suspension of deportation, 602
 Terrorism cases, special removal procedures, 508
 Terrorist removal proceedings, 813
 Voluntary departure and removal compared, 10
 Withholding of removal
 Generally, 892, 1030
 See also Asylum, this index

REMOVAL PROCEDURE

See Deportation Procedure, this index

RESTRICTIONISM

Generally, 44, 50

RIGHT TO COUNSEL

Generally, 673, 678
 Authorization to practice, 670
 Constitutional right, 673, 678
 Criminal proceedings, 678
 Deportation procedures, 654, 668
 Effective assistance of counsel
 Generally, 689
 Private vs appointed counsel, 698
 Fees, Equal Access to Justice Act (EAJA), 683
 Finding lawyers for the indigent, 672
 Legal Services Corporation restrictions, 505
 Miranda rights of detainees, 652
 National security restrictions on procedural safeguards, 834
 Pro bono legal services, 681
 Procedural due process, 174
 Removal hearings, 505
 Terrorism and procedural safeguards, 834

RIGHTS/PRIVILEGES DISTINCTIONS

Constitutional law, 154, 166
 Human rights law view, 187

RULES OF PROCEDURE

Removal hearings, 504

SAME-SEX MARRIAGE

Constitutional issues, 274
 Defense of Marriage Act, 274
 Equal protection issues, 276
 Family immigration quotas and preferences, 267

SANCTIONS

Generally, 10
 On employers, 1158

SEAMEN

See Crew Members, this index

SEARCHES AND SEIZURES

Constitutionality of procedures, 729

SEGREGATION

Immigration laws and, 33

SELF-INCRIMINATION PRIVILEGE

Compelled testimony at deportation hearings, 742
 Deportation proceedings, 730

SEMANTICS

See Terminology, this index

SEPARATION OF POWERS

Judicial Review, this index
 Legislative Vetoes, this index
 Plenary Power Doctrine, this index
 Policy considerations, 587

SEPTEMBER 11 ATTACKS

See also National Security, this index; Terrorism, this index
 Pentagon/Twin Towers Bombing Investigations (PENTTBOM), 819
 Policy affected by, 817
 Procedural rights restrictions after, 832
 Undocumented immigrants, border enforcement after, 1152

SERVICE OF PROCESS

See Notices to Appear, this index

SEXUAL ORIENTATION

Exclusion, 271, 280
 Persecution or fear of persecution, 905, 940

SHIPWRECKED IMMIGRANTS

Entry/admission distinction, 526

SKILLED IMMIGRANTS

Unskilled vs, policy considerations, 78, 82

SMUGGLING

Crime-related deportation, 590

SOCIAL SECURITY

Immigration policy affects, 82

SPECIAL IMMIGRANTS

Preferences, 344

SPECIAL REMOVAL

Terrorism cases, 508

SPOUSES

Families, this index
 Marriage, this index

STATE ACTORS

Asylum law, 974, 978
 Convention Against Torture (CAT), 1105
 Government obligation to control private actors, 1105
 Nonrefoulement, 1137

STATE DEPARTMENT

See Department of State, this index

STATE LAWS

Chinese immigration discrimination, 127
 Citizenship classifications, 1376
 Commerce clause powers of federal government, 116
 Discrimination against noncitizens, 1376
 El Cenizo ordinance, 68
 Federal law and, 2, 14
 Federalism Issues, this index
 Limits to federal immigration power, 132 et seq.
 Official English laws, 66
 Preemption. See Federalism Issues, this index
 Residual state Constitutional powers, 130
 Sign ordinances, English requirements, 68
 Undocumented immigrants
 Drivers' licenses, 1225
 Federal law enforcement efforts, 1153
 Federal/state Memoranda of Agreement (MOA), 1274
 Landlord-tenant law, 1258
 Resident tuition, 1209
 Rights deprivations, 1187 et seq.

STATELESSNESS

Generally, 1320

STATUS

Adjustment of Status, this index
 Asylee and refugee status, 907
 Burden of proof of, 17
 Changes of status of nonimmigrants, 9
 Child Status Protection Act, 265
 Citizenship, this index
 Discretionary non-priority status, 630
 Failure to maintain as grounds for deportation, 586
 Immigrants, this index
 Lawful Permanent Residents, this index
 Nonimmigrants, this index
 Overstayers, this index
 Refugees, this index
 Temporary Protected Status, this index
 Undocumented Immigrants, this index

STAYS

Removal, stays of, 644, 760

STRATEGIES OF IMMIGRATION LAW

Generally, 12 et seq.
 Americanization proposals, 62
 Assimilation debate, 48
 Bilingualism, 49
 Culture and immigration laws, 38 et seq.
 Demographic considerations, 85
 Diversity vs national origin quotas, 39
 Economics, this index
 Environmental matters, 89
 Language and immigration laws, 38 et seq.
 National Security, this index
 Nation-state issues, 47
 Net profit approach, 85
 Open migration proposals, 27, 32
 Politics and Immigration Law, this index

STRATEGIES OF IMMIGRATION LAW

—Cont'd

Race and immigration laws, 38 et seq.
 Restrictionism, 44, 50
 Social security and immigration policy, 82
 Temporary protected status, 1122
 Undocumented immigrants
 Alternatives to illegal immigration, 1232
 Self-deportation, 1187
 Visa auction proposals, 83

STUDENTS

Education, this index
 Nonimmigrants, this index

SUMMARY EXCLUSION

Generally, 506
 See also Expedited Removal, this index

SURREPTITIOUS ENTRY

Generally, 544

SUSPENSION OF DEPORTATION

Prima facie eligibility, 612

TEMPORARY PROTECTED STATUS (TPS)

Generally, 1114 et seq.
 Adjustments of status, 1118
 Administrative review of claims, 1117
 Convention refugees and TPS compared, 1122
 Country-specific legislation, 1120
 Creation of program, 1117
 Discretionary standards, 1119
 Duration of temporary protection, 1126
 Eligibility requirements, 1117
 Extended voluntary departure, blanket grants compared, 1115
 Family unity issues, 1127
 Global approaches, 1120
 Judicial review, 1118
 Policy considerations, 1114, 1124
 Refugees, 21
 Regional approaches, 1120
 Registration requirements, 1118
 Relief from deportation, 637
 Removal proceeding claims, 1117
 Safe haven legislative bills, 1117
 Strategies of immigration policy, 1122
 Withdrawal of status, 1118

TEMPORARY WORKERS

See also Guest Worker Programs, this index
 Nonimmigrant status, 7, 371

TERMINOLOGY

Admission, 522
 Alien, 1, 1140
 Amnesty, 1178
 Deportation, 648
 Entry, 522
 Exclusion, 514, 522
 Illegal alien, 1, 1140
 Lawful permanent residents, 2, 250
 Policy and terminology, 1140

TERMINOLOGY—Cont'd

Removal, 648
Undocumented immigrant, 1140

TERRORISM

Generally, 816 et seq.
See also National Security, this index
Admission procedure changes, 503
Admission procedures in terrorism cases, 508
AEDPA removal proceedings, 813
Alien terrorist defined, 833
Automated entry-exit system, 825
Closed removal hearings, 835
Counterterrorism laws, removal grounds, 194
Country-specific visa restrictions, 840
Deportations, 589
Detention cases, judicial review influences, 241
DHS visa process authority, 841
Enhanced border enforcement, 845
European Union practices, 868
Evidentiary uses of confidential information, 832
Exclusion vs deportation, 589
Exclusions based on terrorism, 443
Expansion of removal grounds, 831
Habeas corpus suspension clause, 169
Heightened scrutiny and delay in procedures, 841
In camera exclusion procedures, 164
Inadmissibility vs deportation, 589
Indefinite detentions, 169
Intelligence gathering, 824 et seq.
Judicial review of detention cases, 241
Likely to engage, 589
Material support offenses, 444, 447
National Security Entry-Exit Registration System (NSEERS), 825
Nonimmigrants, effect on admissions, 355
Overstayers, terrorist, 866
Passport authenticity standards, 843
Pentagon/Twin Towers Bombing Investigations (PENTTBOM), 819
Policy considerations, 854
Policy effects of September 11 attacks, 97
Preventive detention, 864
Procedural rights restrictions after September 11 attack, 832
Profiling, 845
Refugees, effect of procedural delay on, 844
Removal court, terrorist, 832
Removal grounds, counterterrorism laws, 194
Removal proceedings, 813
Representatives of organizations, 589
Responsible cooperator program, 830
Secret evidence hearings, 837
September 11 attacks, effect on immigration policy, 817
Snitch visas, 411, 830
State sponsors of terrorism, visa restrictions, 840
Student and Exchange Visitor Information System (SEVIS), 827
Technological innovations, 842

TERRORISM—Cont'd

US VISIT intelligence gathering, 824
US Visitor and Immigration Status Indication Technology System (US VISIT), 828
USA PATRIOT Act certification program, 822
Visa procedures
 Generally, 840
 Waiver restrictions, 842
Voluntary interviews of noncitizens, 829

TORTURE

See Convention Against Torture, this index

TOURISTS

Nonimmigrant status, 7
Visa waivers, 481

TRADERS

E-1 treaty traders, 368

TRAFFICKING

Generally, 411
Palermo Protocol, 1157
Trafficking Victims Protection Act visas, 412
Undocumented immigrants, trafficking in, 1157

TRANSLATION

Deportation hearings, 656
Procedural due process, 174

TREATY INVESTORS

E-2 visas, 369

TREATY LAW

Generally, 1097
Arbitration, 1111

TREATY TRADERS

E-1 visas, 368

UN HIGH COMMISSIONER FOR REFUGEES (UNHCR)

Generally, 12, 880, 1014

UNAUTHORIZED PRACTICE

Generally, 478
Deportation proceedings, 669

UNDOCUMENTED IMMIGRANTS

Generally, 1140 et seq.
Amnesty
 Generally, 1178
 Policy considerations, 1186
Apprehensions, state law enforcement, 1275
Attorney General appointment controversies, 1158
Borders, law enforcement at, 1147
Bracero Program, 377, 1141
Citizenship of children by birth
 Generally, 1333
 Constitutional amendment proposals, 1292
Convention on the Protection of the Rights of all Migrant Workers, 1224

UNDOCUMENTED IMMIGRANTS

—Cont'd

Criminal justice system impacts, 1146
 Criminal law, state policing efforts, 1274
 Demographics, 1141, 1143
 Drivers' licenses, 1225
 Economic impact, 1144
 Employer influences, 1142, 1163
 Employer offenses
 Generally, 1158 et seq.
 Alternative strategies, 1232
 Discrimination concerns, 1171
 E-Verify program, 1161
 Exploitation concerns, 1163
 State laws, federal preemption, 1251
 Enforcement of immigration laws, 1147
 Equal protection claims
 Federalism issues, 1244
 Strict scrutiny of classifications, 1250
 Equal protection rights
 Public education, 1193
 E-Verify program, 1161
 Exploitation, 1144
 Federalism issues
 Generally, 1238 et seq., 1256
 Employer sanctions, 1251
 Equal protection claims, 1244, 1250
 IRCA, 1257
 Landlord-tenant law, 1258
 Nativism pressures, 1241
 Preemption of state laws, 1251
 Public assistance, 1239, 1283
 Federal/state conflicts, 1146
 Forfeiture enforcement of immigration laws, 1148
 Guest worker programs compared, policy considerations, 1146
 Harboring offenses, 1156
 Human rights issues in enforcement of immigration laws, 1149
 Identity theft offenses, 1156
 IIRIRA enforcement of immigration laws, 1148
 Immigration offenses, 1153
 Immigration Reform and Control Act, 1158
 Income tax law compliance, 1145
 IRCA amnesty, 1178
 Labor law protections, 1213, 1224
 Legal and social identities, 1187
 Legalization policy considerations, 1186
 Legalization proposals, 1178
 Memoranda of Agreement (MOA) with state law enforcement, 1274
 Migrant workers protection convention, 1224
 NACARA amnesty, 1179
 Preemption of state laws
 Employer sanctions, 1251
 Federalism issues, 1251
 Public assistance
 Generally, 1192
 Equal protection claims, 1244
 Federalism issues, 1239, 1283
 Public education
 Generally, 93, 1193

UNDOCUMENTED IMMIGRANTS

—Cont'd

Public education—Cont'd
 Federalism issues, 1283
 IIRIRA, 1212
 Tuition charges, 1210, 1212
 REAL ID Act, 1226
 Rights of, 1187
 Seizure enforcement of immigration laws, 1148
 Self-deportation strategy, 1187
 September 11 attacks and border enforcement, 1152
 Shipwrecked, 526
 Social and legal identities, 1187
 State laws
 Generally, 1153
 Landlord-tenant law, 1258
 Rights deprivations, 1187 et seq.
 State policing efforts, 1274
 States, fiscal impacts, 1145
 Strategies
 Alternatives to illegal immigration, 1232
 Self-deportation, 1187
 Terminology, 1140
 Theories of immigration law, 1142
 Trafficking offenses, 1157
 USA PATRIOT Act enforcement of immigration laws, 1149

UNIVERSAL DECLARATION OF HUMAN RIGHTS

Refugee protection systems, 1131

UNLAWFUL ACTIVITIES

See also Criminal Law, this index
 Grounds for exclusion, 440, 455

USA PATRIOT ACT

Certification program, 822
 Detention standards, 651
 Enhanced border enforcement measures, 845
 Student activities monitoring, 827
 Undocumented immigrants, enforcement of immigration laws, 1149

VIENNA CONVENTION ON CONSULAR RELATIONS

Detention procedures, 653

VISAS

See also Nonimmigrants, this index
 Abbreviations used by consular officers, 485
 Administrative Procedure Act, applicability to visa application procedures, 498
 Administrative review of visa decisions, proposal for, 491
 Adverse decisions of petitions, 474
 Applications, 480
 Approvals, 470
 Attorney representation of applicants, 484
 Automatic revocations of petition approvals, 476
 B-1 visas, 358

VISAS—Cont'd

B-2 visas
 Generally, 404
 Batching of visa applications, 488
 Business visitor waiver program, 481
 Country-specific restrictions, 840
 Denial records, 486
 Department of Homeland Security authority, 4, 485, 841
 Department of State authority, 4
 Discretion accorded consular officers, 485, 487, 499
 Domestic violence applications, 473
 E-2 visa treaty investors, 369
 E-1 visa treaty traders, 368
 Economic stereotyping by consular officers, 485
 Employment applications, 9
 Expiration, 484
 F-1 and F-2 visas, 356
 Family relationships visa petitions, 8
 Frivolous filings, 479
 Group processing of visa applications, 488
 H-2 temporary worker nonimmigrant visas, 377
 H-3 trainee worker nonimmigrant visas, 386
 H-1B temporary worker nonimmigrant visas, 372
 H-2B visas, 360
 Ineligibilities, 430
 Ineligible to receive, 420
 J-1 and J-2 students, 398
 Judicial review
 Denials, 476, 486, 493
 Revocations, 476
 K-3 and K-4 visas, 408
 K-visas, Legal Immigration Family Equity Act, 413
 L temporary worker nonimmigrant visas, 388, 391
 National security restrictions
 Generally, 840
 Waivers, 481, 842
 National Visa Center (NVC), 475
 Nonimmigrant visas (NIV), 481
 ● visas for temporary nonimmigrant workers, 372
 Overstayers, visa extension restrictions, 419
 P visas for temporary nonimmigrant workers, 372
 Petitions
 Generally, 471
 Denials and revocations, judicial review rights, 476
 Documentation, 475
 Family relationships, 8
 Filing dates and priorities, 474
 Nonimmigrants, 9
 Policy considerations, 502
 Profiling by consular officers, 485, 500
 Racial stereotyping by consular officers, 485
 Reciprocal visa waivers, 481
 Red tape problems, 475

VISAS—Cont'd

Residents, immigrant visa requirements, 508
 Responsible cooperator program, 830
 Review board proposals, 491
 Revocations of petition approvals, 476
 S visa program, 411, 830
 Self petitioners, 472
 Snitch visas, 411, 830
 State sponsors of terrorism, visa restrictions, 840
 Status adjustments, 508
 Tourist visas
 Generally, 404
 Waivers, 481
 Trafficking Victims Protection Act, 412
 Transit without visa (TRWOV) privileges, 524
 T-visas, 412
 V-visas, 413
 Waivers
 Generally, 481
 Business visitors, 481
 Electronic System for Travel Authorization (ESTA), 843
 National security restrictions, 481, 842
 Reciprocity agreements, 481
 Tourists, 481

VISITOR AND IMMIGRATION STATUS INDICATION TECHNOLOGY SYSTEM (US VISIT)

Generally, 828

VISITORS

See Nonimmigrants, this index

VOLUNTARY DEPARTURE

Generally, 633
 Deportation, voluntary departure to avoid, 633
 Extended Voluntary Departure, this index
 Judicial review of regulations, 769
 National security restrictions on procedural safeguards, 834
 Reentry after, 812
 Terrorism and procedural safeguards, 834

WAIVERS

Asylum, waivers of terrorism exclusions, 450
 Deportability, waivers of specific grounds, 515
 Exclusion grounds waivers, 430, 441, 450
 Families, hardship waivers, 286
 National security visa waiver restrictions, 842
 Nonimmigrant admissions, 8
 Visas, this index

WARRANTS

Generally, 649

WELFARE

See also Public Assistance, this index
 Public charge deportations, 589

WITHHOLDING OF REMOVAL

Generally, 892, 1030
Asylum, this index
Convention Against Torture, 1107 Criminal law matters, 1107
National security, 1107

WITHHOLDING OF REMOVAL—Cont'd

Nonrefoulement, this index
Relief From Deportability, this index
Temporary Protected Status, this index

WORK

See Employment, this index

†